3.2.3. Commentaries after Albrektson. Since 1963, the theological analysis of Lamentations presented by Albrektson seems generally to have been accepted, even if it has been objected that he tends to overstate the retributive element of Deuteronomistic theology in Lamentations (inasmuch as he ignores the author's sympathy for the inhabitants of Jerusalem) and to question whether the inviolability of Zion and the impregnability of Jerusalem are actually identical concepts in the Hebrew Bible. One important development after Albrektson has been the tendency to place renewed emphasis on the importance of the expression of radical suffering as a legitimate and necessary aspect of sincere religious experience. This move is perhaps most extensively reflected in the work of C. Westermann, although F. Dobbs-Allsopp, J. Renkema, I. Provan, P. House and others also have advocated a similar focus of attention in recent years. From the perspective of discussions about the theological vision presented by the book of Lamentations, this move is particularly helpful because it focuses attention on the point at which the various strands of OT theology presented by the book of Lamentations actually come into contact with one another.

See also FEMINIST INTERPRETATION; HERMENEUTICS; LAMENTATIONS 1: BOOK OF; MEGILLOT AND FESTIVALS; TARGUMIM.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. B. Albrektson, Studies in the Text and Theology of the Book of Lamentations, with a Critical Edition of the Peshitta Text (STL 21; Lund: Gleerup, 1963); A. Berlin, Lamentations (OTL; Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 2002); C. M. M. Brady, The Rabbinic Targum of Lamentations: Vindicating God (SAIS 3; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 2003); J. Calvin, Commentaries on the Prophet Jeremiah and Lamentations, (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1950); F. W. Dobbs-Allsopp, Lamentations (IBC; Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 2002); D. A. Garret and P. R. House, Song of Songs, Lamentations (WBC 23B; Nashville: Thomas Nelson, 2004); N. K. Gottwald, Studies in the Book of Lamentations (Chicago: Allenson, 1954); W. C. Gwaltney Jr., "The Biblical Book of Lamentations in the Context of Ancient Near Eastern Lament Literature," in Scripture in Context II: More Essays on the Comparative Method, ed. W. W. Hallo, J. C. Moyer and L. G. Perdue (Winona Lake, IN: Eisenbrauns, 1983) 191-211; idem, "Lamentations, Book of," in Dictionary of Biblical Interpretation, ed. J. H. Hayes (2 vols.; Nashville: Abingdon, 1999) 2.44-48; D. Hillers, Lamentations (2nd ed.; AB 7A; Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1992); S. N. Kramer, "Sumerian Literature and the Bible," in Studia biblica et orientalia, 3: Oriens antiquus (AnBib 12; Rome: Pontifical Biblical Institute, 1959) 198-225; É. Lévine, The Aramaic Version of Lamentations (New York: Hermon Press, 1976); E. A. Matter, "The Lamentations Commentaries of Hrbanus Maurus and Paschius Radbertus," Traditio 38 (1982) 137-63; T. F. McDaniel, "Alleged Sumerian Influence on Lamentations," VT 18 (1968) 198-209; J. Neusner, A Theological Commentary to the Mid-rash, 5: Lamentations Rabbati (Lanham, MD: University Press of America, 2001); I. Provan, Lamentations (NCBC; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1991); J. Renkema, Lamentations, (HCOT; Leuven: Peeters, 1998); B. Smalley, The Study of the Bible in the Middle Ages (Oxford: Blackwell, 1983); C. Westermann, Lamentations: Issues and Interpretation (Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1994).

B. Pickut

LATE BIBLICAL HEBREW. SEE HEBREW LANGUAGE.

LAW

Legal analysis of the poetic books and other writings under consideration confronts a diverse set of genres, data and perspectives. Only a few common themes emerge. Of these, the most important may be law's relationship to the divine administration of justice in the world. Other issues to be addressed include allusions to law in poetic *imagery and the depiction of legal practice in narrative. These matters will be considered by means of examining each book's legal content and import.

In referring to "the law," the discussion below does not distinguish between biblical law, whether referred to in the Writings or in the Pentateuch, and the law of ancient Israel and Judah. No conclusive evidence exists, however, to show that the two were the same (Wells 2004, 11-15). There may have been significant overlap between the laws in the Bible and those in force in Israelite and Judahite society, especially in the postexilic period, but this is not certain. The law referred to in the poetic and narrative texts examined here, therefore, reveals what was considered right behavior from particular religious perspectives. It may or may not reveal information regarding operative societal law.

1. Divine Justice and Law
2. Poetic Imagery and Law
3. Narrative and Law
4. Summary

1. Divine Justice and Law.

Many of the psalms and numerous wisdom passages consider the justice, or injustice, of Yahweh's actions and his intervention in the affairs of life. The books of *Psalms and *Proverbs tend to present what was likely the traditional understanding of this issue in ancient Judah. Yahweh is just and is consistently so. The books of *Job and *Ecclesiastes raise critical questions regarding this understanding. All four books share, however, the assumptions that Yahweh is the final judge of human behavior, may put humans on trial, and gives blessings to those found righteous and punishment to those found guilty of sin (Avalos, 242-44). They view relationship with Yahweh through the eyes of law. Thus, much of the language used in the prayers, instructions and discourses of these writings also has legal meaning (Magdalene 2007a).

1.1. Psalms. At least two questions are pertinent to a legal analysis of the psalms. First, what was the "law" for the authors of the psalms? Their prayers, *laments, songs of *thanksgiving and other poetic expressions contain references to law in general and also to specific commandments. The latter include a number of prohibitions well known from the Pentateuch, including those against false oaths (Ps 10:7; 24:4), lending money at interest or accepting bribes (Ps 15:5), false accusation (Ps 27:12), robbery and economic abuse (Ps 62:10), the worship of foreign gods (Ps 81:9) and the mistreatment of widows and orphans (Ps 94:6). As implied above, though, this question is different from asking what was the law of the society in which the psalmists lived. Second, how did the authors of the psalms understand the function of what they called law with respect to their own and their community's relationship with Yahweh? In other words, why was it important or how was it beneficial for them to "keep" the law (e.g., Ps 119:34)? The answer to both questions could well lie in the psalms' connection to legal issues and perspectives that are found primarily, although not exclusively, in the book of Deuteronomy. It appears that the psalmists' law either is or is very much like Deuteronomic law (Miller). Moreover, a strongly Deuteronomic point of view underlies the psalmists' emphasis on adherence to the law. This connection to Deuteronomy manifests itself both in the psalms' legal vocabulary and in their view of divine retributive justice.

First, it is Deuteronomic terminology for law that pervades the psalms (e.g., Ps 7:6), especially the three so-called Torah psalms (Pss 1; 19; 119). The six key terms used are tôrâ ("law, teaching"), ʿēdūt ("decrees"), piqqûdîm ("precepts"), hōq ("statute, law"), mišwâ ("commandment") and mišpaṭ ("judgment, ruling"). Due to the poetic *parallelism in which these words occur, it is difficult to identify precise distinctions in meaning among them. They probably function in the psalms as various ways to refer to a particular body of law, which appears to derive, in large measure, from Deuteronomy. The "law [tôrâ] of Yahweh" in Psalm 1 points to Deuteronomy, since the specific statement about meditating on the tôrâ day and night occurs only in Psalm 1:2; Joshua 1:8. The latter clearly has the law of Deuteronomy in view, and this increases the likelihood that the former does as well. Furthermore, the authors of Psalm 19 and Psalm 119, as well as other passages (e.g., Ps 78:5), have clustered their key legal terms to place greater emphasis on the law. Similar clusters of these very terms occur almost exclusively in Deuteronomy and the Deuteronomistic History (Deut 5:31; 6:1; 7:11; 11:1; 26:16-17; 1 Kings 8:58; 2 Kings 17:37).

Second, the psalms and Deuteronomy share the same pronounced view of retributive justice. For Deuteronomy, it is obedience to Yahweh's commandments that will bring health, prosperity and success (Deut 15:4-6; 28:1-14). He requites disobedience with sickness, poverty and defeat (Deut 28:15-68). The psalmists' view is remarkably similar. For them, Yahweh is the supreme and righteous judge of the cosmos (e.g., Ps 7:8-11; 82:1). As such, he makes covenants (e.g., Ps 25:10; 89:3), investigates (bāḥan; hāqar; nāšā; pāqad; šārap) possible covenantal breaches (e.g., Ps 7:9; 17:3; 26:2; 44:21), and enforces the covenants with lawsuits (rib; mšpāt [e.g., Ps 82; 143:2]). Yahweh evaluates the degree to which an individual or a society adheres to covenantal law (Ps 78:10; 103:18) and blesses or punishes accordingly (Ps 1:5-6; 5:12; 9:17; 33:12; 37:17). At times, though, the psalmists believed that this system of justice had malfunctioned, and that the misfortune that they were experiencing was unfair. This was when they would petition Yahweh for assistance (e.g., Ps 4:1; 5:2; 17:1; 55:1-2; 119:154; 130:2-3), appealing to his own rules of justice and couching their prayers in terms that simultaneously carried religious and legal significance: "call" (qārā'), "hear" (šāma'), "listen" (he'ēzīn), "answer" (ānā), "redeem" (gā'al), "cry" (šāwa'), "prayer, supplication, petition" (tēpillā), "complaint" (šiaḥ) and numerous others (Bovati). The psalmists believed that Yahweh could be persuaded of the merit of their petitions and would then act on their behalf (Morrow, 47-48). The petitioners thus felt that they were justified in pleading for vindication for themselves (e.g., Ps 26:1) and ruin for their adversaries (e.g., Ps 143:11-12). Additionally, if the oppression resulted from a seemingly unfair divine judgment against the psalmist, he or she could petition Yahweh to rehear the case and could submit additional evidence of *righteousness to Yahweh (e.g., Ps 88).

1.2. Proverbs. The Wisdom literature in Proverbs reiterates in many respects the view of justice and much of the vocabulary contained in Psalms (e.g., Prov 18:17; 19:28; 23:11). It is "righteousness" that Yahweh will reward with economic prosperity, good fortune and long life; those who displease Yahweh, conversely, are punished (Prov 3:33; 10:24-25; 12:21). For these wisdom texts, being in the right includes behavior that accords with the law: accurate weights and measures (Prov 11:1; 20:23), justice in the judicial system (Prov 12:17; 14:25) and general obedience to the "commandments" (Prov 10:8; 13:13). When Proverbs addresses matters of law at length, it generally reveals an understanding that coincides with long-standing legal tradition. For instance, the discussion in Proverbs 6 about adultery fits well with what is known regarding laws governing adultery throughout the ancient Near East (Wells 2005). The text is addressed to men, and it contrasts prostitution (paying for sex with an unmarried woman) with adultery (having sex with a married woman, not simply any woman other than one's wife). The former will cost money or goods, but the latter can be lethal (Prov 6:26). Moreover, if a man commits adultery, his life is now in the hands of the offended husband, who has the legal right to decide the adulterer's fate (Prov 6:34-35) (see Marriage and Sex).

A righteous life includes, however, more than strict adherence to the law. Mere obedience no longer equals the blessing of Yahweh. The equation requires the addition of wisdom—that is, the range of virtues considered to accompany a life governed by wisdom: diligence (Prov 6:6-11; 10:4), generosity (Prov 14:31; 22:9), judicious speech (Prov 17:28; 21:23), humility (Prov 18:12; 22:4) and sexual fidelity (Prov 5:18-20), among others. If the psalmists' views on what would merit the blessing of Yahweh tend toward a "law alone" approach, those in Proverbs favor one that is "law plus."

This raises the question of the relationship between wisdom and law. Recent scholarship has adopted a variety of viewpoints on this issue. One position holds that wisdom, in a sense, gave birth to law. According to this view, early Israel, as revealed in portions of the Pentateuch, functioned more or less as a loose collection of households and kinship groups and had no binding law that transcended the authority of family and clan leaders. Disputes would have been resolved, therefore, not by means of established rules but rather by appeal to the collective wisdom and experience of the groups and leaders involved in the dispute. Over time, as legal thinking evolved, many of the rules that were concretized in pentateuchal law originated in the accumulated store of this tribal wisdom from an earlier era (Blenkinsopp). The importance of this type of wisdom may have led not only to legal traditions that later took written form but also to the practice of recording wisdom instructions in writing. This might explain the similar statements found in both legal and wisdom texts on topics such as treatment of one's parents (Ex 21:17; Prov 20:20), deceptive business practices (Deut 25:15; Prov 11:1; 16:11) and respect for property boundaries (Deut 19:14; Prov 22:28; 23:10). Thus, proponents of this position maintain that much of pentateuchal law likely developed within an intellectual environment steeped in wisdom rather than within a forensic setting (Jackson, 45-59).

Another point of view finds the idea that wisdom birthed law highly questionable. It can be argued that if one derives from the other, then wisdom derives from law and that the evolutionary understanding of Israelite society assumed by the first view may not be accurate. In fact, it seems equally legitimate to conclude that pentateuchal texts intend to portray early Israel as being governed by a substantial body of formal legal rules (Barmash, 20-27). The rise of wisdom may well have come later as an attempt to move from a strictly rules-based system that operated only within rigid boundaries to an advice-based way of living that had implications for areas of life outside the bounds of law. The range of advice and topics that arise in Wisdom literature, consequently, can be seen as grounded in but reaching well beyond the law (Krüger 1997). Ultimately, though, the book of Proverbs itself provides insufficient data to determine with any degree of certainty wisdom's precise relationship with law. Assertions about an organic relationship between law and wisdom must remain tentative (Crenshaw 1995, 419-25). There is some textual evidence for the view that wisdom is based in law, but this comes only in later Jewish Wisdom literature, particularly *Sirach, which proclaims the student of wisdom to be primarily a student of tôrâ (Sir 24:23; 38:34b; 39:8).

1.3. Job. With the book of Job a different perspective on law and justice begins to appear. Scholarship on Job has revealed that the book is replete with legal content. Most notably, the book tends to follow the format and procedures of a trial (Scholnick). It seems that the author's purpose for this elaborate trial story is to explore a common conception in his day that those who undergo suffering are the subject of a divine trial and of retributive punishment if found guilty. The characters of the book generally agree on how justice should operate: the wicked should experience suffering as punishment for their wickedness, while the righteous should be blessed. They disagree, however, regarding whether or not justice actually does work this way and, if it does not, whether Yahweh or God (hereafter "God" because the Joban text alternates terminology) should be held responsible (Newsom, 336).

Much disagreement exists among scholars regarding who brings the legal action in Job, the nature of the action, the bases of the charge, when the charge is brought, who is the trial's judge, and so forth. From a legal comparative perspective, whereby the book's legal metaphors are examined in light of ancient Near Eastern trial procedure, the book may be described as follows. The trial is complex but seems to begin when the *Satan brings a formal legal accusation against Job in the *divine council that Job possesses a blasphemous mind (Job 1:11; 2:5). God must permit the trial to proceed in order not to corrupt or circumvent the existing divine legal system. Thus, Job endures a torturous legal investigation. The Satan's hope is to hear Job blaspheme God to his face, an act that would serve as the best evidence on the charge before the council (Magdalene 2007b, chap. 5). Job assumes, though, that God is the accusing party and decides to countersue God (Habel, 38; Westbrook 1988, 35 n. 134). He claims that God is guilty of abuse of authority (Job 10:2-7; 19:6-7), primarily for bringing a suit that lacks sufficient justification.

The book's law reflects important aspects of the legal system in force during the Neo-Babylonian and early Persian periods. During those periods, for instance, Mesopotamian trial courts often required the accusing party to produce a second accuser or corroborating witness before finding the defendant guilty (Magdalene 2004). This practice may reveal why Job seeks to find someone to join his claim as a second accuser against God (Job 19:25), but no one is willing. Instead of taking Job's position, the three friends seek to impeach Job, impugn his integrity, and defend God. Adopting the Deuteronomic view of retributive justice, they believe that Job's punishment is an appropriate divine response to a sin that he surely must have committed (Job 22:4-11). The friends insist that Job plead guilty and seek God's mercy.

Elihu's appearance on the scene in Job 32 has been the cause of no little debate. Most scholars see him and his speeches as an editorial insertion subsequent to the original composition of the book. Within the legal framework described above, though, his appearance is not necessarily intrusive. Elihu contends that Job's speeches do indeed constitute blasphemy. He goes on to accuse Job directly and offers a prosecutorial speech (Job 34). In this way, Elihu becomes the Satan's second accuser in the trial before the divine council. He thereby picks up where the Satan left off and completes the case against Job (Magdalene 2007b, chap. 9).

What happens at the end of the book can reasonably be characterized as an out-of-court settlement (Magdalene 2007b, chap. 10). Job, perhaps intimidated by the forcefulness of God's defense and certainly without a second accuser, concedes in his countersuit. God, though having defended himself vigorously, seems forced to admit that allowing the suit against Job to go forward was unfair (Job 42:8; cf. Job 42:11). There is no decisive legal victory for either party, opening up the possibility for settlement. The existence of the settlement is apparent from God's restoration of Job's children, property and honor. Such restoration, particularly doubling Job's previous property, strongly resembles—given evidence from ancient Near Eastern trial records—the penalty that might have been imposed on God had Job's countersuit been successful. Settlements often mirrored, at least in part, damage payments that a court might award, but they avoided the humiliation of a formal finding of guilt. In the end, the book falls short of refuting the claim that God justly controls the suffering of humankind, but it opens the door for critical assessment of that proposition.

1.4. Ecclesiastes. Understanding the treatment of law in Ecclesiastes requires a decision regarding the book's literary integrity and purpose because it seems to contain conflicting ideologies and approaches to the law. At times, the book appears dismissive of any sure reliance on the law (e.g., Eccles 7:15; 8:14-17). At other times, the book speaks as if it embraces a traditional understanding of the import of following the law (e.g., Eccles 11:9). This is particularly true of the epilogue, which advocates, albeit briefly, a very high view of the law or the "commandments" (mišwôt) and maintains that the law is "the whole duty of man because God will bring every deed into judgment (mišpāt)" (Eccles 12:13-14).

As a result, scholars hold profoundly different views of the literary integrity and purpose of the book. One view argues that a single author wrote the whole of the book. The question confronting those who hold this position is whether the author sought ultimately to refute traditional wisdom, theology and law (Crenshaw 1987) or held a more conflicted attitude toward these ideas (Fox). A second view contends that one author wrote most portions of the book, but a later editor inserted glosses of a more traditional nature to soften the radical views of the text (Murphy 1990b, 49-63). A third view maintains that the composer of the book's prologue and epilogue used the speeches of *Qohelet as a foil to demonstrate the weaknesses in Qohelet's arguments; the point of the book comes in the epilogue (Longman). Deciding between these views may depend on how one understands the purpose of the epilogue. Is it attempting to correct the ideas of Qohelet? Or does the epilogue reflect a genuine endorsement of Qohelet's critical, even skeptical, approach? The debate continues, but most recent scholarship tends to see the epilogue as congruent with Qohelet's speeches (Krüger 2004, 207-15).

If Qohelet's speeches do indeed convey much of the book's message, it can be said that the book's reception of law, wisdom and the traditional view of divine *retribution is significantly less enthusiastic than that in much of Proverbs. Instead of regarding a priori the traditional understanding of law and justice as normative, the book measures that understanding against lived experience and finds it wanting, much like Job (Eccles 4:1-3). To be sure, the book does not entirely abandon the concept of divine retribution, nor does it omit references to matters of law; however, it affords neither one a prominent place in its discourses. One of its key points may be that a monolithic view of life and the workings of divine justice is shortsighted or even naïve.

The explicitly legal issues raised by the text are few. It laments injustice in the judicial system (Eccles 3:16); its call for the fulfillment of vows (Eccles 5:4-6) may hark back to pentateuchal statements regarding promissory oaths (Lev 5:4); and it values timely enforcement of the law (Eccles 8:11). Yet, in its discussion of each of these and other issues (e.g., Eccles 10:20) the text's overriding concern is to keep in proper perspective aspects of life that lie outside the scope of law. A legalistic approach to life, as found in some other Second Temple texts (e.g., Bar 3:9; 4:1), is rejected.

2. Poetic Imagery and Law.

The poetic texts of the *Song of Songs and *Lamentations attempt to capture emotions and experiences that are difficult to put into words. The language is often figurative and highly evocative. At first glance, the books seem to say little about law, though certain passages do have legal concerns in view.

2.1. Song of Songs. The poems collected here utilize sexual imagery, and most sexual relations were governed by law. Early in the book the principal female refers to an argument with her brothers over the guarding of her "vineyard" (Song 1:6). This word can have sexual connotations, and the woman's failure to guard her vineyard may refer to the loss of her virginity. At the end of the book, the brothers reenter the picture and claim that they will "build upon" or "enclose" (Song 8:9) their sister as a way to protect her and, presumably, her sexuality. These texts raise legal issues, though there is a fair amount of uncertainty regarding their interpretation (Murphy 1990a).

The book likely refers to a premarital tryst or, at the very least, the potentiality of such. Premarital sex can be defined as taking place before the woman is betrothed. The betrothal period was a type of inchoate marriage, and it commenced upon the payment of the bride price by the groom's family to the bride's. Like adultery, premarital sex was defined in terms only of the marital status of the woman involved. The marital status of the man was irrelevant. If the woman was either inchoately or fully married, for any man to have sex with her constituted adultery. If she was not yet betrothed, and a married man had sex with her, their relations would not be considered adulterous (Wells 2005).

Though not nearly as serious as adultery, premarital sex did have legal consequences. For example, the law in Exodus 22:16-17 requires a man who has sex with an unbetrothed virgin to pay her father an amount equivalent to a standard bride price, even if the father refuses to let his daughter marry the man (cf. Deut 22:28-29). The law's concern centers on the father's economic well-being. It is unlikely that the father would be able to obtain a full bride price (or even one at all) once his daughter has already had sexual relations with a man. Correspondingly, the brothers in Song of Songs probably are concerned about their economic welfare rather than their sister's safety or virtue. Although fathers typically were the ones to negotiate with their daughter's potential suitors and to make the final arrangements for the marriage, it was not uncommon for brothers to assume this role (Roth, 5-6).

2.2. Lamentations. This collection of poems mourns the destruction of Jerusalem at the hands of the Babylonians (587/586 BC) and grieves bitterly over the resulting hardships and horrors for the city's people. Although each poem may come from a different author, all of them share an interpretive framework as they attempt to understand what has happened and why. This framework comes in large part from the traditional view of divine justice reflected in Psalms and Proverbs. Punishment and disaster come from Yahweh because of sin and disobedience (Lam 1:8-9, 18; 4:13; 5:7); marauding armies are simply tools in his hand. In fact, not one of the poems explicitly mentions the direct cause of the devastation, the Babylonians. Nevertheless, some texts appear to question the fairness of how Yahweh has dealt with Jerusalem (e.g., Lam 2:20; 5:20). This questioning is not the same as that of the author of Job, whose protagonist is innocent and sees no justice whatsoever in his suffering. Instead, Lamentations reflects an attitude that admits to wrongdoing but disputes whether the severity of the punishment fits the severity of the crime (Dobbs-Allsopp). Several lines refer to Yahweh's refusal to show mercy or have pity (hāmāl [Lam 2:2, 17, 21; 3:43]), and the two most hopeful of the poems end with an angry, demanding tone (Lam 3; 5).

This interpretive framework also possesses judicial overtones. As in Psalms, the poets here are bringing their case before Yahweh. The language of litigation comes through strongly in Lamentations 3, where the metaphor likely is one of legal appeal. The poet begins with reference to his "crying" (zā'aq) and "pleading" (šāwa') to Yahweh but fears that his "petition/" prayer” (tēpillā) has been ignored (Lam 3:8; cf. Lam 3:44). He characterizes his cause as a “law-suit” (mīšpāt [Lam 3:35]; rib [Lam 3:36]), and in Lamentations 3:58-59 he uses specific language appropriate to appeals: “You have litigated [rib] the litigations of my life [ribē napšī]. . . . May you now judge my judgment [šapēṭā mīšpāṭī].” To initiate this appeal, the poet has “summoned” or “called” (*qārā*⁷ [Lam 3:55, 57]) Yahweh to “draw nigh” (qārab [Lam 3:57]) so that his “cry for relief” (rēwāhā, šaw‘ā [Lam 3:56]) will not go unheard (*šama‘*⁸ [Lam 3:56]). Thus, the poet feels as if he and his people have already been convicted and sentenced and must now ask Yahweh to reconsider their cause. In the end, though, the poets of Lamentations seem uncertain of what the future will hold. The tragedy that they have experienced stunts their confidence that Yahweh will mitigate their sentence and award them vindication.

3. Narrative and Law.

The books of *Ruth and *Esther diverge significantly in their treatments of law. The author of Ruth seems to have stayed close to known legal traditions and practices and to have modified them little for the sake of the story. Esther, in contrast, plays with law and appears to misrepresent standard legal practice at several points in the narrative.

3.1. Ruth. The legal content of the book of Ruth relates primarily to matters of redemption and levirate marriage (see Kinsman-Redeemer and Levirate). With respect to both issues, however, the book assumes a fair amount of knowledge on the part of the reader. Thus, difficulties confront a thorough legal analysis. The major crux comes in Ruth 4:1-6, when the rules governing redemption and levirate marriage intersect.

Redemption of a plot of land would have occurred only after that land had been sold. In Ruth 4:3 *Boaz speaks of the sale of land belonging to *Naomi. A number of English translations (KJV, RSV, NRSV, NIV) render the Hebrew verb mākērā (from the root mkr, “sell”) in the present tense to say that Naomi “is selling” the land. This understanding is problematic (Zevit). First, the verb mākērā is a perfect and is most naturally translated in the past tense. Second, the text would not refer to the act of “redeeming” (gā‘al) the land (Ruth 4:4) were Naomi still in possession of it and looking to sell it. Redemption was, in essence, the act of buying back. At times, those who were facing destitution sold their land to another for less than the land’s fair market value. Although this practice was allowed, it was deemed vital that each family retain the right to regain ownership of its inheritable land (e.g., Lev 25:23-28). Property sold in this way, therefore, could be repurchased (redeemed) by the sellers themselves or by a relative, typically for the same low price at which it had been sold (Westbrook 1991, 90-117). This seems to be the situation envisioned in Ruth. It can be inferred that Naomi and her husband sold their land out of desperation before moving to Moab. In Ruth 4 it is now time for that land to be redeemed—bought back—not by Naomi, who is without sufficient resources, but rather by her nearest male relative.

The unnamed relative in question is happy to redeem the land until Boaz raises the specter of levirate marriage. As Naomi’s nearest male relative, this man is first in line to act as redeemer, to inherit the land upon Naomi’s passing, and to fulfill the requirements of levirate marriage. In his initial willingness to help Naomi, he appears focused only on the first two and has overlooked the third until Boaz reminds him (Ruth 4:5). He then changes his mind. Why? The law of levirate marriage, as described in Deuteronomy 25:5-10, required that a deceased husband’s brother marry the widow, but only if the deceased had no sons. The purpose was to give the widow an opportunity to bear a son who would keep alive the “name” of the deceased—that is, the deceased’s title or right to his portion of inheritable land (Westbrook 1991, 71-77). The brother who married the widow would be fathering a son who would receive the deceased’s portion of the estate, a portion to which the brother might otherwise be entitled. The author of Ruth, though, assumes that in the absence of brothers, the responsibility for marrying the widow—here, Ruth—falls to the nearest male relative. This is essentially what Boaz makes clear to the unnamed relative and what changes the latter’s mind. He does not wish to be encumbered with this responsibility if, in the end, Ruth should bear a son who would then inherit the redeemed land and likely be entitled, as a son, to a share of this man’s property as well (Davies). He states that he does not want to “endanger my own estate” (Ruth 4:6 NIV).

On more minor points of law, the book is somewhat obscure. Naomi is said to have sold the land (Ruth 4:3), but whether women always had the right to buy and sell land in the ancient Near East is doubtful. Evidence for this right comes mostly from later periods. Some argue that Naomi's role as seller thus points to an exilic or postexilic dating of Ruth (Zevit). That may be so, but it is not unreasonable to imagine Naomi acting as a joint seller with her husband or even as his agent. The book also describes the transaction between Boaz and the relative as taking place at the city gate and before a group of city elders. This is not a trial, as some have concluded, but rather a negotiation at which the elders serve as observing witnesses (Wells 2004, 28-29). That negotiations and transactions of this sort were required to take place in such a high-profile venue in ancient Judah is, however, unlikely. Finally, when Naomi takes the child to her bosom and becomes his nurse (Ruth 4:16), the neighborhood women declare, "A son has been born to Naomi" (Ruth 4:17). This is unusual from a legal perspective. We would have expected the text to say that a child was born to Ruth's first husband by operation of the levirate. If, on the other hand, this were an instance of surrogacy parenthood, Naomi would have taken the child "upon her knee" and accepted the child as her own (Gen 30:3). Since the book of Ruth follows neither of these traditions, it appears to present in this instance a deviation from traditional biblical law.

3.2. Esther. The law in Esther is difficult to analyze. Recent scholarship has emphasized the satirical and even comedic nature of the book (Berlin). A number of passages may thus contain exaggerations, distortions or outright fabrications for dramatic effect (Craig). Examples include the inordinate feasting and carousing (Esther 1:4-5), the year-long pampering of each would-be queen before the king has sex with her (Esther 2:12-14), and the huge number of killings carried out by the Jews (Esther 9:16-17).

One particular difficulty arises with the book's use of the Persian loanword dāt ("law, decree, edict"). The word occurs frequently, but several of its uses appear to reflect the author's literary concerns rather than actual legal practice. The decree, for instance, that each husband "should be ruler over his own household" (Esther 1:22 NIV) is unlike any known royal edict. The same is true of the other decrees in the book, especially as they are articulated in the Additions to Esther. The rule that individuals who appear unsummoned before the king are put to death (Esther 4:11) sounds more like legend than law. The idea that any decree "written in the laws of Persia and Media . . . cannot be repealed" (Esther 1:19 NIV) may also fit this category. That this same idea appears in Daniel (e.g., Dan 6:8) confirms its renown in Jewish lore but not necessarily its historicity (Valeta). The basic purpose of these legal pronouncements is to depict a petty, paranoid and grandiose Persian administration.

On the other hand, several elements in the book may relate to operative law known to the author through experience or tradition. First, the language used to describe the adoption of Esther by *Mordecai (Esther 2:7) matches standard ancient Near Eastern language for this type of legal transaction. Second, Haman's accusation against the Jews (Esther 3:8-9) is couched in terms of treason. The text may be attempting to place Haman in the role of an official, known in Persian times as the "eye of the king," whose duty it was to guard against sedition and to denounce those suspected of such activity (Magdalene 2007b, chap. 5 n. 17). Third, the reference in Addition A to the interrogation of those plotting to assassinate the king (Add Esth 12:3) is striking. Interrogation of suspects in southern Mesopotamia during the Neo-Babylonian, Persian and Hellenistic periods often involved torture and was designed to extract confessions (Magdalene 2007b, chap. 4). This is precisely what the text describes. Other parts of the story, such as the method for publishing new laws (e.g., Esther 3:12-14) and execution by hanging (Esther 7:10), are legally plausible, though they cannot be directly confirmed by historical evidence. This is not to say that these elements confirm the narrative's historical nature; rather, they may reflect instances when the author incorporated matters of law that required no substantial modification for literary purposes.

4. Summary.

What these books reveal about law is important in at least two respects. First, apart from the book of Esther, the texts tend to treat the actual practice of law in keeping with pentateuchal legal traditions. Esther seems to parody certain non-Judahite legal traditions in order to satirize imperial structures. Second, this material, when taken together, reveals conflicting assessments of divine justice. The books of Psalms, Proverbs and, to a large degree, Lamentations side mainly with the traditional understanding that Yah-weh's justice system is fair. Other texts, primarily Job and Ecclesiastes, begin to raise questions regarding this standard view of divine justice. They challenge whether obedience to the law or even a life guided by both law and wisdom will inevitably be rewarded with the hallmark features of Yahweh's blessing: good health, prosperity, social respect, long life. This unorthodox perspective must have competed with the more official stance that became ensconced in some later Second Temple literature such as Sirach. In the end, both the early Jewish and Christian communities welcomed both points of view into their sacred canon.

See also ETHICS; KINSMAN-REDEEMER AND LEVIRATE; WISDOM THEOLOGY.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. H. Avalos, Illness and Health Care in the Ancient Near East: The Role of the Temple in Greece, Mesopotamia, and Israel (HSM 54; Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1995); P. Barmash, Homicide in the Biblical World (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2005); A. Berlin, Esther (JPSBC; Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society, 2001); J. Blenkinsopp, Wisdom and Law in the Old Testament: The Ordering of Life in Israel and Early Judaism (rev. ed.; Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1995); P. Bovati, Re-Establishing Justice: Legal Terms, Concepts and Procedures in the Hebrew Bible (JSOTSup 105; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1994); K. M. Craig Jr., Reading Esther: A Case for the Literary Carnavalesque (LCBI; Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 1995); J. L. Crenshaw, Ecclesiastes (OTL; Philadelphia: Westminster, 1987); idem, Urgent Advice and Probing Questions: Collected Writings on Old Testament Wisdom (Macon, GA: Mercer University Press, 1995); E. W. Davies, "Inheritance Rights and the Hebrew Levirate Marriage, Part 2." VT 31 (1981) 257-68; F. W. Dobbs-Allsopp, "Tragedy, Tradition, and Theology in the Book of Lamentations," JSOT 74 (1997) 29-60; M. V. Fox, A Time to Tear Down and a Time to Build Up: A Rereading of Ecclesiastes (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1999); N. C. Habel, The Book of Job (OTL; Philadelphia: Westminster, 1985); B. S. Jackson, Wisdom-Laws: A Study of the Mishpatim of Exodus 21:1-22:16 (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2006); T. Krüger, "Die Rezeption der Tora im Buch Kohelet," in Das Buch Kohelet: Studien zur Struktur, Geschichte, Rezeption und Theologie, ed. L. Schwienhorst-Schönberger (BZAW 254; Berlin: de Gruyter, 1997) 303-25; idem, Qohelet (Hermeneia; Minneapolis: Fortress, 2004); T. Longman

III, The Book of Ecclesiastes (NICOT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1998); F. R. Magdalene, "Who Is Job's Redeemer? Job 19:25 in Light of Neo-Babylonian Law," ZABR 10 (2004) 292-316; idem, "The ANE Legal Origins of Impairment as Theological Disability and the Book of Job," PRSt 34 (2007a) 23-60; idem, On the Scales of Righteousness: Neo-Babylonian Trial Law and the Book of Job (BJS 348; Providence, RI: Brown Judaic Studies, 2007b); P. D. Miller, "Deuteronomy and Psalms: Evoking a Biblical Conversation," JBL 118 (1999) 3-18; W. S. Morrow, Protest against God: The Eclipse of a Biblical Tradition (Sheffield: Sheffield Phoenix Press, 2006); R. E. Murphy, The Song of Songs: A Commentary on the Book of Canticles or the Song of Songs (Hermeneia; Minneapolis: Fortress, 1990a); idem, The Tree of Life: An Exploration of Biblical Wisdom Literature (ABRL; New York: Doubleday, 1990b); C. Newsom, "The Book of Job," NIB 4.319-637; M. T. Roth, Babylonian Marriage Agreements, 7th-3rd Centuries B.C. (AOAT 222; Kevelaer: Butzon & Bercker; Neukirchen-Vluyn: Neukirchener Verlag, 1989); S. H. Scholnick, "The Meaning of Mispat in the Book of Job," JBL 101 (1982) 521-29; D. Valeta, "Court or Jester Tales? Resistance and Social Reality in Daniel 1-6," PRSt 32 (2005) 309-24; B. Wells, The Law of Testimony in the Pentateuchal Codes (BZABR 4; Wiesbaden: Harrassowitz, 2004); idem, "Sex, Lies, and Virginal Rape: The Slandered Bride and False Accusation in Deuteronomy," JBL 124 (2005) 41-72; R. Westbrook, Studies in Biblical and Cuneiform Law (CahRB 26; Paris: Gabalda, 1988); idem, Property and Family in Biblical Law (JSOTSup 113; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1991); Z. Zevit, "Dating Ruth: Legal, Linguistic and Historical Observations," ZAW 117 (2005) 574-600.

B. Wells and F. R. Magdalene

LEMUEL AND AGUR

The dearth of data inhibits us from saying anything definite about Agur and Lemuel except that they are non-Israelite *sages to whom a part or the whole of Proverbs 30—31 is attributed. The LXX and the Vulgate do not recognize the words as names. Early rabbis discovered epithets for *Solomon in 'āgūr and lēmū'el rather than two names of sages. Now, however, it is generally accepted that "Agur" and "Lemuel" are the names of two foreign sages, not noms de plume for Solomon. If maśśā', traditionally rendered "burden" or "prophetic oracle," is to be taken as a place name “Massa,” then Agur and Lemuel can be considered sages of the East whose wisdom is recognized and admired in ancient Israel. Both the style and the content of the proverbs collated in Proverbs 30—31 seem to provide additional confirmation of their foreign origin.

1. Early Jewish Interpretation
2. Sages of the East
3. Agur’s Proverbs
4. Lemuel’s Proverbs

1. Early Jewish Interpretation.

The rabbis discovered allegorical designations for Solomon in ʾāgûr and lēmûʾēl instead of personal names. According to Midrash Exodus 6:1 (also see Midr. Num. 10:4; Midr. Song 1:10; Midr. Eccles. 1:2), Solomon was called Agur, son of Jakeh, because he collected (ʾāgar) the words of Torah but then spat them out (hēki) by ignoring the warning against multiplying wives. The Vulgate is reminiscent of this Jewish tradition: verba congregantis filii vomentis (“words of the collector, the son of the vomiter”). Midrash Proverbs, however, provides a different interpretation, although it also regards “Agur” and “Lemuel” as epithets for Solomon. Solomon was so called because he girded (hāgar) his loins for wisdom and freed himself (nāqī) from sin (Midr. Prov. 30:1). In either way, bēn, the Hebrew word for “son,” is taken metaphorically as a designation of the bearer of the quality rather than literally. “Lemuel” is another appellation for Solomon in that he spoke “to or against God” (lēmô ʾēl) and said, “I can multiply wives without sinning” (Midr. Eccles. 1:2). In Proverbs 31:1 the LXX, which does not recognize a Hebrew proper name in “Lemuel,” echoes this rabbinic interpretation: hoi emoi logoi eirēntai hypo theou (“my words spoken by God”). A story in Midrash Numbers 10:4 provides another interpretation of the name. It relates that Solomon married Pharaoh’s daughter on the eve of the dedication of the temple. She kept him awake with music until late at night and made him sleep late into morning by covering his bed with a canopy. The next morning, the dedication service could not be performed until his mother, Bathsheba, intervened. According to this story, Solomon is called “Lemuel” because he belittled the temple of God, as if to say, “What use is God to him [lammâ lôʾēl].”

These midrashic interpretations, for which there is no palpable evidence, originate in the assumption that the entire book of *Proverbs is the work of Solomon. This assumption is in turn based on a literal understanding of the title in Proverbs 1:1 as meaning that Solomon himself wrote all of Proverbs. The book of Proverbs, however, constitutes a collection of materials whose authors and backgrounds are varied. This has led modern scholars to argue that the words are in fact two proper names, not noms de plume for Solomon.

2. Sages of the East.

Scholarly consensus is that Agur and Lemuel are non-Israelite sages. In support of this consensus is the recognition of maśśāʾ (Prov 30:1; 31:1) as a place name rather than as a reference to a “prophetic oracle.” Although taking maśśāʾ as a toponym necessitates an emendation of the Masoretic hammaśśāʾ (“oracle”) to hammaśśāʾi (“the Massaite”) or to mimmaśśāʾ (“from Massa”) in Proverbs 30:1 and relocation of athnach under maśśāʾ in Proverbs 31:1, many scholars see more problems in keeping the MT as it stands. For instance, it is impossible to translate lēmûʾēl melek as “King Lemuel” because melek (“king”) should be marked for definiteness (hammelek [“the king”]), as rendered by the *Targum (lmʾl mlkʾ). Moreover, an understanding of hammaśśāʾ as a “prophetic oracle” in Proverbs 30:1 does not fit well with the individual and reflexive tone of what follows (cf. Prov 30:2-9). Likewise, the use of maśśāʾ as a prophetic oracle in Proverbs 31:1 does not harmonize with the admonitions (cf. yissērattû [“she instructed him”]) that follow. The interpretation of maśśāʾ as a place name is attested in the medieval version Graecus Venetus, in the Arabic Van Dyke version, and by many modern English translations (RSV, JB, NAB, NEB, NJPS).

If maśśāʾ is to be taken as a proper name, its approximate location can be inferred from its other attestations in biblical and extrabiblical sources. Massa in Genesis 25:14 and 1 Chronicles 1:30 (cf. Gen 10:23) may refer to either an area or a people northwest of the desert of North Arabia, since Dumah and Teima, which precede and follow maśśāʾ respectively in the ethnonymic list, are located in the Arabic desert. First-millennium cuneiform sources also attest to the biblical Massa. Two of them are worth noting here. First, the Summary Inscriptions of Tiglath-Pileser III (744-727 BC) lists Massa among a nomadic group that paid tribute to him on the borders of Palestine (see COS 2.117B:288). There, Massa is listed along with peoples such as Tema (cf. Gen 25:14), Saba (cf. Job 1:15) and Hayappâ (biblical Ephah [cf. Is 60:6]), which are located in North Arabia. Second, one of the Nabû-šum-lišir letters (ABL 260) reports an assault by Ayakabaru, chieftain of Massa. Since Nabû-šum-lišir served as an officer under Assurbanipal (688-627 BC) in the southwestern border region of Babylonia, the land of Massa may have been located anywhere in North Arabia. In summary, the textual evidence suggests North Arabia as the location of Massa.

Additional historical support for Agur and Lemuel as being non-Israelite sages comes from North and South Arabian inscriptions. The consonantal name ʾgr is attested in one of the Nabatean inscriptions: “Agur, the avenger (?), has been removed” (van den Branden, 495). Similarly, the consonantal name yqh appears as an element of composite names, such as yqhmlk in a Sabaean inscription (Ryckmans, 1.81). Considering that the names are not known elsewhere in biblical or epigraphic Hebrew, their attestations in Arabian inscriptions, along with the identification of Massa as a North Arabian tribe, is suggestive of the identity of Agur and Jakeh. Although it is historically improbable to identify the biblical Agur and Jakeh with any of these figures in the inscriptions, the existence of namesakes in Arabia adds cogency to the assertion that Agur son of Jakeh belonged to one of the nomadic tribes in North Arabia. Lemuel has no other biblical or extrabiblical attestation. However the name might be analyzed, it is generally accepted that “Lemuel” is a non-Israelite name (cf. lāʾēl [“belonging to God”]; lšmš [“belong to Shamash”]; ištar-išsu [“Ishtar is his God?”]; ymʾil [“Yammu is God?”]).

Taking Agur and Lemuel as foreign sages, particularly sages of the East, and their proverbs as Eastern wisdom goes well with the biblical attitude toward foreign wisdom, particularly the wisdom of the people of the East. It is well known from biblical sources that foreign wisdom was recognized and admired by ancient Hebrews. In 1 Kings 5:10 Solomon’s wisdom is compared with that of both Egypt and the people of the East, assuming the excellence of the latter. *David quotes an “eastern” proverb (mēšal haqqadmōnī) as he spares Saul’s life (1 Sam 24:13 [MT 24:14]). We read in Jeremiah 49:7 and Obadiah 8 of wise men of Teman and Edom and of their wisdom. Finally, *Job was a sage from the peoples of the East, as his residence in Uz may suggest. It may not be a coincidence that Job’s three friends also come from the same general geographic area. It may even be said that Proverbs constitutes an international anthology of wisdom literature. In it, we have not only Israelite wisdom but also foreign wisdom that has been borrowed as authentic wisdom and adapted to Israelite use (cf. Prov 22:17–24:22).

3. Agur’s Proverbs.

3.1. Extent of Agur’s Proverbs. The extent of Agur’s words has been the subject of much scholarly debate. The question concerns not only their end point but also where they begin. The latter question is posed precisely due to the enigmatic lēʾitīʾēl lēʾitīʾēl wēʾūkāl (Prov 30:1), which, as it stands, gives two hearers of the words: “to Ithiel, to Ithiel and Ucal.” The infelicitous repetition of “Ithiel” and the improbability of “Ucal” as a name have led modern scholars to emend or repoint vowels so as to make a sentence out of the phrase (for various proposals, see textual notes in the MT or Clifford, 260). The NEB, for instance, translates it as “I am weary, O God, I am weary and worn out” (cf. ESV, NRSV, NLT). The NAB renders it as “I am not God; I am not God that I should prevail.” There is no solid linguistic or historical evidence that would tip the scales in favor of one emendation or another. One’s overall understanding of Agur’s theology seems to be the major factor in any decision. Those who regard Agur’s words as atheistic tend to emend it to say, “There is no God, there is no God” (lāʾ ʾitay ēl lāʾ ʾitay ēl).

The question of where Agur’s proverbs end is equally difficult to answer. The decision is often made on the basis of one’s understanding of Agur’s proverbs. Those who see Agur as agnostic or atheistic, for example, do not want Agur’s words to go beyond Proverbs 30:4, for Proverbs 30:5-9 appears fairly orthodox. Apart from the fact that Proverbs 30:2-4 does not necessarily project Agur as a cynic, however, semantic disjunction does not evidence a different voice in the Wisdom literature where juxtaposition of discrete themes is the norm. Since the text does not clearly break the sayings by introducing any sage or title, it may be assumed that the entirety of Proverbs 30 belongs to Agur’s proverbs.

3.2. Agur's Proverbs as International Wisdom. Agur's proverbs reveal many cross-cultural characteristics both in style and content. Rhetorical questions in Proverbs 30:4, for example, are reminiscent of divine questions posed to Job, an eastern sage (cf. Job 38). Recently, van Leeuwen has shown that the first question in Proverbs 30:4 is found in variant form in Mesopotamian texts (cf. Dialogue of Pessimism; Gilgamesh). High respect for God's words and their strict preservation in Proverbs 30:5-6 find parallels in ancient *scribes' conservative attitude to traditional wisdom; Ptahhotep cautions with reference to his own work, "Don't take a word and then add nothing thereto, Don't put one thing in place of another" (cf. Lichtheim, 75). Merikare was told, "Copy your fathers and your ancestors. . . . See, their words endure in writing" (cf. Lichtheim, 99). Even the prayer in Proverbs 30:7-9 is without parallel in ancient wisdom; avoiding extremes and keeping to the middle way is considered characteristic of a wise man in Egyptian wisdom (cf. The Instructions of Ptahhotep). Numerical sayings, such as in Proverbs 30:15-30, are also widely employed in ancient Near Eastern literatures (cf. Ahiqar, lines 92-93 [KTU 1.4 III:17-21]). These cross-cultural features, however, are redacted to accommodate Yahwistic piety in Proverbs 30. Although Agur's prayer in Proverbs 30:7-9, for instance, counsels the golden mean by denying both riches and poverty, Agur's desire to remain faithful to Yahweh informs the entire prayer. The concern for the golden mean here is not an end in itself as in Egyptian wisdom but rather serves as a means for expressing Yahwistic piety. Some scholars aver that Proverbs 30:5-9, which are religious in tone, must be a later addition to the original words of Agur in Proverbs 30:2-4. From the earliest date, however, religious piety has been an important part of Wisdom literature, not only of Israel but also of its ancient neighbors. It would be fairer to say that a Jewish editor appropriated cross-cultural topoi, including religious piety, to advance Israelite Yahwism in Proverbs 30.

4. Lemuel's Proverbs.

The proverbs attributed to Lemuel also reveal international features. They take the form of royal instructions, widely attested in the Ancient Near East (cf. Merikare [Lichtheim, 97-112]; Amenemhet I [Lichtheim, 135-38]; Advice to a Prince [Lambert, 110-15]). Although it is extremely rare that such instructions are attributed to the queen mother, she was often referred to as the source of wisdom. She had a role in the education of her children and was often instrumental in selecting a wife for her son. Moreover, the instructions of Lemuel's mother reflect an ancient Near Eastern royal ideology. The instructions addressed to Merikare, for instance, emphasize justice and compassion for the widow, the orphan, the poor and the needy. Hammurabi, a Babylonian sage-king, presents himself as king of justice and as a shepherd who speaks for the orphan and the widow. Thus, the instructions of Lemuel's mother are firmly at home in this ancient Near Eastern royal ideology. These cross-cultural topoi, along with such Aramaisms as bar ("son") and mēlakīn ("kings") dovetail with the non-Israelite origin of Lemuel's proverbs. Just as in Agur's proverbs, however, Lemuel's proverbs have been adapted to accommodate Israel's religion. Lemuel is not only her biological son, bēri ("my son"), but also a son given in answer to a vow made to Yahweh by her, bar-nēdārāy ("son of my vows" [cf. 1 Sam 1:11]). This son of her vows should seek ēšet ḥayil ("a virtuous wife") who fears Yahweh.

See also PROVERBS 1: BOOK OF; WISDOM SOURCES.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. R. J. Clifford, Proverbs (OTL; Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 1999); J. L. Crenshaw, "A Mother's Instruction to Her Son (Proverbs 31:1-9)," in Urgent Advice and Probing Questions: Collected Writings on Old Testament Wisdom (Macon, GA: Mercer University Press, 1995) 382-95; J. Day, "Foreign Semitic Influence on the Wisdom of Israel," in Wisdom in Ancient Israel: Essays in Honour of J. A. Emerton, ed. J. Day (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1995) 55-70; I. Eph'al, The Ancient Arabs: Nomads on the Borders of the Fertile Crescent, 9th-5th Centuries B.C. (Jerusalem: Magnes, 1982); C. Gottlieb, "Words of the Exceedingly Wise: Proverbs 30:31," in The Biblical Canon in Comparative Perspective, ed. K. L. Younger (ScrCon; Lewiston, NY: Edwin Mellen, 1991); W. G. Lambert, Babylonian Wisdom Literature (Winona Lake, IN: Eisenbrauns, 1996); M. Lichtheim, The Old and Middle Kingdoms, vol. 1 of Ancient Egyptian Literature (Berkeley: University of California Press, 1975); R. D. Moore, "A Home for the Alien: Worldly Wisdom and Covenantal Confession in Proverbs 30,1-9," ZAW 106 (1994) 96-107; G. Ryckmans, Les noms propres sud-sémitiques (3 vols.; Bibliothèque du Muséon 2; Louvain: Bureaux du Muséon, 1934); K. Spanier, "The Queen Mother in the Judean Royal Court: Maacah—A Case Study," in A Feminist Companion to Samuel and Kings, ed. A. Brenner (FCB 5; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1994) 186-95; A. van den Branden, Les inscriptions thamoudéennes (Bibliothèque du Muséon 25; Louvain-Heverlé: Bureaux du Muséon, 1950); J. D. van Leeuwen, "The Background to Proverbs 30:4aa," in Wisdom, You Are My Sister: Studies in Honor of Roland E. Murphy, O. Carm., on the Occasion of His Eightieth Birthday, ed. M. L. Barré (CBQMS 28; Washington, DC: Catholic Biblical Association of America, 1997) 102-21.

K. Kim

LEVIATHAN. See CHAOS AND DEATH; CREATION THEOLOGY.

LEVIRATE. See KINSMAN-REDEEMER AND LEVIRATE.

LITURGICAL READINGS, JEWISH. See MEGILLOT AND FESTIVALS.

LIFE, IMAGERY OF

"Life" is a virtually all-encompassing concept; thus, the imagery for life in these books is abundant and diverse. Yet certain theologically significant patterns centered on the God of Israel emerge amidst the complex plethora of imageries for life. The various imageries of life are informed by the scriptural metanarrative of creation, fall, salvation and consummation. In light of this fourfold redemptive scheme, the diverse and even apparently contradictory ways in which life is portrayed can be meaningfully united and ordered. Although the following presentation of the imagery of life does not directly follow this fourfold narrative scheme, it is informed by and consistent with this scheme. The format of presentation in the present article follows thematic categories that emerge more directly from the biblical books that are treated.

1. Life as Created, Earthly Existence
2. Fruitful Life versus Futile Life
3. Afterlife
4. Summary

1. Life as Created, Earthly Existence.

The imagery of breath/soul/spirit, light, and clay connects all life to God as the Lord of life.

God is the creator and sustainer of life, and at death God is the taker of life.

The Hebrew word hayyîm ("life") denotes the earthly existence that begins when the breath, soul or spirit of God is breathed into the nostrils of creatures, both humans and animals (Job 27:3; Eccles 3:19-21; cf. Gen 1:20, 2:7; 9:4). The imagery of God breathing into creatures divine něšāmā ("breath" [Job 4:9; 27:3; 32:8; 33:4; Ps 18:15]), divine nepes ("soul" or "life" [Job 41:21; Ps 11:5; Prov 6:16]) and/or divine rūah ("spirit" or "breath" [Job 4:9; 27:3; 34:14; Ps 18:15; 33:6; Eccles 3:19]) identify God as the source of life.

In addition to breath of God, the metaphor of light points to God as the life-giver. As light dispels darkness, generates energy, and causes growth and life, light is a powerful symbol of life. Light is often equated with life (Esther 8:16; Job 3:4, 20, 23; 33:28-30) and, indirectly, with God (Job 24:13; 25:3; 29:3). Where God and God's light are, there is life (Ps 36:9). Conversely, where there is only darkness—a metaphor for life away from God—there is misery, horror and death (Job 3:4; 17:12-13; 18:18-21).

God is depicted not only as imparting life but also as fashioning each human in the womb like a potter molding clay (Job 10:8-11; 31:15; Ps 139:13). God mysteriously creates distinctive forms of life, human or animal. The uniqueness of each human is the result not only of a particular genetic makeup but also of God's spirit and hand distinctively fashioning each human. The supernatural and the natural world are seen as seamlessly woven together.

God's involvement in creaturely life continues through the entire lifespan. God is depicted as drawing the babes out of the womb like a midwife (Ps 71:6) and continuing to sustain life like a mother (Job 10:18; Ps 22:9-10; 71:6). Only as long as the breath of God is in creatures' nostrils can creaturely life continue (Job 27:3; cf. Gen 2:7; Ps 104:29). Psalm 104 provides other images for God's ongoing providential care for all living things (see also Ps 136:25; 145:15-16). God provides springs of water for the wild beasts to drink (Ps 104:10-11), causes the grass to grow for the cattle and vegetation for humanity (Ps 104:14), and grants food for the lions and creatures of the sea (Ps 104:21, 27-28). God is even said to respond to the cries of the young raven and prepare its food (Job 38:41). Bread, food, drink and water provide powerful images of life sustained by God. By contrast, images of draught and starvation depict the denial of life as a form of judgment (Ps 107:33-34; Lam 1:11).

The life that God breathes into creatures is portrayed as fleeting. Life and everything in it is hebel (Eccles 1:2), which literally means “vapor” (Ps 144:4; Prov 13:11; 21:6) and is often translated as “breath” (RSV, NRSV, NJPS). “Vapor” figuratively speaks of the ephemeral nature of life (Fredericks, 11-32) and its absurdity (Fox, 27-42). The translation “vapor” is preferred over against the traditional rendering “vanity” (KJV), especially given the plethora of images for the brevity and transience of life used in close connection with hebel. Human life is portrayed as breath, as a runner quickly passing by, as a swift eagle, a flower, a shadow, a cloud, a dream (Job 7:7-9; 9:25-26; 14:1-2; 20:8; Ps 90:10). Life possesses goodness (see 2.1 below), but that too is passing.

Not only is life fleeting, it is fragile, as is powerfully captured by the imagery of clay. Unlike rock, clay is malleable in consistency and brittle when dry. When powdered, it blows away like dust. Clay and dust provide powerful metaphors for the insignificant and fragile human existence marred by sin and under divine judgment: “For dust you are and to dust you will return” (Gen 3:19). Humans are “formed out of the clay” (Job 33:6) and are made “as clay” (Job 10:9). They are “like a broken vessel” (Ps 31:12) or like refuse, “broken in pieces between morning and evening; unobserved, they perish forever” (Job 4:19-20). They die a sudden, unpredictable death only to “return to dust” (Job 10:9; 34:15; cf. Ps 104:29).

God gives and takes life (Job 9:22; 12:10). When God determines to “gather to himself his spirit and his breath” of life (Job 34:14; cf. “the breath-spirit of life” [nīsmat-rûah hayyim] in Gen 7:22), earthly existence comes to an end, and dust returns to dust (Job 21:26; 34:14; Ps 104:29; Eccles 3:20; 12:7). As physical life is given indiscriminately as a gift, so it is taken indiscriminately without apologies. The righteous and the wicked alike face death, and its timing is unpredictable. Thus *Qohelet bemoans the fact that there are righteous who die prematurely and wicked who live long (Eccles 7:15), and that “there are righteous people to whom it happens according to the deeds of the wicked” or vice versa (Eccles 8:14; cf. Ps 73). Before physical death the righteous one has no advantage over the beast or the wicked; all suffer a common fate (Eccles 3:19). Once God takes back “his spirit and his breath,” it is irreversible. Unlike a cut tree that sprouts again, the dead do not come back (Job 14:7-10). “As water evaporates from the sea, and a river becomes parched and dried up, so man lies down and does not rise” (Job 14:11-12). From conception to death, God the potter has absolute mastery over his creatures.

2. Fruitful Life versus Futile Life.

The term hayyim (“life”) also refers to the fullness of redeemed life found in God and in God’s *wisdom. The personified character *Woman Wisdom (Ps 21:4-7; Prov 3-4; 8:1-9:12) offers life and is even identified as “life” (Prov 4:13, 22; 8:35). She is also called “a tree of life” (Prov 3:18), “the spring of life” (Prov 4:23), “the path of life” (Prov 5:6) and “the way of life” (Prov 6:23). Woman Wisdom is the source and giver of life. Those who find her find “the good life, longevity, a large family, prestige, joy, and (inherit the) land” here and now (Murphy 29, 104). This usage of “life” stands differentiated from the life that is breathed into every living thing, human or animal, which may be lived apart from conscious allegiance to God or wisdom. Imbedded in this usage of “life” is the recognition that unless a person embraces Woman Wisdom of the living God, one faces not only the physical death that is universal but also the cursed way of existence or “death” (including poor quality of life, dishonor, premature physical death) that *folly dishes out to those who reject wisdom (Prov 2:19; 9:10).

There are two paths of life, characterized by wisdom or folly, and two corresponding categories of people: the righteous who fear God, and the foolish who do not. Psalm 1 provides the paradigmatic outlook and outcome of the two ways of life. The good life of the righteous is portrayed as a fruitful tree of life, and the condemned life of the wicked is portrayed as empty chaff.

2.1. Imagery for the Fruitful Life of Wisdom.

2.1.1. A Fruitful Tree by Streams of Waters. The ideal life of the righteous is likened to “a tree firmly planted by streams of water” (Ps 1:3). As a tree drinks up the water day and night, so do the righteous delight in, meditate on, and feast upon the word of God on any given day (Ps 1:2; cf. Ps 119). The *law of God produces obedience and *fear of the Lord, which is the beginning, substance and end of wisdom (Ps 19:7-11; 34:11-22; 111:10; Prov 1:7; 9:10; 15:33). In the fear of the Lord the righteous do not walk, go, sit, stand or assemble with the deceitful, wicked, sinners or evildoers (Ps 1:1; 26:1, 4-6). Instead, they walk in innocence, integrity and truth. The true nourishment for righteous life, then, is wisdom and obedience to the word of God.

A fruitful and prosperous tree is a symbol of a righteous life that is both blessed and a blessing to others: they “yield fruit in their season . . . whatever they do, they prosper” (Ps 1:3). The righteous enjoy divine favor and blessings of security, safety, health, longevity, peace, pleasure, happiness, prosperity, riches and honor (Prov 1:33; 3:2-4, 8, 16-18, 25-26; 8:35; 9:11; 10:27). Such manifold blessings are manifested in, for example, the “woman of strength” of Proverbs 31. The life under divine favor and blessings “in season” take on the divine identity and characteristics of wisdom. They become a “wellspring of life” or a “tree of life” to others, instructing others in the way of life (Ps 112:2-5, 9; Prov 10:11; 13:14; 15:4; 18:4; 31:26; cf. Job 11:17). Life, wisdom and *righteousness spring forth and bless others.

The life of *Job is an image of the fruitful tree of Psalm 1. Job is a man of faithfulness, impeccable justice and righteousness. Job enjoys *divine presence, favor, friendship, guidance, protection and blessings on his family (Job 29). He possesses unsurpassable wisdom and understanding, and both young and old pay their respect and listen to his wisdom. He is affluent; his “steps bathe in cream,” even as “boulders pour out streams of oil” (Job 29:6). He is exceedingly compassionate and generous to the poor, “making the widow’s heart sing for joy” (Job 29:13; cf. Prov 31:20). He lives like a king, and his life is glorious (Job 29; 31). When he is severely tried, he stands the test and becomes even more prosperous than ever before.

*Song of Songs is a description and celebration of a good life of love, pleasure and joy. Although God is mentioned only once in this book (Song 8:6), it portrays life as redeemed from the curses of Genesis 3; it is life under divine blessings beyond the hostility of nature and male domination (Trible). Not only is there mutuality and equality between the woman and the man, but also the female lover is “the most prominent” (Trible, 102). A similar pattern is observed in the book of *Proverbs, where Woman Wisdom and the “woman of strength” are highly active, visible and influential in the public sphere as well as in the private. In the garden of love the lovers find each other, praise each other, and become one flesh. Unlike the situation in Genesis 3, conception and birthing are considered positive and are celebrated (Song 6:9; 8:5). Likewise, good marriage and having children are archetypes of the good life in the book of *Ruth and in Proverbs 31. In the garden of love there is life abundant, filled with “every tree that is pleasant to the sight and good for food” (Gen 2:9 RSV), and animals for human joy and love songs. “All nature extols the love of female and male” (Trible, 114). The life of love in the redeemed garden is one of delight as in the garden of Eden before disobedience.

The life of an individual is inextricably tied to that of the corporate life of the family (typically made up of three to four generations in ancient Israel) and the nation. Thus, Proverbs lays a strong emphasis on parents passing down a godly heritage and on children receiving parental instructions regarding divine law and wisdom (Prov 1:8; 6:20; 13:1). The happy, blessed lover in the garden of love is a product of her mother’s godly instructions (Song 8:2). The woman of strength of Proverbs 31 teaches the law, and her entire household respects her: “She opens her mouth in wisdom, and the law of covenant faithfulness [hesed] is on her tongue. . . . Her children rise up and call her blessed; her husband praises her” (Prov 31:26, 28). Children who receive a godly heritage can be compared to a seed from a tree planted by the streams of water that falls by the same streams and then grows and prospers. A fruitful tree fosters other fruitful trees.

Some texts in the book of *Psalms see the transgenerational transfer of inheritance as taking place even before birth; they portray prenatal human existence as already having a moral character, which is described either as sinful and estranged from God (Ps 51:5; 58:3) or as having “conscience” (kilyā [Ps 139:13 NJPS]) and being cherished by God (Ps 71:6, 139:13-16). For the righteous, divine favor begins in the womb: “Your eyes saw my embryo; and in your book were all written the days that were ordained for me, when as yet there was not one of them.” (Ps 139:16). In contrast, “The wicked go astray from the womb, they err from their birth, speaking lies” (Ps 58:3). Rather than being eyebrow-raising statements about “predestination unto reprobation,” these poetic depictions are best understood as vivid illustrations of the concept of transgenerational reward or *retribution found in Exodus 20:5-6; 34:6-7, which is carried forward into Psalms. The image of God forming the "conscience" of the babe in the womb (Ps 139:13) poignantly captures the motif of divine hesed ("covenant faithfulness") reaching to children's children of those who love God (Ps 103:17-18). The unborn child going astray is a disturbing picture of the parents' "hatred" of God, poisoning their children from the womb, putting the children in danger of being "cut off" along with their iniquitous parents (Ps 109:12-14).

2.1.2. "Does Not Wither." The tree firmly planted by the streams of water "does not wither" in drought or disaster (Ps 1:3; cf. Ps 37:19). The biblical writings are not without the realism that life is full of temptations and trials, threats and dangers: "Many are the afflictions of the righteous" (Ps 34:19). A fruitful and wise life is not free of painful or less-than-ideal experiences. Conversely, even the futile or cursed life is not necessarily entirely lacking in ideal experiences (e.g., wealth and longevity). Thus, the good life is not necessarily measured by the extent of pleasant experiences or absence of pain but rather by other criteria, such as the fear of the Lord and, as necessary, sustained faithfulness through harsh trials in life. The godly face torments, misfortune, oppression, injustice and persecution in the very context of the covenant faithfulness of God. They bring their painful experiences and explosion of emotions in a form of lament, complaint, petition, hope and trust, and they are not disappointed.

Ruth, Job and *Ecclesiastes agree that both good and adversity ultimately come from God (Ruth 1:20-21; Job 1:21; 2:10; Eccles 7:14). There are three main categories of trial or adversity that the righteous face in life: (1) natural disasters and tragedies; (2) persecution by enemies; (3) divine testing. These three categories are grippingly illustrated by the stories of reversal of Ruth, *Esther and Job respectively. Each one endures and overcomes severe trials in life by maintaining love for God and receives the blessings of life in an even greater measure.

Through famine and the death of her husband and sons, *Naomi experiences complete "emptiness" (Ruth 1:3-5, 20-21). Ruth, who is also deprived of her husband, selflessly devotes herself to her desolate mother-in-law, Naomi, and to the God of Israel. Ruth then navigates successfully through androcentric Israelite society under Naomi's shrewd instructions and reverses their situation, from emptiness to fullness, from despair to happiness, from destitution to riches. Out of her comes the greatest king of Israel. Unaware, her life takes on historic significance as she carries on her acts of covenant faithfulness (hesed), the price of which is heavy (Larkin, 52). Unaware, in her life divine hesed and providence converge with human hesed and initiative (Larkin, 50-52). The virtues of self-sacrifice, conformity to an imperfect social system, and seeking common good over against the personal good are not typically coveted or promoted by contemporary feminists, but these are the very virtues that turned around these women's lives and eventually the life of a whole nation.

In a different context, Esther also chooses a selfless path for the good of many. Though an empress, she remembers God, identifies with the powerless and endangered, and puts her life on the line. In this way, Esther brings about the salvation of her people, the people of God. The story of Esther illustrates the perennial persecution that the righteous people of God (in this case, the Jewish people as a whole) face among the ungodly. Similarly, many psalms describe the situation in which unsuspecting righteous people are persecuted or oppressed by the wicked. The wicked "desire," "seek," "watch for," "band together against," "plot against," and "gnash their teeth at" the poor, humble, meek and "those whose ways are upright" in order to "lay snare," "set an ambush," "take away," "trample," "crush," "slay" and "destroy" their very life (Ps 7:5; 10:1-11; 31:13; 35:4; 37:12, 14, 32; 38:12; 40:14; 54:3; 56:6; 59:3; 63:9; 70:2; 71:10; 94:21; 143:3). But the righteous turn to God to "defend," "deliver," "save," "rescue" "hide," "preserve," "sustain" and "prolong" their life (Ps 21:4; 22:20; 27:1; 35:17; 54:4; 61:6; 64:1). And the righteous are confident that the Lord delivers them out of all afflictions (Ps 34:19) and executes vengeance on their behalf (Ps 18:47; 27:14; 33:18). Whether for the corporate people of God (as in Esther) or the righteous individual (as in some of the psalms), then, divine justice and reversal of evil will come sooner or later. The wicked will come to an end. There is a relief in life, either in this life or in the next.

Then there is Job, whose main adversary was

God. God's testing of the human heart is not an anomaly that exists only in the book of Job. Several of the books unapologetically assert that it is a normal part of life. "The LORD is in His holy temple; the LORD's throne is in heaven; . . . His eyelids test the sons of men. The LORD tests the righteous and the wicked" (Ps 11:4-5 NASB [cf. Prov 17:3; Eccles 3:17]). God tests "them in order for them to see that they are but beasts" (Eccles 3:18), to refine them "as silver is refined" (Ps 66:10), and to expose and condemn the wicked and to confirm and vindicate the righteous: "When he has tried me, I will come out as pure gold" (Job 23:10 [cf. Ps 11:6-7; 17:3]). Job is a righteous man, thus he expects good life experiences, but evil is given to him instead (Job 30:26). When God hands Job over to *Satan, Job's torment is excruciating. Job curses the day he was born, "despises" and "loathes" his life (Job 3; 9:21; 10:1). Life is wretched and detestable, comparable to the "maggot" and "worm" of rotting food or decaying corpse (Job 25:6). But through it all Job does not curse God. In the end God declares the afflicted Job righteous and the undiscerning friends guilty. Job is vindicated, and his family and fortune are restored (Job 42:11-17). The book of Job paints a picture of life that evades human expectations of fairness and strict retribution. Apparently, *suffering is not proportionate to wickedness, nor is blessing proportionate to righteousness. In fact, Job was tried precisely because he was righteous, so that when Job endured the test without turning against God, God's estimation of Job's unsurpassed righteousness is proven correct, and Satan's accusation of Job's righteousness as only skin deep is proven wrong.

2.2. Images of the Futile Life.

2.2.1. "Like Chaff." The life of the wicked or the foolish is "like chaff" (Ps 1:4; 83:13), which lacks substance and value. The wicked live an existence that denies the true and proper nature of life, which is oriented to the word of God and obedience to it. The foolish despise God's word and wisdom and the wise instruction given through their parents (Prov 1:7-8).

Since the foolish lack understanding and discernment, their life is precarious like "chaff that the wind blows away" (Ps 1:4; 83:13). With no word or fear of God to hold them down or direct them, they "walk in darkness" and "stumble" (Eccles 2:14; Prov 4:19). But ironically, when "the foolishness of man ruins his way, his heart rages against the LORD" (Prov 19:3). The foolish acknowledge God only to blame God. Fools let seducers capture them with their eyelids (Prov 6:25) and follow seducers "as an ox goes to the slaughter" (Prov 7:22), and thereby they are "reduced to a loaf of bread" (Prov 6:26 NASB). Fools have no power to resist the temptation and are easily led astray. Fools are humorously identified as sluggards for their laziness: "As the door turns on its hinges, so does the sluggard on his bed" (Prov 26:14 [cf. Prov 13:4; 20:4; 24:33-34; 26:15]). They are compared to swine for their lack of discretion: "Like a ring of gold in a swine's snout is a beautiful woman who lacks discretion" (Prov 11:22).

Qohelet lived a life of folly (to use the language of Proverbs) because he did not have the fear of the Lord or wisdom: "I have seen everything during my lifetime of futility" (Eccles 7:15). He pursued wisdom and knowledge, but because he lacked the fear of the Lord and obedience, they were either unattainable or useless to him. After great accomplishments, acquisition of a measure of wisdom and knowledge, and chasing of pleasure and wealth, he declares them annoyingly pointless, painful and grievous, utterly unsatisfying and evil (Eccles 1:3-16; 2:1-23; 4:4, 8; 5:10; 6:3). Often the accomplishments and wealth of the fool are given to others to enjoy (Eccles 2:18, 26; 6:2; cf. Prov 13:22). "This is absurd and an evil torment" (Eccles 6:2). Indeed, the life of folly is filled with great irritation and suffering and divine wrath (Eccles 5:17).

2.2.2. Judged and Destroyed. While these books uphold the principle of retribution or of sowing and reaping (emphasized by Proverbs), they also testify to the exasperating reality that the wicked can succeed and prosper (Ps 37:1, 7; 73:3-9; Prov 24:19). Ultimately, however, "the way of the wicked will perish" (Ps 1:5-6). Sooner or later the wicked will be judged, condemned and destroyed by God (Ps 1:4-5; 73:17-20; Job 27:8), for folly will lead to death (Prov 2:18-19; 5:5), and "those who hate [wisdom] love death" (Prov 8:36).

In Psalms we see that divine judgment can be presented either as a temporary discipline for the righteous person who needs correction or as a permanent and more serious state of judgment on the unrepentant sinner. Insofar as people are unrepentant, their life can be spent in sorrow under divine chastisement for iniquity, sin and rebellion (Ps 31:10; but see Ps 31:14-24). Divine retribution can come in various forms: illnesses, calamities, rejection, emotional pain, withdrawal of divine presence, abandonment by family and friends, financial loss, personal enemies, premature death.

Whereas the psalms often portray an individual under judgment, the book of *Lamentations is replete with the imagery of brutal corporate suffering under the judgment of God. Jerusalem experiences the excruciating pains and overwhelming hardship of exile and *destruction as a consequence of abandoning God's covenant. Instead of life, death is everywhere: "In the street the sword bereaves; in the house it is like death" (Lam 1:20). Because of hunger and thirst, those that were once "whiter than milk" are "blacker than soot," with "their skin shriveled on their bones" (Lam 4:7-8). "Babes and suckling languish in the squares of the city," and "their life runs out in their mothers' bosoms" (Lam 2:11-13 NJPS [cf. Lam 2:19; 4:4]). The greatest horror comes when parents cannibalize their own children (Lam 2:20; 4:10). Indeed, "Better were those pierced with the sword than those pierced with hunger" (Lam 4:9). Life under judgment is cursed and brutal. As Qohelet would say, the dead are better off than the living, and one who has never existed is better off than both of them (Eccles 4:3; 6:3; but see Eccles 11:7-8).

Yet, there is room for mercy in the most severe judgment, both for individuals and nations. When humility and repentance are forthcoming, God can be moved to forgive and save those who fear him (Pss 31; 32), for God maintains his covenant love (Ps 32:10-11). From the depth of oppressive pain the writer of Lamentations recalls the true nature of God: "But this I call to mind, and therefore I have hope: Truly, the LORD's covenant faithfulness is not spent, and his compassion never come to an end" (Lam 3:21-22). God does not delight in punishing the wicked, and his punishment is but temporary (Lam 3:31-33). After affirming the just nature of divine punishment and upholding divine goodness, the writer calls the remnant to an honest admission of sin and to a return to the Lord (Lam 3:40-41). Further, the writer prays to God in several ways, offering an all-out supplication for the forgiveness and restoration of Jerusalem, a complaint about the people's massive suffering, and a petition for vengeance on the city's enemies (Lam 3:42—5:22).

3. Afterlife.

Ultimately, the "life" that the Woman Wisdom offers refers to an *afterlife with God (see 1 above), the path to which is paved by Woman Wisdom herself (Prov 5:6; 6:23). Although some might interpret the Wisdom literature and Psalms as being concerned only with life here and now, there is no clear dichotomy between the material/temporal and spiritual/eternal in these writings. Furthermore, given the brevity and limited nature of life, the biblical writers often reflect on delayed divine reward or retribution and extend their hopes for divine justice and a fully redeemed life beyond the grave. Biblical writers affirm that God will judge the whole earth (Job 9:15; 23:7; Ps 9:8; 50:6; 75:2; 96:13; Eccles 3:17) and find hope and consolation in God's eventual justice (Eccles 12:14) and in the related thought of life after death (Fredericks, 86). Accordingly, Job and Psalms present the contrasting motifs of the destruction of the wicked in Sheol and the enduring life of the righteous in divine presence. Against the view that Sheol in these writings is simply a place where all the dead are confined, its usage pressures us toward the interpretation that Sheol is a place for the wicked, from which the righteous are redeemed. An ancient sage reflects, "The path of life leads upward for the wise, that he may keep away from Sheol below" (Prov 15:24 NASB). The "life" that wisdom offers and the "death" that folly guarantees, then, ultimately point to immortality and everlasting destruction respectively. Proverbs' presentation of life and death, blessings and curses, as binary opposites is best seen partly as a pedagogical strategy expected of its genre and intended to encourage in a young pupil righteous choice and obedient living in a world of double reality (Ngwa, 141) and partly as a realistic description of the ultimate outcome of one's life on earth.

The eventual fate of the wicked is compared to "the beasts that perish" and is contrasted from the righteous, who will be received by God and will "see the light" beyond this life (Ps 49:15, 19-20; 73:16-27). Having been cut off from the presence of God (Job 27:8), the souls of the wicked are abandoned to Sheol, their names are forever "blotted out of the book of life," and they are destroyed (Ps 9:5; 16:10; 69:28). Unlike what happens to the wicked, God writes the names of the righteous in the book of life and redeems their life (nepeš) from Sheol (Ps 16:10; 69:28; cf. Job 19:25-26; 30:23). After reflecting on how the life of the wicked is limited to this world only, the psalmist declares his confidence in his final destiny in God's presence: "For You will not abandon my soul to Sheol; nor will You allow Your Holy One to undergo decay. You will make known to me the path of life; in Your presence is fullness of joy; in Your right hand there are pleasures forever" (Ps 16:10-11 NASB [cf. Ps 49:14-20; Job 19:25-26; 30:23]). Even if the righteous are not vindicated in this life, they have the hope and consolation of the afterlife with God. Accordingly, as Qohelet might say, "Even if everything is absurd, nevertheless we must fear God and keep commandments" (Fox, 144).

4. Summary.

Life in a fallen world is brief and transient, and often it is empty and unbearable. Yet, in obedience and right relationship with God the life that humanity once had in paradise can be partly recovered. This redemptive quality of life is measured not by the extent to which pain and suffering are eliminated from life but rather by character and relationships. Those who maintain covenant faithfulness to God and integrity with people (both neighbors and enemies) will experience the fullness of life in God. But the possibility of tasting the goodness of life in the fallen world is often limited by the apparent absence of justice in this world (Job and Ecclesiastes). Such frustration is partly resolved by divine judgment of both the wicked and the righteous. Whether in this world or in the next, the divine Judge ultimately will grant justice. The true content and end of life, then, consists of fear of, obedience to, and love of the Lord.

See also AFTERLIFE; CREATION THEOLOGY; WISDOM THEOLOGY.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. W. Brueggemann, The Psalms and the Life of Faith (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1995); F. W. Dobbs-Allsopp, Lamentations (IBC; Louisville: John Knox, 2002); M. V. Fox, A Time to Tear Down and a Time to Build Up: A Reading of Ecclesiastes (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1999); D. C. Fredericks, Coping with Transience: Ecclesiastes on Brevity in Life (BibSem 18; Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1993); K. J. A. Larkin, Ruth and Esther (OTG; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1996); R. E. Murphy, The Tree of Life: An Exploration of Biblical Wisdom Literature (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1990); K. N. Ngwa, The Hermeneutics of the "Happy" Ending in Job 42:7-17 (BZAW 354; Berlin: de Gruyter, 2005); P. Tribble, "Love's Lyrics Redeemed," in A Feminist Companion to the Song of Songs, ed. A. Brenner (FCB 1; Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1993) 100-120. J. Pokrifka

LITURGICAL INTERPRETATION. See HERMENEUTICS.

LOVE POETRY. See SONG OF SONGS 2: ANCIENT NEAR EASTERN BACKGROUND; WASF.

LYRIC POETRY

The word lyric comes from Greek lyra ("lyre"), a stringed instrument. In time, the term came to be used not only of the harp but also for the sung words that accompanied the *music (cf. the English word lyrics). In poetic theory, lyric, along with narrative (or epic) and dramatic poetics, comprises one of the three categories of poetic literature (J. Johnson, 713). Rigid distinctions among these types are not always possible, as there is of necessity some overlap: the three share certain characteristics and devices. Even so, the classification of poetry into these three main kinds is sufficient indication that lyric can be distinguished from the other two, at least to some degree (see 1.2). As a first, very preliminary, statement, it should be said that lyric poetry retains "most prominently the elements which evidence its origins in musical expression—singing, chanting, and recitation to musical accompaniment" (J. Johnson, 713). Of course, narrative/epic and dramatic poetics can also evidence deep connections to music (see Lord). But with lyric, the "musical element is intrinsic to the work intellectually as well as aesthetically" (J. Johnson, 713). Musicality or, more broadly, auditoriness/aurality again is not limited to lyric, being the general possession of all poetics (Berlin 2004, 2101). Even so, for various reasons discussed in further detail below, lyric must depend even more than other types on the "naked properties of language"—the intrinsic "music" of the poetic word itself, as it were—"as its basic resource for making meaning" (Dobbs-Allsopp 2002, 12; cf. 2006, 348, 356, 358; Langer, 259). The present article discusses lyric and lyric sequences in poetic theory more generally before tracing both within the OT. Finally, the macrogenre of Scripture as a whole is considered in light of the lyric.

1. Lyric Poetry
2. Lyric Poetry in the Old Testament

3. The Lyric Sequence
4. Lyric Sequences in the Old Testament
5. The Bible as Lyric Poetry/Lyric Sequence

1. Lyric Poetry.

1.1. Lyric and/as Music. Although lyric's association with music is intrinsic, encoded in the etymology of the term itself, this does not hold true for its subsequent history. Indeed, beyond the ancient Greek world, "the literal use of music ceases to be a meaningful genre criteria" (Dobbs-Allsopp 2006, 348). Hence, despite the fact that lyric was originally sung (cf. Greek melikos ["member, song"] poetry; see Turco, 120; Race), early on even classical poets such as Horace ceased composing poetry exclusively for musical settings (Dobbs-Allsopp 2006, 348; cf. J. Johnson, 713, 717). Eventually, that is, lyric "found itself bereft of the very element which had been the foundation of its lyricism—music" (J. Johnson, 714). Definitions of lyric must move, therefore, from modal (or performative) understandings, having to do with music, to generic ones (Dobbs-Allsopp 2006, 349).

1.2. The Lyric Beyond Music. Identifying the standard or essential characteristics of the lyric genre is difficult, however, given the interplay of devices that are present therein but also at work in other types of poetry or in literature more generally (Dobbs-Allsopp 2006, 349). It is the case, then, that no one element characterizes lyric to the extent that said element is found in no other genre of literature. Instead, lyric contains several key elements in high density and in particular combination (Dobbs-Allsopp 2006, 378). But even here one must beware of essentialism, as there are dozens of lyric genres with particular aspects and emphases (see J. Johnson, 715; Turco).

A useful starting point is offered by the definition of lyric as "chiefly . . . a nonnarrative, nondramatic, nonrepresentational kind of poetry" (Dobbs-Allsopp 2006, 350). This definition immediately distinguishes lyric from narrative/epic and dramatic poetics. The definition should not, however, be taken as indicating that lyric never contains narrational or dramatic elements. It can and frequently does (see 3-4 below). But these are not pronounced or pre-dominant. In fact, the "aspiration toward something other than narrative may well be the most tractable lyric characteristic of Hebrew verse more generally" (Dobbs-Allsopp 2006, 351).

Lack of narrative interest or execution is, in no small measure, a reflex of the fact that lyric poetry is typically brief (Lindley, 4). Said differently, lyric poetry is "a discontinuous form. . . we normally do not expect the kind of linear unfolding of events that produces a plot" (Exum, 42). The brief and poetic (i.e., lyrical) nature of the lyric precludes extensive character development, emplotment, and so forth that one finds in prose narrative. Instead, there are sudden shifts of topic, speaker and theme (Exum, 42); even when characters are present, the portrait thereof is synchronic, not diachronic. So, although it may be true that "behind every lyric, sometimes vaguely sketched, sometimes clearly defined, is a story that explains the present moment of discourse . . . in lyric poems . . . the story exists for the song," not the song for the poetry (W. Johnson, 35; see also Dobbs-Allsopp 2006, 357-58).

F. Dobbs-Allsopp points out that in the absence of cohesion-aiding devices such as plot or argumentation, lyric is cast upon other resources to do its work. One such resource is form, another the power of language itself, still another the heightened use of emotions, yet another tropological density—the use of many poetic features and figures of thought in close combination (see Dobbs-Allsopp 2006, 363, 364 n. 81, 378; cf. Fisch, 118-19; Alter, 133; J. Johnson, 714). Instead of plot, form; instead of argument, metaphor; instead of story, marked use of heightened language—all in tight formation. These are among the hallmarks of lyric. D. Lindley (4) summarizes matters well: "We may then accept that many lyrics are short, many speak of heightened feeling in a poetic present and are uttered by a voice in the first person, and a significant number are written for music or out of a musical impulse."

But Lindley (4) is quick to point out that "many . . . poems we might wish to call 'lyrics' have few or none of these qualities." This again warns against "essentializing" any one (or more) aspects (or combination); it also indicates that lyric shares even its most central qualities with other kinds of literature, just as lyric often can employ devices found primarily or extensively in those other genres. It is the density of brief scale, lack of plot or argumentation, prominence of the speaking voice over developed characterization, radical dependence on language—especially expressive language—and the like that distinguish lyric (Dobbs-Allsopp, forthcoming).

Two comments should be added before turning to lyric poetry in the Bible. First, the brief scale of lyric poems “means, as a purely practical matter, that . . . [they] will be limited in the scope of their subject matter” (Dobbs-Allsopp 2006, 365). They are too small to speak in extenso about a topic; they are, by definition (and scale) episodic. Second, the lyric’s reliance on language alone, along with the way it employs that language, shares certain properties with the music that originally inspired this type of poetry. Such properties would include “rhythm, meter, a pervasive heightening of sonority through alliteration, assonance, and the like” (Dobbs-Allsopp 2006, 377). The sound patterns of lyric itself, that is, are representative of music (J. Johnson, 715). But even when they are not sung, “literary lyrics carry their own music . . . no extraneous musical accompaniment is required” (Turco, 120).

2. Lyric Poetry in the Old Testament.

Regarding the item last mentioned, J. Johnson (726) writes,

From its primordial form, the song as embodiment of emotion, the [lyric] has been expanded and altered through the centuries until it has become one of the chief literary instruments which focus and evaluate the human condition. In flexibility, variety, and polish, it is perhaps the most proficient of the poetic genres. In the immediacy and keenness of its expression, it is certainly the most effective. These qualities have caused the 19th and 20th [centuries] to look upon the [lyric] as largely their own, but [lyric] poetry has belonged to all ages.

As proof of the latter point, Johnson (715-16) states that lyric is “as old as recorded lit[erature], and its history is that of human experience at its most animated,” and he goes on to note lyric exemplars in Sumerian, Assyro-Babylonian, Hittite and Egyptian.

Certainly the same situation obtains for Hebrew examples (J. Johnson, 716). In fact, S. Driver (360) stated rather categorically that “Hebrew poetry is almost exclusively lyric.” More recently, H. Fisch (118-19) has remarked that the definition of poetry (especially lyric) as “the maximum foregrounding of the utterance . . . is truer of the Psalms probably than of any other poetry”

(cf. Alter, 133). Indeed, it could be argued that there is no narrative or dramatic poetry in the Bible at all. Even the so-called historical psalms (e.g., Pss 78; 105; 106) are not of sufficient scale to approximate narrative/epic poetry. With its “hodge-podge collection of traditions,” which “are not sequenced or otherwise developed logically,” a composition such as Psalm 114 only further exemplifies the distance from narrative/epic poetry that Hebrew poetry typically evidences (see Dobbs-Allsopp 2006, 353). This could be profitably contrasted with the long narrative/epic poems known from Ugarit (Baal, Kirta, Aqhat) or Mesopotamia (Gilgamesh, Erra) (see Dobbs-Allsopp 2006, 365). The OT has no manifest equivalent. The closest approximation—a poetic substratum that underlay the Old Epic (J/E) or certain parts of the Pentateuch—is completely speculative and thoroughly reconstructive in nature (Cross; Damrosch).

Further evidence of the lyric nature of most (all?) Hebrew poetry comes from its connections to music. It is often said that Hebrew knows no word for “poetry.” The closest approximation appears to be šir (“song” [e.g., Ps 45:1; 46:1; 76:1; 120:1; Song 1:1]). Other terms used are also related to music: mizmôr (NRSV: “psalm”; derived from the root zmr, “sing praise”) or qinâ (“lament, dirge”) (see Dobbs-Allsopp 2006, 374-77). To these linguistic data one might add the large number of artifacts recovered from ancient Israel/Palestine that have to do with music (Braun). Or, to return to *Psalms, the number of terms appearing to have something to do with music, whether that is reference to instruments (e.g., Ps 33:1-3; 93:4; 150:3-5), rhythmic patterns or tunes (e.g., Ps 6:1; 12:1; 57:1), or even groups of singers and musicians (Ps 68:26; cf. Ps 150:3-5), is noteworthy (see further Dobbs-Allsopp 2006, 374-77). Admittedly, not all of these data or their precise relationship to music are transparent, but at many points in the psalms the connection is explicit. Consider Psalm 98:5: “Sing praise [zammêrû] to Yahweh with the lyre [bêkinnôr], with the lyre [bêkinnôr] and the sound of a praise-song [zimrâ]” (my translation).

Taken cumulatively, then, this kind of terminology—not to mention other musicological data such as the *refrains present in Psalm 136—betrays “at least an originary concern for music for the compositions so named” (Dobbs-Allsopp 2006, 375; cf. Fisch, 119; J. Johnson, 716), a point reinforced by the artifacts and iconography from ancient Israel/Palestine (Strawn and LeMon; Braun).

Some scholars have gone further, arguing that the psalms are full-blown lyric, regardless of musicality—that is, poetry that is “reflexively conscious of the importance of poetry” (Fisch, 119; cf. further 104-35; see also Driver, 359-91; Lowth, 278-315; Berlin, NIB 4.303; Dobbs-Allsopp 2006). Fisch (108) believes that Psalm 49:3 is an “announcement of lyrical intent” (see also Ps 5:1; 19:14; 104:34), while Dobbs-Allsopp (2006, 359 n. 59) states that the reference to “my work” (ma‘āsay) in Psalm 45:1 (MT 45:2) is “one of the rare instances in which a biblical writer shows some conscious awareness of craft. . . . ‘my work’ . . . would be the precise equivalent to the Greek notion of poesy.” In sum, it would seem that the psalms are predominantly and preeminently lyric (Dobbs-Allsopp 2006), a point reinforced by the history of their reception because the psalms inspired many of the great lyrics and lyric collections (see 3-4 below).

*Song of Songs also fits the description of lyric poetry (Exum, 1; Fisch, 104). Though some scholars have argued that Song of Songs is dramatic poetry and have ascribed various parts to different dramatis personae, the work is not overtly or explicitly dramatic: the different “actors” are never so identified, nor is a plot of any sort given (Fisch, 104; Exum, 78-79). This situation contrasts rather markedly with the one that obtains in the book of *Job, where the speakers are regularly introduced and the poetic sections are emplotted by the prose framework (see Dobbs-Allsopp, forthcoming). “To turn [Song of Songs] into a drama, too much has to be read between the lines” (Exum, 78). It is better to treat it as lyric (see 3-4 below).

The book of *Lamentations is another example of lyric poetry in the OT. Dobbs-Allsopp (2002, 14-20) highlights the high-density use of metaphor; poetic diction; the play of syntax and lineation, including enjambment; *wordplay; pun; euphony; *personification; and the extended use of the alphabetic *acrostic as a formal constraint.

One additional aspect of lyric poetry not mentioned earlier seems especially suitable to biblical examples of the genre. It is what R. Greene (1991, 5-6) discusses as the capacity of lyric to impose “the subjectivity of the scripted speaker on the reader”; or, to put it in Dobbs-Allsopp’s (2006, 367-68) terms, lyric’s ability to be reuttered. Fisch (118) puts it slightly differently, that, in the process of reading and rereading, the words of the lyric become “their [the readers’/speakers’] words, the expression of their individuality on each and every occasion of reading or singing.” To be sure, there is a sense in which all literature can be “road tested” for a while (see Booth), but the brevity of scale and scope, the episodcity, and the property of the speaking voice (see J. Johnson, 726; Fisch, 104; Turco, 120) make poetry, especially the lyric, particularly well suited for reutterability, or what might just as easily be termed (re)appropriation (see Fisch, 127; Miller 1986; 2000, 248-49). We are able to “try on this [lyric] voice and what it says because we have been explicitly included in that voice” (Dobbs-Allsopp, forthcoming). The history of reading the Bible is, in no small measure, the history of (re)uttering and (re)appropriating the words of Scripture. Nowhere is this truer than in the case of the psalms, the Hebrew lyric par excellence.

3. The Lyric Sequence.

Despite the fact that the lyric contains no extended logical argumentation or developed progression of plot and character, poets have long strung together independent and self-contained poems into larger collections or lyric sequences. Well-known examples include Petrarch’s 366-poem sequence Canzoniere, George Herbert’s The Temple, John Donne’s Holy Sonnets, Walt Whitman’s Leaves of Grass and T. S. Eliot’s The Wasteland. The practice of lyric sequencing is an ancient one, however, to judge from the evidence from the ancient Near East (J. Johnson, 715, 724; Dobbs-Allsopp 2006, 366). There are, first, various literary catalogs that have survived, suggesting the practice of poetic collecting (Dobbs-Allsopp 2006, 366 n. 85; for an attempt to find a catalog of lyric poems in Ps 68, see Albright). There is also the very early collection of forty-two Sumerian temple hymns (Sjöberg and Bergman 1969), all of which share the same basic form, appear to proceed in an orderly geographical sequence, and which were compiled by Enheduanna, the daughter of Sargon of Akkad, who claims authorial responsibility for the collection (see Dobbs-Allsopp 2006, 366 n. 85). From Egypt there are various collections of love lyrics (Fox), and, from later periods, one might add to this listing the pseudepigraphical Psalms of Solomon (Dobbs-Allsopp 2006, 366

n. 85). The practice of placing lyrics in larger collections is, therefore, an ancient and widespread phenomenon.

At its simplest, the lyric sequence is a “collocation of lyrics” (Greene 1993, 727) that can be structured by any number of devices—formal, fictional, calendrical and so on (Greene 1993, 727)—such that they “tend to interact as an organic whole” (Rosenthal and Gall 1982, 9). After Petrarch, the lyric sequence became “not merely a ‘form’ but a complex of generic capacities” (Greene 1993, 727). Within this complex a balance must be struck between the overall “unity” of the collection and the integrity of the individual lyric poems themselves (Greene 1993, 728). The latter are often “heterogeneous in form,” but nevertheless they interact holistically by means of the sequence (Rosenthal and Gall 1993, 728). In effect, then, the modern lyric sequence is “a single poem” (Greene 1993, 728) or “a modern lyric poem writ large, its several parts providing the same sort of emotive or apperceptive thrusts of affective language in relation to the whole as do the shifts of tonal coloration and intensity in a single lyric” (Rosenthal and Gall 1993, 728). These comments are evocative when applied to Scripture (see 4 below). Before doing so, however, we will find it instructive to ask how lyric sequences work.

First, since the lyric sequence is writing in the lyric mode but on a larger scale, it helps to counteract the limitations inherent in the brief scale that is a hallmark of lyric poetry (see above). So, one way that lyric poetry can and does manifest larger development, progression, argument, even plot or narrative-like devices, is by lyric sequencing. The dynamics of the sequence itself are varied. On the one hand, they are “primarily emotive and associative” (Rosenthal and Gall 1993, 728), like lyric poetry generally; on the other hand, there is a plethora of structuring characteristics that can be delineated for lyric sequences. While their form is “unusually protean” (Rosenthal and Gall 1993, 728), one might nevertheless highlight the fact that lyric sequences (1) employ lyric as the mode of discourse; (2) consist of multiple, discrete poems; and (3) exhibit perceivable coherence and integrity (Dobbs-Allsopp, forthcoming). Moreover, the overarching structures present in the sequence are themselves lyrical in that they defy reduction to simplistic thematic, logical or narratological explication/paraphrase.

Much more could be said, but it must suffice here to say that the lyric sequence contains both centripetal and centrifugal movements (see Grossberg; Greene 1991, 20; Dobbs-Allsopp 2006, 372, 374; Rosenthal and Gall 1993, 729). In the former, the larger sequence keeps the poems together, though it does so in the open way characteristic of lyric. In the latter, the individual poems making up the sequence press outward, given their lyric episodocity, even while the various strategies of linkage (e.g., repetition; echoing key words; variation on themes, diction, imagery and topic; development of “plot” [see Miner, 222; Dobbs-Allsopp 2006, 357]) apparent in the sequence hold them together. Both movements, that is, contain within themselves elements of the opposite. Whatever the case, it should be stressed that the disjunction or discontinuity that is present alongside obvious moments of continuity is not a defect but rather is a sign of the specifically lyric structure of the sequence (Dobbs-Allsopp, forthcoming). In analyzing a sequence, then, one must attend to both the individual poem and the larger sequence, while simultaneously considering the thrusts toward both fragmentation and unification that mark lyric sequences.

It must be admitted, of course, that strategies of connection, structuring and unity are, to some degree at least, constructed by the reader. J. Exum (42) for example, speaking specifically of Song of Songs, notes that there is a strong “readerly tendency to read sequentially and to make sense of a literary work as a whole; in other words, to read for plot. . . . We create connections as we read, revising them, abandoning them and adopting others when necessary. . . . [In so doing] we have begun to create a ‘story.’” However, said “story” may not actually be present—not in lyric contexts—despite the fact that certain details “tease and tantalize us to find connections [even] where they are lacking” (Exum, 42). One conclusion here is that we must remember that even when unity, development or progression is found, the overall context is lyrical. Even if the lyric sequence gestures at “encompassment,” that is, it is only a gesture, because in lyric the poetic subject(s) “can never be fully and satisfactorily contained” (Dobbs-Allsopp, forthcoming).

4. Lyric Sequences in the Old Testament.

Writing about recent research on poetic collections like the lyric sequence, E. Miner (222) has stated that “because discovery of the unifying principles of such collections has come only relatively recently, it seems very likely that further study will reveal numerous other p[oetic] c[ollections].”

And so it has, and does, when applied to the Bible, though such an endeavor is still very much in its infancy (see Dobbs-Allsopp 2002; 2006; forthcoming).

The place to look for lyric sequences in the OT is precisely where lyric poems reside: Psalms, Song of Songs and Lamentations. In the light of lyric sequences, it becomes possible that these books are not (especially in the case of Psalms) solely or only (random) collections of poems but are instead lyric sequences or at least comprised of such. Indeed, maybe these “books” are not books at all but rather lyric poems “writ large.”

The conclusion drawn by M. Rosenthal and S. Gall (1993, 729) on lyric sequences is an instructive entrée into the issues:

The m[odern] p[oetic] s[equences] frees us to look at poems of all periods, long and short, in a new way, for its dynamics are those of lyrical structure itself, defined as the overall directive energy of movement—the progression, juxtaposition, and interrelation of all the lyric centers, dynamic shifts, and tonal notes—in a poem or s[equences]. The object of lyrical structure is neither to resolve a problem nor to conclude an action but to achieve the keenest, most open realization possible. The best s[equences] depend for their life on the interrelation of lyric centers—units that present specific qualities and intensities of emotional and sensuously charged awareness in the lang[uage] of a passage, not in the supposed feelings of the author or of any implied “speaker.” (first two sets of italics added)

The psalms come immediately to mind in light of Rosenthal and Gall’s comment, in part because, historically, the authors of more recent lyric sequences (e.g., Petrarch) took the psalms as their model (see Greene 1993, 727). The psalms are also a natural location to look for poetic sequencing insofar as scholars have recently paid increased attention to the “shape and shaping” of the Psalter as a whole—an endeavor that is sometimes called reading the psalms

“as a book” (see, e.g., Wilson; McCann) (see Editorial Criticism). Some of this research has focused on clearly demarcated units (whether by title or genre) in the Psalter, such as the Songs of Ascents (Pss 120-134 [see Grossberg]). At other times, the connections have been less transparent but no less evident—for example, the way Psalms 1–2 coinhere to introduce the Psalter (Miller 1993), or the chiasmically formal structure of Psalms 15–24 (Miller 1994; see also, on Pss 51–100, Hossfeld and Zenger). Such readings are fascinating and typically quite insightful; it remains to be seen how “intentional” they are (if intent matters) or if they are primarily constructed by the reader/scholar.

Working in a somewhat different vein, W. Brueggemann has offered a reading of “the entire directive energy of movement” (Rosenthal and Gall 1993, 729) in the Psalter, treating it as a lyric sequence of sorts (though he does not use this language) that moves from Torah obedience to unbounded praise. In a recent work on metaphor in the Psalter, W. Brown has demonstrated the pervasive generativity of two dominant metaphors, that of “refuge” (theology) and “pathway” (ethics); this is certainly what Rosenthal and Gall (1993, 729) would call “the interrelation of lyric centers.”

At the very least, such scholarship suggests the viable presence of lyric sequences in the psalms and the benefit that will result from further study. But research on lyric sequences also indicates that “reading the psalms as a book” is at best a misnomer for this type of approach and represents a fundamental misunderstanding of the nature of the Psalter’s unity (and disunity) as “storied” or “narrative” instead of what it clearly is: a collection (sequence or even collection of sequences) of lyric poems. This is no matter of splitting hairs over scholarly nomenclature; it is a crucial distinction that impacts readerly expectation, analysis and interpretation (see 5 below).

The lyrical nature of Song of Songs has already been discussed above. It can be repeated here that Exum and Fisch, among others, have critiqued interpretations of the work that impose a structural unity upon it but in nonlyrical mode—namely, as a drama—primarily because the plot for such unity and drama must be provided “from outside the textual world” (Exum, 42; see further 42-44, 78-79). It appears that Exum (33-37) herself prefers to think of Song of Songs as a long lyric poem rather than a lyric sequence, but insofar as the lyric sequence is in many ways just another way to write a long lyric poem (see 3 above), this distinction may be interpretively negligible. Regardless, Exum (44) certainly is correct that “we should be wary of looking for narrative progression in a lyric poem that meanders the way the Song does.” This makes any search for plot development or progression or drama in Song of Songs a desperate move, even though “there is, of course, poetic development” (Exum, 44), which is precisely what one would expect in a lyric sequence.

Finally, Dobbs-Allsopp (forthcoming) has made a compelling case that Lamentations is a lyric sequence on the basis of numerous observations, including the work’s “varied and countervailing fragmenting and cohering practices; the sense of development manifested among the several poems, and the strong sense of closure projected by the whole.” Still other lyric sequences might exist in the OT. One thinks, perhaps, of Proverbs 1–9 + 31 or of other subcollections in the Psalter or even in prophetic books. This remark by Miner (222) holds true, then, for Hebrew lyric as well as much later types: “it seems very likely that further study will reveal numerous other p[oetic] c[ollections].”

5. The Bible as Lyric Poetry/Lyric Sequence.

A final possible contribution of lyric poetry to the Bible can be profitably entertained. Not only can it be said that parts of the Bible are lyric poetry and that the Bible contains lyric; also, insofar as the Bible, at a macrolevel, is not easily reduced to a linear plot line or “narrative,” no matter how generously construed, perhaps it is worth thinking about Scripture as a grand poem or sequence of poems, perhaps even as a lyric sequence. Of course, it can be said that if one defines narrative broadly, then the Bible can, in fact, be read as “the great story of God.” Biblical scholars, theologians and laity make this move all the time. However, defining narrative in such great breadth stretches the category almost beyond recognition and thus somewhat trivializes the claim (see Strawson, 438–40). At the very least, it could be asserted in reply that “poetry” too can be similarly stretched and broadened (with concern over subsequent trivialization duly noted). If so, and if one does in fact think of the Bible more like a great poem or lyric sequence than a grand story, what difference would it make? What benefits accrue?

First, one might consider possible detriments that are present in readings that are insufficiently poetic—that is, overly narrativel. This is a large topic that cannot be treated here; it must suffice to say that, generically, the Bible includes much that is not narrative. Fully one-third of the OT is poetic, and this certainly is among its great contributions to Scripture. To be sure, parts of the OT and of the NT can be read in narrative succession (e.g., Genesis through Ezra-Nehemiah or the Gospels and Acts), but in both Testaments this “plot” breaks down when one encounters material either that is out of narrative (or chronological) order and must then be placed back within the plotted story (e.g., the Prophets or the Epistles) or that seems largely uninterested in that story in the first place (e.g., much of the wisdom and poetic writings and the book of Revelation). Even within the main “plot-books/blocks,” a simple, straightforwardly narrative reading breaks down. Chronicles repeats material from Genesis, Samuel and Kings; it does not simply “continue the story.” For their part, the Gospels are more like repetitive refrains than continuations of the same version (contrast the Syriac Diatessaron). And, although Luke and Acts appear to comprise a narrative unity that continues the story of Jesus into the early church, virtually all editions of the NT stubbornly separate the two by imposing John as another, perhaps climactic, Gospel refrain.

There is, in short, a price to be paid for “narrativization”—this imposing of order and linearity on what is, in fact, in many ways disorderly or episodic (see Taylor, 491; Aichele, 95; Strawson), dare one even say lyrical? Despite the wide (even hegemonic) influence that “narrative” currently enjoys, it must be asserted that a closer look at specific parts of Scripture as well as Scripture as a whole indicates that narrative should not hold a monopoly on ways of construing the Bible (and its macrogenre). As its best, narrative theology (inadvertently?) leaves too much out and lets important things slip through; at its worst, it is constructed (advertently?) to avoid things that Scripture itself deems it important for us to have (see Taylor, 490).

To be sure, it is somewhat natural to assume or “find” narrativel structuring in what we read (see 3 above). It is natural because so much of what presently counts as literature or written material is narrativel in basic and fundamental ways (see Dobbs-Allsopp 2006, 350 n. 14; Exum, 42). We should realize, however, that our present context, which favors narrative so much, is also exerting pressure upon us to read in precisely those sorts of ways; this pressure, moreover, is exacerbated by various hermeneutical, psychological and theological movements that seek to find (empirically) or recommend/impose (ethically) a “narrative structure of reality” on the entirety of our lives. But the existence of poetry, in general, and of lyric and lyric sequences, specifically, suggests that this need not be so (see, more generally, Strawson). Reading for plot and expecting to find such is, in short, a constructed phenomenon, imposed ad extra, neither necessary nor implicit—at least not always. There are, after all, other ways of writing and reading (see Landow), other ways of finding form and meaning in our lives. Meaning need not be the result of or the sole purview of narrative; it could just as easily be an “osmotic, systemic, not staged in consciousness” kind of product (Strawson, 448). Or, it could be lyrical. Even our life “stories,” when we tell them, are often little more than a pastiche (sequence?) of moments, episodes, snapshots, altogether comparable to a lyric poem or lyric sequence. The connections holding these together may be linear and progressive, but they need not be always and only narrational (see Strawson). One’s “story” could just as easily be one’s grand “lyric poem.”

The same points could be argued for Scripture. The Bible can indeed be read as a story, but such a move is a readerly construct, one that is not widely self-evident and that carries with it obvious benefits but also certain detriments. For one example of the latter, the Scripture-as-Story approach may (in)advertently function to privilege only or primarily the NT as the “climax of the covenant.” The OT becomes, in such a scenario, “mere background,” of little use even if it is granted putative import. A narrative approach may also create unrealistic expectations: all elements of the plot will be (or are) tied up nicely, eventually, at the end.

Thinking Scripture-as-Lyric/Lyric Sequence offers different results. For one, poetry in general and lyric in particular frequently complicate and ambiguate the reading experience. Not all loose ends are tied up nicely. More pointedly, it is unnecessary that they be so. Life is not like that; why should Scripture be? Study of lyric sequences has shown that both centrifugal and centripetal tendencies are important and deserve attention (see 3 above). Hence, not only what binds the Testaments together (internally or between the two) is important, but also what resists such unification. Readerly consternation over the Bible’s “tensions” or “contradictions” becomes a largely moot problem in the face of lyric’s tendency to fragmentation and disjuncture. This is, in a word, what one expects of lyric poetry. In this way, poetry (and Scripture) again imitates life.

Even so, there are points of connection, overlap and structure in Scripture-as-Lyric/Lyric Sequence, but these are not simplistically or primarily diachronic, related to plot and recounted in story mode, linearly, with causation (see Forster, esp. 25-42, 83-103; Strawson, 439). Instead, the unity of a Testament (or of the Christian Bible) is complex and chainlike “wherein each of the poems is joined to some subset of the other poems in the sequence in a multiplicity of overlapping ways” (Dobbs-Allsopp, forthcoming). Gone is the “climax of the covenant.” In its place is the thick and difficult beauty of the poetry that is (the entirety of) Scripture.

Here, too, much more could be said; regardless, it should be stressed that these sorts of considerations do not indicate that lyric is necessarily better (or worse) than other kinds of discourse, only that it is different from other kinds of discourse (Dobbs-Allsopp, forthcoming) and its benefits deserve to be weighed and measured, especially as they often seem to answer the weaknesses of narrational modes. In this way, what Dobbs-Allsopp (2006, 379) says of the psalms could hold equally true for Scripture as a whole: “Psalmic poetry through its very lyricism may even inspire us to new ways of seeing and imagining, even to new ways of thinking. . . . Lyric thinking . . . is most assuredly a different kind of thinking, a thinking otherwise.” This different kind of thinking, present in the lyric poems of the Bible itself, is one that “thrive[s] in ambiguity and complexity, that emerge[s] rhythmically and through the play of syntax, that [is] implicit in a poem’s tone and get[s] argued through the precision of an image”; if we recovered such thinking, it would move us and our interpretation decidedly “beyond a commentary tradition that in the main has relegated its estimation of the intellective capacities of psalms to that which can be translated into conceptual paraphrase alone” (Dobbs-Allsopp 2006, 378; cf.

374). Gone will be the paraphrase or the proposition; in its place, the poetry.

Thought of in this way, lyric, with all its accompanying benefits and particularities, clearly takes its place (perhaps pride of place) among the seminal contributions that poetry makes to study of Scripture, theology and biblical theology. Historically and cross-culturally, lyric is widely associated with religion and ritual activity, where it is especially “expressive of mystical experience” (J. Johnson, 715), perhaps because it, like poetry more generally, “is open . . . [it] articulates the mystery [of God] but leaves it there” (Miller 2000, 247; see also 245, 249).

See also ORAL POETRY; PARALLELISM; POETICS, TERMINOLOGY OF.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. G. Aichele Jr., The Limits of Story (SemeiaSt; Philadelphia: Fortress; Chico, CA: Scholars Press, 1985); W. F. Albright, “A Catalogue of Early Hebrew Lyric Poems (Psalms LXVIII),” HUCA 23 (1950-1951) 1-39; R. Alter, The Art of Biblical Poetry (New York: Basic Books, 1985); A. Berlin, “Introduction to Hebrew Poetry,” NIB 4.301-15; idem, “Reading Biblical Poetry,” in The Jewish Study Bible, ed. A. Berlin and M. Z. Brettler (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2004) 2097-104; W. C. Booth, The Company We Keep: An Ethics of Fiction (Berkeley: University of California Press, 1988); J. Braun, Music in Ancient Israel/Palestine, trans. D. W. Stott (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2002); W. P. Brown, Seeing the Psalms: A Theology of Metaphor (Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 2002); W. Brueggemann, “Bounded by Obedience and Praise: The Psalms as Canon,” in The Psalms and the Life of Faith, ed. P. D. Miller (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1995) 189-213; F. M. Cross, Canaanite Myth and Hebrew Epic: Essays in the History of the Religion of Israel (Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1973); D. Damrosch, The Narrative Covenant: Transformations of Genre in the Growth of Biblical Literature (San Francisco: Harper & Row, 1987); F. W. Dobbs-Allsopp, Lamentations (IBC; Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 2002); idem, “The Psalms and Lyric Verse,” in The Evolution of Rationality: Interdisciplinary Essays in Honor of J. Wentzel van Huyssteen, ed. F. L. Shultz (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2006) 346-79; idem, “Lamentations as a Lyric Sequence” (forthcoming); S. R. Driver, An Introduction to the Literature of the Old Testament (New York: Meridian, 1956 [1897]); J. C. Exum, Song of Songs: A Commentary (OTL; Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 2005);

H. Fisch, Poetry with a Purpose: Biblical Poetics and Interpretation (ISBL; Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1988); E. M. Forster, Aspects of the Novel (New York: Harcourt, Brace & World, 1955); M. V. Fox, The Song of Songs and the Ancient Egyptian Love Songs (Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 1985); R. Greene, Post-Petrarchism: Origins and Innovations of the Western Lyric Sequence (Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1991); idem, “Lyric Sequence: I. Renaissance to Romanticism,” in The New Princeton Encyclopedia of Poetry and Poetics, ed. A. Preminger and T. V. F. Brogan (Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1993) 727-28; D. Grossberg, Centripetal and Centrifugal Structures in Biblical Poetry (SBLMS 39; Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1989); F.-L. Hossfeld and E. Zenger, Psalms 2: A Commentary on Psalms 51-100, ed. K. Baltzer (Hermeneia; Minneapolis: Fortress, 2005); J. W. Johnson, “Lyric,” in The New Princeton Encyclopedia of Poetry and Poetics, ed. A. Preminger and T. V. F. Brogan (Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1993) 713-27; W. R. Johnson, The Idea of Lyric: Lyric Modes in Ancient and Modern Poetry (Los Angeles: University of California Press, 1983); G. P. Landow, Hypertext 3.0: Critical Theory and New Media in an Era of Globalization (3rd ed.; Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 2006); S. Langer, Feeling and Form: A Theory of Art (New York: Scribner, 1953); D. Lindley, Lyric (Critical Idiom 44; London: Methuen, 1985); A. B. Lord, The Singer of Tales, ed. S. Mitchell and G. Nagy (2nd ed.; Harvard Studies in Comparative Literature 24; Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 2000); R. Lowth, Lectures on the Sacred Poetry of the Hebrews (4th ed.; London: Tomas Tegg, 1839 [1753]); J. C. McCann, ed., The Shape and Shaping of the Psalter (JSOTSup 159; Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1993); P. D. Miller, Interpreting the Psalms (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1986); idem, “The Beginning of the Psalter,” in The Shape and Shaping of the Psalter, ed. J. C. McCann (JSOTSup 159; Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1993) 83-92; idem, “Kingship, Torah Obedience, and Prayer: The Theology of Psalms 15-24,” in Neue Wege der Psalmenforschung: Für Walter Beyerlin, ed. K. Seybold and E. Zenger (HBS 1; Freiburg: Herder, 1994) 127-42; idem, “The Theological Significance of Biblical Poetry,” in Israelite Religion and Biblical Theology: Collected Essays (JSOTSup 267; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 2000) 233-49; E. Miner, “Collections, Poetic,” in The New

Princeton Encyclopedia of Poetry and Poetics, ed. A. Preminger and T. V. F. Brogan (Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1993) 222-23; W. H. Race, "Melic Poetry," in The New Princeton Encyclopedia of Poetry and Poetics, ed. A. Preminger and T. V. F. Brogan (Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1993) 755; M. L. Rosenthal and S. M. Gall, The Modern Poetic Sequence (New York: Oxford University Press, 1982); idem, "Lyric Sequence: II. Modern British and American," in The New Princeton Encyclopedia of Poetry and Poetics, ed. A. Preminger and T. V. F. Brogan (Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1993) 728-29; A. Sjöberg and E. Bergman, The Collection of Sumerian Temple Hymns (TCS 3; Locust Valley, NY: J. J. Augustin, 1969); B. A. Strawn and J. M. LeMon, "'Everything That Has Breath': Animal Praise in Psalm 150:6 in the Light of Ancient Near Eastern Iconography" in Bilder als Quellen / Images as Sources: Studies in ancient Near Eastern artifacts and the Bible inspired by the work of Othmar Keel, ed. S. Bickel, S. Schroer, and C. Uehlinger (OBO; Fribourg: Academic Press; Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, forthcoming) 451-85 and Pls. xxxiii-iv; G. Strawson, "Against Narrativity," Ratio 17 (2004) 428-52; M. C. Taylor, "Impossible Story," Cross Currents 36 (1986-1987) 489-92 [review of Aichele 1985]; L. Turco, The Book of Forms: A Handbook of Poetics (3rd ed.; Hanover, NH: University Press of New England, 2000); G. H. Wilson, The Editing of the Hebrew Psalter (SBLDS 76; Chico, CA: Scholars Press, 1985).

B. A. Strawn

M

MAAT

This is an Egyptian word conventionally transcribed as maat or maet, containing central ^ʾ*ālep* and ^ʿ*ayin* left unexpressed in the popular-usage transcriptions cited. It is from a root maa, basically meaning “be straight” (literally), then “be straight in conduct,” “be true, just, right(eous).” Hence, the abstract noun maat includes truth, justice, rightness, right order in the universe within its orbit. It was the fundamental concept undergirding the values of ancient Egyptian culture, governing relations between deity and humans and within human society in that culture. It was thus in some measure analogous with Hebrew šedeq, šēdāqâ, šādaq (“right,” “righteousness/justice,” “be right/just”). Like Hebrew hokmâ (“wisdom”), Egyptian maat was personified, and in its case right from the beginning (as a fem. word) in the form of a goddess, Maat, to whom even temples and cult were later assigned.

1. Oldest Occurrences, the Maat Hieroglyph, Basic Range of Meaning
2. Historical Development in the Concept of Maat
3. Maat and Old Testament Terms and Concepts

1. Oldest Occurrences, the Maat Hieroglyph, Basic Range of Meaning.

1.1. Oldest Occurrences. This Egyptian term probably was pronounced originally as muʿat*, becoming muʿa (attested in cuneiform transcriptions) in the third and second millennia BC. Going down into the first millennium BC, it was reduced to ma(ʿ), attested through Greek transcripts, and by Roman times it appeared as me (as preserved in Coptic). As both verbal stem muʿa (conventionally maa) and derived feminine noun muʿat (conventionally maat), this word is clearly attested from the very beginnings of pharaonic history, from the First and Second Dynasties onwards (third millennium BC, particularly in personal names of kings and officials and then ever more widely throughout the rest of Egyptian history down to Roman times.

1.2. The Maat Hieroglyph and Basic Meanings. Its significance is multifold and is illustrated by the main hieroglyph used to write the term: a straight piece of wood, usually completely rectangular, or with one end cut at a slant, and wide enough to be a level base (as for a seat or throne). In some early cases it is tapered, as if to be a wedge, such as might be used to achieve a straight, even level where this was lacking. As in English, “straight” can be a synonym for regular and generally accepted behavior, not simply for straight-shaped objects. Thus maat for “straight” conduct came to embrace all that was right in life, including justice and truth(fulness).

1.3. The Fields of Meaning. Leaving aside literal, physical straightness (as of objects), meanings include the following. (1) “Be true” (adjective-verb maa) and “truth” (derived fem. noun maat), as contrasted in context with non-factual situations, lies or deceit. (2) What is “real, genuine,” by contrast with artificial products (e.g., real/natural versus artificially manufactured gemstones), and authentic in quality (even in negative use—e.g., “a real coward”) as opposed to mere (and unreal) appearance. (3) Ethically, what is “just, justice,” by contrast with wrongdoing and crimes. Thus, for example, in a two-party contest in a law court the vindicated party was declared to be “(in the) right” (maa) and the guilty one condemned as “(in the) wrong” (ʿadja). (4) Generally, maa(t) is the term applied to describe “right action/practice, rightness, righteous(ness)” in daily personal conduct at all levels and in public life to the highest level from the pharaoh (its official upholder) downwards. (5) Less pragmatically, maat was essential (in Egyptian eyes) for the right functioning of their universe, so that it not lapse into chaos. (6) The special term maa(t)-kheru (lit., “true of voice”) applied both to the dead who passed the last judgment “justified” by their good life and deeds and, at times (by anticipation), to the living. In this-worldly contexts gods, kings and other mortals could be described by this term when “triumphant” over ill-intentioned foes or “vindicated” against them. (7) From earliest times maat (“right, justice”) was also personified as a deity, and (being a feminine word) as a goddess, Maat. The Egyptians took this so seriously that by the New Kingdom (later second millennium BC) they built temples to her, with all appropriate cult, as at Karnak (in the North precinct) probably under Amenophis III and certainly from Ramesses II onward. The literary practice of *personification of concepts and so on was always common in Egypt at all periods (third millennium BC onward) and likewise in the ancient Near East; neither there nor in the Hebrew Bible did it owe anything whatsoever to classical or Hellenistic Greek usage, despite false statements to the contrary from the later nineteenth century AD down to the present. As the sun blazing with light in the sky was deemed to see everything on earth, the Egyptians vested justice in their preeminent sun-god, Re (or Ra). Thus, in texts and temple wall-scenes Maat (treated as a goddess) personified justice and was unendingly associated very closely with Re (even as his daughter) and repeatedly entitled the “Eye of Re,” his organ for seeing injustice, to apply justice (maat) to it.

2. Historical Development in the Concept of Maat.

2.1. Archaic Period (c. 3000-2700 BC). The sole inscriptions that we have for this period are on administrative wooden or bone/ivory labels, personal and institutional seal-impressions and modest-sized monuments, with very restricted subject matter. Personal names could include maat. So with an official named Nefer-qed-maat, “good is the character of [either] right/justice [or] (the goddess) Maat,” while the Second Dynasty pharaoh Sekhem-ib was surnamed Per-en-maat (for this period, see Kahl 2003, 2.169-73).

2.2. The Old Kingdom or “Pyramid Age” (c. 2700-2150 BC). In this age of Egypt’s first greatness data for maat begin to multiply, and at more than one level. Two pharaohs incorporated maat into their official titles. As Horus-King, Snofru (Fourth Dynasty) called himself Neb-maat (“possessor [and activator] of right/justice”), while, in heading up the Fifth Dynasty, Userkaf entitled himself Iri-maat (“doer of right/justice”). Later such kings included in their pyramid tombs the royal funerary rituals, spells and hymns that make up the vast corpus of the Pyramid Texts. Already these illustrate the various applications of the term maat set out above (see 1.3 above). Already we find Maat personified as a goddess closely linked with the sun-god Re (§§1582, 1768, 1774 [translated in Faulkner, 238, 259, 260]). And likewise so it is with most of the attested meanings of maat the term. So too for what was true, real, on the right way (§1142 [Faulkner, 186]), and used of righteous folk (needing a boat, §1188 [Faulkner, 191]). Archetypally we find, “I have set Right [maat] in place of wrong” (§265 [Faulkner, 61]), or “that I may bring justice” (§323 [Faulkner, 69]), and so on.

Much more informative, beginning in the Old Kingdom, are the formal autobiographical inscriptions of the high officials, found in their tomb-chapels. On such texts (right through to the Late Period) an indispensable representative survey (with translations of typical and key texts) is that given by M. Lichtheim. In the Old Kingdom officials speak of “speaking” and “doing” right (maat) and exemplify it by their just deeds—for example, speaking for the people’s good and not evil against others; paying for work done from one’s own resources (not those of others); not using force against people; pleasing his god and his king alike by both speaking truth and doing right. From the wisdom texts, Ptahhotep cites maat as the basic principle that overcomes all wrongs.

2.3. The First Intermediate Period (c. 2150-2100 BC). After the Old Kingdom, during the later part of this period and on into the Middle Kingdom, many of the Pyramid Texts passed into a new funerary corpus—the Coffin Texts—used by high and middle ranking officials, and mention of maat continued here also.

However, in this period of reduced royal authority local provincial governors and officers speak out for themselves from their tomb-texts and stelae. They continued to invoke maat, but also increasingly they presupposed it as the basis of their enlightened treatment of their people and elaborated on their show of personal good character in that context.

2.4. The Middle Kingdom and Second Intermediate Period (Eleventh-Seventeenth Dynasties) (c. 2100-1550 BC). In this period the great officials continued to stress justice increasingly, with personally righteous conduct, as their ideal. At this time right behavior in this life began to be linked with hope for a blessed hereafter and one's attitude toward the gods. Both for kings and commoners, the need to live justly and mercifully with one's people (whether family, local community or the nation) is also stressed in the royal wisdom-works (Merikare, Amenemhat I) and other literature. But now the possibility of wrong overcoming right is also glimpsed, even if only in moments of deep pessimism (as in The Man Tired of Life, and the Discourse of Khakheperre-sonb).

2.5. The New Kingdom (Eighteenth-Twentieth Dynasties) (c. 1550-1070 BC). In the Middle Kingdom the concept of doing right (maat) had three foci: king, society and the individual. But in the Eighteenth Dynasty scribal thinkers added a fourth dimension: the active presence and role of the gods (see Lichtheim, 54). Personal piety grows apace in the record, linked with doing right.

Then suddenly Akhenaten imposed his regime of directing all official worship exclusively to the sun-god, as embodied in the visible sun-disc (the Aten) and mediated through himself as prophet and son of Aten. No other deity was openly recognized on Akhenaten's monuments; hence it was a true monotheism, cult of one single deity, except insofar as Akhenaten also proceeded to identify himself in some measure with the sun-god. There was no room for goddesses; Maat was now solely maat ("truth, right, justice"), but not in traditional terms. The king himself was the one who "lives on/by maat" ("truth, right"); his officials imbibed his "Teaching" and followed his rulings (from Ay, her No. 62 [see Lichtheim, 61]) to attain a state of maat—that is, rightness in the king's sight. And that was all; the old moral and ethical imperatives of over a thousand years' standing simply disappear from view; Akhenaten is himself the norm on Aten's behalf. Thus, this remarkable pharaoh appears briefly as the world's only monotheistic post-modernist: only one god, and no explicitly endorsed values outside of himself.

After Akhenaten's fall Egypt simply resumed the old ways and the traditional values, especially maat, whose praises were sung once more and with emphasis (see Lichtheim, 63-65, esp. 65). Doubtless shaken by the seeming absence of their gods under Akhenaten's audacious experiment, for a time the more theological scribes experimented with squaring the circle by trying to reckon all deities as forms of Amun the supreme, and hence ultimately but one. However, this was too risqué beyond educated circles, and almost two thousand years of tradition soon engulfed such speculation in oblivion.

Instead, under the Ramesses-kings of the Nineteenth and Twentieth Dynasties, right-doing, just and merciful behavior, speaking and doing maat are not only owed to the king but are seen increasingly as the will of the gods and in hopes of a blessed afterlife. One did right, maat, god-fearingly. Much interest has always focused on a small group of texts (mainly thirteenth century BC) among the many inscriptions left by members of the community of royal workmen (of the Kings' and Queens' Valleys) in their village chapels at Deir el-Medina in western Thebes. These are the stelae that show a penitential side to Egyptian religion. Someone does wrong; ill fortune follows and is viewed as divine punishment. Then the afflicted person is contrite, confessing the wrong and seeking forgiveness and restoration. And when healing follows, thanksgiving may follow. In Egyptian theology the rule of maat was broken, consequences followed, the cause was admitted, and maat was restored. In the Hebrew Bible this same sequence (e.g., as in the structure of the book of Judges) is inevitably labeled by scholars as "Deuteronomistic" and is assigned arbitrarily to six centuries later. But such concepts were not new even in the thirteenth century (let alone the seventh) and go back to at least the early second millennium BC (as in the Mari archive). We have parallel theologies in which obedience to a norm or norms is paramount. In Egypt it was maat; in the Hebrew community it was Yahweh's covenants (Abram, Moses); in Aleppo (Mari text) it was the command of the local deities. The "critical scholarship" over a century ago had no inkling of any of this and fails to fit the vastly enlarged field of known facts.

On the royal level, especially in Ramesside times, the pharaohs are commonly shown offering maat ("truth, right") to the gods, shown as a tiny figure of the goddess in their outstretched hand. Interpretations of this vary. It basically may symbolize the whole duty and acts of the king as executor of maat through his support of justice, proper order and right standards of conduct throughout his realm, as well as maintaining faithfully the cults of the gods—there are words maa (“make offering,” “offerings”), which by punning would permit a reading of these concepts also into his act of “offering maat” and exhibiting his legitimacy of rule (see Teeter). In funerary religion the concept of maat also appears in the compilation of spells for the afterlife known to moderns as the Book of the Dead. Here the most famous passage is Spell 125, the so-called “Negative Confession,” wherein the deceased person at the Hall of (Final) Judgment denies having committed a long series of antisocial and impious actions against the truth/right (maat) (for the text, see Allen, 97-101; for maat elsewhere in the Book of the Dead, see the list of references [under “right,” “righteous,” “truth”] in Allen, 274, 280). Already in the Middle Kingdom denials of committing various wrongs feature in autobiographies of officials, which continues into the New Kingdom, when this practice becomes associated with hopes for bliss (or otherwise) in the afterlife; it was from this rich and long-established repertoire of what was maat and non-maat that the composer(s) of Spell 125 of the Book of the Dead could draw their own great series of do’s and don’t’s (on this, see Lichtheim 103-44, and the illuminating “moral indexes” in Lichtheim 145-55).

2.6. The Later Periods (Hellenistic and Roman) (c. 1070-300 BC). In the Third Intermediate Period our sources are fewer, but the statues of the priests of Amun in Thebes in the Libyan Twenty-Second/Twenty-Third Dynasties give a lively conspectus of their devotion to deity, this being exemplified in their righteous conduct in everyday life (helpful and generous to others especially in need). During the Nubian Twenty-Fifth Dynasty, and the revival of culture and power in the Twenty-Sixth Dynasty, then during Persian rule (“Twenty-Seventh Dynasty”), and under the “resistance” (Twenty-Eighth to Thirtieth Dynasties), and after Alexander’s takeover, into Greco-Roman times, the maat tradition of right behavior in obedience to deity, and to the ruler as upholder of maat, continued through to the end of Egypt’s ancient civilization. It was a high ideal, nobly set forth, and (as in any human society) often “honored” in the breach as well (and as much?) as in the observance.

3. Maat and Old Testament Terms and Concepts.

Both in the OT and elsewhere in the biblical world the Semitic languages had terms by which their users could express the same range of meaning as did maat for the Egyptians. Thus, in biblical Hebrew terms such as šedeq and yāšār and their derivatives (and in part kēn and ’emet) well covered all the concepts represented by maat. The šedeq group of words expresses “right(ness),” “righteous(ness)” and sometimes “vindication”; note the derivatives šēdāqā (“righteousness, just[ice], what is right”), šadeq (“be just, justify, vindicate, declare just”), šaddiq/šadōq (“just, righteous”). The root šdq is old, and words from it go back to at least the early second millennium BC (in Amorite, šidqum) as well as the fourteenth century (Amarna letters, šaduq [“right, just”]) and in thirteenth-century Ugaritic, šdq (“just, lawful, legitimate”). The other major Hebrew word, yāšār, with its basic meaning of “straight, level,” also, like maat, applies that physical concept in good metaphorical fashion to straight conduct and, by extension, to upright behavior; derivatives mēšārīm and mūšōr cover “even(ness)” and “equity” as well as literal (geographical) plains. Like šdq, yšr has its ancient cognates: in Akkadian (Assyro-Babylonian) ešēru (“go straight, be/become alright, set to rights”) is well attested from the third millennium BC onwards, along with corresponding derivatives mišaru and mišartu (“render justice” and “justice”). In Ugaritic too we have y(a)š(a)r (“upright”) and m(i)š(a)r (“justice”).

More modestly, kēn (from kwn) can cover “right/honest, true,” while its Akkadian relative kittu (from kintu) expresses “truth, justice, faithfulness” and so on. Just like Maat in Egypt (and also third millennium BC onwards), Kittu was personified as a goddess and as daughter of the sun-god, but here, of course, daughter of Shamash, not Re. Other personifications among the Mesopotamians took a darker hue: fate/death (as Namtaru) were personified, even as vizier at the court of the queen of their netherworld, and death itself (Irkallu) was personified as a goddess. In the Hittite world sincerity, law, justice and seemingly good and bad were also personified (late second millennium BC). Neither justice nor right(eousness) was personified in Hebrew; they were simply qualities coming from God and to be implemented by humans. The one significant personification in Hebrew is of wisdom (ḥokmā), simply as a vivid literary device (see Proverbs 2: Ancient Near Eastern Background; and briefly on range of personifications, Kitchen, 5-6). Another Hebrew term, ʾemet, covers “faithfulness” and “reliability” and thus “truth”; the root may possibly recur at Ugarit.

In all these fields Egyptian maat and Semitic sedeq, yāšār, kēn/kittu and ʾemet together give expression to concepts that to the present day are the indispensable basis for the conduct of human life and affairs both within human society and to deity, creator of peoples and concepts alike. Egyptian maat and its spread of usages is a valuable conceptual and social parallel running alongside the biblical terms sedeq, yāšār and so forth and their relatives in that world. Such concepts were familiar in societies over a thousand years before Abraham; he and his world lived by such basics toward deity and their contemporaries, as did (almost five centuries later) Moses and his brethren, and the Hebrew nation and its many neighbors then and down to Greco-Roman times. These values were always cherished constants, even though (in a sinful world, then as now), of course, they were always open to abuse by the unscrupulous, who were in turn judged by these standards.

See also ETHICS; RIGHTEOUSNESS.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. T. G. Allen, trans., The Book of the Dead, or, Going Forth Day by Day: Ideas of the Ancient Egyptians Concerning the Hereafter as Expressed in Their Own Terms (SAOC 37; Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1974); R. O. Faulkner, The Ancient Egyptian Pyramid Texts, with Supplement (Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1969); J. Kahl, ed., Frühägyptisches Wörterbuch (6 vols.; Wiesbaden: Harrassowitz, 2002-); K. A. Kitchen, “Some Egyptian Background to the Old Testament,” TynBul 5-6 (1960) 4-18; M. Lichtheim, Maat in Egyptian Autobiographies and Related Studies (OBO 120; Freiburg: Universitätsverlag; Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1992); E. Teeter, The Presentation of Matt: Ritual and Legitimacy in Ancient Egypt (SAOC 57; Chicago: Oriental Institute of the University of Chicago, 1997).

K. A. Kitchen

ature (*Job, *Proverbs, *Ecclesiastes) deal frequently with panhistorical, human issues. It is therefore somewhat surprising that, with the exception of Proverbs, relatively few references to marriage or sex are found therein. The “historical” books that are treated in this volume (*Ruth, *Esther, *Lamentations) display a similar unevenness of coverage (i.e., relatively frequent in Ruth, less so in the other two books). It is, of course, in Song of Songs, which does not easily fit in either of the foregoing groups, that we find the Bible’s most explicit and extensive discourses on sex (if not marriage, too, as we will see).

1. Psalms and Wisdom Literature
2. Ruth, Esther, Lamentations
3. Song of Songs
4. Conclusion

1. Psalms and Wisdom Literature.

1.1. Marriage and Sex in Psalms. Since the focus of the psalms is, by and large, on either individual or communal expression, particularly in relationship to God (as opposed to interpersonal relationships), there are relatively few references to marriage or sex. Nevertheless, there are two of note: the royal wedding psalm (Ps 45) and a pair of psalms on the role of God in family life (Pss 127–128).

1.1.1. Psalm 45. This psalm is categorized by form critics as a “royal psalm” (see Kingship Psalms), and yet it is unique in a number of respects. First, while royal weddings were hardly personal or private affairs (in Israel or elsewhere), the psalmist does address both groom and then bride individually (to be sure, the king is addressed individually elsewhere in royal psalms, such as the coronation psalm [Ps 2:7-9], albeit not at such length). Second, while the particularities of the envisioned wedding are doubtlessly affected by the social standing of the parties, it is notable that the psalm explicitly envisions the bride’s departure from her people and her father’s house (Ps 45:11), quite the opposite direction of movement from that envisioned in Genesis 2:24. Third, the superscription (which may indeed, as most scholars believe, amount to an early commentary on the original poem) states that the psalm is ʾal-šōšannîm. While the meaning and usage of the term are uncertain (for full discussion, see HALOT, 1455), and the same term is found also in the superscription to an individual *lament (Ps

MARRIAGE AND SEX

The Bible’s books of *Psalms and Wisdom liter-

69:1), the noun (or its singular, šōšannâ) occurs eight times in Song of Songs meaning “lily,” including an erotic description of the male lover in Song of Songs 5:13. The same superscription calls the psalm a šir yēdīdōt (“love song”). With due caution, we note that the Ugaritic root ydd meant “love (sexually),” although its usage in classical Hebrew appears to be broader, “favorite” or “friend” (so Zobel, 445). Of special interest, however, is the contention by H.-J. Zobel (446) that the psalm entered the *canon thanks only to “its having been reinterpreted as referring to the relationship between Yahweh and his people”—a theological move that we will re-encounter in spades when we come to Song of Songs. In sum, however unusual this psalm may be within the Psalter, it does represent the book’s one explicit mention of the act of marriage, assumes procreative acts to follow (“your [masc. sg.] sons” [Ps 45:16]), and at least its superscription hints at erotic overtones withal.

1.1.2. Psalms 127–128. Psalms 127–128 appear in the midst of the “Songs of Ascents” (Pss 120–134). At first glance, Psalm 127 seems to address itself to architectural construction (house/city [Ps 127:1]), but the swift transition to a discussion of the blessing of sons in Psalm 127:3–5 inevitably recalls the multiple meanings of “house” (including progeny) in 2 Samuel 7. Psalm 127:5, then, and Psalm 128:1 speak from a thoroughly male perspective of the happiness of the man (geber) whose marriage (“wife” [Ps 128:3]) the Lord blesses with multiple children (Ps 127:5; 128:3) and even grandchildren (Ps 128:6). Given our earlier observations about the nature of the book (and what we will see are the far more frequent treatments of our subject in Proverbs), it is notable that both psalms use a word typical of Wisdom literature, ’ašrê (“happy” [cf. Ps 1:1]).

In sum, to this point the discussion of sexuality has been within marriage, from a male perspective, and for the explicit (if not exclusive) purpose of procreation.

1.2. Marriage and Sex in Proverbs. If Psalms deals almost entirely with vertical (God-human) relationships, Proverbs represents the opposite extreme: while a theological umbrella is set over the whole in Proverbs 1:7 (“The fear of the LORD is the beginning of knowledge”), much of the book is taken up with more earthly, everyday matters, most famously in the parts of Proverbs 22–23 that overlap with the far older Egyptian “Instruction of Amenemope.” It is therefore to be expected that horizontal (human-human) issues, including marriage and sex, will find far more prominence in Proverbs than in Psalms, and it is so.

1.2.1. Lectures Against the Nokriyâ (Loose/Strange Woman) and Praise of Sex Within Marriage. With the exception of an *acrostic poem at the close of the book (Prov 31:10–31), the book’s focus with respect to our topic is on the guidance of men, especially young men. Most often, this is done through the via negativa, with repeated warnings against liaisons with a nokriyâ (NRSV: “loose woman”; NJPS: “strange woman”; lit., “foreign woman”). The most extensive presentation is in three lectures in Proverbs 5:1–23; 6:20–35; 7:1–17 (see also Prov 2:16–17; 20:16 [= 27:13]; 22:14; 23:27–28). The lectures presume that the primary temptation is to adultery in the sense of relations with another man’s wife, and they warn against the husband’s unmitigatable wrath (Prov 6:29–35), against public humiliation (Prov 5:14 [in an “honor and shame”* culture!]) and apparently against sexually transmitted diseases (Prov 5:11), and they certainly threaten death as the inevitable outcome (Prov 5:5, 23; 7:27; cf. 9:18). Notably, given the visual nature of modern pornography and sex-based marketing, throughout the book’s cautions it is not the woman’s looks but rather her smooth speech that is of greatest concern (Prov 2:16; 5:3; 6:24; 7:21; cf. 9:15–18). Finally, the lectures present an extended portrayal in Proverbs 7 of the nokriyâ as seductress unto death (traditionally, “Woman Folly”), who is then juxtaposed with the sublime “Woman Wisdom”* in Proverbs 8 (but who in turn is described neither as wife nor as sexual partner and will therefore not be further discussed here).

Right in the midst of these dire warnings is a more positive statement—in fact, the OT’s sole explicit tribute to sex within marriage (with the arguable exception of Gen 2:24): Proverbs 5:15–19. Interestingly, several of the metaphors are the same as those featured in Song of Songs: drinking water; a well; a doe (cf. Song 4:12, 15; 2:7; 3:5).

Still, in all, arguably the most intriguing moment occurs in one of the early warnings: “You will be saved from the loose woman, from the adulteress with her smooth words, who forsakes the partner of her youth and forgets her sacred covenant [lit., ‘covenant of her God’]” (Prov

2:16-17 NRSV). Although “covenant” surely refers in the first instance to literal marriage, its mention in the context of “the partner of her youth” and of God inevitably brings to mind the common prophetic use of marriage as a metaphor for God’s covenant with Israel and of adultery/prostitution for Israel’s idolatry and apostasy (cf. Jer 2:1-2; Ezek 16; 20; 23; Hos 1—2). Such a linkage to Israel’s historical experience and thereby more generally to a figurative level of meaning will prove most significant when we take up the difficulties of other, less easily interpreted passages, above all in Song of Songs.

1.2.2. Proverbs on Women as Wives: Ambiguity to Modern Ears. As is well known, Proverbs is a collection of collections, and those in Proverbs 10 and following are more epigrammatic than what precedes. In terms of our topic, the male-centeredness of the book comes obviously (indeed, to modern ears, obnoxiously) to the fore: Proverbs 18:22 speaks glowingly of the blessings of a wife (cf. Prov 19:14), and Proverbs 12:4 speaks similarly of a “good wife” (’ēšet-ḥayil [developed at length in the aforementioned concluding acrostic in Prov 31]), but Proverbs 19:13; 21:9 (= 25:24); 21:19; 27:15-16 all comment invidiously on life with a “nagging” or “contentious” woman. Further, Proverbs 30:23 states that the earth shudders at the marriage of a “loathsome” (so NJPS; lit., “hated”) woman, and the mother of King *Lemuel advises him against the distractions of wine and *women in the pursuit of justice for the poor (Prov 31:3).

Finally, and in some ways surprisingly, the book concludes with a paean to the ’ēšet-ḥayil (NRSV: “good wife”; NJPS: “capable wife”; lit., “woman/wife of might”), depicting her as a woman of independence and vigor, entrusted by her husband with the management of the household. To be sure, she is these things, in part at least, to provide leisure for her husband to be “prominent in the gates” (Prov 31:23), so that there is some debate over how liberated she truly is (see Davis, 154-55). Nevertheless, by contrast with what we hear otherwise of women’s standing in ancient times (the Bible often included), the husband’s words in Proverbs 31:29 ring true: “You surpass them all.”

1.3. Marriage and Sex in Job.

1.3.1. The Narrative Framework. Job was married, and he and his wife obviously had sexual relations: he has seven sons and three daughters at the beginning of the book, loses them, has another seven sons and three daughters at the end of the book (presumably by the same wife), and finally lives to see the fourth generation (Job 1:2, 19; 42:13, 16). Beyond that, his wife serves early on as a foil to Job’s *righteousness, advising him, “Curse God [MT: ‘Bless God’], and die,” which he refuses to do, comparing her words to those of “foolish women” (Job 2:9-10). She then disappears for the rest of the book (but for a rhetorical reference in Job 31:10, see 1.3.2 below).

1.3.2. The Poetic Dialogues. Otherwise, the references to marriage and sex in the book are few and fleeting. Two of Job’s “friends” raise the subject briefly: Eliphaz tells Job to accept God’s reproof because one who does so will not fail in bed (so NJPS) and will have many children (Job 5:24-25); Bildad warns that the wicked (including, by implication, Job) will be bereft of children (Job 18:19). For his own part, Job complains that adulterers get away with it (Job 24:15). He longs for the days when he was confident of lifelong vigor and potency (Job 29:20). And the concluding set of self-curses by which he seeks to force God’s personal appearance begins with a protestation that he has not even lusted with his eyes (Job 31:1) and continues later with an extension of the lex talionis to himself and his wife, in the event that he has committed anything approaching adultery (Job 31:9-12)—an extrapolation otherwise unknown in Scripture or ancient Near Eastern law. In short, while sexual purity at least has pride of place in Job’s self-defense, marriage and sex play a minor role in this literary and theological magnum opus, essentially reinforcing what we have already heard from Psalms 127—128: potency and offspring are a blessing from God and a sign of faithfulness.

1.4. Marriage and Sex in Ecclesiastes. Of all the biblical books covered in this volume, Ecclesiastes probably has the least to say explicitly on our topic. One could, to be sure, argue that the observations in Ecclesiastes 1 that “nothing ever really changes” in human existence apply: millennia come and go, but essential human issues like these endure with only outward alteration.

Otherwise, one is left with a negative warning against female entanglements (Eccles 7:26) and, by way of counterpoint, a more positive word (Eccles 9:9). But even the latter places the joys of marriage sub specie aeternitatis: “Enjoy life with the wife whom you love, all the days of your vain life that are given you under the sun, because that is your portion in life and in your toil at which you toil under the sun" (NRSV). This sentiment certainly is in keeping with the most famous passage of the book (Eccles 3:1-8), including the observation that there is "a time to embrace, and a time to refrain from embracing" (Eccles 3:5).

Finally, we take brief note of a text that some Jewish interpreters have seen as an allusion to sexual profligacy versus restraint: "a time for throwing stones, and a time for gathering stones" (Eccles 3:5 [see Machinist, 1609]), as well as one beloved by Christian preachers at weddings (Eccles 4:9-12 [esp. "Two are better than one. . . . A threefold cord is not quickly broken"])). Neither one clearly or necessarily has to do with our topic.

2. Ruth, Esther, Lamentations.

2.1. Marriage and Sex in Ruth.

2.1.1. Levirate Marriage. The most distinctive feature of our topic within the book of Ruth is, of course, its exemplar of levirate marriage (see Kinsman-Redeemer and Levirate). The practice is commanded in Deuteronomy 25:5-10 and is known elsewhere in the ancient Near East (for references, see Hamilton, 567). The law itself forces a certain penultimacy upon marriage, as it commands what is elsewhere forbidden—marriage and sexual relations between a man and his brother's wife (cf. Lev 18:16)—thereby stipulating a higher value on the preservation of the dead brother's "name in Israel." However, while the principle behind the Deuteronomic law certainly is present in Ruth (Ruth 4:5), there are notable differences in the details. Deuteronomy 25:5-10 provides for the refusal to perform levirate marriage, but it is a matter of public shaming, complete with removal of the sandal and spitting in the face, both performed by the widow. In Ruth 4 the refusal is portrayed as a straightforward business decision, with no necessary shame involved (and Ruth not even present). Further, according to Ruth 4, the Deuteronomic interest in the preservation of the dead man's name is merged with the need to keep allotted portions of the promised land in the family, as provided by Leviticus 25:25. These discrepancies have provoked much scholarly discussion, especially of the variety of genres and the dating of the relevant portions of Leviticus, Deuteronomy and Ruth (for summary discussion and references, see Niditch, 452-53). In the end, whether one reads Ruth as history or later historical fiction, the author clearly expects that the reader will recognize verisimilitude in the book's narration of the practice.

2.1.2. Marriage, Sex and Interpersonal Relationships Beyond Both. Levirate marriage is not the only source of tension in Ruth surrounding the ultimacy of the marriage relationship within the social order. Already in Ruth 1, both Ruth and Orpah must wrestle with reality (their precarious situation as widows, soon to be in a foreign land) versus their love for *Naomi as a concomitant of her status as mother to their late husbands. Many scholars have noted that, in fact, quite apart from husbands, the relationship between Naomi and Ruth is the key one in the book (some even speculating that a lesbian relationship developed between them [see Haffner, 34], although there seems little evidence beyond the use of "cleave" in Ruth 1:14 [cf. Gen 2:24]).

What is without question is that it is Naomi whose canny sense of the male psyche leads to Ruth's union with *Boaz and relief for both women from their untenable economic situation. Ruth's first encounter with Boaz may be by "chance" (Ruth 2:4 [about as close as the book comes to overt divine intervention]), but Naomi is quick to see the possibilities, and it is she who arranges for Ruth to be alone with Boaz on the threshing floor. There has been much debate over whether or not Naomi's plan entails overt seduction (the issue largely depends on how one interprets "feet" in Ruth 3:4, 7-8 [see Campbell, 121, 131-32]). Most likely, the narrator is being deliberately opaque on the point (or "suggestive," in the neutral sense of the term). In any event, the early-morning encounter leads quickly enough to a literal gift of seed (Ruth 3:15), to be followed as soon as legally possible by human seed and pregnancy (Ruth 4:13).

The book of Ruth, then, adds a distinctive historical twist to the biblical discussion of marriage and sex (via levirate marriage), but it also features timeless reminders of the inevitable interweaving of both into a social fabric with strings attached to far more than the two individuals involved. (In fact, some scholars believe that the book was a postexilic composition directed against the exclusivist movement that included the dissolution of exogamous marriages under the leadership of Ezra and Nehemiah [cf. Ezra 9—10; Neh 13:1-3] by placing a Moabite woman clearly in the lineage of the revered King *David.)

2.2. Marriage and Sex in Esther. With the book of Esther we face many of the same issues as in Psalm 45, only more so: the marriages in the book are not merely royal, but Persian. In fact, in the view of many scholars the nature of the book as a “comic farce for a carnivalesque holiday [*Purim] . . . with its bawdiness and slap-stick humor,” such that “nothing about the events of the story is realistic,” calls into question the historical value of any details of significance with regard to our topic (so Berlin, 1623). (Thus, for example, the process for selection of the Persian queen is utterly contrary to what is otherwise known, both as to eligibility and as to process.) Even so, the book ranked only with Song of Songs as the subject of rabbinic debate as to its canonicity: in addition to the failure of the book even to mention God, the Jewish heroine is married to a non-Jew in the very period of Ezra and Nehemiah (see the concluding paragraph in 2.1.2 above).

However, in many ways the most interesting treatment of marriage and sex in the book has nothing to do with Queen Esther. Rather, it is the events leading up to her selection: the refusal of Queen *Vashti to appear on command before the inebriated king and his nobles (Esther 1:10-12). Some have speculated that the king’s command was for the queen to appear “wearing a royal diadem [and nothing else]” (so the *Targumim and Talmud), so that the queen’s refusal is really protecting him from his own worst expression of sexuality. But the real problem, at least within the narrative world of the book, is that “the queen’s behavior will make all wives despise their husbands” (Esther 1:17). Thus, at very least the book illustrates the fine line between gender roles and, as it were, naked abuse of power (cf. the far more egregious example of Amnon and Tamar [2 Sam 13]). Queen Vashti may lose her crown, but it is King *Ahasuerus who emerges as an emasculated pawn in an inflexible social matrix.

2.3. Marriage and Sex in Lamentations. Given its subject matter, it is no surprise that, with one exception, any mention of marriage or sex in Lamentations is figurative. Whether by simile (“like a widow” [Lam 1:1]) or by metaphor (“Jerusalem has become among them a thing unclean [lit., ‘a menstruating woman’]” [Lam 1:17]), the fallen city is described as bereft of husband (for the “great reversal” of this image, see Is 62:4) and as one ritually impure—a symbol of her moral depravity (cf. the prophetic usage of adultery as a metaphor for apostasy/idolatry [see 1.2.1 above]). The one literal reference is to the multiple rapes that occurred during the conquest of Jerusalem and Judah (Lam 5:11). Yet even here, one suspects that the author is simply expanding on the prophetic metaphor: just as Israel was guilty of adultery both literally (as in the incidents of the golden calf [Ex 32:6] and Baal-Peor [Num 25:1, 8]) and figuratively (by violating her “marriage” covenant with God), so also is she raped, literally, in the horrible experiences of women during the fall of city and land, and figuratively, as the integrity of the land and its people are violated at will by their enemies (for what some have termed a “pornographic” pursuit of a similar line of thinking, cf. Ezek 16:35-42). (A final note: Lam 4:6 also compares the guilt of God’s people to that of Sodom, but despite the assumptions inherent in the English legal term “sodomy,” this text does not specify the nature of the city’s wickedness.)

3. Song of Songs.

3.1. What Is Clear About Song of Songs. With respect to our topic, Song of Songs provides half a loaf, but that in abundance: it is difficult to find anything that is not in some way related to sex, but marriage is mentioned, at most, obliquely, as the man addresses the woman as kallâ (“bride”) in Song of Songs 4:8-12; 5:1 (and some would argue that “bride” is to be taken no more literally than the oft-accompanying “sister”; see Murphy, 156). The scant mention of marriage is a serious question with which we must deal, but from the outset we may affirm two points on the basis of this book. First, Song of Songs is the Bible’s ultimate refutation of any Platonic or gnostic depreciation of the material body in general or sexuality in particular; otherwise put, there is no sin inherent in sex. Second, Song of Songs affirms (yea, celebrates) sexual expression as an expression of love and joy in its own right and not merely as an instrumental means to the end of procreation (pace numerous church fathers). Beyond these two points, there is little that is self-evident.

3.2. Song of Songs as “Locks to Which the Key Has Been Lost” (Saadia Gaon). Part of the problem is that the book is notoriously difficult to follow. Efforts to read it as a drama or liturgy have waxed and waned among scholars; most scholarly commentary now leans toward seeing the book as a collection of love poems. (The last thirty years have seen a veritable explosion in commentaries on Song of Songs. The history of scholarship is well summarized by Pope, and more recently by Longman and by Hess.)

But what is one to make of this chunk of undigested erotica in the midst of the canon? As is well known, both Jews and Christians have often sought refuge in allegory, even when otherwise adamantly opposed to the practice. Mystics of both faiths, in particular, have meditated on Song of Songs as an entrée into insight about the communion of the individual soul with God or of the community of the chosen, whether Israel or the church, with God (or, for Christians, with Christ the bridegroom). As is the case with some contemporary Christian music, if one is unaware of the context, one might often take their words as boldly erotic, even sensuous.

More recently, scholars both within and without communities of faith have sought to make sense of Song of Songs on a literal level. Often cited is the resemblance of the physical descriptions that the lovers provide of one another to the Arabic wasf*. Feminist scholars have emphasized the proactive role of the woman, whose words do indeed predominate (Brenner, 185-88). By contrast with Psalms and the Wisdom literature examined above, this book is anything but androcentric (although see Exum, 27-29). But the overall Sitz im Leben of the work remains elusive, with proposals advanced for everything from weddings (Origen) to funerals (Pope) to drinking bouts (b. Sanh. 101a) to the simple celebration of human love (Falk; Murphy; Davis; Longman; Hess).

3.3. A Canonical Key to Song of Songs. Regardless of its origins, those who read from within a Jewish or Christian community of faith must deal with Song of Songs as Scripture. To this end, a particularly promising trajectory is that suggested by P. Trible, who holds that Song of Songs serves, at least in its canonical context, as a commentary on Genesis 2–3, describing how God wanted sex to be before the fall (Trible, 47). Read in this way, Song of Songs is particularly explicative of Genesis 2:18-25, climaxing, as it were, with “The two of them were naked, the man and his wife, yet they felt no shame” (NJPS).

As is true generally in exegesis, context is everything. If accepted, Trible’s reading trumps the (at most) scanty mention of marriage in Song of Songs by placing the entire work within the umbra cast by its referent text in Genesis. Further, one may argue that such a reading solves the eternal debate between the literal and figurative readings of the book with a resounding “yes” or “both/and”: just as the prophets’ description of Israel’s idolatry as adultery worked on both the literal and figurative levels (see 1.2.1 and 2.3 above), so also Song of Songs provides the obverse, positive picture, both of literal, human love and the love of, with, and within the divine that one may hold by faith as the source of human love, but which humans can understand only by figure and extrapolation from the love that they may know intimately between themselves. Christians of at least some traditions will see here a sacramental dimension in marriage and sex; Jews and Christians together can hold that Song of Songs describes a garden that, like Eden, has bounds. (For an independently developed and formulated exposition along these same lines, see Longman, 58-70.)

4. Conclusion.

Neither the Bible in general nor the eight books at the focus of this volume are a systematic manual for teaching or life, nor do they provide a “marriage manual” or a guidebook to sanctified sexuality. What does come forth from their necessarily culturally conditioned (usually monarchical, often androcentric) pages is a vision of both marriage and sexuality as a sign of God’s blessing. Moreover, there are at very least strong hints of a canonically sanctioned figurative level of application to God’s relationship with his chosen people.

As is often the case in turning from exegesis of the ancient text to modern life, there are ambiguities and lacunae. For instance, although the books that we have examined (with the possible exception of Esther) uniformly envision monogamy as the norm, the two books that have provided the most material (Proverbs and Song of Songs) are explicitly attributed to King Solomon—he of the seven hundred wives and three hundred concubines (1 Kings 11:3). However unlikely Solomon’s authorship may be as a matter of history, the attributions illustrate the theological challenge. Similarly, present controversialists on subjects such as same-sex marriage find themselves mounting arguments almost entirely from silence with respect to these books.

The fact is that the Bible does not explicitly address every conceivable question, at least not in every one of its subsections. One can adduce examples and infer principles and still be hard pressed to assert, "Thus saith the LORD."

In the end, biblical books such as these eight serve best when heard where they choose to speak: however much human perversity may have twisted our experience of them, marriage and sex are gifts of God, not merely for the fulfillment of the divine command "Be fruitful and multiply" (Gen 1:28), but for the joy, even the "completion" (Gen 2:18), of those united in them.

See also CREATION THEOLOGY; FEMINIST INTERPRETATION; LAW; SOCIAL-SCIENTIFIC APPROACHES; SONG OF SONGS 1: BOOK OF; WOMEN.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. A. Berlin, "Introduction to Esther," in The Jewish Study Bible, ed. A. Berlin and M. Z. Brettler (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2004) 1623-1625; A. Brenner, "Love Me Tender, Love Me True . . . : I Am an Anonymous Woman from the Song of Songs," in I Am . . . : Biblical Women Tell Their Own Stories (Minneapolis: Augsburg Fortress, 2004) 163-90; E. F. Campbell Jr., Ruth (2nd ed.; AB 7; Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1975); E. F. Davis, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, and the Song of Songs (WestBC; Atlanta: Westminster John Knox, 2000); J. C. Exum, "Ten Things Every Feminist Should Know about the Song of Songs," in The Song of Songs: A Feminist Companion to the Bible, ed. A. Brenner and C. R. Fontaine (FCB 2/6; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 2000) 24-35; M. Falk, Song of Songs: A New Translation and Interpretation (San Francisco: HarperSanFrancisco, 1990); D. W. Haffner, "Sexuality and Scripture: What Else Does the Bible Have to Say?" Reflections 92.1 (2006) 32-35; V. P. Hamilton, "Marriage (OT and ANE)," ABD 4.559-69; R. S. Hess, Song of Songs (BCOT-WP; Grand Rapids: Baker, 2005); T. Longman, Song of Songs (NICOT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2001); P. Machinist, "Notes to Ecclesiastes," in The Jewish Study Bible, ed. A. Berlin and M. Z. Brettler (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2004) 1603-1622; R. E. Murphy, The Song of Songs (Hermeneia; Minneapolis: Fortress, 1990); S. Niditch, "Legends of Wise Heroes and Heroines," in The Hebrew Bible and Its Modern Interpreters, ed. D. A. Knight and G. M. Tucker (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1985) 445-63; M. H. Pope, Song of Songs (AB 7C; Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1977); P. Trible, "Depatriarchalizing in Biblical Interpretation," JAAR 41 (1973) 30-48; H.-J. Zobel, "דָּוִד," TDOT 5.444-48.

G. C. Heider

MEANINGLESSNESS. See ECCLESIASTES 1: BOOK OF.

MEGILLOT AND FESTIVALS

The word Megillot, which simply means "scrolls" in Hebrew, is used in a more specific sense to refer to the collection of the five smallest books of the "Writings" (Ketubim) of the OT. The concept of the Megillot as a group developed over a long period and was closely tied to the emerging usage of these five books during the festivals of the Jewish liturgical year. The Megillot is comprised of the *Song of Songs, *Ruth, *Lamentations, *Ecclesiastes and *Esther. The Jewish festivals in which they are read in their entirety are, respectively, Passover, Pentecost, the Ninth of Av, Tabernacles and *Purim.

1. The Megillot
2. The Festival of Passover
3. The Festival of Pentecost (or Weeks)
4. The Fast of the Ninth of Av
5. The Festival of Tabernacles (or Booths)
6. The Festival of Purim
7. Conclusion

1. The Megillot.

1.1. The Emergence of the Megillot. The concept of the Megillot as a unique group within the Writings section of the OT is not attested in either the Second Temple period or the Talmudic period. In fact, during the talmudic era the term megillah was applied only to the book of Esther, as evidenced by the tractate of that name. The talmudic listing of the books of the *canon does not have the five books of the Megillot together but rather follows the chronological order of their presumed authors (b. B. Bat. 14b). The earliest textual witness that groups the Megillot together is the Leningrad manuscript (upon which the BHS is based), which dates from the early eleventh century. The order found there is Ruth, Song of Songs, Ecclesiastes, Lamentations, Esther. There are manuscripts from the thirteenth century that still reflect both arrangements, and by the fifteenth century there are Bibles that include the Megillot in the order of the Ashkenazic liturgy: Song of Songs, Ruth, Lamentations, Ecclesiastes, Esther.

Although there is some evidence that these five books were viewed as somehow distinct as early as the Second Temple and Tannaitic periods (cf. b. Ber. 57b; see Tov, 205), the textual witnesses of the OT demonstrate that the concept of “the Megillot” did not coalesce enough to make an impact on canonical arrangements until the medieval period. It is largely unclear as to the degree to which the grouping of these five books was understood as a well-defined unit in the intervening centuries.

As a further clue toward this end, one might look to the compilation of the Midrash Rabbah, which is a body of work containing rabbinic exegeses and midrashim on the five books of the Pentateuch and the five books of the Megillot. Although the midrashic literature is notoriously difficult to date, Lamentations Rabbah and Esther Rabbah (I) likely date from the fifth century, while Song of Songs Rabbah and Ruth Rabbah probably date from the sixth century. Ecclesiastes Rabbah is often dated from sometime between the mid-seventh century and the end of the eighth century. Because all of them contain earlier material, it is evident that even before these dates there was a large amount of exegetical work being done on these books. Whether they represent a response to an already existing liturgical need or merely reflect a parallel process to that of associating the books of the Megillot with the festivals is uncertain. All that can be deduced from the evidence of the Midrash Rabbah is that prior to the first clear evidence of their public liturgical use these five books were especially prominent in the study of the Bible in Jewish communities. The most likely explanation for the emergence of the concept of the Megillot is that the five books were viewed as distinctly special and were a particular focus of exegesis even before the talmudic period. This situation, along with the results of rabbinic exegesis (see below), contributed to their incorporation into the Jewish liturgy. This in turn contributed significantly to the canonical grouping of the books as “the Megillot,” culminating in the Ashkenazic arrangement of the books according to the order of their liturgical use.

1.2. Liturgical Contours and Connections Among the Books of the Megillot. As a unified collection, the books of the Megillot have several interconnections in the sphere of their liturgical use. The specific cantillations for each of the five books varies among Jewish communities, with respect both to melodies and to whether the text is read by one person or by the congregation. As a general rule, the cantillations are derivative from those for other parts of the Bible, especially from those used in the Pentateuch. Depending on the Jewish community, there is often one melody for multiple books of the Megillot, especially among Song of Songs, Ruth and Ecclesiastes (the three pilgrimage festivals). Though the cantillation of Esther is often unique, in some communities it shares motifs with Song of Songs or Ruth. Furthermore, due to the nature of the material, the cantillation of Lamentations is unique not only among the Megillot but also in Jewish liturgy in general.

The festivals generally share a common liturgical pattern. For example, at the end of every festival (and Sabbath) service the priestly benediction from Numbers 6:22-26 is recited. Among Sephardic groups both the biblical book and its *Targum are read during each of the festival services.

1.3. The Megillot and Christian Liturgy. The reading of each book of the Megillot in its entirety on certain festival days in Judaism has no corresponding phenomenon in Christianity. Other than various selections from these biblical books that appear in the normal lectionary cycles, only a few thematic connections occur between the books and Christian liturgy. For instance, in the Roman Catholic, Lutheran and Methodist (but not the Anglican) lectionaries, Lamentations 3:1-24 is read the day before Easter on Holy Saturday, which is the most significant fast day in the Christian liturgical calendar (cf. Jn 2:19-21). It is also notable that in the medieval Western church selections from Song of Songs figured prominently in the celebration of various Marian feasts (e.g., the Feast of the Annunciation and the Purification of the Blessed Virgin Mary).

2. The Festival of Passover.

2.1. The Festival. The festival of Passover is one of the three pilgrimage feasts and is celebrated from the fifteenth through the twenty-first of Nisan (March-April). According to Exodus 12, Passover was instituted when God instructed the Hebrews to smear the blood of a slaughtered lamb on their doorframes in order to be exempt from the tenth plague, the death of the Egyptian firstborn. Subsequently, the celebration of Passover commemorated this event and the exodus of the Hebrews from their bondage in Egypt. Its most notable characteristic was the slaughter and consumption of the paschal lamb, and it is also closely associated with the festival of Unleavened Bread (Ex 13). Evidently, it was rarely celebrated during the biblical period, two exceptions being the lavish celebrations of Hezekiah and Josiah (2 Kings 23:21-22; 2 Chron 30:13-27; 35:1-19). However, upon the Jews' return from exile, it was kept much more regularly and with added regulations (Segal, 231-69). Its observance in the Second Temple period is attested in Palestine (Ezra 6:19-22; Jub. 49) as well as at Qumran (11QT^a XVII) and Elephantine. After the destruction of the temple in AD 70 the ritual slaughter of the Passover lamb was no longer kept among those within rabbinic Judaism (the practice remained among the Samaritans), and its celebration became increasingly characterized by the Seder meal and the Passover haggadah (cf. b. Pesah. 116a).

2.2. The Association of Song of Songs with Passover. It is quite likely that the tradition of reading Song of Songs as an allegory of God's history with Israel was already common during the Second Temple period. These allegorical interpretations that were set forth by rabbinic scholars became important for laying the groundwork for the association of Song of Songs with Passover.

The exegetical traditions that connect Song of Songs with the events surrounding the exodus from Egypt are first attested in the third century AD. Primary among these traditions was the interpretation of Song of Songs 1:9, "To a mare of the chariots of Pharaoh I compare you, my beloved," as referring to the crossing of the Red Sea (Ex 14). Once Song of Songs was understood as referring allegorically to the narrative of Israel's salvation history, other connections with the Passover and the exodus emerged. For example, Song of Songs 2:9, which refers to looking through windows and lattices, often was placed in the context of the Destroyer passing through on the night of the tenth plague (e.g., Targum of Song 2:9). Other themes probably reinforced the association of Song of Songs with the season of Passover. Both are set in the springtime, and the prophets' characterization of Israel as God's bride provided a strong parallel as well (e.g., Isa 62:5; Jer 2:2). Because the liturgical use of Song of Songs depends upon these exegetical developments, it could not have been used during Passover prior to the third century AD and probably was not used consistently until the sixth century AD (Alexander, 53-56).

2.3. The Liturgical Use of Song of Songs During Passover. Song of Songs is read on the intermediate Sabbath of Passover. If the first and eighth days of the festival fall on a Sabbath, then Song of Songs is read on the first day in Israel and on the eighth day elsewhere. Some Jewish communities have divided the reading of the book over the last two days of the festival. It is also customary among Sephardic Jews to read it on the eve of each Sabbath between Passover and Pentecost, a practice that arose in the sixteenth century under the influence of strands of Jewish mysticism.

Song of Songs is read before the Torah scroll is removed from the ark for the assigned Torah reading. On an intermediate Sabbath the Torah reading is taken from Exodus 33:12-34:26 and Numbers 28:19-25, and the haftarah text is Ezekiel 37:1-14. On the first day of the festival the Torah readings consist of Exodus 12:21-51 and Numbers 28:16-25, and the haftarah is Joshua 5:2-6:1; 6:27. If Song of Songs is being read on the final day of the festival, then it precedes the Torah reading of Deuteronomy 14:22-16:17 and Numbers 28:19-25 and the haftarah reading of Isaiah 10:32-12:6.

3. The Festival of Pentecost (or Weeks).

3.1. The Festival. Pentecost was also one of the three pilgrimage feasts and was celebrated on the sixth of Sivan and also on the seventh for those in the Diaspora (May-June), fifty days after Passover (hence the name, Pentecost). Because of their alternate calendar, those at Qumran celebrated the festival on the fifteenth of Sivan. The festival marks the end of the barley harvest and the beginning of the harvest of wheat and fruit (cf. Ex 23:14-19; Lev 23:9-22; Deut 16:9-12). Since this was a major festival, no work was permitted during the festival (Num 28:26).

3.2. The Association of Ruth with Pentecost. During the Second Temple period the celebration of Pentecost was still centered on its agricultural roots and provided an opportunity for Israel to rejoice over God's provisions. The central feature for the pilgrims was the presentation of two offerings to the temple: an offering of firstfruits and an offering of two leavened loaves.

However, unlike Tabernacles and Passover, the rituals surrounding Pentecost were exclusively tied to the temple. Therefore, after the fall of the temple in AD 70 and the corresponding dislocation of the Jews from the land of Israel, the festival could not continue to be celebrated as before. The result was that the festival underwent a transformation that shifted the focus of Pentecost from its agricultural character to a commemoration of a redemptive historical event in the life of Israel. It was not long before this link emerged. If Passover commemorated the exodus from Egypt and Pentecost was held fifty days after Passover, then on the basis of Exodus 19:1 rabbinic interpreters sought to demonstrate that Pentecost coincided with the giving of the Torah on Sinai. The first correlation of these two events is found in a statement by Rabbi Meir (mid-second century AD) recorded in Exodus Rabbah 31. This connection between Pentecost and the reception of the Torah is important because it laid some of the groundwork for the association of the festival with the book of Ruth.

Ultimately, the historical circumstances that resulted in the reading of Ruth on Pentecost are only partially clear. It must have begun after the mid-second century AD, when the connection between the reception of the Torah and Pentecost first appeared, but before the fourth century AD, when explanations for the reading of Ruth during the festival are found (Bloch 1980, 249). It is not until much later, in the eighth century, that there is an explicit reference to the public, liturgical reading of Ruth as part of the festival (Sop. 14:3 [see Beattie, 9]). A number of explanations have been offered for this practice, but it is difficult to discern the respective weights that should be assigned to each one. Some rabbis explained the connection by pointing out a narrative similarity between Ruth and the exodus generation. Both had undergone ordeals of suffering before expressing loyalty to God and his *law (cf. Ex 19:7-8; Ruth 1:16-17). This parallel was subsequently reinforced by other interpreters. Ruth's loyalty to *Naomi was used homiletically to illustrate the loyalty that Israel should have for the Torah, and the tendency among some rabbinic interpreters to characterize the exodus generation as "converts" offered a parallel to Ruth's Moabite background.

Some rabbis also pointed to the fact that both Pentecost and the book of Ruth are set at harvest time (Ruth 1:22), although, to be precise, Ruth is set at the beginning of the barley harvest, which is earlier than the wheat harvest of Pentecost. A final connection between Ruth and Pentecost is the talmudic tradition that *David, a descendent of Ruth, had been born and had died on Pentecost (cf. Ruth Rab. 3:2; y. Beṣah 2:4, 61b). However, it is important to remember that these thematic connections between Ruth and the festival do not necessarily imply any historical causality. It is always possible that a particular explanation was conceived after the fact to explain an already existing relationship.

3.3. The Liturgical Use of Ruth During Pentecost. The book of Ruth is read during the morning service of Pentecost. For those who celebrate the festival on both the sixth and seventh of Sivan, it is read on the morning of the second day. A notable exception to this is the practice among Sephardic Jews of reading half of Ruth on the first day and the other half on the second day. Typically, Ruth is read prior to the morning Torah reading, which consists of the account of the revelation at Sinai in Exodus 19–20 and the sacrificial laws for the festival in Numbers 28:26–31. The haftarah reading is taken from Ezekiel 1:1–28; 3:12. None of the benedictions that appear among other Megillot festival readings are recited before or after the reading of Ruth other than the priestly benediction from Numbers 6:22–26. Due to the connections between Pentecost and David, many Jewish communities also read selections from *Psalms during the festival service.

4. The Fast of the Ninth of Av.

4.1. The Fast. The Ninth of Av has as its primary reference point the remembrance of the destruction of the first temple in Jerusalem by Nebuchadnezzar in 586 BC. According to the biblical records, Nebuzaradan entered Jerusalem and burned the temple on or after either the seventh of Av (2 Kings 25:8–9) or the tenth of Av (Jer 52:12–13). Various explanations have been offered to harmonize the two accounts (e.g., b. Ta'an. 29a), but eventually rabbinic scholars concluded that the date given in Jeremiah was the most precise for the burning of the temple. However, the fast was observed on the ninth of Av, marking the beginning of the destruction of the temple, rather than on the tenth, when the majority of the destruction was done.

The only biblical mention of the fast of the Ninth of Av is a possible allusion in Zechariah 7:5, which states that the fast "of the fifth month [Av]” had been in observance for “these seventy years.” This would imply that the fast was instituted very soon after the fall of the temple, possibly even on the first anniversary (the news had reached Babylon within six months [see Ezek 33:21]). Scholars are divided over whether the Ninth of Av was observed after the construction of the second temple. Certain mishnaic passages seem to imply that it was being observed (Ydit, 937), but most scholars doubt that it continued after the exile (Bloch 1978, 248).

Nevertheless, it certainly was being observed soon after the fall of the second temple, which Josephus says also happened on the tenth of Av (J.W. 6.249-250). The fact that the destruction of the two temples culminated on the same day, accompanied by the fact that the last stronghold of the Bar Kokhba revolt, Bethar, fell on the ninth of Av in AD 135, led to the conclusion that the ninth of Av functioned as the day of disaster par excellence. According to the rabbinic literature, two other disasters happened on this date. Both the decree that the exodus generation would be prohibited from entering the promised land and the construction of a pagan temple on the temple mount of Jerusalem in AD 136 were said to have occurred on the ninth of Av (b. Ta’an. 26b, 29a). For many Jews, it is more than mere coincidence that the expulsion of Jewish communities from England (1290) and Spain (1492), as well as the beginning of World War I (1914) and the deportation of Jews in Warsaw to Treblinka (1942), all fell on the Ninth of Av.

4.2. The Association of Lamentations with the Ninth of Av. Because both are reflections on the fall of the temple, the association of Lamentations with the fast of the Ninth of Av is easily understandable (as with Esther and Purim). Yet, the liturgical use of Lamentations took significantly longer to develop than did Esther (see 6.2 below). Whereas Lamentations was being read privately in talmudic times (b. Ta’an. 30a), the first mention of its public liturgical use dates from the post-talmudic era, in Soperim 14:3 (eighth century).

4.3. The Liturgical Use of Lamentations During the Ninth of Av. The book of Lamentations is usually read during both the evening and morning services of the Ninth of Av, though some congregations read it at only one of the services (Sop. 18:4). It is the only book of the Megillot that is recited without a blessing either before or after the reading. Several changes in the synagogue service reflect the somber mood of the day, including the dimming of the lights and sitting on low benches or on the floor (see Sop. 18:4-8). Though there are Torah readings during both the morning and the evening services, the study of the Torah, because it is considered a source of joy, is forbidden only on the Ninth of Av. The texts that are permitted to be read during the fast are Lamentations (and Lamentations Rabbah), *Job, Leviticus 26, the more somber chapters of Jeremiah, and the talmudic passages concerning the destruction of Jerusalem.

Since the time of Rashi (AD 1040-1105), and probably earlier, there has been a custom in some communities not to end with the final verse of Lamentations. Instead, in order to end the liturgical reading on a hopeful note, the congregation follows the reading of Lamentations 5:22 with a recitation of Lamentations 5:21 again: “Bring us back to you, O LORD, that we may be restored. Renew our days as of old.” This verse is then echoed by the reader of the scroll. This liturgical practice, along with the rabbinic tradition that the Messiah would be born on the ninth of Av (Lam. Rab. 1:51; y. Ber. 2:3), reflect the theological principle that it is often at the nadir of human experience, in the midst of suffering and mourning, that God chooses to begin his work of redemption.

5. The Festival of Tabernacles (or Booths).

5.1. The Festival. The festival of Tabernacles is the third of the three pilgrimage festivals and begins on the fifteenth of Tishri (September-October) and lasts for eight days, though the final day is often treated as a separate festival called Shemini Azeret. Coming at the end of the autumn harvest and commemorating the wilderness journey following the exodus, Tabernacles was equally an agricultural and redemptive-historical festival. In the Bible it is also called “the feast of ingathering” (e.g., Ex 23:16), “the feast of the LORD” (e.g., Lev 23:39) and, as an indication of its importance, even simply “the feast,” during which *Solomon consecrated the temple (1 Kings 8:2). Before the destruction of the second temple in AD 70 the main feature of the festival was the large number of sacrifices that were offered (Num 29). However, after the destruction of the temple the central feature became the practice of dwelling in temporary, but carefully constructed, booths throughout the week in order to remember the experience of the Hebrews of the exodus generation while they were in the desert (Lev 23:42-43 [see Rubenstein, 320]). This practice stresses both the providential care of God and the ultimate impermanence of human life. In biblical times it also functioned as the occasion for the public reading of the Torah every seven years (Deut 31:10-13).

5.2. The Association of Ecclesiastes with the Festival of Tabernacles. Within the relationship between the Megillot and the five festivals, the connection between Ecclesiastes and the festival of Tabernacles is the least obvious and the last to be attested. There are only a few connections between them that are offered to explain the association of the two.

First, the recurring theme of “Eat, drink, and be merry” (e.g., Eccles 2:24-25; 3:13; 5:18; 8:15; 9:7) is thought to correspond to the joyful mood and agricultural context of the festival (cf. Eccles 3:2). Paradoxically, another basis for association that is often cited is the somber, pessimistic outlook of much of Ecclesiastes. This outlook is seen as a complement to the onset of the rainy winter season that begins around the time of the festival of Tabernacles (Stemberger, 274). The pessimism toward earthly pleasures that is portrayed in Ecclesiastes is also thought to evoke a sobriety that directs one’s attention to the ultimate questions in life, which is particularly appropriate because the celebration of Tabernacles has a decidedly future, eschatological orientation (Zech 14:16). Furthermore, the statement concerning the payment of vows (Eccles 5:4-5) is considered poignant because the yearly cycle of reading through the Torah ends on Simhat Torah, which closes the festival of Tabernacles. Finally, rabbinic interpreters saw an allusion to the festival in Ecclesiastes 11:2, which reads, “Give a portion to seven and even to eight, for you do not know what calamity may occur on earth.” The festival of Tabernacles lasts for eight days, but since post-talmudic times the final day has been treated as an independent festival called Shemini Azeret, based on Numbers 29:35 (in Israel this day corresponds to Simhat Torah; elsewhere it is the day before Simhat Torah). With the institution of Shemini Azeret, the festival of Tabernacles took on a 7/8 structure, which was understood to recall Ecclesiastes 11:2.

Scholars have noted that these intersections between Ecclesiastes and the festival have the character of ad hoc explanations and lack the specificity that is present among other cases, such as Esther with Purim and Lamentations with Ninth of Av. This all contributes to the thesis that the association of the two was secondary and took place under the influence of the larger movement of associating the Megillot and the festivals. If this is the case, then only a broad window for the introduction of the practice of reading Ecclesiastes during the festival can be postulated. The fact that its mention in Soperim 14:3 is almost certainly not original and appears to be a later insertion implies that the formal association was made after the eighth century (Stemberger, 263). The terminus ad quem for the introduction of Ecclesiastes into the liturgy for the festival of Tabernacles is the eleventh century, when it appears in the services of Ashkenazic Jews (Knobel, 4). Determining at what point between the eighth and the eleventh centuries Ecclesiastes came into public use during the festival is unclear because its liturgical emergence among Ashkenazic communities was likely gradual.

5.3. The Liturgical Use of Ecclesiastes During the Festival of Tabernacles. The reading of Ecclesiastes during the festival of Tabernacles is not a uniform practice throughout Judaism and is most closely associated with Ashkenazic Jews. Notably, in Sephardic Judaism Ecclesiastes plays no role in the celebration of Tabernacles. For those communities that do incorporate it into the liturgy, the book of Ecclesiastes, like Song of Songs on Passover, is read only on the intermediate Sabbath. If the first and eighth days fall on the Sabbath, then it is read on the eighth day, Shemini Azeret.

Ecclesiastes is read only during the morning service on its appropriate day, and it precedes the Torah reading. It is interesting in this regard that one of the earliest references to the liturgical reading of Ecclesiastes, Mahzor Vitry (thirteenth century), states that the entire congregation reads it while seated, in distinction from having the book read to them. There are four sets of readings for the festival. On the first day the Torah reading is Leviticus 22:26–23:44 and Numbers 29:12-16, and the haftarah reading is Zechariah 14:1-21. For the second day the reading from the Torah is the same as the first day, but the haftarah reading is 1 Kings 8:2-21. The intermediate Sabbath has Exodus 33:12–34:26 and a portion of Numbers 29 for the Torah reading and Ezekiel 38:18—39:16 is the haftarah. The Torah reading for the final day is Deuteronomy 14:22—16:17 and Numbers 29:35—30:1, which is accompanied by the haftarah reading from 1 Kings 8:54-66.

6. The Festival of Purim.

6.1. The Festival. In conformity with Esther 9:21-22, Purim originally was celebrated on the fourteenth and fifteenth of Adar (February-March) in order to commemorate the rest that the Jews received from their enemies in the wake of the victory of Esther and *Mordecai over Haman. After the fall of the second temple, Purim began to be celebrated only on the fourteenth of Adar. It is marked by intensely jubilant celebration and is often viewed as the mirror opposite of the Ninth of Av.

6.2. The Association of Esther with the Festival of Purim. Among the Megillot, the relationship of Purim to Esther is the most obvious and natural, and by the first century AD the Esther scroll was being read during the festival. By the second century AD a confluence of events, including the fall of the second temple (AD 70), the failure of the Bar Kokhba revolt (AD 135), and the confirmation of Esther's canonical status, resulted in the more systematic observance of Purim. From the second century AD to the present day the reading of the Esther scroll has functioned as the central feature of the celebration of Purim.

6.3. The Liturgical Use of Esther During the Festival of Purim. The central feature of the evening and morning services of Purim is the reading of the Esther scroll. The Torah reading that is read alongside Esther during the morning service is Exodus 17:8-16, which describes the war of Moses and Joshua with Amalek. At the end of the passage is the promise by God that he "will utterly blot out the memory of Amalek from under heaven (Ex 17:14). This is particularly poignant on Purim because Haman was a descendent of Amalek (cf. Esther 3:1; 1 Sam 15:8-9).

The reading of the Esther scroll is introduced with a series of three blessings, to which the congregation responds with "Amen." The vocalization of the scroll is done with a cantillation whose tempo and style reflect the nature of the events being narrated, whether joyous or gloomy. Since the third century it has been the practice that when the reader reaches the list of the ten sons of Haman (Esther 9:7-10), the names (and the word "ten") are uttered quickly in one breath to reflect the fact that they were executed together (b. Meg. 16b). A similar custom, based on a midrashic interpretation of Proverbs 10:7 (Gen. Rab. 49), involves the adults in the congregation whispering "The memory of the righteous shall be for a blessing" after Mordecai's name and "The name of the wicked shall rot" after Haman's name. This is mirrored by the practice of children using rattles or stones to drown out the mention of Haman's name. Conversely, there is a custom, dating from at least the tenth century, that when the reader reaches the "four verses of redemption" (Esther 2:5; 8:15-16; 10:3), he raises his voice and is accompanied by the chorus of the congregation.

At the conclusion of the reading of the Esther scroll another blessing is pronounced: "Blessed are you, O Lord our God, the King of the Universe, who pleads our cause, who renders judgment on our behalf, who avenges us, who fulfills retribution on the enemies of our life, and exacts recompense for us from our foes. Blessed are you, O Lord, who exacts recompense for his people Israel from all their foes, the God who saves" (b. Meg. 21b).

7. Conclusion.

The most likely scenario for the emerging use of the Megillot may now be sketched. The evidence of Ruth, Lamentations and Esther suggests that the private reading of each book on the corresponding festival preceded the formal incorporation of the books of the Megillot into the public festival liturgy, even by centuries. Already in the Second Temple period Esther, or parts of it, were read during the festival of Purim. Though previously read privately, by the close of the talmudic period (eighth century) the books of Ruth, Lamentations and Song of Songs had been incorporated into the liturgy of the synagogue. Following these developments, sometime between the eighth and the eleventh centuries, the book of Ecclesiastes was linked with the festival of Tabernacles. This final connection was likely made in order to match the final book of the Megillot with the only pilgrimage festival without a corresponding book. Yet, the associations of these books with their respective festivals did not occur in isolation but rather developed alongside one another. Once Esther began to be read on Purim, the basic paradigm of using books liturgically was set in motion. The evidence suggests that the unfolding process of incorporating the rest of the books of the Megillot into the other Jewish festival liturgies was long and gradual, spanning almost a millennium.

See also CANON; ECCLESIASTES 3: HISTORY OF INTERPRETATION; ESTHER 3: HISTORY OF INTERPRETATION; LAMENTATIONS 3: HISTORY OF INTERPRETATION; PURIM; RUTH 3: HISTORY OF INTERPRETATION; SONG OF SONGS 3: HISTORY OF INTERPRETATION.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. P. S. Alexander, The Targum of Canticles (ArBib 17A; Collegeville, MN: Liturgical Press, 2003); D. R. G. Beattie, The Targum of Ruth (ArBib 19; Collegeville, MN: Liturgical Press, 1994); L. Blau, "Megillot, The Five," JE 8.429-31; L. Blau and N. Schmidt, "Bible Canon," JE 3.140-54; A. Bloch, The Biblical and Historical Background of the Jewish Holy Days (New York: KTAV, 1978); idem, The Biblical and Historical Background of Jewish Customs and Ceremonies (New York: KTAV, 1980); A. Herzog, "Scrolls, The Five," EncJud 14.1057-59; L. Hoffman, The Canonization of the Synagogue Service (SJCA 4; Notre Dame, IN: University of Notre Dame Press, 1979); A. Z. Idelsohn, Jewish Liturgy and Its Development (New York: Schocken, 1967); L. Jacobs, "Shavuot," EncJud 14.1319-22; P. S. Knobel, The Targum of Qohelet (ArBib 15; Collegeville, MN: Liturgical Press, 1991); R. Posner, U. Kaploun and S. Cohen, eds., Jewish Liturgy: Prayer and Synagogue Service through the Ages (Jerusalem: Keter, 1975); J. L. Rubenstein, The History of Sukkot in the Second Temple Period (BJS 302; Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1995); N. Scherman and M. Zlotowitz, חמ"ש מגילות / The Book of Megillos (New York: Mesorah Publications, 1986); J. B. Segal, The Hebrew Passover from the Earliest Times to A.D. 70 (LOS 12; London: Oxford University Press, 1963); G. Stem-berger, "Die Megillot als Festlesungen der jüdischen Liturgie," in Das Fest: Jenseits des Alltags, ed. M. Ebner et al. (JBT 18; Neukirchen-Vluyn: Neukirchener Verlag, 2003) 261-76; M. Strassfeld, The Jewish Holidays: A Guide and Commentary (New York: Harper & Row, 1985); E. Tov, Textual Criticism of the Hebrew Bible (2nd ed.; Minneapolis: Fortress, 1992); M. Ydit, "Av, The Ninth of," EncJud 3.936-40.

B. C. Gregory

MEMORY. See REMEMBRANCE.

MERISM

Merism is a literary device that uses an abbreviated list to suggest the whole. The most common type of merism cites the poles of a list to suggest everything in between, though the term merism is also used to refer to more extensive, but not exhaustive, lists (see 3 below). Since a merism is a part for a whole, it is an example of synecdoche, which itself is subspecies of metonymy (a trope of association in which one term stands for another, typically broader, term) rather than metaphor (a trope of comparison). The English word merism derives through Latin merismus from Greek merismos ("dividing, partition") and Greek meros ("part").

1. The Scope of Merism
2. The Function of Merism
3. Examples of Merism
4. Conclusion

1. The Scope of Merism.

In the OT merism occurs most frequently in poetry, but it is also found in prose. Indeed, scholars often see the first appearance of merism to be in Genesis 1:1, "In the beginning, God created the heavens and the earth," where "heavens" and "earth" are taken as two poles of a list that suggest the whole. In other words, it is another way of saying that God created everything. It must be admitted, however, that in this case "heaven" and "earth" might simply identify the whole; that is, there are no other parts, similar to saying "mother" and "father" to refer to parents. Another example from a prose context is seen in 1 Kings 4:25: "During Solomon's lifetime Judah and Israel, from Dan to Beersheba, lived in safety, each man under his own vine and fig tree." Dan, the northernmost significant settlement in the land, and Beersheba, the southernmost, represent all the cities and land between them.

As we noted, however, merism occurs more frequently in poetry. Indeed, there is only one literary feature that is distinctive to poetry in Hebrew, *terseness (see 2). The most pervasive features (*parallelism and *imagery) also occur in prose (the existence of *meter is debatable at best). Merism is an example of a secondary poetical device—that is, one, like the *acrostic, that occurs only sporadically in Hebrew poetry. Examples, however, may be seen in the psalms and all the wisdom books (not to mention the poetical parts of the prophets).

2. The Function of Merism.

In the preceding section we noted that most of the conventions of Hebrew poetry, including merism, are also found in prose. If one can speak of a distinctive difference between poetry and prose, it would have to do with length. Poetry is terse, saying a lot using few words. Poetry is compact language. Hebrew poetry is composed of typically short cola that form parallel lines (and at least occasionally *stanzas/strophes), while prose is made up of longer sentences grouped into paragraphs.

The brevity of the poetic line is achieved in a number of ways. Metaphor, simile, *ellipsis and the suppression of conjunctions all contribute to the shortness of the line. Merism, as a device that uses abbreviated lists to suggest the whole, does this as well. Thus, the major function of merism is to enhance the terseness of the line, thereby producing a dramatic effect as well as necessitating a more active involvement of the interpreter/reader.

Song of Songs 7:13 provides an example: "The mandrakes give forth their scent, and on our entrance is every precious gift; the new as well as the old I have treasured for you, my love." This verse concludes one of the woman's passionate speeches to her lover (Song 7:11-13 [see Longman, 199-202]). The second poetic line of this verse is quite vague. She has saved up or treasured "the new" and "the old" for her lover. This begs the question "New or old what?" Readers must engage their imagination to consider the matter. The immediately preceding context might suggest new and old sweet-smelling plants, but why old plants? It is likely that here "new" and "old" are used as a merism defined by "polar word-pairs" (Watson, 321). Thus, "new" and "old" might refer to all things. She has stored up or treasured everything near and dear to her for her lover. So from this example we see how the reader's involvement is evoked by the merism. In addition, merism imparts more interest to the line. To say "new" and "old" is much more vivid, concrete and interesting than simply saying "everything."

Some merisms, particularly those of the "polar word-pair" type, appear together with some frequency. The pair "young" and "old" is an example. Lamentations 2:21a bemoans the destruction of Jerusalem with this statement: "Young and old lie together in the dust of the street." We may confidently recognize "young" and "old" as a polar word-pair merism. The poet certainly did not believe that the middle-aged were immune to the disaster. This text is not the only place where this word pair is used as a merism. Restricting our scope to the books covered in this dictionary, we can cite Job 29:8; Psalm 148:12. If we look beyond these books, we will find a number of other examples (e.g., Is 20:4; Ezek 9:6).

These examples supplement the evidence provided by other frequently occurring pairs of words in poetry to bolster a theory that ancient Hebrew poetry was originally *oral poetry, and, on the basis of analogies with ancient Greek (Homer) and modern Yugoslavian poetry, that ancient Hebrew poets constructed their work using a set metrical pattern and certain stereotyped word pairs (Watters; Gevirtz). Due to recent persuasive arguments against the presence of meter in Hebrew poetry, among other factors, this theory has declined, though not totally disappeared, in recent years.

3. Examples of Merism.

An exhaustive list of examples of merism is impossible here. The following examples are just a sampling from the poetical books covered in this dictionary (*Job, *Psalms, *Proverbs, *Ecclesiastes, *Song of Songs, *Lamentations). In the process of examining these examples, we will also discern some variations between different types of merism.

We have already referenced the use of the "young" and "old" merism in Job 29:8. In a prose context, Job 2:7 describes how the Accuser afflicted Job "from the soles of his feet to the top of his head." The implication, of course, is that no part of his body escaped the disease. In the context of Job's lament, as he expresses his desire to be among the dead, he says that "the small and the great" are there (Job 3:19). Understood rightly as merism, this means that everyone, regardless of social status, is there.

The psalms provide a number of examples of merism, though only a few will be cited here. Psalm 139:2-3 expresses awareness of God's all-encompassing knowledge with two meristic statements:

You know when I sit and when I rise;
you discern my thoughts from afar.
You discern my going out and my lying down;
you are familiar with all my ways.

Through the use of the polar opposites of sitting and rising as well as going out and lying down, the psalmist says that God is fully aware of his inner life as well as his actions.

W. Watson (322) categorizes Psalm 148:7-12 as a list merism:

Praise the LORD, from the earth, you great sea creatures and all ocean depths, lightning and hail, snow and clouds, stormy winds that do his bidding,
you mountains and all hills, fruit trees and all cedars, wild animals and all cattle, small creatures and flying birds, kings of the earth and all nations,
you princes and all rulers on earth,
young men and women,
old men and children.

Whereas a polar word-pair merism simply names two items that are on opposite ends of a spectrum, intending to refer to everything in between, a list merism is more extensive, though not exhaustive. In this example, the first colon calls on “the earth” to praise the Lord. The following verses list a number of things from the earth that are to praise the Lord. It is not an exhaustive list; rather, it is a partial list suggestive of a full list.

In Psalm 74:12-17 God’s creative sovereignty is established by a series of merisms (G. Wilson [in a personal communication]) including day and night (all time), sun and moon (all the celestial bodies), summer and winter (all the seasons).

Proverbs 6:1, warning the wise person to avoid guaranteeing loans to everyone, speaks of the opposites “neighbor” and “stranger.” Proverbs 14:10 admits that no one can fully understand the emotions of another. The mention of “bitterness” and “joy” indicates the poles of the emotional spectrum and is a meristic way of referring to all the emotions.

One of the most memorable uses of merism occurs in the famous poem of Ecclesiastes 3:1-8. The poem lists fourteen areas of activity by citing their polar opposites. For instance, there is a time to be born and a time to die, citing, of course, the beginning and the end of one’s earthly existence. By citing the two extremes of life, it assumes that life as a whole has its appointed time.

A final example comes from the Song of Songs 4:16. Here the woman responds to the man’s loving admiration of her “garden,” which he described as locked, by opening it up for him with these words:

Wake up, north wind,
And come, south wind!
Blow on my garden,
and let its spices flow forth.
Let my lover come into his garden and eat its choice fruit.

Here the words north and south stand here for all the winds. The woman thus is saying that she opens herself up completely to the man.

4. Conclusion.

Merism is a device that contributes to the brevity of the poetic line. Rather than citing all the parts, it evokes the thought of a whole by citing just a few (most typically two and typically the opposite poles) of a list.

See also CHIASM; INCLUSIO; PARALLELISM; POETICS; TERMINOLOGY OF; TERSENESS.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. H. A. Brongers, “Merismus, Synekdoche und Hendiadys in der bibel-hebräischen Sprache,” OTS 14 (1965) 100-114; S. Gevirtz, Patterns in the Early Poetry of Israel (SAOC 32; Chicago; University of Chicago Press, 1963); A. M. Honeyman, “Merismus in Biblical Hebrew,” JBL 71 (1952) 11-18; J. Krašovec, Der Merismus im Biblisch-Hebräischen und Nordwest-semitischen (BibOr 33; Rome: Biblical Institute Press, 1977); T. Longman III, Song of Songs (NICOT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2001); M. O’Connor, Hebrew Verse Structure (Winona Lake, IN: Eisenbrauns, 1980); W. G. E. Watson, Classical Hebrew Poetry: A Guide to Its Techniques (2nd ed.; London: T & T Clark, 2005); W. Watters, Formula Criticism and the Poetry of the Old Testament (BZAW 138; Berlin: de Gruyter, 1976).

T. Longman III

MESSIAH

The English word messiah derives from Hebrew māšīaḥ through the Greek Messias (John 1:41; 4:25). The Hebrew word is a noun, “anointed one,” formed from the verb māšaḥ (“anoint”). In the Torah anointing (and the root māšaḥ) is mostly connected to consecration rituals, and when it comes to people, it is the priests who are anointed for special service to God (Ex 28:41; 29:7; 30:30; 40:15). Exodus 25:6 describes the anointing oil kept on hand at the tabernacle presumably for use in consecration rituals. Outside of the Torah anointing refers to the ritual used to consecrate a king (2 Chron 6:42; 23:11; Ps 2:2; 18:50; 20:6; 28:8; 45:7; 84:9; 89:20, 38; 132:10, 17). Nearly all these references are associated with the king's role as protector and vanquisher of Israel's enemies.

This article is not concerned simply with the concept of anointed king or anointed priest in the biblical books under study here; rather, we are interested to explore the question of whether there is an eschatological messianic expectation in these books. To what extent do these books manifest an expectation of a future messiah?

Christian interest in this question is fueled by the eschatological use in the NT of certain texts from the corpus of OT poetical books. To be clear, we are not talking simply of an anticipation of the coming of Christ in a general sense; we have a more narrow focus. Some studies of the messianic idea are framed too broadly in that they incorporate any kind of christological expectation (Kaiser; van Groningen). We are concerned only with the expectation of a future royal or priestly deliverer because that is more in keeping with the OT concept.

1. Hermeneutical Considerations
2. The Messiah in the Book of Psalms
3. The Messiah in Wisdom Literature?
4. The Messiah in Song of Songs
5. The Messiah in the Books of Ruth and Esther

1. Hermeneutical Considerations.

Significant differences exist among scholars when it comes to the question of messianic expectation in the OT. Part of the problem has to do with the question of the location of meaning in the biblical text. Thus, it is important for the present study to acknowledge its viewpoint as to the meaning of a biblical text. When messianic import is attributed to a text, what does that mean?

This question is relevant because the NT discovers messianic significance in texts that very clearly were not so understood during the OT period. Not only is it likely that the original audience did not recognize the eschatological import of relevant texts, but also it is uncertain at best whether the authors of these texts would have been conscious of eschatological messianic meaning. However, such an idea would not have shaken the confidence of NT authors or have caused them to apply these texts in another way. After all, they understood that the human author's intention did not exhaust the meaning of the text. They believed that God was the ultimate author of Scripture (2 Tim 3:14-17; 1 Pet 1:10-11). And in the light of the work of Christ, they read the OT in a way that brought out its deeper significance. Such considerations are clearly important as we study the messianic significance of the Psalter.

2. The Messiah in the Book of Psalms.

The background to the use of "anointed" in reference to the king in the book of *Psalms may be found in the Former Prophets, particularly in the book of Samuel. Although the Torah anticipated kingship (Gen 49:8-12; Num 24:17), there were no kings of Israel during this time period. However, when Saul became the first king, he was known as God's anointed (1 Sam 10:1; 12:3, 5; 15:7 [overall he is called "anointed" some fifteen times]). Of even more significance for our topic, as we will see, is that the anointing of *David is mentioned a number of times, sixteen in all, and the ritual of his anointing is narrated in 1 Samuel 16. As we read on in the history, *Solomon, Jehu and other kings are also specifically connected with anointing. The historical practice of anointing kings, thus indicating God's choice and empowerment, provides the background to the anointed king of Psalms. In other words, the most immediate and primary reference to the anointed in Psalms refers to the historical kings of Israel and Judah.

2.1. Psalms of the Anointed King: Psalm 2. We begin with an examination of a selection of psalms that refer to the anointed king. Psalm 2:1-2, for instance, says,

Why do the nations rage,
and the peoples plot in vain?
The kings of the earth take their stand, and the rulers take counsel with each other, against Yahweh,
and his anointed.

Later we will see that this psalm receives extensive attention in the NT in reference to Jesus, but in its OT setting there is no obvious indication that the psalm looked far beyond its immediate historical setting. Notable, for instance, is its relationship to the Davidic covenant—for instance, in Psalm 2:7, which echoes 2 Samuel 7:14, describing the fatherlike relationship that God had with the king. Many scholars, perhaps rightly, identify this psalm as a coronation *hymn, though that is certainly not the only possible understanding of the contemporary use of this text.

The first stanza expresses bewilderment at the attempt of the nations to throw off the bondage of Yahweh and his anointed king. We are somewhat at a loss to understand exactly what kind of historical background generated such a thought. There were few time periods when Israel or Judah under the Davidides had vassals who would contemplate throwing off their shackles. Even those times, like that of David himself when Israel did exercise sovereignty over nearby states, do not exactly fit the rather grandiose claims implied by this first stanza. In its ancient setting, however, this may simply be the type of hyperbole generated by the beginning of a new reign.

The line that most closely associates this psalm with coronation is Psalm 2:6: “I have appointed my king on Zion, my holy mountain.” But the text does not clearly indicate that this is an act presently taking place. An alternative explanation of the psalm could be that of a pre-holy war hymn wherein God’s words become a note of assurance to the king before a battle. No matter what the precise setting, there is no doubt that Psalm 2 can be fully explained on the background of its OT context. It is not a predictive text per se.

What is true of Psalm 2 is true of the other psalms that mention the “anointed”; that is, they refer to the human monarch. Psalm 18:50, for instance, is a tricolon that puts “king,” “anointed” and “David and his descendants” in parallel:

He gives great victories to his king;
he shows covenant love to his anointed, to David and his descendants forever.

Psalm 20 speaks of God rescuing his anointed king, Psalm 28 of his being a safe fortress for his anointed, and so forth (see Ps 45:7; 84:9; 89:20; 132, 10, 17).

It is true that on occasion the language used to describe the anointed king surpasses that which can comfortably be applied to any of the human kings who ruled in Jerusalem during the OT time period. For instance, in Psalm 2 God grants the king “the whole earth” as his inheritance and the ability to smash the kings of the earth like clay pots. Even the most powerful kings of Israel did not actually possess such tremendous power, but even so, the language does not obviously point to the far-distant future but rather may be ascribed to the rhetoric of the court or an ideal picture. As we will observe, though, such language does lend itself to further development.

Indeed, the further development may have begun during the monarchical period. It is true that Psalm 2 does not have an authorship ascription. Interestingly, though, Acts 4:25-26 cites the psalm as Davidic. This may be part of the general tendency (observed in the LXX and the Peshitta) to associate all the psalms with David, but one would be hard-pressed to find a period other than David’s that would be better suited for the composition and first use of this poem.

David was the recipient of the promises of the covenant of kingship (2 Sam 7). Although his relationship with God and his reign were anything but undisturbed, one can imagine Psalm 2 being used during his time and certainly afterward during the coronation of Solomon. But if it was a coronation psalm or a pre-holy war song, it would be available for use in later reigns. Surveying the history of the monarchy from Solomon through Zedekiah makes one realize that the psalm, if used at all, would have rung hollow. After all, this time period was known for apostasy, syncretistic worship that was rampant among later Davidic rulers. Even syncretistic kings may have sung Psalm 2 at their coronation (after all, they must have been aware that their kingship was contingent on their descent from David, whose dynasty was established by their God Yahweh), but to the pious the song would have rung hollow.

Indeed, it was likely the dissonance between the content and tone of Psalm 2 and the reality of Judah’s kings and their political subordination to other great world powers that set their minds wondering whether the psalm had repercussions beyond that which may be read from a minimal reading of the poem. This dissonance would have reached its ultimate crisis point at the time Zedekiah was removed from the throne by Nebuchadnezzar and in his place a relatively weak Babylonian governor came to manage Judah.

When the monarchy disappeared, the faithful had to grapple with the significance of the Davidic covenant, in which God promised not to “take my steadfast love from him as I took it from Saul, whom I put away from before you. Your house and your kingdom shall be made sure forever before me; your throne shall be established forever” (2 Sam 7:15-16). And along with the question of the continuing significance of the Davidic covenant, the faithful would also wonder about the abiding relevance of psalms that speak of God’s anointed king, and further, psalms that speak of the king (without specific reference to the ritual of anointing).

Of course, one option was to give up on the promise, to dash the hope that Yahweh cared for them. Probably many took that route. But for those who were convinced that God would not lie or deceive, they would come to believe that the psalm did more than describe present realities. They would look to the future for a king who would fit the picture of the anointed as described in Psalm 2.

Of course, due to the paucity of textual material in antiquity, much of the foregoing description of the discovery of the deeper significance of *kingship psalms such as Psalm 2 is speculative. What is clear is that the authors of the NT read the psalms in the light of Jesus’ life and ministry and identified him as the anointed one. This may be well established by the frequent use of Psalm 2 in the NT in reference to Christ (e.g., Mk 1:11 par.; 9:7 par.; Acts 4:23-31; 13:33; Rom 1:4; Heb 1:5; 5:5; 2 Pet 1:17; Rev 11:18; 19:19).

2.2. Royal Psalms: Psalm 110. Not every royal psalm uses the word anointed. However, the very concept of “king” implies anointing because this was the ritual that demonstrated God’s choice and empowerment. Thus, many of the other royal psalms were pressed into service to extol that Jesus was the Christ, the anointed one. Pre-eminent among these is Psalm 110, distinguished by the multiplicity of citations in the NT (Matt 22:41-45 par.; 1 Cor 15:25; Heb 1:3; 5:6; 7:17, 21) as well as by its unique combination of the royal and priestly roles, both anointed offices (see 2.1 above). Psalm 110 is certainly the most enigmatic song in the Psalter. One of the main reasons why this psalm is so difficult has to do with the divine declaration that the king is “a priest forever according to the order of Melchizedek” (Ps 110:4). With this reference, we have a difficult psalm citing an obscure event in Genesis 14.

First, though, it is important to establish the fact that this psalm does have a meaning in its OT context before it takes on the eschatological significance recognized in the NT. Like Psalm 2, Psalm 110 has a contemporary setting either as a coronation psalm or, more likely, a pre-holy war battle song. It begins with a divine oracle to the effect that God tells the king to take a position of honor at his right hand, while God, the divine warrior, subdues his enemies. Much of the rest of the psalm assures the king of his ultimate victory, thanks to his intervention. It is the Lord who will see to the expansion of the human king’s power.

In this context the psalmist proclaims to the king that God has promised on oath: “You are a priest forever in the order of Melchizedek” (Ps 110:4). This statement is doubly surprising. In the first place, there are other texts that express concern that kings not assume priestly prerogatives (1 Sam 13:8-15; 2 Kings 15:3-5). And second, the king is connected not to the native Israelite priestly line of Aaron but rather to the patriarchal-period priest Melchizedek, whose story is told in Genesis 14.

It is possible, if not likely, that these two actually go together. For one thing, Melchizedek provides a precedent for a priest-king, since he was both, being the king of Salem. He was the one who greets Abraham after successful holy war and receives a portion of the plunder. Melchizedek does provide a pretext for attributing to the king priestly functions without blurring the distinction between the kingship and Aaronic priesthood.

The point is that Psalm 110, like the other royal psalms, has a setting within the world in which it was composed. However, like them as well, as the monarchy falters and ultimately fails, the faithful come to grasp a deeper significance of this psalm. After all, the psalm combines royal, priestly and warrior language, and the authors of the NT understand Jesus as their king, priest and the warrior who saves them from their spiritual enemies.

2.3. David Psalms: Psalm 16. Besides psalms that specifically refer to the “anointed king” and those that are explicitly royal, the NT recognizes the messianic significance of psalms that are labeled Davidic. Psalm 16 is a case in point. The psalm itself nowhere uses the term māšah or its cognates, nor does the content of the psalm in any way betray a royal origin. However, the title identifies it as a psalm of David, and so it would have been natural for the early church to read it as such. In this way, the psalm becomes the utterance of David, who is the anointed king of Israel.

Thus, as Psalm 16 is reread in the light of the death and resurrection of Christ, it would have been quite natural to read it as if uttered by Christ. In this context the message would take on a deeper significance that is implicit in the psalm itself. Psalm 16:10, for instance, could easily be understood in relationship to the historical David as the expression of his confidence that God would save him from some present threat to his life or, better, from a fate reserved only for the wicked (for the argument that Sheol was reserved for the wicked alone, see Johnston).

For you will not abandon my soul to Sheol;
you will not allow your faithful follower to see the Pit.

But as the NT recognized (Acts 2:27; 13:35), it was not David who experienced this protection in the ultimate sense—a point proven by pointing to David's grave—but only Christ, who had been raised from the dead.

2.4. A Messianic Editing of the Book of Psalms?

We examined Psalm 2 simply as a leading example of a psalm that over time came to have important messianic significance in the eyes of the church. However, the choice of this example also leads to a discussion of the possible messianic significance of the structure of the book of Psalms.

Most people read the book of Psalms as a relatively unordered collection of hymns. The book is not systematically structured in obvious ways such as chronology or topic or genre. However, a recent school of thought influenced by the work of G. H. Wilson has suggested a more subtle kind of editorial organization, and recently Wilson has argued that the final order of the book has messianic significance.

Wilson did his early work (1985) under the influence of his mentor, B. S. Childs, who is best known for advocating the canonical approach that looks for meaning in the final form of a text. Childs (511-13) had suggested that Psalter's structure might have a rationale, and Wilson took up the challenge. He argued that a structure could be found by examining the psalms at the so-called seams of the book—that is, the psalms that open and close the five “Books” of the Psalter. Wilson notes that a number (but not all) of these psalms have to do explicitly with the Davidic covenant, and that some of the others could be read in a way to make them relevant.

Psalm 2 is the first such, which, though not mentioning David even in the title or referring to the covenant, is connected to the covenant because of the language that alludes to the Davidic covenant in 2 Samuel 7 (see 2.1 above). Wilson believes, therefore, that Psalm 2 announces the Davidic covenant. Psalm 41, which closes Book I, is taken as a statement of confidence in the Davidic covenant—this in spite of the fact that the covenant is not mentioned or alluded to in the body of the psalm.

Wilson does not comment on the opening composition of Book II (Ps 42) as relevant, but he does believe that the closing psalm, Psalm 72, is. This psalm, according to its title, is a psalm of Solomon, but Wilson treats it as a psalm of David and a prayer for Solomon. He believes that this psalm provides for the passing on of the covenant promises from David to his son.

At the end of Book III the concern with the Davidic covenant becomes explicit for the first time. Wilson (1985, 213) believes that Psalm 89 is about “a covenant remembered but a covenant failed. The Davidic covenant introduced in Ps 2 has come to nothing and the combination of three books concludes with the anguished cry of the Davidic descendants.”

Book IV is then supposedly the answer to the dilemma expressed by Psalm 89 at the end of Book III. It asserts that Yahweh is king and particularly is a refuge (a theme picked up and developed by Creach). So it is a call to trust Yahweh now that the monarchy is gone.

As for Book V, Wilson does not believe that this section could be as ingeniously edited, for there are a number of psalms that came into the collection via preexistent groups. In conclusion, Wilson (1985, 227) states that this fifth book is an answer to the “plea of the exiles to be gathered from the diaspora.” The answer is to trust and depend on Yahweh.

Thus, Wilson sees a development within the structure of the Psalter from a confident assertion of Davidic covenant to its failure and the reassertion of hope in Yahweh's kingship in the absence of the monarchy. In other words, the shape of the Psalter takes on messianic proportions, since he also describes a connection with David here.

This ingenious reading certainly is appealing, but there are reasons to be hesitant about accepting it. First, Wilson's reading is based on a selective view of the psalms at the seams. Not all the "seam psalms" are relevant (e.g., Pss 42; 71; 90). Second, some of the psalms fit only if interpreted in a certain way. This is true of Psalm 41, which is not explicitly about the covenant, but also Psalm 89, which is not obviously about the failure of the Davidic covenant. The hope implied in the appeal to God makes it clear that the psalmist does not think that the covenant has failed; God just needs to be goaded into action by this extreme language. Third, there are psalms that clearly are concerned with the Davidic covenant that are left out of the schema—for example, Psalm 132, which is positive about the Davidic covenant in a way that Wilson's interpretation would not lead us to expect. Finally, one has to seriously question any new insight like this that has not been recognized over the millennia of previous interpretation. Of course, a new insight could be gained, but the burden of proof must be quite heavy.

3. The Messiah in Wisdom Literature?

To explore whether or not it is appropriate to speak of the messiah in Wisdom literature, it is important to be reminded of a crucial distinction. Although Jesus states that the "the law of Moses and the prophets and the psalms" (Lk 24:44)—in essence, the entirety of what we would call the OT—anticipated his coming, he does not mean that all the books engendered a specifically messianic expectation. The messianic expectation has to do with royal, priestly and prophetic roles because these were the people who were anointed in the OT.

Undoubtedly, Jesus was viewed as the wisdom teacher par excellence in the NT (see Proverbs 1: Book of; Woman Wisdom and Woman Folly). However, the question is whether or not this should be defined as a messianic expectation. We will address this question book-by-book, but we will see that these books add little if anything to the discussion, and attempts to see "messiah" in these books are belabored.

3.1. Proverbs. A good ruler was one who was endowed with great wisdom from God. Indeed, Solomon, named in the superscription of the book of Proverbs, was well known for his great, divinely bestowed wisdom. However, even within the book of Proverbs wisdom is not restricted to the royal office, so it is too far an extension to argue that the wisdom of Proverbs is a messianic type of wisdom, and in any case the book of Proverbs does not strike an eschatological tone and thus did not raise messianic expectations (contra Laato, 252-55; Perrin, 57-59).

3.2. Ecclesiastes. In a recent article R. Perrin argues that the reference to "the son of David" (Eccles 1:1) and the "one shepherd" (Eccles 12:11) form a narrative frame (see Frame Narrative) that reveals the messianic intention of the book of *Ecclesiastes, or at least of its final third- or second-century BC redaction. Perrin believes that here we have the combination of messianic and wisdom themes that is known during the intertestamental and NT period. He believes that the combination of "son of David," wise "words" and "king of Jerusalem" (not "Israel") indicates a transcending of past reference and has eschatological significance. He draws parallels that are explicitly messianic in *Sirach (Sir 24:9-12) and Psalms of Solomon (Pss. Sol. 17:21-24, 30, 32). In this interpretation *Qohelet/Solomon is the messianic sage.

Perrin makes some interesting and provocative points, but it is hard to come away with any other impression than that he is overly subtle in his connections. One need only review the many different ideas of what "one/a S/shepherd" means in Ecclesiastes 2:11 to understand the speculative nature of his suggestion (Longman 1998, 278-80).

3.3. Job. W. Kaiser (61-64) devotes a whole section of The Messiah in the Old Testament to the book of *Job. He argues that four texts in Job are relevant to the development of the messianic idea in the book: Job 9:33; 16:19-21; 19:23-27; 33:23-28. After surveying these passages, Kaiser (64) concludes that the book of Job anticipates a messiah who will be "an arbitrator, a mediator, a heavenly advocate and witness, a redeemer, and an interpreter of the enigmas of his life."

These texts are among the most difficult to interpret in a difficult book. But even granting that Kaiser is correct in his interpretation, he is not identifying a specifically messianic expectation in Job in the sense that we are using "messiah" here, since none of the expected traits of Job's arbitrator in heaven have anything to do with an "anointed" office.

4. The Messiah in Song of Songs.

*Song of Songs has a storied history of interpretation (see Song of Songs 3: History of Interpretation). Until the mid-nineteenth century the book was interpreted as an allegory of the history of redemption. In Jewish circles the man in Song of Songs was identified with God, and the woman with Israel. The *Targum then interpreted Song of Songs as allegorically describing the history of Israel from the exodus to the future messianic age. For instance, it takes Song of Songs 8:2 as a reference to the messianic banquet. Christian interpretation, in its historical allegories, simply substituted Christ for Yahweh, and the church for Israel. Few today, however, would read Song of Songs in this way, and so messianic interpretation of the book has also diminished.

5. The Messiah in the Books of Ruth and Esther.

These books too are only indirectly relevant to an expectation of the messiah. One of the functions of *Ruth, however, is that it tells the story connected to the genealogy of David, the future anointed king of Israel, and in Matthew 1 Ruth is cited as part of the line that includes the kings of Israel and culminates with Jesus, David's greater son. *Esther narrates the escape of the people of God from total destruction, which means the preservation of the line that eventually would produce Jesus, the Messiah. Such is the argument of K. Jobes (45): "The New Testament teaches that the Old Testament promises of future salvation were ultimately secured by the death and resurrection of Jesus Christ. The deliverance of God's people from Haman's death decree assured that the continuance of the Jewish nation from which their Messiah would come. The Messiah brought a deliverance from death not limited to escaping the holocausts of history, but a deliverance from the grave that inevitably awaits each of us, both Jew and Gentile alike."

See also KINGSHIP PSALMS.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. B. S. Childs, Introduction to the Old Testament as Scripture (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1979); J. Creach, Yahweh as Refuge and the Editing of the Hebrew Psalter (JSOTSup 217; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1996); K. Heim, "The Perfect King of Psalm 72: An 'Intertextual Inquiry,'" in The Lord's Anointed: Interpretation of Old Testament Messianic Texts, ed. P. E. Satterthwaite, R. S. Hess and G. J. Wenham (Grand Rapids: Baker, 1995) 223-48; K. Jobes, Esther (NIVAC; Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1999); P. S. Johnston, "'Left in Hell?': Psalm 16, Sheol and the Holy One," in The Lord's Anointed: Interpretation of Old Testament Messianic Texts, ed. P. E. Satterthwaite, R. S. Hess and G. J. Wenham (Grand Rapids: Baker, 1995) 213-22; W. Kaiser, The Messiah in the Old Testament (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1995); A. Laato, A Star Is Rising: The Historical Development of the Old Testament Royal Ideology and the Rise of the Jewish Messianic Expectation (ISFCJ 5; Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1997); T. Longman III, Ecclesiastes (NICOT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1998); idem, "The Messiah: Explorations in the Law and Writings," in Messiah in the Old and New Testaments, ed. S. E. Porter (MNTS; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2007); R. Perrin, "Messianism in the Narrative Frame of Ecclesiastes?" RB 108 (2001) 37-60; C. Rosel, Die messianische Redaktion des Psalters: Studien zu Entstehung und Theologie der Sammlung Psalm 2-89 (CThM 19; Stuttgart: Calwer, 1999); G. van Groningen, Messianic Revelation in the Old Testament (Grand Rapids: Baker, 1990); G. H. Wilson, The Editing of the Hebrew Psalter (SBLDS 76; Chico, CA: Scholars Press, 1985); idem, Psalms, vol. 1 (NIVAC; Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 2002a); idem, "Psalms and Psalter: Paradigm for Biblical Theology," in Biblical Theology: Retrospect and Prospect, ed. S. Hafemann (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 2002b).

T. Longman III

METAPHOR. See IMAGERY; POETICS, TERMINOLOGY OF.

METER

Over the past two centuries considerable conversation has arisen about the nature of or the existence of meter in biblical Hebrew poetry, so that, next to *parallelism, it has been the most actively discussed issue with regard to biblical poetics. The nature of the debate and conclusions proffered are closely tied to one's understanding of the term meter. As we will see, "Those who advocate meter in Biblical poetry define meter in a much looser manner than scholars who deny meter in the Biblical text" (Vance, 11). Indeed, it is a strict understanding of meter as used by scholars of nonbiblical poetry that leads many to insist that it plays no significant role in biblical literature. However, since meter is one of the major characteristics of many types of poetry, other scholars assume that biblical poetry is metrical and that identifying the type of meter used by the ancient Israelites will aid the exegetical process.

This article introduces the four main types of poetic meter, each of which has at some time been identified as being present in Hebrew poetry. In addition, it examines arguments against meter being found in biblical poetry to any significant extent if at all. A brief introduction to what is often called qinah meter is also given.

1. Proposed Types of Poetic Meter
2. Arguments Against Meter
3. Qinah Meter

1. Proposed Types of Poetic Meter.

Poetic meter is related to rhythm, the natural flow of a language whether in poetry or prose. As compared to rhythm, meter is characterized by being regularized and systematized in a manner that is easily recognizable. Students of poetry identify four common types of meter, each with its own distinctive characteristics: quantitative, accentual, syllabic, accentual-syllabic. At different times in history each of these meters has been said to appear in biblical poetry. Today, however, only the accentual and syllabic meters are given serious consideration.

1.1. Quantitative Meter. Quantitative meter, the meter of classical Greek and Latin poetry, is based upon the length of the syllables (the quantity or duration of sound in utterance) found in a poetic line. In classical poetry syllables are classified as long or short, depending upon the length of time required to pronounce them (a long syllable is said to take twice as long to pronounce as a short one). Quantitative meter is measured by counting a combination of syllables that are referred to as feet. The five main types of metrical feet are (1) iamb (short-long); (2) trochee (long-short); (3) spondee (long-long); (4) dactyl (long-short-short); (5) anapest (short-short-long). A line of poetry is scanned according to the number of feet used. Thus a line with one foot is monometer, two feet is dimeter, three feet is trimeter, four feet is tetrameter, five feet is pentameter, six feet is hexameter, and seven feet is septameter. The line can be further described by combining the type with the number of feet found in a line. Thus a poem might be written in dactylic hexameter (which frequently substitutes a spondee for a dactyl, as in Homer and Virgil), iambic pentameter or some other.

From very early Christian times claims were made that biblical authors made use of this type of meter when they wrote poetry. Thus Josephus wrote that "Moses also composed a song unto God, containing his praises, and a thanksgiving for his kindness, in hexameter verse" (Josephus Ant. 2.346), even though he gave no examples of how he determined this. Similarly, other writers, including Origen, Jerome, Augustine and perhaps Philo, made similar claims without explaining how they scanned the biblical verses to support their conclusions. It is generally assumed that these early authors used this terminology to convince people of their day that biblical poetry was not inferior to classical poetry. Although a few scholars during the modern period attempted to describe Hebrew poetics according to a quantitative scheme, their work has been deemed unsuccessful. To a great extent this is because the *Hebrew language places a greater emphasis on stress than on the length of vowel sounds. Since no serious proponent has appeared since the early nineteenth century, discussion of this approach with regard to biblical Hebrew is mainly of historical interest.

1.2. Accentual Meter. Accentual meter focuses strictly on the accented or stressed syllables of a line of poetry so that only the accented syllables are counted. Since unaccented syllables are considered irrelevant for counting accentual meter, feet are not normally taken into account. This approach was developed in the nineteenth century by J. Ley, K. Budde and E. Sievers (thus often called the Ley-Budde-Sievers method) and quickly became the predominant way to scan biblical poetry. Although practitioners vary in the exact procedure used, meter is generally determined by counting the major stresses denoted by the Masoretic accents in each of the bicola, tricola and so on of a poetic line. The meter of a particular line could thus be scanned as 3:3, 3:2, 2:2:2 (alternately 3 + 3, 3 + 2, 2 + 2 + 2) and so forth, indicating the number of stresses in each colon as they relate to the stresses in the adjoining colon/cola of a line.

Although not strictly an accentual approach, G. Gray, followed by T. Robinson, based meter upon units of Hebrew words (combinations of nouns, pronouns, prepositions, etc.) that are se-mentally related to other word units found in parallel colon/cola. This method of identifying poetic meter clearly was a development of R. Lowth's description of parallelism, as both Gray and Robinson understood parallelism as the primary aspect of Hebrew poetry. Even though word groups rather than accents are counted, the patterns identified frequently coincide with the accentual meter assigned to a line. A similar approach is practiced by J. Kurylowicz and A. Cooper, who focus on word complexes that are identified not on the basis of semantic parallelism but rather from grammatical criteria. What has been referred to as syntactic-accentual meter finds one significant accent on a word complex that may include a word with its proclitics and conjunctions, nouns in a construct relationship, words linked by a maqṣep, or other words closely related syntactically (Longman, 238-41). A secondary stress in a word complex is considered metrically irrelevant. The basic metrical pattern for this approach appears to be 2:2, though alternate forms are identified.

Another variation on the accentual approach is found in S. Mowinckel, who, by taking the unaccented syllables into account, determined that biblical meter was principally iambic and occasionally anapestic, although he admitted that there are many exceptions. Mowinckel's scansion generally adds one more stress to the meter of a colon, thus yielding 4:4, 4:3, 3:3 and so forth.

The accentual approach suffers from several weaknesses. As the foregoing description demonstrates, those who practice the method do not fully agree on how to identify or count accents. A related problem is that the method usually relies upon the accentuation and vocalization found in the Masoretic Text, even though the exact pronunciation of Hebrew when the Bible was written is unknown and inaccessible. In many instances, practitioners resort to emending the Masoretic Text apparently to ensure that the text conforms to their metric theory. A further negative concerns the macrostructure of a poem. Although it can be argued that most cola contain two or three accents, it is impossible to demonstrate that any metrical pattern is replicated in multiple poems in the Bible or even within the strophic structure of a given poem. It is thus almost essential to speak of biblical poetry as always exhibiting mixed meter. This lack of a real metric pattern gives reason to question whether poetry in the Bible can be said to display accentual meter at all.

1.3. Syllabic Meter. Beginning with F. Cross and D. Freedman, Hebrew poetry has been identified as exhibiting syllabic meter. This approach determines meter by counting the syllables of a poetic line. As distinct from the scansion derived by the accentual approach, which usually yields two or three accents, syllable counting recognizes each colon as having anywhere between three and thirteen syllables and notes that corresponding cola have roughly an equal number of syllables. In most cases, corresponding cola are either long (between eight and thirteen syllables) or short (between three and five syllables) and will be scanned accordingly (e.g., 4:4; 8:8; 7:7; 11:11). Lines that deviate from expected patterns, rather than being seen as a reason to question this approach, are considered part of the larger pattern that may have been deliberately composed for effect. The balance in syllables expected between matched cola is not found in the so-called qinah verses, in which the second colon is consistently shorter than the first colon.

As with the accentual method, this approach exhibits several weaknesses. Although there is significant correspondence between the number of syllables in corresponding cola, there does not appear to be any relation between the number of syllables in a poetic line and those adjacent to it. This distinguishes what is found in biblical poetry from recognized forms of syllabic poetry in which every line contains exactly the same number of syllables (as in French Alexandrine poetry) or in which consecutive lines follow a rigid pattern and the poem has a limited number of lines (as in Japanese haiku). If Hebrew poets used syllabic meter, they apparently did not intend to follow a rigorous pattern within a given poem, much less the entire genre. It is therefore not uncommon for supporters of this approach to admit finding a "thoroughly mixed meter" in which one can find "the free variation of couplets and triplets without discernable pattern" (Stuart, 215). That Hebrew poets might be so free in their compositions as to leave no discernable patterns greatly diminishes the possibility that they used syllabic meter.

Discussions of syllabic meter frequently make reference to anacrusis, a unit of speech that is found at the beginning of a line but not counted as part of the metrical structure of the line. Words in this position often are identified as interjections, conjunctions or pronouns that provide the reader with reason to pause and consider the words that follow. In many cases, however, it appears that anacrusis is invoked simply as a means of balancing the meter in corresponding cola, as the same parts of speech that are evaluated as anacrusis in one colon may not be in another colon.

Other problems arise with regard to the textual basis for counting syllables. Whereas Freedman and others usually base syllable counts upon the Masoretic Text, they recognize that it may not reproduce the original syllables accurately. As a result, their scansion of biblical poems according to syllables can be considered tentative at best. Others, such as Cross and Stuart, who emend the text so that it more closely resembles a hypothetical original reading, risk the accusation of shaping the text to fit their metrical theory, as that appears to motivate changes in readings above textual or even literary concerns.

1.4. Accentual Syllabic Meter. Accentual syllabic meter takes over the nomenclature used in the discussion of quantitative meter, giving it a different meaning. Instead of basing meter on long and short vowels, this approach focuses on stressed and unstressed syllables, which are grouped into feet. An iamb is therefore understood to be composed of an unstressed-stressed syllable unit rather than a short-long vowel unit. Other types of feet can be similarly redefined. Although common in English poetry, this complex meter has rarely been identified as a basis for Hebrew poetry. Although supported by F. Hare and J. Saalschütz, in the seventeenth and nineteenth centuries respectively, it has had no serious followers in more than a century (though J. Kugel [296] states that W. Albright, despite his unclear descriptions and inconsistent practice, followed this approach).

2. Arguments Against Meter.

In contrast to these attempts to identify meter in Hebrew poetry, a number of scholars have concluded that it simply does not exist, at least not in the sense that the term is used to describe other forms of poetry. Meter in poetry is generally understood to be so regular that it is like “a contract between the poet and the reader wherein the poet declares what he or she is going to do” and readers can readily recognize whether they have succeeded or not (Vance, 15). The best that supporters of various types of meter in biblical poetry can claim is that there is some kind of correspondence between the number of accents or syllables within the parallel structure of a poetic line, and that the number of accents or syllables in the various lines of a poem is roughly the same. That Hebrew poets are said to have had enormous freedom within these parameters in how they constructed their poems does nothing to support the presence of meter as normally understood. Furthermore, the lack of agreement between scholars as to the kind of meter used or how it can be scanned indicates that Hebrew poetry is far from regular; and without regularity, it is not strictly metrical. That many have recognized these problems lends credence to the claim that “it is possible to discern an emerging scholarly consensus that denies the existence of meter in classical Hebrew poetry” (Petersen and Richards, 42).

From an exegetical point of view, it appears that identifying meter in a biblical poem accomplishes little. Its use as a means to distinguish poetry from prose is problematic in that many prose sentences exhibit similar syllabic and accentual patterns. The comparative presence or absence of parallelism, degree of terseness, and use of figures of speech serve as a better guide for identifying poetry than does meter. In the same way, a focus on parallelism will likely produce a better understanding of the similarities in length of complementary cola within a line of poetry. Finally, the use of metric arguments for emending the text (when there is little or no textual support for the change) is suspect because arguments in its support are circular by nature.

3. Qinah Meter.

Beginning with Budde's studies on the book of *Lamentations, scholars have referred to a special type of Hebrew meter that is said to be found in lament poems and is thus characteristic of a dirge (see Lament, Psalms of). Named after the Hebrew word for a lament or dirge, qinah meter is scanned 3:2 following accentual meter (Hölscher and Mowinckel scan it 4:3 by including secondary accents) and usually 8:5 following syllabic meter. The second colon is described as being shorter in order to display a “limping” or “falling” rhythm to express the unfulfilled hopes of the singer. An example can be given from

Lamentations 2:5:

hayá`ādōnáy kē`ōyēb [three accents; eight syllables]

The-Lórd has-becóme like-an-enēmy [in the Hebrew phrase the verb comes first] billá`yiśrā`ēl [two accents; five syllables]

he-has-swallowe-up Ísrael

It is clear that this pattern is reproduced in many lines in biblical laments. Even so, it would be incorrect to conclude that biblical poets uniformly made use of the 3:2 form in their composition of dirges. First, this syllabic pattern is common in many types of Hebrew poetry, not just in laments. Second, within a given lament one may find lines that exhibit a number of different "metrical patterns." Third, some biblical laments (e.g., 2 Sam 1:19-27; Lam 5) consistently make use of other accentual and syllabic patterns. The best that can be said of the qinah meter is that some but not all Hebrew poets may have followed such a pattern as they wrote laments. Even so, the lack of this pattern in many laments and its presence in other genres indicates that one must exert great caution in assuming that this pattern was characteristic of Hebrew dirges.

See also PARALLELISM; POETICS, TERMINOLOGY OF; SOUND PATTERNS.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. K. Budde, "Das hebräische Klaglied," ZAW 2 (1882) 1-52; idem, "The Forms of Hebrew Poetry," in Dictionary of the Bible, ed. James Hastings (4 vols.; New York: Scribner, 1902) 4.3-9; F. M. Cross and D. N. Freedman, Studies in Ancient Yahwistic Poetry (SBLDS 21; Missoula, MT: Scholars Press, 1975; 2nd ed., BRS; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1997); D. N. Freedman, Pottery, Poetry, and Prophecy: Studies in Early Hebrew Poetry (Winona Lake, IN: Eisenbrauns, 1980); W. R. Garr, "The Qinah: A Study of Poetic Meter, Syntax and Style," ZAW 95 (1983) 54-75; G. B. Gray, The Forms of Hebrew Poetry: Considered with Special Reference to the Criticism and Interpretation of the Old Testament (New York: KTAV, 1915; repr., Eugene, OR: Wipf & Stock, 2002); J. L. Kugel, The Idea of Biblical Poetry: Parallelism and Its History (New Haven: Yale University Press, 1981); J. Kurylowicz, Studies in Semitic Grammar and Metrics (London: Curzon Press, 1973); J. Ley, Grundzüge des Rhythmus, des Vers- und Strophenbaus in der hebräischen Poesie (Halle: Waisenhausen, 1875); idem, Leitfaden der Metrik

der hebräischen Poesie (Halle: Waisenhausen, 1887); T. Longman III, "A Critique of Two Recent Metrical Systems," Bib 63 (1982) 230-54; S. Mowinkel, The Psalms in Israel's Worship, (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2004); D. L. Petersen and K. H. Richards, Interpreting Hebrew Poetry (GBS; Minneapolis: Fortress, 1992); T. H. Robinson, The Poetry of the Old Testament (London: Duckworth, 1947); D. K. Stuart, Studies in Early Hebrew Meter (HSM 13; Missoula, MT: Scholars Press, 1976); D. R. Vance, The Question of Meter in Biblical Hebrew Poetry (SBEC 46; Lewiston, NY: Edwin Mellen, 2001). W. McConnell

MOAB. See RUTH 2: ANCIENT NEAR EASTERN BACKGROUND.

MONSTERS. See CHAOS AND DEATH; CREATION THEOLOGY.

MORDECAI

After experiencing injustice and facing the threatened annihilation of his people in the Persian Empire, Mordecai rose to become second only to King Xerxes (*Ahasuerus). His roles in the *Esther narrative, however, have raised questions as to whether he was a godly Jew living in exile or had succumbed to the allure of the Diaspora culture.

1. Mordecai's Jewish Identity
2. Mordecai's Identity in the Context of the Persian Empire
3. Was Mordecai a Faithful or a Fundamentally Disobedient Jew?
4. The Ugly Specter of Anti-Semitism
5. Mordecai Becomes a Public Figure

1. Mordecai's Jewish Identity.

1.1. Living in Exile. The Hebrew word order of Esther 2:5 is significant. The verse begins with "a Jewish man, who was in the citadel of Susa." These identifying marks appear even before Mordecai's name, and they hint at the conflict that follows, setting up the Jewish counterpoint to the Persian court. Mordecai is repeatedly called "Mordecai the Jew," distinguishing him in the Diaspora context. His status as an exile is emphasized in Esther 2:6, which literally reads, "who was exiled from Jerusalem with the group of exiles which was exiled with Jeconiah, king of Judah, whom Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon, took into exile." The exile of Mordecai's forebears in 597 BC along with Je-coniah indicates that it was an upper-class family (2 Kings 24:8-16; Jer 29:1-2). The eunuchs, nobles and officials of the king were taken in that wave.

1.2. Mordecai's Genealogy.

1.2.1. Who Was Taken into Exile? The author speaks of "Mordecai, son of Jair, son of Shimei, son of Kish, a Benjamite, who was taken into exile from Jerusalem" (Esther 2:5b-6a). The primary question regarding the genealogy is the impossible age of Mordecai if the relative clause that commences Esther 2:6 refers to him being taken into exile rather than the last individual in the list, Kish. That is the customary way to read such Hebrew constructions. However, because that is unlikely for a narrator seemingly so careful about detail, it is more probable that Kish was indeed the individual taken into exile. In that case, he and these other immediate forebears of Mordecai had names that reflected earlier generations of the family tree.

1.2.2. The Amalekite Connection. Mordecai's tribal affiliation with Benjamin and the ancestor named Kish were clear connections to King Saul, whose father was Kish (1 Sam 9:1; 1 Chron 8:33). Haman is also explicitly linked to a venerable line, that of Agag. The astute audience would recognize some significant unfinished business from the early period of the Israelite monarchy when Saul was commanded by the Lord to obliterate the Amalekites, whose king was Agag (1 Sam 15). This was not capricious; the judgment upon the Amalekites was a fulfillment of God's declaration in Exodus 17:14 that he would erase the memory of the Amalekites because of their attack on Israel as described earlier in the chapter. That assault was a brutal one, as they attacked those who were weak and straggling behind (Deut 25:17-19). Saul, however, disobeyed the Lord and left Agag alive. The confrontation between Mordecai and Haman revisited that old ethnic tension, this time shot through with the injustice of Haman's rise to power while Mordecai remained unrecognized.

1.3. Practicing the Disciplines of Judaism. When Mordecai learned of the deadly decree issued by Haman in the name of the king, he donned the garb of mourning along with Jews in every province to which the edict had come (Esther 4:1-3). After challenging Esther to intervene with the king on behalf of the people, he carried out her instructions to fast along with the Jews of *Susa (Esther 4:17). In the interval his challenge to her is memorable: "Do not think that because you are in the king's house you alone of all the Jews will escape. For if you remain silent at this time, will relief and deliverance for the Jews arise from another place?" The implicit answer to that question was no. "You and your father's family will perish. And who knows but that you have come to the royal position for such a time as this?" (Esther 4:13-14). Generally, the second part of Esther 4:13 is translated "if you remain silent at this time, relief and deliverance will arise from another place, but you and your father's family will perish." It is possible, however, and more logical to read it as a question that is preceded and followed by threats of her own demise along with all the other Jews. This suggests that Mordecai's words were not posed as a hopeful but indefinite expectation of deliverance from some unnamed quarter. Instead, his message was comprehensively grim. Once Haman had discovered that she was both Jewish and related to Mordecai, her fate would be a terrible one regardless of her position as queen. Thus, she needed to act in the knowledge that she was the only hope.

2. Mordecai's Identity in the Context of the Persian Empire.

Although "Mordecai" reflects a common Persian name (Mardukā), there is no solid external corroboration of this particular Mordecai's position as second in the empire. There is an undated cuneiform document from the Persian period that refers to Mardukā, who was thought to be in high office either late in the reign of Darius I or at the beginning of Xerxes' rule. First published by A. Ungnad in 1940-1941 and repeatedly referenced by subsequent scholars, it was hailed as evidence of the well-positioned Mordecai whom the biblical text represents. Nevertheless, more recent appraisals of the document question whether the Mardukā of this text was really as prominent as initially thought and whether he was in office after 502 BC.

An equally challenging question is why Mordecai would bear the name of Babylon's chief deity, Marduk. In the genealogy of Hebrew names the appearance of "Mordecai" is notable. It is possible that he, like his cousin Esther, had a Hebrew name that simply does not appear because his narrative roles unfolded primarily in the Persian court. On the other hand, this may also be a hint that Mordecai had adopted, to a troubling degree, more than merely superficial trappings of Persian culture.

3. Was Mordecai a Faithful or a Fundamentally Disobedient Jew?

In contrast to Haman, Mordecai's emotions, thoughts and motives are hidden. As a result, there are readers who claim that both Mordecai and Esther suffered severe moral lapses that resulted in the silent disapproval of God. Others see them as courageous and devoted Jews living in the tenuous circumstances of a threatened minority population.

3.1. Mordecai's Choice to Remain in the Diaspora.

3.1.1. Evidence of Accommodation. That Mordecai was living in Susa—to say nothing of using the name “Mordecai” and serving in some capacity in the Persian court—is posited as evidence of disobedience and lack of loyalty to God and his covenant people. With the Babylonian exile, the Jews' religious identity had been undermined by loss of connection to the land and by the seductive appeal of the dominant culture. When the Persians replaced the Babylonians, and Cyrus issued his edict (539 BC) sending the exiles back to Judah to rebuild the temple, only a remnant did indeed return. The rest remained comfortably established throughout the Diaspora. By the time Xerxes took over the realm of Persia in 486 BC, these people likely had assimilated to a significant degree, and Mordecai was among them.

3.1.2. Mordecai's Residence in Susa Was Evidence of God's Providence. It is, however, significant in this regard that both Ezra and Nehemiah at the outset of their individual stories were likewise in high-profile positions in Susa. Neither of them is sanctioned for disobedience. In fact, it is telling that those events took place just about a generation after the crisis narrated in the book of Esther. Perhaps the wave of pro-Jewish sentiment as evidenced at the end of Esther and the pattern set by Mordecai's position paved the way for the prominent roles that both Ezra and Nehemiah held in the Persian court prior to their respective returns to Judea.

3.2. Mordecai's Role vis-à-vis Esther.

3.2.1. An Exploitative “Guardian”? A further charge against Mordecai centers on his willingness to send Esther into the “den of iniquity” that was the Persian court. Perhaps he was motivated by concern for his own advancement and was ready to exploit her evident beauty toward that end. Once Esther moved into the king's palace, Mordecai took his place in the gate, a position of significant power. Moreover, Mordecai forbade Esther, once she found herself in that context, to reveal her identity with God's covenant people, for that would entirely compromise his growing power.

3.2.2. A Faithful Guardian. Contrary to the picture of a worldly and callous Mordecai, however, there are hints early in the text that he was anything but that. The Hebrew word order of Esther 2:7 is significant. It begins with “He was caring for,” emphasizing Mordecai's role as guardian of Esther. The verse emphasizes the absence of Esther's parents, indicating twice that both had died and intimating that, apart from Mordecai, she would have been deserted. Even though Esther was Mordecai's cousin, she was sufficiently younger that he adopted her as his daughter.

The description of Esther emphasizes her beauty—literally, “beautiful of form” and “lovely in appearance.” In other words, her extraordinary beauty far exceeded the criteria for being rounded up in the net; there were “young woman,” “virgin” and “lovely in appearance” (Esther 2:3). In Esther's case, being taken was unavoidable. Once she was trapped in the harem, Mordecai's concern for her was evident in his daily walk outside the palace (Esther 2:11).

3.3. Mordecai's Refusal to Bow to Haman. Haman had been appointed to a position of honor higher than any other nobles in the realm, and all were commanded to prostrate themselves in his presence (Esther 3:2). Mordecai was consistent in his adamant refusal to bow to Haman. This event was taking place in the gate complex, which was sufficiently expansive that Haman did not notice the noncompliance of Mordecai until he was informed. Once the court functionaries knew that Mordecai was Jewish, they not only ceased to try to persuade him to bow as they had been doing, but also they turned the matter over to Haman (Esther 3:4).

3.3.1. Personal and Nationalistic Pride? This incident that touched off Haman's fury might have been a matter of Mordecai's own wounded pride and his strong sense of ethnic identity. Having to prostrate himself before Haman would have been a difficult blow to Mordecai, whose faithfulness to the king in exposing the assassination plot had gone unrecognized for about five years (cf. Esther 2:16 with Esther 3:7). Further, these personal tensions may have reflected the long-standing hostility between Israelites and Amalekites. Thus, rather than evidencing strong religious convictions in his refusal to bow, perhaps Mordecai simply responded with pride and nationalistic fervor that was, in the end, extremely reckless, given the consequences. Even though the expressions “kneeling down” and “falling on one’s face” (Esther 3:2, 5) are often used in conjunction with *worship of God, verbal pairs are a prominent stylistic touch throughout Esther. These two terms may simply be another one of these many rhetorical flourishes and lack any overtones of worship or idolatry.

3.3.2. Deep-Rooted Conviction Regarding the Worship of God. There are instances in the biblical text where Israelites bowed to human kings (1 Sam 24:8; 2 Sam 14:4; 18:28; 1 Kings 1:16) and to other superiors (Gen 23:7; 27:29; 33:3), but those Hebrew expressions are not the same as the verbs used in this context, hāwâ and kāra^c. Instead, when these two verbs are used elsewhere together in the biblical text, they always describe an individual doing obeisance in the presence of God (2 Chron 7:3; 29:29; Ps 22:29 [MT 22:30]; 95:6). Contrary to the suggestions that Mordecai’s refusal to bow was merely a sense of personal and ethnic honor, to be ordered to do this must have offended Mordecai’s most fundamental convictions.

4. The Ugly Specter of Anti-Semitism.

For reasons that are not articulated, Mordecai commanded Esther not to reveal her ethnic identity. It is further evident from the events at the king’s gate (Esther 3:2-4) that being Jewish jeopardized Mordecai’s security. There seems to have been a strong subcurrent of anti-Semitism brewing in the court, in Susa, and in the realm at large. This widespread antipathy toward the Jews would serve as fertile ground in which to sow Haman’s decree. Haman clearly expected extensive public participation in his plan to annihilate the Jews. The populace of Susa was thrown into an uproar by the decree of the king and Haman (Esther 3:15), but the nature of that confusion is unclear, and there was a significant part of the empire that decided to attack the Jews, even in the face of the second decree, which allowed the Jews to defend themselves.

5. Mordecai Becomes a Public Figure.

5.1. Honored in the Public Square.

Neither the king nor Haman had slept during the pivotal night described in Esther 5:10–6:3, and both had Mordecai in mind, although with entirely different objectives. Xerxes was agitated because his failure to reward Mordecai reflected badly on him. Haman was vexed because again Mordecai obviously had refused to pay him honor. Thinking that the king’s phrase “the man whom the king delights to honor” applied to him, Haman described the honors that he so ardently desired, continuing to interweave “the man whom the king delights to honor.” This was a practice session; he would announce it repeatedly and publicly with reference to Mordecai.

Both the royal horse and the regal garment were to be ones that the king himself had used. A crest (lit., “crown”) on the horse’s head was not an unusual ornamentation in ancient Near Eastern art; such equine headpieces appear regularly in Assyrian reliefs. Most likely, this was not to be a parade through the streets but rather a stationery demonstration in the city square. The verbs that are translated “has ridden” and “led through” are better understood as “mount,” implying the symbolic position to which Haman would be required to raise Mordecai as a public act of honor.

After Haman’s extended description, the actual event in the city square is sparingly narrated. Although the king seemingly was unaware of the antipathy between Haman and Mordecai, those who watched the spectacle would have known the preceding incidents. It must have felt like a cruel irony to Mordecai because the inevitable and deadly decree was still in effect. Perhaps, not knowing any of the precipitating events, he construed it as a scene of mockery in which he was forced to be the passive recipient.

5.2. Long Overdue Promotion. After Haman’s death on the gallows the king gave Mordecai the signet ring that had been worn by Haman, and Queen Esther appointed him guardian over Haman’s estate (Esther 8:2). He was attired in regal garments and a gold crown (Esther 8:15). Finally, he wielded significant power such that even those in high positions in the empire feared him (Esther 9:3-4).

5.3. Mordecai’s Countermeasures.

5.3.1. The Original Decree. The specific wording of the original decree to annihilate the Jews is critical in order to understand what happened when Mordecai and Esther issued their counter-decree: "Official letters were sent by couriers to all the king's provinces to destroy, kill and annihilate all the Jews—young and old, little children and women—on one day, the thirteenth day of the twelfth month, the month of Adar, and to plunder their goods" (Esther 3:13).

5.3.2. The Decree of Mordecai. In the name of the king, Mordecai issued a decree. The king's edict granted the Jews in every city the right "to assemble and to stand for their lives; to destroy, kill and annihilate every armed force of any people or province attacking them, little children and women, and to plunder their property" (Esther 8:11). The syntax of the phrase "little children and women" is ambiguous and has often been interpreted as giving the Jews the right to destroy women and children. Nevertheless, in the prior decree the objects of "to destroy, kill, and annihilate" were "all the Jews, from young to old, little children and women." Here, "little children and women" immediately follow "those attacking them," suggesting that the Jews were given permission to kill those in every location who were still intent on carrying out the original decree by attacking them and their families. Because the direct focus of the Jewish self-defense was armed adversaries, it is illogical to think that Mordecai's government mandate was issued against the women and children of the enemies. A further direct quotation of the previous edict comes at the very end with the permission to take plunder. Given the fact that the following narrative is emphatic that the Jews did not take plunder even though permitted to do so, it seems that if there had been a legal allowance to slaughter women and children, some comment would have been made regarding that outcome as well. Instead, the casualty report is presented in terms of numbers of men killed (Esther 9:12, 15). In sum, Mordecai cited specific phrases from the previous decree to emphasize that this was specifically a countermeasure. Because of the irrevocability of these laws, the terms of the second edict had to reflect those of the first as protection for the Jews. Just as the relief is emphasized, so also is the fact that the Jews did not take any plunder from their enemies, even though they were permitted to do so by the measure-for-measure form of the decree.

5.4. Instituting the Festival of Purim with Esther. In Esther 9 the focus of the text moves from the narrative of deliverance to the means for perpetuating the memory of that tremendous occasion. Toward that end, Mordecai wrote more than once to establish, confirm and impose the observance of *Purim. The repetitious elements in this description and the general tangle of language come together in a remarkably apt form to convey the monumental effort needed to confirm the new festival.

5.5. Mordecai's Ongoing Political Presence. Mordecai was second to the king, a fact echoing Joseph's role, and he was a benefactor to the Jews, serving as an advocate and spokesperson in the government for the Jewish community (Esther 10:3). His prominent position set the stage for the historical roles of Ezra and Nehemiah. The text closes with "speaking shalom for all his descendants," a poignant reminder of the necessity for Jews throughout the succeeding centuries to have someone positioned to intercede for their well-being.

See also ESTHER 1: BOOK OF.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. O. T. Allis, "The Reward of the King's Favorite (Esther vi.8)," PTR 21 (1923) 621-32; W. B. Barrick, "The Meaning and Usage of RKB in Biblical Hebrew," JBL 101 (1982) 481-503; D. J. A. Clines, "In Quest of the Historical Mordecai," VT 41 (1991) 129-36; A. D. Cohen, "'Hu Ha-goral': The Religious Significance of Esther," Judaism 23 (1974) 87-94; M. V. Fox, Character and Ideology in the Book of Esther (2nd ed.; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2001); W. Horbury, "The Name Mardocheaus in a Ptolemaic Inscription," VT 41 (1991) 220-26; S. H. Horn, "Mordecai, a Historical Problem," BR 9 (1964) 14-25; F. B. Huey Jr., "Irony as the Key to Understanding the Book of Esther," SJT 32 (1990) 36-39; T. S. Laniak, Shame and Honor in the Book of Esther (SBLDS 165; Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1998); J. D. Levenson, Esther (OTL; Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 1997); C. A. Moore, "Archaeology and the Book of Esther," BA 38 (1975) 62-79; idem, ed., Studies in the Book of Esther (New York: KTAV, 1982); L. B. Paton, A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the Book of Esther (ICC; New York: Scribner, 1908); W. H. Shea, "Esther and History," ConJ 13.3 (1987) 234-48; M. Simon, trans., Esther and Song of Songs, vol. 9 of Midrash Rabbah (London: Soncino, 1939); F. S. Weiland, "Literary Clues to God's Providence in the Book of Esther," BSac 160 (2003) 34-47; J. M. Wiebe, "Esther 4:14: 'Will Relief and Deliverance Arise for the Jews from Another Place?'" CBQ 53 (1991) 409-15; E. Yamauchi, “Mordecai, the Persepolis Tablets, and the Susa Excavations,” VT 42 (1992) 272-75.

E. Phillips

MOT. See CHAOS AND DEATH.

MOUNT ZION. See MOUNTAIN IMAGERY; ZION.

MOUNTAIN IMAGERY

Mountain imagery occurs with regularity in the poetry of the OT, frequently sharing mythic features familiar from the literature of the broader ancient Near Eastern world. Broadly speaking, we can group the imagery around the general cosmogonic and cosmic images associated with Yahweh's kingship and the specifically Israelite imagery of Mount Zion.

1. Hebrew Words
2. The Mountains and Yahweh's Kingship in Creation
3. Mount Zion

1. Hebrew Words.

The basic Hebrew word for “mountain” is har, a word of unknown derivation and without cognates in other Semitic languages. It is found some 550 times in the Hebrew Bible but does not occur in Ruth, Esther, Ezra or Ecclesiastes. A close synonym, gibʿa (“hill”), is found in *parallelism with har (37 out of 59x; see Prov 8:25; Song 2:8; also esp. in Isaiah).

The Hebrew for “rock” (sûr [74x]) is cognate to the common word for “mountain” in Aramaic (ûr). “Rock” and “mountain” occur in parallel expression in Job 28:9-10. “Rock” and its synonym selaʿ (66x) also occur in parallelism. Yahweh is sûr and selaʿ for the godly (Ps 18:2 [MT 18:3]; 31:2-3 [MT 31:3-4]; 71:3).

“Field” (šādeḥ [333x]) is a cognate of the Akkadian word šadû (“mountain”). The fields of Moab (Ruth 1:2 [simply “Moab” in the NIV]) are better understood as the mountains—that is, the elevated plateau of Moab (see also Ps 132:6: “the fields of Jaar”). The words mountain and field are in parallel expression in Ps 50:11; 104:10-11. The “gazelles [does] of the field” (Song 2:7; 3:5) were likely living in mountainous areas (cf. Ps 104:18).

The word gēbûl (“territory, border”) is etymologically connected to the Arabic word for “mountain” (jabal) and occurs in parallelism with “mountain” in Ps 78:54. The overlap in meaning of gēbûl with “mountain” may be occasioned by the international custom of marking political and tribal areas by mountains.

2. The Mountains and Yahweh's Kingship in Creation.

2.1. Mountains: Cosmogony, Cosmos, Chaos and Yahweh's Kingship.

2.1.1. Mountains and Cosmogony. The assumption of connections between mountains in Mesopotamian cosmogonies and the OT has given rise to several critical interpretations: a cosmic mountain as the center of the world and, related to this, the mountain as the navel of the world (Butterworth; Clifford; Talmon; Terrien). It is preferable to view the literary associations with mountains in the OT as mythopoeic, as Israel's poets employ standardized images. They all agree that Yahweh is absolutely independent of and prior to creation, and that mountains are contingent on him. Though not thinking in categories of creatio ex nihilo, one psalmist speaks of the birth of mountains (Ps 90:2) in relationship to Yahweh's eternity (cf. Ps 65:6).

2.1.2. Mountains and Yahweh's Kingship. By employing the language of myth, biblical authors invite readers to envision God's strength in creating the cosmos. They speak of a primeval chaos, but under Yahweh's control, that he shaped into a cosmos. The resulting order is reflective of his wisdom and kingship.

2.1.2.1. Yahweh's Wisdom. The cosmos reveals the wisdom of the Creator. In Proverbs 8 the sage envisions *Woman Wisdom as a witness to Yahweh's creative work, including the mountains (Prov 8:24-29). Rather than speculate on the age of the earth, Israel's poets celebrate the antiquity and stability of creation, as represented by the mountains and hills (Job 15:7; Ps 90:2; Prov 8:25). They write lyrically about the order of creation, revealing Yahweh's wisdom, righteousness, and justice (Ps 36:6). His creation (mountains and the deep [Ps 36:6]) reveals cosmic order that is characterized by righteousness and justice. Everything in creation reveals Yahweh's royal splendor and wisdom (Ps 104:24).

2.1.2.2. Yahweh's Kingship over Chaos. In mythopoeic imagery water opposes cosmos. Psalm 104 pictures the primeval chaos as the power of water over the mountains (Ps 104:6-10; cf. Ps 65:5-11). Yahweh's rebuke of the water forever changed its power. Instead of water being a destructive force, it is largely a beneficent force. It comes down in the form of precipitation on mountains, runs down, waters the earth, enables vegetative growth, and thereby it makes human and animal life possible (Ps 104:10-18).

Mountains provide refuge and provision. They form the framework of creation together with the ocean depths, over which Yahweh rules (Ps 95:4; 148:8-9). All creatures of the air, the land and the sea inhabit this space. They receive plentiful rains (Ps 104:13; cf. Ps 148:8) that permit an abundance of vegetation to cover the rocks (Ps 65:12; 72:16; 147:8). Trees provide shade on the mountains (Ps 80:10). Birds find refuge (Ps 11:1; cf. Ps 50:11), and game and small animals roam wild in the mountains (Job 39:5-8; 40:20; Ps 50:10-11; 76:4; 104:18; Song 4:8). Humans explore the mountains in search of precious metals and stones (Job 28).

Psalm 104 closes with a prayer that the Creator God will restore order into this world that has again turned into chaos by the wicked (Ps 104:35). At his coming to judge the wicked the mountains will quake and smoke (Ps 104:32). The opening and closure of the psalm link the world of creation (cosmos) with the world as redemption (a new creation), as the psalmist inspires the godly with the hope that in the end Yahweh's subjugation of the wicked will be like the subjugation of the water in the beginning.

2.1.3. Mountains: Coexistence of Cosmos and Chaos. The ambivalence connected with mountains maintains the tension between creation and redemption. On the one hand, mountains evoke an image of primeval order, the garden of Eden. It is in this idealized setting that we find the two lovers in *Song of Songs (Longman). The lover is likened to a gazelle coming from the mountains (Song 2:8-9, 17; 8:14) but also to a dove hiding in the mountains (Song 2:14). The beloved too is imagined as living in the mountains (Song 4:8). The mountains are laden with spices and smells (Song 4:6; 8:14).

On the other hand, mountains are also associated with danger (chaos). The destructive force of mountain fires endangers the habitat of animals (Ps 83:14; cf. Ps 144:5). Mountains also erode over a long period of time. The stalwart *Job likens his troubles to the erosion of mountains into grit (Job 14:18-20). His orderly life has turned into chaos.

The quaking of mountains is an evocative image of the Day of the Lord (Ps 18:7; 104:32; 144:5). Mountains representative of the stability of creation serve as an image of the great power of God over against the chaotic forces on earth. In the images associated with *theophany the poets speak of the disestablishment of creation at Yahweh's coming. When he turns against the cosmos in judgment and wrath, mountains are leveled to plains (Job 9:5-7) or melt away like wax (Ps 97:5).

The quaking of the mountains as part of the theophanic imagery may signify redemption. The poet of Psalm 114 imagines the mountains, together with the waters of the sea and the Jordan, as thrown in convulsion at Yahweh's deliverance of Israel from Egypt (Ps 114:1-4).

2.1.4. Mountains and the Renewal of the Cosmos. The majesty of the mountains, covered with luxuriant vegetation, serves as an image of redemption in Psalm 80:7-11. Yahweh has made this world to be a cosmos, maintains it, and guarantees that it is a blessed and safe place for his creatures (Ps 72:3). Yet, this world is in need of redemption. The cosmos is continually at risk because of evil. Israel's poets realistically portray the chaotic forces in the world. Psalm 46 envisions a city surrounded by pounding waves that reduce the mighty mountains to mere objects that slide into the sea (Ps 46:2-3). The psalmist encourages the godly not to fear, for even though the mountains may disappear, the city of the Lord will not succumb to these forces (Ps 46:4-5).

Psalm 72 celebrates a world at peace under the agency of the messianic agent. The mountains and hills in such a world are symbols of peace and righteousness (Ps 72:3). The chaotic forces of the present world structures are seen as being transformed into conformity to God's will, expressive of his kingdom on earth. Then everything (people and mountains) praises him (Ps 98:8; 148:7-10; cf. Ps 144:9). The harmonious functioning of the cosmos may be likened to a restoration to the primeval bliss of the garden of Eden.

2.2. Yahweh as the Rock. The metaphor of Yahweh as the Rock is a rich image of redemption. As Yahweh provided water for his people from a rock in the wilderness for Israel (Ps 78:15-16; 105:41; 114:8), so he continues to be the Rock for all who call on him in faith. The image of Yahweh as the Rock is as rich as the many words connected with it: "Yahweh is my rock [sela'], my mountain fortress [mēšûdâ] and my deliverer; my God is my rock [šûr], in whom I find refuge. He is my shield and the horn of my salvation, my high place of refuge [mišgāb]” (Ps 18:2; cf. Ps 9:9; 31:2).

The Rock of Israel is both the hope of *David (Ps 18:2, 31; 19:14; 27:5; 28:1; 31:2-3; 62:2, 6, 7; 89:26; 144:1-2 [messianic agents]) and of all the godly (Ps 78:35; 92:15; 94:22; 95:1; cf. Ps 37:39; 43:2).

3. Mount Zion.

3.1. Mount Zion as a Microcosm.

3.1.1. Cosmos. Yahweh’s rule over creation finds its particular focus in Mount Zion (Ps 76:2). It is Yahweh’s holy mountain and also his city (Ps 48:1). The dual images of mountain and city figure prominently in the language of *Zion in the Psalter. Zion is a peaceful place where God’s people find rest and shelter (Ps 46:4-5, 11). It is a beautiful and joyful place (Ps 48:2). Located on the highest mountain (Ps 48:2; 78:69), it is an image of security and victory. The language of Zion has mythopoeic allusions to Baal’s victory over Yam and to his exaltation on Mount Zaphon. The choice of Zion over against Sinai or Bashan spatially defines Yahweh’s kingship on earth and symbolically marks his presence (see Divine Presence) with his people (Ps 68). It also is a mark of his love for his people (Ps 87:1-2; cf. Ps 78:68).

3.1.2. Cosmos and Chaos. In a Zion psalm the psalmist likens Zion to a city of peace (cosmos) surrounded by forces of water (Ps 46:3) or chaos. As a microcosm, Mount Zion reflects a world of order in a world of opposing forces, and the godly find refuge in Zion. In many psalms the lamenters turn to Mount Zion in prayer, awaiting Yahweh’s response and redress (Ps 3:4).

3.2. The Holiness of Mount Zion. The mountain of the Lord is holy (Ps 43:3; 48:1; 87:1; 99:9). The mountain image signifies Yahweh’s exclusion, exaltation and otherness, but it also marks his inclusion and embrace of people who conform to his expectations (Pss 15; 24). Mount Zion is truly a microcosm of the cosmos, as it represents a world of God’s presence and order (Levenson).

3.3. Mount Zion and the Messianic Agency. Hope in the efficacy of the messianic agent is a concrete expression of Yahweh’s kingdom (Ps 2:6). Psalm 72 opens up the grand expectation that the messianic agent will bring peace and righteousness in the mountains and hills (Ps 72:3). He too is engaged in the removal of chaos with the hope of a righteous cosmos.

3.4. Mount Zion as a Symbol.

3.4.1. The Location of Zion. The city of Jerusalem (Mount Zion) was a localized symbol of Yahweh’s kingdom. It is symbolic of the presence of the Great King. But the structures of Jerusalem, the temple, and the Davidic dynasty are contingent on the reality of Yahweh’s presence. In the book of *Lamentations the poet reflects on Yahweh’s angry abandonment of Mount Zion (Lam 2:2, 5). It has become a wasteland, a haunt of jackals (Lam 5:18).

3.4.2. The Universality of Zion. The poets and prophets transform the image of Zion beyond the local expressions to a symbolic expression. Zion is a symbol of the reality of Yahweh’s rule, however or wherever his kingship is manifest on earth. Yahweh’s gracious sustenance of all of life, especially the godly, and his judgment of the wicked are manifest expressions of his kingship (Pss 146–149; cf. Lam 5:19). As such, Mount Zion is a universal symbol. Wherever and however the reality of Yahweh’s presence and kingship are evident, Mount Zion as the city of God is real. It is the mother city of all the people of God, whether Jews or Gentiles (Ps 87:4; cf. Gal 4:26; Heb 12:22-25).

See also CREATION IMAGERY; IMAGERY; KINGSHIP PSALMS; PSALMS 6; ICONOGRAPHY; ZION.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. E. A. S. Butterworth, The Tree at the Navel of the Earth (Berlin: de Gruyter, 1970); R. J. Clifford, The Cosmic Mountain in Canaan and the Old Testament (HSM 4; Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1972); J. D. Levenson, Creation and the Persistence of Evil: The Jewish Drama of Divine Omnipotence (Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1994); T. Longman III, The Song of Songs (NICOT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2001); M. Selman, “הַר,” NI-DOTTE 1:1051-55; S. Talmon, “הַר,” TDOT 3:42-47; S. Terrien, “The Omphalos Myth and Hebrew Religion,” VT 20 (1970) 315-38.

W. A. VanGemeren

MUSIC, SONG

Music is the patterned use of sound-producing tools in a relevant cultural context (Braun, OEANE 4.70), and singing is the musical use of voice. The Bible frequently refers to music and song in the context of its grand narration of God’s redemption, but nowhere does it consciously consider the nature or fitting uses of music. The ubiquity of music in modern times and its high level of development can lead to unwarranted assumptions about music in the biblical period. It is therefore wise to keep in mind one's chronological, social and religious distance from the biblical world.

From antiquity, music has been a part of everyday life, particularly at occasions of birth, celebration, battle and mourning. But in the wisdom and poetic books of the OT most of the references to music and song are in the context of prayer, lament, thanks and praise (see Lament, Psalms of; Thanksgiving, Psalms of). According to J. Begbie (DTIB, 522), about three-fourths of the musical references in the OT are to song, probably because of associations of musical instruments with surrounding pagan cultures as well as the strong emphasis placed by God's covenant people on the word. The present article considers the nature of sources for studying biblical music and then focuses on music and singing in *Psalms and *Song of Songs. It concludes with some thoughts intended to foster appreciation of the inherent benefits of construing portions of the Bible as music.

1. Sources of Information
2. Music and the Psalter
3. Music and Song of Songs
4. Suggestions for Further Consideration

1. Sources of Information.

Studies of music and song in the OT have tended to draw almost exclusively from textual references in the Bible itself. These data are significant, especially when considered in light of their highly developed literary contexts. Given that the OT developed as part of a wider world of literature and culture, research on this topic must be broadened. To this aim, J. Braun (2002) crafted his study of music in ancient Israel to include the non-Israelite cultures of Palestine. Furthermore, Braun (2002, 5) redirected his focus of research from textual to archaeological evidence that he considered primary. This expansion of research helps not only to identify many of the musical instruments mentioned in the Bible but also to illuminate the technical, social and religious or symbolic dimensions of music. This section thus provides the broad context for the following treatment of music and song in Psalms and Song of Songs.

1.1. Textual Evidence. As a collection of documents developed and preserved by living communities, the Bible contains texts that were finalized long after the events that they depict actually took place. The books of Chronicles, for instance, employed descriptions of First Temple music and Levitical personnel as established by *David to encourage the postexilic community to carry on that heritage. The study of choral music in these books by J. W. Kleinig pays close attention to the Chronicler's literary use of earlier traditions in this new postexilic setting. This is also the period in which the Psalter took final shape, so it is appropriate to study how earlier psalms have been organized and incorporated into the final five-book structure that now exists. The judgment about whether or not David and *Solomon actually achieved the level of musical or liturgical sophistication described in Chronicles is linked in part to one's views about authorial creativity and textual development, but it is unlikely that the Chronicler could have successfully fashioned a literary memory of the past without some basis in reality. It is therefore important that all textual evidence from the Bible be considered in light of the best practices of biblical exegesis. In general, this means that texts must be read within their own literary contexts with attention to semantics, flow of thought, and genre. Texts should also be understood in relation to the wider historical, religious, geographical and social realities of the ancient world and the specific situation in life from which these texts arose. In particular, the musical terminology of the Bible reflects the function of music in ancient societies. Where this is forgotten, the spiritual affinity that some modern readers have with the devotional thrust of the Psalter may have quite little to do with the musical life of these songs in ancient Israelite liturgical practice. To be helpful, contemporary applications and lessons drawn from the Psalter must relate to our own times, but not at the expense of being mindful of the former situations in which believers used these texts to express meaning and significance.

Outside the Bible, literary sources are sparse, but occasionally helpful in the identification of some instruments such as redefining the kinnôr as a type of lyre with very wide range of uses. From the city of Ugarit around 1400 BC comes a Hurrian cult song with text and some indications of musical performance. Philo, Josephus, the Mishnah, plus the Babylonian and Jerusalem Talmuds and other rabbinic literature also shed light on the topic, but their relatively late date must be taken into account. Though chronologically closer to the biblical world, ancient translations of the Bible such as the LXX, Peshitta and Vulgate often provide less illumination than expected. Many of the biblical terms for music were technical and had already fallen out of use even in the Second Temple period, so LXX translators had to make educated guesses when handling some terms (such as the Gk diapsalma for the Heb selā in Ps 3:2 and elsewhere). Sometimes they could do no better than simply transliterate (rendering the Heb māḥālat in Ps 53:1 as maeleth).

The NT and writings of the church fathers provide Christian perspectives. Aside from the christological and eschatological importance of the Psalter in the NT, this evidence supports the claim that the psalms were not merely poems to be read and interpreted but rather were songs to be sung in corporate *worship (Eph 5:19). It is generally held that except for the šôpār (a goat or ram's horn), Levitical instrumental worship music was absent from the synagogue after the destruction of the Second Temple in AD 70. This may be the main reason why the NT does not mention instruments in the context of worship, though it should be noted that it does not prohibit or criticize such use (Begbie DTIB, 523). Many music historians hold that the reason for the paucity of examples of Roman music is its destruction by the early church. Regarding Greek music, merely remnants can be deduced from documents detailing the development of music theory by Pythagoras and continued by Boethius. This material would have been difficult to eradicate because of its inclusion in the larger philosophical systems of thought. For example, it was part of the Quadrivium (Acoustics).

The practice of musically intoning the text of the Bible is ancient. The system of accents found in the MT was codified in writing around the middle of the first millennium AD. But E. J. Revell has found evidence in the LXX of an early pre-Christian accent system. This setting of the Bible to chant, though somewhat musical, was not a mere aesthetic ornament; it helped to fix the interpretation of the text by punctuating it into syntactic units. For example, Rabbi Akiba (c. AD 50-135) believed that chanting the text aided in its interpretation. He thus taught that the study of the *law was equivalent to singing (b. Sanh. 99a).

1.2. Archaeological and Iconographic Evidence. Because the Bible does not adequately describe the instruments that it mentions or the music that they made, archaeological evidence is essential. For example, the traditional identification of the nēbel as a harp is probably wrong because the harp is unattested in the biblical period; the instrument probably is a lyre (Braun 2002, 22-24). With few exceptions, the actual sounds of ancient instruments cannot be reproduced. Archaeological evidence of musical instruments themselves is strongest for durable items such as cymbals, bells and objects made from pottery or bone, such as rattles, flutes and conch trumpets. Wood, strings and membranes are more prone to decay.

Iconographic evidence of music comes from metal and terracotta figurines, rock etchings, drawings on pottery, ivory tablets, alabaster reliefs, murals, seals, coins and mosaic floors.

2. Music and the Psalter.

In their current form, psalms are typically understood as Scriptures to be read and sometimes prayed rather than as songs to be sung. Following S. Mowinckel, scholars generally now agree that most of the psalms first came to life in the context of public liturgical worship at the temple. Private or familial singing certainly took place (cf. the use of Psalms 113—118 [the Hallel] at Passover), but the musical use of the psalms was adopted from their role in the temple service itself (Mowinckel, 2.88; see Psalms 3: History of Interpretation). The destruction of the temple in AD 70 put an end to this liturgical use and effectively silenced the Psalter, which now is studied mostly for its theological contribution. The task of appreciating the connection between music and the Psalter raises two fundamental questions. First, how do we know that the psalms were music? Second, what difference does this make?

2.1. The Musical Nature of the Psalter.

2.1.1. Superscriptions. At least ninety-five of the 116 superscriptions mention musical terms (see Psalms 5: Titles). The word mizmôr ("psalm") in superscriptions is extremely common (57x). It is related to the verb zmr, which basically means "play an instrument" or "sing a song according to musical accompaniment" and thus refers to a musical piece (Allen, 116). The word šîr ("song") appears to be more specific, referring to a vocal composition. Each of Psalms 120—134 bears the heading šîr hamma'ālôt ("song of ascents"), and they probably were used in the context of pilgrimages to the temple. The Psalter includes other types of compositions, but since the meaning of these words is uncertain, they usually are not translated but rather are simply transliterated as maskil, miktam, shiggaion. We do not know if they are musical, though it appears that, in light of Nehemiah 12:46, the word tēhillā in Psalm 145:1 means “song of praise.”

Some psalms have technical indications about their performance, perhaps tunes to which they were to be sung, though as far back as the LXX their meanings were in doubt. The Hebrew prepositions ‘al, bē and ‘el preface these terms and in these contexts probably refer to how the psalm was to be performed in the sense of “according to” or “with.” For example, ‘al-‘ayyelet haššāḥar in Psalm 22:1 would mean “according to the doe of the dawn,” and ‘al-yōnat ‘ēlem rēḥōqim in Psalm 56:1 would mean “according to the dove of the distant terebinth trees.” Immediately following the initial word lamnaṣṣēah (“to the director”) in Psalms 57:1; 58:1; 59:1; 75:1 there is simply ‘al-tašhēt, which means “do not destroy.” It is very likely that most of these kinds of expressions in psalm headings are musical, but available data do not equip scholars to be conclusive in every instance.

For the following items, the summary of options by Braun (2002, 39-41) is well informed. The expression ‘al-‘ālāmôt (Ps 46:1) is variously understood as the high soprano tuning of an instrument, a reference to a female musician, or perhaps some connection to the octave or eighth tone. The expression ‘al-haggittit (Ps 8:1; 81:1; 84:1) could be an instrument or style of music from the city of Gath or some reference to a song related to the practice of pressing wine grapes. The phrase ‘al-māḥālat (Ps 53:1; 88:1) probably is a musical reference to dance (maḥōl), some kind of pipe or wind instrument (from the root ḥll), or some indication that the psalm should be performed in a quiet or depressed manner. The expressions binginôt and ‘al-nēginat derive from the root ngn, which has to do with the playing of instruments, but there is insufficient evidence to be more specific (see Ps 4:1; 6:1; 54:1; 55:1; 61:1; 67:1; 76:1). The heading of Psalm 5 contains ‘el-hannēḥilôt, which modern translations tend to understand as a reference to flutes, although the LXX, Vulgate and other early versions did not treat it as a musical term at all. In Psalm 6:1; 12:1 we see ‘al-ḥaššēmīnūt, which is related to the number “eight.” Although it may refer to an eightstringed instrument, the fact that the heptatonic scale was commonly known in Ugarit strengthens the claim that it has to do with octaves. A few psalms have forms of the word šūšan (“lily”) in their headings (Ps 45:1; 60:1; 69:1; 80:1). Even though early versions do not take these as musical indications, most today read them as references to lyrics of some kind.

The word lamnaṣṣēah is common in psalm superscriptions (55x [also in Hab 3:19]). The verb nšh has to do with supervision, and most modern translations understand lamnaṣṣēah to function as a dedication of the psalm to a musical director or perhaps choirmaster. This certainly is possible, though in light of the LXX and Vulgate, Braun (2002, 38) maintains that it does not possess any particular musical meaning. Since the word appears at the end of the lone psalm in Habakkuk 3 rather than at its heading, the suggestion by B. K. Waltke that it was originally a colophon at the end of one psalm that eventually became appended to the beginning of the ensuing psalm is attractive. If this were so, the number of psalms for the director would remain the same, but the identity of most of them would change. For example, Psalm 3 would be reclassified as a lamnaṣṣēah psalm.

The Bible contains about twenty words for musical instruments, most of them appearing in the book of Psalms. Archaeological and iconographic evidence has greatly helped to clarify their identification, though questions remain. They may be classified according to the sounds that they produced as idiophones (bells, cymbals, rattles), membranophones (drums, tambourines), chordophones (strings) and aerophones (pipes, trumpets, horns).

Finally, twenty-four psalm superscriptions make reference to temple singers: *Asaph, the sons of Korah, Heman, Ethan and Jeduthun. David’s installation of these Levitical musicians and their role in the Solomonic temple (according to many references in 1-2 Chronicles) supports the claim that these particular psalms were publicly sung, as were most of the psalms.

2.1.2. Content of the Psalms. The book of Psalms is replete with references to the temple and its courts. This testifies to the use of psalms in that setting which was full of music. Psalm 68 is a prime example. Not only is it dedicated to the director of music and classified as a “psalm” and “song,” but also it exhorts the righteous and the earth’s kingdoms to rejoice with singing (Ps 68:3-4, 32). Psalm 68:24-27 describes a procession with music and song into the temple sanctuary itself.

In addition to frequent commands to sing, shout and play music, there are indications that the psalms called for vocal responses from worshipers. The expression halēlū-yāh ("praise Yah") is more than a interjection with semantic value; it has a performative liturgical function whereby worshipers signaled their participation and approval. It would have been a fitting response to the singing of psalms. Psalm 136 is antiphonal in that it punctuates each line with "His love endures forever!" Psalm 129, a song (šir) of ascents, uses the phrase "let Israel say" to call for the covenant community to participate in the liturgy, and Psalm 24 (a mizmôr) seems to describe a gathering at the temple when the people sing an answer the question "Who is this king of glory?" with affirmations of the Lord as a mighty and victorious warrior.

2.2. The Musical Significance of the Psalter.

The dynamic of the Psalter is its movement between the two poles of revelation and response. This is clearly evident in Psalm 136, which praises God for who he is (Ps 136:1-3), followed by his works in creation (Ps 136:4-9) and redemption (Ps 136:10-24). The worshiper's response is a series of refrains in every verse that thoroughly saturate the psalm. This dynamic comes to musical expression when the psalmist claims that his song is from the Lord himself (Ps 40:3) and thus is offered back God as something even more pleasing than the sacrificial offering of animals (Ps 69:30-31). The musical ministry of the Levites appointed by David is described as prophetic and thus of divine impetus (1 Chron 25:1-8). Even in lament the psalmist can identify his own prayer as God's "song" that is with him through the night (Ps 42:8; cf. Job 35:10). Even the Lord's statutes become the psalmist's "song" (Ps 119:54). According to J. H. Eaton (104), "Music is from the Lord and for the Lord."

The music of the Psalter is not simply an aesthetic adornment; it is participation in the ongoing musical praise in the universe. The psalms describe this praise in the widest possible terms. Not only are Israel and the nations called to praise God (Ps 99:1-5), but also heavenly beings (the "sons of God" and "angels") take part (Ps 29:1; 103:20; 148:2; cf. Job 38:7). Most striking, however, is the praise that arises from creation itself. The phrase "the heavens declare the glory of God" (Ps 19:1) could be taken as a metonymy for the inhabitants of the heavens were it not for the poetic parallel line that adds specificity: "the sky [rāqia^c, lit., 'firmament'] proclaims the works of his hand" but without words (Ps 19:4). In Psalm 57:8 the psalmist says that he will use stringed instruments to awaken the dawn, presumably so that it too may join him in praise. In Psalm 65:12-13 the pastures, hills, meadows and valleys sing praises to God because he has lavishly blessed them with rain and abundance. The seas, world, rivers and hills join with God's people in a psalm that calls for praise to the Lord with singing and musical instruments in a "new song" (Ps 98:1), which probably is a technical term for a victory song (Longman and Reid, 45). The crescendo of this universal symphony rises from Psalm 148, which calls on practically every conceivable member of creation to praise the Lord: not only people of all ages and status but also angelic beings, celestial bodies, both wild and domestic animals that move on land and in the sea and air, trees of the field and forest, plus the inanimate elements of nature, lightning, hail, snow, clouds and fierce wind. The lyrical music of the Psalter is thus not only a fitting way for the faithful to respond to the Lord's creative and redemptive acts but also an integrated part of the perpetual *hymn of praise generated from the entirety of heaven and earth.

3. Music and Song of Songs.

Apart from the book's title, there is no explicit connection between Song of Songs and actual music in ancient Israel. Unlike the psalms, here there are no musical or liturgical notations. The book never mentions any musical instruments, nor does it suggest any particular social setting for its performance. The phrase "season of singing" (Song 2:12) is the only reference to music within the book, and it yields no knowledge of whether or not Song of Songs itself was ever performed, let alone by whom or for what reasons. The book is clearly poetic and presents dialogue between two (or possibly three) persons as well as refrains from a group, which interpreters sometimes refer to as a "chorus."

The history of interpretation of Song of Songs shows extreme variety but with a clear interest in the meanings of the poems themselves rather than the book's social location or function as a musical song. For example, Rabbi Aki-ba (c. AD 50-135) strongly rejected the singing of this text with literal reference to its sexuality. He preferred to construe the book in terms of God's loving relationship to Israel. In early Christian interpretation Origen (AD 185-253/54) understood the book as a wedding song in dramatic form but was far more interested in its allegorical, "spiritual meaning." To call Song of Songs a drama, however, is not to equate it with performance in the theater. The text has been performed as an oratorio in modern times, but this says nothing of its ancient genre. Its classification as a cantata or operetta is not only highly questionable on literary grounds but also is anachronistic. Some of the poems are similar to songs sung at Arab weddings (see Wasf), but the lasting insight from this observation is that most likely the primary sense of Song of Songs has to do with human love. The poems have been compared with the "sacred marriage" texts of Mesopotamia, but of all the lyrical literature of the ancient Near East, Song of Songs bears greatest similarity to love songs from Ramesside Egypt (1305-1150 BC). The strength of this connection makes it probable that the book is a structured anthology of love songs that were originally performed in nonreligious settings as musical entertainment.

The eventual canonical status of the book testifies to its great theological value. In summary, regardless of how and on what occasions Song of Songs may have been sung in antiquity, the book lyrically celebrates the nature and physical expression of romantic love between a man and a woman who are together made in the image of God, the ultimate focus of true praise.

4. Suggestions for Further Consideration.

We can read and interpret the musical texts of the Bible, understanding them as best we can within their literary and cultural contexts, but there is a dimension of music that is more evident in personal experience than description. Certainly, we must be careful to avoid projecting our modern knowledge of music and the social settings in which it occurs back into the biblical world, but we must also eschew a minimalist approach that entertains only what can be affirmed. By its nature, music is creative and depends on imagination in order to thrive. The present article therefore concludes with some thoughts about music and song in relation to composers, performers and audiences. They are offered not as verified conclusions but rather as suggestions for further consideration.

Music itself is a type of language. The practice of pairing the mood, style and other characteristics of music to lyrics is known as "text painting." Composers tend to do this, whether formally or informally. We cannot know for certain how or by what principles biblical composers set their worship texts to music, but we do know that their subject was lofty and worthy of their best efforts, and praise of God's nature and redemptive acts on their behalf gave ultimate meaning to their existence as God's covenant people. Whether in the roles of composers or performers, accomplished musicians do not slavishly receive or repeat a tradition. They participate and contribute with skill, energy and imagination. Perhaps in their own human way, biblical musicians sought to tap into ever-running hymns of praise, offered to God in the heavenly court or even by nature itself.

Music is often noted for its emotional affect, but the use of music in praise also tends to focus attention away from oneself to the nature and acts of God, thus functioning to transport one's thoughts to another realm. The act of singing lends artistic expression to truth and thus has a cognitive function that promotes personal appreciation, approval, assent and adoration. Music activates the powers of memory and thus endures not only through the day and night but also into times of crisis and trial as well as celebration and thanksgiving. Texts set to music often come to life when they are needed most, seemingly pressed into service by life's circumstances.

Music is a vehicle that unites elements within a person, simultaneously activating the eye, ear, body, breath and voice in addition to the verbal aspects of memory and language. The performance of music by groups, either instrumentally or in choral style, affirms the members' essential contributions, connectedness and interdependence. Musicians and singers understand that their musical achievement is synergistic and thus far greater than the sum of its parts.

Those who listen to the music and songs of others may participate mentally through concurrence and perhaps even materially through patronage. Thus they may align themselves with the affirmations of the texts and personal values of the performers, especially when these are deeply held and shared beliefs about God, human nature and the world. Members of an audience may include persons who themselves were once musicians or singers who by choice or necessity no longer perform with a group. Hearing familiar or otherwise classic compositions can have powerful effects on one's sense of memory, relation to God, and cohesion to family and other social networks. Listening to music can be both therapeutic and edifying.

The acts of composition, singing and playing musical instruments are more demanding of time and resources than plain writing and reading. They are highly appropriate expressions of divine service that by proper definition encompasses one's whole being—in short, loving God with the full strength of one's very heart and soul.

See also CULT, WORSHIP: PSALMS; FORM CRITICISM; LYRIC POETRY; ORAL POETRY; PSALMS 5: TITLES; REFRAIN; SOUND PATTERNS.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. L. C. Allen, “𐤒𐤓,” NIDOTTE 1.1116-17; J. Begbie, “Music, the Bible and,” DTIB 521-24; idem, Theology, Music and Time (Cambridge Studies in Christian Doctrine; Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2000); J. Braun, Music in Ancient Israel/Palestine: Archaeological, Written, and Comparative Sources (BIW; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2002); idem, “Musical Instruments,” OEANE 4.70-79; J. H. Eaton, “Music's Place in Worship: A Contribution from the Psalms,” in Prophets, Worship and Theodicy: Studies in Prophetism, Biblical Theology, and Structural and Rhetorical Analysis, and on the Place of Music in Worship; Papers Read at the Joint British-Dutch Old Testament Conference Held at Woudschoten, 1982, ed. A. S. Van der Woude (OtSt 23; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1984) 85-107; M. V. Fox, The Song of Songs and the Ancient Egyptian Love Songs (Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 1985); T. Longman III, Song of Songs (NICOT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2001); T. Longman III and D. Reid, God Is a Warrior (SOTBT; Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1995); J. W. Kleinig, The Lord's Song: The Basis, Function and Significance of Choral Music in Chronicles (JSOTSup 156; Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1993); S. Mowinckel, The Psalms in Israel's Worship, trans. D. R. Ap-Thomas (2 vols.; New York: Abingdon, 1962); E. J. Revell, “The Oldest Evidence for the Hebrew Accent System,” BJRL 54 (1971-1972) 214-22; B. K. Waltke, “Superscripts, Postscripts, or Both,” JBL 110 (1991) 583-96; G. H. Wilson, Psalms, vol. 1 (NIVAC; Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 2002). R. C. Stallman

N

NAOMI

Naomi is one of three major characters in the book of *Ruth. She was the wife of Elimelech, mother of Mahlon and Chilion, mother-in-law of Ruth and Orpah, and grandmother of Obed. According to the genealogy of Ruth 4:18-22, Naomi was the great-great-grandmother of *David. She is mentioned only in the book of Ruth.

Naomi's name is derived from the Hebrew verb nā'ēm, which means "to be pleasant." The meaning of her name contrasts with Naomi's state of mind at the end of Ruth 1. After the death of her husband and sons in Moab, Naomi returned to Bethlehem and asked to be called mārā', which means "bitter." The book of Ruth, though, always refers to her as Naomi.

1. Naomi's Context
2. Naomi's Emptiness
3. Naomi's Scheme
4. Naomi's Fullness

1. Naomi's Context.

The book of Ruth opens with a reference to the days when the judges ruled. The judges followed the events of the conquest as narrated in the book of Joshua and preceded the rise of monarchy in Israel as described in the books of Samuel. The recollection in Ruth 1:1 of the people and events described in the book of Judges sets Naomi in a time of apostasy, injustice and tumult.

Ruth 1:1 additionally says that there was a famine in Israel. Elimelech and Naomi left Bethlehem, which means "house of bread" in Hebrew, and moved to Moab, which had refused to offer bread to the Israelites during the wilderness years (Deut 23:4). What Elimelech's move to Moab signaled about his relationship with Yahweh and the gods of Moab is uncertain.

The meaning of Elimelech's name ("My God is king") stands out in the period of the judges, when there was no king and just about everyone (perhaps even Elimelech) ignored the commands of the divine king (Judg 21:25).

2. Naomi's Emptiness.

Modern readers of Ruth cannot know for sure if Naomi approved of the move to Moab or of her sons' marriages to Moabite women. The Pentateuch warns generally against intermarriage with Gentiles because of the threat of syncretism (e.g., Deut 7) and specifically against friendship with Moab because of its earlier antagonism toward the tribes (Num 22:1-6; 25:1; Deut 23:3-6). The text does not say if Naomi went with her husband reluctantly or favored the move and the marriages. It merely reports that Elimelech, Mahlon and Chilion died in Moab. The reader can infer that Naomi was devastated on several fronts (see Rauber, 29). She grieved the loss of her husband and children. She had no male protector or provider in a male-dominated world. She was an alien in Moab. These circumstances influenced her to respond in an ambiguous way.

On the one hand, Naomi prayed for Yahweh's kindness upon Orpah and Ruth (Ruth 1:8), but such a prayer may have been more formulaic and polite in contexts of departure (Sakenfeld, 24). As far as Naomi could tell, there was nothing more that she could do to secure their present and future. The text does not indicate if she ever considered the possibility of levirate marriage for herself, Orpah, and/or Ruth with *Boaz or the nearer kinsman (see Kinsman-Redeemer and Levirate). What the text explicitly conveys is that Naomi felt unable to repay the kindness of her daughters-in-law and so bade Yahweh's favor upon them (Hubbard, 103).

On the other hand, Naomi wanted to send her daughters-in-law away because she thought that the hand of God was against her, and that they would experience disfavor because of their association with a spiritual pariah. She acknowledged their kindness (hesed) to her (Ruth 1:8-9) but said nothing of Yahweh's kindness to her (Freedman, 29; Tribble, 169). In fact, upon returning to Bethlehem, Naomi alleged that God Almighty had made her life bitter and empty. God supposedly had brought misfortune (lit., "done evil" [Ruth 1:21]) upon her and witnessed against her through the loss of her loved ones. Even more troubling is her instruction to Ruth to return with Orpah to her people and her gods (Block, 639). This piece of maternal advice does not fit well with the earlier blessing in Yahweh's name, and it is unthinkable that a daughter of Abraham would discourage willing Gentiles from being exposed to the means of grace in the covenant community. Naomi's theology may have become eclectic in Moab or perhaps, in the theologically aberrant climate of the judges period, was never well informed.

It is evident that Naomi's circumstances (her grief and predicament) influenced her to develop a hardened view of divine sovereignty (Grant, 432-33). Although the text does not say that God was angry with Naomi or that the famine and deaths were forms of judgment (Freedman, 35; Hubbard, 127), Naomi measured God's goodness by what was happening to her and by how many of her desires were met. Consequently, she did not view her situation as an opportunity to minister to her Gentile daughters-in-law. Ruth 1 also never says that Naomi prayed; instead, she resorted to conventional wisdom and tried to impose it on Orpah and Ruth.

Naomi's situation was not as empty as she thought. Ruth 1:6 says that Yahweh visited his people to provide food, and Ruth 1:22 mentions Naomi's return during the barley harvest. Of course, Ruth's commitment to her eventually brought fullness in the form of gleanings and an heir.

3. Naomi's Scheme.

At the end of Ruth 1 Naomi had no hope for the future and seemingly considered Ruth an inconsequential part of her life. Yahweh allegedly had brought her back empty. By the end of Ruth 2 Naomi had plenty of food for the short term because of Ruth's industriousness and Boaz's generosity. More significantly, Naomi's attitude began to change as she considered the more permanent help that might come from Boaz's interest in Ruth (Ruth 2:19-20).

Still, as many as seven months elapsed between the initial encounter of Ruth and Boaz in Ruth 2 and the meeting on the threshing floor in Ruth 3 (Block, 677). The meeting was Naomi's idea, and she should receive credit for wanting to find a husband for Ruth. Her scheme, though, was fraught with potential disaster.

Naomi told Ruth to bathe, dress, and go to the threshing floor where Boaz was spending the night winnowing his grain. Approaching Boaz on the threshing floor was not a prudent idea. Naomi put Ruth in real danger (Block, 687; LaCocque, 83). Because threshing floors lay outside the town, Ruth could have been abducted on the way and never reached Boaz. Boaz could have taken offense at Ruth's forwardness and refused to have anything more to do with her. Though a man of standing in the community, he could have taken advantage of Ruth and, if necessary, lied about what happened. It seems unlikely that anyone would have believed Ruth's side of the story or even that Naomi would have publicly defended her Moabite daughter-in-law. There was simply no guarantee that Boaz would respond favorably or honorably. Also, someone could have awakened and seen Ruth at Boaz's feet. In the unsavory days of the judges, prostitutes would offer their services at such places (cf. Hos 9:1). Naomi did no one any favor that night. She put both Ruth and Boaz at risk of yielding to temptation or being unjustly accused.

Nevertheless, the providence of God working through the faithfulness of Ruth and Boaz in an awkward setting produced a favorable outcome for the meeting (see Hubbard, 69-70, 195-96). After Ruth 3 Naomi does not speak anymore. She who tried to arrange a marriage and secure her future waited for others to realize her hope.

4. Naomi's Fullness.

The end of Ruth 3 brings the unwelcome news of a kinsman nearer than Boaz. Naomi did not mention him after Ruth returned from her first day of gleaning in Boaz's field. What his relationship to Naomi and Elimelech was is unknown.

On the threshing floor Boaz had indicated his willingness, even desire, to perform the role of kinsman-redeemer. When the nearer kinsman declined, Boaz and Ruth married with the approbation and blessing of the townspeople. Yahweh blessed their union with the birth of a son, Obed. The book of Ruth ends with Naomi holding her grandson, who, by virtue of levirate marriage, was also counted as Elimelech's son and heir. Obed, whose name in Hebrew means "servant," served Naomi by inheriting her husband's property and caring for her in her latter years. He embodied the assurance of God's faithfulness to keep his promises and give his people an inheritance.

The book of Ruth ends with a moving final scene. Naomi, back home in Bethlehem (the house of bread), had enough food to eat and held in her arms a grandson who was also her legal son. She who had accused Yahweh of bringing her back empty now enjoyed life to the full.

See also BOAZ; FEMINIST INTERPRETATION; RUTH 1: BOOK OF; RUTH 4: PERSON; WOMEN.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. D. R. G. Beattie, trans., The Targum of Ruth (ArBib 19; Collegeville, MN: Liturgical Press, 1994); D. I. Block, Judges, Ruth (NAC 6; Nashville: Broadman & Holman, 2002); D. N. Fewell and D. M. Gunn, Compromising Redemption: Relating Characters in the Book of Ruth (Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 1990); A. D. Freedman, "Naomi's Experience of God and Its Treatment in the Book of Ruth," Proceedings of the Eastern Great Lakes and Midwest Biblical Society 23 (2003) 29-38; R. Grant, "Literary Structure in the Book of Ruth," BSac 148 (1991) 424-41; R. L. Hubbard Jr., The Book of Ruth (NICOT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1988); A. LaCocque, Ruth (CC; Minneapolis: Fortress, 2004); D. F. Rauber, "Literary Values in the Bible: The Book of Ruth," JBL 89 (1970) 27-37; K. D. Sakenfeld, Ruth (IBC; Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 1999); P. Trible, God and the Rhetoric of Sexuality (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1978).

D. Ulrich

NARRATIVE. See NOVELLA, STORY, NARRATIVE.

NARRATIVE INTERPRETATION. See HERMENEUTICS.

NEW YEAR FESTIVAL. See CULT, WORSHIP; PSALMS.

NINTH OF AV, FESTIVAL OF. See MEGILLOT AND FESTIVALS.

NONCANONICAL PSALMS. See DEAD SEA SCROLLS.

NOVELLA, STORY, NARRATIVE

*Ruth and *Esther are captivating narratives, as uncertainty and potential danger turn into redemption and deliverance. Although each story is its own self-contained unit, the *intertextual connections to other biblical characters and events are rich. These narratives also raise distinct challenges in regard to language, unity of text, genre, historicity and purpose.

1. Characteristics of Narrative
2. The Question of Genre
3. Function and Purpose of Narrative

1. Characteristics of Narrative.

Good narrative is a complex interweaving of characters, plot and setting presented by the narrator, who speaks from outside the plot, moving it forward by reporting activities, descriptions and dialogue. In most cases the narrator in the biblical text is omniscient, knowing the inner lives of the characters and selectively reporting their thoughts, feelings and intentions. The narrator often is omnipresent, moving easily from one location to another, omnipotent in the domain of the story, and is rarely neutral but instead conveys a moral and ethical tone, passing judgment on characters and events (Sternberg, 84-128).

1.1. Narrative Technique. Narrative technique indicates the way the language is used to convey meaning (Gunn and Fewell, 147-57). Important features include sentence structure, word order, word choice, verbal forms and repetition. When Esther informed the king of Haman's treachery, the narrator introduces his response with "Then King Ahasuerus said, and he said to Queen Esther . . ." (Esther 7:5). The awkward repetition of "said" works very well to indicate the "sputtering" of the king. He was so shocked that he had to catch his breath and start all over again.

The dominant word in Ruth 1 is return, as it is the essence of *Naomi's charge to Orpah and Ruth, her own homeward-bound intention, and Ruth's choice to return with her. These initial events shape the rest of the book. Throughout Esther there is an overabundance of word pairs, sets of statements and requests, and indications of parallel events. These commence with excessive doublets in the description of the opulent and officious Persian court (Esther 1). At several key points dyads are replaced by triplets, most notably in the context of the decrees sanctioning and effecting violence (Esther 3:13; 7:4; 8:11). They in turn give way to fourfold verbal “strings” of jubilation (Esther 8:16; 9:19, 22). Parallel events shape the comprehensive *chiastic structure that ties together the entire book, emphasizes the theme of reversal from the threat of annihilation to the festive joy and rest (Esther 9:1), and finds its center in the insomnia of the king (Esther 6:1), a development entirely outside the scheming of the human characters.

A second notable linguistic feature of Esther is the predominance of passive verb forms in critical contexts. Esther’s early appearances are almost exclusively described in this manner; she is acted upon by larger, nameless forces. This same anonymity has a wider circle than just Esther and the young women. It pervades the court scenes of the narrative, divesting the bureaucracy of accountability. The passive forms allow for ambiguity in regard to who is responsible for what transpires.

Narrators often use irony to introduce complications that destabilize traditional perceptions (Gunn and Fewell, 55). Famine in the land around Bethlehem (“house of bread”) hints at the disobedience of the covenant people that had brought them to such a state, even though the idyllic narrative in Ruth is a distinct contrast to the spiritual darkness in the book of Judges. Esther, an orphan and an alien with no voice in regard to her presence in the overindulgent Persian court, effected sweeping empire-wide changes.

1.2. Characterization. S. Bar-Efrat (93) has called character and plot the soul and body of narrative. Major characters may be round, flat or functionary (Berlin, 23). Round characters are dynamic and evidence fullness, change and complexity. Readers are given windows into their thoughts and emotions. By way of contrast, we know much less of the inner lives of flat characters. Both Esther and Haman represent round characters. Esther’s personality is complicated, as she appears to develop from acquiescent to boldly challenging and yet from the outset demonstrates a courage that defies passivity. The character of Haman centers on his alternately inflated and wounded ego, which is fully on display. *Mordecai, on the other hand, is opaque, and the reader is left to guess as to his motives for the determinative action of defying the king’s order to prostrate himself before Haman.

Minor functionary characters, also called agents or helpers, contribute significantly to narrative movement. Their configuration at the beginning often creates absence. The deaths of Elimelech, Mahlon and Chilion necessitated the eventual appearance of the *kinsman-redeemer in the person of *Boaz. It was essential that *Vashti be banished from the Persian court before Esther could even enter the narrative scene. Minor characters are present agents as well. The people of Bethlehem represented the social context in which hesed was practiced by Boaz and Ruth. In Esther the functionaries in the Persian court played a key role in making up the mind of the king.

Naming is definitive. In Esther Mordecai is repeatedly called “the Jew,” while Haman is “the Agagite,” both designated as outsiders in the Persian court and both representative of parties to a long-standing ethnic conflict. Likewise, the text emphasizes that Ruth was a Moabite woman, one not welcome in the congregation of Israel (Deut 23:3). This affected how the Bethlehem community would perceive and receive her and adds to the tension regarding the genealogy of *David (Gunn and Fewell, 58; Berlin, 86-88).

The outward appearances of biblical characters are rarely described in detail (Berlin, 34). Therefore, Esther’s extraordinary beauty, described with a pair of doublets, signifies that she had no chance of escaping the roundup of young virgins. Likewise, specific references to donning attire or changing clothing carried messages. Ruth not only put on her best clothes in accordance with Naomi’s instructions (Ruth 3:3) but also, on her own, requested that Boaz spread the “wing” of his garment over her (Ruth 3:9), indicating the protection of the redeemer. Although the narrative does not directly reveal Mordecai’s thoughts, his refusal to abandon his mourning clothes (Esther 4:4) and his later assumption of royal dress (Esther 8:15) are indirect windows into his intentions.

By way of contrast, the moral nature of biblical narrative is evident in the concern to represent characters as righteous and good, or evil and disobedient. Mordecai’s actions in his role as Esther’s guardian indicated his steadfast nature (Esther 2:11). The reader is introduced to Boaz as a worthy man even before his name is given (Ruth 2:1). Boaz in turn affirmed Ruth's strength of character in dialogue with her, describing her self-sacrifice in returning to Bethlehem with Naomi (Ruth 2:11-12) and declaring that her actions were guided by hesed (Ruth 3:10).

Dialogue in biblical narratives is an essential mechanism for both characterization and for moving the plot along. Out of the eighty-five verses in Ruth, more than fifty are dialogue. Naomi's forthright declaration of her own bitterness of soul in her utter bereavement (Ruth 1:13, 20-21) was the backdrop for Ruth's extraordinary devotion. It is significant that the first words that Ruth uttered were her declaration of allegiance (Ruth 1:16-17). Dialogue may be interior, as exemplified in the inner workings of Haman's ego as he presumed to identify himself as the "man the king wishes to honor" (Esther 6:6-9). It appears in mediated speech as the eunuch Hathach assisted in the "conversation" between Mordecai and Esther once the decree of annihilation had been published (Esther 4:5-16). The mediation slows the exchange, giving ample narrative time to establish Esther's determination and resolve.

1.3. Plot Development. The events that make up a narrative are linked in terms of both time and causality, providing a meaningful structure for what otherwise might seem to be random occurrences (Gunn and Fewell, 101-5). There is a starting point, a series of complicating relationships and events, and a resolution to the conflict or problem. The exposition sets up the situation and reveals in a microcosm what is important. That Bethlehem in Judah and Moab are mentioned twice in Ruth 1:1-2 indicates that a major theme of this story is foreignness. The name "Elimelech" ("My God is king"), likewise mentioned twice (Ruth 1:1-3), is equally important, as his name had to be carried on after his death. In Esther the extravagant Persian court was the setting from which Vashti was dismissed. What might appear in the early stages of a narrative to be extraneous is found later to be essential. It was Mordecai's unacknowledged discovery of the assassination plot (Esther 2:21-23) that later turned the whole tide of events around.

Each of the events is selected and shaped to contribute to the unity and coherence of the story; in good narrative they crescendo toward the complication and its resolution. Individual biblical narratives combine to form "salvation history" (Gunn and Fewell, 48). In Ruth provision of someone to carry on the name of the house of Elimelech has a greater meaning in the line of Judah, David and Jesus. After the crisis of the exile the people of God in the Diaspora were spared annihilation as a result of the courage of Esther and Mordecai.

1.4. Setting. In regard to the setting of a narrative, both temporal and spatial issues are significant. Bar-Efrat (141-58) distinguished between external and internal time. The former indicates the period in which a narrative occurred. For Ruth this would be the period of the Judges, while for Esther it was the Persian Empire. In each case the story establishes those connections with the outside temporal world at the outset. Within the narrative, however, there are also chronological indicators that pace the story. Internal time is flexible, moving rapidly in some cases and slowing down in others. Specific time indicators, such as "when they had lived there about ten years" (Ruth 1:4), move the narrative quickly. Flashbacks and abrupt movements compress it. In contrast, conversation and description slow down narrated time. Most of Ruth 2 is devoted to Boaz and Ruth becoming acquainted as she was gleaning in his field.

The biblical text is replete with geographical references, and these narratives are no exception. The country of Moab, located east of the Dead Sea, was not as drastically affected by famine as was the country of Judah. Esther opens in the citadel of *Susa, where Xerxes was showing off his power and wealth to representatives from the large number of provinces under Persian control. Generally in biblical narrative specific places are not extensively described. That makes the first chapter of Esther especially dramatic.

2. The Question of Genre.

The nature of the narratives of Ruth and Esther as they have been briefly described is a necessary starting point for exploring the wide range of opinions about their genre. Unfortunately, the designations that have been applied to these texts are brought to the study from outside the literary context of the Semitic world and are often not accurately applied (Bush, 33). Terms such as novella, folktale, idyll and romance for Ruth, and novella, festival etiology, legend, wisdom tale, farce and burlesque for Esther come from European literary contexts. There are reasons for suggesting each, but all of them imply that the works are primarily fiction, driving a wedge between literary art and historical veracity. Strikingly absent from most attempts to assign genre to these texts is the designation historical narrative. Nevertheless, it is important to entertain that possibility.

2.1. Novella, Short Story, Historical Narrative. Fully lodged in the category of fiction, a novella is a prose composition intended to entertain and edify. Shorter than a novel, it focuses on dramatic action, development of characters with personality, and dialogue. There are differences of opinion in regard to the form and content boundaries between novella, short narrative tale and historical narrative. According to W. L. Humphreys (82), a novella is a crafted literary work that is too short to be a novel and too long to be a short story. It is fiction, telling not what happened but rather “what happens.” Further, whereas the novella develops character, the short story simply reveals it. The short-story form in Israel had its own conventions and style, focusing on the normal concerns of life and demonstrating that the sphere where human activity took place was also where God was at work (Campbell, 90-93). There is an unmistakable emphasis on the sovereignty of God as the story unfolds.

2.2. Reliable Narrative Historiography. The style of the Esther narrative, with its concern for dates, numbers, names and procedures, indicates that it was intended to be read as history. In many details the correspondence between Esther and extrabiblical sources is remarkable, a point conceded by most scholars. Given the careful representations in Ruth and Esther of their geographical and historical contexts, the best label, especially for Esther, might simply be “historical narrative.” Although this runs counter to the presumption on the part of much of scholarship that literary artistry and historical reliability cannot coexist (see Provan, Long and Longman, 75-97), the essence of these narratives is the provision by God for the deepest needs of individuals and whole communities when they were in dire straits. That message of hope is severely diminished if the providential interventions of God are merely inspirational fiction. In that case, God has turned from “the lord of history into a creature of the imagination, with the most disastrous results” (Sternberg, 32).

3. Function and Purpose of Narrative.

Narratives provide structures for articulating worldviews and giving meaning to reality. They are didactic, often designed to convey information (Provan, Long and Longman, 81). The story of Esther authenticated the annual celebration of *Purim commemorating the deliverance of Jews across the empire from annihilation. Esther was to be read annually so that Israelites would relive blotting out the memory of their archenemy. This emphasis was particularly important because Purim, unlike the major Jewish festivals, had not been instituted at Sinai (see Megillot and Festivals).

Storytelling is a discipline that brings order to human experience, teaches morality, and offers criticism (Gunn and Fewell, 1-2). Reading Ruth and Esther means probing the cultural and ethnic conflicts and potential injustices that are embedded in the stories. In spite of ambiguity regarding whether or not Ruth is an example of levirate marriage, the related issues of redemption of land and restoration of family name are central. The Esther narrative is the one biblical text focused solely on life in the Diaspora. Unlike the rest of the postexilic literature that emphasizes return to the land, this narrative presents the complexities involved with the choice to remain in the dispersion and the vulnerability of those Diaspora communities. The ubiquitous verbal dualities also may reinforce the theme of dual loyalty with which Jews in the Diaspora context have always wrestled.

At the same time, all biblical narrative is designed to bring the reader to a further understanding of the sovereign and covenant God, even though this main character is planted behind the scenes of these particular narratives as they deal with the concerns of life in Bethlehem and Susa. Numerous providential coincidences are lodged in contexts that demanded responsible and faithful human choices and action. Ruth clearly teaches about hesed, the role of the kinsman-redeemer, and the larger socio-theological matter of redemption. The divine silence in Esther compels God's people to choose between the imperfect alternatives that arise in the real ambiguities of life, just as Esther and Mordecai did. At the same time, people of faith are confident that God will address injustice and suffering and will preserve his people in his wisdom and in his time.

See also ESTHER 1: BOOK OF; FORM CRITICISM;

FRAME NARRATIVE; HISTORICAL CRITICISM; RHETORICAL CRITICISM; RUTH 1: BOOK OF.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. R. Alter, The Art of Biblical Narrative (New York: Basic Books, 1981); S. Bar-Efrat, Narrative Art in the Bible (JSOTSup 70; Sheffield: Almond, 1989); A. Berlin, Poetics and Interpretation of Biblical Narrative (BLS 9; Sheffield: Almond, 1983); F. Bush, Ruth, Esther (WBC 9; Dallas: Word, 1996); E. F. Campbell Jr., "The Hebrew Short Story: A Study of Ruth," in A Light unto My Path: Old Testament Studies in Honor of Jacob M. Myers, ed. H. Bream, R. Heim and C. Moore (GTS 4; Philadelphia: Temple University Press, 1974) 83-101; D. M. Gunn and D. N. Fewell, Narrative in the Hebrew Bible (OBS; Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1993); W. L. Humphreys, "Novella," in Saga, Legend, Tale, Novella, Fable: Narrative Forms in Old Testament Literature, ed. G. Coats (JSOTSup 35; Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1985) 82-96; J. D. Levenson, Esther (OTL; Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 1997); S.

Niditch, "Legends of Wise Heroes and Heroines: I. Esther, II. Ruth," in The Hebrew Bible and Its Modern Interpreters, ed. D. Knight and G. Tucker (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1985) 445-56; I. Provan, V. P. Long and T. Longman III, A Biblical History of Israel (Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 2003) 75-93; M. D. Simon, "Many Thoughts in the Heart of Man . . .": Irony and Theology in the Book of Esther," Tradition 31 (1997) 5-27; M. Sternberg, The Poetics of Biblical Narrative: Ideological Literature and the Drama of Reading (ILBS; Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1987); F. S. Weiland, "Historicity, Genre, and Narrative Design in the Book of Esther," BSac 159 (2002a) 151-65; idem, "Plot Structure in the Book of Esther," BSac 159 (2002b) 277-87; idem, "Literary Conventions in the Book of Esther," BSac 159 (2002c) 425-35; idem, "Literary Clues to God's Providence in the Book of Esther," BSac 160 (2003) 34-47. E. Phillips

ONOMATOPOEIA. See SOUND PATTERNS.

ORAL POETRY

Oral poetry may be defined as poetry composed in a nonliterate setting without the aid of the resources for writing, despite the potential availability of such resources. Obviously, however, stating a definition is problematic. Although the definition above focuses on composition, assessing oral quality or nature may involve consideration not only of composition but also of transmission and preservation, as well as a multitude of scenarios involving the possible intersection of oral and literate activity in all three of these areas. In short, any understanding of oral poetry must contend with at least two nagging questions. First, if the material originally was oral, why, and how, did it eventually become written? Second, what indicators in this written material give evidence that it once was oral? (For an early, broad-based treatment, see Finnegan, 7-24; for a later, summary treatment focused on the Hebrew Bible, see Niditch, 5-6.) The second question has been the focus of the vast majority of research in the area, and the short answer to that question has been that formulaic language in the written form reflects an oral heritage; however, although scholarship as a whole affirms that biblical poetry is formulaic in some sense, no such consensus exists that formulaic nature equals orality.

1. Oral Poetry and Oral Culture
2. Oral Formulaic Theory
3. Hebrew Word Pairs and Orality
4. Hebrew Poetry and Orality
5. Current State
6. Future Prospects

1. Oral Poetry and Oral Culture.

The common assumption is that the ancient world out of which biblical poetry would have come reflected primarily an oral culture. Certainly, writing was developed very early, but that activity apparently was limited to a select few so that the vast majority of the populations would not have been able to write or read. Scholarly work as early as the eighteenth century reflects the idea that the Hebrew Bible either includes epic pieces or that at least some of those materials are based on older, underlying poetic epic materials (Conroy, 2-15). Even though this particular theory is supported by little hard evidence, the idea that Hebrew poetic materials were oral in nature, at least at their beginnings, is not hard to imagine. Much research has focused on the subject of possible oral antecedents of the biblical materials, with the work of Hermann Gunkel being perhaps the best-known and most influential example (Gunkel, 3-9). The problem arises in trying to make more specific statements about the nature of those materials, the nature of the production of those materials, or about the nature of the evidence for such materials and their production.

2. Oral Formulaic Theory.

Although consideration of the possible oral nature of biblical materials does not owe its origins to the area of study called "oral-formulaic theory" (more recently, "oral theory"), the area of study has been influenced greatly by it. The theory, in brief, is that consistent formulaic style in written documents from ancient times signals that the material in the documents originally was oral in nature. This theory historically is credited primarily to two scholars, M. Parry and his student and protégée A. Lord (Foley, 11-17).

Parry's analysis of the works of Homer led him to the conclusion that the majority of the material was formulaic; that is, it consisted primarily of ready-made phrases used to express typical themes that in combination with other themes constituted the larger stories. This conclusion, in turn, led him to theorize that the nature and style of the material indicated that it had been composed orally, by itinerant poets/singers, in spontaneous performances before live audiences. In addition, although the poets/singers could display creativity and innovation, the vast majority of their material's content was traditional in nature, drawn from a widely known stock of formulas and themes passed on orally from person to person, from generation to generation, in these acts of performance.

Parry was not content to simply posit a reasonable theory; he wanted to validate it, if possible. So beginning in 1933 he did field studies in Yugoslavia among traditional Serbo-Croatian storytellers, resulting in the discovery of remarkable parallels between the more modern stories and storytellers and their characteristics and those of the Homeric works, so much so that he considered his earlier theory validated. However, Parry's life and work were cut short by a tragic accident, and Albert Lord continued his work, culminating in his monumental The Singer of Tales (1960), which set forth the theory and its evidence in a clear and compelling fashion.

Although oral-formulaic theory was a revolutionary development in the field, from the beginning the theory has had detractors, and its form has evolved over the years. Even Lord himself has been open to adjusting some definitions, understandings and applications. Nevertheless, its influence has been constant not only in the field of Homeric studies but also in comparative literature studies and, to a more limited extent, biblical studies.

3. Hebrew Word Pairs and Orality.

Perhaps the most fruitful area in biblical poetics for an application of the distinctive nature of oral theory developed in connection with the long-standing recognition of ubiquitous *parallelism in Hebrew verse. Although Parry's work in Homeric epic, with its emphasis on the metrical utility of narrative orality, received its just share of critique, the assumption of orality continued to garner support from ongoing textual work in a variety of ancient literary settings.

Taking R. Lowth's classic formulation of parallelism as a starting point, a number of biblical scholars during the first quarter of the twentieth century noted the presence of poetic convention much like that of the Hebrew Bible in diverse writings of the ancient Near East. Perhaps the most significant find was the discovery of fixed word pairs extant in the parallel lines of both biblical Hebrew and Ugaritic literature. H. L. Ginsberg first documented various examples of these "standing pairs" in several articles published in the 1930s (Ginsberg and Maisler, 248 n. 15; Ginsberg 1935, 327; 1936, 172). An expansion of the work undertaken in the 1940s and 1950s by M. Cassuto and M. Held led to the suggestion by the latter of a hypothetical "dictionary of parallel words" available to Semitic poets for use in the composition of traditional hymnic materials (Cassuto 1943; 1947; Held).

A brief example of these word pairs should suffice. Particular words for "mountains" and "hills" or "silver" and "gold" were observed repeatedly in successive lines of Hebrew and Ugaritic verse. Without regard to content or context, the presence of the first appeared to guarantee essentially the positioning of the second. With a rhythmic regularity, an evocation of the "mountains" brought about an echo of the "hills," or for "silver" the companion mention of "gold," in the highly stylized structure of poetic parallelism. The prevalence of such phenomena led to a certain expectation of the word pair as a fixed expression. Such fixed pairs abound throughout the Hebrew and Ugaritic corpora.

An increasing interest in orality and the use of formulaic language eventually intersected with the compositional convention of word pairs in the study of Hebrew poetry. In the 1960s two scholars attempted to establish a foundational connection between oral theory and parallel word pairs in positing a biblical "oral poetry." S. Gevirtz (10) suggested that traditional language such as the fixed pair or, in his words, "cliché" served a mnemonic function in furthering the compositional utility of an essentially oral art. W. Whallon (153-54) surmised that rather than aiding the poet's memory in performance, traditional word pairs facilitated the oral poet's spontaneous creation of parallelism with its own brand of "impressive elegance." A third scholar, R. Culley (32), expanded the concept of formulaic language beyond the limitation of the "word pair" proper to include a catalog of repeated phrases "a line long" in the poet's oral arsenal. Each of these studies in some unique way evoked the work of Parry and his assumption of orality as the driving force behind ancient epic literature.

With the importance of word pairs firmly established in the burgeoning lexicon of oral poetry, the decade of the 1970s witnessed both the broadening of a philosophical basis for the supposed orality of biblical Hebrew poetics and a growing consensus toward caution in light of the highly speculative nature of such pursuits. P. Yoder (480-81) sought to equate "A-B pairs" with Parry's definition of formula, exchanging the formal requirement of *meter for parallelism, and thereby to identify the use of traditional word pairs as the common stock of the oral poet. M. Dahood (78-86) aimed to recover the "Canaanite thesaurus" underlying the Ugaritic and Hebrew texts as a tool for textual criticism and exegesis. R. Coote (60), while affirming parallel pairs as a "conventional resource" of the oral poet, challenged the fixed nature of the word pair in its fundamental formulation. W. Watters (142-47) demonstrated that the word pair not only was the dominant formulaic expression in Hebrew poetry but also was characteristic of both oral and written literature and implied that as such it should not be styled the champion of orality in the biblical corpus. Such caution also was echoed during the latter half of the decade in the works of D. Freedman (12-13) and P. Craigie (56). The rise of linguistic research, which emphasizes the grammatical aspects of parallelism, and the recognition of limitations within the inherently theoretical framework for assumed orality contributed to a stagnation of exploration into the nature of fixed word pairs during the 1980s (Berlin, 157). In light of the erudite dismantling of Lowth's basic premise of parallelism by J. Kugel in The Idea of Biblical Poetry, prospects for a revival of interest in word pairs and orality appear unlikely.

4. Hebrew Poetry and Orality.

Efforts to sift through the poetic materials of the Hebrew Bible in hopes of finding hard evidence of orality have failed to produce a convincing case for the existence of an expressly oral residue. As noted above, the presence of formulaic language in Hebrew verse, whether at the line or phrase level, offers only a hint of oral convention, particularly in light of the use of formulas in undoubtedly written compositions (i.e., *acrostic psalms). Even fixed word pairs, which appear as a logical extension of the oral poet's craft, may be simply the result of a colloquial characteristic of human communication, as likely to occur in the conventional creation of literature as the spontaneous tradition of oral performance. Perhaps most troubling for an estimation of biblical orality is the nature of the materials themselves, ranging from collections of *wisdom in various forms to a limited corpus of short, anonymous *hymns betraying an uncertain provenance.

One example of the difficulty associated with the application of oral theory to the poetics of the Hebrew Bible may be discerned in a cursory examination of the several compositions in the Psalter (Pss 47; 93; 96—99) identified by S. Mowinckel as enthronement psalms (Mowinckel, 1.106-92). Since the vast majority of work in oral poetry has focused on *Psalms, this grouping of related songs (see Music, Song) may be understood as representative not only of other poetic materials in the broader context of the Hebrew *canon but also of the suggested oral history that stands behind such literary activity. On the surface, notable features of the enthronement psalms recommend recourse to orality as an explanation for a shared sensibility of divine sovereignty. The form-critical category itself is based on the presence of formulaic language, "the Lord reigns." Similarity in vocabulary ("king," "throne," "holy"), stock phrases ("all the earth"), use of repetition ("sing praises" in Ps 47, "the floods" in Ps 93, "ascribe" in Ps 96) and the presence of fixed word pairs ("peoples/nations") at the surface level all point to an oral origin. One might suggest that psalms of this sort could have been composed extemporaneously by skilled oral artisans for an ancient annual festival of reaffirmation exalting the kingship of Yahweh (see Kingship Psalms). Further, one may suppose that this group of psalms circulated orally for years among the traditions of ancient Israel, eventually becoming encoded at the hand of the poet or some scribal assistant to preserve their artistry or even prevent their loss. Yet despite the compelling attraction of such speculation, these psalms are extant only as members of a literary collection that allows no easy access to its compositional roots or to the history of its individual components, save an occasional attribution (sons of Korah in Ps 47 [see Asaph and Sons of Korah]) or parallel presentation (1 Chron 16 in Ps 96). Thus, regardless of the role of orality in the composition or preservation of these particular psalms, their substantial contribution to the canon of Hebrew Scriptures remains as a written witness to the majesty of Israel's God and King.

5. Current State.

Despite the fact that the subject of orality is commonly broached in the larger field of biblical studies, recent studies in Hebrew poetry show little focus on the issue of orality, apparently reflecting the perspective that considering the possible oral nature either is unimportant to reading and interpreting the material or at least is not essential to doing so. One may propose a number of reasons for this fact. (1) Notwithstanding an early flourish of work on biblical poetry and orality, no sustained trend in this direction ever materialized, and such study seems to have developed little since the assessment by R. Coote in 1976. (2) Oral poetry is ethereal in nature, and so identifying "oral poetry" via written material with confidence is quite difficult because of the challenge of establishing truly objective criteria for identifying it and of determining any objective method for isolating and interpreting it. (3) There has been a growing focus on the Bible as literature with a concomitant focus on appreciation of the final form of the material along with its "inherent" qualities and style. With this approach to poetry, the study begins with an assumption of all-encompassing artistry, proceeds with close reading that exposes key words and devices, patterns and structures, and concludes with suggestions of meaning evident in the texture, form and content of given texts.

6. Future Prospects.

The scenario described above seems to require this question: What value would consideration of a proposed oral nature add to the study of Hebrew poetry? Perhaps the best answer is to refer to the proposal by S. Niditch (6, 24) that an oral aesthetic or mentality permeates the biblical material as a whole. Although establishing a clear and firm methodology for recognizing and analyzing the oral aspects of biblical poetry seems impossible at present, embracing an assumption of remnant orality will allow readers to approach the texts with a healthy sensitivity to all characteristics of the material, including possible oral aspects. That sensitivity has potential to help inform current literary, linguistic approaches to biblical poetry. Perhaps it can also precipitate some continuing innovative attempts to clarify the nature and value of the oral qualities of those materials that in turn could lead to better reading and deeper understanding. Given the common assumption of the oral background for many if not most biblical materials, such an approach would seem only logical.

See also CULT, WORSHIP: PSALMS; FORM CRITICISM; LYRIC POETRY; METER; PARALLELISM; POETICS, TERMINOLOGY OF; SOUND PATTERNS; WISDOM POEMS; WORDPLAY.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. A. Berlin, "Parallelism," ABD 5.155-62; M. Cassuto, "Biblical Literature and Ugaritic Literature," Tarbiz 14 (1943) 1; idem, "Parallel Words in Hebrew and Ugaritic," Le'Onenu 15 (1947) 97-102; C. Conroy, "Hebrew Epic: Historical Notes and Critical Reflections," Bib 61 (1980) 1-30; R. Coote, "The Application of Oral Theory to Biblical Hebrew Literature," Semeia 5 (1976) 51-64; P. Craigie, "The Problem of Parallel Word Pairs in Ugaritic and Hebrew Poetry," Semitics 5 (1977) 48-58; R. Culley, Oral Formulaic Language in the Biblical Psalms (Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1967); M. Dahood, with T. Penar, "Ugaritic-Hebrew Parallel Pairs," in Ras Shamra Parallels: The Texts from Ugarit and the Hebrew Bible, ed. L. Fisher (3 vols.; AnOr 49; Rome: Pontificum Institutum Biblicum, 1972) 1.71-387; R. Finnegan, Oral Poetry: Its Nature, Significance and Social Context (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1977); J. Foley, Oral-Formulaic Theory and Research: An Introduction and Annotated Bibliography (New York: Garland, 1985); D. Freedman, "Pottery, Poetry, and Prophecy: An Essay on Biblical Poetry," JBL 96 (1977) 5-26; S. Gevirtz, Patterns in the Early Poetry of Israel (SAOC 32; Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1963); H. L. Ginsberg, "The Victory of the Land-God over the Sea God," JPOS 15 (1935) 327-33; idem, "The Rebellion and Death of Ba'lu," Or 5 (1936) 172-80; H. L. Ginsberg and B. Maisler, "Semitized Hurrians in Syria and Palestine," JPOS 14 (1934) 248-60; H. Gunkel, Genesis, trans. Mark E. Biddle (Mercer Library of Biblical Studies; Macon, GA: Mercer University Press, 1997); M. Held, "More Parallel Word Pairs in the Bible and in the Ugaritic Documents," Leshonenu 18/19 (1952-1954) 144-60; J. Kugel, The Idea of Biblical Poetry: Parallelism and Its History (New Haven: Yale University Press, 1981); A. Lord, The Singer of Tales

(New York: Atheneum, 1973); S. Mowinckel, The Psalms in Israel's Worship, trans. D. R. Ap-Thomas (2 vols.; Nashville: Abingdon, 1962); S. Niditch, Oral World and Written Word: Ancient Israelite Literature (LAI; Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 1996); M. Parry, The Making of Homeric Verse: the Collected Papers of Milman Parry, ed. A. Parry (New York: Oxford University Press, 1987); W. Watson, Classical Hebrew Poetry: A Guide to Its Techniques (JSOTSup 26; Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1984); W. Watters, Formula Criticism and the Poet- ry of the Old Testament (BZAW 138; Berlin: de Gruyter, 1976); W. Whallon, Formula, Character, and Context: Studies in Homeric, Old English, and Old Testament Poetry (Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 1969); P. Yoder, "A-B Pairs and Oral Composition in Hebrew Poetry," VT 21 (1971) 470-89.

W. E. Brown and J. J. Rankin

ORALITY. See ORAL POETRY.

P

PALACE. See ARCHITECTURE.

PARADISE. See CREATION THEOLOGY.

PARALLELISM

Generally speaking, parallelism is the term used by scholars to describe the congruence (or lack thereof) of comparable elements in corresponding lines of Hebrew poetry. Many believe that this binary-like phenomenon, including the relationship that it creates or maintains between poetic lines, is a defining, if not the definitive, characteristic of biblical poetry. Vigorous debate continues, however, regarding the precise nature of parallelism, its structures and types, how best to describe it, and how (or even if) it communicates meaning within a poem.

1. Two Points of Entry
2. Parallelism: A Brief History of a Biblical Idea
3. "Theological Parallelism"
4. Parallelism and the Canon of Scripture
5. Conclusion

1. Two Points of Entry.

Two recent definitions of parallelism offer instructive starting points into the discussion. The first is by G. Wilson (39):

The sense of . . . [parallelism] is that after the statement of an initial line, a second (and sometimes a third) line is generated that shares some obvious grammatical-structural similarities with the first and yet redirects the focus of the first through alternate words and expression. The close grammatical-structural similarity between lines provides continuity that emphasizes the parallel character of the two lines, while the distinctive phraseology of each phrase lifts the phenomenon beyond mere repetition and offers the opportunity for expansion or advancement on the original line's meaning.

The basic aspects of this definition might be exemplified by a vast number of poetic lines in the OT. Consider, as one example, Psalm 19:1 [MT 19:2]:

The heavens are recounting the glory of God,
and the firmament proclaims his deed.
(our translation)

The nomenclature differs among scholars, but the first clause can be designated line (or colon or verset) A, and the second clause line (or colon or verset) B. Together, A and B comprise a bicolon. The specific content of the two lines of this bicolon are tightly related: the subjects of the two clauses, "the heavens" and "the firmament," obviously correspond; the verbal roots utilized, "recount" and "proclaim," both speak of communication; and the direct objects, "the glory of God" and "his deed," also relate to one another. This is "the parallel character of the two lines" of which Wilson speaks. But the phraseology is distinctive, as his definition also notes. "The firmament" is a specific aspect of the "heavens" (see Gen 1:1, 6-7); the verbal roots are different; and the movement from God's glory to God's deed may suggest that the former is somehow manifested or revealed in the latter. There is indeed parallelism in Psalm 19:1, and clearly this is not "mere repetition." Instead, when analyzed closely, these two fairly simple lines contribute to a rather dense, though terse, poetic sentiment: the sky, part of God's creation, testifies to God's incomparable nature.

Wilson's definition emphasizes that parallelism must not be misconstrued to mean that all of the elements of one line find exact correspondence in the second. The following definition of parallelism by A. Berlin (2004, 2098-99 [italics added]) is a second useful entry point, clarifying the nature of the lines' relationship:

Parallelism is the pairing of a line (or part of a line) with one or more lines that are in some way linguistically equivalent. The equivalence is often grammatical . . . both parts of the parallelism may have the same syntactic structure. . . . Another form of equivalence is semantic . . . the meaning of the lines is somehow related. . . . [But] equivalence does not imply identity. The second line of parallelism rarely repeats exactly the same words or exactly the same thought as the first; it is more likely to echo, expand, or intensify the idea of the first line in any one of a number of ways.

There are obvious similarities between Wilson's definition and Berlin's, though the latter's notion of linguistic equivalence, encompassing both grammar and semantics, not to mention nonidentity, is more inclusive than Wilson's. This broader and, at the same time, more specific definition of parallelism—it includes grammatical-syntactical correspondence, not simply that of semantics (meaning)—is indicative of much of the current state of research on parallelism. To understand why this is the case and how things have arrived at this point, one needs a sense of how the study of parallelism has changed over the past 250 years.

2. Parallelism: A Brief History of a Biblical Idea.

2.1. R. Lowth and Parallelismus Membrorum.

The modern study of parallelism began in the eighteenth century with the lectures of R. Lowth (1710-1787) (see Jarick). Prior to Lowth, scholars considered *meter to be the hallmark of Hebrew verse, as it is in ancient Greek and Latin poetry, both of which clearly influenced their perspective. But in his Lectures on the Sacred Poetry of the Hebrews (first published in 1753), Lowth (1839, 33-34) argued to the contrary, asserting that the laws governing Hebrew meter were largely unrecoverable, and turned his focus to the relationship of poetic lines. Others before him had described this relationship, especially in the psalms, but Lowth (1839, 204) argued that parallelismus membrorum ("parallelism of members")—the way poetic lines respond to one another (note that for Lowth, membrum ["member"] translates Gk kōlon ["line"] [see Kugel 1981, 2-3 n. 4; Baker 1973])—was "the origin and progress of that poetical and artificial conformation of the sentences which we observe in the poetry of the Hebrews." In his work on Isaiah, Lowth (1834, ix) described his understanding of the phenomenon: "The correspondence of one verse, or line, with another, I call parallelism. When a proposition is delivered, and a second is subjoined to it, or drawn under it, equivalent, or contrasted with it, in sense; or similar to it in the form of grammatical construction, these I call parallel lines; and the words or phrases, answering one to another in the corresponding lines, parallel terms."

While admitting that the "certain equality, resemblance, or parallelism" between lines or elements of the line "has much variety and many gradations; it is sometimes more accurate and manifest, sometimes more vague and obscure," Lowth (1839, 205) nevertheless asserted that "it may . . . on the whole, be said to consist of three species." These three species or types of parallelism are synonymous parallelism, antithetic parallelism and synthetic (or constructive) parallelism (Lowth 1839, 205-14).

2.1.1. Synonymous Parallelism. The first type occurs when poetic lines repeat "the same sentiment . . . in different, but equivalent terms" (Lowth 1839, 205). Psalm 24:1 provides an excellent example:

The earth and its fullness are the LORD's,
the world, and those who dwell in it. (our translation)

Both lines echo the same thought: everything in the world belongs to God. They do so with parallel elements: "the earth" corresponds to "the world"; "its fullness" matches "those who dwell in it." The only element from the first line that goes unparallelled is "the LORD," but this habit of deletion, gapping or *ellipsis from line A to line B is frequent in Hebrew poetry (Lowth 1839, 208 [see 2.5.4 below]) and normally does not complicate comprehension.

2.1.2. Antithetic Parallelism. The second type occurs "when a thing is illustrated by its contrary being opposed to it" (Lowth 1839, 210). Note Psalm 1:6:

For the LORD knows the way of the righteous (ones), but the way of the wicked (ones) will perish.
(our translation)

Here the two lines establish a contrasting (i.e., antithetical) relationship between two types of “ways,” asserting that those who walk therein reach very different outcomes. The careful reader will note that the elements are not as balanced or parallel in Psalm 1:6. The Lord actively knows (NRSV: “watches over”) the way of the righteous, but the way of the wicked is said to perish on its own, as it were, without any indication of God’s agency. Even so, the broad contrast between the parallel ways is clear.

2.1.3. Synthetic (or Constructive) Parallelism. The third type occurs when “the sentences answer to each other, not by the iteration of the same image or sentiment, or the opposition of their contraries, but merely by the form of construction” (Lowth 1839, 211). Lowth (1839, 212) provides this example from Psalm 77:17 [MT 77:18]:

The clouds overflowed with water;
The atmosphere resounded;
Thine arrows also issued forth.

The relationship of these lines is much looser than in the previous examples. Indeed, they are parallel only insofar as some of the elements seem to match one another: “the clouds,” “the atmosphere” and “thine arrows” (presumably a metaphor for lightning) all play a role in the poet’s description of a violent rainstorm. Also, the grammatical construction of each line is comparable. However, the elements are not obviously synonymous, nor do they provide strong contrasts (antitheses) for one another. Lowth (1839, 211-12) considered synthetic parallelism to consist of “all such [parallelisms] as do not come within the two former classes.” Synthetic parallelism is thus a kind of catchall category; when poetic lines are neither synonymous nor antithetical, Lowth placed them in this third type. Lowth (1839, 213) admitted that the category was thus very loose and difficult to delineate with precision: “The variety in the form of this synthetic parallelism is very great, and the degrees of resemblance almost infinite: so that sometimes the scheme of parallelism is very subtle and obscure, and must be developed by art and ability in distinguishing the different members of the sentences, and in distributing the points, rather than by depending upon the obvious construction.”

These comments prefigure the work of subsequent generations of scholars who have sought to mitigate the ambiguity of synthetic parallelism by refining Lowth’s basic tripartite schema. Otherwise, a very real problem arises: what keeps mundane prose from being just another kind of synthetic parallelism (see 2.4.2 below)?

2.2. “The Laws of Parallelism.” Despite the problems with synthetic parallelism that were apparent from the beginning, Lowth’s argument that all Hebrew poetry exhibited parallelismus membrorum won the day and went virtually unchallenged for well over a century. One of the most important results of his work was the determination of the genre of prophetic literature: since it exhibits extensive use of parallelism, it must be interpreted and analyzed as poetry rather than prose. In fact, some of the most thoroughgoing utilizations of Lowth’s schema were executed in work on the prophets—for example, L. Newman and W. Popper’s studies of Amos and Isaiah, published in 1918. Indeed, by this time, Hebrew poetry was thought to function so strictly according to the “laws of parallelism” that if the text did not adhere to these laws, then textual emendation was in order (Newman and Popper, 449); thus, “Defect in parallelism is due to defect in text, and conversely . . . once the right of emendation is admitted, the emendation must be on the basis of parallelism” (Newman and Popper, 448). Parallelism thus moved from being a description of Hebrew poetry, to a tool in genre analysis, and, in the work of Newman and Popper, to a lawlike factor useful for, among other things, textual criticism and emendation.

It is somewhat ironic that the flaws in Lowth’s third category actually helped to propagate his theory by encouraging subsequent scholars to develop new ideas, all the time working within his tripartite schema. So, for example, Newman and Popper (136) attempted to shore up Lowth’s legacy by classifying new varieties of parallelism that would better explain the unacceptably vague category of synthetic parallelism. Such was not the case with G. Gray, who saw the flawed third type of parallelism as an opportunity to refine Lowth’s system. In 1915, arguing that synthetic parallelism was no category at all, Gray (reprint 1972, 49-50) introduced the categories of “complete parallelism” and “incomplete parallelism,” which together are “not distinct from, but mere subdivisions of synonymous and antithetic parallelism.”

In his description of complete and incomplete parallelism Gray introduced a system of describing parallelism, referring to a Hebrew word in any given line by a letter (e.g., a, b, c) which could be mapped to its parallel in the second line (e.g., a', b', c'). Complete parallelism occurs when every term in the first line is parallel to a term in the second, whether the lines relate to one another synonymously or antithetically. The complete—in this case, synonymous—parallelism of Job 4:9 provides one such example (in the following, hyphenated words translate one Hebrew word):

a	b	c
By-the-breath of-God they-perish,
a'	b'	c'
and-by-the-blast of-his-anger are-they-consumed. (Gray 1972, 61)

The antithetic parallelism of Proverbs 15:1 provides another:

a	b	c	d
A-soft answer turneth-away wrath,
a'	b'	c'	d'
but-a-greivous word stirreth-up anger.
(Gray 1972, 62)

Incomplete parallelism occurs when some of the terms from the first line occur in the second line, while others do not. An example is Song of Songs 2:1:

a	b	c
I-am a-rose-of Sharon,
	b'	c'
a-lily-of the-valleys. (our translation)

This example demonstrates incomplete parallelism “without compensation”; that is, the second line is shorter than the first (Gray 1972, 74). Gray noted that Hebrew poetry also exhibits incomplete parallelism “with compensation,” which means that although some elements in the lines go unparallelled, they are roughly the same length. In this scenario, the second line omits an element from the first but compensates by introducing a new element to balance the line length. Consider Psalm 58:6 [MT 58:7]:

a	b	c	d
O-God, rip-out their-teeth from-their-mouth, b'	c'		e	a'
break the-fangs-of			the-young-lions, O-
LORD! (our translation)

In this verse, element d from the first line goes unparallelled, but to compensate, the second line adds element e (which can be seen as “backward” or “reverse gapped” [see 2.5.4 below]), providing the proper noun to which the personal pronouns refer.

According to Gray, countless other permutations can be found in biblical poetry that mix complete, incomplete, synonymous and antithetic parallelism in various ways. In general, though, he found incomplete parallelism to be much more common than complete parallelism. Indeed, in some poetic lines the parallelism is so incomplete that it is functionally nonexistent. Thus, if one were to chart biblical poetry with regard to parallelism, “the graph would run from zero (no parallelism) through all the gradations of incomplete parallelism to 100 (complete parallelism)” (Freedman 1972, xxv-xxvi). The vast, vast majority of poetic lines, however, would fall in the 1-99 range.

Gray’s work preceded the discovery of the ancient city of Ugarit by nearly fifteen years; once Ugaritic was deciphered and its poetic texts translated, his categories of complete and incomplete parallelism took on new significance. It was quickly observed that Ugaritic poetry, like Hebrew, was also marked by parallelism, but often with a higher degree of identical (Gray’s “complete”) parallelism. This led W. Albright and a generation of his students, especially F. Cross and D. Freedman (see Albright; Cross and Freedman; also Freedman 1980; Cross) to two important conclusions: (1) Hebrew poetry (especially early Hebrew poetry as they defined it) stands in the same tradition of “Canaanite” poetry to which Ugaritic literature also belonged, and of which it was a primary repository (see also Gevirtz); (2) the formality or, at least, the higher incidence of “complete” parallelism that marked Ugaritic poetry vis-à-vis Hebrew poetry facilitated the establishment of a relative typology between the two literatures with results for the dating of each (see Robertson). Thus, Albright et al. suggested that examples of looser, incomplete types of parallelism were later than examples of very tight, synonymous, even identical types of parallelism. In this way, they were able to delineate a corpus of “ancient Yahwistic poetry,” including texts such as Genesis 49, Exodus 15, Numbers 23–24, Deuteronomy 32–33 and Judges 5 (Freedman 1980, 14), and thereafter construct broad theories of Israelite religion and history on the basis of this early corpus (see, e.g., Freedman 1980, 77–178).

It should not be missed that these historical-religious reconstructions and the relative typology and chronology were all predicated, in no small way, on an understanding of parallelism. Cross and Freedman (5) explicitly state that Ugaritic and Hebrew poetry shared one “dominating principle . . . that of balance or symmetry: parallelismus membrorum.” Using the typology of early, tight regularity (“repetitive parallelism”) to later, looser (ir)regularity, Cross and Freedman (71 n. 1) concluded that “the early poetry of Israel, like that of Ugarit, was quite regular in structure, and susceptible to quantitative analysis” (cf. Freedman 1980, 2–11).

At this point, things have come somewhat full circle: from pre-Lowthian meter, to parallelism instead of meter (see 2.1 above on Lowth), to parallelism as meter. Not only does this “historical” use of the “laws of parallelism” strike one as contrary to the spirit of Lowth’s original insights, it is also not far removed from Newman and Popper’s work, because instances or characteristics of “later” Hebrew poetry that were found in the corpus of “early” Hebrew poetry were often emended—with or without textual support from other ancient versions (see Cross and Freedman, esp. 5; Goodwin; Kugel 1984, 114)—often with an accompanying note: metri causa (“on account of the meter” [note: not on account of the parallelism, though the two are confused and identified at this point in the scholarship]). Alternatively, high incidence of nonrepetitive parallelism was irrefutable evidence that a poetic text was late. The “laws of parallelism” seem to have become even more reified in the historical-grammatical work of the Albright school. And, despite the very real and important gains that were made thereby, especially for historical and history-of-religion pursuits, one cannot help but wonder if the laws of parallelism had not killed the spirit of Hebrew poetry. There are, after all, other things at work beyond diachrony that can explain difference in poetry (see Berlin 2004, 2101–2).

2.3. The “Spirit” of Parallelism. Soon after Lowth asserted that parallelism was the essential element of Hebrew poetry, scholars began to comment on the function of parallelism, arguing for its unique suitability as the “spirit” of poetry. Toward the end of the eighteenth century, J. Herder (1.41) described the expressive power of parallelism this way:

Poetry is not addressed to the understanding alone but primarily and chiefly to the feelings. And are these not friendly to . . . parallelism? So soon as the heart gives way to its emotions, wave follows upon wave, and that is parallelism. The heart is never exhausted, it has forever something new to say. So soon as the first wave has passed away, or broken itself upon the rocks, the second swells again and returns as before. This pulsation of nature, this breathing of emotion, appears in all the language of passion, and would you not have that in poetry, which is most peculiarly the offspring of emotion[?]

Herder’s (admittedly Romantic) understanding of parallelism is much broader than Lowth’s, extending to encompass different types and styles of nonbiblical poetry. For example, Herder (1.42) saw parallelism as the common element of Alexandrine verse (a German metrical form, common in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, consisting of lines of twelve syllables with the caesura between the sixth and the seventh syllables):

That is parallelism altogether. Examine carefully why it so powerfully enforces instruction, and you will find it to be simply on account of its parallelism. All simple songs and church hymns are full of it, and rhyme, the great delight of Northern [European] ears, is a continued parallelism. . . . To this same Oriental [i.e., Hebrew] source we are indebted both for rhyme, and the uniform movement of our church musick [sic].

Herder’s work demonstrates that when one (considerably) expands the definition of parallelism, it “appears” in a vast number of cultures and their poetic forms. Indeed, Herder believed Hebrew parallelism to be the origin of all poetic parallelism writ large the world over. This position is not accurate, of course, because Ugaritic poetry (see Pardee; LeMon), as well as other ancient Semitic poetries, contain parallelism (Foster, xvi-xvii; Reiner, 298; Buccellati, 119-20) and antedate the OT, sometimes by centuries. Note one example from the Epic of Gilgamesh II.43-44:

He anointed himself with oil, turned into a man,
He put on clothing, became like a warrior.
(Foster, xvii)

Nevertheless, ever since Lowth's breakthrough lectures, scholars of poetries as varied and disparate as Finnish, Chinese, Mongolian, Indic and Turkic (to name but a few) have identified parallel structures in their respective poetries, describing them on analogy with the poetry of the Hebrews (see O'Connor 1993; Gentz) (the same is true for ancient Near Eastern parallelism [see Watson 2007, 130]). Consider, for example, the following lines from Beowulf, which exhibit later propensities toward parallelism:

The leader of the troop unlocked his word-hoard;
The distinguished one delivered this answer.
(Heaney, 19)

Then there is the great English poet Gerard Manley Hopkins (1844-1889). Writing thousands of years after Beowulf or the Epic of Gilgamesh, Hopkins adopted biblical parallelism as a model for the foundational structural device of his poetry and claimed that it was fundamental to all poetic speech. From Lowth, via Herder, to Hopkins—among the many others who could be mentioned—parallelism had morphed from a characteristic of Hebrew verse to a universal poetic principle.

No one has done more to promote this expansive understanding of parallelism than the Russian-born linguist R. Jakobson. Jakobson cited and accepted Hopkins's notion that parallelism was foundational to poetry, subsequently delineating extensive parallel structures in Russian folk songs. Significantly, Jakobson argued that parallelism is not simply an intracolonic phenomenon. Instead, he saw parallelism at work everywhere in a poem: in its microstructures, including the repetition of individual letters, syllables and words (according to Jakobson, rhyme is just another form [phonological] of parallelism), as well as in macrostructures such as *inclusios, *refrains and the repetition of images or ideas throughout a poem. So, for Jakobson, any coupling or repetition at any distance within a poem constituted parallelism, and he claimed that parallelism (understood in this very broad way) was the essential means by which all poets structure discourse.

Jakobson's seminal work inspired a generation of linguistic anthropologists to study parallelism in this broad sense, going deep into poetry, especially its syntax, in the process. These efforts have prompted some to suggest that parallelistic poetry has similar rhetorical and psychological effects across cultures. P. Boodberg wrote in 1954 that "parallelism . . . is intended to achieve a result reminiscent of binocular vision, the superimposition of two syntactical images in order to endow them with solidity and depth, the repetition of the pattern having the effect of binding together syntagms that appear at first rather loosely aligned" (cited in Fox, 27). Building off of Boodberg's suggestion, J. Fox (28) speculated that "if . . . the brain's processing of verbal information is of the same order as its processing of visual information, then there may well be a neuro-physiological underpinning for the almost hypnotic appeal of [parallelistic] ritual language performances." When linguistic anthropological research like this is taken into account, one emerges with a kind of common (even universal?) poetic parallelism that is not simply a parochial (Hebrew) poetic device but rather a structure of human thought—at the very least, a structure of the poetic mind (see Wagner, 1-26; Kinzie, 57).

If there is any truth to this, then parallelism is not simply a device or form of Hebrew poetry but rather is a primary avenue by which meaning is conveyed within the poems of the OT (see Alter, 205; Berlin 1985, 17, 140-41)—and not just there, but in many different kinds of poetry, from many different parts of the world, in many different languages. In this perspective, parallelism is very much the spirit of poetry, but that spirit has come a long way from Herder's day. It is no longer a romanticized spirit that blows wherever the spirit will; instead it is a ubiquitous, even robotic, spirit that moves with bewildering linguistic, grammatical and syntactical precision.

2.4. Reassessing Parallelism.

2.4.1. Linguistic Approaches. Although it is true that "repetition of sound, syllable, word, phrase, line, strophe, metrical pattern, or syntactic structure lies at the core of any definition of poetry” (Shapiro, 1035), one might well ask Jakobson et al. if their broad definition of parallelism, rooted as it is in repetition, is the same thing as biblical parallelism. Has parallelism, in its broad and ever-varied linguistic construal(s), largely outgrown its usefulness as an analytical category? Two important writers on Hebrew poetry would answer this question in the affirmative, at least to some degree. But before turning to the work of J. Kugel and R. Alter, we should note that a number of biblical scholars have followed Jakobson, approaching biblical parallelism largely as a grammatical-syntactical phenomenon; indeed, Lowth (1834, ix) himself spoke of parallelism “in the form of grammatical construction.” Included here is the work of M. O’Connor, which offers an understanding of Hebrew line structure as governed by a highly complex system of syntactical “constraints” (see O’Connor 1997, esp. 65; 1993; see also Holladay). This syntactical constriction, not parallelism, O’Connor argues, is the fundamental feature of Hebrew poetry. Even so, O’Connor (1993, 877) believes that the “core of . . . p[arallelism] is [also] syntactic; when syntactic frames are set in equivalence by p[arallelism], the elements filling those frames are brought into alignment as well, esp[ecially] on the lexical level (thus the term ‘semantic p[arallelism]’).” This is to say that syntactical parallelism precedes semantic parallelism, and similar sentiment undergirds the important linguistic work of E. Greenstein among others (cf., e.g., Berlin 1985; ABD 5.135-62; Collins; Geller). Greenstein pursues the deep structure of parallel lines, observing that oftentimes this deep structure is precisely parallel even though the surface structure seems patently not. The problem here, however, is twofold: (1) it is probably safe to say that many, if not most, readers (at least those who are not linguists) rarely, if ever, are consciously aware of deep structure; (2) more importantly, the deep structure is often defined so generically (e.g., a sentence comprising a noun phrase and verb phrase, the latter of which consists of a verb and another noun phrase as the object) as to be of little interpretive value. However, Greenstein’s attention to psycholinguistics—that is, how parallelism affects audience perception—is a welcome and significant development (see also Berlin 1985, 9-10). Briefly, Greenstein

(54) argued that the more difficult (or incomplete) the parallelism, the more it demanded “effort” or “audience participation”: “Gaps in surface stimuli place a higher level of involvement on the perceiver. . . . The audience is engaged by having to form the complete image in its mind. . . . [Incomplete parallelism] involves greater processing by the audience and is therefore engaging; [complete parallelism] represents a full stimulus and tends to disengage” (cf. Berlin 1985, 134).

Building upon the work of Greenstein, but especially on that of Jakobson, Berlin has offered what is probably the most robust treatment of biblical parallelism from a linguistic perspective (but see also Pardee), treating it in its grammatical (morphological and syntactical), lexical and semantic (including word pairs and patterning), and phonological (sound pairs) aspects. Her treatment is especially noteworthy for its balance, taking care not to privilege syntax over semantics (or vice versa): “both are important aspects of parallelism, along with . . . other aspects” (Berlin 1985, 23). Employing the broad view of Jakobson and tracing parallelism in so many different facets and on so many levels of the poem, Berlin (1985, 4) is able to conclude that “in a certain sense parallelism is the essence of poetry.” Like Greenstein, she pays attention to literary effect (psycholinguistics), pointing out, among other things, that parallelistic contexts influence one’s expectation of parallelism. Writ large, such an observation could explain Lowth’s creation of “synthetic parallelism” in the first place: equivalences in close proximity, the similarity of surface structures, and the number of linguistic equivalences in so much of Hebrew poetry encourages one to read other verses, also, as binary sentences (see Berlin 1985, 134).

As Berlin’s work makes clear (see also Geller), many who write from a linguistic perspective recognize that the meaning of a poem is not exhausted by discussion of its syntax (see Howard, 346-47, 350, 367; Alter, 215 n. 11). The same is true for parallelism. To repeat an earlier sentiment: if parallelism is the spirit of Hebrew poetry, one wonders if the heaping up of rules—typological or, in the linguistic case, syntactical—has not killed that spirit. And, again, is parallelism ultimately and in some sense finally or only repetition? The works of Kugel and Alter speak to both these issues of poetic meaning and how parallelism is both more and less than repetition. Though differing in many ways (see, e.g., Alter, 18-19), they are united on several fronts, especially in their basic agreement that the Lowthian system misunderstands parallelism (and thus Hebrew poetry), and that parallelism can be spoken of in fairly straightforward, even simple, terms rather than only through exceedingly complex syntactical or semantic analyses.

2.4.2. J. Kugel. Kugel's work appeared before Alter's. His contribution is twofold. First, he challenged the notion that parallelism was the defining mark of Hebrew poetry. He pointed out that there are a number of prose texts and, still more basically, certain features of Hebrew prose that reflect supposedly poetic aspects, most notably parallel terms and structures (e.g., Num 5:12-15 [see Kugel 1981, 64]). Conversely, there are some poetic texts that are difficult to define as parallel in any meaningful sense of the term (e.g., Ps 119:54). Hence, one "can no longer equate parallelism and Hebrew poetry" (Petersen and Richards, 27) but instead must reckon with a prose-poetry continuum. (Contrary to some opinion, however, Kugel did not give up on distinguishing poetry and prose completely but rather felt that a simplistic, hard-and-fast distinction between the two was unhelpful to interpreting both [see Kugel 1984, esp. 110, 115].) This observation has far-reaching consequences that cannot be dealt with here, but it suffices to note that it strikes yet another blow against Lowth's (or, at least, the Lowthians') equation of parallelism and poetry (see O'Connor 1997). Second, Kugel leveled a withering critique on Lowth's three categories of synonymous, antithetical and synthetic parallelism. Kugel (1984, 107) thinks that "the taxonomic approach to parallelism has in the past proven largely futile, and that the multiplication of categories of semantic or other parallelism has had a particularly diverting, and therefore negative, effect on an overall understanding." The taxonomic approach is obviously that of Lowth and followers such as Newman and Popper, Gray, and others. In its place, Kugel has offered something that is simpler: a focus on what he calls the "pause sequence." Kugel represents this schematically as follows:

_____ / _____ //

Here, the first dash is the A "clause" (remember that Kugel does not think of poetic lines or cola proper), which is followed by a brief pause, then by the B "clause" and a longer pause (Kugel 1981, 51). Kugel (1984, 107) understands this pause sequence as "seconding," and believes it to be the characteristic mode of parallelism. In seconding, "B typically reinforces A by backing it up, going it one better, amplifying, embellishing, and so forth" (Kugel 1984, 108). So, in his now famous definition, Kugel (1981, 1, 23, 42, 58) defines biblical parallelism as "A is so, and what's more, B" or "A, and as a matter of fact, B." In point of practice, there is a virtually infinite number of ways that B seconds A—for example:

- true addition ("A is so, and what's more B, that is, both A and B are so")
- equation ("A is so, yes, B is so, that is, A or B is so, it does not matter which")
- "going one better" ("A is so, nay, B is so, that is, in fact B is so") (Kugel 1981, 43)

Even so, "taxonomy and re-tropification" are dangers that must be avoided because the delineation and multiplication of categories "risks departing from that basic, 'seconding' sentence which underlies their particulars and whose nature has determined the quality of the medial and final pauses in the sentence" (Kugel 1984, 108). As Kugel (1981, 58) puts it, "Biblical parallelism is of one sort, 'A, and what's more, B,' or a hundred sorts; but it is not three." Taxonomic approaches to parallelism are "a hundred" (or more); Lowth's are three. Both numbers do not add up to the "one sort" (seconding) that Kugel has identified. The end of Lowthian categories could hardly be put any more strongly.

2.4.3. R. Alter. Building on the insights of B. Hrushovski, Alter came to similar conclusions as Kugel, but independently (see Alter, xi). Alter (1985, 10) understands the poetic line as marked by "dynamic movement from one verset [or line/colon] to the next," not by synonymous stasis. In fact, "literary expression abhors complete parallelism, just as language resists true synonymy, usage always introducing small wedges of difference between closely akin terms" (Alter 1985, 10). Alter (10-11) traces the understanding of "semantic modifications" or "disharmony in a harmonious [parallelistic] context" back to Herder, who observed that "the two [parallel members] . . . confirm, elevate and strengthen each other in their convictions or their rejoicings" (Herder, 1.40). So, in a memorable phrase not unlike Kugel's, Alter (11) epitomizes the relationship between parallelistic lines as "how much more so," stating that "this impulse to intensification is . . . the motor force in thousands of lines of biblical poetry." Alter (12) does admit that it is not "obligatory that every paired set of terms in parallel versets reflect development or intensification," but in most cases, at least according to Alter's perceptive readings, most do. This development or intensification happens in larger poetic structures and movements but also in words set in parallel where the "predominant pattern of biblical poetry is to move from a standard term in the first verset to a more literary or highfalutin term in the second verset" (Alter 1985, 13). A good example is in Genesis 49:11b:

He washes his garment in wine, and his robe in the blood of grapes. (our translation)

The effect of such "heightening or intensification . . . of focusing, specification, concretization, even what could be called dramatization" (Alter 1985, 19)—the "how much more so" in semantically paired lines (and there are numerous types)—"is clearly to introduce a 'new perception' through the device of parallelism" (Alter 1985, 16).

Again, though Kugel and Alter have points of difference, they are united in asserting the wrong-headedness of the Lowthian tripartite schema for understanding (let alone exhausting) the possibilities of relationships in the parallelistic line. Still further, they concur that the emphasis in Lowth's system (and in those who follow him overmuch) has been too strongly (and wrongly) placed on synonymity (see also Clines). Linguistic approaches to parallelism would say much the same. But it is safe to say that Kugel and Alter go further, laying the accent in their understanding of parallelism heavily and clearly on difference—the differentiation between parallel lines (see Kuntz 1993, 325-26; Berlin, NIB 4.304). As Alter (18 [italics added]) puts it, "The evidence of line after line of biblical verse suggests that we are too quick to infer [the] automatic and formulaic rhetorical gesture of repetition when more than that is going on." Adjudicating the role of sameness versus difference in repetition is, in fact, a large issue of debate in both literature and hermeneutics (see, e.g., Strawn). It cannot be solved here. Even so, it should be noted that some theorists (especially those depending on Jakobson) continue to speak extensively of modes of recurrence, of which repetition, equivalence, similarity, symmetry and congruence are part (e.g., Nel), and that others maintain that, in many ways, Lowth was right in seeing that parallelism is largely "a matter of correspondence" (Petersen and Richards, 34; cf. Berlin 1985, 2), even if that correspondence is diverse and pluriform. We would want to assert, in some distinction from Alter and Kugel, that the repetition at work, at least in some "parallel" or congruent constructions, indicates that sameness is every bit as important as difference. This assertion is, in no small way, the result of learning from the insights of both linguistic and literary approaches to parallelism. Both sameness and difference matter. To neglect one and favor another is to mistake something crucial about the nature of Hebrew prosody (see similarly Berlin 1985, 11, 154 n. 2).

2.5. Main Types of Parallelism. The history of research on parallelism indicates that one must navigate between the Scylla of Lowth's overly simplistic tripartite schema, on the one hand, and the Charybdis of falling prey to an ever-expanding taxonomy of subtypes that delivers diminishing returns, on the other. Even so, as Alter (10) asserts, parallelism offers a framework wherein disharmony functions within a larger harmonious context. Or, as Berlin (NIB 4.307) puts it, "The effect [of parallelism] is to advance the thought, while at the same time creating a close relationship between the parallelism's constituent parts." So, with all due respect to Kugel's critique of the taxonomic approach, and despite the fact that Lowth's categories are flawed, it is still possible, perhaps even necessary, to speak of different types of parallelism. Indeed, a number of scholars have offered such typologies (see Berlin 1985; Pardee; Watson 1994; 2001; Alonso Schökel), and a handful of types are selectively summarized below. Most, but not all, of these have been chosen due to their perceptibility—that is, how readily apparent and available they are to the reader (see Berlin 1985, 10, 130-35). In addition to the fact that the listing below is not comprehensive (and a comprehensive listing would miss much of the point [see Kugel 1981; cf. Berlin 1985, 2]), one must always remember that skillful poets work both within and against conventions. So, although the types given below are important, this listing neglects numerous examples of mixed types.

2.5.1. Parallelism of Morphological Elements. This category includes such things as the repetition of the same (or a semantically related) verbal root but in different aspects. For example, in Psalm 29:10 the Hebrew root yšb (“sit”) appears in both the perfective and imperfective aspects:

YHWH sat enthroned [yāšāb] at the flood;
YHWH sits enthroned [wayyēšeb], king forever. (Berlin 1985, 35)

Another example comes from Psalm 24:7, where the same verbs appear in different conjugations:

Lift up [šē’û; Qal of ns’] your head, O gates;
and be lifted up [wēhinnās’û; Niphal of ns’],
O ancient doors.

2.5.2. Parallelism of Number. This appears when consecutive lines contain cardinal or ordinal numbers, with the number usually increasing from the first line to the second, often in an “x // x+1” pattern (e.g., Job 5:19; 33:24; Ps 62:11 [MT 62:12]; Prov 6:16; 30:15, 18, 21, 29; Eccles 11:2). The prevalence of this type of parallelism confirms that numbers in Hebrew poetry typically convey relative plurality rather than exact specificity, as in, for example, Micah 5:5 [MT 5:4]:

Then we will raise against him SEVEN shepherds,
EIGHT chiefs of men. (Watson 2001, 144)

2.5.3. Staircase Parallelism. This occurs when a thought is interrupted by an epithet or other element, only to have the thought resumed from the beginning and completed in the next line (Watson 2001, 151). Note the tricola in Psalm 77:16 [MT 77:17]:

When the waters saw you, O God, when the waters saw you, they were afraid;
the very deep trembled. (NRSV)

Also Proverbs 31:4:

It is not for kings, O Lemuel,
It is not for kings to drink wine, or for rulers to desire strong drink. (NRSV)

2.5.4. Ballast Variant Parallelism. Here, the second line exhibits ellipsis. Ellipsis (also called “gapping”) is one of the most common features of Hebrew poetry (see O’Connor 1997, 122-29). It is when one element from the first line is left out in the next (reverse ellipsis is when an element from the second is left out of the first). In ballast variant parallelism the second line is expanded, despite the ellipsis, so that the lines roughly correspond in length (cf. Gray’s “incomplete parallelism with compensation” [see 2.2 above]). Take, for example, Proverbs 7:16:

I have decked my couch with coverings, colored spreads of Egyptian linen. (NRSV)

The second line contains no verb clause describing the action. The poet balances the length of the two lines by presenting an expanded description of the bed coverings, which were introduced only cursorily in the first line.

2.5.5. Positive-negative Parallelism. This occurs when the same or similar idea(s) is expressed first positively and then negatively (Berlin 1985, 56). Consider Proverbs 6:20:

My child, keep your father’s commandment, and do not forsake your mother’s teaching.
(NRSV)

2.5.6. Gender-matched Parallelism. Proverbs 6:20 also evidences gender-matched parallelism, where “father,” a masculine noun in the first line, is balanced in the second by a feminine noun, “mother.” Despite the frequency of this pattern in Hebrew verse, most gender-matched parallelism is difficult to identify in English translation (see Watson 1994, 192-239). Psalm 85:11 [MT 85:12] offers a further example, in which two grammatically feminine terms in the first line correspond to masculine terms in the second.

Truth [’ēmet, fem.] will spring up from the earth [’ereṣ, fem.], and justice [sedeq, masc.] will look down from the heavens [šāmayim, masc.]. (our translation)

2.5.7. Nominal-pronominal Parallelism. This is a frequently occurring pattern in which one line contains a proper noun and the second line replaces the noun with a pronoun. Psalm 33:2 is a well-balanced example:

Praise the LORD [yhwh] with the lyre; make melody to him [lô] with the harp of ten strings. (NRSV)

2.5.8. Half-line or Internal Parallelism. This type demonstrates that parallelism is not limited to bicola or tricola (see Watson 1994, 104-91). Rather, parallel elements may appear within a single line of poetry, as in Job 1:21:

The LORD gave, and the LORD has taken away. (NRSV)

Internal parallelism often appears in a line that does not correspond explicitly to the lines surrounding it. In such cases it seems that internal parallelism provides these (mono)cola with balance and symmetry so that they can stand on their own among other, more tightly parallel lines. It functions, in other words, “to strengthen a structure otherwise lacking in cohesiveness” (Pardee, 188).

2.5.9. Macro- and Microparallelisms. As noted earlier, linguistic approaches to parallelism in the tradition of Jakobson have expanded the concept to such a degree that it may be traced not only between two or three lines but also across large sections of poetry or poems as a whole (see Pardee; LeMon). In this way, *inclusio, *chiasms, *refrains and other types of repetition (imagistic or ideational) become examples of macrostructural parallelism. Many types of macroparallelism are perceptible to readers of the Bible in English; unfortunately, many linguistic forms of parallelism are lost in translation, especially when they are of the microstructural variety. Such is the case with phonological parallelism, otherwise known as assonance (and consonance), alliteration and rhyme.

Given the plethora of forms and types of parallelism, some of which are discernable in translation and many of which are not, it is easy to lose sight of what it means to interpret Hebrew poetry. Interpreting a poem is not co-terminous with simply identifying the various types of parallelism at work, even though the latter task can help with the former. Instead, the task of interpretation entails discerning how these parallelisms function, how they provide structure to the poem, and how that structure and those parallelisms contribute to the poem’s meaning, much of which is not contingent solely upon parallelism. Finally, when facing the daunting task of interpreting poetry, biblical or otherwise, one must remember that poems resist easy analysis, categorization and paraphrase (see Longenbach; Kinzie). They elude interpretation even as they invite and require it. A poem is a poem and means as a poem, creating meaning through its poetry. This is no tautology but rather the nature of poetic language, what Jakobson called “the poetic function”—the way poetic language functions to draw attention to itself and focuses on the message for its own sake (see Berlin 1985, 7, 9, 17, 140-41). The meaning of the parallel line is, then, at a profound poetic level, irreducibly the parallel line itself.

3. “Theological Parallelism.”

It remains to speak of further meanings created by Hebrew parallelism and the scholarly work done on it. To take the former issue first, an interesting case is found in the work of Augustine. Like other authors of the time, Augustine practiced a kind of prosopological exegesis “wherein the reader of the psalm identifies what person [prosopon] is speaking in a given verse or to what character a verse refers” (McCarthy, 31). At the same time, especially in his early work on the psalms, Augustine believed that all Scripture spoke of Christ and the church, the head and his body (de domino et corpore eius). It was the task of the exegete, then, to discern when the verse’s referent shifted from head to body or vice versa. In practice, however, Augustine tended to mix the distinct voices of Christ and the church into the one voice of the whole Christ (McCarthy, 31-32). This singular voice of Christ comprises all his members (Enarrat. Ps. 17.51) and “comes to express, if not actually effect, the union of God and humanity, the one true mediator” (McCarthy, 32). This means that Christ spoke human words and humans can speak Christ’s, or, in Augustine’s own words, “Let Christ speak, because the Church speaks in Christ, and Christ speaks in the Church, both body in the head and head in the body” (Enarrat. Ps. 30[2] s.1.4).

This exchange of words, which is “rooted in the divine Word’s appropriation of human flesh, allows Augustine to emphasize the singularity of the psalms’ subject” (McCarthy, 32).

Augustine’s approach to the psalms does not manifest a technical appreciation of the types and forms of parallelistic poetry. Even so, it is important to observe that in many ways his interpretation is only possible with, and is in fact facilitated by, parallelism. Moreover, in his ultimate emphasis on the unity of the “one voice,” Augustine prefigures, in his own way, theorists who also stress the ultimately unified nature of parallel Hebrew bicola. What is important in Augustine’s reading is how he applies these insights to produce a kind of “theological parallelism” whereby oneness is forged out of twoness (cf. Berlin 1985, 16): Christ and the members of his body (the church) are combined in the one voice of the whole, incarnate Christ.

4. Parallelism and the Canon of Scripture.

A second additional meaning created by parallelism or, in this case, by the scholarly work on parallelism is found in the work of C. Miles, who has employed research on parallelism to profitably (and somewhat metaphorically) understand the relationship of the two Testaments of the Christian Bible (see Miles, 179-95). Miles (179) suggests that “we consider the canon of Scripture on analogy with a . . . [bicolon] of Hebrew verse.” Depending on Kugel’s work in particular, Miles posits that the OT and NT are like the A and B lines of a Hebrew bicolon. Just as the relationship between the two lines is variable and elastic, so too the relationship between the Testaments cannot be construed simplistically or monodirectionally, as is done in, for instance, many of the law-gospel, promise-fulfillment, and narrative schemata that are familiar from homiletical treatments of the OT or from various OT or biblical theologies. Many (certainly not all) of these schemata treat the OT as little more than background, introduction or premise—often-times flawed or erroneous in some way—for the “climax” that comes in the NT. But, as Miles (186) points out, “The function of parallelism is not to focus our attention [only] on the second [line]. The ‘true addition’ represented in the ‘what’s more’ of B is not an end in itself, for, as Kugel makes clear, $A + B$ is a single statement. . . . What is heightened or intensified, therefore, is not the meaning of one part of the poetic line (namely, part B), but the meaning of the poetic . . . [bicolon] as a whole.”

Pragmatically, this means that a virtually infinite number of approaches to the OT’s relationship to the NT (and, correlatively, the homiletical use of the OT) are authorized and recommended—indeed, as many as the number of ways two lines of a bicolon can be related (Miles, 190-91; cf. Berlin 1985, 127; NIB 4.308). At times, the relationship between the Testaments is one of virtual synonymy; they say virtually the same thing, with the OT’s witness sufficient, to some degree at least, in and of itself. But at other times the relationship is otherwise. Whatever the case, there is always a sense of seconding, “what’s more,” and “afterwardness” in the B line of the NT (Miles, 188). Even so, understanding the Testaments per Hebrew parallelism will permit no simple supersessionism(s): “there is never a sense in the dynamic of Hebrew parallelism in which A is devalued or made obsolete” (Miles, 188-89). Instead, just as “ $A + B$ is a single statement” (Miles 2000:186 [cf. 189 on the whole being different than the sum of its parts “because the parts influence or contaminate each other,” Clines, 95]), so too the Christian Bible, comprised of two Testaments, is a single statement—“the gospel of God,” to use Miles’s (190) terms.

In this approach, we will still find it necessary to attend to the things that the Testaments equate and the things that they contrast, but we will do so with the understanding that it is through the relationship their parallelism creates that we are shown the message of Scripture as a whole. Or, to state the claim even more strongly, it is through the dynamic interplay of the Old and New Testaments, that is, through the various expressions of their parallelism, that the meaning of the gospel of God is realized. (Miles, 189)

Such a position has ramifications for the individual treatment of both Testaments as well. So, on the one hand, “the New Testament witness is never simply privileged a priori” (Miles, 192), and, on the other, “the rhetorical effect achieved when the Testaments are formally adjoined . . . is not a diminishing of the significance of the Old Testament, but a heightening or intensification of the meaning of the canon of Scripture as a whole" (Miles, 191).

5. Conclusion.

In conclusion, the study of parallelism not only casts essential light on the meaning of a large corpus of the biblical text (approximately one-third of the OT is poetry) but also may raise one's sensitivities toward the theological interpretation of some of the poetic passages therein, while at the same time affording unique insight into the structure and interpretation of the *canon of Scripture itself. Parallelism might also help to explain the function of poetic metaphor, the two being "two sides of the same coin—counterparts of the same phenomenon in a different dimension . . . parallelism operat[ing] in the linguistic dimension the way metaphor operates in the conceptual dimension" (Berlin 1997, 27-28). Although parallelism may not contain meaning within itself as a poetic device or linguistic structure (Berlin 1985, 135, 138), "by controlling the ways by which words reach their destination parallelism always has meaning" (Greenstein, 70); and by structuring the text, parallelism "has an impact on how its meaning is arrived at" (Berlin 1985, 135). Since "the poetic function—the 'focus on the message for its own sake'—is achieved through parallelism . . . [then] parallelism becomes our entrée into the message" (Berlin 1985, 17 [see further, 138-41]). If even a portion of the above sentiments are true, then despite the very real and perduring difficulties associated with analyzing parallelism, the attempt is clearly worth the effort.

See also ACROSTIC; AMBIGUITY; ELLIPSIS; HEBREW LANGUAGE; LYRIC POETRY; ORAL POETRY; POETICS, TERMINOLOGY OF; SOUND PATTERNS; TERSENESS; TEXT, TEXTUAL CRITICISM; WORD-PLAY.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. W. F. Albright, Yahweh and the Gods of Canaan: A Historical Analysis of Two Contrasting Faiths (repr., Winona Lake, IN: Eisenbrauns, 1990 [1968]); L. Alonso Schökel, A Manual of Hebrew Poetics (SubBi 11; Rome: Pontifical Biblical Institute, 2000); R. Alter, The Art of Biblical Poetry (New York: Basic Books, 1985); A. Baker, "Parallelism: England's Contribution to Biblical Studies," CBQ 35 (1973) 429-40; A. Berlin, The Dynamics of Biblical Parallelism (Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1985); idem, "On Reading Biblical Poetry: The Role of Metaphor," in Congress Volume: Cambridge, 1995, ed. J. A. Emerton (VTSup 66; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1997) 25-36; idem, "Reading Biblical Poetry," in The Jewish Study Bible, ed. A. Berlin and M. Z. Brettler (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2004) 2097-104; idem, "Introduction to Hebrew Poetry," NIB 4.301-15; idem, "Parallelism," ABD 5.135-62; G. Buccellati, "On Poetry—Theirs and Ours," in Lingering Over Words: Studies in Ancient Near Eastern Literature in Honor of William L. Moran, ed. T. Absuch, J. Huehnergard and P. Steinkeller (HSS 37; Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1990) 105-34; D. J. A. Clines, "The Parallelism of Greater Precision," in Directions in Biblical Hebrew Poetry, ed. E. Folis (JSOTSup 40; Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1987) 77-100; T. Collins, Line-Forms in Hebrew Poetry: A Grammatical Approach to the Stylistic Study of the Hebrew Prophets (SPSM 7; Rome: Pontifical Biblical Institute, 1978); F. M. Cross, "Toward a History of Hebrew Prosody," in From Epic to Canon: History and Literature in Ancient Israel (Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1998) 135-50; F. M. Cross and D. N. Freedman, Studies in Ancient Yahwistic Poetry (2nd ed.; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1997 [1975]); B. R. Foster, ed., The Epic of Gilgamesh: A New Translation, Analogues, Criticism (New York: W. W. Norton, 2001); J. J. Fox, ed., To Speak in Pairs: Essays on the Ritual Languages of Eastern Indonesia (CSOLC 15; Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1988); D. N. Freedman, "Prolegomenon," in The Forms of Hebrew Poetry: Considered with Special Reference to the Criticism and Interpretation of the Old Testament, by G. B. Gray (repr. New York: KTAV, 1972 [1915]) xxxvi-xxxvii; idem, Pottery, Poetry, and Prophecy: Studies in Early Hebrew Poetry (Winona Lake, IN: Eisenbrauns, 1980); S. A. Geller, Parallelism in Early Biblical Poetry (HSM 20; Missoula, MT: Scholars Press, 1979); J. Gentz, "Zum Parallelismus in der chinesischen Literatur," in Parallelismus membrorum, ed. A. Wagner (OBO 224; Fribourg: Academic Press; Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 2007) 241-69; S. Gevirtz, Patterns in the Early Poetry of Israel (2nd ed.; Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1973); D. W. Goodwin, Text-Restoration Methods in Contemporary U.S.A. Biblical Scholarship (Naples: Istituto Orientale di Napoli, 1969); G. B. Gray, The Forms of Hebrew Poetry: Considered with Special Reference to the Criticism and Interpretation of the Old Testament (repr., New York: KTAV, 1972 [1915]); E. L. Greenstein, "How Does Parallelism Mean?" in A Sense of Text: The Art of Language in the Study of Biblical Literature; Papers from a Symposium, ed. E. L. Greenstein (Winona Lake, IN: Eisenbrauns, for Dropsie College, 1983) 41-70; S. Heaney, Beowulf: A New Verse Translation (New York: W. W. Norton, 2000); J. G. Herder, The Spirit of Hebrew Poetry, trans. J. Marsh (2 vols.; Burlington, VT: Edward Smith, 1833 [1782-1783]); W. L. Holladay, "Hebrew Verse Structure Revisited (I-II): Which Words 'Count'? Conjoint Cola, and Further Suggestions," JBL 118 (1999) 19-32, 401-16; G. M. Hopkins, "Poetic Diction [1865]," in The Collected Works of Gerard Manley Hopkins, 4: Oxford Essays and Notes, ed. L. Higgins (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2006) 120-22; D. M. Howard Jr., "Recent Trends in Psalms Study," in The Face of Old Testament Studies, ed. D. W. Baker and B. T. Arnold (Grand Rapids: Baker and Apollos, 1999) 329-68; B. Hrushovski, "Prosody, Hebrew," EncJud 13.1195-240; R. Jakobson, "Grammatical Parallelism and Its Russian Facet," Language 42 (1966) 399-429; J. Jarick, ed., Sacred Conjectures: The Context and Legacy of Robert Lowth and Jean Astruc (LHBOTS 457; London: T & T Clark, 2007); M. Kinzie, A Poet's Guide to Poetry (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1999); J. L. Kugel, The Idea of Biblical Poetry: Parallelism and Its History (New Haven: Yale University Press, 1981); idem, "Some Thoughts on Future Research into Biblical Style: Addenda to The Idea of Biblical Poetry," JSOT 28 (1984) 107-17; J. K. Kuntz, "Recent Perspectives on Biblical Poetry," RSR 19 (1993) 321-27; idem, "Biblical Hebrew Poetry in Recent Research, Part I," CurBS 6 (1998) 31-64; idem, "Biblical Hebrew Poetry in Recent Research, Part II," CurBS 7 (1999) 35-79; J. M. LeMon, "The Power of Parallelism in KTU² 1.119: Another 'Trial Cut,'" UF 37 (2005) 375-94; J. Longenbach, The Resistance to Poetry (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 2004); R. Lowth, Lectures on the Sacred Poetry of the Hebrews, trans. G. Gregory (4th ed.; London: Thomas Tegg, 1839 [1753]); idem, Isaiah: A New Translation with a Preliminary Dissertation, and Notes, Critical, Philological, and Explanatory (10th ed.; Boston: William Hilliard, 1834); M. C. McCarthy, "An Ecclesiology of Groaning: Augustine, the Psalms, and the Making of Church," TS 66 (2005) 23-48; C. A. Miles, "Proclaiming the Gospel of God: The Promise of a Literary-Theological Hermeneutical Approach to Christian Preaching of the Old Testament" (Ph.D. diss., Princeton Theological Seminary, 2000); P. J. Nel, "Parallelism and Recurrence in Biblical Hebrew Poetry," JNSL 18 (1992) 135-42; L. I. Newman and W. Popper, Studies in Biblical Parallelism: Pt. I, Parallelism in Amos; Pt. II, Parallelism in Isaiah, Chapters 1-10 (UCPSP 1/2-3; Berkeley: University of California Press, 1918); M. O'Connor, "Parallelism," in The New Princeton Encyclopedia of Poetry and Poetics, ed. A. Preminger and T. V. F. Brogan (Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1993) 877-79; idem, Hebrew Verse Structure (repr., Winona Lake, IN: Eisenbrauns, 1997 [1980]); D. Pardee, Ugaritic and Hebrew Poetic Parallelism: A Trial Cut ('nt I and Proverbs 2) (VTSup 39; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1988); D. L. Petersen and K. H. Richards, Interpreting Hebrew Poetry (GBS; Minneapolis: Fortress, 1992); E. Reiner, "First-Millennium Babylonian Literature," CAH² 3/2 (1992) 293-321; D. A. Robertson, Linguistic Evidence in Dating Early Hebrew Poetry (SBLDS 3; Missoula, MT: Society of Biblical Literature, 1972); M. Shapiro, "Repetition," in The New Princeton Encyclopedia of Poetry and Poetics, ed. A. Preminger and T. V. F. Brogan (Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1993) 1035-37; B. A. Strawn, "Keep/Observe/Do—Carefully—Today! The Rhetoric of Repetition in Deuteronomy," in A God So Near: Essays on Old Testament Theology in Honor of Patrick D. Miller, ed. B. A. Strawn and N. R. Bowen (Winona Lake, IN: Eisenbrauns, 2003) 215-40; A. Wagner, ed., Parallelismus membrorum (OBO 224; Fribourg: Academic Press; Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 2007); W. G. E. Watson, Traditional Techniques in Classical Hebrew Verse (JSOTSup 170; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1994); idem, Classical Hebrew Poetry: A Guide to Its Techniques (2nd ed.; JSOTSup 26; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 2001); idem, "The Study of Hebrew Poetry: Past—Present—Future," in Sacred Conjectures: The Context and Legacy of Robert Lowth and Jean Astruc, ed. J. Jarick (LHBOTS 457; London: T & T Clark, 2007) 124-54; G. H. Wilson, Psalms, vol. 1 (NIVAC; Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 2002).

J. M. LeMon and B. A. Strawn

PARALLELISMUS MEMBRORUM. See PARALLELISM.

PARANOMASIA. See POETICS, TERMINOLOGY OF; WORDPLAY.

PASSOVER, FESTIVAL OF. See MEGILLOT AND FESTIVALS.

PENTECOST, FESTIVAL OF. See MEGILLOT AND FESTIVALS.

PERIPETY. See ESTHER 1: BOOK OF.

PERSIA. See SUSA.

PERSONIFICATION

Personification is a figure of speech that attributes human characteristics to plants, animals, objects or abstractions. A nearly universal feature of writing and speaking in every age, this device was given the name prosōpopoeia (from Gk prosōpon ["face"] and poiein ["to make"]) by classical rhetoricians. Aristotle (Rhet. 3.10.6; 3.11.1-4) praised Homer for speaking of inanimate things as though they were living, making them vivid, and Quintilian (Inst. 9.3.89) saw the figure in common sayings such as "Avarice is the mother of cruelty" (see Arthos and Brogan). One contemporary literary approach finds it wherever nonhuman entities are endowed with intelligence and/or speech (Paxson).

If literary works and their symbols are "verbal patterns of experience" (Burke, 152-53), personification is a special form of symbolic action, one that uses depictions of human speaking and acting to convey an emotion, an idea or a strategy for coming to terms with a situation in life. Biblical examples range from the simple metaphor in "Let all the trees of the forest sing for joy" (Ps 96:12) to the extended monologues of *Woman Wisdom (Prov 1:20-33; 8:4-36). In these personifications metaphor and characterization are combined in varying proportions to depict typical patterns of personal interaction, inviting readers to engage them with their own responses. As used throughout Scripture, personification highlights that which characterizes the human person, the ability to use language to enter into relationship with God; it is one of many ways that biblical rhetoric inspires and calls forth obedient love of God.

1. Inchoate (Basic) Personification
2. Synecdochic Personification
3. Collective Personification
4. Characterized Personification

1. Inchoate (Basic) Personification.

Brief and simple attributions of human qualities are scattered throughout *Psalms and, to a lesser extent, the other writings. All creation responds to the work of God with praise, demonstrating the extent of God's majesty and setting an example for human *worship. The seas lift their voice (Ps 93:3-4), joined by the heavens, fields and trees (Ps 96:11-12), the distant shores and all the earth (Ps 97:1), mixing their voices with those of God's people (Ps 98:1-9; 100:1-5; 148:1-14). Mountains are born and sing praise (Ps 90:2; 89:12), but they also look with envy at *Zion, where God resides (Ps 68:15-16). An extended metaphor in Psalm 19:1-6 reflects on the capacity of the heavens to praise and teach, even though "there is no speech, nor are there words." In answer to the protests of *Job, the Lord asks if Job was present at creation when the morning stars sang and heaven shouted for joy (Job 38:7): "Can you send the lightnings . . . so they say to you, 'Here we are?'" (Job 38:35).

Common objects, animals and locales all take on human characteristics. The shepherd's rod and staff offer comfort as a sign of God's care (Ps 23:4), but wine the mocker and beer the brawler will lead the unsuspecting astray (Prov 20:1). The swift ostrich laughs at the horse and rider, while the brave horse laughs at fear (Job 39:18, 22). Earth and Sheol are addressed as though they could hear and respond (Job 16:18; 17:14). Sheol, the barren womb, thirsty earth and hungry fire never say "Enough!" (Prov 30:15-16). The depths of the sea and Abaddon confess that they do not know where *wisdom is to be found (Job 28:14, 22). The land itself cries out when defrauded (Job 31:38), and the deserted roads of conquered Jerusalem mourn (Lam 1:4).

These basic personifications make poetic descriptions vivid and interesting, but they are more than mere ornamentation. What is true of metaphor in general also applies here: personification communicates truth in a unique and compelling way for which there is no substitute.

2. Synecdochic Personification.

A synecdoche is a figure in which a part stands for the whole, or the whole for a part (from Gk synekdechesthai ["to take up or understand with another"]). Biblical personifications sometimes attribute an action to the character quality that it reveals. The exclamation by *Naomi in Ruth 2:20 provides an example: "May he be blessed by the LORD, whose kindness has not abandoned the living or the dead." Whether the kindness belongs to the Lord or *Boaz (the grammar allows either), clearly it is this person's kindness (hesed) that has not forsaken the two women. Because the act of kindness is given indirect attribution, the quality of the action itself takes center stage. So also the word spoken by God represents divine action and purpose: “By the word of the LORD the heavens were made” (Ps 33:6), a word that runs swiftly like a messenger to carry out the divine will (Ps 147:15-18).

Human emotions and virtues also become actors, sharpening the focus on their role in human motivation and interaction. Two lodgers are contrasted in “Weeping may linger for a night, but joy comes with the morning” (Ps 30:5). Love sleeps and can be awakened (Song 2:7; 8:4), but when stirred, it is stronger than death (Song 8:6-7). Hunger can drive a worker like a taskmaster (Prov 16:26), but a lazy person’s appetite just craves and stays hungry (Prov 13:4). Love and faithfulness meet; righteousness and peace kiss (Ps 85:10).

Representative parts of the body can stand for human thoughts, feelings and actions. The psalms speak of the steadfast heart that leaps for joy (Ps 28:7; 51:7), the crushed bones that rejoice (Ps 51:8), and the yearning flesh that faints (Ps 63:1; 84:2), all in answer to the divine call. The heart knows its own bitterness, and the foolish heart rages against the Lord (Prov 14:10; 19:3); in this way the intentions of a person are shown to be private and, at times, even deceptive. The psalmist rebukes the powerful for the evil done with a razor-sharp tongue and then turns to address the deceitful tongue itself: “You love all words that devour” (Ps 52:1-4; cf. Ps 73:8-9; 120:1-4). So also discontent and covetous eyes instigate the mouth that leads to sin (Eccles 4:8; 5:6; cf. Job 15:5-6). A series of proverbs on the mouth and lips imagine that they act according to their own purposes, choosing that which finds favor or is perverse (Prov 10:11, 14, 18, 21, 32).

In sum, the synecdochic personification of actions, emotions, virtues and body members invites readers to deepen their understanding of relationships with God, neighbor and creation by offering a fresh angle of vision and sharpening focus on the positive or negative quality of an interaction.

3. Collective Personification.

Collective personifications place special focus on God’s relation with people groups. In some cases they portray rejection of God and the resulting judgment. Nations can conspire against the Lord’s anointed (Ps 2:1-2), and a rebellious country can suffer a series of unstable and short-lived rulers (Prov 28:2).

The most developed of these personifications appears in the book of *Lamentations, where conquered Jerusalem is described, named and quoted (some interpreters also believe that the “man of affliction” in Lam 3 is the personified voice of the exiles [see Berlin, 84-85]). Although it is not possible to determine the degree to which it draws from Mesopotamian city laments (Biddle), prophetic imagery (Hillers, 32-41) or the psalms of *lament, the personification of Jerusalem in a variety of female roles startles the imagination and evokes an emotional response. In short, “Jerusalem, personified as a woman, suffers only as a woman can suffer” (Berlin, 8-9).

In the first two chapters of the book the plight of Jerusalem is reported by a grief-stricken observer who periodically turns to address her directly: “To what can I liken you that I may comfort you, Virgin Daughter Zion?” (Lam 2:13b). Abandonment links the various descriptions of *suffering. Jerusalem is empty, left alone like a war widow (Lam 1:1); the image brings together the traditional Deuteronomic sense of widows’ vulnerability with the immediate sense of grief. She who was noble and surrounded with servants is now set to forced labor like a slave, weeping bitterly at night with tears on her cheeks (Lam 1:1-2). None of her illicit lovers is there to lend comfort; her friends have betrayed her, even becoming her enemies (Lam 1:16-17), and the plunder and destruction of the temple is described as an act of rape (Lam 1:10).

Personifications of the suffering city name “Zion” (Lam 1:17; 2:6) as “Daughter Zion” (Lam 1:6; 2:1, 4, 8, 10, 13, 18; 4:22), “Virgin Daughter Zion” (Lam 1:15; 2:13), “Daughter Judah” (Lam 2:2; 2:5) and “Daughter Jerusalem” (Lam 2:13; 2:15). The final word to “Daughter Zion” promises an end to punishment, directing it instead on her enemy “Daughter Edom” (Lam 4:21-22). “Daughter” may be poetic speech for any young female, perhaps a diminutive term of endearment for someone of marriageable age (Berlin, 10-12). It may also carry some connotation of home and stability, a counterbalance to the males who go out to make war. In any case, “Daughter” reminds readers that this warfare has battered, violated and deserted one both beloved and vulnerable (Follis, 1103).

The observer's reports are periodically interrupted by the words of Woman Jerusalem herself. Combined use of description and the very words of the distressed, says Aristotle (Rhet. 2.8.8-16), are especially effective in calling forth pity. Woman Jerusalem herself asks onlookers, "Is it nothing to you, all you who pass by? . . . Is any suffering like my suffering?" (Lam 1:12). She grieves over her lost and destitute children with words that may have been inspired by the real mothers of Jerusalem who could not feed their children (Lam 1:16; cf. Lam 2:11-12, 19-20; 4:2-4, 9-10). The observer calls her to lament and repent (Lam 2:13-19), and she does, directing her contrition, grief and even her anger to God: "Look, LORD!" (Lam 1:9b, 11b, 20-22; 2:20-22). Although there are other laments in the book spoken by a single male exile (Lam 3) and the collective voice of the people (Lam 5), it is Daughter Zion who turns lament into accusation, asking God, "Whom have you ever treated like this?" (Lam 2:20).

Jerusalem's outcry calls upon the reader to look and see, to come alongside and comfort. Her lament asks God to do the same and break the divine silence that pervades the book. The female experience of suffering becomes the lead metaphor of the book, compelling the poet to speak in a woman's voice (Kaiser, 182). It becomes one among a chorus of voices struggling to find meaning, offering the community of exiles a means to deal with its pain, to express the inexpressible (Heim, 141, 146).

Jerusalem suffers for her sins, but that suffering is nearly unspeakable, especially that of her children. Contemporary readers are thereby encouraged to raise their questions about innocent and inexplicable suffering, particularly in the face of human genocides (as the twentieth century witnessed in Germany, Cambodia, Yugoslavia and Rwanda). At the same time, they are challenged to deepen their theology of sin and judgment, rejecting facile explanations of current events.

In sum, the descriptions and quotations of Woman Jerusalem offer readers and hearers visual image and voice by which they too may situate themselves in relation to God. Some will join with her in lamenting, repenting and contending with God. Others will make stronger identification with those who suffer, increasing their capacity for compassion and service. Ultimately, the personification helps Bible readers engage life at its most raw and profound moments.

4. Characterized Personification.

Compared to Woman Jerusalem, the female figures of Woman Wisdom and Woman Folly in the book of *Proverbs have more highly developed characterizations of personality and purpose. The two are set in contrast: one speaks for the good of her hearers, while the other speaks to their pleasures and ultimately brings about their demise. The opposing life ways of wisdom and *folly lead their followers to life or death, thus setting the stage for a dramatized debate in which each voice vies for attention and allegiance.

The drama reaches its high point in Proverbs 9 as the two become competing hosts, each beckoning passers-by with an invitation to a meal. Woman Wisdom has built her own house, slaughtered meat, and mixed wine with spices to prepare a sumptuous feast. A woman of means, she sends her servants to call out an invitation to the table, a symbol of her teaching: "Leave your simple ways and live, walk in the way of insight" (Prov 9:6). An example of that teaching follows, drawing a contrast between the wise and mockers and urging the listener to choose one way or the other (Prov 9:7-12).

Woman Folly asks no such thing, for she has not left those simple ways herself. She sits idly at the door of her house, without servants, calling out with her own voice a parody of Woman Wisdom's invitation, even repeating her words: "Let all who are simple come to my house!" (Prov 9:16; cf. Prov 9:4). Yet Woman Folly offers no teaching except her claim that stolen water is sweet and bread eaten in secret is delicious. She makes no offer of life as Woman Wisdom does, nor does she disclose that her house is the home of the dead (Prov 9:18). Coming at the end of the series of instructions and lectures that form the introduction to the book (Prov 1:1—9:18), the juxtaposed invitations underline the repeated charge to "get wisdom" (Prov 2:1-6; 3:13-18; 4:5-7; 5:1; 8:10-11). The choice between wisdom and folly is unavoidable; to ignore the charge is to decide for folly.

Moreover, both figures and the words of their debate serve as primary symbols for the many characterizations of wise and foolish living presented throughout the book: "The wise woman builds her house, but the foolish one tears it down with her own hands" (Prov 14:1).

Folly becomes the primary symbol for both the smooth words of the strange or "other" woman (Prov 2:16-19; 5:1-6; 6:23-29) and the deceitful words of evil men (Prov 2:12-15; 4:14-17; 6:12-15). Both forms of seduction illustrate the misuse of speech and its potential to persuade. Woman Folly's "teaching" about stolen water (Prov 9:17) calls to mind the warnings against extramarital relationships (Prov 5:1-23; 7:6-27), and her promises sound remarkably similar to those made by the violent gang (Prov 1:10-19).

Similarly, Woman Wisdom brings together the images of a wise and good wife and associates them with the instruction that the wise parents offer to their son. Wisdom will enter a person's heart and protect it from seduction to evil, just like the parent's teaching (Prov 2:10-16; 6:20-24). Wisdom can be "found" like a wife who brings good things to her husband (Prov 3:13-18; 18:22; 31:10-31) (see Camp). Therefore, the young man is told to love and cherish wisdom, calling her "my sister," a term of marital endearment (Prov 4:6-9; 7:4-5; cf. Song 5:1-2) (see Murphy). As an example of ancient Near Eastern instruction that was typically directed to young men, these personifications must be interpreted and taught in a way that includes men and *women, the young and the old. Moreover, preachers and teachers will remember that both men and women are made examples of wisdom and folly, avoiding gender stereotypes.

But Woman Wisdom is more than a good wife: she is a counselor of kings. Her script is enriched by a monologue that proclaims her love of truthful speech and inspiration of righteous rulers (Prov 8:1-16); the authority that she claims is grounded in her presence at creation. Because she was witness as God established the orders of the cosmos, she can advise human authorities on right social order (Prov 3:19-20; 8:22-36). As personified in Proverbs and Job 28 (and as further developed in the apocryphal books *Sirach, Baruch, *Wisdom of Solomon), wisdom represents a way of life and a mediation of divine instruction that NT writers used to describe Jesus Christ, the wisdom of God (1 Cor 1:24; Col 1:15-17; 2:2-3).

The rich and varied use of personification encourages the biblical interpreter to identify examples of the figure and, more importantly, to discover their rhetorical strategies as expressions of God's desire for relationship. Personification as a kind of symbolic action gives a face and a voice to the broad range of life experiences, skillfully crafted to shape a response of faithfulness.

See also ANIMAL IMAGERY; CREATION IMAGERY; FEMINIST INTERPRETATION; FLORAL IMAGERY; IMAGERY; MOUNTAIN IMAGERY; POETICS; TERMINOLOGY OF; WOMAN WISDOM AND WOMAN FOLLY; ZION.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. J. Arthos and T. V. F. Brogan, "Personification," in The New Princeton Encyclopedia of Poetry and Poetics, ed. A. Preminger and T. V. F. Brogan (Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1993) 994; A. Berlin, Lamentations (OTL; Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 2002); M. E. Biddle, "The Figure of Lady Jerusalem: Identification, Deification and Personification of Cities in the Ancient Near East," in The Biblical Canon in Comparative Perspective, ed. K. L. Younger Jr., W. W. Hallo and B. Batto (ANETS 11; Lewiston, NY: Edwin Mellen, 1991) 173-94; T. V. F. Brogan and A. W. Halsall, "Prosopopoeia," in The New Princeton Encyclopedia of Poetry and Poetics, ed. A. Preminger and T. V. F. Brogan (Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1993) 994; E. W. Bullinger, Figures of Speech Used in the Bible (Grand Rapids: Baker, 1975) 861-69; K. Burke, Counter-Statement (2nd ed.; Berkeley: University of California Press, 1968); C. V. Camp, Wisdom and the Feminine in the Book of Proverbs (BLS 11; Sheffield: Almond, 1985); E. R. Follis, "Zion, Daughter of," ABD 6.1103; K. M. Heim, "The Personification of Jerusalem and the Drama of Her Bereavement in Lamentations," in Zion, City of Our God, ed. R. S. Hess and G. J. Wenham (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1999) 129-69; D. Hillers, Lamentations (rev. ed.; AB 7A; Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1972); B. B. Kaiser, "Poet as 'Female Impersonator': The Imagery of Daughter Zion as Speaker in Biblical Poems of Suffering," JR 67 (1987) 164-82; P. E. Koptak, "Reading Scripture with Kenneth Burke: Genesis 38," in To Hear and Obey: Essays in Honor of Fredrick Carlson Holmgren, ed. P. E. Koptak and B. J. Bergfalk (Chicago: Covenant Publications, 1997) 84-94; idem, Proverbs (NIVAC 15; Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 2003); R. E. Murphy, "The Personification of Wisdom," in Wisdom in Ancient Israel: Essays in Honour of J. A. Emerton, ed. J. Day, R. P. Gordon and H. G. M. Williamson (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1995) 222-33; J. J. Paxson, The Poetics of Personification (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1994).

P. E. Koptak

PLOT DEVELOPMENT. SEE NOVELLA, STORY, NARRATIVE; RUTH 1: BOOK OF.

POETICS, TERMINOLOGY OF

The terminology used by scholars when discussing Hebrew literature, and especially poetry, can be confusing. This is not just because they use unfamiliar technical terms that the nonspecialist cannot understand; it is also because sometimes different terms are used to refer to the same thing, and occasionally the same term is used with different meanings. The present article concentrates on the more common terms used in discussion of Hebrew poetry. The terms are divided into three groups: (1) those used in discussion of the basic unit of Hebrew poetry; (2) those used to refer to specific features or characteristics of Hebrew poetry; (3) those used to refer to units of poetry larger than the basic unit.

1. The Basic Unit of Hebrew Poetry
2. Features Characteristic of Hebrew Poetry
3. The Structure of a Hebrew Poem

1. The Basic Unit of Hebrew Poetry.

1.1. Definition of Terms. The most common feature of Hebrew poetry is a sentence, which is divided into two parts by a pause or break in sense, for which the technical term is caesura. This break is marked in modern editions of the Bible by a punctuation mark, a comma or semicolon in English translations and an accent mark in the Hebrew text. In scholarly papers it is sometimes marked by a single or repeated slash—for example, Psalm 33:6-7:

By the word of the LORD the heavens were made //
and by the breath of his mouth all their host.
He gathers the waters of the sea as a heap //
he puts the deeps in storehouses.

The original Hebrew text did not have punctuation marks, and so the caesura has to be recognized on the grounds of the meaning of the two parts of the sentence and, sometimes, the grammar (the use of “and” in the Hebrew in Ps 33:6 clearly marks a break in the sentence).

Some scholars use the term line to refer to the whole sentence (Alter, 9), while others use it of the subunits that make up the sentence (O'Connor, 52; Watson, 12). J. P. Fokkerman (38) uses “line” of the whole sentence and describes it as “the verse in the literary sense.” Unfortunately the use of the term verse to refer to a unit of Hebrew poetry can cause confusion because these literary verses do not always coincide with the numbered verses in the Bible, a point that Fokkerman (13-14) recognizes. Less common now than it used to be is the use of the term stich (sometimes stichos) of either the whole sentence (O'Connor, 52) or its subunits (Watson, 12).

A variety of terms are used for the subunits of the sentence. The one now used most commonly is colon (pl., cola). R. Alter (9) prefers to use the term verset, as does Fokkerman (30, 46), though he sometimes uses “colon” as an alternative. M. O'Connor (52) prefers to use the term line to refer to the subunits, a term that Watson (12) uses interchangeably with “colon.” Although most of the scholars who use the term hemistich use it as an alternative to “colon,” W. G. E. Watson (12) uses it of “a subdivision of the colon, generally equal to half the length of the colon.”

Watson (12) comments, “The two-colon unit can almost be taken as standard in Hebrew poetry.” A sentence of this type is called a bicolon. Sentences can be made up of three cola (a tricolon [e.g., Ps 18:8]), four cola (a tetracolon, sometimes called a quatrain [e.g., Jer 2:13]) or, rarely, more.

1.2. The Debate. There is a debate about what constitutes the “basic unit” of Hebrew poetry (Gottwald, 831). O'Connor (52-54) argues that it is “the smallest apparent unit,” what he calls the line, and others call the colon. D. Clines (95) argues that in a bicolon the meanings of the two cola have to be taken together so that the understanding of one modifies the understanding of the other; as a result, the meaning of the whole is more than the sum of its parts. The same would, of course, apply to a tricolon or tetracolon. Fokkerman (45-47) too recognizes what he calls the verse (a bicolon, tricolon, etc.) as the basic unit of meaning in Hebrew poetry; however, he points out that its meaning must be understood in the context of the whole poem of which it is part.

2. Features Characteristic of Hebrew Poetry.

2.1. Introduction. Scholars differ in their lists of the features that are characteristic of Hebrew poetry. Most agree that parallelism, terseness (including ellipsis) and the use of imagery are important characteristics. Some, like O'Connor, have gone below the “surface” of the text to look for characteristics at the level of the underlying grammar. There is considerable disagreement about the importance of meter* or rhythm, with most doubtful of their importance. Other features that depend on the sound of words—rhyme, paronomasia, alliteration, assonance—are lost when the Hebrew is translated into another language.

2.2. Parallelism. This term is used to describe the occurrence of a bicolon in which the words in the second colon correspond in some way to those in the first colon. It is generally recognized as the characteristic feature of Hebrew poetry. R. Lowth, in the mid-eighteenth century, was the first person to attempt a systematic analysis of parallelism in Hebrew poetry. He identified three main types of parallelism: synonymous, antithetic and synthetic.

In synonymous parallelism the second colon repeats the sense of the first, though with some variation. For example, Psalm 77:11:

I will remember the deeds of the LORD;
yes, I will remember your wonders of old.

An antithetic parallelism occurs when what is said in the second colon contrasts what is said in the first. For example, Psalm 30:5:

For his anger is for a moment;
his favor is for a lifetime.

The third category, synthetic parallelism, included all those bicola in which the second colon did not either repeat or contrast the first. This third category is a rather vague and unsatisfactory one, and so some scholars have proposed ways of understanding the nature of parallelism in Hebrew poetry other than Lowth's three categories. Alter argues that the second colon focuses, heightens or specifies what is expressed in the first colon. In Psalm 77:11 the “deeds” mentioned in the first colon are specified as “wonders of old” in the second. The second colon of Psalm 30:5 is a heightening of what is said because the brevity of God's anger is contrasted with the long-lasting nature of God's favor. J. Kugel sums up what he sees to be the essence of parallelism in the formula: “A, and what's more, B.” B in some way “seconds” the thought of A.

Lowth's approach emphasizes semantic par- allelism—that is, correspondence between the meanings of the two cola. Berlin draws attention to the importance of grammatical parallelism in Hebrew poetry. This can take various forms. Parallelism can be produced by replacing one word with another that has the same grammatical function: a noun in the first colon may be replaced by a pronoun in the second, as in Psalm 33:8:

Let all the earth fear the LORD, let all the inhabitants of the world stand in awe of him.

A feminine word may be replaced by a masculine one, or vice versa. A perfect form of a verb can be replaced by an imperfect form. There can also be more extensive grammatical “transformations” to produce parallelism. A noun clause may replace a verbal one, as in Psalm 34:1:

I will bless the LORD at all times,
This praise shall continually be in my mouth.

There can be a change in the mood of the verb. In Psalm 6:5 a statement is put in parallel with a question:

For in death there is no remembrance of you;
in Sheol who can give you praise?

Berlin also puts some emphasis on lexical parallelism. A major aspect of this is the use of traditional “word pairs” such as “man/woman,” “earth/heaven” and “loyalty/truth.”

2.3. Terseness. Hebrew poetry says what it has to say in as few words as possible. It is rare for a colon to contain more than four words. According to Berlin (5), “It is not parallelism per se, but the predominance of parallelism, combined with terseness, which marks the poetic expression of the Bible.” One feature of this terseness is that certain words and particles that are commonly used in prose either are not used at all or are used much less often in poetry. These are the conjunction “and,” the definite article (both of which are prefixes in Hebrew), the relative pronoun and the definite-object marker. D. N. Freedman (1987, 16-17) suggests that the frequency with which these occur in a piece of Hebrew text is an excellent indicator of whether that text is poetry or prose.

2.4. Ellipsis. This is the omission of a word within a poetic or grammatical unit where it would be expected to be present. The most common form of ellipsis in Hebrew poetry is the omission of a verb from the second colon of a bi-colon. The reader is expected to supply the verb from the first colon. An example is Psalm 114:4:

The mountains skipped like rams, the hills like lambs.

This contributes to the terseness of Hebrew poetry. O'Connor (401) uses the term gapping to refer to ellipsis, and he asserts that it is a basic feature of Hebrew poetry and does not occur in Hebrew prose.

2.5. O'Connor's "Constraints." O'Connor has tried to describe Hebrew poetry in terms of the way in which lines (what others call colons) are structured grammatically. The study of grammatical structure is called "syntax." O'Connor argues that Hebrew poetry can be defined in terms of "syntactical patterns," the various ways in which lines are structured. In his view, it is the existence of limitations on the kinds of patterns that occur, what he calls "syntactical constriction," that is the fundamental feature of Hebrew poetry that distinguishes it from prose. In order to understand his "constraints," it is necessary to understand his terminology. He uses three terms to refer to various constituents of a line or colon.

Unit. Most words count as individual units. However, there are some words in Hebrew, called particles, that O'Connor does not count as units. They usually depend on other words.

Constituent. This is a word or phrase that has a specific grammatical function in a line or colon. The first line of Psalm 106:7 can be divided into four constituents (each is indicated by the words joined by hyphens): "Our-fathers, when-in-Egypt, did-not-consider your-wonderful-works." The first constituent is the grammatical subject of the line, the third is the action carried out by the subject, and the fourth is the grammatical object of the line. The second is a phrase that defines when the action took place.

Clause predicators. The most common of these is the verb. In the example given from Psalm 106:7, it is the verb "consider."

O'Connor gives a list of "constraints." The first four are fairly straightforward, while the other two more complex.

A line contains from zero to no more than three clause predicators.

A line contains at least one and no more than four constituents.

A line contains at least two and no more than five units.

A constituent may contain no more than four units.

If a line contains three clause predicators, it cannot contain a dependent noun or noun phrase, and if it contains two clause predicators, only one of them may have a dependent noun or noun phrase.

If a line contains one or more clause predicators, it cannot contain a noun or noun phrase that is not dependent on one of them.

2.6. Imagery. A characteristic of poetry in many cultures is that it makes more frequent and more intense use of *imagery than is found in prose. This is so with Hebrew poetry. A common way of making a verbal image, a "word picture," is by comparison. The two commonest types of comparison are simile and metaphor.

A simile is an explicit comparison. In English it is often expressed by using the words "like" or "as." For example, "They are like trees planted by rivers of water" (Ps 1:3).

In a metaphor the two things being compared are simply equated with one another without using "like" or "as." For example, "The LORD is my shepherd" (Ps 23:1). This can be quite arresting when the similarity between the elements of the metaphor is not immediately obvious, forcing the reader to stop and think about it.

There are several reasons why a poet might want to make use of imagery. First, an image often makes an emotional impact that a straightforward statement would not. Saying, "God looks after me" does not have the impact of "The LORD is my shepherd." Second, images can carry more than one meaning. An ancient Hebrew reader of Psalm 23 would see connotations of royalty in the shepherd image because ancient Near Eastern rulers were often spoken of as shepherds of their people. This brings out a third reason for the use of imagery: it aids the terseness of Hebrew poetry, saying a great deal in just a few words.

2.7. Meter. One feature of poetry in many cultures is the presence of a regular rhythmic sound pattern, called meter (sometimes spelled “metre”). Because biblical Hebrew stopped being a living language over two thousand years ago there are inevitable uncertainties about how it was spoken, and about intonation and stress (see Hebrew Language). This is one reason why there is considerable debate about whether meter is a feature of Hebrew poetry and, if it is, what form it takes.

S. Mowinckel, for example, argued that poetry is often connected with singing, and singing implies a rhythm. Thus, it was likely that Hebrew poetry, especially the psalms, would be characterized by meter. Mowinckel (163) argued that “the Hebrew poetic rhythm is in principle iambic.” An iambic meter is one in which there is an alternation of stressed and unstressed syllables. Mowinckel (172-74) recognized that the meter within a psalm is sometimes irregular and suggested that this might be due to textual errors or later revision and rewriting of the poem.

This irregularity of meter in many Hebrew poems leads some scholars to deny that meter is an important feature of Hebrew poetry (Kugel, 297-98; O’Connor, 138). Kugel argues that whatever approximate regularity there may be in the meter of a poem arises from the balancing of ideas that is a feature of parallelism. Watson (100), however, points to instances of unusual word order in poetry as evidence that the poet was trying to produce a specific pattern of stress. Watson (92) accepts, though, that the meter is not consistent throughout a Hebrew poem. This inconsistency or variability leads S. E. Gillingham (68) to prefer to speak of rhythm rather than meter because “‘rhythm’ implies discernible patterns, used with fluidity and flexibility throughout a poem.”

2.8. Rhyme. Two words rhyme when they sound alike. Rhyme does not play an important role in Hebrew poetry. End-rhyme, the correspondence in the sound of words, or the final syllable of words, at the end of the lines in poem is a well-known device in English poetry. It is very rare in Hebrew poetry. When it does occur, usually it is the result of using the same suffix or ending in successive cola (Watson, 231).

2.9. Paranomasia. This is the deliberate use of two or more different words that sound alike. Song of Songs 1:3 provides an example. Here the words for “your anointing oils” (šēmānêkā) and “your name” (šēmekā) sound alike. This reinforces the idea of the man’s reputation (“name”) having a good “aroma” like that of anointing oil.

2.10. Alliteration. This is the result of the repetition of the same consonant. Alliteration usually occurs within a colon or bicolon, and it can be seen as a way of giving a kind of cohesion to the unit. In Psalm 127:1 the two words at the end of each colon in the first bicolon contain the Hebrew consonant bêt (English transliteration b).

Unless the LORD builds the house / / those who build it labour in vain

’im-yhwh lō’-yibneh bayit / / šāw’ ʿamlû bônāyw bô

The Hebrew consonant šin (English transliteration sh) is prominent in the second bicolon. The second half is three words in Hebrew, each beginning with šin.

Unless the LORD watches over the city / / the watchman stays awake in vain

’im-yhwh lō’-yišmor-’ir / / šāw’ šāqad šômēr

2.11. Assonance. This occurs when a series of words contains a distinctive vowel sound or certain vowel sounds in a specific sequence. As with alliteration, it gives cohesion to a colon or bicolon. In Psalm 102:6 the first word in each colon has the same sequence of three vowels.

I am like a desert owl / / I am like an owl of the waste places

dāmīti . . . / / hāyīti . . .

3. The Structure of a Hebrew Poem.

3.1. Introduction. Most studies of Hebrew poetry have concentrated on the level of the colon or bicolon. Relatively little study has been made of the rhetorical patterns that might encompass the whole poem (see Rhetorical Criticism). Part of the reason for this is uncertainty about how to set about analysis at this level. It is rare to find explicit markers of structure in the text, though there are two that do occur: the refrain and the acrostic. Although some scholars use the terms strophe and stanza more or less interchangeably (Gillingham, 64, 196), more often they are distinguished, with the stanza being the larger unit, composed of two or more strophes.

3.2. Refrain. This is a repeated sentence, or sentences, which divides the poem into sections. In Psalm 67 the sentence “Let the peoples praise you, O God; let all the peoples praise you” (Ps 67:3, 5) divides the psalm into three sections. In this case the refrain is a fixed formula. Psalm 80 has a refrain that varies slightly. The way God is referred to is heightened in each repetition: “O God” (Ps 80:3), “O God of hosts” (Ps 80:7), “O LORD God of hosts” (Ps 80:19). The variation is greater in Psalm 56:4, 10-11. The repetition of an identical refrain in Psalm 42:5, 11; 43:5 suggests that originally these two psalms were a single poem.

3.3. Acrostic. An acrostic is a poem in which the first letters of successive lines form a recognizable pattern. The examples in the OT follow the order of the letters in the Hebrew alphabet. The best-known examples are Psalm 119; Proverbs 31:10-31; Lamentations 1—4. In Proverbs 31:10-31 and Lamentations 1; 2; 4 each verse begins with a successive letter of the Hebrew alphabet. In Lamentations 3 the verses are grouped into threes, with each verse in the group beginning with the same letter. Psalm 119 has groups of eight verses beginning with the same letter.

3.4. Strophe. A strophe consists of a group of bicola that are linked in some way. Most strophes contain two or three bicola, though they can be longer, and in a few cases a single bicolon can be regarded as a strophe. There are various ways in which a group of bicola can be linked. The following are some possibilities (Fokkerman, 89).

A compound sentence may extend over two or more bicola.

The group of bicola may formulate or explain a single thought.

The bicola may form a clear series of some kind.

The group of bicola may form an embedded speech, such as a quotation.

The group of bicola may present or work out a metaphor or simile.

The group may be bound together by *inclusio (the use of the same word or phrase at the beginning and at the end).

Psalm 13 provides an example of how strophes may be recognized. The first strophe (Ps 13:1-2) is clearly marked out by a series of four questions, each beginning “How long . . . ?” The second strophe (Ps 13:3-4) is a single compound sentence, and it is also marked out by a change from question to command or plea: “Consider and answer me. . . .” The third and final strophe (Ps 13:5-6) is marked by a change from plea to an expression of trust in God: “But I trusted in your steadfast love. . . .” Psalm 2:7-9 is an example of a strophe that is an embedded quotation. In Job 14 there are two strophes that develop a metaphor or simile. In Job 14:7-9 it is the image of a felled tree regenerating from its rots, and in Job 14:10-12 human death is compared to the drying up of a lake. There is an inclusio marking out the strophe of Psalm 69:8-10 (ET 69:7-9), though it is not clearly seen in most English translations.

Upon you [for your sake] I have been abused
 . . .
your abuses [abuses aimed at you] have fallen upon me.

3.5. Stanza. Longer poems can often be divided into stanzas consisting of two or three (occasionally more) strophes. No fixed rules can be given for recognizing stanzas (Fokkerman, 117; Watson, 162). Stanza division is usually based on content, so that new stanzas are marked by changes in subject matter. For example, Psalm 19 can be divided into three stanzas: Psalm 19:1-6, 7-10, 11-14. Occasionally there are markers, most obviously refrains.

See also ACROSTIC; CHIASM; ELLIPSIS; FORM CRITICISM; FRAME NARRATIVE; IMAGERY; INCLUSIO; LYRIC POETRY; MERISM; METER; MUSIC, SONG; ORAL POETRY; PARALLELISM; PERSONIFICATION; REFRAIN; SOUND PATTERN; STANZA, STROPHE; TERSENESS; WORDPLAY.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. R. Alter, The Art of Biblical Poetry (New York: Basic Books, 1985); A. Berlin, The Dynamics of Biblical Parallelism (Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1985); D. Clines, “The Parallelism of Greater Precision: Notes from Isaiah 40 for a Theory of Hebrew Poetry,” in Directions in Hebrew Poetry, ed. E. R. Follis (JSOTSup 40; Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1987) 77-100; T. Collins, Line-Forms in Hebrew Poetry: A Grammatical Approach to the Stylistic Study of the Hebrew Prophets (Rome: Biblical Institute Press, 1978); J. P. Fokkerman, Reading Biblical Poetry: An Introductory Guide (Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 2001); D. N. Freedman, “Pottery, Poetry and Prophecy,” JBL 96 (1977) 5-26; idem, “Another Look at Biblical Hebrew Poetry,” in Directions in Hebrew Poetry, ed. E. R. Follis (JSOT-Sup 40; Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1987) 11-28; S. A. Geller, Parallelism in Early Hebrew Poetry (HSM 20; Missoula, MT: Scholars Press, 1979); S. E. Gillingham, The Poems and Psalms of the Hebrew Bible (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1994); N. K. Gottwald, "Hebrew Poetry," IDB 3.829-38; W. L. Holladay, "Hebrew Verse Structure Revisited (I): Which Words 'Count,'" JBL 118 (1999a) 19-32; idem, "Hebrew Verse Structure Revisited (II): Conjoint Cola, and Further Considerations," JBL 118 (1999b) 401-16; J. Kugel, The Idea of Biblical Poetry (New Haven: Yale University Press, 1981); R. Lowth, Lectures on the Sacred Poetry of the Hebrews (London: T. Tegg & Son, 1835); S. Mowinckel, The Psalms in Israel's Worship, vol. 2 (Oxford: Blackwell, 1962); M. O'Connor, Hebrew Verse Structure (Winona Lake, IN: Eisenbrauns, 1980); T. H. Robinson, The Poetry of the Old Testament (London: Duckworth, 1947); L. A. Schökel, A Manual of Hebrew Poetics (SubBi 11; Rome: Pontificio Istituto Biblico, 1988); W. G. E. Watson, Classical Hebrew Poetry: A Guide to Its Techniques (JSOTSup 26; Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1986). E. C. Lucas

POETRY, HEBREW. See PSALMS 1: BOOK OF.

POLYTHEISM. See DIVINE COUNCIL.

POSTCOLONIAL INTERPRETATION. See HERMENEUTICS.

POSTHOLOCAUST INTERPRETATION. See HERMENEUTICS.

POSTMODERN INTERPRETATION. See HERMENEUTICS.

POVERTY, PROVISIONS FOR. See RUTH 2: ANCIENT NEAR EASTERN BACKGROUND.

PRAISE. See HYMNS; WORSHIP.

PRISON. See IMPRISONMENT IMAGERY.

PROPHECY. See WISDOM AND PROPHECY.

PROPHETS. See WISDOM AND PROPHECY.

PROTECTION IMAGERY

The psalmist's praise for the protector-Lord resonates with military tones: "I love you, O LORD, my strength, O LORD, my crag, my fortress, my deliverer, my God, my rock in whom I seek refuge, my shield, and the horn of my salvation, my stronghold" (Ps 18:1-2). We also hear cultic, judicial, pastoral, medical, wisdom and family echoes in protection imagery. And the "root metaphor" behind most of this is kingship, whether divine or divinely ordained (Mettinger, 92).

1. Military Protection Imagery
2. Nonmilitary Protection Imagery

1. Military Protection Imagery.

1.1. Refuge. Refuge serves as the key biblical protection image. The ancient Near Eastern ideas of finding refuge in cult and king occur frequently, often alongside related imagery having to do with fortifications and good defensive terrain.

1.1.1. Ancient Near Eastern Background of the Metaphor. J. Creach (61-62) posits three sources of Israel's metaphor of divine refuge: (1) *Zion, whose ramparts signaled security (citing Keel, 179-80; Ps 31:1-4; 61:2b-4; 71:1-3; see also 1 Chron 11:5b, 7-8; Prov 18:10), and whose temple functioned as "the place of refuge par excellence" (citing Keel, 181; 1 Kings 1:50-53; cf. 1 Kings 2:28-34; see also Ex 21:13-14; Num 35:10-34); (2) Palestine's rugged topography, which had provided literal refuge to *David (citing Keel, 180-81; 1 Sam 22-24; 2 Sam 23:14; (3) the mother bird, whose outstretched wings symbolized protection (citing Keel, 191-92; Ps 17:8; 36:7; 57:1; 61:4; 63:7; 91:4; Ruth 2:12; see also Deut 32:10-12; Mt 23:37b).

Contrary to some claims (noted by Keel, 180-81), this royal/divine protection imagery is not unique to Israel. Various ancient Near Eastern confessions acknowledge dependence upon their king as protector (Creach, 56-58), and they incorporate protection metaphors into divine titles—for example, Anu-du-di ("Anu is my bulwark"), Istar-dūri ("Ishtar is my wall"), Ellil-kidinī ("Ellil is my protection") (Widengren, 82). Similar metaphorical titles apply to Marduk, Adad, Ashur, Nebo, Shamash, Ea and Dagan (Widengren, 324-25).

1.1.2. Royal Connections of the Metaphor. Generally, the Lord provides this refuge, either as a king protecting his realm and subjects or as a host sheltering his guests (e.g., Ps 23:5-6; 27:4; 65:4; 84) (see Keel, 198). Zion gives refuge because, according to Psalm 48:2, it is "the city of the great king" (Creach, 55). By analogy, Israel's king (Ps 84:9; 89:18) or even other rulers (Ps 47:8-9) can serve as a “shield” (māgēn [cf. Rom 13:1-7; 1 Tim 2:1-2; 1 Pet 2:13-17]). The book of *Lamentations rued the failure of the ideal of the protective royal “shadow” (Lam 4:20; cf. Jer 39:5-7).

1.1.3. Stronghold or Fortress. The Hebrew text frequently uses šūr (“rock”) or selaʿ (“stone” or “cliff, crag”) as a figure for the protector God. The LXX of *Psalms avoids the metaphorical petra for God, tending towards literal explanations, either an outright theos (Ps 18:31, 46; 28:1; 31:2; 62:2, 6-7; 71:3; 73:26; 92:15; 95:1 [LXX: 17:32, 47; 27:1; 30:3; 61:3, 7-8; 70:3; 72:26; 91:16; 94:1]) or other literal explanations of the metaphor, such as “strength” (krataiōmai), “help” (boēthos), “protector” (antileptōr) or “firm support” (stereōma) (Olofsson, 35-37). The praise “my rock” (e.g., Ps 62:2, 6-7) frequently parallels either similar figures such as “strength . . . stronghold” (Ps 31:2) and “fortress” (Ps 71:3) or more literal language such as “salvation” (Ps 18:46) or “redeemer” (Ps 19:14).

A range of related terms express the same idea of metaphorical refuge in God: “mountain stronghold” (mēšûdâ, māʿōz) or “strength” (ʿōz). With three exceptions in our literature (Job 39:28; Ps 66:11; Eccles 9:12), mēšûdâ serves as a divine title that symbolizes Yahweh’s protection (Ps 18:2; 31:2-3; 71:3; 91:2; 144:2). And the two nominal derivatives of the verb ʿzz (“be strong”) define Yahweh as a powerful ally (e.g., Ps 28:7; 59:17; 81:1; 118:14) or as an excellent defensive position (e.g., Ps 27:1; 28:8; 31:2; 37:39; 43:2; 52:7; Prov 10:29). A “mountain refuge” (mišgāb, from šāgab, “be set on high”) implies a secure height. As with the “stone” terms, the LXX often eliminates this metaphor as a title for God, using “protector” (antileptōr) instead (e.g., Ps 18:2; 59:9, 16-17 [LXX: 17:3; 58:10, 17-18]).

1.1.4. Cover or Shelter. Various terms describe divine cover or shelter. With one exception (Ps 104:18), the psalms always describe finding “refuge” (hāsâ, maḥseh) as divine protection in this life (Ruth 2:12b; Ps 91:2, 9; Prov 30:5) or even after death (Prov 14:32). The LXX can use the equally metaphorical kataphygē (“refuge”) (Ps 46:1 [LXX 45:1]), but it generally abandons the metaphor in favor of the literal sense, using terms such as “hope” (elpis), “help” (boēthos) or “protector” (antileptōr). The mention of “hiding” (sātar) can imply that there will be no protection when, for example, God hides his face (e.g., Job 13:24; Ps 13:1; 27:9; cf. Num 6:24-26), and it can even imply deceit (Job 24:15; 34:22).

But the “hiding place” (sēter) may also be protective (e.g., Job 14:13; Ps 17:8; 27:5). The protection by a king can be described as “shade, shadow” (šēl) (Song 2:3; Lam 4:20), as can the more figurative protection of either wisdom or money (Eccl 7:12). And it is especially useful to describe protection found in God’s shade (Ps 121:5), especially under the shadow of God’s wings (Ps 17:8; 36:7; 57:1; 63:7; 91:1). God provides “cover” (sākak) for his people (Ps 5:11; 91:4), perhaps even functioning like a helmet to cover the head (Ps 140:7) just as he does as a shield to protect the body.

1.1.5. Den or Dwelling. The word māʿōn has its background as the animal’s den or lair (Job 37:8; 38:40; Ps 104:22; Song 4:8). Sometimes the remoteness of the lair symbolizes the transcendence of God’s habitation, which is then applied metaphorically to God’s abode in the temple (Wilson, 1015-16). Above all, this can refer to the temple as a place of escape, literally, but perhaps also figuratively (Ps 84:3). Nonetheless, O. Keel (181) notes that even this symbolism of refuge avoids images associated with death: “Yahweh is never called ‘my cave’ or ‘my crevice,’ though in concreto these were resorted to for refuge as frequently as rocks and mountaintops. . . . From the perspective of cosmic ‘geography,’ however, they belong to the realm of the netherworld and are not suited for description of Yahweh, who is a God of life.”

1.2. Armaments. One armament is defensive, the “shield” (māgēn, šinnâ). Sometimes God provides the shield in the person of his anointed king (Ps 84:9; 89:18), but more often God himself takes up the shield and comes to the rescue (Ps 35:2). Sometimes a divine characteristic such as salvation (Ps 18:35), favor (Ps 5:12) or faithfulness (Ps 91:4) is the shield, and sometimes God himself is the shield (e.g., Ps 3:3; 18:30; 33:20; Prov 2:7; 30:5). So a common divine appellation is “my shield” (Ps 7:10; 18:2; 28:7; 119:114; 144:2) or “our shield” (Ps 33:20; 59:11). J. F. D. Creach (29) wonders if “shield” eventually became a dead metaphor meaning little more than “helper” or “protector,” because māgēn is never used of Yahweh as a shield against enemy arrows, though that figurative expression would sometimes have been appropriate (e.g., Ps 11:2; cf. Eph 6:16). Indeed, the LXX of Psalms translates it as hyperapistēs (“protector”) most of the time.

Other armaments incorporated into the protection imagery are offensive, though used for protection. The Lord can take to his wind-driven “cloud-chariot” (rēkūb [Ps 104:3]), sometimes described as “cherubim” (kērūb [Ps 18:10]), and his hosts can command thousands of them (Ps 68:17) in defense of his people. “Lightning” (’ôr; i.e., God’s “arrows” [hēš]) provides protection by scattering or piercing the heart of the psalmist’s enemies (Ps 18:14; 45:5; 144:6). Sometimes God protects by stringing his “bow” (qešet) to fight the psalmist’s enemies (Ps 7:12), other times by breaking their bows (Ps 46:9) so they cannot employ them against “the upright” (Ps 11:2; 37:14). And the same dual dynamic applies to other weapons that God may wield himself (Ps 18:14; 144:6) or remove from enemy hands (Ps 76:3), such as the “sword” (hereb [Ps 45:3]) and “spear” (hānūt [Ps 35:3; 46:9]).

1.3. Other Military Protection. The psalmist frequently asks God to “guard” (šāmar) or “watch over” (nāšar) him. In a metaphorical sense, wisdom, instruction, discretion, a parent’s instruction, and so forth are said to guard and watch over the disciple (Prov 2:11; 4:4-6; 6:20-24). In turn, those who adhere to those principles guard and watch over their own lives (Prov 13:3; 16:17; 19:16; 21:23).

Although “shade” or a “shadow” (šēl) is often associated with things ephemeral (e.g., Ps 102:11; Eccles 6:12) or even with death (e.g., Ps 44:19; 107:10, 14), God’s “shade” is consistently construed as positive. In this case, its background is like shade that protects from sunstroke. The shade is God himself (Ps 91:1; 121:5), but sometimes it is mediated, whether through his appointed kings (Is 32:1-2; Lam 4:20; cf. Judg 9:15; see also Song 2:3) or through his gift of “wisdom” (hokmā [Eccles 7:12]).

The “wing” (kanap) also symbolizes protection, either by the phrase “shadow of your wings” (Ps 17:8; 36:7; 57:1; 63:7) or by “wings” used with a verb for finding shelter/refuge (hāsā [Ruth 2:12; Ps 61:4; 91:4]). The image of a bird spreading her wings over her hatchlings is at the root of this image (cf. Mt 23:37). Some also suggest that this could also be connected to the cultic image of the cherubim, whose wings extended protectively over the ark (Keel, 190, citing Ps 36:7; 63:7; see also Kraus, 2.248-49). Note also the parallel between “wings of the wind” and the “cherubim” (Ps 18:10/2 Sam 22:11) or the “cloud-chariot” (Ps 104:3).

The “horn” (qeren) may symbolize protection. O. Keel (146) connects the “horn of my salvation” (Ps 18:2/2 Sam 22:3) “with the power of protection offered by the horns of the altar,” where the blood of atonement was applied (Keel, 146; citing Lev 8:15; 16:18; 1 Kings 1:50; 2:28; Amos 3:14). Indeed, most plurals of qeren refer to the altar’s horns. On the other hand, M. Brown (991) connects the phrase with the use of qeren to refer to a hillside “promontory” or “peak” (Is 5:1) and says that it may mean something more like “peak of safety,” a notion paralleled by calling God a “rock,” “fortress” or the like. However, the singulars and duals refer either to literal animal horns or to the power that they symbolize, and the lifted horn often symbolizes oppressive power. So the psalmist looks forward to a time when the horn of the wicked will be cut off (Ps 75:4-5, 10) in favor of the divine “horn of salvation” (Ps 18:2), who is in turn represented by the Davidic king whose horn God exalts (Ps 89:17, 24; 92:10; 112:9; 132:17; 148:14).

2. Nonmilitary Protection Imagery.

2.1. Medical. When facing death, the psalmist cries out, “Heal me” (rāpā’ [Ps 6:2b]), and later he is thankful for God’s healing (Ps 30:2; 103:3). Sometimes it is difficult to determine whether this is literal healing from deathly sickness (Ps 6:2), psychological or spiritual healing (Ps 147:3), or more a matter of rescue from a generally unhealthy situation (Ps 41, esp. v. 4; 107, esp. v. 20). Perhaps these would have been inconsequential distinctions for Israel, who would have understood healing in a more holistic way that linked physical healing, forgiveness and wellness of the “soul” (Chan, Song and Brown, 1165-68).

2.2. Cultic. Here we have first to do with the image of Mount Zion as a mountain redoubt, and particularly the representation of the temple as a fortress (see 1.1.3 above), which may reflect the common ancient Near Eastern motif of the mountaintop as the abode of the gods. But we also hear of the temple as a sanctuary from blood vengeance and of the altar as the symbol of that sanctuary. In fact, as previously noted (see 1.3 above), the symbol “horn” does frequently refer to the altar’s horns, where one might find refuge (e.g., 1 Kings 1:50-51; 2:28). Even the birds find sanctuary in God’s presence at the temple (Ps 84:3), so how much more so do God’s own people.

2.3. Judicial. Sometimes protection comes by judicial intervention against an oppressor (Job 5:4; 6:23; Ps 10:18; 72:4, 12, 14; 82:3) or as the result of judicial vindication in the face of unjust accusations (e.g., Ps 7:6, 8, 11; 35:23). So the psalmist cries out, “Argue my case” (Ps 119:154), and he expresses confidence that “the LORD will champion their cause” and get justice for the poor (Ps 140:12).

2.4. Pastoral. We hear of the protective shepherd (Ps 23) or of his “arm(s)” (Ps 28:9). Since “shepherd” is a royal metaphor, it can involve enthronement (Ps 80:1) and with protecting a dynastic inheritance (Ps 28:9). And perhaps the talk of “hedging” (śûk/sûk) is a pastoral image of using a thorny hedge to protecting the flock (cf. 1 Sam 25:16) or crop field (Ps 80:12; cf. Is 5:5). It would be the background for the complaint by *Satan that God overprotects *Job (Job 1:10) or Job’s complaint that God unfairly restricts him (Job 3:23; cf. Hos 2:6).

2.5. Light. If the threat is ominous darkness of death (Ps 38:10), the protection may come from God either as “light” (’or) or a “lamp” (nêr) (e.g., Job 29:3; 33:28; Ps 13:3; 18:28; 112:4; 132:17). Or God may snuff out the light of the enemy (Prov 13:9; 20:20; 24:20). M. Selman notes the covenantal aspect of God’s promise of light, which featured in the Aaronic blessing (Selman, NIDOTTE 1.324-25, 327, citing Num 6:24-26; Ps 27:1; 31:16; 67:1; 80:3, 7, 19; 89:15). When God gives light, he is doing one of two things: he may be answering the problem of the darkness of death by sustaining the light of life (Selman, NIDOTTE 1.325, citing Ps 13:3), giving of his own light to keep alight a person’s flickering lamp of life (Selman, NIDOTTE 3.159, citing Ps 18:28); or he may be giving spiritual understanding (Selman, NIDOTTE 1.325, citing Ps 19:8; 119:130), which is paralleled by the life-sustaining function of “law/teaching” (tôrâ), and with “wisdom” (hokmâ) and other terms in that semantic range (e.g., Ps 119:105; Prov 6:23; 20:27).

2.6. Parental or Nursing. Protective actions can be described figuratively as those of a “father” (Job 29:16; Ps 68:5; 89:26) or of a “mother” at whose breasts children find not only nourishment but also protection (Ps 22:9b; Lam 4:3). Or God can be even described as a “midwife” who safely brought the psalmist into the world (Ps 22:9a; 71:6). So Lamentations describes exile as the loss of parental protection suffered by orphans (Lam 5:3).

2.7. Miscellaneous. Protection metaphors are as diverse as the many threat metaphors to which they respond. Protection from a fatal slip might come in the form of a helping hand from the Lord (Ps 145:14), from his strong right hand (Ps 18:35-36) or even from his hesed (“steadfast love” [Ps 94:18]). This might also be accompanied by better trail maintenance (Ps 18:35-36). The fear of disappearance into the depths or into the pit of Sheol provokes the cry “Do not let the depths engulf me, do not let the pit swallow me” (Ps 69:14-15), although, ironically, Job seeks temporary asylum in Sheol (Job 14:13). If the lion, feral dog or wild ox—or people who are equally rapacious—threaten the psalmist’s soul, then the protector breaks jaw, fang, claw and horn (Job 29:17; Ps 3:7; 22:21; 58:6; 75:10; 124:6).

See also CHAOS AND DEATH; CONFIDENCE, PSALMS OF; KINGSHIP PSALMS; LIFE; SUFFERING; THEODICY; WARFARE.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. M. L. Brown, “נֶר,” NIDOTTE 3.990-92; A. K.-Y. Chan, T. B. Song and M. L. Brown, “נֶר,” NIDOTTE 3.1162-73; J. F. D. Creach, Yahweh as Refuge and the Editing of the Hebrew Psalter (JSOTSup 217; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1996); O. Keel, The Symbolism of the Biblical World: Ancient Near Eastern Iconography and the Book of Psalms (New York: Seabury, 1978); H.-J. Kraus, Psalms (2 vols.; Minneapolis: Augsburg, 1989); T. N. D. Mettinger, In Search of God: The Meaning and Message of the Everlasting Names (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1988); S. Olofsson, God Is My Rock: A Study of Translation Technique and Theological Exegesis in the Septuagint (ConBOT 31; Stockholm: Almqvist & Wiksell, 1990); M. J. Selman, “נֶר,” NIDOTTE 1.324-29; idem, “נֶר,” NIDOTTE 3.159-60; G. Widengren, The Accadian and Hebrew Psalms of Lamentation as Religious Documents: A Comparative Study (Stockholm: Thule, 1937); G. H. Wilson, “נֶר,” NIDOTTE 2.1015-16.

D. A. Brueggemann

PROVERB, GENRE OF

What is a proverb? How is a single proverb changed when pulled out of its original story and resituated in a collection? How does a proverb’s meaning shift when it is recontextualized after being taken from a collection and merged back into a new and often diverse story? Do all proverbs move with and invoke the same level of authority? What literary forms occur in the biblical text of *Proverbs (better-than, abomination, numerical sayings, etc.)? Do larger units of pairs, strings/clusters, mini-collections and whole collections actually exist and reflect editorial intent? The goal of the present article is to crack open the core nature of the pithy proverbial sayings by wrestling with these and related questions.

1. Historical and Cultural Universality of the Proverb Genre
2. Toward a Definition of the Proverb
3. The Virtual Potential of Collected Proverbs
4. Proverbial Usage
5. Proverbial Authority
6. Proverbial Orality
7. Hebrew Proverbs
8. Proverbial Forms
9. Editorial Compositional Units
10. Future Directions and Reflections

1. Historical and Cultural Universality of the Proverb Genre.

From the ancient clay tablets of Sumer (c. 2500 BC) to postmodern Internet pop-ups, the proverb has crossed all cultural, linguistic and literary boundaries. It appears embedded in epics, poems, songs, plays, novels and modern advertising, and stands solo in a myriad of international and regional proverbial collections. The human urge to classify, generalize and codify experience, filtered through a culture's ideals and values, helps explain the universality of the proverb. One might say that proverbs are an encoding compression schema of the mind (Honeck).

The detachable and collectable proverbial form was early bound into Sumerian proverb collections, including the Shuruppak Instructions, dating back to 2600-1800 BC, shortly after the invention of writing itself (Alster). Old Babylonian proverbial clusters were copied from Sumerian unilingual collections into bilingual lists, even maintaining the same sequence and thereby reflecting the international movement of early proverbial wisdom (Lambert). Later, Ahiqar, who served as a sage in the Assyrian courts (c. 700 BC), recorded proverbs that were widely transmitted across the ancient Near East and Ahiqar was even translated into Arabic.

Egypt also has a long tradition of proverbial instructions, often in a parent-to-child format, extending from the Old Kingdom (c. 2600-2100 BC [e.g., Hardjedef, Kagameni]), Middle Kingdom (c.

2000-1600 BC [e.g., Ptahhotep]) and New Kingdom (c. 1500-1080 BC [e.g., Amenemope, Ani]) down to demotic and the Ptolemaic times (c. 300 BC [e.g., Ankhsheshonq]) (Lichtheim; Pritchard).

Adages from classical Greek and Roman times have been compiled, and English, Chinese, European and Russian collections are also voluminous (Mieder 1986). Oral proverbial production is still very much alive in the folklore of numerous groups on the African continent. The proverbial form is an ancient, universal and culturally fluid form.

2. Toward a Definition of the Proverb.

Cervantes defines proverbs as "short sentences drawn from long experience." Ibn Ezra describes the proverb as having "three characteristics: few words, good sense, and a fine image." The world's leading paremiologist (from paroimia, Gk for "proverb"), W. Mieder, defines the proverb as "a short, generally known sentence of the folk which contains wisdom, truth, morals, and traditional views in a metaphorical, fixed and memorable form and which is handed down from generation to generation" (Mieder 2004, 3). While the Hebrew term māšāl, often translated "proverb," can include longer units such as instructions (Prov 1:10-19), numerical sayings (Prov 30:29-31) and *acrostics (Prov 31:10-31), it is often used for short proverbial sentences (Prov 10-22). Even in the longer wisdom forms there is a compression of thought and expression.

Mieder's definition fits well with the biblical proverbs: (1) proverbs are short (in Prov 10—29 usually self-contained short sentences); (2) proverbs are used among the folks ("As the proverb of the ancients says" in 1 Sam 24:13, as opposed to the prophetic "Thus says the LORD"); (3) proverbs are metaphorical (e.g., "tongue is choice silver" in Prov 10:20); (4) proverbial forms are fixed (e.g., "better than" proverbs [Prov 19:1], yet open to variation [cf. Prov 10:1 with Prov 17:25]); (5) proverbs proffer wise and moralistic advice (e.g., righteous/wicked contrast [Prov 10:3]; wise/foolish contrast [Prov 10:8]); (6) proverbs are transmitted intergenerationally (in Prov 4:3-4 the father tells his son to listen to the advice that his father gave him; see also Prov 31:1-9).

The structural paremiologists A. Dundes, A. L. Kuusi and G. B. Milner have noted that binary (+/-) oppositions between the topic and comment often characterize proverbial sentences. Milner's doubled binary opposition, which he labels "quadripartite structure," though not absolutely universal, is frequently seen in the biblical proverbial formulations. For example, Proverbs 10:4:

Topic	Comment
Lazy hands [-]	make a person poor [-]
but diligent hands [+]	bring wealth [+]

Paremiological studies have shown how modern proverbs are translated from one culture to another (see 1 Kings 4:31-34; Prov 30:1; 31:1). Such intercultural modern proverbial transitions may shed light on connections between Proverbs 22 and the Egyptian Amemope (see Washington; Ruffle). In addition, they have offered ways of conceptualizing and analyzing proverbs. Paremiologists have also developed models for tracing a proverb and its variants historically through a thousand years and across numerous cultures. C. Westermann and F. W. Golka have explored the use of African proverbs, which provide great profit for understanding biblical proverb formation and contexts in which they functioned.

In short, as modern literary studies (see Longman and Ryken; Alter) have enriched the exegesis of the biblical text, so too paremiological studies are able to give perspectives that shed light on how biblical proverbs work. The enriching dialogue between scholars of biblical proverbs and paremiologists is in its infancy (see Fontaine).

3. The Virtual Potential of Collected Proverbs.

A proverb is created from a singular situation (1 Sam 10:12). An observed pattern is isolated and a general inference formulated. This inductively, deductively or analogically derived inference is then distilled into a concise, poetically crafted statement. The proverb is then detached from that original setting to be used as an intergenerationally traditional saying among the folk in a thousand diverse contexts. Often it is transformed and twisted with use (e.g., "Different strokes for different folks" to "Different hopes for different folks"; cf. Prov 13:14 with 14:27). Traditional sayings are then gathered by editors into collections. These collections are taught to children, students, scribes and royal officials in homes, schools and royal courts (see Gammie and Perdue). An individual proverb learned in the collection is later recontextualized or instantiated in a hundred different contexts, unleashing its potential in specific new situations (see Jas 5:20; cf. Prov 10:12).

Some conclude that proverbs that have been detached from their original situations into sterile collections are dead (Mieder 1974). However, once detached or decontextualized into a collection, the collected proverb becomes much more flexible and gains multisemantic possibilities and polysituational adaptability in terms of its future use. Its potential is virtual in the collection and realized when it is reattached and recontextualized.

How the proverb is understood changes when it is taken from a collection and put into diverse and new interactional situations (see Fontaine, 57-58). Thus one may cite "A wise child brings joy to a father" (Prov 10:1a) to encourage a child to make a wise decision, to challenge a parent to show emotion, to thank a faithful adult child or to critique a parent's response. The virtual potential of this collected proverb may be realized in a multitude of ways when it is recontextualized in each new interactional situation.

4. Proverbial Usage.

Proverbs are detachable units designed for conversational reattachment in new situations. The importance of proverbial usage is clearly acknowledged in the book of Proverbs itself: "Like a lame man's legs that hang limp is a proverb in the mouth of a fool" (Prov 26:7, 9).

Not only should the content of what is said be understood, but also the actual impact of the statement on the listener should be carefully noted. This may be seen in the use of Proverbs 14:15: "A simple person believes anything." One can easily imagine recontextualizing this same proverb in a wide range of speech-act contexts in order to expose, humiliate, rebuke, mock, warn, guide, encourage, evaluate, humor, cause reflection or instruct, among others. Thus the situation of use is as important in shaping its current meaning as an analysis of the semantic/syntactic content of the proverb and its original Sitz im Leben.

Culture also plays a role in determining how a proverb is to be understood. In Scotland, "A rolling stone gathers no moss" indicates the need to keep up with modern trends lest undesirable moss grow and reveal a lack of mental vitality. In England, on the other hand, the same proverb means that if things are continually in flux, desirable traits (moss) will not have sufficient stability to thrive (Kirshenblatt-Gimblett). Culture impacts how proverbs are interpreted, and one must make an effort to understand both the culture of origin and the current culture of usage.

When the proverb is instantiated, it is cited as coming from a wider community rather than as originating from a specific author ("As they say" [cf. 1 Sam 10:11-12; 19:24]). Hence the locus of authority is moved from the speaker using the proverb to a collective indirect tradition. Proverbs also function phatically to establish, maintain and restore social relationships and to reinforce solidarity and accepted norms that bond a community together (cf. the "friends" of *Job).

In Proverbs 1:17, "How useless to spread a net in full view of all the birds!" is used as a concluding argument to turn a young person away from the lure of violent companions. The proverb is easily identified. There is a shift from a literal description of hoodlums shedding innocent blood to a proverbial metaphor in the image of a bird and a snare (see also Prov 5:15; Eccles 1:18; 4:5-6; 9:12-13). Here, as often, the proverb is used to close or concisely summarize an argument.

5. Proverbial Authority.

It should be clear at this point that it is difficult to discuss the independent veracity of a collected proverb and its authority, especially when the proverbs in collections are so polyvalent and decontextualized. Genre does not determine whether the Scriptures are true; it merely shapes how that truth is formulated into text. The historical narratives face a similar difficulty in authority when moving from a historical particular to a generalized application. Proverbs are not meant to be dogmatized into universal propositional truths. That was one of the mistakes made by Job's "friends."

How is the authority of Proverbs to be understood? Is Proverbs 10:4, "Poverty comes from a lazy hand, but a diligent hand makes wealth," a promise? It is easy to cite examples of people who have been diligent but remained poor and of others who have been lazy yet live in the lap of luxury. Furthermore, the book of Proverbs itself indicates that although working hard leads to profit, evil companions (Prov 1:18) or another's greed may quickly negate or pillage the benefits of hard work and leave one ultimately impoverished. A proverb is not a promise.

The proverb may be commenting on only one aspect of a situation rather than encompassing the whole. Because of its unitary, pithy nature, a proverb cannot be taken as a guarantee of complex outcomes. In order to describe a multifaceted situation comprehensively, multiple proverbial vectors may be needed. In short, proverbs are true but are encapsulated and focused on just one aspect of a diverse reality.

The manner in which the proverbial genre engages authority is nuanced and multidimensional. At least five categories may be observed in exposing the contours of proverbial authority: (1) a universal mandate (Prov 3:5), (2) an ideal-confirming exhortation (Prov 10:4), (3) a simple nonmoral observation (Prov 14:10), (4) an ideal-disconfirming warning (Prov 11:13), (5) an absolute prohibition (Prov 6:16-17). These five categories are proffered to demonstrate that the authority of the genre is not uniform and flat but rather variegated and contoured. A wise interpreter must avoid universalizing and dogmatizing a particular proverbial saying.

Furthermore, when proverbial usage is added into the mix, the scope of authority may have nothing to do with the reason for citation. Perhaps the proverb is cited simply for pointed humor, such as the sluggard who is too lazy to raise his hand up to his mouth (Prov 19:24; 22:13).

6. Proverbial Orality.

Another underlying aspect of the proverbial genre that should not be overlooked is the oral nature of proverbs in terms of their original creation, transmission and use. It is no accident that the theme of speech and oral communication is central in Egyptian wisdom literature as well as in Israelite proverbs (Prov 11:9; 12:14, 18; 16:24, 27). The oral implications of the frequently repeated phrase "Listen, my son" should not be neglected.

Orality may help explain the variations found in duplicate proverbs (Prov 9:4, 16; 14:12; 15:25 [see Snell]). Sometimes half-verses are repeated but linked to different matching cola (Prov 10:6, 11). Often variants are introduced in whole verse repetitions with one-word (Prov 19:5, 9), two-word (Prov 10:1; 15:20) or three-word differences (Prov 10:2; 11:4; 15:13; 17:22). Numerous modern collections cite the same proverb with multiple variations (e.g., “Don’t change horses in midstream” and its alternative, “Don’t swap horses while crossing a stream”). At other times proverbial phrases are purposefully “twisted” by the user to make counter-proverbs (e.g., “Spare the rod and spoil the child” becomes “Spoil the rod and spare the child”).

7. Hebrew Proverbs.

7.1. māšāl. The term translated “proverbs” in the title of the book of Proverbs, māšāl, means “likeness” or “similitude.” There is a diversity of genres tagged by the label of māšāl: popular sayings (Jer 23:28; 31:29), literary aphorisms (Prov 10:1-22:16), taunt songs (Is 14:4; Mic 2:4; Hab 2:6-8), bywords (Deut 28:37; 1 Kings 9:7) and allegories (Ezek 17:1-10; 20:45-49). The māšāl calls for one to reflect and make connections mapping the ideals expressed in the text onto the current situations.

7.2. Sound Techniques. The proverbs of the book of Proverbs were crafted in poetic form. Modern examples showing the significance of sound can be seen in sayings such as “Practice makes perfect” and “Forgive and forget.”

It is clear that the *sages who originally crafted proverbs were keenly sensitive to the sounds of their sayings. For example, Proverbs 10:9a:

hōlēk battōm yēlek betah
One who walks honestly walks securely.

Note the symmetrical (final -ek followed by initial b + t), a sound repetition that reinforces the “walk” (hōlēk/yēlek) word/root repetition. It is no surprise that those who edited the collections also used sound to link the proverbial sentences into longer clusters (see Prov 11:9-10, where each line begins with the preposition bē [“by”]).

7.3. Semantic Parallelism. *Parallelism is the most significant and frequent poetic device used in Hebrew proverbs. The following categories provide basic handles on how the two parallel lines are related (Kugel; Alter; Berlin; Watson). G. H. Wilson has developed the first three categories after taking into account Kugel’s “A, and what’s more, B” critique of Lowth’s “Standard description” (synonymous, antithetical, synthetic) approach. The proverbial sentences of Proverbs 10–29 most frequently have opposing parallel lines.

7.3.1. Affirming Parallelism. Proverbs 16:28 (ABC/A'B'C'):

A perverse person stirs up dissension;
a gossip separates close friends.

7.3.2. Opposing Parallelism. Proverbs 10:1 (ABC/A'B'C'):

A wise son brings joy to a father;
a foolish son is a grief to his mother.

7.3.3. Advancing Parallelism. Proverbs 16:7 (ABC/DEF):

When a person’s ways are pleasing to the LORD,
he makes even his enemies live at peace with him.

7.3.4. Metaphoric Parallelism. Proverbs 16:15 (ABC/A'B'C'):

In the light of the king’s face is life, and his favor is like a cloud of the spring rain.

7.4. Syntactic Parallelism. The ordering and paralleling of syntactic units (S = subject, V = verb, O = object, M = modifier) are carefully examined in the major works on Hebrew poetic structures (O’Connor; Collins). The book of Proverbs manifests these carefully crafted features that are often covered over in translation. So the NIV hides the *chiasm in the translation of Proverbs 10:12:

Hatred [S] stirs up [V] dissension [O], but love [S] covers [V] all wrongs [O].

The Hebrew ordering is SVO/OVS, which highlights a chiasmic structure with a “hate/love” *inclusio linking the beginning and ending of the bicolon.

7.5. Proverbial Figurative Features. The proverbial literary genre is often poetically and rhetorically crafted with a diverse range of figures of speech.

7.5.1. Metonymy. This is a figure in which one word or phrase is substituted for another with which it is closely associated. So Proverbs 27:24b states, “And a crown [i.e., the king] is not secure for all generations.”

7.5.2. Simile. This is a statement that makes a comparison between two diverse realms using the markers “like” or “as.” Proverbs includes numerous similes (Prov 10:26; 18:8; 19:12). Proverbs 12:18a illustrates this trope when it makes this point: “Reckless words pierce like a sword.”

7.5.3. Metaphor. This is a comparison of two diverse realms without the explicit use of “like” or “as” (see Prov 18:4; 20:15b; 21:6b). In Proverbs 18:10, “The name of the LORD is a strong tower” metaphorically likens the name of the Lord to the security and protection of a strongly fortified tower.

7.5.4. Hyperbole. This is an overstatement that helps the proverb to focus attention on the aspect of the situation that is being encapsulated. Thus, the sages recommend that when dining with a ruler, it is best to “put a knife to your throat if you are given to gluttony (Prov 23:2).

7.5.5. Synecdoche. This is a figure in which a part is used for the whole, or the general for the specific (see Prov. 17:7a, 22a; 18:6a, 7a). Proverbs 10:20a mixes a “silver” metaphor and a “tongue” synecdoche: “The tongue of the righteous is choice silver.”

7.5.6. Personification. This is a major figurative trope in Proverbs 1—9; 31. *Personification occurs when an inanimate object or abstraction is given human qualities. Thus “Wisdom” calls out in the streets (Prov 1:20), laughs (Prov 1:26), was born and aided God in the creation of the world (Prov 8:22). Indeed, how to understand this feminine personification or hypostasis is one of the most debated aspects of the book of Proverbs (see Camp).

7.6. Proverbial Themes and Vocabulary. Besides sound patterning, parallelism and heightened use of figures of speech, the biblical proverb genre is also characterized by certain themes and vocabulary that help mark out its conceptual space. Although certain vocabulary sets do not necessarily prove a wisdom tradition origin, the lists given by R. N. Whybray are the most useful. Some characteristic wisdom words are “lacking sense” (ḥāsar-lēb), “fool” (kēšil, nābāl, ʿēwīl), “counsel” (ʿēšā), “simple” (peʿī), “mocker” (lēš), “discerning” (nābôn, mēbîn), “discipline” (mūsār), “way” (derek), “knowledge” (daʿat), “understanding” (tēbūnā), “blessed” (ʿāsrê) and various forms of “wisdom” (ḥkm, ḥokmā), to name a few (Whybray 1974). There is often a heavy use of antithetical word pairs (e.g., “wise/foolish” [ḥākām/kēšil]; “righteous/wicked” [šedeq/rāšāʿ]; “diligent/sluggard” [ḥārūš/rēmiyyā]).

Major themes that the proverbial genre addresses are diverse. However, categories such as wise/foolish, righteous/wicked, diligent/sluggard, rich/poor and topics of friendship, speech, wicked/virtuous woman, Yahweh and the king are commonly reflected in this genre, as well as the avoidance of topics such as the temple, priesthood, prophets and events of redemptive history and the covenant.

7.7. Motivational Structures. The motivational structures are clear in admonitions that are often accompanied by an explicit motive clause. Often, however, motivations are not found in explicit motive clauses but are revealed only after one looks below the surface syntax to the motivational level.

Character/Consequence (Prov 10:1a, 2b, 3a, 6a):

A wise son [+ Character] makes a father glad [+ Consequence]. (Prov 10:1a:)

Character/Act (Prov 10:12a, 14a):

The wise [+ Character] store up knowledge
[+ Act]. (Prov 10:14a)

Character/Evaluation (10:20a; 11:1a):

A righteous tongue [+ Character] is choice silver [+ Evaluation]. (Prov 10:20a)

Act/Consequence (Prov 10:17a, 19a):

When many words are spoken [-Act], there is no no lack of sin [- Consequence]. (Prov
10:19a)

Appearance/Reality (Prov 13:7; 14:13):

There is one who pretends to be rich
[+ Appearance] yet has nothing [- Reality]
(Prov 13:7a)

These structures reveal an “approach/avoidance” motivational structure with didactic intent. The most frequent underlying structure is “character to consequence” and not “act to consequence,” as promulgated in early wisdom studies (von Rad).

8. Proverbial Forms.

The proverbial form is easily identified not just from the poetic techniques of sound, syntax, parallelism, figures, themes and vocabulary involved but also because the proverbial statements often conform to architectonic proverbial literary structures. The proverbial forms recorded in the historical sections of the Bible are one-line traditional sayings or folk proverbs (e.g., Gen 10:9: "Therefore it is said, 'Like Nimrod a mighty hunter before the LORD'"; see also Judg 8:2, 21; 1 Sam 10:12; 24:13; Ezek 9:9; 18:2, 25, 29; see Fontaine). In the past many thought that the two-line poetically parallel wisdom sayings found in the book of Proverbs were a later development from one-line proverbs. With the discovery of proverbial collections in the ancient Near East, such a simplistic unilinear literary evolution—from simple one-line sayings to complex poetic bicola—must be rejected.

Within the book of Proverbs there are clearly two types of literary forms: the instructions, which are characterized by the imperative and second-person form of direct address (Prov 1–9; 22:17–24:22; 31:1–9 [instructions, admonitions]), and the sentence sayings, which are generally in the third person and nonimperative (Prov 10:1–22:16; 24:23–34; 25–29 [numerical, better-than, comparative, abomination, beatitude, Yahweh, contrary sayings]).

8.1. Instructions: "Listen, my son" (Prov 1–9; 22–24). M. Fox divides the instructions of Proverbs 1–9 into ten father-son lectures (Prov 1:8–19; 2:1–22; 3:1–12; 3:21–35; 4:1–9; 4:10–19; 4:20–27; 5:1–23; 6:20–35; 7:1–27) and five interludes (Prov 1:20–33; 3:13–20; 6:1–19; 8:1–36; 9:1–18) that feature *Woman Wisdom speaking. The lectures/instructions usually have the format of a direct address or "call to hear" ("Listen, my son" [Prov 1:8; 2:1; 3:1; 4:1; 5:1]) followed by an exhortation ("Listen . . . do not forsake your mother's teaching" [Prov 1:8; 2:1b–5; 3:1; 4:1; 5:1]) and an explicit motivation ("for they will be a garland" [Prov 1:9; 2:6; 3:2; 5:3]). This introduction is followed by a lesson proper ("If violent hoodlums allure you . . ." [Prov 1:10–16]), a conclusion that may include a proverb (Prov 1:17: "How useless to spread the net in full view of the birds") and a concluding apothegm ("and so these prowl for their own blood" [Prov 1:18–19]) to reinforce the teaching (Fox, 45). The ten lectures can be divided into three subsets: (1) call to apprenticeship (Prov 1:8–19; 2:1–22; 4:1–9; 4:10–19), (2) call to remember and obey (Prov 3:1–12, 21–35; 4:20–27), (3) warnings against illicit sexual relations (Prov 5:1–23; 6:20–35; 7:1–27). The interludes are addresses given by Woman Wisdom, extolling her instruction (Prov 1:20–33), virtues (Prov 9:1–18; 31:10–31), benefits (Prov 3:13–20) and skills (Prov 8:1–36).

8.2. Admonitions: "Guard your heart, for it is . . ." (Prov 4:23). The admonitions are found in both Mesopotamian and Egyptian wisdom literature. The highest concentrations are in the instruction sections of Proverbs 1–9; 22:17–24:22. The admonition architectonic formula is as follows (a ± means the item is optional, i.e., it may or may not be present): ± call to listen ± condition ("if") + imperative + motivation ± summary instruction. Proverbs 3:5 provides a well-known example: "Trust in the LORD with all your heart" (imperative) + "he will make your paths straight" (motive) (see also Prov 3:3–4, 9–10; 4:21–22, 23; 23:10–11; 31:8–9). Prohibitions employ the same form, but in the negative—for example, Proverbs 3:11–12: "Do not despise the LORD's discipline" (negative jussive) . . . + "because the LORD disciplines those he loves" (motive) (see also Prov 5:8–14; 4:14–16; 6:25–26) (see Nel; cf. the discussion of prohibitions in Crenshaw 1995).

8.3. Numerical Sayings: "Three things are too amazing . . . four that I . . ." (Prov 30:18). The numerical saying is based on careful observation of some feature(s) collected and classified using a numerical pattern: "There are X . . . and X+1 . . ." (Prov 30:15b–16, 18–17, 21–23, 24–28, 29–31; 6:16–19; 26:24–25; cf. Job 5:19–22; Eccles 7:16–17; Amos 1–2; Sir 23:16–17). Numerical sayings are derived from nature (Prov 30:15–16, 18–19), society (Prov 30:21–23), ethics (Prov 6:16–19; 30:7–9) and theology (Job 5:19–22; 33:14–15). Often the last line (X+1) contains the point being highlighted and uses the numerical pattern for heightening. Some view the numerical patterning as a mnemonic device. G. S. Ogden notes that this form was utilized by the prophets (Amos 1–2). Confucius even used it for sexual topics (cf. Prov 30:19) (Ogden; Roth). Others tie this form back to a listing type phenomena found in the early onomastica.

8.4. "Better Than" Sayings: "Better poor . . . than rich . . ." (Prov 19:1). In modern times we use this form, as in "Better late than never." This form connects Israelite wisdom with Egypt, where, interestingly, it frequently refers to economic evaluations as it does in Israelite proverbs. So Amenemope says, "Better is bread with a happy heart than wealth with vexation" (Lichtheim 2.152). The simple form "Better A than B" is most often extended into a quadripartite structure: "Better A + x than B + y." An example of this is seen in Proverbs 16:8: “Better a little with righteousness than great wealth without justice” (e.g., Prov 12:9; 15:16-17; Eccles 4:3, 6; Sir 40:19-26). A variation of this form is the “not good” proverb (Prov 17:26; 18:5; cf. Eccles 3:12, 22) (Bryce; Ogden).

8.5. Comparative Sayings: “For as churning milk produces butter . . .” (Prov 30:33). The comparative proverb manifests the essential nature of the proverb that makes an analogical comparison of one realm with another. Thus, the biblical sage writes, “Like a city with broken walls is a person who lacks self-control” (Prov 25:28; cf. Prov 26:11, 21, 23; 30:33). There is a high concentration of the simile pairs/clusters in Proverbs 25—26. The comparative cluster Proverbs 25:28—26:2 indicates that the chapter break for Proverbs 26 was misplaced.

8.6. Abomination Sayings: “The way of the wicked is an abomination to the LORD” (Prov 15:9). Some of the earliest Sumerian collections also have this form, which references their deities: “Debts not cleared . . . are an abomination to Utu” (Alster 1.196). The biblical sage writes, “A false balance is an abomination to the LORD, but an accurate weight is his delight” (Prov 11:1; cf. Prov 11:20, 15:8-9). In antithetical parallelisms the “abomination” is often balanced by “his delight” (Clements). Some have proposed that proverbs that mention “the LORD” (“YHWH”) were later additions inserted into an early more secular proverb collection (McKane). The lengthy history of the abomination sayings calls such a proposal into question.

8.7. Beatitudes: “Blessed is one who is kind to the poor” (Prov 22:9). The beatitude, or macarism, is best known from the Sermon on the Mount (Mt 5:3-11), but this form is also found in the wisdom psalms (Ps 1:1; 32:1-2; 112:1-2). The use of “blessings” in the covenant (Lev 26; Deut 27—28) should not be confused with their use in wisdom texts, as they function quite differently in the two genres. The beatitude form appears in Egyptian instructions as well as biblical proverbs (Prov 8:32, 34; 29:18; cf. Sir 14:1-2). Proverbs 28:14a states, “Blessed is the one who always fears the LORD” (Nel).

8.8. Yahweh Sayings: “The Lord [YHWH] is far from the wicked” (Prov 15:29). Whybray (1979) notes that of the 375 sayings (interestingly, the gematria for the name “Solomon” equals 375), fifty-five (fifteen percent) are Yahweh sayings (contra McKane, who believes the Yahweh sayings were later additions to a secular proverbial core). Proverbs 15—16 contains a marked increase in the number of Yahweh sayings and is positioned at the center of the book of Proverbs. An inclusio begins and ends the book with “the fear of the LORD” (Prov 1:7; 31:30; cf. Eccles 12:13). The section Proverbs 15:33—16:9 is a concentrated collection of Yahweh sayings followed by a series of king sayings (Prov 16:10-15).

Generally, the Yahweh sayings are used at the collection level. K. M. Heim (288) notes that the following chiasmic pattern has a Yahweh-saying inclusio bonding Proverbs 21:1-31 together.

- [A] Yahweh sayings (vv. 1-3)
- [B] diligence (v. 5)
- [C] nagging wife (v. 9)
- [C'] nagging wife (v. 19)
- [B'] laziness (v. 25)
- [A'] Yahweh sayings (vv. 30-31)

8.9. Contrary Proverbs: “Answer not a fool . . . Answer a fool . . .” (Prov 26:4-5). Contrary or paradoxical proverbs have been common fare from ancient proverbs collections of many cultures (e.g., Sumerian: “From 3,600 oxen there is no dung”) to modern English sayings. Does “absence make the heart go fonder”? Or is it “out of sight, out of mind”? Perhaps the twisted proverb has it right in “absence makes the heart to wander.” This antonymity between proverbial sayings looks like a contradiction if one understands proverbs in a dogmatic or absolutist manner. Yet, in almost every proverb collection, opposites are recorded and often juxtaposed, with the “contradiction” purposefully used to break the bands of an isolated dogmatic approach and to necessitate the importance of coming to grips with the polysituational use of proverbs.

Thus the biblical proverb pair in Proverbs 26:4-5—one advising, “Do not answer a fool according to his folly,” and the next one just as clearly advising, “Answer a fool according to his folly”—is common fare in proverb collections from around the world. The editors deliberately placed these contrary proverbs back to back. This dissonance leads one away from simplistic dualistic dogmatism to a situationally nuanced wisdom.

9. Editorial Compositional Units.

To what extent does divine guidance extend to the anonymous authors of these diverse sentences or to the editors who determined the canonical shape of the text in Hezekiah's day (Prov 25:1) and others who later assembled the whole book of Proverbs? The LXX reordering of collections reinforces the idea that the order was still fluid even into the Hellenistic period of the LXX (after 200 BC) (see Cook). How did the editors compile the proverbs into collections? What techniques and ethos do their work of collecting and editing reveal? Is it possible to interpret above the sentence level on the plane of the pair, string/cluster and collection?

9.1. Pairs. Many have noted the apparent randomness of the sentence sayings in Proverbs 10–29. However, literary and linguistic techniques have revealed over sixty proverbial pairs in the sentence sayings (Hildebrandt). Several identifiable techniques were used to bind individual proverbs into pairs.

First, repeated catchwords may semantically link two proverbs into a pair. Proverbs 13:21–22 provides an interesting example, where the first proverb begins with “sinners” and the second ends with “sin,” thereby forming an inclusio that bonds the two sayings together. This is further enhanced by the first proverb's ending with the word tôb (“good”) and the second proverb's beginning with that same word. Thus, a chiasm spans the pair and links them in an ABBA pattern: sinners/good/good/sin. Clearly, the juxtaposing of these two was not random.

Second, the linking between the pairs is often thematic (Prov 21:25–26; 13:2–3). Thus both verses of Proverbs 12:18–19 address issues of speech without the presence of a single catchword. Sometimes this thematic pairing may be antithetic, as in Proverbs 16:12–13, where one saying references that which the king detests, while the next identifies that in which the king delights (see also Prov 18:10–11).

Sometimes two proverbs with a metaphor or simile are juxtaposed (Prov 10:25–26; 14:26–27; 27:15–16). In these cases the shared figure of speech provides the sense of cohesion.

When proverbs are paired, each sentence should first be interpreted as an isolated unit, then the relationship to its pair explored as a second layer of interpretation and interaction.

9.2. Acrostic: Proverbs 31:10–31. An acrostic begins each line with consecutive letters of the alphabet, although some variations are allowed. The acrostic form has proven impossible to translate without overt paraphrasing. To construct such a piece demands careful planning and textual crafting and manifests clear authorial intent. The book of Psalms exhibits the acrostic format (Pss 9–10 [taken together]; 25; 34; 111; 112; 119; 145). The poem of the virtuous woman in Proverbs 31:10–31 is a concluding acrostic to the book of Proverbs. Many have made suggestions as to the function of the acrostic form, from mnemonic/pedagogical to giving a sense of completeness or exhaustiveness—the “A to Z” on the virtuous woman. The acrostic form may present an underlying sense of “order” (maat) that wisdom or this virtuous woman brings to the life of her family. Besides its use as superlative highlighting for the themes of Psalm 119 and Proverbs 31, the acrostic form is often used in lament contexts (see *Lamentations) where the acrostic may be referencing the notion of deep providential “order” prevailing in the face of overwhelming chaos.

T. P. McCreesh (1985) has suggested that the poem in Proverbs 31 is an inclusio, as the book begins with Woman Wisdom's invitation (Prov 1) and concludes with a description of the many ways that this virtuous woman (Woman Wisdom) will serve those who embrace her. Others, such as A. Wolters, see this poem as a panegyric to the valiant wife (cf. Ps 112), parallel to Israel's heroic poetry (cf. the Song of Deborah in Judg 5). While B. K. Waltke (2.518) rejects McCreesh's identification of the valiant wife with Woman Wisdom as allegorical and unreal, he contrasts such an allegorical figure to someone like *Ruth, who was a real model. I would like to reinvigorize McCreesh's case. Woman Wisdom is contextually relevant to Proverbs, whereas the heroic Ruth, Deborah and Psalm 112 are contextually distant. Perhaps the relationship between Woman Wisdom in Proverbs 1–9 and real Israelite women, as understood by C. V. Camp (285–86), can be adapted to fit Proverbs 31. For the sage, what is more valuable than “rubies” (Prov 3:15; 8:11; 31:10)? It is Woman Wisdom, not an allegorical, mythical wise woman, but perhaps modeled on the real wise women of Israel (see 2 Sam 14:2). Woman Wisdom as an inclusio between Proverbs 1–9 and Proverbs 31 is convincing to me, although most prefer a “heroic wife” motif (e.g., Wolters; Waltke).

9.3. Strings/Clusters. Many recent studies have focused on collectional aspects of Proverbs, as seen in the works of Skehan, Heim, Van Leeuwen and Whybray, along with extensive work done by Germans from the days of G. Boström and Skladny, to Plöger, Scherer, Scoralick and Krispen. The recent bounty of commentaries (Plöger; Meinhold; Murphy; Whybray 1994; Garrett; Perdue; Fox; Koptak; Longman; and esp. Waltke) also reflects this rich collection approach to proverb interpretation.

Heim sees Proverbs 10:6-11 as a cluster being delimited by the inclusio repetition of “but violence overwhelms the mouth of the wicked” in Proverbs 10:6b and Proverbs 10:11b. Waltke notes the alternating AB/AB pattern in Proverbs 20:8-11 introduced with a janus (Prov 20:8) that points back in an inclusio to Proverbs 20:2 and forward to the next cluster that it begins.

- [A] the king’s justice (v. 8)
- [B] universal human depravity (v. 9)
- [A’] the Lord’s justice (v. 10)
- [B’] human depravity from youth (v. 11)

These chiasmic, alternating and inclusio structures are helpful in isolating such clusters. These brief examples show the importance of reading the sentence sayings in light of the pairing and the clustering strategies by which the editors built up their collections.

9.4. Larger Units and Collections. The book of Proverbs is explicitly composed of seven collections as designated by the superscriptions:

- 1:1—9:17 Instructions about Woman
Wisdom and Woman Folly
- 10:1—22:16 Sentence sayings of Solomon
- 22:17—24:22 Sayings of the wise
- 24:23-34 More sayings of the wise
- 25:1—29:27 More proverbs of Solomon collected by the men of Hezekiah
- 30:1-33 Sayings of Agur
- 31:1-31 Sayings of King Lemuel that his mother taught him

Although many critics view the “Solomonic enlightenment” historically linking these collections to Solomon as a literary fiction, this is not supported by the superscriptions themselves (Prov 1:1; 10:1; 25:1), the literary form (see Kitchen) or the historical descriptions of the period (1 Kings 3:5-6; 4:29-34; 2 Chron 1—9), where even international connections are uniquely highlighted, particularly with Egypt (1 Kings 3:1; 9:16).

R. C. Van Leeuwen isolates a subcollection in Proverbs 25-27. Similarly, B. V. Malchow demonstrates that Proverbs 28—29 is a subcollection that he labels a “manual for future monarchs.” Heim (288) provides an encapsulation of the whole of Proverbs 21 as a subcollection.

10. Future Directions and Reflections.

Many have used proverbs in defense of pedagogical techniques (memorizing, use of the rod, etc.), to offer advice on how to make money (diligence/wealth motifs [cf. Benjamin Franklin’s “Way of Wealth”]), and to reinforce a black/white cognitive-ethical framework that actually subterfuges the use of proverbs for attaining higher-order thinking and more advanced aspects of spiritual formation. Although it is clear that proverbial familiarity can be beneficially inculcated at a young age, the wisdom potential of these sayings needs to be explored within the framework of adult cognitive-ethical development, emotional intelligence and wisdom/spiritual formation (see Sternberg and Jordan).

The power and potential of the well-crafted collected proverbs are designed to be unleashed and recontextualized in the particular story of each individual. Proverbs deny helplessness by encouraging those pursuing Woman Wisdom to make responsible choices that matter and have real consequences, all the while realizing that although a person may plan a course, one’s steps are ultimately determined by the Almighty (Prov 16:9). Hence, a humbling, reverential *fear of the Lord is the only valid foundation, or pou sto, to begin one’s pursuit of wisdom (Prov 9:10).

See also CHIASM; DISCOURSE IN PROVERBS; FORM CRITICISM; INCLUSIO; PARALLELISM; POETICS, TERMINOLOGY OF; PROVERBS 1: BOOK OF.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. B. Alster, Proverbs of Ancient Sumer: The World’s Earliest Proverb Collections (2 vols.; Bethesda, MD: CDL Press, 1997); R. Alter, The Art of Biblical Poetry (New York: Basic Books, 1987); A. Berlin, The Dynamics of Biblical Parallelism (Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1985); G. Boström, Paronomasi i den äldre hebreiska maschallitteraturen med särskild hänsyn till proverbia (LUA 1; Lund: Gleerup, 1928); L. Boström, The God of the Sages: The Portrayal of God in the Book of Proverbs (Stockholm: Almqvist & Wiksell, 1990); G. E. Bryce, “Better-Proverbs: An

- Historical and Structural Study," in Book of Seminar Papers: The Society of Biblical Literature, One Hundred Eighth Annual Meeting, Friday-Tuesday, 1-5 September 1972, ed. L. C. McGaughey (2 vols.; Missoula, MT: Society of Biblical Literature, 1972) 2.343-54; C. V. Camp, Wisdom and the Feminine in the Book of Proverbs (BLS; Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1985); R. E. Clements, "The Concept of the Abomination in Proverbs," in Texts, Temples and Traditions: A Tribute to Menahem Haran, ed. M. Fox et al. (Winona Lake, IN: Eisenbrauns, 1996); T. Collins, Line-Forms in Hebrew Poetry: A Grammatical Approach to the Stylistic Study of Hebrew Prophets (Rome: Biblical Institute Press, 1978); J. Cook, The Septuagint of Proverbs: Jewish and/or Hellenistic Proverbs? Concerning the Hellenistic Colouring of LXX Proverbs (VTSup 69; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1997); J. L. Crenshaw, Studies in Ancient Israelite Wisdom (New York: KTAV, 1976); idem, Urgent Advice and Probing Questions: Collected Writings on Old Testament Wisdom (Macon, GA: Mercer University Press, 1995); J. Day, R. P. Gordon and H. G. M. Williamson, eds., Wisdom in Ancient Israel: Essays in Honour of J. A. Emerton (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1995); A. Dundes, "On the Structure of the Proverb," in The Wisdom of Many: Essays on the Proverb, ed. W. Mieder and A. Dundes (Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 1981) 43-64; C. R. Fontaine, Traditional Sayings in the Old Testament (BLS; Sheffield: Almond, 1982); M. Fox, Proverbs 1-9 (AB 18A; New York: Doubleday, 2000); J. G. Gammie and L. G. Perdue, The Sage in Israel and the Ancient Near East (Winona Lake, IN: Eisenbrauns, 1990); D. A. Garrett, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, Song of Songs (NAC; Nashville: Broadman, 1993); F. W. Golka, The Leopard's Spots: Biblical and African Wisdom in Proverbs (Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1993); K. M. Heim, Like Grapes of Gold Set in Silver: An Interpretation of Proverbial Clusters in Proverbs 10:1-22:16 (BZAW 273; Berlin: de Gruyter, 2001); T. Hildebrandt, "Proverbial Pairs: Compositional Units in Proverbs 10-29," JBL 107 (1988) 207-24; R. P. Honeck, A Proverb in Mind: The Cognitive Science of Proverbial Wit and Wisdom (Mahwah, NJ: Lawrence Erlbaum, 1997); B. Kirshenblatt-Gimblett, "Toward a Theory of Proverb Meaning," in The Wisdom of Many: Essays on the Proverb, ed. W. Mieder and A. Dundes (Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 1981) 111-22; K. A. Kitchen, "Proverbs and Wisdom Books of the Ancient Near East: The Factual History of a Literary Form," TynBul 28 (1977) 69-114; P. E. Koptak, Proverbs (NIVAC; Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 2003); J. Krispen, Spruchkompositionen im Buch Proverbia (EH 349/23; Frankfurt: Bern; New York: Peter Lang, 1989); J. L. Kugel, The Idea of Biblical Poetry (New Haven: Yale University Press, 1981); A.-L. Kuusi, "Towards an International Type-System of Proverbs," Proverbium 19 (1972) 698-736; W. G. Lambert, Babylonian Wisdom Literature (London: Oxford University Press, 1960); M. Lichtheim, Ancient Egyptian Literature (3 vols.; Berkeley: University of California Press, 1975); T. Longman III, Proverbs (Grand Rapids: Baker, 2006); T. Longman III and L. Ryken, A Complete Literary Guide to the Bible (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1993); B. V. Malchow, "A Manual for Future Monarchs," CBQ 47 (1985) 238-45; T. P. McCreesh, "Wisdom as a Wife: Proverbs 31:10-31," RB 92 (1985) 25-46; idem, Biblical Sound and Sense: Poetic Sound Patterns in Proverbs 10-29 (JSOTSup 128; Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1991); W. McKane, Proverbs: A New Approach (OTL; Philadelphia: Westminster, 1970); A. Meinhold, Die Sprüche (2 vols.; ZBK 16; Zürich: Theologischer Verlag, 1991); W. Mieder, "The Essence of Literary Proverb Study," Proverbium 23 (1974) 888-94; idem, Proverbs: A Handbook (Westport, CT: Greenwood Press, 2004); idem, The Prentice-Hall Encyclopedia of World Proverbs (New York: Prentice-Hall, 1986); idem, Wise Words: Essays on the Proverb (New York: Garland, 1994); W. Mieder and A. Dundes, eds., The Wisdom of Many: Essays on the Proverb (Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 1981); G. B. Milner, "Quadripartite Structures," Proverbium 14 (1969) 379-83; R. E. Murphy, Proverbs (WBC 22; Nashville: Thomas Nelson, 1998); P. J. Nel, The Structure and Ethos of the Wisdom Admonitions in Proverbs (Berlin: de Gruyter, 1982); M. O'Connor, Hebrew Verse Structure (Winona Lake, IN: Eisenbrauns, 1980); G. S. Ogden, "Better Proverb (Tob-Spruch), Rhetorical Criticism, and Qoheleth," JBL 96 (1977) 489-505; L. G. Perdue, Proverbs (IBC; Louisville: John Knox, 2000); O. Plöger, Sprüche Salomos (Proverbia) (BKAT 17; Neukirchen-Vluyn: Neukirchener Verlag, 1984); J. P. Pritchard, Ancient Near Eastern Texts Relating to the Old Testament (Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1969); W. Roth, Numerical Sayings in the Old Testament (VTSup 13; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1965); J. Ruffle, "The Teaching of Amenemope and Its Connection with the Book of Proverbs," TynBul 28 (1977) 29-68; A. Scherer, Das weise Wort und seine Wirkung: Eine Untersuchung zur Komposition und Redaktion von Proverbia 10, 1-22, 16 (WMANT 83; Neukirchen-Vluyn: Neukirchener Verlag, 1999); R. Scoralick, Einzel-spruch und Sammlung: Komposition im Buch der Sprichwörter Kapitel 10-15 (BZAW 232; Berlin: de Gruyter, 1995); P. W. Skehan, "A Single Editor for the Whole Book of Proverbs," in Studies in Ancient Israelite Wisdom, ed. J. L. Crenshaw (New York: KTAV, 1976) 329-40; U. Skladny, Die ältesten Spruchsammlungen in Israel (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1962); D. C. Snell, Twice-Told Proverbs and the Composition of the Book of Proverbs (Winona Lake, IN: Eisenbrauns, 1993); R. J. Sternberg and J. Jordan, eds., A Handbook of Wisdom: Psychological Perspectives (New York: Cambridge University Press, 2005); R. C. Van Leeuwen, "The Book of Proverbs," NIB 5.17-264; G. von Rad, Wisdom in Israel (Nashville: Abingdon, 1981); B. K. Waltke, The Book of Proverbs (2 vols.; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2005); H. C. Washington, Wealth and Poverty in the Instruction of Amenemope and the Hebrew Bible (SBLDS 142; Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1994); W. G. E. Watson, Classical Hebrew Poetry: A Guide to Its Techniques (JSOTSup 26; Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1984); C. Westermann, Roots of Wisdom: The Oldest Proverbs of Israel and Other Peoples (Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 1995); R. N. Whybray, The Intellectual Tradition in the Old Testament (BZAW 135; Berlin: de Gruyter, 1974); idem, "Yahweh-Sayings and Their Context in Proverbs 10:1-22,16," in La sagesse de L'Ancien Testament: Travaux présentés au Colloquium Biblicum Lovaniense XXIX tenu du 29 au 31 août 1978, ed. M. Gilbert (BETL 51; Gembloux: Duculot; Leuven: Leuven University Press, 1979) 153-65; idem, The Composition of the Book of Proverbs (JSOTSup 168; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1994); G. H. Wilson, Psalms, vol. 1 (NIVAC; Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 2002); A. Wolters, The Song of the Valiant Woman: Studies in the Interpretation of Proverbs 31:10-31 (Waynesboro, GA: Paternoster, 2001).

T. Hildebrandt

PROVERBS 1: BOOK OF

The book of Proverbs is the preeminent collection of wisdom in the Hebrew Bible. *Ecclesiastes and *Job are also wisdom literature, but they contest optimistic views concerning the rewards of wisdom rather than defining the nature of wisdom per se. In order to define wisdom in the light of the teaching of the book of Proverbs, one might be deceived into thinking that it is no more than the skill of living. Certainly, Proverbs guides its ancient and modern readers on the right path and warns against the evil path, but Proverbs is more than a collection of observations, prohibitions and admonitions. At its foundation, Proverbs describes wisdom as a relationship; it begins with the "fear of the LORD" (Prov 1:7). No wonder Proverbs, along with Genesis and *Psalms, remains one of the most popular books of the OT among modern readers.

1. History of Composition
2. Genre
3. Ancient Near Eastern Background
4. Structure
5. Theological Message

1. History of Composition.

1.1. Author and Date. The book begins with the following superscription: "The proverbs of Solomon, the son of David, king of Israel." Traditionally, the book has been closely connected with *Solomon (c. 970-930 BC), described in the book of Kings as the paragon of wisdom, a gift that was granted to Solomon upon his request (1 Kings 3:1-15). Solomon often is pictured as demonstrating extraordinary wisdom (1 Kings 4:29-34), a wisdom with which he achieved international fame. He is also said to have "composed three thousand proverbs, and his songs number a thousand and five" (1 Kings 4:32). Furthermore, Solomon is mentioned in the superscription of the two other major OT wisdom books, Ecclesiastes and *Song of Songs. The rabbis (Midrash Rabbah) describe these three books as coming from the three phases of his life by stating, "When a man is young, he composes songs; when he grows older, he makes sententious remarks; and when he becomes an old man, he speaks of the vanity of things."

However, though a first reading of the superscription might lead one to assume that Solomon was the author of the entirety of the book, internal evidence throws that idea into doubt. In short, the book occasionally mentions others who have contributed to the making of the final product. First mention should be made of an anonymous group of *sages referred to simply as "the wise" (Prov 22:17; 24:23). The wise are connected with the proverbs found in Proverbs 22:17—24:34. Later we will refer to the ancient Near Eastern, particularly Egyptian, background to the material in this section. While the reference to “the wise” is nonspecific, material in the last two chapters of the book are ascribed to individuals who are specifically named, Agur (Prov 30:1) and Lemuel (Prov 31:1), although they remain enigmatic because they are not named elsewhere in the Bible (see Lemuel and Agur). Finally, another anonymous group is said to have contributed to the final form of the book: “men of Hezekiah” (Prov 25:1). Hezekiah was king of Judah in the late eighth and early seventh centuries BC, over two centuries after Solomon ruled a united Israel. These men were likely scribes or sages who worked in his court. However, the exact nature of their contribution is not absolutely clear, since the verb used to describe their work could indicate that they simply added additional Solomonic proverbs, though it might also intend to say that they redacted them.

Thus, at best, Solomon was responsible for only part of the book, not the whole composition. Indeed, the mention of Solomon in Proverbs 1:1 might be taken as simply citing the most well-known or perhaps the source of the wisdom tradition that constituted the book of Proverbs. The fact that he is mentioned in the superscription, which is the first verse of the preamble (Prov 1:1-7), and then again in Proverbs 10:1, may well indicate that the material from Proverbs 1:8—9:18 is anonymous. The material that the book itself ascribes to Solomon is Proverbs 10:1—22:16; 25:1—29:27.

In conclusion, if one regards the indications within the book, the origins of the book of Proverbs might be associated with Solomon, but its redaction continued for centuries afterward. Like the composition of Psalms, so also the composition of Proverbs may have taken place over a long period of time before it finally came to a close and no more proverbs were added. Indeed, the considerably different structure of LXX Proverbs as well as a number of additions may indicate that this process continued even beyond the time that the Hebrew text tradition adapted by the Masoretes came to a close.

Before concluding this discussion of authorship, we should note the fact of repeated proverbs throughout the book. D. C. Snell has cataloged the evidence for repeated verses according to the following categories (of which only representative examples are given in the parentheses):

- Whole verses repeated with spelling variations (Prov 14:12/16:25; 18:8; 26:22)
- Whole verses repeated with one dissimilar word (Prov 6:10-11/24:33-34)
- Whole verses repeated with two dissimilar words (Prov 10:1/15:20; 11:1/20:23)
- Whole verses repeated with three dissimilar words (Prov 10:2/11:4)

Thus, it appears that individual proverbs were added over time. According to Snell (74), “Scholars generally agree that there are few indications of the absolute dates when the composers and editors worked.” The situation may be like that in Psalms (compare duplicate psalms such as Pss 14; 53), where similar and near similar psalms were added because different groups of psalms came into the collection at different times, and while there would be a majority of new psalms in a new group, it may contain one or more that already existed in the collection. Even so, their presence may indicate something to the reader: the importance of such a theme. In other words, repetition, resulting from whatever reason, leads to emphasis.

But none of this information helps us date any individual proverb with great confidence. And in any case, proverbs are like jokes and riddles. It is hard to recover the date of their composition. They often emerge in an oral context and eventually find their way into a written collection such as the book we know as Proverbs. Perhaps Solomon did compose some proverbs, but he might also have been a collector.

We cannot say much for certain about the date of individual proverbs or the date of the final form of the book. However, perhaps we can say something about their social origins. Are they from the upper levels of society or the lower? Are the proverbs derived from the court, the farm, the school, the temple or some other place within Israelite society? To that subject we now turn.

1.2. Social Setting. In the modern period, G. von Rad was a pioneer in this discussion, arguing that proverbs found their social setting among royal scribes working in the service of the king. Evidence for this includes the connection with Solomon and the men of Hezekiah, noted in Proverbs 25:1 (see 1.1 above). In addition, we will soon observe that Proverbs has ana-logues from the ancient Near East, especially ancient Egypt. Many of these texts have a court origin, as is illustrated by the most famous related Egyptian text, the Instruction of Amenemope. Amenemope was a lower-level bureaucrat who was instructing his son.

More recently this question has been concerned with the issue of whether or not there were scribal schools in ancient Israel that might have fed graduates into the royal bureaucracy (see Sages, Schools, Education). The first mention of such a school is from the later book, *Sirach, which refers to the bet midrash. Of course, schools could have predated their first attested reference, and probably did so, but the evidence in favor is then inferential.

A. Lemaire has put forward the best arguments in favor of the existence of schools during the OT time period. He points to the discovery of a handful of extrabiblical texts that appear to come from a school setting. Tablets that contain lists of the alphabet provide a good example. Other scholars, including F. Golka, argue that these documents support literacy, not schools. While the fact that Egypt, Mesopotamia and even Canaan provide evidence of schools may strongly support the idea, we have nothing like concrete proof that will establish the existence of schools. And in addition, the explicit comments of the OT (Deut 4:10; 5:31; 11:19) as well as the dynamics of Proverbs 1—9 suggest that learning came about when a father instructed his son in a family setting.

Golka and his teacher C. Westermann took a different tack to the question. Rather than looking at ancient analogies such as Egypt, they observed living societies that they felt were socially similar to ancient Israel. That led them to tribal Africa, where they examined the production of proverbs in those societies. The similarities led them to argue that biblical proverbs originated with small farmers of Israel.

This proposed setting might explain proverbs such as Proverbs 10:5, “An insightful son harvests in the summer; a disgraceful son sleeps during harvest,” but not ones such as Proverbs 23:1-3, which more likely comes from a court setting: “When you sit down to dine with a ruler, carefully consider what is in front of you. Place a knife at your gullet to control your appetite. Do not long for his delicacies, for they are false food.” The best conclusion recognizes that the proverbs of the biblical book do not come from a single social setting. The book is a collection from a variety of settings.

1.3. Textual Transmission. A comparison of the structure of the book of Proverbs in the Masoretic tradition (as represented by the Codex Leningradensis) and the Greek tradition (LXX), dated to around 200 BC, reveals a significant difference (Cook). The order matches through Proverbs 24:22, then it diverges in the following way:

Masoretic Text	Septuagint
24:23-34 (Further Sayings of the Wise)	30:1-14 (Agur)
25:1—29:27 (Hezekiah’s Men)	24:23-34 (Further Sayings of the Wise)
30:1-14 (Agur)	30:15-33 (Numerical Parallelisms)
30:15-33 (Numerical Parallelisms)	31:1-9 (Lemuel’s Mother)
31:1-9 (Lemuel’s Mother)	25:1—29:27 (Hezekiah’s Men)
31:10-31 (Poem to the Noble Wife)	31:10-31 (Poem to the Noble Wife)

Besides a difference in order of passages in the last part of Proverbs, there are also a number of texts that we find in the MT that are not found in the LXX (Prov 4:7; 8:33; 16:1, 3; 20:14-19), as well as many additions in the LXX that are not in the MT (Tov 1990; 1992, 337).

The difference between the MT and the LXX is the most important variant to consider, since the other versions (Syriac, Vulgate, Targum) are of no additional significance because they reflect one of those two traditions. The Dead Sea materials only include a minimal witness to the book of Proverbs (see Dead Sea Scrolls).

But why is there a difference between the MT and the LXX, and, further, what is the significance of the variance? Two views have been put forward. E. Tov believes that there are two different editions of the book. However, B. Waltke (2004, 6-9) more recently has shown the Greek text to be a rather free translation of the Hebrew, heavily influenced by Stoic philosophy and Jewish midrashic thinking. Such a conclusion, while minimizing the importance of the Greek version as a textual witness to the original text, does not preclude its importance on occasion.

2. Genre.

2.1. Superscription: māšāl. The superscription of the book contains a genre label when it begins “The proverbs [mīšlê, the construct form of māšāl] of Solomon.” Unfortunately, one does not get very far trying to define the genre through etymology or even through a study of the word itself, since the semantic field seems rather broad. In Proverbs 1:6 the term is parallel with “words of the wise,” so perhaps the word māšāl simply refers to the fact that this literary vehicle is part of the wisdom teacher’s pedagogical repertoire. The Greek equivalents are paroimia and parabolē, which supports this idea. It also points to the fact that the underlying verb may be māšāl I, “be like,” implying a comparison or teaching by metaphor, rather than māšāl II, “rule” or “dominate.” It is possible but not likely that the noun “proverb” plays on both words. If so, it would point to the fact that the proverb intends to draw comparisons so that the recipient can stay in control of a situation. But ultimately we will not understand the genre of proverb or of the book and its parts through etymology. It is best to turn to the contents.

The first observation that we can make is that there seems to be a difference between Proverbs 1—9 and Proverbs 10—31. The bulk of the former is extended speeches or discourses (see Discourse in Proverbs), while the latter is shorter, briefer observations, warnings, prohibitions and encouragements. The latter, as we will see, is much closer to what we call proverbs in English.

2.2. Discourses: Proverbs 1—9. First we take a closer look at the discourses. Most of the discourses are speeches of a father (sometimes speaking also on behalf of his wife [see Prov 1:8]) to his son. However, on a few occasions the speaker is a woman named “Wisdom,” who addresses all the young men who are walking by her (Prov 1:20-33; 8:1-36; 9:1-6), and on one occasion, another woman, named “Folly,” speaks to the young men (Prov 9:13-18) (see Woman Wisdom and Woman Folly).

M. Fox (45-46) has correctly described the components of a discourse as typically containing an exordium, a lesson and a conclusion, though there is considerable variety in the amount of space devoted to these three elements. The exordium includes a call for the recipient to pay attention, which is accompanied by motivation to do so. The lesson is the object of teaching, and the conclusion brings the teaching to a close, sometimes by describing the consequences of listening or not listening to the lesson.

Proverbs 2 is an example of a discourse that has a major emphasis on the exordium, which essentially takes up the first half of the chapter. It invokes the son (“My son” [Prov 2:1]), calling on him to pay attention. Motivations are given, notably the fact that if the son seeks wisdom, God will grant it to him. The lesson includes admonition to avoid evil women and men (Prov 2:12-19), and the conclusion is stated in the last three verses (Prov 2:20-22).

Proverbs 7 is a discourse of father to son that begins with an exordium in Proverbs 7:1-5. The exordium anticipates the lesson as concerned with avoidance of promiscuous women. Even so, the lesson proper is found in Proverbs 7:6-23 and is in the form of an anecdote of a seduction. Proverbs 7:24-27 drives home the point to the son: he needs to avoid the approach of the seductress, or he will be ruined.

2.3. The Proverb (Proverbs 10—31). The bulk of Proverbs 10—31 is composed of short, pithy sayings that offer observations, warnings, prohibitions and encouragements. Typically these are bicola, but tricola and even longer proverbs also occur. There are longer speeches resembling discourses in Proverbs 30—31, but these are the exceptions.

We will examine the proverb first by looking at a typical bicolon and use as our illustrative example the very first proverb of the section: “A wise son makes a father glad, and a foolish son is the sorrow of his mother” (Prov 10:1).

2.3.1. Poetic Style. The first observation to make is that the proverb is poetic in style (as is the discourse). Thus, it demonstrates some of the characteristics of poetry, including *terse-ness and *parallelism. Poetry is compact language, and proverbs are no exception. This adds punch to the statement, helping to make it memorable. Often a proverb furthers its memorability by the use of a *sound play of one type or another. This aspect of the proverb is often lost on the non-Hebrew reader but can be illustrated by reference to proverbs in English: “Haste makes waste”; “Look before you leap”; “A stitch in time saves nine.”

Rhyme is never used in Hebrew poetry; the nature of the language makes it too easy to do and therefore not interesting poetically. However, there are examples of other types of language manipulation, such as alliteration. For instance, Proverbs 30:20 has a sound play:

This is the way of the adulterous woman:
she eats and wipes her mouth,
and she says, “I have done nothing wrong!”

kēn derek ʾiššā mēnā ʾāpet ʾāklā ūmāḥātā pihā
wēʾāmrā lōʾ-pāʾaltī ʾāwen

The content of this verse focuses on the woman’s mouth, and this message is underlined by the fact that a high proportion of the letters are labials, signifying sounds formed by the lips (particularly the letters m and p).

Although Proverbs 10:1 does not have a really striking sound play, it is terse and has a tight parallel structure. Specifically, it is a parallelism built on antonyms (often called antithetic parallelism), very common in Proverbs. Thus, “wise” parallels “foolish,” “joy” parallels “grief,” and “father” parallels “mother.” The constant is the son. An antithetical parallelism looks at the same truth from opposite perspectives; it is not making opposite points.

Another common feature of parallelism is not present in this example: *imagery. However, imagery is a common feature of proverbs, as in, for instance, Proverbs 10:11: “The mouth of the righteous is the fountain of life, but violence overwhelms the mouth of the wicked.”

The use of metaphors such as “the fountain of life” adds interest and memorability as well as emotional impact to a proverb. Most proverbs articulate fairly obvious points, and the poetic quality of the proverb adds greatly to its overall impression.

2.3.2. Time-Sensitive. Another characteristic of the proverb genre is that its validity is dependent on circumstance; the proverb does not necessarily express a timeless truth. Proverbs are right only if they are stated to the right person at the right time.

This helps explain the presence of contradictory proverbs. In English, both “Too many cooks spoil the broth” and “Many hands make light work” are true if applied to the correct situation. So too in Proverbs there are clearly contradictory verses, most famously Proverbs 26:4-5: “Don’t answer fools according to their stupidity; otherwise you will become like them yourself. Answer fools according to their stupidity; otherwise they will become wise in their own eyes.” It takes a sage who is able to read people and situations to know which of these two is rightly applied.

A number of proverbs reflect this time-sensitive quality. For example, “It is a joy to a person to give an answer! How good a word at the right time!” (Prov 15:23). Apparently, giving a cheerful greeting is unwise if done at the wrong time of day: “Those who bless their neighbors with a loud voice in the early morning—it will be considered a curse to them” (Prov 27:15).

According to *Qohelet, in the book of *Ecclesiastes, there is a right time for everything: “For everything there is a season, and a time for every activity under heaven: a time to be born and a time to die; a time to plant and a time to uproot what has been planted; a time to kill and a time to heal; a time to tear down and a time to build” (Eccles 3:1-3). What frustrates Qohelet is that though God knows these times and human beings do not, not knowing ruins the whole wisdom enterprise. After all, if one applies a proverb at the wrong time, it is useless: “The legs of a lame person hang limp, and so does a proverb in the mouth of fools” (Prov 26:7). It can even be dangerous: “Like a thorn bush in the hand of a drunk, so is a proverb in the mouth of fools” (Prov 26:9).

Returning to the proverbial observation in Proverbs 10:1, we should ask, Is it always true, and if not, under what conditions is it true? Clearly, it is not always wise to bring joy to parents. Some parents are abusive and derive joy from harming their sons and daughters. The proverb presupposes wise parents, those whose happiness would derive from their child moving in a godly direction.

The point is clear: the conditions for the truth of a proverb must be explored before or as it is being applied. Although all this is true and important in the proper understanding of proverbs, we must admit that certain proverbs are always true. For instance, Proverbs 11:1 states, “Fraudulent scales are an abomination of Yahweh, but an accurate weight brings his favor.” If there are exceptions to this proverb, they are so rare as to be unimportant.

2.3.3. Rewards and Punishments. Proverbs often describe a wise, righteous, godly action and contrast it with a foolish, wicked, ungodly one. Sometimes a proverb will focus on one or the other. Some of these proverbs associate such behaviors with consequences. This is true not just of the proverb form per se; consequences are connected to wisdom and *folly in the discourses as well.

For instance, notice the reward that Woman Wisdom offers those who become intimate with her: “With me are riches and honor, enduring wealth and prosperity. My fruit is better than fine gold; what I yield surpasses choice silver” (Prov 8:18-19). On the other hand, the ultimate result of following Woman Folly is death (Prov 9:18).

Two issues need to be addressed regarding the teaching concerning *retribution in Proverbs. The first concerns the agency of the punishment, and the second is whether or not the teachings on reward and punishment are promises.

2.3.3.1. The Agent of Reward and Punishment. In regard to the first question, while in Proverbs good things happen to good people and bad things happen to bad people, rarely is the agent of the blessing and punishment named. Sometimes the connection between act and consequence is simply stated, with no mention of how it will happen. In the case of a text such as Proverbs 21:7 (“The violence of the wicked will sweep them away, for they refuse to act with justice”), it seems as if the evil acts themselves will rebound onto the evildoer. They reap the consequences of their reward. In Proverbs 18:6 (“The lips of fools lead to accusation; his mouth invites blows”) the very words of fools will result in their pain. Interestingly, a text such as Proverbs 24:16 (“For the righteous may fall seven times but get up, but the wicked will stumble in evil”) reveals that the sages understood that bad things will happen to good people—after all, the righteous are said to stumble and more than once. However, the righteous, as opposed to the evil, will get up again. In other words, the bad things that happen to good people are simply temporary setbacks. They are, after all, on a road that ends in life. K. Koch famously described this as “the act-consequence relationship”—that is, an act that leads inexorably to a certain consequence. L. Bostrom and others have qualified this to “the character-consequence relationship,” noting that acts arise out of character and are more like a symptom than the reason for the consequence.

On the other hand, Proverbs 16:5, “All the haughty are an abomination to Yahweh; they surely will not go unpunished,” although it does not make a direct connection, certainly leaves the impression that Yahweh has something to do with the punishment. After all, it is the fact that the act is an abomination to Yahweh that leads to the punishment. Finally, there are texts that do make a connection between Yahweh and reward and punishment: “For the one whom Yahweh loves he will correct, even the father who treats a son favorably” (Prov 3:12); “The curse of Yahweh is in the house of the wicked, but he blesses the home of the righteous” (Prov 3:33); “Yahweh will not let the righteous starve, but he will push away the desire of the wicked” (Prov 10:3).

So, in conclusion, some texts lead us to think that the acts of the wicked will come back to haunt them, and other texts imply or directly connect Yahweh to the rewards and punishments that come on people. However, the two are really not different. The former may imply that Yahweh will see that people get what they deserve. Perhaps the best way to think of it is that Yahweh built the world in a way that punishments are inherent to bad actions and rewards to good actions. Yahweh is ultimately behind all consequences. As Bostrom (139) puts it, “Our investigation . . . has led us to the conclusion that the world view of the sages was neither built upon a concept of an impersonal order nor of actions with ‘automatic,’ built-in consequences, but on the active participation of the Lord in the affairs of men in conjunction with man’s own responsibility” (see also Waltke 2004, 73-76).

2.3.3.2. Are Proverbs Promises? This raises the question of whether proverbs present the rewards and punishments of wise and foolish behavior as promises or guarantees, and if not, then what are the proverbs? Two a priori considerations might give one pause. The first has to do with common experience. The theme of undeserved affliction is taken up even in popular writing in our own culture (e.g., Rabbi Harold Kushner’s When Bad Things Happen to Good People), and the Bible, in narrative texts such as the Joseph story, shows that such misfortune does indeed occur. Joseph, when approached by Potiphar’s wife, behaves in accordance with the extensive teaching on resisting the advances of a seductress (compare Prov 5—7 with Gen 39). However, rather than incurring blessing, Joseph’s upright behavior gets him thrown in jail.

A proverb does not give guarantees; rather, it indicates the best route to a desired end. That end will be achieved, all other things being equal. An illustration is provided by Proverbs 22:6, a proverb often cited by young parents as a promise: "Train up youth in his path, then when they age, they will not depart from it." The proverb has an ambiguity that often is overlooked. Whose path is it talking about? The translation given above shows its interpretive prejudice by taking "youth" as a plural and "his" as a singular. This indicates the translators' position that the path is God's rather than, as some take it, the path or "bent" of the child. This interpretive decision does not bear on the topic under discussion, so we will bracket it and go on.

If one treats this proverb as a promise, then it indicates that godly training assures a parent that the child will not depart from the path. As a dark consequence of this, however, if a child goes bad, this proverb can become a reason for guilt: the parent must have done something wrong. However, it is wrong to consider the proverb as advancing a promise. Instead, it is saying that if one trains up a child in a godly way, it is more likely that the child will end up godly than if there is no such training. However, all things might not be equal. It may be that the child comes under the influence of a bad peer group, and even though the parents have been diligent, the child has gone the wrong way. This latter situation is the cause of parental worry in the first discourse of the book (Prov 1:8-19).

Thus, it is wrong to treat proverbs as guaranteeing health, wealth and prosperity for wise behavior and failure and ultimately death for foolish behavior (Waltke 1996). Even so, the book lays out a strategy to optimize the joys of life and minimize the frustrations.

As a final comment on the subject of retribution in the book of Proverbs, we note R. C. van Leeuwen's observation that the book itself shows an implicit awareness that the wise do not always get material rewards, as is evidenced by the "better than" proverbs that pepper the book. Proverbs 19:1 is illustrative: "Better to be poor and walking in innocence than to have crooked lips and be a fool."

"Better than" proverbs show relative values. Riches are good, but innocence is better; therefore, if a choice must be made, the latter must be taken over the former. This statement demonstrates awareness that not all the innocent become wealthy. Returning to the example of Joseph resisting the advances of Potiphar's wife and going to jail, we would have to say that he chose wisely when he acted with integrity and gave up his freedom. As the story continues, we see that even though the short-term consequences of his actions were not good, the very fact that he was in jail was what ultimately brought him in contact with the chief cupbearer, who ultimately introduced him to Pharaoh, which meeting led to the survival of the Jacob's family.

3. Ancient Near Eastern Background.

Since the early twentieth century, any treatment of the book of Proverbs must take account of its ancient Near Eastern background. Here I present a summary from my perspective (for a more extensive treatment, see Proverbs 2: Ancient Near Eastern Background).

Even within the Bible itself there seems to be a great openness and appreciation of the wisdom of the surrounding nations. When Solomon's wisdom is praised, he is said to supersede the wisdom of the people of the east and of Egypt (1 Kings 4:29-30). For this to be a true compliment, some value must be ascribed to these foreign traditions. Such relative valuation would have been inconceivable in other areas of Israelite thought, such as prophecy.

3.1. Egyptian Instructions. Of all the surrounding nations, it is Egypt that has yielded the most evidence of wisdom literature similar to Proverbs. Indeed, it was the translation of one particular instruction text in the early twentieth century, Amenemope (see 3.1.1 below), that initiated the modern comparative study of the book of Proverbs.

The primary genre of Egyptian wisdom had the native term shy3t attached to it. This word is often translated as "instruction" or "teaching," though J. D. Ray suggests that "enlightenment" may be closer to its true meaning. These texts appear as early as the Old Kingdom (2715-2170 BC) and down to the demotic period (seventh century BC and after). Indeed, it was one of the most popular genres in Egyptian literature. These instructions come from the upper levels of Egyptian society and are composed in large part of advice about how to get along in that society and perhaps even move upward. As in Proverbs, a father instructs his son in these texts.

In some examples the father is the king. These compositions begin with a preamble (often similar to Prov 1:1-7) that introduces the speaker as well as the addressee. We will refer to one specific text and an important concept to shed light on this genre.

3.1.1. Amenemope. I have chosen Amenemope for special treatment because of the role that it has played in the interpretation of Proverbs. The main papyrus (now in the British Museum and dated between the tenth and sixth centuries BC) was first discovered in 1888 but not translated until 1923, at which time its relevance for the study of Proverbs was immediately recognized.

The text contains the instructions of Amenemope, identified as the “Overseer of Grains,” to his son, Hor-em-maa-Kheru. Similar to other instructions, the text has a preamble that gives not only lengthy descriptions of the speaker and a shorter one of his son but also a statement of purpose that includes “the teaching of life, the testimony for prosperity, all precepts for intercourse with elders, the rules for courtiers, to know how to return an answer to him who said it, and to direct a report to one who has sent him . . . to rescue him from the mouth of the rabble, revered in the mouth of the people” (translations from Amenemope are those of J. A. Wilson in ANET, 421-25). Unique to Amenemope among the Egyptian Instructions and relevant to the interpretation of Proverbs, as we will see, is the division of the following text into thirty chapters. The content of the advice contrasts the “heated man” over against the “silent man,” reminiscent of the contrast of the foolish person and the wise.

Scholars have noted specific correspondence between select passages from Amenemope and Proverbs as follows:

Do not rob the poor because they are poor, or crush the afflicted in the gate. (Prov 22:22)

Guard yourself from robbing the poor
From being violent to the weak.
(Amenemope iv, 4-5)

Do you see those who are skillful in their work?
They will serve kings;
they will not serve common people.
(Prov 22:29)

As for the scribe who is experienced in his office
He will find himself worthy to be a courtier.
(Amenemope xxii, 16-17)

Do not wear yourself out to get rich;
be wise enough to desist.
When your eyes light upon it, it is gone;
for suddenly it takes wings to itself, flying like an eagle toward heaven.
(Prov 23:4-5)

Do not strain to seek excess
When your possessions are secure
If riches are brought to you by robbery
They will not stay the night in your possession.
When the day dawns they are no longer in your house.
Their place can be seen but they are no longer there.
The earth opened its mouth to crush and swallow them
And plunged them in Dust.
They make themselves a great hole, as large as they are.
And sink themselves in the underworld.
They make themselves wings like geese,
And fly to heaven. (Amenemope ix, 14-x, 5)

Do not remove an ancient landmark or encroach on the fields of an orphan, for their redeemer is strong;
he will plead their cause against you.
(Prov 23:10-11)

Do not remove the boundary stone on the boundaries of the cultivated land.
Nor throw down the boundary of the widow.
(Amenemope vii, 12)

Note that these parallels are particularly intense in the section that is identified as “the words of the wise,” leading to speculation that there is a particularly close relationship in this section with ancient Near Eastern material, and maybe even a special influence from Amenemope. For this reason, the preamble (Prov 22:17-21) to this section is typically emended (slightly) to refer to the “thirty” sayings of the wise, paralleling the thirty chapters of Amenemope.

But this raises the difficult question of influence. Which came first, the Hebrew or the Egyptian, or was the influence more indirect than that? Advocates are found on the side of Egyptian priority (Emerton), Israelite priority or a third, common source. A recent viewpoint argues that although there are similarities between Amenemope and Proverbs, the parallels are not unique to those two texts (Ruffle; Kitchen). In other words, the more we learn about Egyptian instruction, the more parallels we observe with a number of different Egyptian instructions. Not only that, but also we see similarities of both with other cultures' wisdom, most notably the Aramaic Ahiqar (see 3.3 below). Perhaps the best conclusion is that there is not a specific relationship between Proverbs and Amenemope, but rather that both texts are part of an international tradition of wisdom that shares many similarities. In the light of the similarities, the differences, particularly the role of Yahweh in the wisdom of Proverbs, stands out even more.

3.1.2. Maat. The concept of maat* is frequently expressed in Egyptian Instructions. Maat refers to the order and harmony of creation; its associated ideas are truth and justice. A rupture in the harmony, truth and justice of the creation is an assault against maat. Although maat often is presented as an impersonal concept, it is also represented on occasion as a goddess. Maat determines what is right and wrong. The Instruction genre informs a person how to live in conformity with maat. In line 64 of Merikare (and Instruction from Middle Kingdom) we find this admonishment of the addressee: "Do justice [maat] whilst thou endurest upon earth" (ANET, 415).

The idea of maat as the order of creation is similar in concept to wisdom's role in creation (Prov 3:19-20; 8:22-31). To live well in this world, it is important for a person to be wise and live in conformity with wisdom. Indeed, some scholars have detected maat behind the figure of Woman Wisdom.

3.2. Sumerian Wisdom. Sumerian proverb collections are extremely old, very likely going back to the Early Dynastic III period (2600-2550 BC). They continued in use for a very long period of time. Indeed, most of the tablets come from the Old Babylonian period in the early second millennium. Although there is not the same specific connection between Proverbs and comparable Sumerian texts, they do share many similar themes, as we can see from the following summary provided by B. Alster (1.xviii): "a woman's daily routine, family relationships, the good man, the liar, legal proceedings, Fate, the palace, the temple and their gods, as well as historical and ethnic allusions." Besides the early proverb collections there is also a Sumerian text known as the Instructions of Shuruppak, which has the same father-son dynamic found in Proverbs 1—9 and the Egyptian Instruction texts.

3.3. Aramaic Wisdom. The Ahiqar text has some striking similarities with Proverbs. The story was first known through the apocryphal book of Tobit as well as in Syriac, Armenian, Arabic and other languages (Lindenberger). However, in the early twentieth century an Aramaic version was discovered in Egypt that dates to the fifth century BC but may well reflect a composition that was written soon after the setting a hundred years earlier. The story is set in the sixth century BC during the reigns of the Assyrian kings Sennacherib and his son Esarhaddon. However, there is no independent evidence of the existence of a historical Ahiqar from this time period.

The first part of the text tells the story of Ahiqar, a wise man in the Assyrian court. He is raising his nephew Nadin to succeed him, but the latter betrays him by casting the suspicion of the king on him. The latter decrees his death and dispatches one of his generals to execute him. Fortunately for Ahiqar, he had saved this general's life earlier, so the general returns the favor by faking the wise man's execution.

Later the Egyptians approach Esarhaddon to ask for an adviser to help with a building project, and the king bemoans the fact that the brilliant Ahiqar is not available. The general uses this as an occasion to bring Ahiqar back to public attention. The king greets him warmly and then Ahiqar beats Nadin for his traitorous activities. He then launches into a lengthy instruction setting. Teachings similar to those found in Proverbs can be seen in two examples: "The son who is instructed and restrained, and on whose foot the bar is placed [will prosper in life]" (Saying 2); "Spare not your son from the rod; otherwise can you save him [from wickedness]?" (Saying 3). Compare this teaching with Proverbs 23:13-14.

4. Structure.

The structure of the book of Proverbs may first be outlined according to its extensive authorship rubrics (see 1.1 above):

1:1	Superscription
1:2-7	Preamble (stating the purpose)
1:8—9:18	Extended Discourses on Wisdom
10:1—22:16; 25:1—29:27	Solomonic Proverbs
22:17—24:34	Sayings of the Wise
30	Sayings of Agur
31:1-9	Sayings of Lemuel
31:10-31	Poem to the Virtuous Woman

However, it is also possible to outline the book in another way. Indeed, as we will see in §5 below, the most important observation to make on the structure is the difference between Proverbs 1—9 and Proverbs 10—31. The division here is one that follows a genre distinction between extended discourses and proverbs per se (see 2 above).

4.1. Structure of Proverbs 1—9. This section is composed of discourses or speeches of a father to a son or Woman Wisdom to young men in general, with occasional proverbs. Upon analysis, this section may be outlined as follows:

1:1-7	The Purpose of the Book
1:8-19	Avoid Evil Associations
1:20-33	Do Not Resist Woman Wisdom
2:1-22	The Benefits of the Way of Wisdom
3:1-12	Trust in Yahweh
3:13-20	Praising Yahweh
3:21-35	The Integrity of Wisdom
4:1-9	Embrace Wisdom!
4:10-19	Stay on the Right Path
4:20-27	Guard Your Heart
5:1-23	Avoid Promiscuous Women; Love Your Wife
6:1-19	Wisdom Admonitions: Loans, Laziness, Lying and Other Topics
6:20-35	The Danger of Adultery
7:1-27	Avoid Promiscuous Women: Part II

8:1-36	Wisdom's Autobiography
9:1-6, 13-18	The Ultimate Encounter: Wisdom or Folly
9:7-12	Miscellaneous Wisdom Sayings

4.2. Structure of Proverbs 10—31. Casual readers of Proverbs 10—31 come away with the impression that these chapters are relatively randomly organized. Although there is some clustering of proverbs with similar themes (e.g., the Yahweh proverbs of Prov 15:33—16:9 followed by kingship proverbs in Prov 16:10-15), there is no systematic ordering of proverbs by topic.

Recent work on Proverbs, however, has raised the issue of whether there might be order that hitherto has gone undetected. A number of scholars have made the argument that there is an intentional and subtle structure that permeates Proverbs 10—31. The most recent sustained argument for this position is that of K. M. Heim, who critiques and incorporates earlier insights. Heim (106) argues for a coherent organization of proverbs based on phonological, semantic, syntactic and thematic repetition. He believes that this organization has gone unrecognized because only one of these strategies has been the object of study. Armed with the preunderstanding that there is coherence, and with many ways of seeing it, it is not surprising that Heim concludes that proverbs fall into clusters like the twigs of a grape vine. Once he delineates the units, he then interprets individual proverbs within the cluster. This last point is the interpretive payoff of his ideas, and unfortunately, if he is wrong, it means that he is imposing meaning on these proverbs.

The problem with Heim's approach is that the criteria of association that he allows are so broad and varied that one is bound to see connections, but more than one possible set of connections could be seen. Creative minds can create subtle associations between proverbs and then also "recognize" subtle associations between proverbs in a cluster. The human mind, after all, can associate the most disparate facts.

Instead, the best conclusion is that proverbs are indeed arranged in more or less random fashion, especially in regard to their subject matter. Von Rad (6) is correct: "Basically each sentence, each didactic poem, stands on its own." For example, proverbs on anger are not gathered together but rather are scattered throughout the book (Prov 6:19; 16:14; 19:11, 12, 19; 21:19; 25:23; 27:3-4; 29:8, 22). An explanation for such randomness may be found in the history of composition. Since, as Snell has pointed out, there are many near and completely identical proverbs in the book, it seems logical to think that individual proverbs were added over time, individually and/or in groups. It might also be pointed out that randomness is a characteristic of ancient Near Eastern wisdom collections. In Egyptian tradition, for instance, there is very clear arrangement along thematic lines only with the Papyrus Insinger, the copy that we have dating to the first century AD, though its composition may go back to Ptolomaic times (fourth to first century BC), still very late in comparison to biblical proverbs.

5. Theological Message.

5.1. Old Testament Context. It is a common misconception that the book of Proverbs is secular or downplays theological themes. O. Eissfeldt (47) says, "The basis for the commendation of wisdom and piety is on the one hand purely secular and rational." Although there is no denying that Yahweh is sometimes explicitly mentioned in the book, some scholars (Whybray, 72; McKane, 1-22) have gone so far as to say that when Yahweh's name is found in the text, it is an indication of a late redaction of an earlier consistently secular book.

It is true that Proverbs is different from other books of the Bible in regard to theology. The book lacks connection to redemptive history or expansive references to important ideas such as the covenant (see Wisdom and Biblical Theology). Elements of *worship, such as sacrifice, prayer and temple, if mentioned at all, are not a central part of the teaching of the book. However, the final form of the book is deeply and pervasively theological. Indeed, the concept of wisdom is not simply a practical skill but is a theological idea (see Wisdom Theology). This perspective may be argued from the book in two main ways.

5.1.1. Fear of the Lord. Throughout the book (at least 21x) wisdom/knowledge is characterized as *"fear of the Lord," perhaps nowhere more famously than as the conclusion to the preamble that introduces the book: "Fear of the LORD [Yahweh] is the beginning of knowledge; fools despise wisdom and discipline" (Prov 1:7).

This defines wisdom, and conversely folly, in a theological manner. Indeed, it characterizes wisdom as a relationship. To be wise, one must fear God. The idea of fear is probably not best understood as terror, on the one hand, or mere respect, on the other; rather, to fear God means to acknowledge one's subordinate and dependent place in the universe. It is more like knee-knocking awe.

5.1.2. Woman Wisdom. It is more than the teaching on the fear of Yahweh that leads to this conclusion. It also has to do with the role of Woman Wisdom in the book. Woman Wisdom is found only in Proverbs 1—9, but on the background of foregoing discussions of the structure of the book, we will see that the individual proverbs found in Proverbs 10—31 should be read only against the background of the hermeneutical lens provided by Proverbs 1—9. But first, who is Woman Wisdom?

Proverbs 1—9 has two types of discourse: (1) a father instructs his son; (2) Woman Wisdom speaks to all the young men who go by. The implicit reader of the book is a young male. This man is often described as walking on a path. The "path" is an extensively used metaphor throughout the first part of Proverbs, culminating in Proverbs 9. Everyone is walking on a path, or, perhaps better said, on one of two types of path: a straight path or a crooked path. The path refers to one's life. In the book there are two types of path, two types of *life. One is "crooked" (Prov 2:15) and "dark" (Prov 2:13). Danger lurks on this path (Prov 1:10-15; 2:12-15). These dangers include traps and snares that can foul up one's walk on the proper path of life. The dark path represents one's behavior in this life, but it culminates not in life but in death. On the other hand, there is the right path, the path that leads to life. This path is straight and well lit. The person who stays on this path will not stumble.

Later readers, both during the OT period and after, are to imagine themselves as that young man walking the path and listening to the instruction of the father and the admonitions of Woman Wisdom. This is particularly true when we reach Proverbs 9, which is a climactic point in the book where the reader is called upon to make a decision before encountering the individual proverbs that follow in the second part of the book.

In Proverbs 9 the young man/reader is walking the path and hears a voice coming from a magnificent house “from the pinnacle of the heights of the city” (Prov 9:3). It is Woman Wisdom, who issues an invitation: “Whoever is simpleminded turn aside here. . . . Come, eat my food, and drink the wine I have mixed. Abandon simplemindedness and live. March on the path of understanding” (Prov 9:4-6). But there is another voice, also coming from a house “at the heights of the city,” who is identified as Woman Folly. She too issues the young man/reader an invitation: “Whoever is simpleminded turn aside here. . . . Stolen water is sweet; food eaten in secret is pleasant” (Prov 9:16-17). The reader now must make a choice. With whom will he dine? But who are these women, and what is the significance of the choice?

The main key to interpreting the symbolic value of Woman Wisdom is the location of her house on the highest point of the city. In ancient Near Eastern cities the temple, representative of the presence of deity on earth, was the building on the highest point. Thus, it is clear that Woman Wisdom is a *personification of Yahweh’s wisdom and ultimately of Yahweh himself. On the other hand though, Woman Folly’s location is also on the heights of the city. This also indicates the divine status of this figure. Woman Folly represents the false gods and goddesses that seek to lure the Israelite away from the true God. Thus the choice between Woman Wisdom and Woman Folly is no less than a fundamental religious choice between the true God and false gods.

A possible objection to this interpretive approach may be raised. In Proverbs 8 Woman Wisdom is described in some detail, and part of the description involves her role in observing the creation of the world (see Creation Theology). She is also described as the firstborn of creation (Prov 8:22-31). How can she be God and the firstborn of creation? But for that matter, what would it mean in regard to God’s attribute of wisdom to press the language in detail as a literal description? Like all poetic metaphors (and personification is a type of metaphor), the language is not meant to be understood in that way. Part of the art of interpretation is the uncertain process of coming to grips with how far the comparison may be taken. The major point of these verses seems to be that creation and wisdom are inextricably bound. Thus, if one wants to know how the world works and thus to successfully navigate life, one had better know this woman, Yahweh’s wisdom—that is, Yahweh himself.

However, whether Woman Wisdom stands for God or for God’s wisdom, the choice remains a religious one and one that colors wisdom and folly with theological significance. Proverbs 10:1 provides an illustration: “A wise son makes a father glad, and a foolish son is the sorrow of his mother.” Reading this proverb through the lens of the choice between Woman Wisdom and Woman Folly would lead to the conclusion that this is more than just a wise observation. More deeply, it says that a son who makes a parent glad is showing wisdom, which means that he is acting like someone who has aligned himself with Yahweh, the true God. On the other hand, a son who makes his parents sad is showing himself to be a fool and therefore is acting like one who worships idols. The point is that the very ideas of wisdom and folly are religious concepts. Though the terms “wisdom” and “folly” are not used in every verse in the second part, every verse does use associated vocabulary or simply positive or negative language to indicate whether a behavior is wise or foolish. Thus, the whole book is theological to its core.

5.2. New Testament Perspective. The NT reveals an interesting association between Woman Wisdom and Jesus Christ. But first we note the pervasive NT teaching that Jesus was characterized by divine wisdom. In the Lukan narratives concerning Jesus’ infancy and youth we see a strong emphasis on Jesus’ wisdom. The narrator makes a point of noting the young Jesus’ growth in wisdom (Lk 2:40, 52). Furthermore, when Jesus is old enough to go to the temple, he amazes the teachers of the law and other witnesses of his astonishing wisdom (Lk 2:41-51). When Jesus began his teaching ministry, all the people who heard him were astounded by his profound wisdom (Mk 1:21-22; 6:2). He even utilized the parable (Heb māšāl) as his main teaching vehicle. He was the sage par excellence.

Whereas the Gospels demonstrate that Jesus was wise—indeed, wiser than Solomon—Paul asserts that Jesus is not simply wise, but that he is the very incarnation of God’s wisdom. Twice Paul identifies with God’s wisdom. In 1 Corinthians 1:30 Paul says, “God made Christ to be wisdom itself,” and in Colossians 2:3 he proclaims that in Christ “lie hidden all the treasures of wisdom and knowledge.” Given this background, it is not surprising that the NT subtly associates Jesus with Woman Wisdom, particularly as presented in Proverbs 8.

But there is more than a general association between Jesus and wisdom. He is also associated with the figure of Woman Wisdom. We can see this in his response to his opponents in Matthew 11:19, where he defends himself against their attacks by saying, “Wisdom is proved right by her actions” (TNIV).

Elsewhere in the NT Jesus is described in language that is reminiscent of Proverbs 8. We look first at Colossians 1:15-17: “Christ is the visible image of the invisible God. He existed before anything was created and is supreme over all creation, for through him God created everything in the heavenly realms and on earth. He made the things we can see and the things we can’t see—such as thrones, kingdoms, rulers, and authorities in the unseen world. Everything was created through him and for him. He existed before anything else, and he holds all creation together” (NLT).

Though clearly not a quotation from Proverbs, this text would be recognized by someone well versed in the OT, as Paul was, as saying that Jesus occupies the place of Wisdom. Indeed, the literal rendition of the Greek of the sentence that ends “is supreme over all creation” is “He is the firstborn of all creation.” Paul is inviting a comparison: Wisdom was firstborn in Proverbs 8; Jesus is firstborn in Colossians. Wisdom is the agent of divine creation in Proverbs; Christ is the agent in Colossians. In Proverbs 8 we read, “By me kings reign, and nobles issue just decrees. By me rulers rule, and princes, all righteous judgments” (Prov 8:15-16). And in Colossians 1:16 Paul says that Christ made “kings, kingdoms, rulers, and authorities.” The message is clear: Jesus is Wisdom herself.

The author of Revelation is a further witness to the connection between Wisdom and Jesus. In the introduction to the letter to the church at Laodicea we read, “This is the message from the one who is the Amen—the faithful and true witness, the ruler of God’s new creation” (Rev 3:14). The last phrase (hē archē tēs ktiseōs tou theou) resonates with the ideas behind Proverbs 8:22-30. In particular, the phrase may represent the meaning of that difficult word in Proverbs 8:30, the “architect” (’āmôn) of creation. The allusion is subtle but clear: Jesus stands in the place of Woman Wisdom.

Even more subtly, we might note that the great preface to the Gospel of John echoes with language reminiscent of the poem about Woman Wisdom in Proverbs 8. The Word of God (the Logos), who is God himself, was “in the beginning . . . with God . . . He created everything there is” (Jn 1:1-3); indeed, the “world was made through him” (Jn 1:10). Jesus, of course, is the Word, and the association is with language reminiscent of Woman Wisdom.

Seeing the connection between Jesus and Woman Wisdom has important implications for how Christians read the book of Proverbs. We have already noted that the ancient Israelite reader would read the metaphors of Woman Wisdom and Woman Folly as a choice between Yahweh and the false gods of the nations. This decision would have little relevance to modern readers, who are not trying to make a choice between God and Baal; the latter is not a live option, and the NT claims to reveal the nature of the Godhead more carefully. That is, the NT presents Jesus as the mediator of our relationship with God. The gospel choice is a decision whether or not to follow Jesus. Thus, to understand the invitation of Woman Wisdom as the invitation of Christ to relationship with God makes the book contemporary to Christian readers.

As for Woman Folly, she may be taken as anything or anyone who seeks to divert our primary attention away from our relationship with Jesus. Idols today typically are subtler than in ancient times. Rather than being lured by deities and their images, we are captivated by more abstract and conceptual idols: power, wealth, relationship, status, and the like.

See also DISCOURSE IN PROVERBS; FEMINIST INTERPRETATION; FORM CRITICISM; PROVERB, GENRE OF; PROVERBS 2: ANCIENT NEAR EASTERN BACKGROUND; PROVERBS 3: HISTORY OF INTERPRETATION; WOMAN WISDOM AND WOMAN FOLLY.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. Commentaries: R. J. Clifford, Proverbs (OTL; Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 1999); M. V. Fox, Proverbs 1-9 (AB 18A; Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 2000); T. Longman III, Proverbs (BCOTWP; Grand Rapids: Baker, 2006); W. McKane, Proverbs (OTL; Philadelphia: Westminster, 1970); R. E. Murphy, Proverbs (WBC; Nashville: Thomas Nelson, 1998); L. G. Perdue, Proverbs (Interp; Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 2000); R. C. Van Leeuwen, "Proverbs," in The New Interpreter's Bible, Vol. 5 (Abingdon, 1997), 19-264; B. Waltke, Proverbs: Chapters 1-15 (NICOT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans: 2004); idem, Proverbs: Chapters 15-31 (NICOT; Grand Rapids, Eerdmans, 2005). Studies: B. Alster, Proverbs of Ancient Sumer (2 vols.; Bethesda, MD: CDL Press, 1997); L. Bostrom, The God of the Sages: The Portrayal of God in the Book of Proverbs (ConBOT 29; Stockholm: Almqvist & Wiksell, 1990); J. Cook, The Septuagint of Proverbs: Jewish and/or Hellenistic Proverbs? Concerning the Hellenistic Colouring of LXX Proverbs (VTSup 69; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1997); O. Eissfeldt, The Old Testament: An Introduction, including the Apocrypha and Pseudepigrapha, and Also the Works of Similar Type from Qumran; The History of the Formation of the Old Testament (New York: Harper & Row, 1965); J. A. Emerton, "The Teaching of Amemope and Proverbs xxii 17-xxiv 22: Further Reflections on a Long-Standing Problem," VT 41 (2001) 431-52; F. Golka, "Die israelitische Weisheitsschule oder 'des Kaisers neue Kleider,'" VT 33 (1983) 257-71; K. M. Heim, Grapes of Gold Set in Silver: An Interpretation of Proverbial Clusters in Proverbs 10:1—22:16 (BZAW 273; Berlin: de Gruyter, 2001); K. Kitchen, "Proverbs and Wisdom Books of the Ancient Near East," TynBul 28 (1977) 69-114; K. Koch, "Gibt es ein Vergeltungsdogma im Alten Testament?" ZTK 52 (1955) 1-42; A. Lemaire, "The Sage in School and Temple," in The Sage in Israel and the Ancient Near East, ed. J. G. Gammie and L. G. Perdue (Winona Lake, IN: Eisenbrauns, 1990) 165-83; J. Lindenberger, The Aramaic Proverbs of Ahiqar (Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1983); T. Longman III, "Proverbs," in Zondervan Illustrated Bible Backgrounds Commentary, ed. J. Walton (4 vols.; Grand Rapids: Zondervan, forthcoming); J. D. Ray, "Egyptian Wisdom Literature," in Wisdom in Ancient Israel, ed. J. Day et al. (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1995) 17-29; J. Ruffle, "The Teaching of Amemope and Its Connection with the Book of Proverbs," TynBul 28 (1977) 39-68; D. C. Snell, Twice-Told Proverbs and the Composition of the Book of Proverbs (Winona Lake, IN: Eisenbrauns, 1993); E. Tov, "Recensional Differences between the Massoretic Text and the Septuagint of Proverbs," in Of Scribes and Scrolls: Studies on the Hebrew Bible, Intertestamental Judaism, and Christian Origins Presented to J. Strugnell on the Occasion of His Sixtieth Birthday, ed. H. W. Attridge, J. J. Collins and

T. H. Tobin (CTSRR 5; Lanham, MD: University Press of America, 1990) 43-56; idem, Textual Criticism of the Hebrew Bible (Minneapolis: Fortress; Assen: Van Gorcum, 1992); R. C. Van Leeuwen, "Wealth and Poverty: System and Contradiction in Proverbs," HS 33 (1992) 25-36; G. von Rad, Wisdom in Ancient Israel (London: SCM, 1972); B. K. Waltke, "Does Proverbs Promise Too Much?" AUSS 34 (1996) 319-36; C. Westermann, Wurzeln der Weisheit: Die ältesten Sprüche Israels und anderer Völker (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1990); R. N. Whybray, The Concept of Wisdom in Proverbs 1-9 (London: SCM, 1965); B. Witherington III, Jesus the Sage: The Pilgrimage of Wisdom (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1994).

T. Longman III

PROVERBS 2: ANCIENT NEAR EASTERN BACKGROUND

The existing biblical book of Proverbs is not just one book, but rather four: Proverbs of *Solomon son of *David (Prov 1—24 [hereafter "Solomon I"]), Proverbs of Solomon copied out by Hezekiah's men (Prov 25—29 [hereafter "Solomon II"]); Words of Agur (Prov 30); Words of Lemuel from his mother (Prov 31) (see Lemuel and Agur). The last three are shortest and simplest, each having an identifying authorial title followed directly by the main text (Type A). The first is the longest and more complex (Type B), having a similar title (with preamble, Prov 1:1-7) but followed by a long prologue (Prov 1:8—9:18) and a subtitle (Prov 10:1) to introduce the main text (Prov 10—24). Ending the latter are two segments, cited as "Words of the Wise" (Prov 22:17; 24:23a). Thus, broadly, Solomon I would date to c. 950 BC, Solomon II (in final form) to c. 700 BC (under Hezekiah), and Agur and Lemuel hardly much later.

The wisdom in Proverbs is specifically instructional wisdom, framed as from an instructor (e.g., a parent) to a junior (e.g., a son or sons). This is distinct from observational wisdom (as in the Sumerian proverb collections of the third to early second millennia BC [for which, see Alster 1991-1992; 1997]) and from wisdom by debate (third to first millennia BC), closer to *Job and *Ecclesiastes.

Traditionally, for the last 130 years or so, not a few OT scholars have regarded most (if not all) of Proverbs to be of postexilic origin, and Proverbs 1—9 as the latest segment of it. However, such views remain purely theoretical, without adequate reference to most of the real and relevant data now available from the biblical world itself—that is, the ancient Near East. Such data cast a very different light on the books of Proverbs.

1. Scope of Ancient Near Eastern Background
2. Near Eastern and Biblical Structures and Formats
3. Near Eastern Evidence on Concepts and Linguistic Indicators in Proverbs
4. The Subject Matter of Proverbs in Its Near Eastern Context
5. Concluding Perspective on Proverbs in Its Ancient Near Eastern Context

1. Scope of Ancient Near Eastern Background.

1.1. Geography and General Date of Near Eastern Instructional Wisdom Books. Most of such works are found in ancient Egypt through the third to first millennia BC, some twenty-seven in all, plus five “letter-writing” instructional books and the onomastica (word lists), all for training *scribes, taking us to at least thirty-three works overall. Some are known complete, some by mere allusion, and the rest in varying states of (incomplete) preservation. The next largest series is from Mesopotamia (Sumer, Assyria and Babylonia), again through the third to first millennia BC, with the oldest work (Shuruppak) in two Sumerian “editions” and one Akkadian [Assyro-Babylonian] version, four more damaged such works, plus three minor fragments (one, the beginning of one of the other works?)—a total of about nine works so far. Then, in the Syro-Anatolian realm are two items: part of a Babylonian/Hurrian bilingual text from Ugarit, and a Hittite translation of another Akkadian text likewise (both thirteenth century BC). Finally, outside the Bible, one West Semitic text, the Proverbs of Ahiqar (Aramean officer of Esarhadon of Assyria) in Aramaic, in a fifth-century copy from Egypt. So, here are three more works. Thus, we have a grand total of about forty to forty-five items in six languages, plus the four books within our Hebrew book of Proverbs, for almost fifty items in seven languages altogether. Older bibliographical summaries are included in Kitchen 1977; 1979; these can be supplemented in part from more recent collected translations such as those by W. K. Simpson; Hallo and Younger.

1.2. Specific Distribution by Date and Type of Ancient Near Eastern Books. Direct examination shows that all of these instructional wisdom writings correspond in overall format to either Type A (like Solomon II; Agur and Lemuel) or Type B (like Solomon I), insofar as they are sufficiently preserved to determine.

1.2.1. Third Millennium BC. For Type A (title and main text only) we have (so far) the Instructions of Hardjedef (Old Kingdom, in New Kingdom copies) and the Instructions for Merikare (First Intermediate Period, in later copies). Given the individual styles and contents of both, they should be assigned to their attributed periods; they are wholly different from Middle Kingdom works. For Type B (title, prologue, subtitle [optional], main text) we possess the complete and splendid Ptahhotep from Egypt (proper to the Old Kingdom, including from later allusions) and the Old Sumerian version of Shuruppak from third-millennium contexts at Abu Salabikh and Adab in Mesopotamia. For translations of Egyptian texts, see, for example, Lichtheim, vol. 1; W. K. Simpson (sometimes partial only); for Shuruppak, see Alster 1974.

1.2.2. Early Second Millennium BC. Within c. 2000-1600 BC, Type A works are absent so far, but for Type B our sources increase. From Twelfth Dynasty Egypt (Middle Kingdom) we have a cluster of four works: one by Khety son of Duauf (exalting the scribal career over all others); two loyalist works, Sehetepibre (named from an excerptor [author’s name not yet recovered]) and A Man for His Son (deliberately anonymous, for general usage); and one of royal origin, ostensibly by Amenemhat I on his dynasty’s behalf (for translations, see Lichtheim, vol. 1; W. K. Simpson [at times incomplete]). From Mesopotamia, so far, we have only the Classical Sumerian and Akkadian versions of Shuruppak (Alster 1974 [Sumerian]; Lambert [Akkadian]).

1.2.3. Late Second Millennium BC. Here, with ever increasing source materials, Type A comes back into view. From Egypt come the Instruction from Ancient Writings (anonymous, because it purports to collect just older sayings) and the brief Instruction by Hori (early Twentieth Dynasty), plus the clutch of “letter-writing” instructions (of Qagabu; for Pentaweret; of Nebmarenakht; of Piay [in Caminos]; “Setekh-mose” is only [so far] a title line). These belong to the Nineteenth-Twentieth Dynasties. To the latter (by origin) belongs also the Onomasticon of Amenemope (Gardiner). Of this class (Type A), Mesopotamia and the Hittites offer (so far) only an Akkadian original and a Hittite version of Shube-awilim.

Type B flourished as ever. From Egypt in this group come the works by the vizier Amatju (Ah-mose), the high priest Amenemhat (Eighteenth Dynasty) and the scribes Aniy (Nineteenth Dynasty?), Amennakht and the famous Amene-mope, of the early Twentieth Dynasty (c. 1170 BC) (the last three are in Lichtheim, vol. 2; W. K. Simpson). From Mesopotamia we have currently just the Counsels of Wisdom (Lambert).

1.2.4. First Millennium BC. Here, in Egypt a Theban priest Nebneteru (c. 860 BC) presents a short set of admonitions but without any formal title within another text. Definitely of Type A are the demotic-language instructions of Papyrus Louvre D.2414 (Ptolemaic [third-first centuries BC]), but the beginning of the Insinger texts (Ptolemaic period, first century BC? [Lichtheim, vol. 3]) is lost. In Greek is the beginning of Amenothos (Greco-Roman period). From Mesopotamia the Akkadian Advice to a Prince falls probably within c. 1000-700 BC (Lambert, 110-15). From the Levant we have the three final compositions from the Hebrew book of Proverbs: Solomon II, Agur and Lemuel (c. 700 BC).

For Type B we have the Saite Instruction from within c. 570-400 BC (full publication in Jasnou) and Ankh-Sheshonqy (Lichtheim, vol. 3; W. K. Simpson) from the late Ptolemaic period (within the third to first centuries BC?) from Egypt. From Mesopotamia, but based on a West Semitic character, we have an instruction of the Aramean Ahiqar, official of Esarhaddon of Assyria (c. 670 BC) in a fifth-century Aramaic copy (Porten and Yardeni, 22-53). All three of these have narrative prologues. To this epoch (c. 950 BC) would belong, by its title, Solomon I, being the first twenty-four chapters of the Hebrew book of Proverbs. (For the data bearing on this, see 2 below.)

2. Near Eastern and Biblical Structures and Formats.

2.1. Review of the Structural Features of the Books Within Proverbs in Near Eastern Context. Thus, the four constituent books in Proverbs are in literary terms part of a long-lived and extensive family of some fifty compositions through most of three thousand years. This corpus offers us very clear guidance over the constants and changing norms to be found in this category of literature and thereby on the format, dating and so forth of the Hebrew works. This can best be seen by examining each main feature in turn. This was previously done on a strictly factual basis in three papers by K. A. Kitchen (1977; 1979; 1998), which remain fundamental; complementary to these is the 1977 work by J. Ruffle.

2.1.1. Form and Use of Titles and Subtitles. Use of an initial formal title is practically universal in this class of writings; only when (very rarely) the body of instruction is incorporated into another text does this not happen, as in the case of Nebneteru (see 1.2.4 above). Again, almost all these formal titles name an author or compiler, always in the third person, usually with a title or epithet(s); exceptions are rare—for example, the Man for His Son (an “everyman” text) and According to Ancient Writings (collection of old sayings) from Egypt. In Egypt a noun-based formulation was used: “(Beginning of) the Instruction by . . . (NN).” This usage is followed by Levantine writers—so by Ahiqar (“[These are the Words of Ahiqar . . .]” outside the OT, and by Solomon I/II (“The Proverbs of Solomon . . .”) and by Agur and Lemuel (“the Words of Agur/Lemuel . . .”) inside it. By contrast, Mesopotamian writers preferred a verbal construction, be it narrative (“NN gave instruction . . .”) or imperative (“Hear the counsel of NN . . .”). In all cultures further features could be added at will. Commonly, an author might address his son (sometimes named) or sons, or else an apprentice or other younger person. Title lines could be extended by inclusion of numerous personal titles and epithets of the author, or by claims for the work’s aims or value (cf. Ptahhotep, subtitle), or by other literary embellishments (so the Classical Sumerian version of Shuruppak, initial time clauses). The title and preamble in Solomon I (Prov 1:1-7) is longer than the title lines in Solomon II (Prov 25:1), and both are longer than with Agur and Lemuel. In turn, going back in time, the subtitle in Ptahhotep and the initial titles of Amenemope and of the Onomasticon of the other Amenemope are all longer than that of Solomon I. Long, medium and short titles occur at all periods; in short, there is no total “evolution” from short to medium to long in the case of main titles or subtitles to these instructional works—quite the opposite! The more complex title/preamble of Solomon I is strictly in keeping with its greater complexity and length as compared with Solomon II, Agur and Lemuel, just as is the case with other Near Eastern works of varying length and complexity, regardless of date.

Subtitles and interjected cross-headings deserve notice. Thus, Khety son of Duauf divides his main text into two, with a commendation of the scribal career worth the toil of schooling (e.g., Lichtheim, 1.189-90; W. K. Simpson, 435 §22). In Solomon I a minimally simple subtitle divides between the prologue and main text (Prov 10:1), and at Proverbs 22:17; 24:23 we have, respectively, an interjection and another brief subtitle. Long before all these, alongside the Egyptian Ptahhotep with his complex subtitle between prologue and main text, the Old Sumerian versions of Shuruppak (third millennium BC) use a remarkable alternating twin series of standard longer and shorter subtitles (longer ones each having a subprologue). Then, in the early second millennium, the Classical Sumerian version has only two numbered, standard subtitles, and then the fragmentary Akkadian one shows no trace of any at all. In other words, subtitles begin complex and then shrink in size and importance during the third, second and early first millennia BC. Only Ankh-Sheshonqy (third-first centuries BC) has a long one between the prologue and main parts of his text (Lichtheim, 3.164, at 5:14-19; Jastrow in W. K. Simpson, 504, at 4/x+15ff.), an archaic throwback stylistically to the ancient usage of Ptahhotep.

The use of numerical headings to mark off sets of numbered teachings begins (at present) with Amenemope (c. 1170 BC) and is found almost a millennium thereafter more elaborately in the Insinger demotic wisdom book (see Lichtheim, 3.184-217). The repeated attempts to foist a reference to unnumbered “thirty (sayings)” upon Solomon I (Prov 22:20) are unjustified (see 3.2.3 below).

2.1.2. Formats and Nature of Prologues. The presence or absence of a prologue is the marker between the two types of instructional wisdom text. Inspection of the entire corpus reveals the following clear facts. (1) Before c. 1000 BC all the known prologues (bar one) are exhortatory. The prologue of Solomon I (Prov 1—9) falls into this category. All these call upon the reader to heed the admonitions given and extol their aims. The sole exception is Ptahhotep, who uses his prologue to state his old age and failing health to the king to ask him to appoint his son to his office in his stead, which the king grants; so this borders on narrative instead. (2) During the first millennium BC (sometime after c. 1000 BC) the known prologues are narrative. They tell of events and do not exhort. This is seen in the Saite Wisdom, Ahikar and Ankh-Sheshonqy. (3) Before c. 1000 BC the exhortatory prologues are all short to medium in length; the oldest exhortatory prologues are short, while both short- and medium-length examples are found in the second millennium. The post-1000 BC narrative prologues, however, are usually long, as befits a story-narrative. So somewhere around the second-first millennium change, prologues change their content (exhortation to narrative) and become regularly much longer. The attempt to dismiss prologues as merely anything that precedes the main text, without specific or datable usage (Weeks 1994, 6, 13), is thus wholly mistaken on visible and self-existent evidence from an entire corpus (see Kitchen 1998, esp. 351-53, 359-63 [giving translations of most of the existing prologues]). (4) In our external corpus, in every case, the prologue is always an integral part of the original text; it is not, and contextually cannot be, something added in ages afterward.

This fourfold situation puts Solomon I in a very interesting position. He is exhortatory (both in person and through Wisdom personified) and so belongs firmly to the traditions of the third to second millennia, pre-1000 BC. Yet he goes on at some length (Prov 1—9), as the later and narrative books do. In other words, Solomon I is at a literary hinge, a point of transition from the second to first millennia BC, which, at his traditional date line (c. 950 BC), can only be described as precisely right and, for independent factual reasons, not simply tradition. Furthermore, Proverbs 1—9 has to be part of the original text of Proverbs 1—24, exactly as with all other instructional books here; it cannot have been added on in front of Proverbs 10—24 at some very late date. Nor are these four lines of data the only evidence to indicate such a result (see 2.1.3 below).

2.1.3. The Nature and Authenticity of Ascribed “Authorships.” Over the last century and more, the attribution of the authorship of the various segments of Proverbs to Solomon, Agur and Lemuel (and the role of Hezekiah’s copyists) has frequently been dismissed, and likewise attempts have been made to discredit the named authorships of Egyptian and other texts to serve the same aim. Two points require attention: (1) What does “authorship” of an instructional wisdom text actually imply? (2) How far (and why) should the ascribed “authorships” (whatever their nature) be granted credence, if at all?

First, there is the nature of such “authorship.” That a text claims to be by Solomon or Amenemope does not imply that they should be considered to have personally first invented every admonition, phrase or concept now found in the books ascribed to them. This is already clear in Solomon I, where, in Proverbs 22:17, he publicly equates what he now writes (“what I teach”) with “Words of the Wise,” clearly from others who have preceded him. And again explicitly in the subtitle at Proverbs 24:23, he declares, “These also are Words of the Wise.” We are not told who these earlier *sages were, nor does it intrinsically matter; and often, older wisdom had passed from its first formulators through many other minds and lips to lose its original identity. For us today, “A stitch in time saves nine” has now no known author, but the truth of its embedded principle is universally evident. This is also the case in antiquity. This is true not only for Proverbs but also, and demonstrably so, in the other Near Eastern instructional books. Thus, sayings of Hardjedef (Fourth Dynasty) reappeared later in Ptahhotep (Fifth Dynasty), in a Koptos decree (:G) of Pepi II (Sixth Dynasty), and then in Merikare (Tenth Dynasty), while Ptahhotep’s work probably was cited by Merikare and then more definitely in a loyalist instruction early in the Twelfth Dynasty and under Sesostri III of the later Twelfth Dynasty (for references, see Kitchen 1998, 349 nn. 7-9). The later citations are not marked out by named author any more than in Proverbs. They also constitute serious evidence for the genuinely Old Kingdom date of composition for the works of Hardjedef and Ptahhotep. Thus, it is perfectly possible for Solomon (or anyone else) to have searched out older sources of wisdom, mulled over them, and used them directly or duly modified in his own work. Hardjedef is modified by his excerptors, for example. So Amenemope might have been among the Wise used or modified by Solomon (or whoever), but there is no explicit proof (on this, see 4.1-2 below).

Second, there is the authenticity of these ascribed authors/compiler. In several cases there can be no doubt about the reality of the “authorships” mentioned. Thus, in his tomb chapel in Western Thebes, under Amenophis II (c. 1420 BC), the high priest of Amun, Amenemhat, caused to be inscribed in stone a “monumental” copy of his own instruction for his children and for posterity; he uses his own career as a shining example for his offspring to follow (Cumming, 114-15, no. 425). Regrettably, this text is now lost after the opening section, but of its authorial origin there can be no doubt. Already, over half a century earlier (under Hatshepsut or Tuthmosis III [early fifteenth century BC]), the Instruction by the vizier Amatju/Ahmose for his son and vizieral successor User was deliberately inscribed by User in his West Theban tomb (Tomb no. 131) in honor of succeeding his father as vizier. At Deir el-Medina (the workmen’s village for the Valley of the Kings) the authors Amennakht and Hori of the late Nineteenth/early Twentieth Dynasties (c. 1200 BC or soon after) actually seem to have dedicated their respective works not to their own sons (as normal) but rather to each other’s sons as a compliment (Bickel and Mathieu)—no doubt of their reality either. Again, Aniy was a middle-rank scribe of the West Theban temple of either Queen Ahmose-Nefertari (mother of Amenophis I, but cult flourishing throughout the New Kingdom [c. 1520-1070 BC]) or Queen Nefertari wife of Ramesses II (hence, c. 1280/1260 BC); his reality we have no reason to doubt.

Likewise, the “famous” Amenemope, whose work is so often compared to Proverbs; he was a temple administration official in Akhmim with a tomb at neighboring Abydos, a wholly realistic situation. In earlier times, as in the Twelfth Dynasty, Khety son of Duauf (or “Dua-Khety”) was evidently an East Delta official and in New Kingdom tradition had been a “ghost writer” serving King Amenemhat I (whose resultant Instruction we possess); neither king nor amanuensis can be dismissed, the king’s reign being monumentally well attested. Merikare is a monumentally attested king of the Ninth/Tenth Dynasty, and the wisdom text laid down for him reflects well the conditions at that dynasty’s end before the Eleventh Dynasty took over. It has no relevance at any later date. Finally, there is the Old Kingdom. Imhotep (text not yet recovered) is a monumentally attested chief officer of King Djoser (Third Dynasty), while Hardjedef is one of several well-attested sons of Kheops, builder of the Great Pyramid (Fourth Dynasty [c. 2600 BC]). His text appears to be quoted by later writers, setting him back in the Old Kingdom. The oft-cited lack of literary manuscripts from that period means absolutely nothing, but simply reflects the vast losses (c. 98 percent) of all ancient Egyptian papyri and could be reversed by chance finds anytime. There are good specimens of Egyptian literature (hymnology) in the huge Pyramid Texts corpus (engraved in stone in some pyramids) and of literary biographical narratives in private tomb chapels of the period; these hint at what is lost or yet unrecovered. So we have no reason to reject an Old Kingdom date for writers attributed to that epoch. The content and style of Kagemni, Hardjedef and Ptahhotep do not suit any later period. Hence, most Egyptian authorial attributions are to be treated as real. In the Late Period, Ankh-Sheshonqy may be the author of the work in whose prologue and subtitle he appears (if it dated by origin to the Thirtieth Dynasty [fourth century BC]), but it may otherwise be drafted by his son or be pseudepigraphic; we have no evidence to go on. The author (name lost) of Pap. Louvre D.2414 may have been real, but we have nothing to go on. Thus, most Egyptian attributions should be taken seriously.

As for the Levant and Mesopotamia, omitting Proverbs for the present, we have only Ahiqar in West Semitic; such a man did live under Esarhaddon, in Mesopotamian tradition, as a high counsellor (ummanu) bearing also the good Akkadian name “Aba-ninnu-dari.” He is therefore historical. That he wrote the Ahiqar text is not provable; the introductory narrative prologue is in the first person (like Ptahhotep), which would favor it being historical rather than fiction. Going much further back, our two remaining early Mesopotamian authorial figures are much more shadowy. The oldest, the Sumerian Shuruppak, is presented as instructing his son Ziusudra—the name of the Sumerian equivalent to Noah. Shuruppak may then be equivalent to Ubar-tutu, king of the city Shuruppak, hence a “Shuruppak(ite).” If so, these are two figures of very distant tradition indeed (long before, e.g., Gilgamesh), and their direct authorship of any existing work will seem a priori unlikely. The remaining pair, Shube-awilim and his son Zur(?)ranku, are wholly shadowy figures, of whom nothing tangible is known, and could even conceivably be just literary reflexes of Shuruppak and Ziusudra; so no clear judgment is possible in their case. So for Mesopotamia, one pair of figures comes from before the flood and is incommensurable, while another pair remains totally obscure at present. Alone, Ahiqar should stand out as a real person of high official rank and as possible author of what is attributed to him. Arameans were numerous in the Neo-Assyrian royal courts and appear in reliefs of Tiglath-pileser III [c. 740 BC], writing in Aramaic upon scrolls, alongside cuneiform scribes with clay tablets. So, Ahiqar, if author, would have written in Aramaic that was very close to the standard Aramaic of the copy that we have now.

What, then, about Solomon, Agur and Lemuel? On this showing, in the shadow of Egypt and Assyria, and reputed to have lived c. 950 BC (Solomon) and perhaps two centuries or so later (Agur, Lemuel [their land Massa attested eighth century BC]), there is no reason so far to doubt the ascriptions in Proverbs (see above on titles, prologues, etc.). But other points invite comment to round off any such inquiry. An authorship compilatory at least in part raises no problems so far.

2.1.4. Direct Personal Address in Book Titles and Texts Proper.

2.1.4.1. To Son(s) in Book Titles. In Egypt, wherever the introductory book title is preserved, at least twelve have the author addressing a son, apprentice (sometimes by name) or children (anonymous plural). In Mesopotamia all the six preserved book title lines address the son (three by name). In contrast to both Egypt and Mesopotamia, our Hebrew books never name the son or sons addressed, and these are never included in the book titles. Lemuel, of course, acknowledges himself as his mother’s son, but it is he, not she, who is reporting the instruction given, so she is not named instead.

2.1.4.2. To Son(s) in the Main Text of Books. Here, Egypt and Mesopotamia differ completely. All over the place—in prologues, subprologues and throughout the text—the Mesopotamian works address “my son,” all the way from Old Sumerian Shuruppak down to the Counsels of Wisdom and five times in Ahiqar’s main text. But in the whole run of Egyptian main texts never once do we find any second-person address to “my son” anywhere. Here, the three shorter Hebrew books stand closer to Egypt than to Mesopotamia. “My son” occurs but once each in Solomon II (Prov 27:11) and in Lemuel (Prov 31:2). By contrast, Solomon I has “my son” thirteen times and “my sons” three times, all in the prologue (Prov 1—9), but only twice (“my son”) in the whole of the main text (Prov 19:27; 24:13). The frequency in the prologue goes with earliest Mesopotamian usage, by contrast with Egypt and later-period texts. The rarity of “my son” in the main text compares well with mid-to-late second-millennium Mesopotamian texts; less so with Ahiqar (who does it more). In summary, Solomon I goes with earliest Mesopotamian usage in its prologue and with second-millennium usage in its main text; first-millennium texts there go further than Solomon I. Again, Solomon I holds a hinge position between the second and first millennia BC in this department.

2.1.4.3. Personal Address: Command versus No Command. The Egyptian works very often tell the reader to listen, pay heed, and so forth, but without saying “my son.” In Mesopotamia usage is divided. Their writers say “listen, my son” (hearkening context) in their prologues, but occurrences of “my son” in their main texts do not have “listen.” As in Mesopotamia, this is also true in Solomon I (main text, no “listen” [Prov 19:27; 24:13]) and in Solomon II (Prov 27:1) and Lemuel (Prov 31:2 and *parallelism). The prologue of Solomon I (all of Prov 1—9) is another matter. Here, we have twelve cases of “listen, my son” to four cases of “my son” without “listen” (a 3:1 ratio). Thus, Proverbs 1—9 is a true prologue, and it corresponds to Near Eastern usage (especially early Mesopotamian)—no question of late first-millennium usage.

2.1.5. The Nature and Types of Main Texts of Books. To the casual eye, the main texts of most of these works look like merely unconnected series of injunctions and aphorisms. However, a threefold distinction occurs. First is a unitary (or continuous) main text, from beginning to end. Examples of this crop up at all periods—for example, for Type A texts we have in Egypt Hardjedef, Ancient Writings, Hori, the “letter-writing” instructions, the Onomasticon and Pap. Louvre D.2414 and Amenothès; Mesopotamia offers Shube-awilim and the Advice to a Prince; in Hebrew we have Solomon II and Agur. Type B texts from Egypt of this type include Ptahhotep, Man for His Son, Amenemhat I and Ankh-Sheshonq; from Mesopotamia come the Akkadian Shuruppak, Counsels of Wisdom and Ahiqar. In all these works author-compilers may flit back and forth freely between topics.

The second group comprises works with a two- or three-sectioned text. In such cases, each section is commonly devoted to a particular theme, but the division(s) left unmarked; such are Egyptian Merikare and biblical Lemuel. Others mark the sections off with cross-heads/subtitles or interjections—for example, Egyptian Ani, Old-Sumerian Shuruppak and biblical Solomon I.

Third, there are the multisegmented texts, the use of explicitly numbered sections. This is as old as Sumerian Shuruppak (third/early second millennia BC [sections of miscellaneous content]) and halfway through preclassical antiquity with Amenemope’s thirty chapters on topics, but in part repetitive (c. 1170 BC), as well as in late Hellenistic times (the Insinger demotic text, with twenty-five sections on specific topics). The main point to note here is that all three usages coexist through three millennia; there is no “development” from one to another.

2.1.6. Poetic Conventions in Main Texts. Here the picture is varied but quite clear. Throughout the third and second millennia BC, into the opening centuries of the first millennium, poetic parallelism (like that found in, e.g., *Psalms) is the dominant form of expression, and the two-line couplet or bicolon is the dominating “building block.” This is true equally of the nonbiblical and biblical texts alike. But alongside the ubiquitous couplet, three-line, four-line and even longer line groupings were quite widely used as needed at all periods (for references, see Kitchen 1977, 88-89 nn. 45-52).

However, from about the sixth/fifth centuries BC onward a new trend sets in: the use of individual one-line precepts, often gathered together in larger blocks. This first properly appears in Amenemope (twelfth century), is clearly evident in the Saite Wisdom (within c. late sixth to early fourth centuries), and is rampant in Ahiqar (fifth century at latest) and in Ankh-Sheshonq and Insinger (Hellenistic period). These facts have been noticed by others in Egyptology (e.g., J. F. Quack and R. Jasnow). Likewise, verbal reiteration (using a word or phrase in several successive one-line sayings) abounds in these late works but has modest forerunners all the way back to the third-millennium Shuruppak. What is noteworthy is the absolute dominance of the traditional third/second millennium parallelistic couplet (in all its subforms) in all four of the constituent books that make up the biblical book of Proverbs—no great runs of single-liners here, or hardly at all. In this particular matter of the objective history of Near Eastern poetics specifically in wisdom literature, the tenth to early seventh centuries are just about the minimum dates possible for Solomon I and the group Solomon II/Agur/Lemuel, respectively. The matter was different in, for example, hymnody or prophetic works, outside the Bible or within it. Again, one may find both “atomistic” usage of runs of pithy sayings (whether couplets or longer) and also “organic” paragraphs or miniature essays, including side by side in one and the same work, and at all periods. (For listing with references, see Kitchen 1977, 90-91.)

3. Near Eastern Evidence on Concepts and Linguistic Indicators in Proverbs.

3.1. Use of “Non-wisdom” Concepts in Near East and Proverbs.

3.1.1. Personification. For well over a century attention has been given to the role of personified Wisdom in Proverbs 8—9. For much of that time, down to the early 1950s, not only was Proverbs 1—9 regarded as the latest part of Proverbs, but also, latest of all, this section personifying wisdom was even attributed to Greek influence (so, e.g., O. Eissfeldt as late as 1965). That extreme view is less evident today, following more recent comparisons with Egyptian maat* both as the principle of “right, justice, right order of life” and as a *personification of these qualities, and in fact to the extent of being treated even as a full goddess, eventually with her own temples and cult, as at Karnak in Thebes, from at least the Ramesside period (Nineteenth-Twentieth Dynasties [c. 1295-1070 BC]), if not already under Amenophis III (Eighteenth Dynasty [c. 1390-1352 BC])—in biblical terms, broadly since Moses’ time. However, OT scholars still illogically assign a late (postexilic) date to Proverbs 8—9, even though the theory of Greek influence is (in effect) exploded.

Personification in OT times had nothing whatsoever to do with Greeks of the fifth to second centuries; it was endemic to the entire biblical world of the ancient Near East, and already from the third millennium BC onward. In Egypt, Hike (“Magic”) appears as a male deity in the funerary temple of Sahure (c. 2500 BC), in the Pyramid Texts (copies of a century later) and even in a priestly title. Concepts such as Hu (“Authoritative Command”) and Sia (“Understanding”) were personified throughout the third and second millennia BC; from the Middle Kingdom (c. 1900 BC) we have the double-barreled Iir-Sedjmy (“Sight-and-Hearing”), similar in concept to other double-named entities at Ugarit (see below).

Early and late, Mesopotamians also personified diverse entities such as Egyptian Maat or Hebrew Wisdom. From at least the early second millennium the god Enki’s wife Damgal-nunna was assigned two personified ministers: “Hearing” (Uznu) and “Intelligence” (Khasisu). The underworldly messenger Namtaru was but a personification of Sumerian Namtar (“Destiny” [fourteenth century BC]). From the second millennium, Kettu as “Justice” and Mesharu as “Law” were likewise personified, by Hittites and Hurrians as well as by Babylonians. In North Syrian Ugarit, in the thirteenth century BC, the local religious myths include the personified Kothar-wa-Khasis (“Skill-and-Understanding” [cf. Uznu/Khasisu above]). And so on, a myriad of other examples from a variety of spheres (not only religion, *ethics and abilities) might be called upon (for detailed references, see Kitchen 1960). All of the data cited there and here long predate Solomon or any other date for Proverbs 1—9 or Proverbs 8—9.

Thus, there is no reason whatsoever to speculate about a “theologized wisdom” of supposedly postexilic date; Proverbs 1—9 (and in fact Prov 8—9) are no more “theologized” than the rest of Proverbs 1—24 (in which mentions of Yahweh crop up in not a few passages). Deities appear or are respected in the third- and second-millennium instructional wisdom books of Egypt and the Near East also, for which our well-dated manuscript evidence firmly excludes any attempt to banish them to a “postexilic period”; so, this non sequitur must be abandoned for Proverbs too.

3.1.2. Covenant. The term bērit (“covenant”) appears just once in Proverbs (Prov 2:17). It certainly cannot be used to support any date for that verse or its context later than the tenth century BC. Outside of the OT, the concepts of covenant, contract and treaty are well attested. Thus, in tablets from Qatna (central Syria) in the fifteenth/fourteenth centuries BC, a biritu is “cut.” Then in the thirteenth century BC at Ugarit we find in a Hurrian hymn El-brt and El-dn (“El of the Covenant” and “El of Judgement”) in a good religious context. In contemporary Egypt Nineteenth Dynasty mentions occur (reigns of Sety I and Merenptah) of hired labor, male and female respectively. And then clear usage in the Year 11 victory text of Ramesses III (Twentieth Dynasty [c. 1170 BC]) shows us the defeated Libyans seeming to plan making a covenant amongst themselves and certainly seeking a (vassal) treaty with the pharaoh. Thus, bērit is well-attested in religious, commercial and political contexts during c. 1400-1170 BC, long before Solomon's day (and long before the often later dates wrongly assigned to Hebrew bērit in much OT scholarship).

3.2. Linguistic Points in Proverbs.

3.2.1. Aramaisms. A common excuse sometimes offered in the past for assigning a late (exilic/postexilic) date to most of Proverbs has been the alleged presence of Aramaisms. The error here comprises two assumptions: (1) an Aramaism in itself must always be "late" (c. 600 BC and thereafter); (2) specific supposed Aramaisms are themselves of late date. The first assumption is no longer tenable because the presence of a land of Aram and of Arameans is not late but rather comfortably precedes any realistic date for Solomon's reign (c. 971 BC at earliest). Aram as an entity is firmly vouched for by its presence in a topographical list of Near Eastern names in the funerary temple of Amenophis III (c. 1370 BC) in Western Thebes (at Kom el-Hetan); this is fully accepted by all who know the Egyptian data of this particular type. In turn, this extinguishes the question mark that used to be set against the presence of the term "Aram" ("Pa-Aram") in a Late Egyptian Miscellany under Merenptah (Year 3 [c. 1211/10 BC]; the "Pirem" of Caminos [109, 113], who did not recognize it). After that, during the twelfth century, the Arameans grew in number and power in Syria and eventually endangered the very existence of Assyria in the east, under Tiglathpileser I (1115-1076 BC), who ceaselessly fought against them. These people groups would have spoken one form or another of Old Aramaic, as would Hadadezer of Aram-Zobah (c. 1025-990 BC) in David's time. Thus, early Aramaic would be current already down to the northern borders of Israel before Solomon ever ascended his throne.

The second assumption is limited to very few words indeed; four in particular in Solomon I are (1) qabbēl, "receive, accept" (once, in Prov 19:20), (2) naḥat, "to go/bring down" (once, in Prov 17:10), (3) r^c, of uncertain meaning (Prov 18:24), (4) hesed (II), "reproach" (Prov 14:34). The first word perhaps is not Aramaic at all, being scarcely attested in Standard Aramaic ("complain," not "receive," in P. Cowley 37:3) or until the *Dead Sea Scrolls, too late to be of significance (the supposed example in Amarna Letter 252 has been eliminated: it is qbl, "to fight back"). As Common West Semitic, the second word is firmly attested in Ugaritic, then only in poetic usage in later Hebrew, and going on in prose in later Aramaic. The third word is open to too many possibilities even not Aramaic, and it may simply be Hebrew (for various alternatives, see Kitchen 1977, 106). And as a rare West Semitic term, the fourth word simply does not occur at all in any external Aramaic or other source in the pre-Hellenistic period. Anything later is irrelevant. By contrast, we have (5) bar for "son" and (6) the plural mēlākin for "kings" in Proverbs 31:2-3—in the text of the easterner Agur! In his case, early Aramaic connections were likely; the Old-Aramaic br for "son" is attested from at least the later ninth century (Zakkur of Hamath), and compare the Moabite plurals (Mesha Stela [ninth century BC]) in -in. Thus, appeal to Aramaic on dating is essentially a delusion.

3.2.2. Other Linguistic Items. The Hebrew of Proverbs is well-linked to wider Semitic usage, including specifically West Semitic (see Hebrew Language). Thus, the term marbaddim ("coverlets") in Proverbs 7:16 again links up with Ugaritic (thirteenth century BC). Likewise, the words for "pledge": ʿarubbā goes away back to Old Assyrian erubbatum, almost a thousand years before Solomon, while ʿarrabon is attested from thirteenth-century Ugaritic. Staying with finance, we find offerings or vows expressed as being "due" from somebody by using the preposition ʿal (Prov 7:14), again at Ugarit. In another direction (returning to Prov 7:16), the otherwise unattested word ʿēṭūn ("yarn" [meaning "cloth"]), once linked by some to Greek othonē, would on context be better linked with Egypt, and that might include an Egyptian origin for this word (cf. Egyptian idmy ["linen"], third millennium onwards; idn, late second millennium). Thus, when adequate background is available, the plea for late origins fails; when we have no data or scarcely any, then for the time being no strong conclusions can be drawn anyway.

3.2.3. The Conundrum of Proverbs 22:20: "Already” or “Excellent Things” or “Thirty (Sayings)”?

A rather special case concerns Proverbs 22:20. The word šilšôm here has often raised a question mark in the minds of Hebraists. In Hebrew this word is usually part of a bound expression, ’etmôl šilšôm, meaning “already, previously” and the like, which made good sense. The expression is literally “yesterday-and-the-day-before.” In the Hebrew of the OT ’etmôl/’etmôl (“yesterday”) is found several times on its own (2 Sam 15:20; Job 8:9; Ps 90:4; Is 30:33; Mic 2:8). And from a thousand years before these, in early Akkadian (CAD 18, 2006, 416). So one similar occurrence of šilšôm should not be rejected a priori. One alternative of long-standing is based on the Qere reading šālîšîm, understood as “excellent things” or something similar. However, a close examination of the data on the text indicates that such a word (with such a meaning) strictly does not exist, however good it might sound (see Emerton, 435-38). The full publication of an Egyptian text, the Instructions of Amenemope, in the early 1920s with its “Thirty Chapters” of imparted wisdom led A. Erman to suggest in 1924 that the Hebrew šilšôm should be revoicalized as šêlôšîm (“thirty”), making the verse Proverbs 22:20 read along the lines of “Have I not written for you thirty (things) of counsel and knowledge?” Then E. Sellin endeavored to find just thirty admonitions in Proverbs 22:22b—24:22 to fit in with this suggested reading. Both Erman and Sellin sought to establish similarities linking the two texts and to have the text of Proverbs more or less directly dependent on Amenemope. Many have followed them since. Here, we reexamine the matter of šilšôm. (For wider comparisons, see the next section.)

That šilšôm, understood as “already, previously,” makes good sense has been noted by a variety of scholars, such as J. Ruffle and R. N. Whybray, both discussed at length by Emerton. He favors the “thirty” reading but is unconvincing in trying to dispose of šilšôm as “already” or something similar. His only positive suggestions against it are two. First, he misinterprets the phrase “written for you” as “written to you,” and then he misunderstands his mistranslated dative as referring to the author writing a letter to the person addressed (Emerton, 439). As he remarks, no other such reference exists elsewhere in the Wisdom literature—but neither does it exist here, for it is merely his own mistranslation. The text of Proverbs 22:20 remains quite simply “Have I not written for you already, with counsels and knowledge?” and this merely refers to the immediately preceding text of Proverbs 1:1—22:19. Second, he overvalues the usage of the versions and later commentators from the LXX into medieval times. But the LXX’s “triply” (trissôs) is nothing more than a guess by the Hebrew-to-Greek translator of the consonants š-l-š-m, whether with w or y before the final m (main text or margin). All the subsequent interpretations (other than “already”), from the Latin Vulgate to F. Delitzsch, are unsoundly based guesswork and should be dismissed.

Thus, the only two interpretations to be considered are either šilšôm—with ellipse of ’etmôl—(“already”) or the emended vocalization šêlôšîm (“thirty”). The latter solution has led to repeated attempts to find (or to force) just thirty admonitions in the Hebrew text of Proverbs 22:22—24:22. However, the most natural understanding of the text finds thirty-three items, not thirty, unless (with some) one treats four verses as “introductions” to immediately following proverbs/admonitions; such would be Proverbs 23:12 with vv. 13-14; Proverbs 23:19 with vv. 20-21; Proverbs 23:26 with vv. 27-28; and, less certainly allowed, Proverbs 23:15-16 with vv. 17-18 (see Emerton, 448). This would give us twenty-nine items plus the introduction in Proverbs 22:17-21, as “first” saying, to make up thirty (for other guesses, see Emerton, 451-52). However, the omission of ’etmôl in the locution ’etmôl šilšôm for “already, previously,” if (accidentally) unique in Hebrew, is clearly attested elsewhere—a matter that has escaped the notice of biblical scholars.

Back in the early second millennium BC the Old Babylonian lexical word lists set out equivalences between Sumerian and Babylonian words and expressions for the convenience of scribes. In one such list we have Babylonian shalshumi (“day before” [i.e., “yesterday”]) given on its own three times with various Sumerian equivalents; the Babylonian form of ’etmôl, which is timali (“yesterday”), is then similarly given with its equivalents, separately, after the shalshumi entries. Thus each part of the full expression timali shalshumi, “the day before yesterday” (precursor of Heb ’etmôl šilšôm), could be treated on its own. Nor is this restricted to mere lists. It also clearly occurs in current written documents of the same period, up to one thousand years before Solomon or Proverbs. An Old Babylonian letter uses shalshumi in “the day-before-(yesterday), over (someone’s) health I kept watch,” while in another such letter from Mari a man writes “the day-before, I reached Terqa,” or “already I have reached Terqa,” again using shalshumi on its own (no timali). At Nuzi, c. 1500 BC or just later, a case records witnesses to a man’s thefts of sheep: “by force, Peshkilishu took (it) three-days-past/previously” (shalushmu, for shalshumu, with metathesis, ush for shu?), and “he did not return it already/three-days-back.” In the Amarna Letters (fourteenth century BC), in the full form tumal shalshami, our expression occurs meaning “previously, already, recently,” and so too in later periods (for references, see CAD 17.1.268b [cf. 262b]; Moran, 360 top). Thus, an isolated šilšôm (no ’etmôl) in Proverbs 22:20 is not an isolated phenomenon but rather has ancient precedents going back for a millennium, and in part also the meaning “already, previously.” In Proverbs 22:20 it is an archaism as befits poetic style, and as required by the format of this verse. Thus, Hebrew hă-lô’ (twin particles) + first main word (kātabî), then lê-kā (twin particle/pronoun) + second main word (šilšôm) is balanced in the second half of the verse by bē (preposition) + first main word (mô’ēšôt), then wā (conjunction) + second main word (dā’at).

So, we have hă-lô’ + kātabî, lê-kā + šilšôm (“have-not + I-written, to-you + already”), then bē + mô’ēšôt, wā + dā’at (“with + counsels, and + knowledge”).

In this very tight poetical format there is simply no room for an additional word, ’etmôl, which would wreck the balance of the whole verse. Therefore, we should see here the plain fact of historic archaism (a feature of poetry in any case), using a term that fits excellently, and in a short form to fit the format of the whole verse. The interpretive acrobatics performed here to find thirty sayings are superfluous.

4. The Subject Matter of Proverbs in Its Near Eastern Context.

4.1. The Debate over Amenemope and Proverbs 22—24. In the 1920s the “thirty sayings” issue led to intense interest not only in finding numerically thirty sayings in (or imposing them upon) Proverbs 22:22—24:22 but also in close comparisons between the subject matter to be found in Amenemope and Proverbs 22—24. It has to be said that in the excitement of the chase to find the greatest possible number of parallels, some did not scruple recklessly to emend either (or both) of the Hebrew and Egyptian texts to force a “relationship” artificially (see, e.g., D. C. Simpson, 236-39, left-hand columns and notes, citing also Erman, Gressman, etc.; cf. Ruffle, 52-54), and most did not bother to check how far the topics and ancient attitudes in question were actually unique to these two books (possibly significant) or in fact shared by them with other such writings through the centuries (giving insignificant parallels). Solomon makes it clear, twice over, that he is teaching from sources that included “Words of the Wise” (Prov 22:17; 24:23), and he does not specify that these men were all Hebrews; indeed, Agur and Lemuel were not (being probably from Massa, on the northwest Arabian fringe), and Job quite possibly not. And, as we noted (see 1.2.3), Amenemope in the twelfth century BC (and ostrakon, c. 1000 BC) was earlier than Solomon.

One thing is certain: Proverbs 22:22—24:22 is not remotely a straight, consecutive translation from Amenemope. As long since compactly pointed out by J. A. Wilson (in ANET, 424 n. 46), the supposed citations in Proverbs from, or allusions to, Amenemope never occur in the same order in the two books, except for two consecutive “links” each in Amenemope chapters 9 and 11. Otherwise, if we follow the sequence of passages in Proverbs claimed as linked to Amenemope, we find that our supposed biblical copyist has jumped backwards and forwards all over the place in a most bizarre fashion. The links (in biblical order) go as follows:

To A(menemope)’s chapter 1 (for Prov 22:17-18), then back to A’s introduction (for Prov 22:19), then wildly forward to A’s concluding chapter 30 (Prov 22:20), then back to A’s introduction (Prov 22:21), and on to A’s chapter 2 (Prov 22:22). Nothing for Proverbs 22:23. But away up to A’s chapter 9 (two separate passages: Prov 11:13-14; 13:8-9) for Proverbs 22:24, 25. Another gap (nothing for Prov 22:26-27), but down back to A’s chapter 6 for Proverbs 22:28; then all the way on to A’s chapter 30 again (Prov 22:29). Then back to A’s chapter 23 (Prov 23:1-3), still further back to A’s chapter 7 (Prov 23:4-5), followed by another jump forward to A’s chapter 11, in two separated passages (Prov 14:5-10; 14:17-18) and with chapter 9 (cf. Prov 23:6-7, 8). Then on again to A’s chapter 21 (Prov 23:9), then all the way back to A’s chapter 6 again, but in two separated passages, Proverbs 7:12-15; 8:9-10 (for Prov 23:10-11). Then a clear gap, with nothing in Amenemope for Proverbs 23:12—24:10. Finally, A's chapter 8 (for Prov 24:11), but nothing more at all in Amenemope for Proverbs 24:12-22.

In short, absolute chaos, if one really wishes to assume that Proverbs had here been derived directly from the text of Amenemope. This situation disproves misleading statements such as that by D. C. Simpson (235) that "the passages quoted from the latter [Amenemope] often appear in the same context, and mostly, though by no means invariably, stand in the same relative order in it as the corresponding Hebrew proverbs do in the Hebrew Book of Proverbs." The facts are clearly otherwise: apart from the separated pairings in Amenemope chapters 9 and 11, the tabulation given above shows with crystal clarity that there is no overall corresponding order between the two books. And any suggestion of recopying through some unknown and wholly theoretical intermediate text would be a counsel of despair.

A second qualifying factor is that, on careful scrutiny, the supposed Hebrew borrowing from Amenemope often turns out to be shorter than the assumed Egyptian original. In other words, if Solomon, or anyone else in Jerusalem, had made use of Amenemope (or any other such text from among Words of the Wise), then they did so critically, using only what seemed to be a suitable expression of what they had approved of, and reset in a Yahwistic mental context.

Third, one cannot neglect the wider context of both Amenemope and Proverbs (see 4.2 below). They both belong to a millennial-long tradition of international wisdom, both instructional and otherwise. A good example of the misleading result of failure to compare right across the board can be illustrated by one classic example involving both works and the wider context. Thus, in Proverbs 23:4-5, "(wealth) takes wing like an eagle flying off into the heavens," while Amenemope (10:4-5, after a longer screed) observed that "(riches) make themselves wings, like geese, and fly off to heaven"—at first glance, a striking resemblance, varied only by a change of bird. However, neither is wholly "original"; some eight hundred years before, a Sumerian proverbialist wrote, "(Like) migratory birds, wealth finds no place to settle" (Sumerian Proverb Collection 1, no. 18 [Alster 1997, 10]). In other words, once this concept—wealth all too easily flies off like the birds—had been formulated, it too flew from mouth to mouth and mind to mind (and text to text) just like the birds.

4.2. Wider Relationships. Various themes common to Proverbs (esp. Prov 22:20—24:22) and Amenemope are by no means exclusive to these two works; such cases thus cease to constitute any evidence for the supposed special relationship between Amenemope and Proverbs. One may add other cases to join that of wealth and fugitive birds just cited. (1) Not too surprisingly, both Amenemope (chap. 1) and Proverbs, both at its real beginning (Prov 1:1-6 and passim) and in this section's beginning (Prov 22:17-21), loudly advertise their wares: true wisdom with good consequences. But so also did several others. From the third millennium so too do Ptahhotep (Egypt) and Shuruppak (Mesopotamia [all three editions]). From the early second millennium (cited mainly in Kitchen 1998, 359-63) so too do Sehetepibre, Man to His Son, Khety son of Duauf, and Amenemhat I (all from Egypt), and in the late second millennium the Vizier Amatiu, the High Priest Amenemhat, and Amennakht (all from Egypt). Such usage was customary wherever this kind of literature flourished, and no case can be made for assuming any specific relationship between any of these works (or with and between Amenemope and Proverbs) on this matter. (2) Respect for one's mother occupies Aniy (7:19) as also Proverbs (Prov 23:22). (3) By contrast, a responsible man should beware of sexual affairs and women of uncertain status, with not only Aniy (3:13) and Proverbs (Prov 2:16; 23:27) but also Ptahhotep (§18) well over a thousand years earlier. (4) By all such authors, oppressing the poor stood condemned, not only in Proverbs (Prov 22:22-23; see also Prov 18:5) and Amenemope (chap. 2) but also by Khety son of Duauf (verso 4 [c. 1970 BC]) and in Mesopotamia the Counsels of Wisdom (lines 57-60 [c. fourteenth-twelfth century BC]) (Lambert, 101). (5) In contrast, one should care for the poor with not only Proverbs (Prov 3:27) and Amenemope (chap. 11) but also with Aniy (5:10) and Counsels of Wisdom (61-65). (6) Table manners engaged the attention of the ancients. Again, not only in Proverbs (Prov 23:1-3, 6-8) and Amenemope (chap. 23) but also over a millennium earlier in Egypt's Pyramid Age, with Kagemni (§§3-4) and Ptahhotep (§7). (7) To be a diligent man with chance of high office is reflected not only in Proverbs (Prov 22:29) and Amenemope (chap. 30) but also in Khetty son of Duauf. (8) The bad-tempered person of Proverbs 22:24-25 is comparable not solely with the “hothead” or passionate person of Amenemope chapter 9. The Egyptian term also recurs in Papyrus Sallier I, 8:6 (incomplete context), in contrast to the quiet man: desert waters are opened to the latter but are sealed against the former, “who finds his mouth”—that is, the loud-mouthed (c. 1210 BC [see Caminos, 321]). For the term shemem (“hothead”), and older taa in Egyptian, see Shupak 1993, 117-18:1-2. Thus similarly, over a thousand years before, Ptahhotep (§§23, 25 [Lichtheim, 1.70]) warned against hotheads, as did both Man to His Son (§§19-20) and, closer in time to Amenemope, Aniy (5:3; 6:15 [Lichtheim, 2.138, 140]), among other texts. In Mesopotamia early on, the early and classical versions of Sumerian Shuruppak also deal with the quarrelsome (Alster 1974, 15, 37: 31). So there is no exclusive link here for Amenemope and Proverbs. (9) As for removing (= violating) field boundaries, the claim of relationship with Proverbs 22:28; 23:10-11 and Amenemope chapter 6 holds water only if the theme is otherwise known nowhere else. It is not easily found in other wisdom instructions but certainly is found in other texts, and it was severely punishable. These include many references in Mesopotamia, as in the Middle-Assyrian Laws and on so-called kudurru-stelae (RIA 3.8.639; see Slanski), and in Egypt in such as the Instructions to the Vizier (§10 [c. 1530 BC] and the Nauri Decree by Sethos I (§§12A/B [c. 1290 BC]) (Kitchen 1993, 46). Thus, the topic is, in effect, probably too banal to be used to plead any special relationship.

In other words, almost all topics found in the Words of the Wise in Proverbs are in fact shared not only with Amenemope but also with other instructional wisdom all the way from Mesopotamia to Egypt, and through two millennia (third and second), besides in other types of documents. No “special relationship” can be safely established in such cases. It should be added that the same phenomenon of parallels in varying degrees between the rest of Proverbs, Amenemope and other Egyptian and Near Eastern wisdom books can also be amply documented (see, e.g., in some detail, Ruffle, 37-52). Thus, there is no adequate material reason to prefer “links” with any special part of Proverbs in such a situation.

5. Concluding Perspective on Proverbs in Its Ancient Near Eastern Context.

The foregoing critical survey has utilized compactly not solely the biblical text of Proverbs in isolation (as favored in the later nineteenth century and by too many since then) but rather the entire available corpus of instructional wisdom writings from the whole biblical world through three millennia in order to provide a clearly objective (because independent) framework of the history of the features of this group of writings at all periods, in sequence. Measured against that independent sequence and range of data, the results are clear. There is no evidence of any kind in favor of the later nineteenth-century purely theoretical presentation, but there is considerable independent evidence (given above) that clearly favors the datings implied by the biblical text’s explicit headings and inherent features (literary, linguistic, conceptual, etc.). It may be helpful to summarize here, as follows, in ten points.

(1) All titles are expressed in the third person, with an author/compiler’s name, except for two anonymous compilations, of traditional material or for universal application. In the vast majority of cases the ascriptions are to be taken seriously, and in several cases we know that these ascriptions are factual. Only a “pre-flood” ascription is unlikely to be literally true, while Shube-awilim is obscure. Subtitles and interjected cross-headings (before or within main texts) are optional.

(2) Two classes of such writings exist: Type A (simply title plus main text) and Type B (title, prologue, sometimes subtitle, then main text). Half the corpus (including Solomon II, Agur and Lemuel) is of Type A, and the other half of Type B (including Solomon I). Occurrence of both types throughout the third, second and first millennia proves that there is no “evolution” from simpler Type A to more complex Type B, unless it happened before c. 2600 BC (on which, of course, we have no evidence). Thus, all four documents within Proverbs come well inside long-established customary usage either way.

(3) Prologues themselves show change through time. Other than Ptahhotep (the oldest in Egypt), they are without further exception used by authors to state their aims and/or proclaim the worth and importance of what they are writing, so throughout the third and second millennia. In the first millennium (when preserved at all), from the sixth century onward, they are narrative, sometimes biographical. In the third/second millennia they are short going on to medium in length; in the first millennium they run up to considerable length, when present. Thus, being exhortatory (like third/second millennia) and yet of some length (first millennium), Solomon I's prologue (Prov 1—9) is clearly “transitional,” sharing one feature with the past and having one looking toward the future.

(4) Use of addresses to “my son(s)” in prologues and main texts and of personal commands varies in place and time; here, Solomon I is again transitional, between east (Mesopotamia) and West (Egypt), and between the second and first millennia.

(5) The “main text” in all these works can fall into one of three formats: unitary throughout, quite a number (including Solomon II, Agur), or segmented into two or three sections, with or without subheadings (so also Solomon I), or explicitly numbered off in “chapters” or sayings (from Sumerian to Amenemope and demotic; not in the OT).

(6) During the third, second and early first millennia all such works are expressed in poetic parallelism, commonly in two-line couplets, but as needed using more complex units; so in all four books in Proverbs. By clear contrast, from the sixth/fifth centuries onward this format was largely superseded by use of one-line sayings, often in large blocks, sometimes with repetition of part of the wording in a series. This is almost totally absent from Proverbs, which belongs before c. 600 BC in its entirety on these grounds alone, besides the other data.

(7) Regarding the occurrence of certain concepts, use of personification (e.g., of Wisdom in Prov 8—9) has nothing whatsoever to do with Greek influence at any time. Personification was a commonplace usage throughout the ancient and biblical Near East during the third and second, as well the first, millennia BC. Compare Maat in Egypt (“Righteousness/Justice”), who early on became a full goddess, unlike Hebrew Hokmat (“Wisdom”), at least in Proverbs. Also, bērît (“covenant”) as both a concept and a word is solidly attested from at least the mid-to-late second millennium BC, before any Hebrew monarch, priest or prophet ever used it.

(8) In regard to linguistic matters: (1) Arameans had been around in a limited way since the fourteenth/thirteenth centuries BC and expanded in much of the Near East during the twelfth-ninth centuries BC. Their language inevitably went with them; so, Aramaisms must be expected from twelfth/eleventh centuries at least. (2) Four supposed items in Proverbs are absent, or nearly so, in Old/Standard Aramaic, while two clear items reflect the eastside links of Agur (Massa) northwards (and cf. ninth-century Moabite). Much of the regular vocabulary of Proverbs is of Common Semitic/Common West Semitic origin, much of that going back into the second millennium BC and even beyond. What was alleged to be Greek (ᾗτῦν) is most likely long-established Egyptian, for example.

(9) The much-disputed šilšôm on its own, meaning “previously, already,” has precisely the same form (no prefixed ʾetmôl) already back in the early (and probably middle) second millennium BC (lexical lists, letters, court case); from then and/or the fourteenth century the meaning “already, previously” is attested (not just original “day-before-[yesterday]”). In Proverbs 22:20 it is simply an archaism used to fit into a restricted poetical context. It has nothing to do with the “thirty (sayings)” of Amenemope, nor are there necessarily exactly thirty sayings in Proverbs 22:22—24:22. So this supposed link with Amenemope falls away.

(10) None of the topics treated in common in both Amenemope and Proverbs are unique to them alone within the Wisdom literature corpus, except for the condemnation of shifting land boundaries, and this recurs amply in other, non-wisdom contexts. Also, the order of treatment of topics in Proverbs and Amenemope differs very drastically indeed, and the Hebrew aphorisms are often shorter than the Egyptian ones. Neither work can be taken as simply a straight translation of the other, nor can any irrefutable direct relationship between the two texts be established. On the other hand, Amenemope was written well before Solomon reigned or wrote. And Solomon twice says explicitly that he has drawn upon “words of wise men”; there is nothing to exclude his drawing upon and even reformulating topics from Amenemope any more or less than any other source, but nothing can be proved either way. Even today, “A stitch in time saves nine” remains a true observation for all of us, regardless of anyone's theology or beliefs.

In summary, the ancient Near East offers an independent network of firm, factual controls over what opinions may be valid or invalid regarding the origins, formats and literary history of the four constituent books of Proverbs. It is regrettable that what was simply speculative “no facts” theory in the later nineteenth century has been in effect canonized into (hyper)critical dogma during the twentieth century. It is the duty of the twenty-first century to peel away these untenable accretions and replace them with clear factual data and clear rational results that derive directly from impartial and tangible data.

See also ASAPH AND SONS OF KORAH; DISCOURSE IN PROVERBS; FORM CRITICISM; HISTORICAL CRITICISM; MAAT; PROVERB, GENRE OF; PROVERBS 1: BOOK OF; WISDOM SOURCES.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. B. Alster, The Instructions of Shuruppak: A Sumerian Proverb Collection (Mesopotamia 2; Copenhagen: Akademisk Forlag, 1974); idem, “Early Dynastic Proverbs and Other Contributions to the Study of Literary Texts from Abu Salabikh,” AfO 38-39 (1991-1992) 1-51; idem, Proverbs of Ancient Sumer: The World’s Earliest Proverb Collection (2 vols.; Bethesda, MD: CDL Press, 1997); S. Bickel and B. Mathieu, “L’écritain Amennakht et son enseignement,” Bulletin de l’Institut français d’archéologie orientale au Caire 93 (1993) 31-51 and plates 1-8; R. A. Caminos, Late-Egyptian Miscellanies (BES 1; London: Oxford University Press, 1954); B. Cumming, Egyptian Historical Records of the Later Eighteenth Dynasty, Fasc. II (Warminster: Aris & Phillips, 1984); J. A. Emerton, “The Teaching of Amenemope and Proverbs xxii 17-xxiv 22: Further Reflections on a Long-standing Problem,” VT 51 (2001) 431-65; A. H. Gardiner, Ancient Egyptian Onomastica (3 vols.; London: Oxford University Press, 1947); W. W. Hallo and K. L. Younger, eds., The Context of Scripture, vol. 1 (Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1997); R. Jasnow, A Late Period Hieratic Wisdom Text (P. Brooklyn 47.218.135) (SAOC 52; Chicago: Oriental Institute of the University of Chicago, 1992); K. A. Kitchen, “Some Egyptian Background to the Old Testament,” TynBul 5-6 (1960) 4-18; idem, “Proverbs and Wisdom Books of the Ancient Near East,” TynBul 28 (1977) 69-114; idem, “The Basic Literary Forms and Formulations of Ancient Instructional Writings in Egypt and Western Asia,” in Studien zu altägyptischen Lebenslehren, ed. E. Hornung and O. Keel (OBO 28; Freiberg: Universitätsverlag; Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1979) 235-82; idem, Ramesside Inscriptions Translated and Annotated: Translations, vol. 1 (Oxford: Blackwell, 1993); idem, “Biblical Instructional Wisdom:

The Decisive Voice of the Ancient Near East,” in Boundaries of the Ancient Near Eastern World: A Tribute to Cyrus H. Gordon, ed. M. Lubetski, C. Gottlieb and S. Keller (JSOTSup 273; Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1998) 346-63; W. G. Lambert, Babylonian Wisdom Literature (Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1960); M. Lichtheim, Ancient Egyptian Literature: A Book of Readings (3 vols.; Berkeley: University of California Press, 1973-1980); W. L. Moran, The Amarna Letters (Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1992); B. Porten and A. Yardeni, eds., Textbook of Aramaic Documents from Ancient Egypt, 3: Literature, Accounts, Lists (Jerusalem: Hebrew University, 1993); J. Ruffle, “The Teaching of Amenemope and Its Connection with the Book of Proverbs,” TynBul 28 (1977) 29-68; N. Shupak, Where Can Wisdom Be Found? The Sage’s Language in the Bible and in Ancient Egyptian Literature (OBO 130; Fribourg: Universitätsverlag; Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1993); D. C. Simpson, “The Hebrew Book of Proverbs and the Teaching of Amenophis,” JEA (1926) 232-39; W. K. Simpson, ed., The Literature of Ancient Egypt (3rd ed.; New Haven: Yale University Press, 2003); K. E. Slanski, The Babylonian Entitlement narûs (kudurrus): A Study in Their Form and Function (Boston: American Schools of Oriental Research, 2003); S. Weeks, Early Israelite Wisdom (OTM; Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1994). K. A. Kitchen

PROVERBS 3: HISTORY OF INTERPRETATION

The history of the interpretation of Proverbs begins with the early translations of the book and reaches to scholarly analyses of the text in current commentaries, monographs and essays.

1. The Septuagint and the Targum
2. Early and Medieval Jewish and Christian Interpretation
3. English Protestant Interpretation: Jonathan Edwards
4. Proverbs in Modern Study

1. The Septuagint and the Targum.

1.1. The Septuagint of Proverbs. The starting point for our investigation of the history of the interpretation of Proverbs—that is, the earliest point at which we have a sustained interpretation of the text—is the LXX translation of the book. There is a serious problem, of course, in using an ancient translation to determine the interpretive methodology and presuppositions of its translator: the tendencies of the translation are most apparent where that translation differs from the Hebrew text, but in many cases the LXX is not appreciably different in meaning from the received Hebrew of the MT. Also, there are reasons why the LXX might differ from the MT that have nothing to do with the translator's hermeneutics (e.g., textual corruptions in either the LXX or the MT; an LXX translation based in postbiblical meanings for a Hebrew word; simple translation error). Sometimes, however, differences in the LXX can be attributed to the translator's hermeneutic. For Proverbs, the following tendencies in the LXX translation can be observed:

- Using abstractions to replace the vivid, metaphorical language of the MT, as in Proverbs 12:6—MT: "The words of the wicked are for an ambush of blood, but the mouth of the upright delivers them"; LXX: "The words of the wicked are deceitful, but the mouth of the upright delivers them."
- Giving proverbs a moralizing or spiritual tone that goes beyond what the MT states, as in Proverbs 13:11—MT: "Wealth from nothing [i.e., wealth acquired quickly and with little effort] shrinks, but he who gathers it by hand [i.e., who acquires wealth over time and with effort] increases it"; LXX: "Property hastily gained with lawlessness becomes small, but the one who gathers to himself with piety becomes abundant—a just man shows compassion and lends."
- A preference for antithetical proverbs with their underlying duality of good versus evil. Many proverbs of the MT are antithetical in nature, but the LXX sometimes has antitheses where the MT does not, as in Proverbs 11:7—MT: "When a wicked man dies, [his] hope will perish, and the expectation of power perishes"; LXX: "When a righteous man dies his hope will not perish, but the boast of the ungodly perishes."
- Occasional recasting of theological language in a manner more suited to Second Temple Judaism, as in Proverbs 29:18—MT: "In the absence of [prophetic] vision, a people is left unrestrained, but blessed is he who keeps law"; LXX: "There should be no interpreter for a lawless people, but the one who keeps the law is blessed." The MT speaks of the charismatic role of the prophet where the LXX has the exegete or interpreter; this may be a deliberate reflection of the religious sensibilities of Hellenistic era Judaism. The LXX also contrasts a lawless (paranomos) people with the one who keeps the *law (nomos)—a rendition that reflects the importance of Torah in this community.

- Avoidance of blatantly sexual language, as in Proverbs 5:19—MT: "A lovely deer, a graceful doe. Let her breasts saturate you at all times; be intoxicated always in her love"; LXX: "A deer of companionship, a colt of your favor, so let her associate with you. Let her very self be regarded as yours and you stay with her at all times. For in going about in the companionship of this woman you shall come forth enriched."
- A recasting of proverbs on laziness and diligence, so that they deal with other moral or spiritual issues, as in Proverbs 20:13a—MT: "Do not love sleep, lest you lose your property"; LXX: "Do not love to malign, so that you not be cut off."

What are we to make of such differences? Sometimes, of course, the translator's Vorlage may have contained a reading different from that found in the MT, but some scholars, most notably J. E. Cook, argue that the translator of Proverbs had a Hebrew Vorlage not significantly different from the MT. This translator was capable, but he was also willing to take some liberties with the text, so that the LXX renditions are driven more by his theological and exegetical purposes than by variant readings in the underlying Hebrew. The translator at times diverged significantly from his parent Hebrew text in order to make clearer what he believed to be the actual meaning of the book.

However, the precise orientation of the translator's presuppositions are debated. Suggestions include that he engaged in Jewish midrashic exegesis or, conversely, that he was heavily influenced by Hellenistic thought. G. Gerleman, for example, has argued that the tendency to recast proverbs on laziness reflects Stoic philosophy in that Stoicism did not consider laziness a vice. On the other hand, Cook claims that the LXX of Proverbs is fundamentally Jewish in outlook (even that it was translated in Jerusalem rather than in Alexandria), but that it does incorporate non-Jewish ideas to reinforce what is already present in the Hebrew text. For example, Proverbs 6:6-8 in Hebrew uses the analogy of the ant to demonstrate the value of being industrious, but the LXX is greatly expanded by the inclusion of a discussion of the wise labor of the bee. Cook argues that this expansion is demonstrably derived from the portrait of the bee in Aristotle's Historia Animalium, and that the LXX translator used it because he believed that it enhanced the point being made in the Hebrew.

Some scholars, such as E. Tov, are not persuaded that the translator of the LXX would have been willing to render the Hebrew so freely, and they say that some of the differences must be due to its having a different parent text (an argument for this is the fact that the LXX places Prov 30:1-14 after Prov 24:22 and sets Prov 30:15-31:9 after Prov 24:34). Even so, one should not ascribe all differences in the LXX of Proverbs to a Vorlage different from that of the MT. For example, as P. Gentry points out, sometimes the LXX translator gave a different reading to a parent text that, in its Hebrew consonants, was identical to that behind the MT. An example is in Proverbs 23:7, where the MT has "as he thinks [šā'ar] in his soul," and the LXX has "like a hair [šē'ār] in the throat," but both readings are based in the same Vorlage, with the consonant ש (šin or šin) in שֶׁר being unpointed. Thus, not every variant reading is theologically motivated, but many of the tendencies of the LXX—a moralizing and theologizing tone, avoidance of potentially offensive language, a fixation on the "good versus evil" antithesis—must be reckoned as examples of the religious outlook of the translator.

1.2. The Targum of Proverbs. The Aramaic *Targumim, with their free and expansive paraphrases of biblical texts, also give us insight into early Jewish interpretation. The date of the Targum of Proverbs is uncertain; it may be from as early as the second century AD or as late as the ninth century AD. It strongly resembles the Syriac Peshitta, so that many scholars believe that it is actually based on the Syriac rather than the Hebrew, although others believe this to be prima facie unlikely and argue that the Syriac is dependent on the Targum. Be that as it may, the Targum of Proverbs is noteworthy for lacking the kind of expansive, haggadic paraphrase that one often sees in the Targumim. It may be that Proverbs, by nature a plain and practical book, did not attract the kind of exegetical extravagance seen elsewhere in the Targumim.

The Targum does have a few of the same traits as the LXX. For example, it avoids the explicit sexuality of Proverbs 5:19, rendering it as, "a hind of love and a gazelle of grace. Learn good conduct at all times and in love of her you will grow ever stronger" (emphasis original in Healy translation, indicating where the Targum is different from the MT). Also, the Targum recasts the theological language of Proverbs 29:18, rendering it as "When the evil are many the people are broken, but happy is he who keeps the law" (emphasis original in Healy). In the main, however, the Targum is a fairly straightforward rendering of Proverbs; its interpretations are often identical to what one sees in the MT.

2. Early and Medieval Jewish and Christian Interpretation.

2.1. Premodern Rabbinic Interpretation. Midrash Mishle (Midrash on Proverbs) is an invaluable source of lore and teaching on Proverbs in the rabbinic tradition. Although compiled in about the ninth or tenth century AD by an unknown redactor at an unknown location, it contains rabbinical teachings based in Proverbs from much earlier, using both Palestinian and Babylonian rabbinic sources and citing the Mishnah, Tosefta, Mekilta, Babylonian Talmud and Genesis Rabbah, among others. It almost invariably uses texts from Proverbs as launching pads for extended discussions in rabbinical doctrines and controversies of its time; it rarely expounds on the contextual or literal meaning of a verse.

A marvelous example of such exposition is in the comments on Proverbs 10:3, "The LORD does not let the righteous go hungry, but the desire of the wicked he thwarts." This leads into rabbinic comments on the basis of divine judgment in the last day, and in particular to assertions that one finds life and vindication through the study of Torah. This in turn leads to an explication, by means of a fictitious drama of divine judgment, of the entire rabbinic program of righteousness through study. Interrogating a "disciple of the sages," God first asks if he had meditated on Torah. If the answer is affirmative, God then examines him to see if he knows the Mishnah. If he knows that, he must show that he has recited the Midrash on Leviticus, and then he is examined on his knowledge of the midrashim on all of the Pentateuch. If he accomplishes that, he must demonstrate that he has recited haggadah and, passing that, demonstrate knowledge of the Talmud. Finally, he must show that he had engaged in the mystical meditation on the nature of God's chariot (Ezek 1).

Torah has all but supplanted the role of Wisdom in Midrash Mishle. In its exposition of Proverbs 8, it regularly in effect reads "Torah" for Wisdom. Thus, discussing Proverbs 8:30, it simply comments, "At first Torah was in heaven." At Proverbs 22:1, "A good name is preferable to great riches, and favor is better than silver or gold," it comments that a person who has silver and gold without Torah has nothing, and that the "favor" that excels riches in value is surely Torah. Training a child in the proper way to go (Prov 22:6) likewise refers to teaching Torah.

At times Midrash Mishle relates Proverbs to biblical or legendary stories. Proverbs 27:17 ("Iron sharpens iron, and one man sharpens another") is taken to refer to the conflict between Moses and Pharaoh. But "Good news puts fat on the bones" (Prov 15:30) leads into a lengthy anecdote on how Rabbi Johanan ben Zakkai warned the Jews that their rebellion against Rome (in the war of AD 66-70) would bring down the temple. He then by trickery escaped Jerusalem and made his way to the camp of Vespasian, to whom he predicted that Nero would die and Vespasian would replace him as emperor. When the report of his election to the imperial throne arrived, Vespasian was perplexed that he could not put on his boot, but Rabbi Johanan was able to explain that the good news had put fat on his bones.

Other rabbinical texts handle Proverbs in much the same way as does Midrash Mishle. The Leviticus Rabbah, for example, in establishing the point that Israel alone has true prophets, cites Proverbs 15:29 ("The LORD is far from the wicked, but he will hear the prayer of the righteous"), explaining that the "wicked" are the prophets of the nations and the "righteous" are the prophets of Israel.

It should not be supposed, however, that all early Jewish interpretation of Proverbs was midrashic. Jewish scholars also produced commentaries that gave a more literal and contextually based interpretation of the biblical texts (the peshat, "plain sense" commentaries). Commentaries on Proverbs in this mode include those by Shlomo ben Isaac (d. 1105), Moses Kimhi (d. c. 1190) and Levi ben Gershom (Gersonides [d. 1344]). Even Midrash Mishle can exegete the text in a fairly literal manner, as at Proverbs 26:18-22, where it explains that these verses refer to slander and gossip.

2.2. Proverbs in the New Testament. Two NT allusions to Proverbs reflect a general biblical literacy more than any specific manner of interpreting the text. When both Jesus in Matthew 16:27 and Paul in Romans 2:6 apparently cite part of Proverbs 24:12 ("Will not [God] repay a man according to his work?"), it is doubtful that either was reflecting on the context of these words in Proverbs. Rather, the language of Proverbs has influenced the rhetoric of Jesus and Paul. That is, both speak in the idiom of the OT. We should note that similar language also appears in Psalm 62:12.

Usually, the NT interprets a text from Proverbs quite literally and applies it in a manner in keeping with its original usage. A good example is the citation of Proverbs 3:11-12 in Hebrews 12:5-6 (see also the citations of Prov 3:34 in 1 Pet 5:5; Prov 10:12 in 1 Pet 4:8; Prov 11:31 in 1 Pet 4:18). The citation of Proverbs 25:21-22 in Romans 12:20 could be added to this list, although admittedly the intended meaning of the Proverbs text is difficult. 2 Peter 2:22 cites Proverbs 26:11 ("A dog returns to its vomit") in its original sense but adds to that a citation from the Aramaic wisdom text Ahikar 7.27 to the effect that a pig, after a bath, wallows in mire. In short, the NT generally cites aphorisms in Proverbs in accordance with their most obvious moral meanings.

A much more controversial question is whether Paul in 1 Corinthians 1:24, where he calls Christ the "wisdom of God," is alluding to Proverbs 8. That is, does Paul imply that *Woman Wisdom is in fact the Logos? The universal conclusion of the patristic authors is that he does (see 2.3 below). There is good reason for believing, however, that this is not the case.

The "wisdom of God" in 1 Corinthians 1:17-31 is paradoxical. It is a wisdom that appears to be *folly in that it asserts that God redeemed humanity via a condemned and crucified criminal. In this, it is incomprehensible to the wisdom-seeking Greeks, just as it is offensive to the Jews who look for a Messiah coming in power. The divine folly of 1 Corinthians 1 is focused on the cross and calls upon people to seek grace. By contrast, there is no paradoxical divine folly in Woman Wisdom of Proverbs 8. Her appeals are based upon her relationship to creation, suggesting that prudence and moral rectitude are in harmony with the order that is built into the world (see Creation Theology). Such harmony is the polar opposite of the paradoxical tension—the divine wisdom as a stumbling block—found in Paul's thought. Woman Wisdom calls upon her hearers to sound judgment and rational behavior rather than to a counterintuitive work of grace. In short, apart from the word wisdom, it is difficult to see any connection between Proverbs 8 and 1 Corinthians 1. The citations listed above, moreover, suggest that the NT writers read Proverbs in a straightforward manner for practical exhortation.

2.3. Patristic and Medieval Christian Interpretation: Christ the Wisdom of God. Samples of post-NT Christian reflections on Proverbs can be given (see Wright), but early and medieval Christian exegetes actually gave relatively little attention to Proverbs. Their basic understanding of the nature of the Solomonic books was from Origen via Jerome: Proverbs is wisdom for beginners; *Ecclesiastes is for the more proficient and is meant to keep them from the vanity of the world; *Song of Songs is a mystical introduction to the love of God for the advanced reader. Thus, interpreters gave far more attention to Song of Songs than to Proverbs.

In addition, early Christian interpretation of the OT was driven first by the conviction that it testified to Christ and second by the conviction that the saving truths of the gospel could be found everywhere in its pages. The first major hermeneutical conflict that Christianity faced was with the Jews, who contended that Jesus Christ was not to be found in their Scriptures. It is not surprising, therefore, that early Christian reading of Proverbs quickly gravitated to its portrayal of Wisdom (especially in Prov 8). Citations of Proverbs 8 are found in the writings of the great theologians of the early church (such as Irenaeus, Clement of Alexandria, Origen, Augustine), as well as in the lesser lights of early Christian scholarship. Their unanimous viewpoint, following the early apologists Justin Martyr and Athenagoras (both second century AD), was that the Logos was the Wisdom of Proverbs 8. The identification of Christ with Woman Wisdom, however, carried with it a grave problem: Wisdom herself declares that the Lord created her at the beginning of his work (Prov 8:22). This gave an enormous opening to the heretic Arius (c. AD 256-336), who readily conceded that Christ could be identified as the Wisdom of Proverbs, and from that argued that only God the Father was truly and innately eternal.

Athanasius (AD 293-373) responded to Arius with Contra Arianos, which contains perhaps the most important piece of patristic exegesis of a text from Proverbs. According to C. Kannengiesser, Athanasius responded by pointing out that Proverbs 8:22 is "proverbial" in nature; that is, it is set within a literary figure and cannot be applied directly to Christ without first working through its figurative elements. Furthermore, Athanasius asserted that with this, as with any text, one must inquire into its "time" (kairos), "person" (prosōpon) and "point" (pragma). The point of Proverbs 8:22, he claimed, is that Wisdom makes a self-disclosure that can be identified only with the person of Christ and with the time of the incarnation. And it is at the incarnation, not as the eternal Word, that Wisdom says, "You created me."

Another text of great significance to early Christian interpreters was Proverbs 22:20-21, which in the LXX begins, "And you, write these things for yourself in a threefold manner." Origen took this to refer to the threefold meaning behind each text of Scripture (the literal, moral and spiritual, analogous to the human body, soul and spirit). Jerome transmitted this hermeneutical canon to the Western church, and it became a pillar supporting the medieval program of allegorical exegesis.

Elsewhere, just as the rabbis related Proverbs to traditional rabbinical teaching on Torah, the church fathers frequently related texts from Proverbs to the incarnation or to other NT teachings. In Proverbs 9:2-5, where Wisdom slaughters her beasts and sets her table with bread and wine, Hippolytus in his fragments on Proverbs sees the Eucharist (so also Cyprian Letter 63.5; Bede Commentary on Proverbs 1.9.5). John Cassian (Conference 24.24.6) relates Proverbs 15:19 ("The way of a sluggard is like a hedge of thorns, but the path of the upright is a built-up highway") to our pilgrimage to the heavenly Jerusalem. Evagrius of Pontus (Scholia on Proverbs 304.25.10) used Proverbs 25:8-10, an exhortation against taking one's neighbors to court without first trying to settle a matter quietly, as an appropriate text for discussing our freedom and friendship with God in Christ.

A good example of this tendency is in Bede's comments on Proverbs 22:29, which in context teaches that skillful and diligent workers will be duly recognized (the Vulgate version can be rendered, "Have you seen a man quick in his work? He will stand in the presence of kings; he will not be before lowly men"). Bede, however, takes the proverb to refer to the final judgment and uses it to allude to heretical teachings: "Whom-ever you see quick in his work, that is, both vigorous and anxious in a good work which is his to do, understand that in the day of the last judgment, that one will be standing in the presence of the Apostles, who will sit with Christ to judge the world. For clearly that one will have kept their commands and will not be counted among the company of lowly teachers—whose errors he avoided—that is to be set on the left hand of the judge" (Commentary on Proverbs 2.22.29).

It would be wrong, however, to suppose that the early and medieval expositors always jumped from the text of Proverbs to distinctively Christian doctrine. Frequently their comments directly expound on the practicalities of virtuous living described in the text. Ambrose (Duties of the Clergy 1.3.10-11) uses Proverbs 4:23 as a basis for an exhortation to keep close watch over one's thoughts and speech. Augustine, in Sermon 36, uses Proverbs 13:7 for a discourse on wealth and on the dangerous pride that it engenders. A favorite passage for early and medieval Christians was Proverbs 31:10-31, the portrait of the valiant woman. This could be allegorized as a portrait of the church maintaining pure doctrine, but it could also be read more literally as a song in praise of flesh-and-blood women (as did Gregory of Nazianzus in praising his parents and his sister). Augustine, in drawing out distinctively Christian or "spiritual" lessons from this text, never lost sight of the fact that it was first concerned with a virtuous woman.

3. English Protestant Interpretation: Jonathan Edwards.

By its very nature, Proverbs is not a focal point for theological controversy. Most of its teachings are practical, and notwithstanding the difficulty of translating a number of individual proverbs, the essential meaning of any specific discourse or proverb is self-evident. Thus, it was not a bone of contention in the theological battles of Christians and Jews (there are exceptions to this rule: Peter the Chanter of Paris, writing in the late twelfth century, indicates that Jews and Christians wrestled over Prov 30:4, a text that a Christian naturally would read in a trinitarian manner ["What is his name, and what is the name of his son, if you know?"]). As we have seen, the figure of Wisdom was heavily employed in Jewish and Christian theological rumination, and any tradition could take an individual proverb and apply it to that tradition's ideals, albeit often in an arbitrary manner. Despite all this, the bulk of Proverbs was simply too plain and straightforward for it to attract a great deal of this kind of theological attention.

But it is this very quality of plainness and practicality about righteousness that made Proverbs especially attractive to one Christian tradition. Protestant Reformed theology, especially that of the English variety, looked upon Proverbs as a treasure. Both Matthew Poole (1624-1679) and Matthew Henry (1662-1714) extolled Proverbs as a practical guide to devout and upright living, and both gave it considerable attention. The most expansive meditation on Proverbs in this tradition is the massive commentary by Charles Bridges (1794-1869). But perhaps the greatest theologian to read Proverbs in this manner was Jonathan Edwards (1703-1758).

At the very beginning of his career, in 1722, Edwards resolved that "A righteous man who can find?" (Prov 20:6) would be fulfilled in himself. Edwards believed that *Solomon had written Proverbs for young men who sought to bring all the habits of mind and body into subjection. As S. J. Stein demonstrates, throughout his life Edwards used it as a basis for self-examination and meditation. He took "Be not wise in thine own eyes" (Prov 3:7) as a prohibition of pride about one's own holiness, judgment or virtue. He preached from Proverbs, believing, with Matthew Henry, that the counsels of Wisdom were a counteragent to the counsels of *Satan.

But Stein points out that Edwards did not merely engage in pious moralizing. Edwards's theory of metaphor and imagination played an important role in his analysis of Proverbs. Reflecting on Proverbs 25:11 ("A word fitly spoken is like apples of gold in pictures of silver"), Edwards stated, "The words are silver and the sense and fruit is gold." That is, the core teachings—the actual meaning—of the text, like apples of gold, obviously have great value. But the very words—the language and metaphor by which the meaning is conveyed—are also to be prized. These are the “pictures of silver.” In doing its work of edification, the text addresses intellect as well as imagination both through that which is signified (the meaning of the text) and its signifier (the poetics of the text). Thus the text ultimately leads us to Christ, who is both the true wisdom and the beauty of holiness. The poetics are not merely ornamentation, making the truth somewhat more pleasing, but rather are the very means into the truth. Therefore, when Edwards commented on Proverbs, he was not content merely to leap to the essential meaning of the text; he also wrestled with the implications of its form and metaphor. For example, Edwards noted how often Proverbs described the qualities of the righteous and the wicked under metaphors of physical anatomy (their eyes, hands, feet and so forth, as in Prov 10:10; 15:30; 23:26; 25:17), and he followed suit, using similar language in his sermons.

As Edwards matured, he came more and more to recognize that his youthful attempts to discipline himself into godliness were doomed to fail, and so also came to recognize the need for grace. Thus, for him, the wisdom of Proverbs was not merely instruction in righteousness but was ultimately Christ himself, who draws us into holiness by his grace and beauty. We should note in passing, however, that the Puritan divines were not the only theologians who regarded biblical wisdom as a guide to sanctification; this was a favorite theme of the Franciscan Bonaventure (1221-1274) also.

4. Proverbs in Modern Study.

4.1. The Abandonment of the Solomonic Authorship of Proverbs in the Nineteenth Century. At the beginning of the nineteenth century Proverbs was widely regarded as a very ancient work and possibly of Solomonic origin. By the end of the century most scholars had abandoned that view. The story of how scholarly opinions were transformed has been documented by R. Smend.

In 1835 W. Vatke advocated a fifth-century BC date for Proverbs, primarily on the grounds that the ethical and moral spirit of the book was incompatible with an earlier date. By 1873 even the relatively conservative F. Delitzsch would dismiss the notion of Solomonic authorship as implausible. Like many of his contemporaries and much of subsequent scholarship, he believed that different parts of Proverbs had come from different eras. Most scholars believed that the sentence proverbs of Proverbs 10:1–22:16 were for the most part older, and conversely they believed that the wisdom discourses of Proverbs 1–9 were later, although there were some exceptions (see Discourse in Proverbs). E. Bertheau, writing in 1883, listed three reasons for rejecting a preexilic date for the material of Proverbs: (1) there was no reference to Proverbs in the prophetic books; (2) Proverbs implies that Yahwism has triumphed over paganism in Israel; (3) Proverbs appears to be similar to *Sirach. When T. K. Cheyne addressed the issue in 1893, the consensus was that the present book of Proverbs is a postexilic production. C. Toy, writing for the International Critical Commentary series in 1899, came to similar conclusions.

As scholars entered the twentieth century fairly confident that Proverbs was postexilic, the question of the book's date was no longer the center of attention (although interest in that issue has never disappeared). And although some of the questions raised in the twentieth century were already raised in the nineteenth, such as the matter of whether there were wisdom “schools” in ancient Israel, these were much more thoroughly examined in the twentieth century. In addition, the flood of ancient Egyptian and Mesopotamian wisdom texts made available in the twentieth century provoked great interest in setting Israelite wisdom in its context. The story of twentieth-century investigations into Proverbs has been documented by R. N. Whybray (1995).

4.2. The Roots of Israelite Wisdom and of Proverbs.

4.2.1. The Sitz im Leben of Proverbial Wisdom. In seeking the Sitz im Leben of Proverbs, scholars have debated whether the teachings of the book are derived primarily from Israelite folk sayings or from formal schools. On the one side is the view that Proverbs primarily represents an institutional endeavor, created by formal schools of “wisdom” that were centrally located, perhaps royally sponsored, and that drew heavily upon international wisdom and perhaps also upon traditional Jewish religious instruction, such as the Torah. On the other side is the view that proverbs by nature are folk sayings, and that they were passed down as tribal wisdom and family exhortation until they were at last codified in an editorial process that ended in the postexilic era. There is, of course, a wide variety of distinctive positions within the spectrum of these two models.

G. von Rad is a champion of the view that Israelite wisdom was heavily dependent upon the international wisdom of Egypt and Mesopotamia. For him, the Israelite Wisdom literature was primarily a work of formal schools that, beginning in the united monarchy, encountered and formally studied the older, international wisdom. Frequent reference to kings in Proverbs (such as at Prov 25:2) suggests a royal sponsorship of wisdom schools. A number of influential scholars substantially agree with this, but others differ, arguing that most of Proverbs seems derived from ordinary life rather than from the court, and that even in Egypt wisdom literature is not always from high officials. Whybray (1974) argues that in the OT wise and wisdom have no particular association with the royal court, and that there is little reason to assume that there was a school of the wise at the center of power.

A related question was whether schools as formal institutions of learning for the young existed in Israel (see Sages, Schools, Education). Analogies from Egypt and Mesopotamia suggest that Israel, like those cultures, must have developed formal teaching institutions for families above the status of the yeoman peasants. Some scholars, such as B. Lang (1979) and A. Lemaire, claim that the existence of such schools is demonstrable archaeologically due to the discovery of abecedaries and other such inscriptions. Others, however, argue that the evidence is in fact very slim, noting the complete lack of reference to any such schools in the OT itself.

On the other side of this issue are scholars who argue that Israelite wisdom was a native development from family and tribal teachings. In particular, a number of scholars, following O. Eissfeldt, argue that the shorter, pithy sayings of Proverbs 10–29 are similar to folk proverbs found in every culture. H. W. Wolff and E. Gerstenberger argue independently for the existence of a Sippenweisheit, or “folk wisdom,” behind biblical wisdom. Many other scholars, however, are unconvinced. There is, at present, little consensus on this issue beyond awareness that the background of Israelite wisdom is complex and probably not explicable on the basis of a single source.

4.2.2. Secular Wisdom and Yahwistic Wisdom Redactors. Another, related issue concerns whether Proverbs contains an older layer of “secular” wisdom upon which a later layer of Yahwistic piety has been superimposed. The essential idea is that Proverbs contains evidence of an older wisdom that was concerned primarily with prudent behavior, much like the common aphorisms of many cultures, but that this material, in a Yahwistic redaction, was supplemented with sayings that were explicitly religious and focused on Yahweh. No one exploited this concept so fully as did W. McKane, who argues that there are in fact three layers or categories of material in the sentence literature of Proverbs 10–29. “Class A” is the older wisdom and teaches the individual how to have a successful and harmonious life. Examples from Proverbs 13 include Proverbs 13:1, 3, 4, 7, 8, 10, 11, 12, 13, 14, 15, 16, 18, 19a, 20, 24. “Class B” is like Class A in that it is also secular, but it is primarily concerned with the well-being of the community and points out types of antisocial behavior that damage the community. Examples from Proverbs 13 include Proverbs 13:2, 5, 17, 19b. “Class C” proverbs are a later reworking of Class A proverbs to give them a theological message and are identified by the presence of “God language.” Examples from Proverbs 13 include Proverbs 13:6, 9, 21, 22, and 25.

Scholars have not been persuaded by McKane’s schema, and in general the consensus is that there was no Yahwistic edition of Proverbs. It is obvious to many interpreters that some of the proverbs are distinctive for explicitly naming Yahweh, but it is not clear that this indicates that a separate redaction took place. The explicit mention or nonmention of Yahweh is in fact just one of the variables that one can see in Proverbs (other variables being, for example, the mention or nonmention of the king, different types of *parallelism, and the presence or absence of various kinds of metaphor). Reviewers point out also that a distinction between “secular” and “religious” teachings in the manner described above is anachronistic for early Israel and the ancient Near East.

4.2.3. Egyptian and Mesopotamian Connections. The discovery of wisdom texts from Egypt and the ancient Near East in the late nineteenth and early twentieth centuries provoked an enormous wave of research into the background of biblical wisdom literature. Egyptian wisdom material predating its biblical counterparts—in some cases by more than a millennium—included from the Old Kingdom The Maxims of Ptah-hotep; from the First Intermediate Period The Teaching for Merikare; from the Middle Kingdom The Teaching of King Amenemhet I for His Son Senwosret; The Admonitions of Ipuwer; The Eloquent Peasant; The Man Who Was Weary of Life; and from the New Kingdom The Instructions of Any; The Instruction of Amenemope. In addition, Sumerian and Akkadian proverbs from Mesopotamia were discovered, as well as the Akkadian Counsels of Wisdom. A later wisdom text of significance is the Story of Ahikar, known from an Aramaic text dating to about 500 BC.

Henceforth, Israelite wisdom could never be studied in isolation from its international context, and it became de rigueur for every modern commentary on Proverbs to contain a discussion of ancient Near Eastern wisdom. The Egyptian Instruction of Amenemope provoked an enormous amount of discussion because of its similarity to Proverbs 22:17–24:22. Parallel to the thirty chapters of Amenemope, the enigmatic Hebrew of Proverbs 22:20a is widely emended to read, “Have I not written thirty sayings for you” (NIV), and the text of Proverbs 22:17–24:22 fairly easily divides into an introduction and thirty teachings. Although there are many differences between the two works, analogous teachings are undeniable (such as the warnings about how to behave when dining with a high official in Prov 23:1–3 and in Amenemope chap. 23). Scholars argue over how these similarities might be explained, suggesting either that one of the two texts influenced the other, or that both looked back to an earlier source, or that they had no direct connection but both drew on common wisdom ideas. No clear consensus exists beyond the conclusion that Amenemope is from the New Kingdom and so predates Proverbs.

Ancient Near Eastern wisdom also provided grounds for reopening the question of the date of the composition of Proverbs. K. A. Kitchen (1977) examines all the extant literature and on formal grounds concludes that there is little reason to date Proverbs late, contrary to what nineteenth-century scholars had concluded. In particular, Kitchen demonstrates that there is no evidence that the complex “discourse” wisdom of Proverbs 1–9 constitutes a later development, with the “sentence” wisdom being earlier. The assertion that Proverbs could not have come from the early first millennium is undermined by the ancient parallels. In particular, both D. Garrett and B. Waltke argue that the Egyptian and Mesopotamian wisdom indicates an early date for the composition of Proverbs (see Proverbs 2: Ancient Near Eastern Background).

4.2.4. The Origin and Significance of the Proverbial Bicolon. Examining individual proverbs, scholars wondered if they saw evidence for the historical development of the formal proverbial bicolon. O. Eissfeldt, W. O. E. Oesterley and J. Hempel argued that in many cases the *sages took an original one-line folk saying and added to it a second line in antithetical or synonymous *parallelism. But B. Gemser pointed out that the demotic wisdom literature, appearing as the latest of the Egyptian wisdom texts, uses one-line sentences with no parallelism, and he effectively undercut the evolutionary theory. Although some more recent scholars continue to believe that traces of folk wisdom may be evident in Proverbs, few think that these are identifiable or that a history of the development of the bicolon can be traced.

Scholars also noticed that some bicola were indicative statements (the Aussagewort, such as Prov 17:18: “A man without sense shakes hands and puts up security for his neighbor”) and others were admonitions (the Mahnwort, such as Prov 24:28: “Do not testify against your neighbor for no good reason, or use your lips to deceive”). Hempel, noting that the Mahnwort was more common in the later chapters of Proverbs, argued that this represents a later stage in evolution of the proverb form. Subsequent scholars debated the issue, some asserting that one could not demonstrate chronological development using this formal device, and others simply asserting that the distinction between Aussagewort and Mahnwort was overdrawn and of little significance.

4.3. The Personification of Wisdom. Scholars have focused a great deal of attention on the relationship between Wisdom personified as a woman (Prov 1:20–33; 8) and Maat, the Egyptian goddess of justice and order. Although few today would deny that the Egyptian notion of *maat could have had any influence on Israelite thinking, equally few would assert that Maat is either the counterpart to or the origin of Proverbs’ Woman Wisdom. The differences between the two are at least as significant as the similarities. Unlike Woman Wisdom, Maat in the Egyptian texts does not make exhortations recommending herself to young men. Maat is a goddess, but Woman Wisdom is a *personification. The Egyptian word for “wisdom” is not personified in the manner that the Hebrew word is. Lang (1986) argues that Proverbs 8 was originally a song of self-praise sung by an Israelite goddess that was redacted and demythologized to give it its current form.

4.4. The Editorial Grouping of Proverbs. Scholars have debated whether there is any order to the sentence aphorisms of Proverbs 10–29. Many scholars treat the individual sayings as being, in effect, without context or structural order. R. N. Whybray (1979) suggests that “Yahweh sayings” have been inserted among the proverbs to provide some order or to make comments on proverbs in the immediate context. For example, he argues that Proverbs 15:16 reinterprets Proverbs 15:17. O. Plöger observes that sometimes individual proverbs are set together in pairs or in small groups. A. Meinhold groups the proverbs into small collections or paragraphs. D. Garrett similarly argues that proverbs are set in groups identified through parallel structuring, catchwords or common themes and metaphors.

4.5. Repetition in Proverbs and Its Significance. On the basis of a linguistic analysis of the text, J. Grintz (1968; 1993) argues that the major collections in Proverbs 1:1–24:34 were created in the age of Solomon (arguing, e.g., that there are clear linguistic ties between Prov 1–9 and Prov 22:17–24:22). He contends that the collections of Proverbs 25:1–31:31 were added in the reign of Hezekiah, in keeping with the biblical claims. Thus, he maintains that the editorial history of Proverbs is reflected in the order of the book in the MT. D. C. Snell, however, on the basis of an analysis of repetition within Proverbs, takes issue with Grintz’s claim that Proverbs 1–9 is closely related to Proverbs 22:17–24:22. He argues that the redaction of the book had a more complex history, beginning with Proverbs 25–29 in the reign of Hezekiah and with other collections added thereafter in three subsequent stages. Snell has also given subsequent scholars a valuable database of repetition in Proverbs to explore.

4.6. The Virtuous Woman of Proverbs 31:10–31. The poem of the virtuous woman at the end of Proverbs has attracted a good deal of attention. A number of scholars have made proposals regarding the structure of the poem. Some take its alphabetic *acrostic layout to be a mnemonic device (e.g., Toy), but others have found that explanation insufficient and look for other explanations. W. G. E. Watson argues that the acrostic is meant to persuade the reader that the poem has exhaustively treated its subject. Interpreters are divided as to what structure the poem may have beyond its obvious acrostic pattern. Garrett suggests that the poem has a chiasmic structure (see Chiasm), with Proverbs 31:23 at its center and pivot, implying that the poem is a last word of advice to the young man, telling him that this is the kind of woman he ought to seek for a wife.

Many scholars naturally interpret this passage as being concerned primarily with the ideal of the wife, mother and homemaker. M. B. Crook argues that this poem was the memorandum of a lesson on home economics for aristocratic young women in a formal school setting. Others interpreters, such as T. McCresh, maintain that the woman of Proverbs 31 is neither a real nor even an ideal wife, but that the subject of this text is Woman Wisdom, analogous to what we see in Proverbs 1–9. C. Camp argues that by basing the abstraction of wisdom in the actual wise women of Israel, Proverbs 1–9 and 31 “recontextualizes” wisdom under the theological metaphor of the prudent woman. A. Wolters, on the other hand, suggests that Proverbs 31:27 contains in the Hebrew word šōpiyyā (“[she is] watching”) a deliberate *word-play on sophia, the Greek word for “wisdom.”

4.7. The Theology of Proverbs. Whybray (1995) has laid out ten broad areas of consensus about the theology of Proverbs in modern scholarship.

1. It does not focus on Israel.
2. It has some historical ties to ancient Near Eastern wisdom literature.
3. It focuses on practical ethics for the individual.
4. It is generally optimistic in outlook, in contrast to Ecclesiastes.
5. It does not lay out a complete systematic theology.
6. It teaches that one’s behavior determines whether one prospers or suffers.
7. At least some of its teachings are religiously motivated.
8. It is thoroughly monotheistic.
9. Gaining “wisdom” is the key to a good life.
10. Wisdom is the gift of God.

Whybray also lays out ten disputed areas, which we can best describe as ten questions.

1. Does Proverbs have a unified message?
2. Is Proverbs an alien corpus within the OT, having more in common with international wisdom than with Israel's covenant theology? H. D. Preuss asserts that in Proverbs Yahweh is not so much the God of the law, of Israel's cult, and of the Genesis creation narrative; he is rather the deity who upholds the moral world order of wisdom.
3. Is Proverbs essentially practical, or does it have a theology? J. C. Rylaarsdam, for example, argues that it is a religious work, and he seeks to show that Wisdom is parallel to the Old Testament concept of the divine Spirit.
4. Is Proverbs more anthropocentric than theocentric? W. Zimmerli argues that the anthropocentric nature of Proverbs is evident in how it admonishes the reader but does not base its legitimacy in an appeal to divine authority.
5. According to Proverbs, is *suffering imposed by God on evildoers, or is suffering simply the natural outcome of evil behavior? In divine *retribution the evildoer suffers because God directly punishes that person for evil acts, but in an "act-consequence" theory of retribution, each evil action carries within it its own reprisal, so that suffering, personal ruin, disgrace and death are intrinsic to evil behavior. God, in effect, does not need to intervene with punishment because the evildoer brings down destruction on his or her own head. An act-consequence interpretation of Proverbs sets it apart from a book such as Deuteronomy, in which retribution is always a direct judgment from God.
6. In contrast to Torah, should Proverbs be regarded as sage advice instead of authoritative doctrine? Zimmerli's anthropocentric understanding of Proverbs suggests that it is more properly advice than it is revelation.
7. Is Proverbs rooted in a theology of creation? This is highly disputed, with some scholars asserting that the orderliness of creation is behind the moral world order espoused in Proverbs, and others saying that there is virtually no reflection on creation in Proverbs.
8. Does Proverbs teach that there is a pervasive ordering of the world (analogous to Egyptian maat)? R. E. Murphy argues that although there are impressive parallels between goddess Maat and Woman Wisdom in Proverbs 1—9, claiming to see a world order in Proverbs 10—15 is a transposing of Egyptian ideals upon Proverbs.
9. Has Yahwistic theology been imposed by a later redactor upon proverbs that originally were either secular or more generically religious? Against McKane, who argues that the earliest layer of Proverbs is secular, M. Fox maintains that the teachings of Proverbs are essentially a religious system, but that an explicitly Yahwistic book of Proverbs is a second stage of development. Even at this later stage, Fox says, the harmonization is somewhat superficial in that Israel's history and covenants are not brought into wisdom teaching until Sirach.
10. How is Woman Wisdom to be interpreted? That is, what is she? Is she a personified attribute of God (divine wisdom)? Against this, von Rad distinctively argues that Wisdom is an attribute not of God but rather of creation. Wisdom is thus present in the world and available to people at large. But, as we have seen, many other interpretations of Woman Wisdom have been offered.

In general, the interpretation of Proverbs has moved toward both greater unity and greater fracturing. Against the earlier sectarian interpretations of the text (whether distinctively Jewish or Christian), most today see it as a book of practical virtue in a monotheistic framework. On the other hand, critical assessments of the origins of its formal patterns of discourse and aphorism, of its relationship to other ancient Near Eastern wisdom, and of the meaning of its portrayal of Woman Wisdom have led to a wide diversity of opinions and to no consensus.

See also FEMINIST INTERPRETATION; PROVERBS 1: BOOK OF; PROVERBS 2: ANCIENT NEAR EASTERN BACKGROUND; SOCIAL-SCIENTIFIC APPROACHES.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. Bede, In Tobiam; In Proverbia;

- In Cantica Canticorum; In Habacuc*, ed. D. Hurst (CCSL 119; Turnhout: Brepols, 1983); C. Camp, Wisdom and the Feminine in the Book of Proverbs (Decatur: Almond Press, 1985); J. E. Cook, The Septuagint of Proverbs: Jewish and/or Hellenistic Proverbs? Concerning the Hellenistic Colouring of LXX Proverbs (VTSup 69; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1997); M. B. Crook, "The Marriageable Maiden of Prov. 31:10-31," JNES 13 (1954) 137-40; O. Eissfeldt, Der Maschal im Alten Testament: eine wortgeschichtliche Untersuchung nebst einer literargeschichtlichen Untersuchung der מִשְׁלָּה genannten Gattungen "Volksspruchwort" und "Spottlied" (BZAW 24; Gießen: A. Töpelmann, 1913); M. V. Fox, "Aspects of the Religion of the Book of Proverbs," HUCA 39 (1968) 55-69; D. Garrett, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, and Song of Songs (NAC; Nashville: Broadman, 1993); B. Gemser, "The Instructions of 'Onchsheshonqy and Biblical Wisdom Literature,'" in Studies in Ancient Israelite Wisdom, ed. James L. Crenshaw (New York: Ktav, 1976), 134-60; P. J. Gentry, "The Septuagint and the Text of the Old Testament," BBR 16 (2006) 193-218; G. Gerleman, Studies in the Septuagint, III: Proverbs (LUÅ 52/3; Lund: Gleerup, 1956); E. Gerstenberger, Wesen und Herkunft des sogenannten apodiktischen Rechts im Alten Testament (Bonn: Rheinischen Friedrich-Wilhelms-Universität, 1961); J. M. Grintz, "משלי שלמה," Leshonenu 33 (1968), 243-69; ET in D. Snell, Twice-Told Proverbs and the Composition of the Book of Proverbs (Winona Lake, IN: Eisenbrauns, 1993) 87-114; J. F. Healy, "The Targum of Proverbs," in The Aramaic Bible, vol. 15, ed. M. McNamara (Collegeville, MN: Liturgical Press, 1991); J. Hempel, "The Forms of Oral Tradition," in Record and Revelation, ed. H. Wheeler Robinson (Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1938), 28-44; C. Kannengiesser, "Lady Wisdom's Final Call: The Patristic Recovery of Proverbs 8," in Nova doctrina vetusque: Essays on Early Christianity in Honor of Fredric W. Schlatter, S.J., ed. D. Kries and C. B. Tkacz (AmUS; New York: Peter Lang, 1999) 65-77; K. A. Kitchen, "Proverbs and Wisdom Books of the Ancient Near East," TynBul 28 (1977) 69-114; idem, "The Basic Literary Forms and Formulations of Ancient Instructional Writings in Egypt and Western Asia," in Studien zu altägyptischen Lebenslehren, ed. E. Hornung and O. Keel (OBO 28; Freiburg: Universitätsverlag; Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1979) 235-82; B. Lang, "Schule und Unterricht im alten Israel," in La Sagesse de l'Ancien Testament, ed. M. Gilbert (BETL 51; Gembloux: Duculot, 1979), 186-201; idem, Wisdom and the Book of Proverbs: An Israelite Goddess Redefined (New York: Pilgrim Press, 1986); A. Lemaire, Les écoles et la formation de la Bible dans l'ancien Israël (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1981); T. McCreesh, "Wisdom as Wife: Proverbs 31:10-31," RB 92: 25-46; W. McKane, Proverbs: A New Approach (OTL; Philadelphia: Westminster, 1970); A. Meinhold, Die Sprüche (Zürich: Theologischer Verlag, 1991); R. E. Murphy, "Assumptions and Problems in Old Testament Wisdom Research," CBQ 29: 407-418; W. O. E. Oesterley, The Book of Proverbs (London: Methuen & co., 1929); O. Plöger, "Zur Auslegung der Sentenzensammlungen des Proverbienbuches," in Probleme biblischer Theologie: Gerhard von Rad zum 70. Geburtstag, ed. Hans Walter Wolff (München: C. Kaiser, 1971), 402-16; H. D. Preuss, Old Testament Theology (Louisville: Westminster John Knox Press, 1995); J. C. Rylaarsdam, Revelation in Jewish Wisdom Literature (Chicago: University of Chicago, 1946); B. Smalley, Medieval Exegesis of Wisdom Literature, ed. R. E. Murphy (SPRTS; Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1986); R. Smend, "The Interpretation of Wisdom in Nineteenth-Century Scholarship," in Wisdom in Ancient Israel: Essays in Honour of J. A. Emerton, ed. J. Day, R. P. Gordon and H. G. M. Williamson (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1995) 257-68; D. C. Snell, Twice-Told Proverbs and the Composition of the Book of Proverbs (Winona Lake, IN: Eisenbrauns, 1993); S. J. Stein, "Like Apples of Gold in Pictures of Silver": The Portrait of Wisdom in Jonathan Edwards's Commentary on the Book of Proverbs," CH 54 (1985) 324-37; E. Tov, Textual Criticism of the Hebrew Bible (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1992); C. Toy, Proverbs (ICC; Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1899); B. L. Visotzky, The Midrash on Proverbs (New Haven: Yale University Press, 1992); G. von Rad, Wisdom in Israel (London: SCM Press, 1972); B. Waltke, The Book of Proverbs: Chapters 1-15 (NICOT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2004); W. G. E. Watson, Classical Hebrew Poetry: A Guide to its Techniques (New York: T & T Clark, 2005); R. N. Whybray, The Intellectual Tradition in the Old Testament (BZAW 135; Berlin: de Gruyter, 1974); idem, "Yahweh-Sayings and their Contexts in Proverbs, 10,1-22,16," in La Sagesse de l'Ancien Testament, ed. M. Gilbert (BETL 51; Gembloux: Duculot, 1979), 153-65; idem, The Book of Proverbs: A Survey of Modern Study (HBI 1; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1995); H. W. Wolff, Amos' Geistige Heimat (Neukirchen-Vluyn: Neukirchener Verlag, 1964); A. Wolters, “Šōpiyyā (Prov. 31:27) as Hymnic Participle and Play on sophia,” JBL 104 (1985) 577-87; J. R. Wright, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, Song of Solomon (ACCS 9; Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 2005); W. Zimmerli, “Concerning the Structure of Old Testament Wisdom,” in Studies in Ancient Israelite Wisdom, ed. James L. Crenshaw (New York: Ktav, 1976), 175-207. D. Garrett

PROVIDENCE, DIVINE. See ESTHER 1: BOOK OF; RUTH 1: BOOK OF.

PSALMS, NONCANONICAL. See DEAD SEA SCROLLS.

PSALMS 1: BOOK OF

The psalms have remained a central fixture for corporate worship and private devotion over the centuries. Readers have been enamored by their poetic language, rich *imagery and stark honesty. In addition, the psalms provide readers with a glimpse into the cultic life of ancient Israel and offer a primer on OT theology. As with all poetic texts, interpretation comes with slow and thoughtful reflection. Form and meaning are mingled together carefully, requiring interpreters to be attentive to all matters simultaneously. In learning to appreciate the poetic and literary quality of the Psalter, contemporary readers will find its theological voice intensified and sharpened. And like generations before, they will find the Psalter to be God's Word to them even as they make it their word to God.

1. Title and Titles
2. Approaches to the Psalter
3. Genre
4. Hebrew Poetry
5. The Psalter as a Book
6. Theological Themes in the Psalter
7. The Psalms and the New Testament

1. Title and Titles.

1.1. The Name of the Book. The words psalm and psalter are of Greek origin. The word psalm derives from the Greek psalmos, which refers to the playing of a stringed instrument. This term appears in the LXX as a translation for the Hebrew word mizmôr, which appears fifty-seven times in the psalm titles and refers to a song that is accompanied by *music. The association of psalmos with the biblical book appears relatively early. In Luke 24:44 Jesus speaks of the “Law of Moses, the Prophets and the Psalms [psalmoi]” (NIV), although this probably does not indicate the full collection of psalms as it appears today. Later, in Codex Vaticanus (fourth century AD), the plural psalmoi appears as a title for the entire collection, and roughly a century later, in Codex Alexandrinus, the term psalterion (“Psalter”) stands as the title to the biblical book.

Still, the common Hebrew designation for the collection of psalms is tēhillim, from the verbal root hll, meaning “praise.” In rabbinic literature the book is frequently referred to as Sefer Tehillim (“Book of Praises”). Yet in the earliest Hebrew manuscripts (Codex Aleppo and Codex Leningradensis) no title appears. This is evident in Codex Aleppo. After the closing Masorah in the book of Chronicles, one line has been left vacant, followed by Psalm 1.

1.2. The Attribution to David. Despite the absence of his name in the “title” of the book, *David has long been associated with the book of Psalms and with Israelite psalmody in general. There is little doubt that the frequent appearance of David's name in the psalm titles contributed to such an association. In the Hebrew Psalter there are seventy-three psalms that include the phrase lēdāwīd in the psalm title. Although the precise meaning of the preposition lē remains uncertain, ancient readers of the psalms apparently interpreted it as indicative of David's close association with Israelite psalmody. Within the group of seventy-three psalms that mention David in the title, thirteen have an extended note that not only mentions David but also attempts to locate the psalm within the life of David himself (Pss 3; 7; 18; 34; 51; 52; 54; 56; 57; 59; 60; 63; 142). As B. Childs (1971, 149-50) has suggested, such titles are best understood as midrashic or protomidrashic exegesis, in which later scribes attempted to connect the poetic language of the psalm with the narrative of David's life. For example, in Psalm 51 the psalmist prays, “Wash me thoroughly from my iniquity, and cleanse me from my sin. For I know my transgressions, and my sin is ever before me. Against you, you alone, have I sinned and done what is evil in your sight. . . . Purge me with hyssop, and I shall be clean; wash me, and I shall be whiter than snow” (Ps 51:2-4a, 7 NRSV).

In reflecting on the life of David, the scribes added this superscription to the psalm: “A psalm of David, when the prophet Nathan came to him after he had gone into Bathsheba.” The superscription thus functions to meld poetry with prose, uniting the language of the psalm with the life of King David.

The association of David with psalmody is not without biblical warrant. The books of Samuel recount David's association with music, particularly his skillful playing on the lyre (1 Sam 16:14-23). In 2 Samuel 1 David appears as psalm composer, issuing forth a lament (qînâ) over the fallen Saul and Jonathan, and later, in 2 Samuel 6, he appears as cultic leader, ushering the ark of the covenant into Jerusalem.

Beginning in the postexilic period, however, the relationship between David and the cultic life of Israel received a vigorous reappraisal. In the rehearsing of Israel's history, the book of Chronicles moves beyond the claim that David was a king who was also musically skilled (as indicated in the book of Samuel) and instead presents David as the founder of Israel's cultic life—music, song and occasion. Indicative of the Chronicler's assessment of David as central to Israel's cultic life, the Chronicler records not only that David could make music and musical instruments but also that he made the instruments for four thousand Levites. The Chronicler also records that it was David who gave specific directives related to the appointed festivals.

Later Jewish writers adopted a similar perspective on the relationship between David and psalmody. In Sirach 47 the writer extols, "He sang praise with all his heart, and he loved his Maker. He placed singers before the altar, to make sweet melody with their voices. He gave beauty to the festivals, and arranged their times throughout the year" (Sir 47:8b-10a NRSV).

In the LXX version of the Psalter the compilers associated David with eighty-five psalms (as opposed to the seventy-three in the Hebrew text). Those who composed the *Dead Sea Scrolls may have been the most gratuitous in their comments. David is lauded for his musical productivity and is credited with having composed 3,600 psalms, 446 songs and four additional songs for the sick. Later, David's association with Israelite psalmody extended to the point where David not only was associated with the psalmody but also was credited as the author of the Psalter itself. In the Babylonian Talmud tractate Baba Batra it says, "Moses wrote his own book, the Balaam pericope, and Job. Joshua wrote his own book and eight verses of the Torah [Deut 34:5-12]. Samuel wrote his own book, the book of Judges, and Ruth. David wrote the book of Psalms" (B. Bat. 14b).

Although the titles were not part of the original psalms and thus provide little evidence as to authorship, they do prove invaluable in understanding the history of interpretation. They suggest the continued attempt at locating the poetic voice of psalmody within the storied life of Israel.

1.3. Textual Transmission. The MT Psalter, based upon Codex Leningradensis, differs in varying fashion from two other significant textual traditions, the Greek Psalter and the Dead Sea Psalms scroll.

1.3.1. The Greek Psalter. Although translation of the Hebrew Psalter into Greek presumably began some time after 200 BC, the oldest textual witnesses to the Greek Psalter are Codex Vaticanus, Codex Sinaiticus and Codex Alexandrinus. Codex Vaticanus is a fourth-century AD manuscript that includes the entire Psalter except for Psalms 105:27—137:6. Codex Sinaiticus, also a fourth-century AD manuscript, contains the entire Psalter. Codex Alexandrinus is a fifth-century AD manuscript in which Psalms 49:20—79:11 are absent, but the remainder is intact.

The numbering of the psalms in the Greek Psalter deviates from that in the Hebrew tradition. Some psalms that stand separately in the Hebrew tradition (Pss 9—10; 114—115) appear as a single psalm in the Greek Psalter. The following chart shows the variations in numbering.

MT	LXX
1—8	1—8
9—10	9
11—113	10—112
114—115	113
116:1-9	114
116:10-19	115
117—146	116—145
147:1-11	146
147:12-20	147
148—150	148—150
(none)	151

Each of the Greek traditions mentioned above includes an additional psalm, Psalm 151. The superscription to the psalm reads, "This psalm is ascribed to David as his own composition (though it is outside the number), after he had fought in single combat with Goliath" (NRSV). In this psalm David's abilities on the lyre and the harp are extolled, as well as his victory over the Philistine warrior. The superscription appears to acknowledge the 150 psalms as a fixed or established entity, to which Psalm 151 was added subsequently. The attribution of the psalm to David, coupled with the fact that this psalm appears as the concluding psalm of the Greek collection, suggests the continued close association of David with Israelite psalmody in general and the Psalter in particular.

1.3.2. The Dead Sea Psalms Scroll. Of all the biblical books represented among the Dead Sea Scrolls, the book of Psalms appears most frequently, with at least thirty-nine psalm scrolls or manuscripts having been discovered (thirty-six at Qumran, two at Masada, and one at Nahal Hever). The most significant find was 11QPs^a. Found in 1961, and published later (1965, 1967) by James Sanders, 11QPs^a contains parts of forty-one canonical psalms from book 4 and book 5 of the Psalter, providing the most extensive psalms scroll.

The contents of 11QPs^a have generated much debate concerning the nature of the collection found at Qumran. Although the scroll begins with Psalm 101, it quickly diverges from the traditional ordering of the last one-third of the Psalter as found in the MT. In addition, non-biblical material is present in this portion, including, among others, “Plea for Deliverance,” “Apostrophe to Zion” and “Hymn to the Creator” (for the entirety of the collection, see Flint, 174). The contrast between the two collections led Sanders to propose the “Qumran Psalms Hypothesis.” Perhaps most influential from his hypothesis was the suggestion that whereas Psalms 1—89 appear to have been stabilized earlier, the final section of the Psalter exhibited considerable fluidity. The later work of G. Wilson (1985) and P. Flint have confirmed Sanders’s earlier suggestion concerning the stabilization of the Psalter and also his contention that 11QPs^a was a true Psalter for the Qumran community. Such findings have led to a renewed discussion pertaining to the formation, both date and theological intention, of the MT Psalter.

2. Approaches to the Psalter.

Numerous methodological approaches have been employed in studying the Psalter, at least three of which deserve particular mention because they have been formative in shaping the direction and scope of subsequent work on the text: (1) the form-critical approach; (2) the cult-functional approach; (3) the canonical approach.

2.1. Hermann Gunkel and the Form-Critical Approach. Prior to H. Gunkel (1862-1932), and consonant with historical-critical approaches of that era, scholars such as J. Wellhausen, B. Duhm and A. Rahlfs had attempted to locate individual psalms within specific historical contexts. More particularly, these scholars, and others, ascribed most of the psalms to the Maccabean period (second century BC). Driving such a late date was their aversion to the cultic institutions and rites of ancient Israel, as well as their insistence that the conflict between the enemies and the psalmists probably was indicative of the societal turmoil and class struggle present during this period.

Gunkel, however, moved in a different direction, rejecting attempts at the historical specificity of individual psalms, and instead sought “to bring some kind of order to this material, which takes such diverse forms . . . and is spread out over so many centuries” (Gunkel, 5). To this end, Gunkel analyzed the structure of the psalms, noting also the forms of expression that appeared conventional to different structures. Each psalm could be classified based on its setting in life (Sitz im Leben), its thought and mood, and its literary form (Formensprache). From this analysis, Gunkel sought to categorize all psalms according to their respective types or forms (Gattungen).

Gunkel identified four major types of psalms (see also 3 below): *hymns, community *laments, individual laments and songs of *thanksgiving. Gunkel noted that there are other forms in the Psalter, but these are found in lesser number. They include royal psalms, songs of *Zion, songs of Yahweh’s enthronement, entrance liturgies and wisdom psalms.

Gunkel contended that although Israelite psalmography originated in the preexilic period (contrary to many of his contemporaries) and was transmitted orally, many of the psalms present in the Psalter are “spiritualized” replicas of the earlier “types.” Any mention of cultic matters in the psalms was meant as metaphorical.

2.2. Sigmund Mowinckel and the Cult-Functional Approach. A number of Gunkel’s students adopted and adapted his approach to *form criticism. Foremost among Gunkel’s students was a Scandinavian student, S. Mowinckel (1884-1965). Although Mowinckel was influenced by Gunkel’s work, he was equally influenced by Danish anthropologist V. Gronbeck, whose work focused on the structure and behavior of primitive societies, with particular interest in the function of cult within those societies.

While acknowledging his debt to Gunkel, Mowinckel charted a new course in psalms study. He sought to relate each psalm more directly to the events within the cultic life of the community itself. Whereas Gunkel had maintained that the extant psalm compositions were in fact only replicas of earlier oral traditions, Mowinckel argued that these compositions were originally composed for actual use in the cult. As a result, Mowinckel sought to determine the function of the psalm within the cult itself.

The most influential (and controversial) theory espoused by Mowinckel was the notion of a New Year's festival in ancient Israel meant to celebrate the enthronement of Yahweh as king. Although specific indication of such a festival is absent in the biblical literature, Mowinckel contended that the autumnal festival mentioned in the text (Ex 23; 34; Lev 23) suggests an earlier festival meant to celebrate the enthronement of Yahweh. In an effort to reconstruct such a festival, Mowinckel was forced to draw on the yearly Mesopotamian Akitu festival. He surmised that Psalms 93–99, which celebrate the kingship of Yahweh, would have been central to the liturgy of the festival. In addition, and similar to the Akitu festival, Mowinckel argued that the Israelite king was meant to play the role of Yahweh in the festival. Modified forms of Mowinckel's thesis appear later in the works of Artur Weiser (a "covenant renewal" ceremony) and Hans-Joachim Kraus (a "Royal Zion festival"). Such theories, though intriguing, have failed to sway contemporary scholarship.

2.3. The Canonical Approach. Since the 1980s the focus in Psalms scholarship has shifted away from the reading and interpretation of individual psalms as with the methodologies proposed by Gunkel and Mowinckel. Beginning with B. Childs's Introduction to the Old Testament as Scripture (1979), the question of the canonical shape of the Psalter has received significant attention, opening up another methodology for exploring the world of the text. Questions related to both the shape of the Psalter and the processes behind that shaping have moved to the fore.

G. Wilson, a student of Childs, explored the various editorial techniques employed in the collecting of the psalms. Wilson (1985, 199) concluded that such was "the result of a purposeful, editorial activity which sought to impart a meaningful arrangement which encompassed the whole" (see Editorial Criticism). Among the many contributions of Wilson (and others) was the insistence on recognizing that several units appear to have been edited together in the final collection of the Psalter, and further, the insistence on taking the position of those units seriously in interpreting the text. Thus, the Psalter could be understood as a "book" with the following components:

Introduction	Psalms 1–2
Book 1	Psalms 3–41
Book 2	Psalms 42–72
Book 3	Psalms 73–89
Book 4	Psalms 90–106
Book 5	Psalms 107–145
Conclusion	Psalms 146–150

Such a reading of the Psalter led Wilson to conclude that the book divisions of the Psalter were real, editorially induced structures. Furthermore, Wilson noted that the shaping of the Psalter appears most evident at the "seams" of the various books, where royal psalms appear to have been strategically positioned. Finally, such an approach argues that the introductory and concluding psalms are critical to reading the remainder of the Psalter (see 5 below).

3. Genre.

In his form-critical approach Gunkel identified various types, or genres, of psalms. Although the poetic nature of the texts themselves allows for much fluidity and flexibility within each genre, there are identifying features of each form worth noting. Some types, or genres, are easily identifiable because they share common literary conventions. Other psalms are associated by type predicated upon the subject matter of the psalm itself. Because many of the psalm types overlap in language and imagery, the precise categorizations of psalms according to types tend to deviate from each other.

3.1. Individual Lament. The most frequent type of psalm is the individual *lament, with nearly one-third of the psalms falling into this category. The structure of the lament psalm generally follows this pattern: (1) opening address, often in the form of a vocative ("My God"); (2) description of the distress or crisis; (3) plea for help (from God), often followed by reason for God to hear or act; (4) profession of trust; (5) promise to praise God or to offer a sacrifice. Although the precise order of these components may vary somewhat from psalm to psalm, most laments will contain all five elements.

3.1.1. The Prayers of the Accused. There is a large subgroup of lament psalms often called “The Prayers of the Accused” (Pss 3; 4; 5; 7; 11; 17; 25–27; 31; 35; 41–42/43; 52; 54–59; 77; 86; 94; 102; 109; 139–140; 142). False allegations have been levied against the psalmist, and in return the psalmist pleads for vindication from these unjust accusations: “Vindicate me, O God, and defend my cause against an ungodly people; from those who are deceitful and unjust deliver me!” (Ps 43:1 NRSV).

Earlier interpreters (H. Schmidt, W. Beyerlin, L. Delekat) suggested that these psalms had their origins in a sacral trial that took place within the temple court—a type of asylum. There the psalmist would issue forth his complaint and await a judgment from God concerning the lament. Although more recent scholars retain some sense of an “asylum ritual” (K. Seybold) in the psalms or at least acknowledge some type of “divine jurisdiction” (H.-J. Kraus) in the psalms, others have questioned such reconstructions and, moreover, whether there is adequate evidence to suggest such a ritual (Day, 29).

3.1.2. The Psalms of Illness. Another significant subgroup of the lament psalms contains language pertaining to the illness of the psalmist (Pss 6; 13; 38; 39; 69; 88; 102). In these psalms the psalmist prays for healing (Ps 6:2) from illness, often lamenting about his physical condition (Ps 102:3). E. Gerstenberger (1988, 62) has proposed that these psalms may have been used by local “ritual experts” who prepared a service for the ailing person in which the individual offered a sacrifice and then recited the psalm from the sickbed.

A dominant image in these psalms is that of Sheol (see Afterlife). Whether speaking of Sheol specifically (Ps 88:3) or using more metaphorical language such as the “pit” (Ps 69:15) or “deep waters” (Ps 69:2), the psalmist’s frequent use of such images suggests an understanding of illness as an intrusion of Sheol into this life.

3.2. Communal Lament. The communal laments were psalms uttered during times of national crisis (Pss 12; 44; 60; 74; 79; 80; 83; 85; 89; 94:1–11; 126; 137). The Sitz im Leben for such psalms probably was some type of special festival set aside for lamentation. A possible example of such an occasion is found in Judith 4:9–15. A central feature of the communal lament is the rehearsal of the history between God and his people, often citing God’s mighty deeds performed on the behalf of his people as motivation for God to “arouse” from his sleep and deliver his people. Although not every circumstance surrounding these psalms can be identified (Ps 44), the destruction of the temple in 587 BC appears to have been the subject matter of a number of communal laments (Pss 74; 79; 137). For example, in Psalm 74, the community laments, “And then, with hatchets and hammers, they smashed all its carved work. They set your sanctuary on fire; they desecrated the dwelling place of you your name” (Ps 74:6–7 NRSV).

As J. C. McCann (647) has suggested, although not all of the communal laments may have been written in response to the events of 587 BC, it seems likely that all of them were “eventually read and heard in view of this crisis.”

3.3. Hymn. *Hymns, sometimes referred to as songs of praise, make up over one-fifth of the Psalter (Pss 8; 19A; 29; 33; 46–48; 65; 66A; 68; 76; 84; 87; 93; 95–100; 103–104; 111; 113–114; 117; 122; 134–136; 145–150). Their format is rather simple, having only three elements: (1) opening invitation to praise; (2) rationale for praise, often introduced by the Hebrew particle meaning “for” (kî); (3) renewed call to praise.

The shortest psalm, Psalm 117, is a song of praise and provides a helpful example of this form: “Praise the LORD all you nations! Extol him, all you peoples! For [kî] great is his steadfast love toward us, and the faithfulness of the LORD endures forever. Praise the LORD!” (Ps 117 NRSV).

Although the command “Praise the LORD” frequently stands at the beginning of such psalms (see Pss 146–150), other introductory words may appear as well, including “Bless the LORD” (Ps 134), “Shout to the LORD” (Ps 100) and “Rejoice in the LORD” (Ps 33).

The hymns often are grouped together and are found more readily in the second half of the Psalter, whereas the lament psalms appear to dominate the first half. Therefore, one could say that the Psalter moves from lament to praise, reaching a crescendo of praise in Psalms 146—

150. This might explain, in part, why the rabbis and later Jewish writers tended to refer to the Psalter as the Sefer Tehillim (“Book of Praises”).

There are some subgroups to this type that appear throughout the Psalter, each with a distinctive focus: psalms to the Creator, Zion psalms and enthronement psalms.

3.3.1. Psalms to the Creator. There are at least five psalms that invoke *creation imagery: Psalms 8; 19A; 33; 104; 136. Although these psalms refer to elements of nature, they are not “psalms of creation.” Instead, and perhaps more precisely, these psalms invoke images of creation with the goal of praising the Creator. Thus, the psalmist proclaims, “By the word of the LORD the heavens were made, and all their host by the breath of his mouth” (Ps 33:6 NRSV).

Perhaps the most thorough praise to the Creator occurs in Psalm 104. There the psalmist extols God, praising him for stretching out the heavens as a tent (Ps 104:2), setting up the foundations of the earth (Ps 104:5), and filling the creation with water, grass and animals, and even Leviathan (Ps 104:26).

Some of the creation imagery employed in these psalms reflects the larger ancient Near Eastern context in which the psalmist lived. For example, Psalm 104:19-24 appears to resemble, in some form, a hymn to the sun-disc (Aten) by Pharaoh Akhenaten. Although the exact nature of the dependence remains a matter of dispute, the psalmist does appear to have employed “stock phrases” from Egyptian poetry (Kraus 1993, 302). Similarly, Psalm 29 characterizes God as a storm-god, drawing from images typically associated with Baal and Canaanite poetry (Day, 42-43; Wilson 2002, 509-10). In both cases it would be a gross oversimplification to assert that the psalmist merely inserted the name of Yahweh where the previous god’s name appeared. More likely, the psalmist’s use of stock images from other ancient Near Eastern cultures suggests a high level of poetic sophistication, manifested in the ability to draw from a larger “bank” of images while also articulating with specificity the psalmist’s own tradition.

3.3.2. Zion Psalms. Reference to *Zion and the temple appears throughout the Psalter. Six psalms, however, appear to focus on Zion in particular: Psalms 46; 48; 76; 84; 87; 122. Within these psalms the psalmist also makes use of traditions associated with Zion theology. Yet it is not the city itself that is the object of praise but rather the presence of God (see Divine Presence). In Psalm 46 the psalmist proclaims, “There is a river whose streams make glad the city of God, the holy habitation of the Most High. God is in the midst of the city; it shall not be moved” (Ps 46:4-5 NRSV). In some ways, Zion serves as a cipher for the active and protective presence of God among his people. It is this presence that demands the celebration and praise of the psalmist.

A frequent theme in several Zion psalms is the inviolability of Zion (cf. Pss 46; 48; 76). The nations appear set to destroy Zion, yet the psalmist confidently asserts that “within its citadels, God has shown himself a sure defense” (Ps 48:3 NRSV), able to destroy the weapons of war (Ps 46:9; 76:3). These psalms also suggest that despite the uproar of nations and the challenge of foreign kings, Zion is a city that will not be moved (Ps 46:5), for it is the city of the Great King (Ps 48:2). These psalms seek to rebuff the apparent threats from other nations by suggesting that the presence of the city of God guarantees the work of God on their behalf (Ps 46:6-7; 76:5-6). As McCann (668) has noted, while these psalms celebrate the reign of the Great King, they also acknowledge that this reign is “constantly and pervasively opposed.” Although the language regarding Zion appears extravagant at times—even calling it the center of the earth (Ps 48:2)—such psalms should be understood as bold statements of trust that dare to counter the claims of the larger and more powerful enemies that surrounded it.

3.3.3. Enthronement (or “Yahweh Reigns”) Psalms. There are six hymns referred to as enthronement psalms (or “Yahweh reigns” psalms, from Heb yhwh mālāk). As previously indicated (see 2.2 above), these psalms were central to Mowinckel’s thesis regarding an autumnal festival that presumably celebrated the coronation of Yahweh as king. Mowinckel suggested that the phrase yhwh mālāk would have been understood to mean “the LORD has become king,” reflecting the people’s enthronement of Yahweh as king for another year. Others have asserted that the phrase is more durative in sense, and thus would be rendered “Yahweh is king” (Kraus 1988, 86-89). The particular points arguing for or against a Sitz im Leben associated with an autumnal festival need not be rehearsed here (see Day, 67-87).

The chief theme, in any case, is the declaration of the reign of God. In these psalms the reign of God is frequently coupled with other central theological themes found throughout the OT. For example, in Psalm 93 the psalmist alludes to Yahweh's role as Creator, and in so doing, reinforces Yahweh's rightful position as king (Ps 93:1-2). His victory over the floods confirms his capacity as cosmic king to hold *chaos at bay and retain order (Ps 93:3-4). Twice (Ps 93:1; 96:10) Yahweh is praised for having established the world and ensuring that it will not be moved.

Another frequently invoked theme in the enthronement psalms is that of the nations. Yahweh subdues the nations (Ps 47:3), and it is through his victory over the nations that he has demonstrated his rule (Ps 98:1-2). Yet the nations are also said to be the location where the reign of God is to be proclaimed. The psalmist exhorts, "Declare his glory among the nations, his marvelous works among all the peoples" (Ps 96:3 NRSV).

In Psalm 97 the recognition of Yahweh as king will extend to all the coastlands, calling "all peoples to behold his glory" (Ps 97:6). Because of the reign of Yahweh, those who worship idols will be put to shame (see Honor and Shame), and ultimately they will recognize that Yahweh stands as king above all other gods (Ps 97:9).

3.4. Psalms of Thanksgiving. In the psalms of *thanksgiving the psalmist offers thanks to Yahweh for deliverance from some form of distress. Often the psalm of thanksgiving is understood as a complement to the individual lament. Many individual laments conclude with a vow by the psalmist that if he is delivered from his distress, he will offer praise and sacrifice to Yahweh. The psalm of thanksgiving, on the other hand, presupposes that such distress has been remedied, thus leading the psalmist to fulfill some vow or sacrifice of thanksgiving. Strikingly, though, psalms of thanksgiving occur with much less frequency than the laments. Although a few scholars, most notably C. Westermann, have argued that there are no individual psalms of thanksgiving, the majority conclude that the following psalms fall within this type: Psalms 18; 30; 32; 40A; 52; 66B; 92; 116; 118; 138. Only one communal psalm of thanksgiving is readily identifiable: Psalm 124. To this psalm Gunkel added Psalms 66B; 67; 129, although his assignments have not met with universal agreement.

The structure of the psalms of thanksgiving exhibits considerable variation. In principle, however, there are three major sections to the psalm: (1) introduction, in which the psalmist states his desire to offer thanks to Yahweh; (2) narrative body, in which the psalmist recounts his distress and cry to Yahweh for deliverance, with the final section noting how Yahweh delivered the psalmist; (3) conclusion. Of the three sections, the conclusion exhibits the greatest variation, perhaps raising the question as to its usefulness in defining the type itself.

The psalms of thanksgiving apparently arose from various circumstances. The psalmist gives thanks for being delivered from illness (Pss 30; 41). In other psalms the psalmist rejoices in his victory over enemies (Pss 52; 92). And in others the psalmist gives thanks for forgiveness (Ps 32). In several psalms the psalmist expresses his desire to give "testimony" of his deliverance. In Psalm 116 the psalmist extols, "I will pay my vows to the LORD in the presence of all his people, in the courts of the house of the LORD, in your midst, O Jerusalem" (Ps 116:18-19 NRSV). The desire to give testimony of deliverance suggests that these psalms may have had their original Sitz im Leben in the cult and, more specifically, within the great worship festivals of ancient Israel (Kraus 1988; Seybold).

3.5. Royal Psalms. The psalms within this group are unified more around a particular theme than formal literary features. Although the psalms represent a variety of literary forms, they are characterized by their explicit reference to the king (see Kingship Psalms). Gunkel initially identified a modest number of psalms that fell within this type: Psalms 2; 18; 20; 21; 45; 72; 89; 101; 110; 132; 144:1-11. These psalms appear to refer to particular incidents within the life of a king. Psalm 2 and Psalm 110 are coronation psalms, invoking language of investiture ("You are my son; today I have begotten you" [Ps 2:7b]). Psalm 45 was composed probably for the wedding of a king, and several psalms are related to events associated with battle (Ps 18; 20; 144:1-11).

Subsequent to the work of Gunkel, the number of royal psalms was expanded, particularly by Scandinavian and British scholars, with some suggesting as many as forty psalms to be assigned to this type (S. Croft; J. Eaton). The heavy emphasis on the role of the king within the cult of ancient Israel has led many of the same scholars to postulate that within the autumnal festival the king played an important role. The theory suggests that the king undergoes a ritual of humiliation. In this cultic event the king symbolically suffers defeat at the hands of the enemies but is vindicated by the deliverance of Yahweh. Although proponents of this and similar theories have tried to base their reconstruction on several royal psalms (Pss 2; 18; 89; 101; 110; 118), they have failed to persuade the majority of scholars. The lack of explicit reference to such a ritual, both within the psalms and in the historical narratives, has resulted in skepticism toward its existence.

3.6. Wisdom and Torah Psalms. Beginning with Gunkel, scholars have suggested that there is “wisdom poetry” within the Psalter. As evidence, Gunkel noted that the psalmist frequently referred to his speech as “wisdom” (Ps 37:30; 49:3), “instruction” (tôrâ [Ps 78:1; 94:12]), “riddle” (Ps 49:4; 78:2) and often spoke of the “fear of Yahweh” (see Fear of the Lord). As with the royal psalms, the wisdom psalms do not exhibit a strict literary form; instead, they are identified based on thematic and linguistic usage. Among those frequently identified as wisdom psalms are Psalms 1; 37; 49; 73; 112; 128. Although the precise number of wisdom psalms differs, depending on the interpreter, most acknowledge the existence of such a classification.

In recent years, however, some scholars (most notably J. Crenshaw) have vigorously questioned the category “wisdom psalms.” Given the paucity of information regarding the life and work of the *sages in ancient Israel, it is only speculation that they participated in “learned psalmography” (contra Mowinckel). J. Crenshaw (94) has suggested that the most we should affirm is that “some psalms resemble wisdom literature in stressing the importance of learning, struggling to ascertain life’s meaning, and employing proverbial lore.” Rather than limiting the language of “wisdom” only to the sages, Crenshaw suggests that such language and ideas would have been of concern to all “thoughtful people.”

The Torah psalms, which are frequently listed as a subset of the wisdom psalms, receive such a designation, of course, because of their heavy emphasis on the tôrâ of Yahweh. There are only three such psalms in the Psalter: Psalms 1; 19; 119. Psalm 119 is the Torah psalm par excellence. Ten different terms are employed in reference to the tôrâ of Yahweh, and they appear throughout the 176-verse *acrostic poem. Psalm 1 stands at the beginning of the Psalter (see 5.1 below) and contrasts the way of the righteous with the way of the wicked. The tôrâ of Yahweh functions as the fundamental guide that leads one into the way of the righteous.

3.7. Entrance Liturgies. Within the Psalter there are at least two psalms that fall within this category, Psalm 15 and Psalm 24, while others, such as Psalms 92; 100; 118, have similar characteristics. The structures of Psalm 15 and Psalms 24 are nearly identical. The psalm opens with a question concerning who may enter the temple, followed by an answer (from a priest?) stipulating the particular requirements for entrance. The psalm concludes with a blessing or an affirmation of those qualified to enter the temple. Gerstenberger (1988) has suggested that while such psalms may have been intended originally to designate who could enter the temple, later use of the psalm probably was meant to reflect “nonsacrificial, ‘ethical,’ worship of early Jewish communities.” In this sense, these psalms possess a catechetical function, as suggested by Galling and Seybold.

4. Hebrew Poetry.

Reading Hebrew poetry demands that the interpreter pay as much attention to the literary and aesthetic nature of the text as to the semantic range of individual words. The defining features of Hebrew poetry include *parallelism and *terse (Berlin) or compressed (Wilson 2002) speech. Parallelism and the various poetic devices that contribute to the meaning of the overall work deserve careful consideration by those reading such material.

*Meter (i.e., iambic pentameter) is another element frequently found in poetic texts of differing cultures. A number of proposals related to the meter of Hebrew poetry have been offered, but none appear to have gained consensus, leading some scholars (Kugel; Berlin) to argue that there is no meter in Hebrew poetry.

4.1. Parallelism. Although not the first to note the parallel structure of Hebrew poetry, R. Lowth, in 1753, articulated a view of parallelism that has remained central to the study of poetry for nearly two centuries. In his view, parallelism can be defined as the correspondence of one line with a subsequent line. For example,

For he spoke, and it came to be;
he commanded, and it stood firm.
(Ps 33:9 NRSV)

The difficulty comes, however, in attempting to understand the relationship between the lines. Due to the various relationships that can be expressed between the two lines, Lowth forwarded the notion that parallelism could be found in one of three basic forms: synonymous, antithetic and synthetic (or constructive). Although Lowth's tripartite division of parallelism has been challenged by more recent studies of Hebrew poetry, it has remained central to any discussion of Hebrew poetry. As a result, brief examples of the three types of parallelism identified by Lowth are provided here, followed by a brief treatment of more contemporary approaches.

4.1.1. Synonymous Parallelism. In synonymous parallelism the second line, or line B, repeats the sentiment of line A. Although repetition of specific terms may not occur, Lowth observed the presence of equivalent terms. For example, in Psalm 59 the psalmist prays,

Deliver me from my enemies, O my God; protect me from those who rise up against me.
Deliver me from those who work evil;
from the bloodthirsty save me.
(Ps 59:1-2 NRSV)

In each line an imperative requesting divine assistance appears, with the repetition of the same verb twice. In addition, the "enemies" are described in varying terms but referring to the same entity, and in each case the object of the verb is the first-person singular pronoun ("me"). Such repetition heightens the intensity of the request and of the psalm in general, causing the reader to ponder the plight of the psalmist not once, but repeatedly.

4.1.2. Antithetic Parallelism. In this form of parallelism line B stands in contrast to line A. As Lowth noted, not only are sentiments contrasted, but also even specific words stand in stark contrast. In Psalm 1 the psalmist provides a comparison of the righteous and the wicked:

For the LORD watches over the way of the righteous,

but the way of the wicked will perish.
(Ps 1:6 NRSV)

The contrast presented in such parallel lines provides the reader instruction concerning the fate of those who choose wrongly. Rather than simply stating that one should choose the way of the righteous, such a construction affords the reader the rationale concerning that choice.

4.1.3. Synthetic or Advancing Parallelism. Lowth suggested a third category of parallelism, which he termed "synthetic parallelism." More recently, Wilson (2002, 43) has noted the inadequacy of that term and suggested that this form of parallelism is better represented by the term "advancing parallelism." What makes the category distinct from synonymous or antithetic parallelism is that line B does not exhibit similarities with line A in regard to syntax, structure or semantics. Line B advances the theme presented in line A. For example, in Psalm 53 the psalmist says,

Fools say in their hearts, "There is no God,"
They are corrupt, they commit abominable acts;
there is no one who does good.
(Ps 53:1 NRSV)

Although all three lines share a similar theme, that of the "fool," they lack the type of formal parallel structure seen in synonymous and antithetic parallelism. Line A indicates what the fool says, line B indicates what the fool does, and line C offers a summative evaluation. As Wilson (2002, 45) suggests, advancing parallelism offers the psalmist "maximum flexibility in creating lines that develop, direct, and advance" the movement of the psalm.

4.1.4. Additional Forms of Parallelism. Most work on the Psalms in the twentieth century adopted Lowth's tripartite categorization of parallelism, offering occasional modification, particularly to the third type. In an effort to clarify, additional forms of parallelism have been suggested (see Watson, 114-59). A number of lines exhibit what is often referred to as "staircase parallelism." In such a pattern elements from line A are repeated in line B with additional comments added to complete the thought. Such a feature is exhibited in Psalm 9:

The LORD is a stronghold for the oppressed,
a stronghold in times of trouble. (Ps 9:9 NRSV)

Due to the large number of metaphors present in Hebrew poetry, and especially in the Psalter, a number of scholars have noted what they call “emblematic parallelism.” A simile or a metaphor appears in one line and is meant to stand in relationship to an element in the other line. A familiar example comes from Psalm 42:

As a deer longs for flowing streams, so my soul longs for you, O God.
(Ps 42:1 NRSV)

Additional types, such as incomplete parallelism, Janus parallelism, climactic parallelism, advancing parallelism and metathetic parallelism, have been noted (Wilson 2002, 39-48).

4.1.5. Post-Lowthian Studies in Parallelism. Recent studies in Hebrew poetry have attempted to move beyond Lowth’s initial thesis, challenging the prevailing notion of parallelism. Many have lamented that Lowth’s tripartite division is too limiting and actually forces the text into preconceived categories rather than recognizing the diverse nature of parallelism within Hebrew poetry. Drawing from modern linguistic studies, research on parallelism has expanded, offering new categories for understanding the phenomenon of parallelism: semantic aspect, grammatical aspect, lexical aspect and phonological aspect.

4.1.5.1. Semantic Aspect. The semantic aspect refers to the relationship in meaning between the two lines and best represents Lowth’s form of categorization. The 1981 work of J. Kugel, however, offered one of the first sustained challenges to Lowth’s view of parallelism, particularly as it related to the semantic aspect of parallelism. Kugel observed that the majority of parallelism present in the Hebrew poetry is neither synonymous (as presupposed by Lowth) nor antithetical. To the contrary, Kugel (57) avers that “all parallelism is really ‘synthetic,’” which prompted him to reassess the manner in which one spoke of the relationship between lines. From this, Kugel developed his well-known formula: “A is so, and what’s more, B is so.” Thus, in a typical verse line B has what Kugel calls a “seconding” or “afterwardness” function. Yet this is much more than the Lowthian idea of synonymous or antithetical restatement. As Kugel (52) explains, “B typically supports A, carries it further, backs it up, completes it, goes beyond it.” In short, line B is connected with line A to construct a single, complex statement.

The following verse appears to reflect Kugel’s observations:

But I call upon God,
And the LORD will save me. (Ps 55:16 NRSV)

In this verse line B is not synonymous with line A, nor is it antithetical; rather, it appears to “complete” the thought from line A, even going beyond it.

Similarly, R. Alter has attempted to delineate the features of parallelism. Alter prefers to speak of line B having a focusing or intensifying function within the parallel structure. Although the explanations of semantic parallelism by Kugel and Alter appear similar, the two scholars should not be thought of as identical in approach to Hebrew poetry. Alter suggests that there are specific literary indicators within a text that suggest that it is poetic. Kugel, however, believes that while there is both prose and poetry in the Hebrew Bible, much of the prose can be understood as poetic. Hence for Kugel even poetic prose should be read in light of his thesis “A is so, and what’s more, B is so.” Alter, a literary critic, however, prefers to limit his analysis only to those texts that exhibit indicators of poetry.

4.1.5.2. Grammatical Aspect. The grammatical aspect of parallelism considers the syntax of poetic lines and the equivalent nature of that syntax. Generally, Hebrew poetry exhibits what can be called “grammatical equivalence: the second line substitutes something grammatically different, but equivalent, for a grammatical feature in the first line” (Berlin, 32). For example,

God has taken his place in the divine council;
in the midst of the gods he holds judgment.
(Ps 82:1 NRSV)

In line B the pronoun “he” is parallel to the noun “God” in line A. Although parallel terms may come from different word classes (noun // pronoun; noun // relative clause; substantive [noun, adjective, participle] // verb), the syntax of the line remains equivalent.

A number of parallel lines are crafted so that semantically parallel terms serve a different syntactic function in their respective lines. The psalmist states,

I will observe your statutes;

do not utterly forsake me. (Ps 119:8 NRSV)

The first-person pronoun is used in both lines, which thus are semantically parallel, but in line A the pronoun is the subject, whereas in line B it is the direct object of the verb. Consideration of the grammatical aspect suggests that parallelism involves not only the meaning of the entire line but also the relationship between the individual grammatical components.

4.1.5.3. Lexical Aspect. The lexical aspect of parallelism relates to the pairing of terms in parallel lines. Considerable work has been done in identifying word pairs (both in Hebrew and Ugaritic poetry) that appear in parallel lines. Certain sets of terms appear regularly such as “day/night” and “heaven/earth.” When words from the same class are paired together, it is known as “paradigmatic pairing.” The most common form of paradigmatic pairing suggests contrast, resulting in oppositional terms (“righteous/wicked”; “good/bad”; “woman/man”).

Another form of pairing is known as syntagmatic pairing. A frequent type of syntagmatic pairing is known as conventionalized coordinates. Often two terms will appear in parallel lines forming a hendiadys (“loyalty/truth”) or a *merism (“heavens/earth”). An example of a merism appears in Psalm 8:

How majestic is your name in all the earth!
You have set your glory above the heavens.
(Ps 8:1 NRSV)

The individual terms are not employed separately to indicate location; rather, they appear together in an effort to generate a meaning that exceeds their individual usage. In the case of Psalm 8, the psalmist announces that all of creation is filled with the majesty and glory of God.

4.1.5.4. The Phonological Aspect. The phonological aspect refers to the presence of sound pairs within parallel lines. Sound pairs are identified as “word or lines of the same or similar consonants in any order within close proximity” (Berlin, 104). In addition to grammatical and semantic equivalence, Psalm 122:7 exhibits phonological equivalence:

Let there be peace [slwm] within your walls, security [slwh] in your towers. (Ps 122:7)

There are a large number of other instances where the sound pair is not lexically equivalent (as in Ps 122:7), yet the similarity of the consonants serves to suggest that the “equivalence of sound signifies equivalence of sense” (Berlin, 112).

4.2. Poetic Devices. In addition to parallelism, the psalms employ a number of stylistic and literary devices. Not only do these devices exhibit the technical nature of Hebrew poetry in general, but also they reinforce the notion that, as with most all poetry, meaning and aesthetics are inseparable. Unfortunately, some of these devices are lost in the translation process (i.e., assonance, alliteration, onomatopoeia, paronomasia). Although these are treated in depth elsewhere in the present volume, a brief explanation of selected poetic devices is given here.

4.2.1. Chiasm. *Chiasm is related to parallelism in that it involves the relationship between two lines. The second line reverses the order of the sentence elements presented in the first line. In Psalm 63 the psalmist states

My soul clings to you;
your right hand upholds me. (Ps 63:8 NRSV)

Although the wording is altered slightly in the second line, the repetition is evident, yielding the following pattern (characteristic of chiasm in general):

A	B	C
C'	B'	A'

Chiasm may be found in larger textual units (Ps 36:6-7; 72:1-2; 101:3-7) as well as in entire psalms (Ps 86).

4.2.2. Inclusio. *Inclusio is the repetition of lines or phrases at the beginning and end of a composition, thus forming a type of literary envelope. For example, Psalm 8 opens and concludes with the line “O LORD, our Sovereign, how majestic is your name in all the earth” (Ps 8:1, 9 NRSV). Frequently, the framing statements identify an important theological concept related to the meaning of the entire psalm. Psalm 118 opens and concludes with the line “O give thanks to the LORD, for he is good; his steadfast love endures forever” (Ps 118:1, 29 NRSV). The remainder of the psalm offers a song of thanksgiving for deliverance from enemies, reinforcing the nature of Yahweh’s steadfast love.

4.2.3. Simile. A simile is a figurative device meant to compare a topic with an image. Markers such as “like” or “as” appear in such language to indicate the nonliteral nature of the expression. In speaking of the king, the psalmist writes, “May he be like rain that falls on the mown grass, like showers that water the earth” (Ps 72:6 NRSV).

4.2.4. Metaphor. Metaphors are another example of figurative language meant to offer a comparison. Unlike a simile, however, there are no markers present to indicate a comparison. Instead, the topic is immediately associated with the image, drawing a more forceful comparison between the two. Metaphors are invoked repeatedly in the psalmist’s language about God. Since God is sui generis, the psalmist must resort to metaphorical language (“rock,” “refuge,” “fortress,” “king”) in characterizing God. Unlike the simile, however, the basis of the comparison is left unstated, forcing the interpreter to consider the ramifications of the implied connection.

4.2.5. Metonymy. Metonymy is a figure of speech in which the name or designation of one thing is substituted for that of another object that is closely associated. There is no intended comparison between the two terms; it is simply a case of lexical substitution. In Psalm 73:9 the psalmist announces, “They set their mouths against heaven.” In this verse “mouths” has been inserted, or substituted, for “words.”

4.2.6. Synecdoche. Synecdoche is another type of figurative substitution. In this figure of speech the whole is represented by a part (or vice versa), or a particular is used to refer to the whole (or vice versa). In Psalm 93:2 the psalmist says that Yahweh’s “throne is established from of old.” The psalmist is not speaking of a literal throne but rather has employed the word “throne” in reference to the dominion and rule of Yahweh as king.

4.2.7. Apostrophe. An apostrophe is a figure of speech in which the psalmist speaks directly to an absent person(s) or thing(s) as though actually present. Frequently in the psalms the psalmist will speak to kings or even foreign nations, often employing apostrophe. For example, in Psalm 137 the psalmist speaks directly to Babylon: “O daughter Babylon, you devastator! Happy shall they be who pay you back what you have done to us!” (Ps 137:8 NRSV). Typically, the use of an apostrophe involves some form of direct address (note the use of “you” throughout) marked by a vocative (“O daughter Babylon”).

5. The Psalter as a Book.

Following recent trends in biblical studies, psalms study has considered the final shape of the Psalter. Although the book of Psalms does represent 150 discrete units, scholarship has moved to consider how, and in what ways, these units function together. Focus has shifted from the individual psalms to larger units and even the entire Psalter itself. Psalms 1–2 have been recognized as providing the introduction to the collection, while Psalms 146–150 offer a concluding run of psalms. Book 4 (Pss 90–106) has been recognized as the editorial center of the Psalter, and as such it provides a central theme to the reading of the entire corpus.

5.1. Psalms 1–2 as Introduction. The connections between the two introductory psalms have been well-rehearsed in a number of studies: neither psalm has a title; the two psalms are framed by an inclusio using the word ʾāšrê (“happy” [Ps 1:1; 2:12]); both psalms include hāgā in their opening lines (Ps 1:2: “meditate”; Ps 2:1: “plot”); the wicked mentioned in Psalm 1 are juxtaposed with the unruly nations and leaders in Psalm 2. Although some have suggested that Psalm 1 and Psalm 2 were added to the Psalter at roughly the same time (deClaisé-Walford, 41), others have contended that Psalm 2 was part of a larger collection (most likely Pss 2–89), and that Psalm 1 may have been added at a later, redactional stage (Rösel, 95; Zenger, 41). Rather than attempting to weigh the merits of either position here, we will focus on the function of the two psalms as an introduction to the Psalter.

The opening psalm, reminiscent of the wisdom tradition, presents the reader with two fundamentally different options for life. Although the psalm opens with reference to the “happy” or “blessed” person, the identity of that individual is established based on a comparison with the “wicked,” “sinners” and “scoffers.” Unlike these, however, the righteous individual delights in the “law [tôrâ] of the LORD” and will be rooted by “streams of water.” And unlike the wicked, whose path will perish (Ps 1:6), the righteous will prosper in all that they do, and the Lord will watch over their way (Ps 1:3, 6). Thus the opening psalm presents two ways of life, but the way of the righteous is one predicated upon tôrâ obedience. In this instance tôrâ probably is meant not only in its narrower sense (i.e., the *law) but also in its broader sense, meaning “instruction.” Psalm 1, then, exhorts the readers to root their lives in the law of the Lord while also recognizing the instructive nature of the Psalter as Scripture (Childs 1979, 513-14).

The second psalm, no doubt, reflects a coronation ceremony during the preexilic period, yet its position at the beginning of the Psalter raises questions as to its function in the corpus. Wilson (2002, 114) has suggested that this psalm possesses at least three levels of meaning: (1) its original use for ideological authorization of the Davidic kings; (2) its later reuse in an early collection of the Psalter (Pss 2—89); (3) its use with Psalm 1 as an introduction. It is the last level of meaning that is of interest here.

The royal psalms (particularly Ps 2) appear to have been reinterpreted by subsequent generations, especially following the exile (see Starbuck, 205-12). As Childs (1979, 516) has observed, and others after him have confirmed, the location of Psalm 2 appears to emphasize “the kingship of God as a major theme of the whole Psalter.” The notion of a human king was appropriated in messianic fashion, leaving room for the possibility of a new king or a new understanding of kingship (Tucker). Until then, however, the community is called to assert that the true King, Yahweh, reigns. As McCann (665) has concluded, “The perspective of the Psalter from the beginning is eschatological—that is, God’s reign is proclaimed as a present reality, but it is always experienced by the faithful amid opposition.”

Together, Psalm 1 and Psalm 2 call the reader to heed the instruction of Yahweh and acknowledge that despite circumstances that appear to the contrary, the Lord reigns. The remaining psalms serve as variations on these themes, highlighting the instruction of Yahweh and wrestling with the notion of the reign of Yahweh.

5.2. Book 4 as Editorial Center. If Psalms 1—2 provide an editorial introduction to the Psalter, Psalms 90—106 may stand as the editorial center of the entire corpus. Wilson (2002, 123-24) has noted that the royal psalms in the first half of the Psalter (Pss 1—89) appear to rehearse the story of the Davidic monarchy. Psalm 2 celebrates the covenant between Yahweh and the human king. Psalm 72, a prayer for the king, represents the passing of kingship to subsequent generations, and Psalm 89 laments Yahweh’s apparent rejection of the Davidic covenant and the subsequent destruction of the nation.

Psalms 90—106 reorient the theological message of the Psalter. The first of the group, Psalm 90, lists Moses in the superscription. Although probably not a psalm of Moses, the mention of Moses returns the reader to a time in Israel’s history when the nation was led by only one king, Yahweh. This theme is reinforced with the appearance of the enthronement psalms in the middle of this collection. Of the seventeen psalms in this collection, six are enthronement psalms (Pss 93; 95—99), celebrating the kingship of Yahweh. The final two psalms are historical psalms, recounting the faithfulness of Yahweh in the deliverance of his people out of Egypt and into the promised land. These psalms are meant to counter the crisis of exile, reasserting belief in the reign of Yahweh, even with the apparent absence of a human king.

5.3. Psalms 146—150 as Conclusion to the Psalter. The final five psalms in the Psalter provide an emphatic conclusion to the entire work. Overall, the five psalms offer a sustained call to “praise the LORD.” Each of the five psalms contains an inclusion, opening and closing with hallelû-yâ (“praise the LORD”). This sustained call to praise God reaches a crescendo in Psalm 150. In this psalm the call to praise Yahweh appears twelve times throughout the psalm, followed by one last hallelû-yâ in Psalm 150:6, operating as a concluding imperative for the entire Psalter. Thus, whereas the earlier psalms (particularly Pss 3—89) were filled with lament, most notably lamenting the loss of kingship in Psalm 89, the final run of psalms suggests that lament does not have the last word in the lives of those who take seriously the tôrâ of the Lord and confess his reign. Psalm 150:6 appears as the final invitation: “Let everything that has breath praise the LORD.”

6. Theological Themes in the Psalter.

In addition to careful attention to the literary structure of individual psalms and the editorial shape of the entire corpus, the interpreter must also be sensitive to the range of theological themes throughout the Psalter. Although the following themes are by no means exhaustive, they are suggestive of the theological range present in the psalms (for a comprehensive treatment, see Kraus 1992).

6.1. Yahweh as King. As suggested previously (see 5.1-2 above), the reign of Yahweh is central to the message of the Psalter, and the rehearsal of this theme appears frequently throughout the work. The kingship of Yahweh may be considered the “root metaphor” of the entire Psalter. All subsequent affirmations about the work and activity of Yahweh are predicated upon the assumption that Yahweh reigns as king. The references to Yahweh as divine warrior (Ps 18:7-15; 24:7-10) and judge (Ps 9:7; 105:7) are extensions of the central affirmation that Yahweh reigns as king. As J. Mays (30) has noted, “When viewed as limbs and branches dependent on the substance of this root metaphor, the psalms are the poetry of the reign of the LORD.” Thus, whether explicitly announced (Ps 97:1) or more subtly claimed (Ps 82), the reign of Yahweh stands as the central theological claim of the Psalter.

6.2. Yahweh as Refuge. The theme of Yahweh as refuge (hāsā) appears frequently, especially in the psalms of lament and encompasses a significant number of familiar metaphors within the Psalter, including “rock,” “wings” and “holy mountain” (Creach; Brown). Not only does the final line of Psalm 2 remind the reader that “Happy are all who take refuge [hāsā] in him,” but also the verb often appears in the opening line of individual psalms (e.g., Ps 7:1; 11:1; 16:1; 71:1), thus establishing it as one of the operative themes of that psalm.

The psalmist also makes reference to being “in the shadow of your wings.” Although this metaphor emerges from the constellation of images associated with animal metaphors (see Animal Imagery), particularly those from the ornithological world, the metaphor of wings is connected with the notion of refuge, connoting the protective and nurturing capacity of God. Other images such as “shield” and “fortress” (Ps 144:1-2) are employed similarly.

6.3. Yahweh as Creator. In attempting to portray the power of God, the psalms often resort to creation imagery. Several psalms (Pss 29; 93; 104) invoke ancient Near Eastern images of a cosmic combat with primeval chaos. For the psalmist, however, these images of a primeval battle reassert the claim that Yahweh reigns, and further that the reigning King has the capacity to create order out of chaos anew. In essence, these images not only celebrate what God has done but also celebrate and anticipate what God may yet do through his continued creative care.

Creation also plays a critical role in the Psalter in testifying to the reign of Yahweh. In Psalm 19 the psalmist explains, “The heavens are telling the glory of God; and the firmament proclaims his handiwork” (Ps 19:1 NRSV). Similarly, Psalm 97 announces that “the heavens proclaim his righteousness” (Ps 97:6 NRSV). The voices of creation join with the voices of God’s people in announcing the one true God, who reigns over all creation.

6.4. Enemies. Repeatedly throughout the Psalter come allusions to the threats and taunts of enemies. In the psalms of the individual those who offer such threats are identified by various terms: “enemies” (’ōyēb [Ps 3:7; 6:10; 7:5; 41:5]), “foes” (šar [Ps 3:1; 13:4; 23:5]), “evildoers” (mēre’im [Ps 26:5; 27:2]) and “wicked ones” (rēša’im [Ps 3:7; 12:8; 26:5]). In addition to excessive hubris (Ps 10:6; 14:1), the enemies appear to have turned their attention upon the psalmist, persecuting the poet in both word and deed. To highlight the nature of such attacks, the psalmist resorts to three metaphors in an effort to relay the nature of the threat: the enemies are compared to (1) a hostile army that attacks a helpless people (Ps 27:3; 55:18); (2) hunters who seek their prey (Ps 9:15; 35:7-8); (3) wild beasts that attack unsuspecting victims (Ps 22:12-13; 27:2) (Kraus 1992, 130-31).

In other psalms, particularly communal laments and royal psalms, the enemies are those nations hostile to Israel and Judah. These enemies appear stronger in number, often coming in chariots and on horses (Ps 20:7), thus forcing the king (or the community) to turn to Yahweh for deliverance from the invaders. These nations are the ones that do not know Yahweh and do not call on his name (Ps 79:6). Thus the threat of the enemies is also a challenge to the honor and the name of Yahweh. The community implores Yahweh to act, not simply to redeem them, but more critically to restore “the glory of your name” (Ps 79:9).

In addition to individual enemies and national foes, the psalmist also speaks more figuratively, referring to the primeval foes as a force to be reckoned with. In Psalm 74 the psalmist alludes to several primeval foes: “You divided the sea by your might; you broke the heads of the dragons in the waters. You crushed the heads of Leviathan” (Ps 74:13-14a NRSV). The primeval foes are meant to illustrate the disorder, destruction and chaos that threaten the ordered world in which Yahweh reigns as king. Yet, as Kraus (1992, 129) has observed, “the primeval powers are used to show by comparison how great Yahweh's power is."

7. The Psalms and the New Testament.

The early church made extensive use of the Psalter, quoting or alluding to it more than any other OT work. Apparently, the early Christian community continued the Jewish practice of making the psalms part of their liturgical materials. Paul encourages the community at Colossae to "sing psalms, hymns, and spiritual songs" (Col 3:16 NRSV) to God. Paul expresses similar sentiments in Ephesians 5:19-20.

In addition to the psalms functioning as a resource in early Christian worship, they served as a theological resource for the Christian community in its attempt to interpret the Christ event. To this end, a number of psalms were employed repeatedly in the NT, most notably Psalms 2; 22; 69; 110; 118.

The NT writers, particularly the Synoptic writers, cited Psalm 2 in their presentation of Jesus as God's anointed. At the baptism of Jesus, Psalm 2:7 ("You are my son; today I have begotten you" [NRSV]) is remembered, attesting to the divine sonship of Jesus while also formally announcing his rule as king. This same verse is quoted elsewhere (Acts 13:33; Heb 1:5; 5:5) in celebrating the exaltation of Christ. In addition, other themes from Psalm 2 appear, particularly the notion of the threat against God's anointed and his triumph over the nations (see Ps 2:8-9). In the book of Acts, Luke makes frequent use of these themes as he reflects upon the community's struggle for identity and survival. Upon the release of Peter and John, the community gathered together and "raised their voices" (in song?): "Sovereign Lord, who made the heaven and the earth, the sea, and everything in them, it is you who said by the Holy Spirit through our ancestor David, your servant: 'Why did the Gentiles rage, and the peoples imagine vain things? The kings of the earth took their stand, and the rulers have gathered together against the Lord and against his Messiah'" (Acts 4:24-26 NRSV). The community interpreted, through the lens of the Psalter, not only the hostile reception of Jesus by the world but also their own hostile reception.

Three of the longest laments, Psalms 22; 31; 69, are used extensively by the Synoptic writers in their accounts of Jesus' suffering and death. In addition to the cry of dereliction uttered from the cross (Ps 22:1 [Mt 27:46; Mk 15:34]), other elements of the passion narrative have their parallels in Psalm 22 in particular. The Synoptic writers note the derision heaped on the one suffering, with those passing by shaking their heads in shame (Ps 22:7 [Mt 27:39; Mk 15:29; Lk 23:35]). Matthew also showed how those who passed by hurled insults at the suffering one (Ps 22:8 [Mt 27:43]), and all three Synoptic writers, plus John, drew attention to the dividing of the clothes and the casting of lots (Ps 22:18 [Mt 27:35; Mk 15:24; Lk 23:34; John 19:24]). Yet the methodology of the NT writers was far more complex than mere "proof-texting" from the OT in an effort to add credence to their narratives. Rather, the language of lament proved to be fertile ground for expressing the depths (and riches) of Christ's passion. As H.-J. Kraus (1992, 189) has suggested, Christ "not only identifies himself with all the suffering that finds expression in the Psalms . . . but also he alone is the servant of God, in whose life and death are fulfilled all the sufferings of all those who cry out in prayer."

Although explicit citations of the psalms appear absent in Revelation, idioms, phrases and concepts from the Psalter are readily present. The central affirmation of the Psalter, the rule of God over the world (see 6.1 above), functions as the dominant theme throughout Revelation (Rev 4:2, 9; 5:1, 7, 13; 6:16; 7:10, 17; 19:4; 21:5). In the enthronement psalms the psalmist announces, "the LORD reigns" (yhwh mālak); likewise, in Revelation 19:6 the author proclaims, "the Lord God reigns" (ebasileusen kyrios ho theos). In addition to the celebration of God's kingship in Revelation there is frequent mention of songs and the singing of a new song (Rev 5:9; 14:3). And toward the end of the Revelation, not only is the image of Zion reappropriated (Rev 21:9—22:5), but also the author recounts a vision of a heavenly multitude offering praise. Three times they begin their praise with "Hallelujah" (Rev 19:1, 3, 6), drawing the reader back to the conclusion of the Psalter. In so doing, the author reaffirms the continued reign of God and urges the reader to wait with the same hopeful expectation articulated in the book of Psalms.

See also ASAPH AND SONS OF KORAH; CONFIDENCE, PSALMS OF; CULT, WORSHIP; PSALMS; DAVID; DEAD SEA SCROLLS; EDITORIAL CRITICISM; FORM CRITICISM; HYMNS; LAMENT, PSALMS OF; LYRIC POETRY; POETICS, TERMINOLOGY OF; PROTECTION IMAGERY; THANKSGIVING, PSALMS

OF; WORSHIP.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. Commentaries: L. Allen, Psalms 101-150 (WBC; Rev. ed.; Nashville: Thomas Nelson, 2002); W. Brueggemann, The Message of the Psalms: A Theological Commentary (Minneapolis: Augsburg, 1984); P. Craigie, Psalms 1-50 (WBC; Rev. ed.; Nashville: Thomas Nelson, 2004); E. Gerstenberger, Psalms: Part 1, with an Introduction to Cultic Poetry (FOTL; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1988); idem, Psalms, Part 2 and Lamentations (FOTL; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2001); F.-L. Hossfeld and E. Zenger, Psalms 2 (Hermeneia; Minneapolis: Fortress, 2005); H.-J. Kraus, Psalms 1-59 (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1988); idem, Psalms 60-150 (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1993); J. L. Mays, Psalms (IBC; Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 1994); J. C. McCann Jr., "Psalms," NIB 4.641-1280; M. Tate, Psalms 51-100 (WBC; Dallas: Word, 1990); G. Wilson, Psalms, vol. 1 (NIVAC; Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 2002). Studies: R. Alter, The Art of Biblical Poetry (New York: Basic Books, 1985); W. H. Bellinger Jr., Psalms: Reading and Studying the Book of Praises (Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 1990); A. Berlin, The Dynamics of Biblical Parallelism (Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1985); W. P. Brown, Seeing the Psalms: A Theology of Metaphor (Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 2002); B. S. Childs, "Psalm Titles and Midrashic Exegesis," JSS 16 (1971) 137-50; idem, Introduction to the Old Testament as Scripture (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1979); J. Creach, Yahweh as Refuge and the Editing of the Hebrew Psalter (JSOTSup 217; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1996); J. Crenshaw, The Psalms (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2001); J. Day, Psalms (OTG; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1992); N. deClaissé-Walford, Reading from the Beginning: The Shaping of the Hebrew Psalter (Macon, GA: Mercer University Press, 1997); P. W. Flint, The Dead Sea Psalms Scrolls and the Book of Psalms (STDJ 17; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1997); K. Gallig, "Der Beichtspiegel," ZAW 47 (1929): 125-30; E. S. Gerstenberger, Psalms: Part 1, with an Introduction to Cultic Poetry (FOTL 14; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1988); idem, Psalms: Part 2, and Lamentations (FOTL 15; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2001); H. Gunkel, The Psalms: A Form-Critical Introduction (FBBS 19; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1967); J. Kugel, The Idea of Biblical Poetry: Parallelism and Its History (New Haven: Yale University Press, 1981); C. Rösel, Die messianische Redaktion des Psalters: Studien zu Entstehung und Theologie der Sammlung Psalm 2- 89 (CthM 19; Stuttgart: Calwer, 1999); K. Seybold, Introducing the Psalms (Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1990); S. R. A. Starbuck, Court Oracles in the Psalms: The So-Called Royal Psalms in Their Ancient Near Eastern Context (SBLDS 172; Atlanta: Society of Biblical Literature, 1999); W. D. Tucker Jr., "Democratization and the Language of the Poor in Psalms 2-89," HBT 25 (2003) 161-78; W. G. E. Watson, Classical Hebrew Poetry: A Guide to Its Techniques (JSOTSup 26; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1984); G. Wilson, The Editing of the Hebrew Psalter (SBLDS 76; Chico, CA: Scholars Press, 1985); E. Zenger, "Der Psalter als Wegweiser und Wegbeleiter: Ps 1-2 als Proömium des Psalmenbuchs," in Sie wandern von Kraft zu Kraft: Aufbrüche, Wege, Begegnungen; Festgabe für Bischof Reinhard Lettmann, ed. A. Angenendt and H. Vorgrimler (Kevelaar: Butzon & Bercker, 1993) 29-47. W. D. Tucker Jr.

PSALMS 2: ANCIENT NEAR EASTERN BACKGROUND

The psalms may be described as song and as poetry, but foremost they are the prayers of ancient Israel. Of course, they are not the only prayers that Israel ever uttered. The Bible is filled with prayers in both prose and poetic format, some of which, like the psalms, were sung, and of course there were countless prayers that were spoken and never recorded. The book of Psalms is unique in being the official collection of Israel's corporate prayers. These were the prayers spoken during formal *worship. S. Mowinckel rightly called the book of Psalms the hymnbook of the temple. So it is correct also to regard Psalms as Israel's prayer book.

Not surprisingly, the religions of the ancient Near East also had their prayers, a number of which have been recovered in the modern period. Prayer is communication with one's God/gods, presupposing that the deity was thought to be a person. The people of Mesopotamia, Egypt, Hatti and Syro-Palestine thought of their gods in a personal way, and so they engaged them in conversation. Prayer is one side of that conversation.

Scholars have found it illuminating to read the psalms in the light of other ancient prayers. The best approach to studying the psalms in the light of their cultural analogues is not simply to draw on parallels but also to take note of the differences that exist between these various prayer traditions. But before any type of comparison can be made, the data must first be described. We thus begin with a survey of the prayers of ancient Mesopotamia, Egypt, Hatti and Syro-Palestine. Knowledge of the psalms is here presupposed and will not be described in any detail (see various articles on Psalms in the dictionary). While proceeding culture by culture, this survey will be structured according to the literary form of the prayers. These forms (*hymn, *lament, etc.) will be compared with their analogues in Psalms. Afterward, we will observe the similarities and differences in terms of style (*terseness, *parallelism, *imagery, etc.) as well as content.

1. Formal Analysis
2. Poetic Analysis
3. Content Analysis
4. Promise and Pitfalls
5. Conclusion

1. Formal Analysis.

1.1. Sumerian Prayers. Sumerian is the oldest known written language. The earliest Sumerian writing comes from about 3000 BC and is mostly economic in nature. Literary texts are known from closer to the middle of the third millennium BC, and the first hymns came from the period when the earliest Semitic rulers dominated the area of southern Mesopotamia, and are also well attested. Both hymns and laments are found in Sumerian.

1.1.2. Sumerian Hymns. Three types of hymns are attested in Sumerian: (1) hymns to various deities; (2) temple hymns; (3) hymns to kings. After a brief introduction to all three types, we will note the special importance of an author of a number of Sumerian hymns, Enheduanna.

1.1.2.1. Hymns to Deities. Not surprisingly, the bulk of hymns in the Sumerian corpus are hymns to various deities. We have well over one hundred such hymns through the Old Babylonian period that offer worship to many of the main gods of the pantheon. As an example, we note a portion of a hymn to the god Ninurta that draws particular attention to this god's function as a god of war. Throughout the hymn each stanza is repetitive, the first part lauding "my king," and the second specifically naming Ninurta:

[My king], of the house of the contentious
(and) disobedient, you are its adversary,
Of their city, you are its enemy.

Lord Ninurta, of the house of the contentious (and) disobedient, you are its adversary,
Of their city, you are its enemy.
(ANET, 577)

1.1.2.2. Temple Hymns. Numerous examples exist of hymns that celebrate not the deity per se but rather the god's dwelling place. A prime example of such a hymn is one dedicated to Ekur, which was the name of the temple of Enlil found in the city of Nippur. This hymn begins by praising the house as a whole and its parts as a "great mountain," the actual meaning of the Sumerian term "Ekur."

The great house, it is a mountain great,
The house of Enlil, it is a mountain great,
The house of Ninlil, it is a mountain great,
The house of darkness, it is a mountain great,
The house which knows no light, it is a mountain great,
The house of the Lofty Gate, it is a mountain great. (ANET, 582)

One can surmise that the exaltation of the god's house is a way of exalting the god. After all, the temple would represent sacred space made holy by the presence of the god represented by his image.

1.1.2.3. Royal Hymns. We have a number of hymns in which it is the king himself who worships the deity and/or is himself the object of celebration (see Kingship Psalms). Twenty-four of the royal hymns are connected with the neo-Sumerian king Shulgi (twenty-first century BC). These hymns, particularly those that extol the king himself, are part of a program where Shulgi and his theologians promoted him as a divine figure—a rare practice in ancient Mesopotamia. Scholars speculate that the purpose was to give Shulgi the religious backing to create an empire in southern Mesopotamia. In the following example Shulgi worships Enlil. The hymn begins thus:

Enlil, the eminent one, the sovereign (god), whose utterance is trustworthy,
Nunamnir, the eternal shepherd of the Land,
who hails from the Great Mountain,
The great counselor, the leader of heaven and earth,

who is in control of all the divine offices.
(COS 1.57:552)

The hymn also praises Enlil for choosing Shulgi to rule in the land. He is described as “a lion’s seed,” “the shepherd” and “the protective spirit of the land.” J. Klein has argued that this and other Shulgi hymns were composed for use during his coronation. All told, there are well over one hundred attested examples of this genre in Sumerian, reaching into the early Old Babylonian period, where the rulers of cities such as Isin, Larsa and even Babylon allowed themselves to be praised, though they did not consider themselves gods.

1.1.2.4. Enheduanna. Special mention should be made of Enheduanna, the daughter of Sargon, the founder of the Akkadian dynasty, the first Semitic dynasty in Mesopotamia. These Akkadian speakers adopted Sumerian as their literary language, and Enheduanna, the high priestess of the moon god Nanna, was the first named author. She is known for her hymns. She functioned as priestess for forty years during the twenty-third century BC. Interestingly, the cycle of hymns that we have from her are concerned not with Nanna but with Inanna, the goddess of love and war (Hallo and van Dijk; De Shong Meador). In the opening of one such hymn Enheduanna praises the goddess as the one who controls the me, a Sumerian word and concept that denotes what Farber (COS 1.161:522) calls “the cultural norms which are the basis of Sumerian civilization and all aspects of life.”

Queen of all the me, radiant light,
Life-giving woman, beloved of An
(and) Urash,
Hierodule of An, much bejewelled,
Who loves the life-giving tiara, fit for en-ship,
who grasps in (her) hand, the seven me,
My queen, you who are the guardian of all the great me,
You have lifted the me, have tied the me
to your hands,
Have gathered the me, pressed the me to your breast.

Among other works attributed to her are forty-two hymns addressed to temples from the southern city of Eridu to the northern city of Sippar and the eastern city of Eshnunna (Sjöberg, Bergmann and Gragg).

1.1.3. Sumerian Laments. Sumerian was a language rich in lament literature, both corporate and individual. We know a number of different types by their native designations, but in the following we will survey only the most discussed types and those most relevant for comparison with the biblical genre.

1.1.3.1. Corporate Laments: The Balag and the Ershemma. Perhaps the most famous of all Sumerian laments are the so-called city laments that were composed in response to the destruction of Ur at the end of the Third Dynasty of that city. However, those texts are more relevant to the study of the book of *Lamentations rather than Psalms because they are historically specific laments (see Dobbs-Allsopp). Related to these city laments connected to the fall of Ur is the balag genre, which are also communal laments concerning the downfall of a city. The significant difference of the balags is that they lack the historical specificity of the earlier texts. In this they may be compared in subject matter to the biblical communal laments bemoaning such destruction (Pss 44; 74; 79; 89; 137). The balag was an instrument, probably a harp, and thus probably accompanied the singing of these laments. These texts were written in a dialectical form of Sumerian called emesal, which was the language of the gala-priests who performed ritual lamentations (Kutscher).

The late (first millennium BC) congregation laments (balag) often had an ershemma connected to them. The word ershemma means something like the “lament of the shem-drum” and indicates the instrument that accompanied the singing or chanting of the lament by the gala-priest. The rituals of the gala-priests were usually recited in emesal (see above), and this includes the ershemma. The ershemma is a lamentation connected to the cult (Cohen). Indeed, from the cultic calendars of Uruk and Ashur we see that the ershemma concluded the liturgy. It was a song of intercession. In the description of E. R. Dalglisch, they are “generally very formal, filled with epithetic and laudatory invocations, often with repetitious formula to induce the deities to repent” (Dalglisch, 20). He divides the extant ershemmas into early ones from the First Dynasty of Isin (Old Babylonian period, the first half of the second millennium BC) and late ones from the first millennium BC. A number of the former are connected with the actual fall of the Dynasty of Isin, wherein the goddess of that city (Nin-Isina) laments the destruction of the city. But others are not connected with an actual destruction and therefore probably were reused in ritual contexts. The late ershemmas, on the other hand, were the ones, mentioned above, that were connected to the late congregational balags.

1.1.3.2. The Private Lament: The Letter Prayer and the Ershahunga. Whereas the balag and the ershemma were communal laments, individuals could also petition the gods for help with their own troubles. Sumerian worshipers considered suffering to emanate from the anger of their gods. When suffering came in the form of illness or some other misfortune, they approached their gods in their sanctuaries in order to attempt to appease them.

An early form of delivering a prayer to a deity was accomplished by inscribing the message on a votive object. However, this method proved too costly for most. One interesting more economical strategy was the letter prayer, of which we have some examples (COS 1.164-65:532-34). The gods were represented by statues, and worshipers would write prayers in the form of letters and deposit them in the presence of a god. In this way the prayer would be constantly in the presence of the god. We have examples of both royal and nonroyal letter prayers. An even later form of Sumerian private petition is the ershahunga, meaning "lament that calms the heart" (of the deity), which explains its purpose. We know of at least 130 examples of this genre, mostly from the first millennium BC, from actual examples or from the citation of first lines in literary catalogs. These prayers were uttered to request healing from sickness, protection from and the destruction of enemies, or deliverance from the punishment of sin.

1.2. Akkadian Prayers. Although the Babylonians and Assyrians spoke and typically wrote in Akkadian, a Semitic language written in cuneiform, they often composed their prayers in Sumerian, usually the emesal dialect, and thus the prayers described above were often uttered by Akkadians (cf. the ershahungas of the first millennium). However, there is also a tradition of bilingual and unilingual Akkadian prayers, predominantly hymns, but also one significant lament genre, the shuilla.

1.2.1. Akkadian Hymns. Numerous hymns of praise to various deities are attested, and a number are easily accessible in English translation (ANET, 383-91; COS 1.114-17:416-19; B. R. Foster, 1.65-74; 2.491-544). Perhaps the most famous is the great hymn to Shamash, the god of the sun. Shamash is praised as the one who physically illumines the world and, as the one who exposes the darkness, is also known as a protector of justice. A short citation from the song illustrates:

At the brightness of your light, humankind's footprints become visible].
You blunt the horns of a scheming villain,
The perpetrator of a cunning deal is undermined,
You show the roguish judge the (inside of) a jail. (COS 1.117:418)

Hymns are directed to other deities (Marduk, Ishtar, etc.), who are extolled by their specific attributes and epithets. P. D. Miller (26) notes that there are relatively few thanksgivings, mostly general descriptions of praise.

1.2.2. Akkadian Laments: The Shuilla. The term shuilla is a Sumerian one meaning "to lift the hand" and likely refers to some kind of ritual gesture that accompanied the uttering of this prayer. Though the name is Sumerian, and there was a corporate lament in Sumerian by this name, there also is a well-attested Akkadian genre. Besides language, another difference between the Sumerian and Akkadian genres is that the latter are individual laments. According to W. W. Hallo (1878), they "combine the form of an incantation with the function of a prayer." These prayers begin with a hymn that specifies attributes of the deity that are relevant for the second section, which is a petition. The petitions concern things such as illness, the effects of witchcraft and the fear of death. The petitioners often recognize their own fault as a condition of their present dire situation, as is illustrated in the following example from a shuilla addressed to Marduk:

Because of my misdeed, known or unknown, [I have been found neglectful], have trespassed, slighted, and sinned;
[As against] my father, my begetter, against your great divinity,
[I have been neglectful], have trespassed, slighted, and sinned. (Hunt, 156)

The third and final section of a shuilla is a renewed call to praise the deity.

1.3. Egyptian Prayers. Prayers are attested in the Egyptian language from the earliest period of the literature (Old Kingdom) down to the very latest periods (for collections, see J. L. Foster; Assmann; Barucq and Daumas). D. B. Redford has indicated that hymns and poetry comprise much of Egyptian literature. Also, Redford (2237) notes, hymns were sung, and they were sung in such a fashion that “the singing of the priests in the temple was likened to the rhythmic clatter of baboons at the rising of the sun.” The reference to the priests is a reminder that many of these hymns were part of the formal worship liturgy of Egypt. In terms of their content, J. L. Foster (1995b, 2) points out that Egyptian prayers express “the entire gamut of religious emotions and attitudes seen in the hymn and prayers of later religions—classical or Judaeo-Christian.” The earliest hymns are found in the Pyramid Texts, which are from the Old Kingdom (particularly the Fifth Dynasty and the Sixth Dynasty [2428-2250 BC]). These are writings from the pyramid walls and include a collection of spells, incantations and hymns. These texts assisted the dead pharaoh in his transition to the divine sphere. The Old Kingdom Pyramid Texts were produced for royalty. These are replaced by the Middle Kingdom Coffin Texts and then by the New Kingdom Book of the Dead. These latter two contain prayers, hymns and spells that enable common people to make the journey to the afterlife.

1.3.1. Hymns to Various Deities. The only significant difference between Egyptian hymns and other ancient Near Eastern hymns is the name of the deity who is the object of praise. Many Egyptian deities are the focus of attention in the numerous Egyptian hymns, including Osiris, Horus, Thoth, the divine pharaoh and even the divinized Nile, as the following excerpt illustrates: “Hail to thee, O Nile, that issues from the earth and comes to keep Egypt alive! Hidden in his form of appearance, a darkness by day, to whom minstrels have sung. He that waters the meadows which Re created in order to keep every kid alive” (ANET, 372).

1.3.2. The Great Hymn to Aten. Certainly the most famous and striking of all Egyptian hymns is the one dedicated to the Aten (sun-disc). The Aten was worshiped as early as the Twelfth Dynasty (c. 1900 BC), but devotion to him was intensified during the Amarna period (Eighteenth Dynasty), specifically during the rule of Akhenaton (fourteenth century BC). For reasons presently being debated, this king elevated Aten to the level of exclusive worship. Because of this, Akhenaton is frequently compared to Moses as promoting a monotheistic religion. Thus, this hymn takes on a special importance as purportedly expressing the theological ideas associated with this religious innovation.

Though discovered on the tomb wall of the pharaoh’s minister Ay, the hymn speaks in Akhenaton’s voice. It expresses the pharaoh’s unique religious ideas with a powerful and beautiful style. It begins with a request to Aten that also praises the deity in his function as providing light to the world.

Let your holy light shine from the height of heaven,
O living Aten,
source of all life!
From eastern horizon risen and streaming, you have flooded the world with your beauty.
You are majestic, awesome, bedazzling, exalted, overlord of all the earth, yet your rays, they touch lightly, compass
the lands to the limits of all your creation.

Reading on, one is struck by the intensely intimate language by which Akhenaton addresses his god:

And you are in my heart;
there is no other who truly knows you but for your son, Akhenaton.
May you make him wise with your inmost counsels,
wise with your power,
that earth may aspire to your godhead, its creatures fine as the day you made them. (J. L. Foster 1995a, 1751-53)

This hymn expresses the religious devotion of only a moment in the history of Egyptian religion. After Akhenaton’s death his exclusive devotion to the sun-disc was rejected, and religion reverted to what was normal in Egypt.

1.4. Hittite Prayers. The Hittite empire that flourished in Asia Minor during the mid-second millennium BC left behind records of a significant number of prayers that have since been recovered, translated and published (Lebrun).

These prayers show that the Hittites approached their gods and goddesses for many of the same reasons as their neighbors did (de Roos). Hittite prayers may be characterized by three elements that may either be independent of each other or combined into a single prayer: arkuwar, mugawar, walliyatar.

The arkuwar is a defensive prayer in which the supplicant mounts a self-defense against the gods in the context of suffering of some sort that is understood as a punishment for sin. The best-known prayer from Hatti, the Plague Prayer of Murshili (latter fourteenth century BC), is a prayer of the arkuwar type. King Murshili's prayers are set in the twentieth year of a plague that has ripped through his country. It began during the reign of his father, Suppiluliuma I, and also claimed the life of his brother, Arnuwanda II. Murshili, though admitting that the son can inherit the sins of his father, defends himself and pleads with the gods on the basis of the fact that retribution has been made, in large part, by the plague itself: "What is [this]? Hattusa has made restitution through the plague. It [has made restitution] twenty-fold. So it happens. And the souls of the Storm-god of Hatti, my lord, [and of] the gods, my lords, are simply not appeased" [from the second plague prayer] (COS 1.60:156). The defense is legal, using language from the law court. Indeed, as de Roos (2000) states, "The Hittites expressed their relations with their gods not in terms of grateful sentiments, but in terms of justice and juridical judgment."

The mugawar is an invocation, an appeal to the god to pay attention. Kantuzili, a prince from around the time of Suppiluliuma I, uttered such a prayer to the Hittite sun-god, asking that god to intercede with his personal god, an underworld deity, on behalf of his sickness, when the sun-god descends at night into the underworld: "O Sun-god, when thou goest down to the netherworld (to be) with him, forget not to speak with that patron-god of mine and apprise him of Kantuzilis' plight!" (ANET, 400).

Finally, the walliyatar is a song of praise. An example of such a song may be given from a hymn to Telepinus, the Hattian storm-god, whose beginning gives the tenor of the whole: "Thou, Telepinus, art a noble god; thy name is noble among all gods; among the gods art thou noble, O Telepinus. Great art thou, O Telepinus; there is no other deity more noble and mighty than thou" (ANET, 397).

Thus the Hittites praised their deities and turned to them in times of trouble and suffering. Hymn and lament are both found among their extant prayers.

1.5. Northwest Semitic Prayers. So far no separate hymns or laments written in a Northwest Semitic language (Eblaite, Ugaritic, Aramaic, etc.) have been discovered outside of the Bible. Even so, because of references within other texts, we know that such likely existed. Two examples may be presented. The largest collection of Northwest Semitic texts outside the Bible comes from the digs at Ras Shamra, or Ugarit. The best-known texts from this group are narrative myths. In these myths the main characters are often depicted as appealing to the gods for help. For instance, at the beginning of the Kirtu text the king of that name bemoans the loss of his family in a way that draws the attention of the gods. Similarly, the opening of the Aqhat epic features King Danel implicitly requesting that the gods give him a son. The dominance of narrative myth and lack of hymnic literature leads K. van der Toorn (1995, 2053) to say that "it should perhaps be assumed that in places such as Ugarit priests sung the texts of myths instead of psalms of praise."

Nonetheless, we do have an example of a petition to Baal in KTU 1.119:28-34:

O Baal, drive away the mighty one from our gates,
the warrior from our walls!
Bulls, O Baal, we will offer up, vows, Baal, we will pay!
Male animals, Baal, we will offer up,
hitpu sacrifices, Baal, we will perform:
A banquet, Baal, we will go up, the paths to the temple, Baal, we will walk!

Outside of the Ugaritic texts, not much can qualify as prayer. In this context, however, the Aramaic inscription of Zakir, king of Hamat and Lu'ash, is commonly mentioned. It is not a prayer, but it alludes to a prayer that the king offered in the midst of battle ("I lifted up my hand [in a gesture of prayer] to Be'elshamayn, and Be'elshamayn heard me").

1.6. The Forms of the Psalms in the Context of the Ancient Near East. Communication with the divine is an integral part of all major ancient Near Eastern religions. Looking at it from an Israelite perspective, Miller (5) rightly notes that “when Israel began to pray to the Lord, it did so in the midst of peoples whose arms had long been raised and whose heads had been bowed to the gods that directed their lives and delivered them from disaster.” Indeed, the literature of Egypt, Sumer, Babylon, Assyria, Egypt and, to a lesser extent, Canaan gives ample evidence of hymns of joy and songs of grief and disappointment.

One must conclude that there is great formal similarity between the prayers of these different cultures. In general, the hymns heap praise on the deities for who they are, what they provide for the world, and what they have done for the community and for the individual. Epithets are used as well as descriptive phrases to extol the deity. Furthermore, the laments of the region share similar concerns. Van der Toorn (1985, 62-67) highlights four major areas that recur in the laments of the ancient Near East: physical ailments, social strife, mental problems and disagreement with the divine realm.

Besides these general similarities, there are some specific ones as well. For instance, like Sumerian temple hymns, Israel knows of songs that celebrate their God by virtue of extolling the place where he chose to make his presence known. These are the so-called *Zion hymns (Pss 46; 48) as well as other hymns that reflect on the beauty of the sanctuary (Ps 84). In addition, there are extensive prayers that celebrate or provide petitions for the king (Pss 20; 21), a phenomenon that we noted throughout the ancient Near East. This, of course, is hardly surprising, considering the importance of the king, whether divine or not, throughout the Near East.

Attempts to find differences between the prayers of Israel and those of the rest of the Near East are often unpersuasive because they are based on degree rather than kind, and, in any case, we have only a selection of prayers. Even so the following differences may be noted.

(1) Israelite hymns often praise Yahweh for his acts in history (Pss 77; 78; 114; 137). Near Eastern hymns tend to praise their gods by means of reference to their function within the pantheon and by reference to their attributes and epithets. Of course, Yahweh, as sole God, incorporates all functions, attributes and epithets, and, as we will note later, he often is described in terms that are used in ancient Near Eastern literature for their gods. The lack of sustained attention to the gods’ acts in history in the hymns is not absolute (see texts such as the Lamentation over the Destruction of Ur [not discussed in this article]), and it does not mean that ancient Near Eastern people did not conceive of their gods as active in the historical process (see Albrektson).

(2) The laments of Israel typically open with invocation, petition and complaint; the laments of Mesopotamia start with praise before moving on to petition. It is easier to describe this difference than to give an explanation of its significance. Could it be that Israelites felt freer to complain to God because they were in a covenant relationship with him? Could it be an indication of a more intimate relationship with God? It does seem inappropriate to propose, as some do, that the fact that Mesopotamian prayer opens with praise suggests that the worshipers who use them are whining or trying to extort an answer to their prayer.

(3) Evidence indicates that a number of the subgenres of prayer in the ancient Near East Akkadian shuillas, for instance, were connected to incantation rituals. Since divination was largely prohibited in Israel, we have nothing quite comparable.

2. Poetic Analysis.

Besides form, Hebrew poetry shares certain literary conventions with other ancient Near Eastern texts. Although this can be seen just by reading the texts side by side, there has not been a major comparative study in this area. The present article will offer only a few comments concerning major aspects of poetic language (terseness, parallelism, imagery). Focus will be on Akkadian and Ugaritic poetry because these are the only other major corpora of ancient Semitic poetry. Nonetheless, we should note that Akkadian poetic tradition shows signs of being influenced by Sumerian conventions, particularly in being, at times, highly repetitive. The study of Israelite poetic style has been helped by reference to these parallel literatures (Watson, 4-10), although it has been notoriously overused by M. Dahood and his students (see 4 below).

2.1. Terseness. Most, if not all, poetry is terse, using few words to communicate its message. In Hebrew poetry this terseness is achieved by *ellipsis, relative nonuse of prose particles and conjunctions, and imagery. The brevity of the poetic line may be observed on a printed page of the Hebrew Bible by all the white space. Virtually any line of Akkadian or Ugaritic poetry could be quoted to make this point.

Even in English the opening line of Psalm 23 is terse: “The LORD is my shepherd, I will lack nothing.” In Hebrew, however, it is even briefer: yhw̄h rō’î lō’ ’ehsār. In the description of Baal’s feast in CTA 3 i 8-17, we observe the same short, staccato-like lines:

He arises, serves,
and gives him drink;
He puts a cup in his hand,
a goblet in his two hands,
A large vessel, mighty to look upon, belonging to the furnishing of the heavens,
A holy cup women may not see,
a goblet ‘Athiratu may not eye;
One thousand kd-measures he takes from the new wine,
ten thousand he mixes into his mixture.
(COS 1.86:250)

2.2. Parallelism. A second characteristic of Hebrew poetry shared with Akkadian and Ugaritic poetry is parallelism. Not every line of Hebrew poetry exhibits parallelism, but it is pervasive. “Parallelism” is the term to describe the echoing effect of poetry:

Blessed are those who do not walk in the counsel of the wicked,
And in the way of sinners do not stand,
And in the seat of mockers do not sit.
(Ps 1:1)

This is a tricolon that illustrates the nature of parallelism well. Parallelism does not merely repeat the same thought two or three times; it always expands, intensifies, and sharpens the idea with each new colon (see Kugel). In this case, the three parts of the verse intensify the relationship with evil as it moves from walking (a casual acquaintance) to standing (more settled) to sitting (firmly ensconced) with it.

Although the level of parallelism most obvious to a reader of an English translation is on the level of meaning, as illustrated here (semantic parallelism), the feature also operates on a grammatical level. The three cola of Psalm 1:1 also cohere through grammatical parallelism, as the three parallel subordinate clauses have the following pattern:

Blessed are those ...

negated verb / prepositional phrase
prepositional phrase / negated verb
prepositional phrase / negated verb

Parallelism is found extensively in Ugaritic poetry, as is illustrated by the following examples from the Baal myth:

In a dream of the Gracious One, the kindly
god,
in a vision of the Creator of creatures,
The heavens rain down oil,
the wadis run with honey.
(COS 1.86:271)

This example contains two bicola. In the first, “dream” parallels “vision” both in construct with an epithet of the god El. In the second, “heavens” parallels “wadis,” both of which are effusive with luxurious liquid (oil and honey). However, although this example is a bicolon, it has long been noted that Ugaritic poetry exhibits a higher proportion of longer parallel lines, as this example from earlier in the myth illustrates:

She seizes Motu, son of ‘Ilu:
with a knife she splits him, with a winnowing-fork she winnows him,
with fire she burns him,
with grindstones she pulverizes him, in the field she sows him. (COS 1.86:270)

Here we have a parallelism of five parts, each describing a means by which Anat decimates Mot, the god of death, who has just consumed Baal.

2.3. Imagery. The third major identifying feature of poetry is an extensive use of figurative language. *Imagery seems to be a staple of poetry across cultures, so it is not surprising to discover that all ancient Near Eastern poetry utilizes imagery. It is therefore unnecessary to cite numerous examples of poems to make the point, but later we will observe not only that there is a similar use of imagery but also that specific ancient Near Eastern images are consciously appropriated by Israelite psalmists (see 3.1 below). However, for the present we will note the opening of a hymn for Shamash, the sun god, from the time of Assurbanipal:

Light of the great gods, resplendent illuminator of the universe, Lofty judge, shepherd of the celestial and earthly regions. (COS 1.143:474)

In these opening lines we have the metaphors of judge and shepherd applied to the sun-god, who is literally the illuminator of the universe.

2.4. Secondary Poetical Devices. Along with the extensive use of terseness, parallelism and imagery throughout the psalms, there is a host of secondary poetical devices occasionally used in these poems. The list of such devices is too long to be discussed here (see Inclusio; Merism; Personification; Refrain; Rhyme; Sound Play; Wordplay; see also Watson). One example will have to suffice. The *acrostic form is used in a few psalms (e.g., Pss 9; 10; 111; 112; 119). These psalms begin each unit (whether a colon, a parallel line or a whole stanza) with successive letters of the Hebrew alphabet. Both Akkadian and Ugaritic poetry also have examples of poems or parts of poems where attention is given to some kind of pattern at the beginning of the lines. Interestingly, Akkadian also has examples of what are called sentence acrostics—for instance, the Babylonian Theodicy, where the twenty-seven stanzas each have lines that begin with the same syllabic sign that when taken together may be translated “I, Saggil-kinam-ubbub the incantation priest, fear god and king.” The study of similar or nearly similar poetic devices enriches our understanding of their significance in Hebrew poetry.

3. Content Analysis.

Perhaps most interesting to readers of Psalms are the similarities and differences when it comes to the content of the psalms. There are comparisons to be made not only in terms of form and style but also in terms of content. Similar themes and images will be discussed in this section, as well as two psalms that have been recognized to have particularly close connections with ancient Near Eastern ideas. Many specific differences in content can also be pointed to, but we will focus on one obvious major one: the object of petition and praise.

3.1. Shared Imagery. Many, many images are shared between the Bible and its ancient Near Eastern parallels (see Keel). Here we will focus on a few striking illustrative examples (see Psalms 6: Iconography).

3.1.1. Conflict with the Waters. Throughout the psalms God is pictured as dominating or defeating the waters (Day; Kloos; Wakeman; Curtis). For example, in Psalm 24:1-2 we read,

The earth is the LORD's, and everything in it, the world, and all its inhabitants, for he founded it on the seas and established it on the rivers.

The conflict motif is stronger in the description found in Psalm 18:14-15:

He shot his arrows and scattered them
 [the enemy], with great bolts of lightning he routed them.
 The valleys of the waters were exposed and the foundations of the earth laid bare at your rebuke, LORD, at the blast of breath from your nostrils.

The theme of conflict against the waters may also be found in reference to the exodus, specifically the crossing of Sea of Reeds. For instance, we read in Psalm 77:16 (see also Ps 114),

The waters saw you, God,
 the waters saw you and writhed;
 the very depths quaked.

Scholars are rightly convinced that passages such as these have as their background the ancient Near Eastern creation conflict motif as found in the Babylonian text known as the Enuma Elish and in the Ugaritic Baal myth (see Creation Theology). T. Jacobsen has argued that the latter came first and influenced the development of the former.

Nonetheless, we begin with a summary of the plot of the former, since the latter is broken. The Enuma Elish begins with a theogony. The two primordial gods, Apsu (the salt water) and Tiamat (fresh water), give birth to the younger gods. These are more active, and they disturb the sleep of their parents. As a result, Apsu, over Tiamat's objections, decides to kill the children. However, Ea, the god of wisdom, discovers the plot and through a preemptive strike kills Apsu and is enthroned on the flood-waters (see comment on Ps 29:10 in 3.2.2 below). The unintended consequence of this action was to anger Tiamat, who now turns her anger on the younger gods. She is a more formidable enemy than her husband, and Ea knows that he is no match for her. After Ea issues a challenge to the rest of the gods, it is his own son Marduk who steps forward to take on the challenge. He will battle Tiamat on condition that if he wins, he will be proclaimed the king of the pantheon.

He does defeat her, and afterwards he splits her body in half “like a shellfish” (she is a sea monster). He uses the top half to create the heavens and the lower half to create the earth (by pushing back and bounding her waters).

It is Marduk’s defeat of Tiamat that is of interest to us. Although Genesis 1 does not use the conflict myth to describe creation, the psalms use it to describe the dominance of Yahweh and his ability to establish and maintain order out of chaos.

The Canaanite analogy to the Enuma Elish makes the biblical connection seem even closer. The relevant episode begins when the messengers of Yamm (the Sea) show up at the divine assembly to proclaim him king. He also demands that Baal become his servant. The other gods acquiesce, but Baal does not, and he requests that the craftsman god Kothar-wa-Hasis make him two clubs. With these clubs he fights and defeats Yamm. At this point the text breaks off, but most scholars think that it continued by describing creation. Also relevant is that later texts describe Leviathan (Lotan) as an associate of Yamm (see 3.1.2 below).

3.1.2. Leviathan. Connected to the previous topic but deserving of special comment is the Canaanite background to the creature known as Leviathan in the Bible. Most interesting is the reference to Leviathan in Psalm 74:13-17, which praises God by saying,

You split open the sea by your strength;
you broke the heads of the monsters in the waters.
You crushed the heads of Leviathan and gave it as food to the creatures of the desert.
You opened up springs and streams;
you dried up the ever-flowing rivers.
The day is yours, and yours also the night;
you established the sun and moon.
You set all the boundaries of the earth;
you made both summer and winter.

In Ugaritic literature, Leviathan (Ltn) is a seven-headed sea monster that is defeated by Baal (KTU 5.1.28). The picture in Psalm 74 is intentionally describing Yahweh in language that is reminiscent of the false gods who seduced Israelites away from proper worship of Yahweh.

3.1.3. Rider on the Clouds. The image of Yahweh riding the clouds is not infrequent in the book of Psalms (and in the prophets). Psalms 18; 68; 104 picture God as riding the cloud. This is storm-god imagery again. Thus, we are not surprised to hear that Baal is so described in Ugaritic literature. As a matter of fact, one of the most common epithets applied to Baal is “the one who rides the clouds.” This storm cloud is the divine war chariot.

3.1.4. Zion and Zaphon. For many years Psalm 48:2 was thought to praise *Zion, God’s holy place, on “the sides of the north.” Since the discovery of the Ugaritic materials, scholars and translators have come to a different conclusion. As the TNIV renders the verse,

Beautiful in its loftiness,
the joy of the whole earth,
like the heights of Zaphon is Mount Zion,
the city of the Great King.

The Hebrew word šāpôn is now recognized not to be “north,” but rather the name of Baal’s sacred mountain, Mount Zaphon (identified with Mount Casius in modern Syria) (see Mountain Imagery).

3.2. Specific Psalms.

3.2.1. Psalm 104 and the Hymn to Aten. Previously, we noted an extraordinary and unique Egyptian hymn that was dedicated to the sole worship of the sun-disc, Aten (see 1.3.1.2 above). Many scholars have commented that this psalm bears some kind of definite relationship to Psalm 104. J. L. Foster (1995a, 1759) focused on three elements of similarity: tone, some shared general ideas and one very specific parallel. The tone of both is celebratory of nature created by God and therefore leads to the worship of the deity. Both poems open with praise of God’s glory and brilliance. Indeed, the opening of Psalm 104:2 sounds like the worship of a sun deity, “The LORD wraps himself in light as with a garment,” while the Egyptian poem begins “Let your holy light shine from the height of heaven.” In addition stanzas 9 and 10 of the hymn describe how Aten supplies the water, similar to Yahweh's actions in how Psalm 104:10-13. Further, both Aten and Yahweh are named as source of life, and their absence is associated with death.

Once you rose into shining, they lived;
when you sink to rest, they shall die.
For it is you who are Time itself,
the span of the world;
life is by means of you. (Hymn to Aten, stanza 12)

All creatures look to you to give them their food at the right time.
When you give it to them,
they gather it up;
when you open your hand,
they are well satisfied.
When you hide your face,
they are terrified;
when you take away their breath,
they die and return to the dust.
(Ps 104:27-29)

However, the most striking connection is in a passage that could be so close only if the psalmist (writing later) was aware of the Egyptian hymn.

You set the darkness, it becomes night, when all the beasts of the forest prowl.
The young lions roar for their prey and seek their food from God.
The sun rises, and they withdraw;
they lie down in their dens.
Then people go out to their work, to their labor until evening.
How many are your words, LORD!
In wisdom you made all of them;
the earth is full of your creatures.
There is the sea, big and wide, teeming with creatures without number—living things both large and small.
There the ships go back and forth, and Leviathan, which you formed to play
there. (Ps 104:20-26)

Undoubtedly there is some connection between these two songs, with the Egyptian exercising some kind of influence on the construction of the Hebrew, but there are also indications of other influences on the psalm. For instance, the reference to Leviathan could only come from Canaan. We turn now to a look at a psalm that is filled with Canaanite-like language, Psalm 29.

3.2.2. Psalm 29 as Transformed Baal Hymn. It is well known that the Canaanite god Baal was a storm-god. He was the one who dispensed rain, flashed lightning, and created thunder. Psalm 29 pictures Yahweh as a storm-god in language reminiscent of Baal (Ginsberg; Cross; Craigie). The repeated reference to Yahweh's voice, for instance, certainly connotes thunder. After all, lightning accompanies his destructive "voice" (Ps 29:7).

Indeed, there are other features of this psalm that further tie Psalm 29 to Canaanite theology. For instance, the opening verse appeals to the "heavenly beings" (bēnē 'ēlīm), the Ugaritic cognate being a reference to the pantheon, the "sons of El." Poetically, the psalm has a high percentage of repetitive parallel lines and tricola, characteristics of Ugaritic poetry. Furthermore, the geographical references (Lebanon, Sirion, Desert of Kadesh) point to a location north of Israel per se. Finally, mention should be made of Psalm 29:10, where the theme of Yahweh's enthronement over the flood is connected to the creation conflict theme (see 3.1.1 above) and perhaps specifically associated with the picture of Ea building his throne on the body of Apsu in the opening of the Enuma Elish.

All in all, the evidence indicates that the psalm may be a Baal poem transformed to become a poem to worship Yahweh. This might have taken place by simply substituting the name "Yahweh" for "Baal." However, the fact that we have no Ugaritic hymns should give our confidence pause here. We can see the connection by virtue of themes in the epics and poems, and we do have good reason to suspect that there were Canaanite poems in spite of the lack of evidence. Nonetheless, because of a lack of direct evidence, we must allow for the possibility that an Israelite poet created this poem. However, if so, then that poet must have intentionally composed it using Canaanite ideas and poetic conventions.

3.3. Rationale. Why would Israelite poets utilize ancient Near Eastern religious ideas in their compositions, particularly to describe their unique God in the language of pagan gods? It is doubtful that this was done unconsciously or as a means of affirming these foreign gods. The best explanation is that the poets were demonstrating that Yahweh was the one and only true God. In Psalm 29 it is not Baal, but rather Yahweh, who provides storm and rain. In this way, the psalmists appeal to those Israelites who were tempted to worship false gods to get what they wanted.

4. Promise and Pitfalls.

Familiarity with ancient Near Eastern materials can indeed lead to new insights and a richer reading of the psalms. Indeed, in the cases of Psalm 29 and Psalm 104, recognition of their connection to Near Eastern poems with similar imagery allows an identification of an apologetic function of these poems. Thus, we have noted the benefit of such study. However, there are also potential pitfalls that can result from an overzealous and uncontrolled reading of the psalms in relationship to ancient Near Eastern literature. Two examples may be cited in this regard.

S. Mowinckel commands respect for his many contributions to the study of the OT and the psalms. He is the scholar who more than anyone else reminded readers of the cultic setting of the psalms, for instance (see Cult, Worship: Psalms). However, he overused ancient Near Eastern analogies in order to propose a single Sitz im Leben for the psalms in an annual enthronement ceremony that purportedly took place on New Year. He argued this not so much on innerbiblical evidence but rather by positing an analogue with the Babylonian Akitu (New Year) festival. Though his views held sway and dominated discussion for years (and even today comprise a required episode in any narrative history of modern psalm interpretation), no scholar working in the area today would affirm his conclusions in this matter. The connection between the psalms and this particular ancient Near Eastern background was much too tenuous, and thus scholars recognize that Mowinckel's ideas were an imposition of ancient Near Eastern religious ideas on the OT.

A second cautionary tale may be told in connection with the work of M. Dahood. The central thesis of Dahood's approach to the book of Psalms is that the Hebrew needs to be rewritten in the light of discoveries in Northwest Semitic language (in particular Ugaritic, but toward the end of his career also Eblaite), including poetic devices and imagery. He maintained extremely high regard for the Hebrew consonants but low regard for the vocalization and word separation done by the Masoretes (AD 400-1000). He believed that through the rediscovery of ancient literature modern scholars now knew how to read the psalms better than the Massoretes did. Thanks to the critical work of J. Barr and others, it is now clear that Dahood overreached in his use of Near Eastern texts in interpreting the psalms, and so his conclusions do not enjoy significant support today.

Fortunately, today it appears that most modern academic commentaries on the psalms use the ancient Near Eastern material in a more judicious manner. Even so, it is necessary to evaluate each case on its own merits.

5. Conclusion.

We have observed a significant similarity in the form and style of the psalms and their ancient Near Eastern analogues. Even in the area of content, especially when measured by imagery, there is substantial connection. However, it is appropriate to conclude by highlighting the difference between the two traditions that must be borne in mind when comparing the two. The object of petition and worship is completely different. That is, psalms utilize the forms, style and imagery to worship Yahweh, whom they proclaim as the only legitimate deity in the universe.

See also CULT, WORSHIP: PSALMS; FORM CRITICISM; HYMNS; KINGSHIP PSALMS; LAMENT, PSALMS OF; LYRIC POETRY; ORAL POETRY; PSALMS 1: BOOK OF; THANKSGIVING, PSALMS OF.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. B. Albrektson, History and the Gods: An Essay on the Idea of Historical Events as Divine Manifestations in the Ancient Near East and in Israel (ConBOT 1; Lund: Gleerup, 1967); J. Assmann, Ägyptische Hymnen und Gebete (BAW; Zürich: Artemis, 1975); J. Barr, Comparative Philology and the Text of the Old Testament (Winona Lake, IN: Eisenbrauns, 1987); A. Barucq and F. Daumas, Hymnes et prières de l'Égypte ancienne (LAPO 10; Paris: Cerf, 1980); M. E. Cohen, The Canonical Lamentations of Ancient Mesopotamia (2 vols.; Potomac, MD: CDL Press, 1988); P. C. Craigie, "Psalm XXIX in the Hebrew Poetic Tradition," VT 22 (1972) 143-53; F. M. Cross, "Notes on a Canaanite Psalm in the Old Testament," BASOR 117 (1950) 19-23; A. H. W. Curtis, "The 'Subjugation of the Waters' Motif in the Psalms: Imagery or Polemic?" JSS 23 (1978) 244-56; M. Dahood, Psalms (3 vols.; AB 16, 17, 17A: Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1966-1970); E. R. Dalglisch, Psalm Fifty-One in the Light of Ancient Near Eastern Patternism (Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1962); J. Day, God's Conflict with the Dragon and the Sea: Echoes of a Canaanite Myth in the Old Testament (COP 35; Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1985); J. de Roos, "Hittite Prayers," in Civilizations of the Ancient Near East, vol. 3, ed. J. M. Sasson (New York: Scribner, 1995) 1997-2005; B. De Shong Meador, Inanna, Lady of Largest Heart: Poems of the Sumerian High Priestess Enhedu-anna (Austin: University of Texas Press, 2000); F. W. Dobbs-Allsopp, Weep, O Daughter of Zion: A Study of the City-Lament Genre in the Hebrew Bible (BibOr 44; Rome: Editrice Pontificio Istituto Biblico, 1993); A. Falkenstein and W. von Soden, Sumerische und akkadische Hymnen und Gebete (BAW; Zürich: Artemis, 1953); P. W. Ferris Jr., The Genre of Communal Lament in the Bible and the Ancient Near East (SBLDS 127; Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1992); B. R. Foster, Before the Muses: An Anthology of Akkadian Literature (3rd ed.; 2 vols.; Bethesda, MD: CDL Press, 2005); J. L. Foster, "The Hymn to Aten: Akhenaten Worships the Sole God," in Civilizations of the Ancient Near East, vol. 3, ed. J. M. Sasson (New York: Scribner, 1995a) 1751-61; idem, Hymns, Prayers, and Songs: An Anthology of Ancient Egyptian Lyric Poetry, ed. S. T. Hollis (SBLWAW 8; Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1995b); H. L. Ginsberg, "A Phoenician Hymn in the Psalter," in Atti del XIX Congresso Internazionale degli Orientalisti: Roma, 23-29 settembre 1935 (Rome: Tipografia del Senato, 1938) 472-76; W. W. Hallo, "Lamentations and Prayers in Sumer and Akkad," in Civilizations of the Ancient Near East, vol. 3, edited by J. Sasson (New York: Scribner, 1995) 1871-81; W. W. Hallo and J.-J. van Dijk, The Exaltation of Inanna (YNER 3; New Haven: Yale University Press, 1968); J. Hunt, "The Hymnic Introduction of Selected 'Suilla' Prayers Directed to Ea, Marduk, and Nabu" (Ph.D. diss.; Brandeis University, 1994); T. Jacobsen, "The Battle between Marduk and Tiamat," JAOS 88 (1968) 104-8; O. Keel, The Symbolism of the Biblical World: Ancient Near Eastern Iconography and the Book of Psalms (New York: Seabury Press, 1978); J. Klein, Three ÷ulgi Hymns: Sumerian Hymns Glorifying King ÷ulgi of Ur (BSNELC; Ramat-Gan: Bar-Ilan University Press, 1981); C. Kloos, Yhwh's Combat with the Sea: A Canaanite Tradition in the Religion of Ancient Israel (Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1986); J. L. Kugel, The Idea of Biblical Poetry (New Haven: Yale University Press, 1981); R. Kutscher, Oh Angry Sea (a-ab-ba hu-luh-ha): The History of a Sumerian Congregational Lament (YNER 6; New Haven: Yale University Press, 1975); R. Lebrun, Hymnes et prières hittites (HRel 4; Louvain-la-Neuve: Centre d'Histoire des Religions, 1980); T. Longman III, "The Psalms and Ancient Near Eastern Prayer Genres," in Interpreting the Psalms, ed. P. Johnston and D. Firth (Leicester: Inter-Varsity Press, 2005); P. D. Miller Jr., They Cried to the Lord: The Form and Theology of Biblical Prayer (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1994); S. Mowinkel, The Psalms in Israel's Worship (Nashville: Abingdon, 1962); D. B. Redford, "Ancient Egyptian Literature: An Overview," in Civilizations of the Ancient Near East, vol. 3, ed. J. M. Sasson (New York: Scribner, 1995) 2223-41; A. W. Sjöberg, E. Bergmann and G. B. Gragg, The Collection of Sumerian Temple Hymns (TCS 3; Locust Valley, NY: J. J. Augustin, 1969); K. van der Toorn, Sin and Sanction in Israel and Mesopotamia: A Comparative Study (SSN 22; Assen: Van Gorcum, 1985); idem, "Theology, Priests, and Worship in Canaan and Ancient Israel," in Civilizations of the Ancient Near East, vol. 3, ed. J. M. Sasson (New York: Scribner, 1995) 2043-58; M. Wakeman, God's Battle with the Monster: A Study in Biblical Imagery (Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1973); J. H. Walton, "Hymns, Prayers, and Incantations," in Ancient Israelite Literature in Its Cultural Context (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1989); W. G. E. Watson, Classical Hebrew Poetry: A Guide to Its Techniques (London: T & T Clark, 2005).

T. Longman III

PSALMS 3: HISTORY OF INTERPRETATION

Through the ages of the church the psalms have lived in its liturgy, praises and scholarship. They give evidence of God's kingship and his messiah's reign and enable the church to reflect upon its own response to that reign. This article explores the history of the interpretation of the psalms. Given the multitude of ways the psalms have been used, this article traces the history of interpretation as reflected in the scholarship of the church and leaves to other studies the exploration of the rich use of the psalms in liturgy and prayer, in literature and art.

1. Psalms in the New Testament
2. Psalms in Patristic Literature
3. Psalms in the Medieval Period
4. Psalms in the Reformation

5. Psalms in the Modern Period
6. Directions for the Future

1. Psalms in the New Testament.

The NT quotes extensively from the LXX text of Psalms, using the psalms in a variety of ways. One discovers the psalms used apologetically (e.g., Rom 3:4, 10-18; 4:7-8; 11:9-10) and as a basis for extended commentary (Heb 3:7-4:13). However, employing hermeneutical practices common to first-century Judaism, the early church uses the psalms primarily in a messianic sense, showing that the life, death and resurrection of Jesus fulfilled the predictions of the psalms for the coming *messiah.

This messianic, Christological reading occurs several ways. First, *David is presented in the NT as a prophet (Mt 22:43; Mk 12:36; Acts 2:30; 4:25), and Davidic psalms are presented as foretelling messianic events (Mt 22:43-45; Acts 2:25, 31; 4:11). Second, in the Gospel accounts Jesus quotes from the psalms (e.g., Mt 21:16 [Ps 8:2]; Mt 21:42; Mk 12:10; Lk 20:17 [Ps 118:22-23]; Mt 22:44-45; Mk 12:36-37; Lk 20:42-44 [Ps 110:1]), as do the Gospel writers (Mt 4:6; Lk 4:10-11 [Ps 91:11-12]; Mt 21:9; 23:39; Mk 11:9; Lk 13:35; 19:38; Jn 12:13 [Ps 118:25-26]). These quotations are given as evidence of the messiahship of Jesus. Third, the book of Acts uses the psalms to provide proof of Jesus' messiahship (Acts 2:25-28, 34-35 [Ps 16:8-11; 110:1]) and connects the continuing events of the early church to messianic psalms (Acts 4:10-11 [Ps 118:22-23]). Fourth, the presentation of Jesus as messiah is achieved by stringing together several psalms used as proof texts (e.g., Heb 1:5-13 [Ps 2:7; 104:4; 45:6-7; 102:25-27; 110:1]). In all of these ways the NT writers attest their conviction that Jesus is the messiah, and that this is predicted in the psalms.

2. Psalms in Patristic Literature.

2.1. Psalms in the Apostolic Fathers. The apostolic fathers continue the NT emphasis on the prophetic nature of the psalms. Barnabas 5:12 (citing Ps 22:21) names the psalmist as a prophet who foretells the death of Christ, and I Clement 16:15-16 (citing Ps 22:6-8) foretells his humble life. In I Clement 36:4-5 the author uses Psalm 22:7-8; 110:1 to make messianic claims in the same way the NT does.

The apostolic fathers also cite the psalms pastorally, exhorting ethical conduct and Christian service. For instance, Didache 3:7 (citing Ps 37:11) urges meekness of life, while Polycarp, To the Philippians 6:3 (citing Ps 2:11), urges fearful service of God.

In Barnabas 10—11 we discover allegorical interpretation of Psalm 1 similar to that found in the later fathers. First, the righteous man as a tree of life planted by streams of water is allegorical of a Christian's hope in the cross and descent into the waters of baptism. Second, the three types of wicked people to be avoided are given as the explanation of three types of foods to be avoided in the Mosaic *law—the law is the allegory now rightly explained in the key given in Psalm 1:1.

The apostolic fathers, in reading the psalms as prophecies foretelling Christ and as a resource for pastoral care and exhortation, reflect the interpretation of the NT and provide a hermeneutical bridge to the church fathers. Their allegorical reading is not found in the NT's interpretation of the psalms. This hermeneutic is, however, taken up in the later church fathers and subsequent interpretation until the modern period. In interpreting the psalms for the church, this becomes the indispensable method for over one thousand years.

2.2. Psalms in the Church Fathers. The church fathers refer to the psalms frequently in their apologetic, ethical and pastoral works as well as in commentaries. The fathers continue to read the psalms as prophecy, finding proof of Christ. Especially for the early church fathers, this often occurs in the context of apologetic argumentation with Jews and gnostics. Justin Martyr (Dial. 32—33) argues that Psalm 110 prophesied Christ's ascension and exaltation, and Psalm 22 is used by Justin Martyr (Dial. 98—106), Irenaeus (Haer. 4.20, 33) and Tertullian (Adv. Jud. 10) as prophetic proof of Christ's passion. Text-critical awareness formed a part of such argumentation. For instance, Tertullian and Justin Martyr, using a text of Psalm 96:10 that states that the Lord reigns "from the tree" (which was likely a Christian interpolation), argue that the Jews had altered the text for apologetic purposes.

In interpreting the psalms, the church fathers reflect the developing interpretive traditions of Alexandrian and Antiochene hermeneutics. Alexandrian exegesis, going beyond the text's literal meaning to its spiritual meaning, dominates patristic writing and later medieval work. Thus, in Enarrationes in Psalmos, in a homily on Psalm 120 (the first Psalm of Ascent), Augustine argues that these psalms speak of one who ascends upward in spiritual life, away from the “earthly, fragile, temporal objects” and toward God alone. Likewise, his homily on Psalm 114 reads the historical recital of the Israelites’ removal from Egypt as the Christian’s own movement out of the bondage of sin, or depicting the church’s doctrine of baptism. Jerome, although engaged with historical and grammatical questions (his Psalms translation from Hebrew to Latin provides the basic text for the Roman Catholic Church), moves beyond them to the spiritual meaning of the psalms, leaving behind what was considered the letter that kills for the true spiritual food of the Psalter.

Patristic interpretation includes the supercriptions of the Psalms (see Psalms 5: Titles), which are treated as part of the inspired psalm text. Authorship is not questioned but generally is ascribed to David as a prophet. Considered key to a correct interpretation of the psalm, these titles are given mystical, allegorical interpretations enabling the psalms of David to refer to Christ. The obscure musical notations, interpreted through an etymological and allegorical approach, are also given christological import. By this method, Jerome (Tract. Ps. 61) interprets the title phrase in Psalm 16, “A Miktam of David,” etymologically as indicative of the humility (from mākak, “be humiliated”) and perfection (tām) of Christ. This mystical interpretation of the titles was the norm until the modern era.

The church fathers are not unconcerned with psalm types and the shape of the book of Psalms. Athanasius (Ep. Marcell. 14) categorized the psalms as narrative, prayer, petition, thanksgiving, confession, prophecy, praise and exhortation, and Jerome (Tract. Ps. 1) reflects a tradition of reading Psalm 1 as introductory to the Psalter as a whole. These questions, which become paramount in modern interpretive methods, never gained a place of primary importance in this era; rather, the focus is on reading the psalms for their spiritual meaning, finding in them Christ and his church.

Some work of the Antiochene fathers on the psalms remains extant. Theodore of Mopsuestia produced a commentary on Psalms 1–81, using an approach similar to a modern grammatico-historical approach. Ascribing authorship to David, he argues that David spoke prophetically, but only of events concerning the nation of Israel, and only up to the Maccabean period; in other words, no psalm prophesied Christ, and psalms could apply to him only through analogous circumstances. Yet, despite his rejection of the allegorical method of the Alexandrians, Theodore was not totally free of it. His exegetical work on Psalm 45, which he deemed messianic (along with only Pss 2; 8; 110), is really an allegorical approach in which the king is Christ, and the bride is the church.

3. Psalms in the Medieval Period.

Medieval scholars are not noted for moving Psalms interpretation into fresh arenas. Instead, they reproduce the tradition of the fathers, amassing collections (called glosses) of nonannotated patristic comments that surround and interleave each psalm. Psalms exegesis in the medieval period follows the allegorical and spiritual readings of the church fathers, now fully expanded to fourfold interpretation (literal, allegorical, tropological, anagogical). Reading psalm titles as part of the inspired text, and applying to both titles and text the fourfold interpretive methods, these scholars saw the psalms everywhere speaking prophetically of the life, death and resurrection of the Christ. Additionally, the church is hermeneutically retrojected into the OT people of God, and the psalms are robbed of any historical placement in the life of the Israelites. For instance, in Psalm 52 the given historical setting is allegorically interpreted by the Venerable Bede (cited in Neal and Littledale 2.211), so that David becomes Christ, Saul becomes the persecuting Jew, and Doeg becomes Judas the traitor or the antichrist, while Ahimelech the priest stands as the elect church.

During the later medieval period fruitful interaction between some Christian and Jewish commentators (such as Nicholas of Lyra and Rashi in the twelfth century) refined knowledge of the Hebrew text. Text-critical issues in the Vulgate were addressed, with some interpreters questioning or rejecting the accepted Vulgate version. This interaction was at times married to a more Antiochene, literal method (as in Hugh and Andrew of St. Victor). However, neither the Antiochene influence, nor attention paid to the original text, was able to offset the centuries-long interpretive traditions of the fathers. It did, however, demonstrate the advantage to psalms study of the original languages and the results of a more literal hermeneutic, both of which were of great importance to the Reformers’ interpretation.

4. Psalms in the Reformation.

New interpretive methods of the Protestant Reformation reflect the atmosphere of learning contemporaneous to it. A retrieval of the original language of the psalms text, a concern for the historical setting of the psalms, and an effort to interpret the psalms by the biblical text alone, apart from the dogmas of the Roman Catholic Church, characterize this period. The two great Reformers, Luther and Calvin, are indicative of these efforts.

Luther's introduction to his first lecture series on the psalms and his lectures and homilies on selected psalms reveal his interpretive strategies; Calvin's work is contained in his commentary on the book of Psalms. Luther still interprets to discover the fourfold meaning of the text, allowing (theoretically, at least) for spiritual readings only if the same truth is elsewhere stated historically. When Psalm 17:7 speaks of "those who withstand Thy right hand," the passage is first allegorical, for Christ is the right hand and power of God (as also noted in Ps 118:16), second tropological, for the right hand is the merit of Christians experienced in life through the gracious work of God, and third analogical, for the right hand is the awarding of glory in the future (as argued from Mt 25:33-34) (Luther 10.111). Yet the overriding interpretive principal is that every psalm speaks prophetically of Christ and, by extension, the church conformed to Christ in all things. By this method the righteous man of Psalm 1 is both Christ and the church, which righteously rejects the ways of all the ungodly. Calvin, on the other hand, rejected allegorical interpretation, seeking the literal meaning of the text through grammatical and historical analysis. However, he moves beyond the text's literal meaning by finding in the psalms types of Christ and the church. In this way, Psalm 2 is interpreted according to David's historical reign but is interpreted typically as true prediction of Christ (Calvin 1.11).

The Reformers affirm the prophetic nature of the psalms and the traditional authorship ascriptions. Yet Calvin (3.159) can consider Psalm 74 (an Asaphite psalm [see Asaph and Sons of Korah]) possibly originating in the exilic or Antiochene period. However, he does not argue vehemently for such possibilities; his interests lie instead in interpreting the psalms for pastoral application. Both Reformers reject the etymological and allegorical interpretation of the psalm titles, allowing that many of the terms are obscure and likely are musical notations.

Calvin (1.xxxvii-xxxix) exhibits the deep pastoral sense of the Reformers in their work with the psalms. He gives the several pastoral purposes of the psalms in the preface to his commentary: inner contemplation, instruction in prayer, praise, holy living and the knowledge of eternal salvation. Both Luther and Calvin use the psalms to exhort believers in practical living.

5. Psalms in the Modern Period.

5.1. The Eighteenth Century: Hebrew Poetry. Up to the eighteenth century, psalms interpretation continued in the medieval and Reformation interpretive traditions, but increasingly in the eighteenth century the application of historical assumptions and approaches moved scholarly interpretation away from the dominant model of spiritual interpretation. In 1753 R. Lowth, professor of poetry at Oxford University, published his lectures on the psalms as De sacra poesi Hebraeorum. His concerns are not theological but rather literary and historical, and they express themselves in two interpretive claims. First, as ancient poetry, the psalms must be read in light of their historical and cultural setting—a hermeneutic that became increasingly important in psalms interpretation throughout the modern period. Second, he explores the form of Hebrew poetry, most particularly the *parallelism of poetic lines. His formulation of synonymous, antithetic and synthetic parallelisms delineates the discussion of Hebrew poetry for the modern period, with little major advance until J. Kugel's The Idea of Biblical Poetry in 1981.

Lowth still holds to Davidic authorship of the psalms but moves away from the allegorical interpretation of the fathers. Instead, he speaks of a "mystical allegory" that allows the literal meaning to remain alongside a typological reading that, as prophecy, points forward to the Christ.

5.2. The Nineteenth Century: Historical-Critical Interpretation. Historical concerns dominate this century's psalms study. Consequently, authorship, occasion, date, Psalter formation, and Hebrew linguistics and grammar form the discussion (see Historical Criticism). The supercriptions' historical value is generally discounted, and new historical settings are considered as Davidic authorship is relinquished in whole or in part. W. de Wette's 1811 commentary rejects Davidic authorship and an early date for the psalms, and most critical scholars in the century follow suit to one degree or another. F. Delitzsch (1867), G. H. A. von Ewald (1880) and J. J. S. Perowne (1882) each credit some of the psalms to Davidic authorship (Delitzsch allows for fifty psalms, von Ewald that some of the ledāwīd psalms [Pss 3—41] could be Davidic, Perowne that the majority of these psalms were Davidic). Most discount the historical settings in the superscriptions and place many psalms in the exilic and postexilic eras. The Maccabean era is considered a locus of composition because an evolutionary idea of religion posited that such individual expressions of faith must stem from a later, developed, internalized religion. T. K. Cheyne (1888), a most extreme expression of this idea, denies in toto the reliability of the superscriptions and their authorial designations, placing the Psalter's composition almost totally in the Maccabean era. By the late nineteenth century, however, commentators such as C. A. Briggs and S. R. Driver question the reasonableness of such wholesale late composition, and though Maccabean psalms are not discounted a priori, the claim is increasingly considered unjustifiable.

Not all commentators move from the precritical stance toward authorship and the reliability of the superscriptions. M. A. Schimmelpenninck, in her work of 1821 and 1825, is aware of the new historical-critical theories but rejects them, as does E. W. Hengstenberg in 1842. In these few authors the historical-critical wave is resisted but not stemmed.

The process of the Psalter's composition is commonly discussed in the commentaries of this period. Most recognize the discrete collections in the Psalter (such as the Davidic Psalms [Pss 3—41; 51—72], the Asaphite collection [Pss 78—83], Psalms of Ascent [Pss 120—134]) and posit an expanding Psalter from the early (and possibly Davidic) period to the postexilic period and even the Maccabean period. Widespread recognition of the fivefold book pattern continues in this era, but little attention is given to the themes and theologies of each collection; this is left to a later period.

Psalms interpretation also benefits in this era from advances in Hebrew grammar and philology, and text-critical studies. Commentators such as von Ewald, Briggs and Delitzsch bring these advances to their commentaries in an attempt to more fully illuminate the original setting and meaning of the psalms. This pursuit also evidences itself in strictly grammatical studies of the Psalter, such as J. J. Greswell's 1873 Grammatical Analysis of the Hebrew Psalter, produced for use by students preparing for entry to Oxford's divinity school. This work demonstrates a prevailing mood in scholarship that historical and cultural understanding was basic to a correct interpretation of the psalms.

Finally, the allegorical method was largely eschewed in this period. With the loosening or relinquishment of Davidic authorship and the concomitant prophetic nature of the Psalter, many psalms that had been interpreted christologically and messianically throughout church history were no longer so interpreted. Although the church generally had read the messianic psalms (identified variously as Pss 2; 45; 72; 110, etc.) prophetically and christologically, many historical-critical commentators did not. Rather, they argued, these psalms spoke of an earthly king such as David or another earthly king. For some interpreters, however, these messianic psalms could also form an ideal of a king, which ideal Christ subsequently realizes (Driver, Briggs and Briggs), or present a type with a promised antitype (Perowne, Kirkpatrick, Delitzsch), or a messianic hope settled on the Davidic line, which hope was gradually transferred to the future (Delitzsch on Pss 110; 45; 72; 132).

5.3. The Twentieth Century: Form-Critical Interpretation. The historical-critical approaches of the nineteenth century continue into the twentieth century and to the present day. However, in the 1920s and 1930s a new interpretive approach to the psalms revolutionized psalms interpretation. H. Gunkel's form-critical approach (see Form Criticism) moves the locus of interpretation from the historic questions of authorship and occasion to questions of psalm forms and the life setting (Sitz im Leben) of the various forms. Grouping the psalms in form typologies (Gattungen), Gunkel demonstrates the uniformity and variance within these forms. Each form is given a life setting in the cult (see Cult, Worship: Psalms) as both individuals and community participate in ritual acts in response to life experiences. The forms were as ancient as the cult itself, but later, imitative psalms were also composed by pious poets for individual use outside of the cult setting. Originating in the seventh century, before the collapse of the state of Judah, these private spiritual songs became especially popular in the postexilic period. So in-fluent was Gunkel's form-critical approach that virtually all subsequent critical commentaries take up his psalm-form typology, although not without modification (most notably, C. Westermann's Praise and Lament in the Psalms redesignates Gunkel's four main categories of psalm types).

Of note in Gunkel's study is his treatment of royal psalms (which, he argued, were Pss 2; 18; 20; 21; 45; 72; 101; 110; 132; 144:1-11) (see King-ship Psalms). Belonging to the monarchic period, these royal psalms arose out of specific historical situations (such as a royal wedding, or praise for a military victory). The most frequent life setting of these psalms, however, is a royal enthronement festival, which, he posited, took place annually during the fall of the year. The psalms that were sung at the festival (Pss 2; 21; 72; 110) evolved into an eschatological interpretation once the monarchy failed.

Gunkel's theory of the cultic Sitz im Leben and an annual royal enthronement festival is furthered by his student S. Mowinckel. Using the New Year's enthronement festival of Mesopotamian and Canaanite literature as a model, he argues for a similar festival in Israel. The cult participants used the yhwh mālāk psalms (Pss 93; 96—99 [Mowinckel translates yhwh mālāk as "YHWH is become king"]) to reenact the cosmic, mythic enthronement of Yahweh. Mowinckel argues that much of the Psalter was used in this hypothetical festival. Although Mowinckel's thesis is largely discounted today as overly speculative and without support in the Historical Books, some commentators have followed a similar line by situating psalms in a cultic festival. A. Weiser's 1962 commentary situates Psalms in an autumnal festival of covenant renewal, and H.-J. Kraus's 1978 (ET 1988) commentary situates them in an autumnal royal *Zion festival celebrating the divine founding of the Davidic dynasty and God's choice of Jerusalem.

5.4. The Twentieth Century: Continuing Historical-Critical Interpretation. Despite Gunkel's emphasis on the study of the form and life setting of the psalms, not all scholars since then have made these concerns their focus. Some continue the historical-critical questions of author, date, occasion, language and Psalter formation. For instance, M. Battenwieser's 1938 commentary (ET 1969) arranges the Psalter chronologically, dating the psalms from the period of Joshua until the Persian period and allowing for a few psalms authored by David. He questions the validity of form criticism's findings, as well as the theory of a cultic festival of enthronement. M. Goulder, in a series of studies from 1982 to 1998, also works within a historical-critical paradigm but with an awareness and use of form-critical categories. He argues that the psalm headings, though late and often erroneous, did contain some authentic historical record. By these, Goulder argues that the Psalter as it stands proceeds chronologically from the Davidic era to the postexilic era and, for the lēdāwīd psalms, speaks of historical moments in the life of David. Defending his return to a largely traditional reading of the psalms' date and setting, he urges that his claim is not due to fundamentalist biblicism but rather is supported by the internal evidence in the Psalter itself. Some conservative psalms commentators, such as H. C. Leupold (1959) and D. Kidner (1973; 1975), continue to hold to traditional ascriptions of authorship. For each, the superscriptions are later editorial interpolations yet contain authentic memories of historical setting and authorship. However, even these more traditional stances on the historical-critical questions are not conducted without attention to the influence of Gunkel's form-critical approach.

Another interpretive method that merits notice in this era is the comparative philology spurred by the mythic and poetic texts found at Ugarit. M. Dahood's Anchor Bible commentaries (1965-1970) give a fresh translation of the psalms, together with a philological commentary that seeks to resolve many of the textual anomalies and difficult Hebrew words and phrases by comparison to Ugaritic. On the strength of the epigraphic evidence, Dahood argues that the psalms are preexilic, and that some (Pss 2; 16; 18; 29; 60; 68; 72; 108; 110) may have been composed in the Davidic era; none date from the Maccabean era. Dahood's commentary has been criticized for too enthusiastically attempting to solve all the difficult passages in Psalms with supposed Ugaritic phrases and parallels, but his methodology has not been totally rejected, as is evidenced by P. Craigie's more moderate application of this method in 1983.

5.5. The Twentieth Century: Reading the Psalms as a Whole. Over the last thirty years the trend in the study of Psalms has shifted once again. Rather than focusing interpretive efforts on the history behind the psalms (of author and occasion, or of cultic setting or form), the trend has moved to consider the psalms not as disparate units but rather as comprising a whole book shaped intentionally and theologically by its editors, often in the postexilic period and later (see Editorial Criticism).

Awareness of the book as a whole is not a new enterprise. Throughout the history of interpretation attention has been given to the collections within Psalms (such as the Korah, Asaph or Ascents collections), the Psalter's five-book structure with its doxological conclusions to each book, as well as the introductory nature of Psalms 1—2 and the conclusive nature of Psalm 150. Driver, in the nineteenth century, traced concatenations of words in some contiguous psalms as evidence of redactional activity in shaping the collection. But these piecemeal observations had little sense of the book's overall structure, much less a theology that informed that structuring.

The seedbed of this method was prepared by several scholars (such as B. Childs [1979], who argued that Ps 1 was a Torah-focused introduction to the collection, intentionally directing the individual to read the collection for the purpose of personal reading, study and meditation), but it was G. H. Wilson's The Editing of the Hebrew Psalter (1985) and subsequent work that particularly spurred this approach. Wilson argued that the Psalter was shaped by the presence of both explicit and nonexplicit editorial markings, such as the doxologies, the terminology found in the superscriptions, and markings at the "seams" of the five books. Theologically, the Psalter's structure recognized the apparent failure of the Davidic covenant (books 1-3), and in light of that failure books 4-5 held this Davidic hope in tension with the call of wisdom to dependent trust in Yahweh alone as king.

Wilson's efforts to read the shape of the Psalter under the twin themes of royal covenant and Torah wisdom are taken up by many scholars. For instance, both J. L. Mays (1987; 1994) and J. C. McCann (1993a) work with the canonical Psalter, discerning its shape by these twin themes. For Mays, the royal and wisdom themes are introduced in the dual introduction of Psalms 1—2 to the whole Psalter, and each psalm must be read in the dual light of God's sovereign reign and the instruction of the Torah. McCann also reads the whole Psalter through this dual theme introduced in Psalms

1—2. He also takes into consideration form-critical interpretation, reading Psalms as presenting three types of instruction for life under God's sovereignty: psalms of instruction for praise, prayer and profession.

Each of these scholars attempts to read the "story" or "theme" of the Psalter, just as one would do for other biblical books. This "story" arises out of the redactor's own social and historical setting and can be exegeted accordingly. One recent study that attempts such an exegesis is N. L. deClaissé Walford's Reading from the Beginning (1997). Her study takes up the shape presented by Wilson but focuses additionally on the purpose of such shaping in the postexilic community, positing the book as a rationale for continued existence of the surviving postexilic community. Answering the questions of "Who are we?" (books 1-3) and "What are we to do?" (books 4-5), the Psalter charges the community to remember their identification as the people of Yahweh and his Torah. It is this sense of identity that imparts hope for continued existence in difficult circumstances, enabling, finally, the praise in Psalm 150.

Other attempts to read the "story" of the Psalter proceed without deClaissé Walford's exegesis of the redactional community. W. Brueggemann (1984; 1991) reads the psalms canonically and rhetorically for a contemporary audience, without concern for the Psalter's message to the redactor's community. Discerning broad movement in the psalms from obedience to Torah in the midst of suffering (the focus of Pss 1—72) to praise (the focus of Pss 73—150), he asks how the message speaks to those experiencing contemporary crises of experience with God. The pivot point in which the movement from obedience to praise is accomplished is Psalm 73, where the doubting sufferer encounters Yahweh in his temple and reawakens hope and the reality of trustful communion with God.

Finally, another example, from D. C. Mitchell (1997), demonstrates continuing work on the canonical shape of the Psalter. Rather than seeing a Psalter shaped by Davidic covenant and Torah, Mitchell argues that it bears an eschatological shape. Comparing the Psalter to the eschatological program in Zechariah 9—14 and other prophets, he discerns the same program in the Psalter. This program proceeds through the whole Psalter and includes such eschatological events as the bridegroom-king who comes to Zion (Ps 45), the gathering of scattered Israel to Jerusalem (Ps 50), the gathering of hostile nations against Jerusalem (Pss 73–83) and the final rescue of Israel by their king-messiah (Ps 110).

6. Directions for the Future.

The exploration of the redactional shape and theology of the Psalter remains a fruitful field of inquiry. Although the historical reconstruction of the redactional setting could become overly speculative, and some critical self-assessment must be maintained in the observation of the marks of redactional activity, R. N. Whybray's (1996) negative assessment of the attempts may be premature because the method does continue to refine its approach, determining means of critical self-assessment. Certainly, its theological and canonical appeal remains an exciting resource for churchly interpretation.

Historical-critical and form-critical approaches, though no longer enjoying the focused attention of the twentieth century, will remain means by which the text is examined. The persistence of the historical component throughout the history of interpretation of the psalms makes it unlikely that such questions will be neglected. Positivistic conclusions regarding authorship, occasion, date and the superscriptions' reliability have long been set aside, but the fact of the inclusion of the superscriptions in the canonical Psalter will continue to legitimately bring these questions into the interpretive process, particularly as interpreters question in what way these superscriptions should shape the reading of the text.

As the questions of modernity are succeeded by the questions of postmodernity and the multiplicity of interpretive perspectives currently undertaken, one of the effects upon Psalms study is to reengage the precritical interpreters. Can the interpretive approaches of the church fathers and the medieval era be taken up again? Can these methods be reincorporated as new attention is paid to the theological shape of the Psalter and a more nonhistorical, reader-oriented interpretive process is explored—especially since theological and reader-oriented readings were hallmarks of the precritical interpreters? How might (or should) precritical concerns and methods be shaped by interpreters who have themselves been shaped by the critical traditions? What theological insights of these interpreters should mark current interpretive efforts? These are questions being engaged by scholars such as B. E. Daley (2003) and may see a new respect for the concerns of the precritical interpreters and perhaps also a nuanced reincorporation of their theological approach.

Finally, the history of interpretation of the psalms will continue to engage the crucial element of the interpreter as one addressed by these very personal poems of encounter with God. As has been the question of the interpretive work through the centuries, How do these words addressed to God become God's word to people? The psalms continue to speak, and the interpreter must wrestle with them to correctly hear and respond to that message.

See also DEAD SEA SCROLLS; FEMINIST INTERPRETATION; FORM CRITICISM; HERMENEUTICS; HISTORICAL CRITICISM; MEGILLOT AND FESTIVALS; PSALMS 1: BOOK OF; PSALMS 2: ANCIENT NEAR EASTERN BACKGROUND; SOCIAL-SCIENTIFIC APPROACHES; TARGUMIM.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. Apostolic Fathers, (2 vols.; LCL; Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1976-1977); C. A. Briggs and E. G. Briggs, A Critical and Exegetical Commentary on the Book of Psalms (2 vols.; Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1906); W. Brueggemann, The Message of the Psalms (Minneapolis: Augsburg, 1984); idem, "Bounded by Obedience and Praise: The Psalms as Canon," JSOT 50 (1991) 63-92; M. Buitenwieser, Psalms Chronologically Treated, with a New Translation (New York: KTAV, 1969); J. Calvin, Calvin's Commentaries, 4-6: Commentary on the Book of Psalms, 1-5 (repr., Grand Rapids: Baker, 1979); T. K. Cheyne, The Book of Psalms or The Praises of Israel: A New Translation, with Commentary (London: Kegan Paul, Trench, 1888); idem, The Origin and Religious Contents of The Psalter in the Light of Old Testament Criticism and the History of Religions (London: Kegan Paul, Trench, Trübner, 1891); B. S. Childs, "Reflections on the Modern Study of the Psalms," in Magnalia Dei: The Mighty Acts of God; Essays on the Bible and Archaeology in Memory of G. Ernest Wright, ed. F. M. Cross (Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1976) 377-88; idem, Introduction to the Old Testament as Scripture (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1979); P. C. Craigie, Psalms 1-50 (WBC 19; Waco: Word, 1983); M. Dahood, Psalms (3 vols.; AB 16, 17, 17A; Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1965-1970); B. E. Daley, "Is Patristic Exegesis Still Usable? Some Reflections on Early Christian Interpretation of the Psalms," in The

Art of Reading Scripture, ed. E. F. Davis and R. B. Hays (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2003) 69-88; N. L. deClaissé-Walford, Reading from the Beginning: The Shaping of the Hebrew Psalter (Macon, GA: Mercer University Press, 1997); R. J. Defer-rari, ed., The Fathers of the Church: A New Translation, vols. 48, 57 (Washington, DC: Catholic University of America Press, 1963, 1965); F. Delitzsch, Biblical Commentary on the Psalms, vol. 1. (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1949); W. de Wette, Commentar über die Psalmen (Heidelberg: Mohr & Zimmer, 1811); S. R. Driver, Studies in the Psalms, ed. C. F. Burney (London: Hodder & Stoughton, 1915); idem, An Introduction to the Literature of the Old Testament (repr., Cleveland: World Publishing Company, 1963 [1891]); J. Eaton, Kingship and the Psalms (Naperville, IL: Allenson, 1976); M. Goulder, The Prayers of David (Psalms 51-72): Studies in the Psalter, II (JSOTSup 102; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1990); J. J. Greswell, Grammatical Analysis of the Hebrew Psalter (Oxford: J. Parker, 1873); H. Gunkel, The Psalms: A Form-Critical Introduction (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1967 [1930]); E. W. Hengstenberg, Commentary on the Psalms (3 vols.; Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1846); R. C. Hill, Theodore of Mopsuestia: Commentary on Psalms 1-81; Translated with an Introduction and Notes (SBLWGW 5; Atlanta: Society of Biblical Literature, 2006); W. L. Holladay, The Psalms Through Three Thousand Years: Prayerbook of a Cloud of Witnesses (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1996); D. Kidner, Psalms 1-72: An Introduction and Commentary on Books I & II of the Psalms (TOTC; London: Inter-Varsity Press, 1973); idem, Psalms 73-150: A Commentary on Books III-V of the Psalms (TOTC; London: Inter-Varsity Press, 1975); A. F. Kirkpatrick, The Book of Psalms (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1902); H.-J. Kraus, Psalms 1-59: A Commentary (Minneapolis: Augsburg, 1988 [1978]); idem, Psalms 60-150: A Commentary (Minneapolis: Augsburg, 1989 [1978]); J. L. Kugel, The Idea of Biblical Poetry: Parallelism and Its History (New Haven: Yale University Press, 1981); H. C. Le-upold, Exposition of the Psalms (Grand Rapids: Baker, 1959); R. Lowth, Lectures on the Sacred Poetry of the Hebrews (1787) (2 vols.; Anglistica & Americana 43; repr., Hildesheim: G. Olms, 1969); M. Luther, Luther's Works, vols. 10-11, ed. H. C. Oswald; vols. 12-14, ed. J. Pelikan (St. Louis: Concordia, 1955-1976); J. L. Mays, "The Place of the Torah-Psalms in the Psalter," JBL 106 (1987) 3-12; idem, The Lord Reigns: A Theological Handbook to the Psalms (Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 1994); J. C. McCann, A Theological Introduction the Book of Psalms (Nashville: Abingdon, 1993a); idem, ed., The Shape and Shaping of the Psalter (JSOTSup 159; Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1993b); D. C. Mitchell, The Message of the Psalter: An Eschatological Programme in the Book of Psalms (JSOTSup 252; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1997); S. Mowinckel, The Psalms in Israel's Worship (2 vols.; New York: Abingdon, 1967); J. M. Neale and R. F. Littledale, eds., A Commentary on the Psalms: From Primitive and Mediaeval Writers; And from the Various Office-books and Hymns of the Roman, Mozarabic, Ambrosian, Gallican, Greek, Coptic, Armenian, and Syriac Rites (4 vols.; New York: AMS Press, 1976); R. J. Payne, Athanasius: The Life of Antony and the Letter to Marcellinus (Classics of Western Spirituality; New York: Paulist, 1980); J. J. S. Perowne, The Book of Psalms: A New Translation with Introductions and Notes Explanatory and Critical (2 vols.; Andover, MA: W. F. Draper, 1882); A. Roberts and J. Donaldson, eds., The Ante-Nicene Fathers: Translations of the Writings of the Fathers Down to A.D. 325 (10 vols.; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1979-1986); P. Schaff, ed., A Select Library of the Nicene and Post-Nicene Fathers of the Christian Church (repr., Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1956); M. A. Schimmelpenninck, Psalms According to the Authorized Version; With Prefatory Titles and Tabular Index of Scriptural References from the Port Royal Authors, Marking the Circumstances and Chronologic Order of Their Composition; To Which Is Added, an Essay upon the Psalms, and Their Spiritual Application (London: J. & A. Arch, 1825); B. Smalley, The Study of the Bible in the Middle Ages (Notre Dame, IN: University of Notre Dame Press, 1964); G. H. A. von Ewald, Commentary on the Psalms (2 vols.; London: Williams & Norgate, 1880-1881); A. Weiser, The Psalms (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1962); C. Westermann, Praise and Lament in the Psalms, (Atlanta: John Knox, 1981); R. N. Whybray, Reading the Psalms as a Book (JSOTSup 222; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1996); G. H. Wilson, The Editing of the Hebrew Psalter (SBLDS 76; Chico, CA: Scholars Press, 1985).

L. Wray Beal

PSALMS 4: TITLES

The titling of the psalms provides notes about composition and performance, often using untranslatable technical terms. Scholars divide over whether the titles are authentic, especially in regard to authorship and the historical notes attached to fourteen of the Davidic psalms.

1. Problems
2. Title Information

1. Problems.

1.1. Meaning of Technical Terms. Many technical terms remain untranslatable, as frequent recourse to transliteration indicates. Some seek a universal key. For example, J. Thirtle linked gittit with the gat ("wine press") and thus to the harvest festival of Tabernacles and then tried to link other unidentified terms to particular festivals. H. Gunkel (350) identified gittit as a gentilic and then reasoned, "Other substantives ending with t should also be conceived as nomen gentili-ca." Gunkel (349) also noted "commonalities" in the terms; so after translating binginôt as "with stringed instruments" and noting the proximity of references to musical instruments, he generalized that terms such as this "relate to musical performance."

1.2. Authenticity of Titles.

1.2.1. Different Views of Authenticity. S. Mowinkel (2.100-101) calls the historical notes "midrash . . . unhistorical, speculative exegesis of disconnected details." B. Childs (521-22) sees them as an authoritative, though secondary, setting for the psalms, a community act of reinterpretation, universalizing each individual psalm by "relating it to the history of David as a representative man." But if these titles were midrashic additions, we would expect them to match something obvious in the psalm itself. And if these titles were to "Davidify" the Psalter, we would have expected far more of them to be titled "by David," as we see in the LXX, and we would have expected far more mention of instances from the life of *David. Evangelical scholarship generally attributes significant authority to the titles. D. Kidner (1973, 33) even appears to treat them as inspired, canonical Scripture, noting that the NT even builds arguments on authorship notes (e.g., Mk 12:35-37; Acts 2:29-36 [using Ps 110:1]; Acts 13:35-37 [using Ps 16:10]).

1.2.2. Problems for Authenticity. Various problems cast a shadow over the authenticity of the historical and authorial notes. First, some doubt that composing psalms is what one might expect of David when he was hiding in caves and fighting Philistines (Ps 57:1; 142:1). The reply to this is that those hardships were the occasioning incidents for these psalms, like the World War I trenches that provoked the poetry of soldiers such as Robert Graves, Wilfred Owen and Siegfried Sassoon and their French and German counterparts. Second, some see historical tension with OT and broader ancient Near Eastern history. Psalm 56 says that David composed it "when the Philistines seized him in Gath"; however, the historical record says that David took himself to the king of Gath to escape Saul (1 Sam 21:10; 27:1-3). But note that David began to fear the king of Gath, feigned insanity, and "escaped to the cave of Adullam" (1 Sam 21:12-23:1). Several Davidic psalms mention the temple, before his son *Solomon built it; however, the tabernacle could be called "the LORD's house" (Josh 6:24) or "the LORD's temple" (1 Sam 1:9). Supposedly late Aramaisms in the Psalter no longer seem such a problem: "Aramaic" loan words appear in Ugaritic texts from hundreds of years before David's time, and liturgical materials may have been updated lexically from time to time. Third, some say that the third-person reference in the psalm titles seems incongruent with the first-person reference in the psalm itself. That would not necessarily even undermine Davidic authorship of these titles, since the psalm text itself sometimes refers to David in the third person, probably dealing with his official position as "the king" (Pss 21; 61; 63; 110). And it does even less to undermine the titles' authenticity if we accept that the titles were authentic canonical editorial activity like we see elsewhere in the OT (e.g., Num 12:3; Deut 34).

1.2.3. Support for Authenticity. As to the issue of Davidic authorship, we do well to note that the normal ancient Near Eastern practice acknowledged the king as patron of the cultus; indeed, the OT knows David as Israel's poet-singer par excellence (e.g., 1 Sam 16:14-23; 2 Sam 23:1-7; 1 Chron 6:31; 15:16; 16:7; 25:1; 29:30; Ps 18 = 2 Sam 22; Ezra 3:10; Neh 12:24-47).

Intertestamental material continued this line of thought (Sir 47:8-10), and the LXX expanded the list of Davidic titles by fourteen (Pss 33; 43; 71; 91; 93-99; 104; 137; 151), with Ps 151 being a "supernumerary" (exôthen tou arithmou) but still the genuine article (idiographos) (Ps 151:1). Josephus states that David "composed songs and hymns to God in varied meters" (Josephus Ant. 7:305-306), and Philo reports that David "sang/wrote hymns [hymneō] to God" (Philo Conf. 149).

This continued into the NT. Jesus himself

built arguments that hinged upon Davidic authorship (Mt 22:41-46 [using Ps 110:1]), as did Peter (Acts 2:25-29 [using Ps 16:8-11]). Finally, two psalms are called Davidic even though their titles did not show it in the Hebrew (Heb 4:7 [using Ps 95:7-8]) or even in the LXX (Acts 4:25-26 [using Ps 2:1-2]).

One final note supporting authenticity is the LXX's confusion over many of the titles' technical terms. It appears that the titles were already old enough that various archaic technical terms had already fallen out of use when the LXX translators saw them.

1.3. Superscript or Postscript? Thirtle (4-5, 10-16) first developed the idea that anything preceding the literary genre and author was actually a postscript for the previous psalm, like the pattern observed in Habakkuk's prayer (Hab 3:1, 19). B. Waltke (586) defined it similarly, saying that the superscript contained information about composition, and the postscript about performance. Waltke (589-95) compiled evidence:

1. Egyptian hymns incorporate colophons (see ANET, 365, 367, 370, 371).
2. Hymns outside the Psalter use that pattern (Hab 3:1, 19; Is 38:9-10, 20b).
3. Psalm 3/4 could match the superscript-subscript pattern of Habakkuk 3; Isaiah 38.
4. The narrative equivalent of Psalm 18:1 lacks the "putative postscript" (2 Sam 22:1).
5. The identification of lamnaššēah ("for the choir master") as a subscript of Psalm 41, rather than the start of the superscript for Psalm 42, retains the sharp change from "psalm of David" that occurs throughout all of book 1 (Pss 3—41) to the Korahite psalms of book 2.
6. Identifying everything up to "A maskil of Heman the Ezrahite" as the postscript for Psalm 87 solves the apparent double titling for Psalm 88.
7. Potential subscripts match language in their own psalm (e.g., Ps 56:1, cf. Ps 55:7, 8).
8. The LXX differed from the MT in its handling of this information in some psalms (Pss 104—106; 111—117).
9. 11QPs^a has a postscript for Psalm 145.
10. Psalm 148b-c may have introduced Psalm 149.
11. With the exception of the textually corrupt superscript of Psalm 88, "for the choir master" always appears as the first element in superscripts in the present Psalter's arrangement, which would allow for consistent assignment of this and what follows as postscripts for their preceding psalm.

Kidner (1973, 42) made cautious use of the postscript idea. For example, he noted that the LXX alloiōthēsomenōn of Psalms 45; 69; 80 vocalized the Hebrew not as "lilies" (šōšannim) but rather as "those who change" (šēššōnim); so he said that L. Delekat was on track with his reference to "those whose situation changes for the worse," which he referred back to Psalm 44 (citing Delekat, 294-95 on Pss 44—45). Kidner (1973, 43) wondered if "doves" (Ps 56:1) might be a postscript for the previous psalm, which mentions doves (Ps 55:6-7). Kidner (1973, 181 n. 1) also noted that the final word of Psalm 48:14 is al-mūt, which, if joined, as many Hebrew manuscripts do, "can be revocalized as olāmōt, 'evermore,' as in the LXX, Vulg." If so, that would be an example of an intact postscript retained in Psalms. As did Waltke, Kidner (1975, 317) noted that this could solve the double-titling of Psalm 88. All in all, these arguments make a case for suggesting that everything up to the note of literary genre or authorship may be postscript for the previous psalm.

2. Title Information.

2.1. Postscripts: Performance Directions.

2.1.1. General Directions. (1) lamnaššēah, "for the choir master," occurs fifty-five times in psalm titles (Pss 4—6; 8; 9; 11—14; 18—22; 31; 36; 39—42; 44—47; 49; 51—62; 64—70; 75—77; 80; 81; 84; 85; 88; 109; 139; 140 [or postscript for the psalm preceding each of those]) and once in Habakkuk 3:19. Translations tend toward "for the leader" or "choir master," understanding this Piel participle of nāšaḥ to refer to "supervision" (e.g., Ezra 3:8-9), in this case supervising musicians (e.g., 1 Chron 15:21). The LXX has eis to telos ("to the end"), from its Niphal or its nominal form nēsaḥ ("duration" [e.g., Jer 8:5]). The rabbis translated it either way: "to the Eternal" (Midr. Ps. 139) or "for the leader" (Midr. Ps. 140).

(2) selā, generally transliterated, is not a title, but it falls in the class of performance directions like those given in psalm titles. It occurs seventy-one times in Psalms, and three times in Habakkuk's prayer (Hab 3:3, 9, 13). The LXX rendered this diapsalma, referring to an interlude with musical instruments (cf. the Persian salā ["song, sound of string"]). Since Thirtle, it has been common to treat it as a stanza marker serving "the purpose of the modern" (Thirtle, 145); however, it sometimes interrupts the flow of thought (e.g., Ps 55:19-20; 68:7-8, 32-33; 85:2-3; Hab 3:3, 9). Some suggest that the term comes from sālal ("raise")—for example, to raise the pitch or volume of the singing. For example, B. Edwards (72, 77) says that it indicates "the expression of very strong, earnest feeling" in "an urgent appeal to God," and Edwards (73-79) suggests that it called for singing at full force with trumpet accompaniment, like the priestly "reminder" trumpets that accompanied some sacrifices (e.g., Lev 23:24; Num 10:9-10). Its omission never impairs the meaning of the passage, so it is common to remove it typographically from the flow of the text, often to the right margin, whether transliterated as usual or translated (e.g., "pause" [NJB] or "interlude" [NLT]).

(3) higgāyôn, generally transliterated, does not occur in the psalm titles, but it appears to be a musical performance direction, and in Psalm 9:16 it immediately precedes selā. If we see it as a way of playing a string instrument (Ps 92:3), we might arrive at something like Mowinckel's "musical flourish" (Mowinckel, 2.211; so also BDB); however, if we connect it with the use of the term higgāyôn for "whispers" (Lam 3:62) or "meditation" (Ps 19:14), we might arrive at something like a psalm sung sotto voce, which we see in various translations such as "muted music" (NJB), "meditation" (NKJV) or "quiet interlude" (NLT).

2.1.2. Melodies or Styles. (1) bingînôt/bingînôt, "with stringed instruments" (Pss 4; 6; 54; 55; 67; 76 [or postscript for Pss 3; 5; 53; 54; 66; 75]); and al-nēginat, "on stringed instruments" (Ps 61 [or postscript for Ps 60]). This comes from nāgan, "play a stringed instrument," like David's kinôr (e.g., 1 Sam 16:16-23; 18:10; 19:9).

(2) el-hannēhîlôt, "with the flutes" (Ps 5:1 [or postscript for Ps 4]). The rabbis connected this with nahālā ("inheritance"), as does the LXX kleronomousēs ("inherit") and the Vulgate (hereditatem), perhaps as a tune name about their tribal inheritance (see Ps 4:8). Mowinckel (2.210) connects this with hālā ("grow weak, tired, ill") and says that it is a song to be sung against disease.

However, most connect this with hālil ("flute"), one of the instruments played in royal and religious processions (1 Kings 1:40; Is 30:29), by bands of ecstatic prophets (1 Sam 10:5), or for mourning (Jer 48:36).

(3) al-haggittit, "according to [the tune or style] 'Gittith'" (Pss 8; 81; 84 [or postscript for Pss 7; 80; 83]). The LXX (lēnos) and Vulgate (torcularibus) derive it from gat ("wine press"), identifying it as a vintage song, perhaps for the Feast of Tabernacles (Thirtle, 55-66; Delekat, 292-93). The rabbis linked the wine press with divine wrath against the wicked nations (Joel 3:13), which meant redemption for Israel (Midr. Ps. 8; 84). This might work well with its use as postscript for Psalm 7 (see Ps 7:6-16). However, Gunkel (349-50) is probably right in understanding this as nomen gentileum, "according to the Gathites," which could refer to an instrument (Targum: "kinōrā" from Gath), style or tune originating in Gath, where David had parked the ark of the covenant, and where it blessed the house of Obed-Edom "the Gittite" (2 Sam 6:10-12).

(4) al-ālāmôt, "according to [the tune or style] 'Alamoth'" (Ps 46 [or postscript for Ps 45]; cf. 1 Chron 15:20). If this is related to almā ("young woman"), it could be "to [the voice of] young women, either lit, or of soprano or falsetto of boys" (BDB) or perhaps of high-pitched musical instruments (HALOT, citing Delekat, 292-93). The LXX kryphion ("hidden things") presupposes al-ālāmôt, which the rabbis described as the "hidden things," unfathomable wonders of God (Midr. Ps. 46, citing Job 5:9), and which Mowinckel (2.215-16) relates to cultic mysteries.

(5) al-haššēminit clearly means "on 'the eighth'" (Pss 6; 12 [or postscript for Pss 5; 11]; cf. 1 Chron 15:21), but its reference is ambiguous. Rabbinic midrash referred it to *worship above and beyond the general practice of seven times a day (Ps 119:164), to circumcision on the eighth day (Lev 12:3), or even to Israel's dispersion into eight kingdoms derived from the pairs of limbs on Daniel's statue: Babylon/Chaldea, Media/Persia, Greece/Macedonia, Ishmal/Edom (Midr. Ps. 5, citing Dan 2:31-33). Some infer the lower "octave" of men's voices, especially in contrast to the ālāmôt ("soprano" [1 Chron 15:20-21]); however, that is anachronistic and gender-bending to boot, because the octaval "eighth" is a musical concept more modern than ancient Near Eastern musical notation, and "the eighth" is feminine. J. Glueck (33) retains the “bass” range by a connection with šmn (“fat”), implying a low tone because “the larger the vibrating body the deeper the pitch.” It is more common to associate this note with an unidentified eight-stringed instrument (cf. 1 Chron 15:21; see Kraus, 1.31; Eerdmans, 60), like the Targum’s kinora, perhaps a “harp” or “lyre of eight strings” (Ps 6:1; 12:1). Most English translations transliterate it as an unexplained style or tune.

(6) ‘al-tašhēt, “to [the tune] ‘Do Not Destroy’” (Pss 57—59; 75 [or postscript for Pss 56—58; 74]; cf. Deut 9:26). This is likely the catchword for a tune name (Mowinckel, 2.214-15). The cry fits the content of all four psalms as well, whether construed as postscripts or superscripts.

(7) ‘al-māhālat, “according to [the style or tune] ‘Makhalath’” (Ps 53 [or postscript for Ps 52]); and ‘al-māhālat lē’annōt, “according to [the tune or style] ‘Makhalath Leanoth’” (Ps 88 [or postscript for Ps 87]). This may be a catchword for a tune name (e.g., “set to ‘Makhalath’”); however, other options are possible: a reference to style linking it with mēhōlā (“for a dance”), a performance note linking it with hālilā (“on a flute”), or a note about occasion linking it with maḥāleh (“for an illness” [cf. NJB: “in sickness”]). The last suggestion fits well with the title of Psalm 88, where it combines with lē’annōt, which could be from ‘nh and mean either (a) “‘humiliate,’ namely, one’s soul” (Mowinckel, 2.212) or “accompany penance” (Sawyer, 34); or (b) “for responding,” as the LXX apokrithēnai (“answer”) understood it.

(8) ‘al-šōšannīm, “according to [the tune] ‘Lilies’” (Pss 45; 69 [or postscript for Pss 44; 68]); ‘al-šūšan ‘ēdūt, “according to ‘The Lily of Testimony’” (Ps 60 [or postscript for Ps 59]); and ‘el-šōšannīm ‘ēdūt, “with/according to ‘The Lilies of Testimony’” (Ps 80 [or postscript for Ps 79]). “Lilies” probably served as a catchword for a tune name, whether by popular connection with poetry about love and fertility (Song 2:1-2, 16; 4:5; 5:13; 6:2-3; 7:2; cf. Ps 45) and by extension with blossoming Israel (Hos 14:5; cf. Mt 6:28; Lk 12:27), or by connection with temple imagery (1 Kings 7:19, 22, 26; 2 Chron 4:5). The fuller expression’s link with covenantal testimony (‘ēdūt) could even hint at some connection with the ark of the covenant that viewed Aaron’s budding rod as “lilies of revelation” (Mowinckel, 2.214).

(9) ‘al-yōnat ‘ēlem rēhōqīm, perhaps “to [the tune] ‘Dove of the Distant Oaks’” (Ps 56 [or postscript for Ps 55]; cf. Ps 55:6). The term ‘lm makes for uncertainty in this title. The LXX interpreted it as ‘ēlim (“gods” or “holy ones”), rendering it tou laou apo tōn hagion memakrymmenou (“the people far from the saints” or “the people far from the holies”—i.e., in exile), which the Vulgate followed with populo qui a santis longe. That fit David’s “exile” in Gath, which the title mentions. Mowinckel (2.214) approves the change to ‘ēlim (“gods”), but he says that it refers to “the doves to the distant gods,” alluding to a cultic act like that of a scapegoat but using a dove instead (linking Lev 16:8 with Lev 14:2-7, esp. v. 7). The Geneva Bible of 1599 kept the ‘ēlem (“silent”) in its rendering, “dumme doue in a farre countrey” (so also NKJV, HSCB). Translations that opt for “oaks” or “terebinths” (RSV, NIV, NRSV, ESV, NLT, NET) understand ‘ēlem to be an alternate form of ‘ēlim from ‘ayil. Gunkel’s bias toward gentilics for any vague term that ends with -t leads him to change yōnat to yawānūt (“Greeks”) and render it “according to the Greek manner of the distant Islands” (Gunkel, 350). The cautious approach of transliterating it as a tune name or style called “Jonath Elem Rekhoqim” may be wise (e.g., KJV, NASB, JPS, NJPS).

(10) ‘al-‘ayyelet haššaḥar, “to [the tune] ‘Doe of the Dawn’” (Ps 22 [or postscript for Ps 21]), probably is a tune named by its catchword. Mowinckel (2.21) says that it refers to an animal sacrificed at dawn; however, Israel’s cultus sacrificed only domesticated animals. Nonetheless, morning sacrifice may originally have been in view, perhaps understanding the leaping doe as figurative of the dawn. The LXX antilempseōs (“help”) must have read ‘ēyālūt (“help” [see Ps. 22:19]) instead of ‘ayyelet, as did the Targum, ‘l tqwp qwrbn tdyr’ dqryst (“on the strength of the regular morning sacrifice”). We may safely dismiss Gunkel’s modification of ‘ēyetelet to the gentilic ‘ēlafūt (“Elathites”—i.e., from Elath in the Gulf of Aqabah).

(11) ‘almūt labbēn, “to [the tune] ‘Death of the Son’” (Ps 9 [or postscript for Ps 8]; cf. Ps 48:14) or perhaps “according to [the tune or style] ‘Alamoth’” (cf. Ps 46:1). As it stands [‘almūt], this expression is uncertain; however, many manuscripts have ‘al-mūt (“concerning death”), which this note follows. Indeed, Psalm 9 refers to death by three common terms: māwet (“death” [Ps 9:14]; cf. mūt and the ancient Near Eastern deity Môt), šahat (“pit” [Ps 9:16]) and šē’ōl (“grave, underworld” [Ps 9:18]), though those links would mean little if this is actually a postscript for Psalm 8. The ‘al-mûṭ at the end of Psalm 48 may actually be a fragment of the title of Psalm 49. If so, it could read like the directions here in Psalm 9. However, it could just as well be read like the title of Psalm 46, as some Hebrew manuscripts have it (Ps 48:14 [MT 48:15]); indeed, the LXX hyper tōn kryphiōn (“concerning things hidden”) here in Psalm 9 assumes the same ‘al-‘ālūmōt that it assumed in the title of Psalm 46.

2.2. Superscripts: Composition.

2.2.1. Types of Composition. (1) šîr, “a Song,” is a general term for any type of song (e.g., Gen 31:27; Ex 15:1, 21; Judg 5:12), but it may have a more technical meaning in the psalm titles, where it appears to refer to vocal performance with cantillation (Delekat; Kaiser, 352). It is most often accompanied by musical instruments, which might be called kēlē šîr, or “instruments of song” (Kraus, 1.21, citing 1 Chron 15:16; 16:42; 2 Chron 7:6; 34:12; Neh 12:36; Amos 6:5). “A psalm can be at once a šîr and a mizmôr” (Mowinckel, 2.207); other than when combined as “song of ascents” (šîr hamma‘ālōt [Pss 121–134]), šîr occurs without mizmôr (“psalm”) only three times in psalm titles (Pss 18; 45; 46).

(2) mizmôr, “a Psalm,” occurs fifty-seven times in the Psalter and nowhere else; therefore, we might consider it a technical term for temple music. The verb zamar may mean “pick,” whether referring to pruning fruit (Lev 25:3–4; Is 5:6) or to plucking a string instrument. By steps of extension, it refers to strumming a kithara, or harp, then to a song sung to string accompaniment (Pss 4; 6; 67; 76), and finally to temple music in general, such as a “psalm” for a flute (Ps 5:1). The English word psalm goes back to the LXX use of psalmos, a term for twanging a bow-string.

(3) miktām, generally transliterated, is always as “a Miktam of David” (Pss 16; 56–60; cf. Is 13:12). The LXX’s stēlographia (“pillar inscription”), the Targum’s glipā’ tērîšā (“engraving/writing that is straight/upright/perfect”), and the Vulgate’s tituli inscriptio read the Hebrew as miktāb (“writing”). C. T. Hodge (1.636–41) notes that medieval Jewish writers took it variously: some saw it as a musical term to denote melody and rhythm (Rashi), the melody (Ibn Ezra) or a musical style or instrument (Kimhi); some (followed by von Ewald, 1.39–41) separated miktām into the preposition mîn and ketem (“from gold”), taking it figuratively as “a precious or golden song” (Midr. Ps. 16); and some thought that the separation should be māk and tām (“humble” and “perfect” [e.g., Midr. Ps. 16]; cf. Aquila: tapeinou teliou, “humble and perfect”; Jerome: humilis et simplex). Some now connect miktām with katama (“hide, conceal”), deriving various senses from that, such as a mystery psalm, one with hidden meaning; something hidden like a treasure; something hidden until now and thus “a new song”; a psalm sung with covered lips—that is, for personal or private prayer or meditation (note NJB: “in a quiet voice”). Mowinckel (2.209) derives it from the Akkadian katāmu, speaking of either “a song of hiding” (i.e., under God’s protection) or “a song of covering” (i.e., atoning). Hodge (637) objects, “Akk. katāmu is not recorded as having the meaning ‘cover’ in the sense of ‘atone for,’ as does Heb. kāpar.” Glueck (35) suggests that it derives from kātam (“stain, or be stained” [e.g., Jer 2:22]) and is linked to “blood, bloodstain, or a place of bloodshed” that may be paralleled with šāḥat (“pit”), šē’ōl (“underworld, grave”) and mōt (“death”), terms that “are present in all the Miktam Psalms.” This diverse uncertainty makes the best choice the transliteration “Miktam,” which almost all English translations adopt unless they are translating or are influenced by the Vulgate (e.g., Douay-Rheims, NJB).

(4) maškil, “a Maskil” or possibly “an efficacious (psalm),” is used in the heading for a variety of psalm types: wisdom (Pss 45; 89), royal (Pss 32; 78) and especially petition (Pss 42/43; 44; 52–55; 74; 88; 142). The term occurs a few other places, generally associated with wisdom and its attendant success (Ps 14:2; 47:7; 1 Sam 18:14–15; Job 22:2; Prov 10:5, 19; 14:35; 16:20; 17:2; 21:12). It derives from šākal, which is most often translated “succeed, or prosper”; however, it is an intellectual term too, meaning “comprehend, discern, perceive.” H. Kosmala (237) notes that the majority of the passages where škl forms are used reflect on knowledge of God, and that the term eventually came to refer to “a person who pleases God,” such as the Qumran teacher, or to a way of life that pleases God, like that laid down in the Qumran Manual of Discipline (see Kosmala, 238–40). So also the rabbis connected it with the principle that “the path of life leads upward for the intelligent/wise person [maškil]” (Prov 15:24) and to the hopeful upward look to God for deliverance (Midr. Ps. 32); or they could just call it a “meditation” (Midr. Ps. 142). From the connection with wisdom, Kraus (1.25) talks of “presenting songs and poems in a skilled, intelligent, and artistic way” (see esp. Ps 47:7). Mowinckel (2.209) very possibly is on track when he notes the connection with petitions and then says that this should be understood as a successful, that is, “efficacious,” song.

(5) šiggāyôn, “a Shiggaion” (Ps 7 [cf. ʿal šigyônôt in Hab 3:1]). The term’s etymology and meaning are unclear; therefore, the LXX just has psalmos, as does the Vulgate (psalmus), and the Peshitta simply omits anything to represent it. Contemporary treatments tend to derive it either from the Hebrew šāgā (“go astray, wander” [BDB] or “stagger” [HALOT]) or from the Akkadian šigû (“howl, lament, dirge”). If they follow the Hebrew šāgā, they speak of “staggering verse” or “dithyrambic poetry,” perhaps resulting from or provoking ecstatic experience (Eerdmans, 76-77; Dahood, 1.41); if they follow the Akkadian šigû, they speak of a dirge (Mowinckel, 2.209) or of an “agitated lament” (Kraus, 1.26). The rabbis went for “impulsive speech,” like David’s *imprecation against his enemies (Midr. Ps. 7, citing 1 Sam 26:10; Ps 6:10; cf. Eccl 10:20).

(6) tēhillā, “a Praise [song]” (Ps 145; cf. Ps 147:1; šir tēhillā in Neh 12:46) designates this hymn as a “cultic doxology” (Mowinckel, 2.204).

(7) tēpillā, “a Prayer,” which may be “of David” (Pss 17; 86; 142), “of Moses” (Ps 90) or “of someone who is humble, poor, afflicted” (Ps 102). Indeed, these psalms are all petition psalms.

(8) hallēlū yā or halēlū ʿet-yhwh, “praise the LORD.” This Piel imperative may serve as the superscript for several psalms (Pss 106; 111; 112; 113; 135; 146—50), and of those, it is a *chiastic subscript for all except Psalm 111 and Psalm 112. For some, it is a subscript only (Ps 35; 105; 115—117).

2.2.2. Association with Individual or Group. (1) Nearly half of the psalms (73 of 150) have titles ascribing them to David, using either the simple lēdāwīd, “by David” (Pss 3—9/10; 11—17; 19—32; 34—35; 37—41; 51—65; 68—70; 86; 89; 101; 103; 108—110; 122; 124; 131—133; 138—145), or the fuller note lēʿebed yhwh lēdāwīd, “by the servant of the LORD, David” (Pss 18; 36). The nature of that association is not immediately clear because the ascription is lēdāwīd, and the preposition l- could indicate a psalm written “by,” “for,” or even “about.” So it could mean “belonging to” a Davidic collection, which is paralleled by the Ugaritic expression lbʿl, or “[tablet belonging] to [the/a] Baal [cycle]” (Pardee, 301). However, when linked with a personal name in the psalm titles, this seems best taken as the lamed auctoris (Waltke and O’Conner, 2006), thus “a psalm of David (properly belonging to David as the author),” for which “of David is used alone elliptically” (Kautzsch 1910, §129c). Certainly the expansive title of Psalm 18 indicates authorship: “By David [lēdāwīd], who addressed to the LORD the words of this song in the day when the LORD delivered him from the grip of all his enemies and from the hand of Saul” (Ps 18:1). Fourteen titles include historical notes, all of them about David (Pss 3; 7; 18; 30; 34; 51; 52; 54; 56; 57; 59; 60; 63; 142). Except for two (Pss 7; 18), all share the same syntax, which hints at an editorial regularity: infinitive construct introduced by b- and a subordinate clause using finite verbs. This may indicate a later editor’s attempt to “Davidify” the Psalter; it may, on the other hand, preserve reliable tradition identifying the Davidic psalms.

(2) līslōmō, “by Solomon,” associates two psalms with David’s son Solomon (Pss 72; 127), who is said to have composed 1,005 songs (1 Kings 4:32).

(3) lēhēmān haʿezrahī, “by Heman the Ezrahite” (Ps 88). The chronicler lists Heman as a leader of Levitical singers (1 Chron 6:33; 15:16-17, 22; 16:41-42; 25:1-6) who prophesied with musical accompaniment by Levitical instrumentalists and by priests blowing their trumpets (2 Chron 5:12-13; 7:6; 29:25-28). “Ezrahite” may be derived from “Zerah” instead of “Ezrah” (1 Chron 4:17), seeing that an Ethan and a Heman descended from Zerah (1 Chron 2:6). Since Heman is listed among the sages (1 Kings 4:31), perhaps it is fitting that this psalm is a maskil (see 3.2.1.4 above).

(4) lēʿetān hāʿezrahī, “by Ethan the Ezrahite” (Ps 89). A descendant of the Mararite division of Levites (1 Chron 6:44), Ethan joined Heman and Asaph in leading temple music (1 Chron 15:17, 19). Like Heman, Ethan (or Jeduthun) is listed among the sages (1 Kings 4:31), and like Psalm 88, this psalm is a maskil (see maskil under 2.2.1. above).

(5) lēmōšeh ʾiš-hāʾēlōhīm, “by Moses, the man of God” (Ps 90). Before David, Moses himself was known as a composer of song (Ex 15:1-18; Deut 31:19, 30; 32:1-44; 33:1-29).

(6) Psalm 39 attributes authorship to Jeduthun, using the expression lîdûṭûn (“by Jeduthun”), which is following the Qere in replacing the Kethib lîdîṭûn (“by Idithun”). Psalm 62 and Psalm 77 probably direct that these psalms be sung by the Jeduthun choir, or according to a Jeduthun style or tune, using the expression ‘al-yêdûṭûn (“concerning Jeduthun” [Ps 62:1]), and also replacing ‘al-yêdûṭûn with ‘al-yêdûṭûn (Ps 77:1) (cf. 1 Chron 25:1-2; 2 Chron 5:12). Along with Asaph and Heman, Jeduthun (= Ethan [1 Chron 15:17, 19]) was one of David’s chief prophets/musicians (1 Chron 16:41-42; 25:1, 3, 6; 2 Chron 5:12; 35:15). His descendants apparently formed a choir that continued into the postexilic period, as did the Korahites (see below).

(7) libnê-qōrah, “by/for the sons of Korah” (Pss 42; 44—49; 84; 85; 87; 88). This could refer to something authored/commissioned by the Korahite choir; however, it probably directs that the psalm be sung by the Korahite choir. Among David’s followers in the wilderness (1 Chron 12:1, 6), the descendants of the rebel Korah survived into the postexilic period to serve as temple guards and servants (1 Chron 9:19, 31-32; 26:1, 19) and worship leaders (2 Chron 20:19). By an irony of grace these descendants of priestly usurpers are included among the Psalter’s authors or performers—and not the priests.

2.2.3. Directions for Using the Psalm. (1) šîr-ḥānukkat habbayit, “song for the dedication of the house” (Ps 30). David gathered the temple building material and organized its musicians and guards, so we should not be surprised to see that he wrote a psalm for its eventual dedication, even though not he, but rather his son Solomon, would build and dedicate it. This psalm may also have played a key role in the Hanukkah rededication of the temple (1 Macc 4:36-61; 2 Macc 10:1-9; Jn 10:22).

(2) lêhazkir, “bring to remembrance” or “get God’s attention” (Pss 38; 70 [NET]). Mowinckel (2.212) helpfully links this with the memorial sacrifices, suggesting that it might have been sung to accompany such an offering (see Lev 2:2, 9, 16; 5:12; 24:7 [cf. Acts 10:4]). It might also be useful to note that both of these psalms are petitions.

(3) lêlammēd, “for instruction” (Ps 60). J. Sawyer (34-35) notes two other poetic compositions described with this term and suggests that they may have been used to accompany the teaching of the *law (see Deut 31:19, 22; 2 Sam 1:19-27, esp. v. 18).

(4) lētôdâ, “for thanksgiving,” aptly titles a thanksgiving hymn (Ps 100).

(5) lêyôm haššabbât, “for the day of Sabbath” (Ps 92). Interestingly, elsewhere the LXX adds labels for other days of the week: tēs mias sabbatōn, “for Sunday” or “for the first [day] of the week” (Ps 24 [LXX 23]); tetradi sabbatōn, “for Wednesday” or “for the fourth [day] of the week” (Ps 94 [LXX 93]); eis tēn hēmeran tou prosabbatou, “for Friday” or “for the day before the Sabbath” (Ps 93 [LXX 92]).

(6) hamma‘ālôt, “of ascents” (Pss 120; 122—134), or lamma‘ālôt (Ps 121). The early translation “song of degrees” (GNB, KJV) gave way to “song of ascents” (RSV, NIV); however, either translation requires explanation. Kraus suggests the possibility that it indicates “a wayfaring psalm” for postexilic returnees “going up [hā‘ōlîm] out of captivity” (Ezra 2:1), for those who made an “ascent [hamma‘ālâ] from Babylon” (Ezra 7:9). The rabbis also could link these psalms with deliverance, from the Egyptians or from any oppressor (Midr. Ps. 120); however, they could also link them with ascending in pilgrimage to the Jerusalem temple (Midr. Ps. 122). Kraus (1.23) thinks it useful to combine two ideas: a “song of steps [hamma‘ālôt]” up to the throne, temple levels or altar (citing Ex 20:26; 1 Kings 10:19-20; 2 Chron 9:18-20; Ezek 40:6, 22, 26, 31, 34, 37, 49; 43:17), and a “pilgrimage song” or “processional song,” understanding the “ascents” [m‘lh] as a technical term for “pilgrimage” (Ps 24:3; 122:4; cf., e.g., Mk 10:33; Lk 2:4) or for procession to a shrine (2 Sam 6; 1 Kings 12:32-33; 2 Kings 23:1-2) or to the city of David (Neh 3:15; 12:37; Lk 2:4). Kraus (1.24) admits, “Only Psalm 122 is applied to a pilgrimage, and only Psalm 132 to a procession” but still thinks of Psalms 120—134 as a pilgrimage songbook that includes various kinds of songs.

See also ASAPH AND SONS OF KORAH; DAVID; PSALMS 1: BOOK OF.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. B. S. Childs, Introduction to the Old Testament as Scripture (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1979); M. Dahood, Psalms (3 vols.; AB 16, 17, 17A; Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1966-1970); L. Delekat, “Probleme der Psalmenumberschriften,” ZAW 76 (1964) 280-97; B. B. Edwards, “Studies in Hebrew Poetry,” Bibliotheca Sacra & Theological Review 5 (February 1848) 58-79; B. D. Eerdmans, The Hebrew Book of Psalms (Ost St 4; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1947); J. J. Glueck, "Some Remarks on the Introductory Notes of the Psalms," in Studies on the Psalms: Papers Read at Sixth Meeting Held at the Potchefstroom University for C.H.E., 29-31 Jan. 1963 (Potchefstroom: Pro Rege, 1963) 30-39; H. Gunkel, Introduction to Psalms: The Genres of the Religious Lyric of Israel (Macon, GA: Mercer University Press, 1998); C. T. Hodge, "Mikdam," in Semitic Studies in Honor of Wolf Leslau on the Occasion of His Eighty-Fifth Birthday, November 14, 1991, ed. A. S. Kaye (2 vols.; Wiesbaden: Harrassowitz, 1991) 1.634-44; O. Kaiser, Introduction to the Old Testament: A Presentation of Its Results and Problems (Minneapolis: Augsburg, 1975 [1970]); E. Kautzsch, ed., Gesenius' Hebrew Grammar (2nd ed.; Oxford: Clarendon, 1910 [1909]); D. Kidner, Psalms 1-72 (TOTC; Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 1973); idem, Psalms 73-150 (TOTC; Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 1975); H. Kosmala, "Maškil," JANESCU 5 (1973) 235-41; H.-J. Kraus, Psalms (2 vols.; Minneapolis: Augsburg, 1989); S. Mowinckel, The Psalms in Israel's Worship (2 vols. in 1; BRS; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2004 [1951]); D. G. Pardee, "The Preposition in Ugaritic," UF 8 (1976) 215-322; J. F. A. Sawyer, "An Analysis of the Context and Meaning of the Psalm-Headings," TGUOS 22 (1967-1968) 26-38; J. W. Thirtle, The Titles of the Psalms: Their Nature and Meaning (London: Henry Frowde, 1904); H. von Ewald, Commentary on the Psalms (2 vols.; Theological Translation Fund Library 23-24; London: Williams & Norgae, 1880-1881); B. K. Waltke, "Superscripts, Postscripts, or Both," JBL 110 (1991) 538-96; B. K. Waltke and M. O'Connor, An Introduction to Biblical Hebrew Syntax (Winona Lake, IN: Eisenbrauns, 1990).

D. A. Brueggeman

PSALMS 5: ICONOGRAPHY

*Imagery is the essence of biblical poetry. However, studies on biblical imagery are mostly focused on the semantic value of words in their contexts and only rarely on the actual images that may lie behind the words. Ancient Near Eastern iconography as a growing field in biblical studies provides a tool through which the thought world of the biblical authors may be accessed not only via the literary poetic device but also through a visual artifact that can be related to the text. The psalms need to be seen and not just read, as W. Brown suggests in his extensively reviewed work on the relationship between metaphor and icon.

1. Image and Text
2. Ancient Near Eastern Iconography
3. Iconography and the Psalms

1. Image and Text.

The relationship between image and text can be manifold and complex. Traditionally, Judeo-Christian sources have given preference to the text over the image, but at least since H. Gressmann's Altorientalische Bilder zum Alten Testament (1927) and J. Pritchard's The Ancient Near East in Pictures Relating to the Old Testament (1954) there is an awareness that the OT was written in a sociocultural context that abounded with images, and that these images have had an impact on the biblical text. A simple example is found in Psalm 65:9 (MT 65:10) where a somewhat enigmatic reference is made to the peleg ʾēlōhim ("canal of God"), which can be interpreted as a conduit of water flowing downward from the heavenly realm to the earth, an iconographic motif known from Middle-Assyrian and Middle-Babylonian times. Figure 1 shows a Kassite cylinder-seal with an inscription dating it to the fourteenth century BC. On it there is the water-god Ea surrounded by lush vegetation and holding in each hand a vase from which streams of water flow downward into receptacles on the ground.

The predominance of text over image in biblical scholarship has been criticized repeatedly, and the argument usually adduced is that this has its roots in an aniconic Judeo-Christian tradition. However, archaeology and the study of imagery in the Bible point to the fact that the biblical authors were aware of and accustomed to the images around them. Iconographic studies, especially those from the University of Fribourg in Switzerland, have recently taken this notion to its furthest conclusion in attempting a reconstruction of the religious history of Palestine/Israel based on images without any explicit reference to the Hebrew Bible. Preference in this case is given to the image over the text, based on the minimalist assumption that the text of the OT is of limited value for historical reconstructions. A more differentiated approach would recognize text and image as two independent media, each of which has strengths or weaknesses and needs to be interpreted in its own right within relevant hermeneutic parameters. Furthermore, each source has to interact with the other through comparison, whereas the point of departure for the comparative process within the context of OT studies needs to be the biblical text.

1.1. Imagery in the Psalms. It is impossible to talk about imagery in the psalms without touching on the realm of metaphor. Metaphor, as suggested by A. Berlin in The Dynamics of Biblical Parallelism, is almost intrinsic to *parallelism as the strongest expression of Hebrew poetry, which indicates that imagery in the psalms usually is transmitted via this literary device. Although most scholars recognize the importance of metaphor in the Psalter, there is little material that discusses the subject in a systematic manner, taking into consideration modern metaphor theory and cognitive linguistics. Most of the literature available on the subject is following in the footsteps of P. Macky's them in a new and creative way; they structure our thinking theologically through what they tell us and what they do not. Metaphors in the psalms can be cognitively categorized and represent universal truths that cannot be expressed otherwise. Therefore, metaphors in the psalms have a rhetorical or ideological force that should not be underestimated. (3) *Intertextuality: Metaphors have a chronological aspect and appear on a timeline; they should be studied with reference to their usage and reusage in biblical texts, which through intertextual markers indicate that they refer to the same metaphor, possibly shifting or creating its meaning along the way. In this way, imagery in the psalms can help us to gain a clearer understanding of the religious history of the OT and to understand our own modern and personal religious histories.

1.2. Literary and Literal Image. Athanasius (c. AD 293-373), in his letter to Marcellinus, states that the reader of the psalms "is enabled to possess the image deriving from the words," referring to expressions that can be realized in both image and language. Cognitive linguistics has demonstrated the level of understanding (cognition) that a metaphor is able to evoke, as the most prominent trope of biblical imagery, through the incongruity between different domains of knowledge. The resulting new meaning is based on the reader/hearer's ability to map from the known toward the unknown. Although modern metaphor theory deals adequately with the issues of semantics and pragmatics, the question of the origin of the metaphor in the poet's mind is rarely addressed. Images are derived from imagination, and the imagery actually opens a window into the poet's mind. We often look through this window to discern the meaning of the imagery, but frequently we overlook the image behind the imagery. The iconoclastic debate of church history has warned against the icon becoming the idol, which happens when the deity's power is harnessed within the physical structure of the image. However, the fear of idolatry has impoverished the hermeneutical endeavor to discover the image behind the imagery.

Mostly, pictorial remains from the ancient Near East have been treated as illustrations of texts or described under art-historical perspectives, but seldom are they taken into consideration when it comes to the reconstruction of interactive metaphor theory, and the recent discussion of metaphor criticism in the psalms can be summarized under three emerging angles. (1) Semantics and pragmatics: The study of metaphor in the psalms has to be done in reference to both semantics and pragmatics, taking into consideration both meaning and usage. This implies a closer look at the cultural and social context of the metaphor, including the iconographic ancient Near Eastern image as discussed in this article. (2) Cognitive linguistics: Metaphors transmit content but also no content, drawing at the same time on different domains of knowledge and combining religio-cultural history. A stela from a clearly Iron Age I archaeological context near the gate at Bethsaida (figure 2) showing a semiabstract image of an anthropomorphic figure with a sword and a bovine head, which has been identified as a moon-deity, may actually tell us a great deal about problematic cultic practices of OT times at the city gate that motivated religious reforms like the one mentioned in the short information provided in 2 Kings 23:8, which says that King Josiah “broke down the shrines at the gates.” O. Goldwasser goes further in establishing the cognitive relationship between the image and imagery on the basis of Egyptian hieroglyphs, where the relationship between text and picture is probably the most intricate, stating that in this pictorial form of writing the “intellectual leap” between icon and phonetic metaphor has been accomplished. Thus, the biblical poets drew from a conceptual stock of imagery that can and needs to be related to the images of the ancient Near East within the parameters of a balanced comparative methodology. The question that follows is, “What caused the biblical writers to use an iconographic motif and translate it into the medium of language and create thus a new context influenced by their particular set of hermeneutical criteria?” In order to answer this question, one has to look at the often-neglected methodological issues underlying ancient Near Eastern iconography.

Figure 1. Kassite cylinder-seal

Figure 2. Bethsaida stela

2. Ancient Near Eastern Iconography.

As a separate discipline within biblical studies, ancient Near Eastern iconography describes and interprets the pictorial remains of ancient cultures. It focuses on the development of themes and motifs throughout the material culture of the ancient Near East and tries to establish possible relationships with the cultural and religious history of the ancient world.

2.1. Studies in Ancient Near Eastern Iconography. The results and advantages of an iconographic approach to the biblical text have been demonstrated through a number of publications associated with the Biblical Institute at the University of Fribourg, Switzerland, so one can speak of the “Fribourg school” of ancient Near Eastern iconography. O. Keel’s widely cited The Symbolism of the Biblical World: Ancient Near Eastern Iconography and the Book of Psalms (the original German edition was published in 1972) focused on the Psalter with the intention of surveying the conceptual similarities between the biblical text and the ancient Near Eastern image, drawing mainly on Mesopotamian and Egyptian monumental art. A number of exegetical studies followed that recognized the abundance of archaeological remains in the realm of miniature art from Syro-Palestine (e.g., seals and amulets). Methodologically, they approached the evidence more systematically, taking into consideration chronological and geographical delimitations. More recent publications have moved from mere biblical theme-oriented studies toward a primary concern with the iconographic evidence as such and its consequential bearing on the religious history of ancient Israel. In the same way, the focus has shifted from exegetical issues to the synthesizing and integration of iconographic evidence into an overall picture of religious belief in ancient Israel. Thus the attempt is to contribute to the reconstruction of the religious conceptual world (Vorstellungswelt) of Israel through pictorial material. The Fribourg school has produced a number of important reference works such as the Corpus der Stempelsiegelamulette aus Palästina/Israel, of which two volumes have been published so far. The most ambitious and recent project has been the writing of a religious history of Palestine/Israel and the ancient Near East based solely on pictorial evidence, with a deliberate avoidance of referring to the biblical text (Die Ikonographie Palästinas/Israels und der Alte Orient: Eine Religions- geschichte in Bildern). However, while it appears that in its publication the Fribourg school has moved progressively away from the biblical text, most recently critique has been voiced from within that this lack of reference actually constitutes a methodological weakness.

2.2. Methodology in Ancient Near Eastern Iconography. The interpretation of an iconographic object needs to be informed by methodological guidelines comparable to the hermeneutic process that guides the process of biblical interpretation. Keel's methodological study Das Recht der Bilder gesehen zu werden (1992) draws on but moves beyond E. Panofsky's iconographic interpretation scheme, which divides the interpretative process up into three steps:

Preiconographic description: based on the practical experience of the describer; aimed at the primary object

Iconographic analysis: based on the knowledge of literary sources for comparative purposes, focuses on type-history; the secondary or conventional subject is the objective

Iconological analysis/interpretation: based on synthetic intuition and a knowledge of cultural symptoms and symbols, aimed at the establishing of meaning

Keel has especially criticized Panofsky's second methodological step because it reverts to an interpretation of images on the basis of textual sources and arrives at the following conclusions: (1) each picture has to be evaluated in its own right without the reception bias of Judeo-Christian exegesis before it can be linked exegetically to a text; (2) image and word are not dichotic but rather should be complementary to each other, mutually enhancing; (3) pictures can be interpreted with the help of other pictorial material without necessarily resorting to textual sources. Within the interpretation process each image has to be divided into components that together, and in a contextual relationship, constitute the image and its meaning. The important compositional elements of an image are the motif, the scene and the decoration, while their relationship has to be understood within an architectural hierarchy that is comparable to the hermeneutical circle of exegesis on a linguistic level that works within the sequence of word, phrase, sentence, unit, section and so on.

Figure 3 shows the iconographic interpretation scheme in a graphic way. The circular depiction demonstrates the reciprocal relationship between the individual components of the image. While it is important to understand the smallest units, the overall meaning of the image can be derived only from an integrated interpretation of all the elements.

Only after the image has been understood in its own right can an attempt be made to compare it to a literary text—that is, to the biblical word. According to Keel, such a comparison may yield a variety of relationships between the biblical text and the ancient Near Eastern thought world as expressed by the iconographic image: (1) a text can directly refer to an ancient Near Eastern image, such as the description of Chaldean soldiers in Ezekiel 23:14-15; (2) a text can be implicitly influenced by pictorial representations, such as the description of the four living creatures in Ezekiel 1; (3) a text and an image can independently refer to a common subject matter, such as the rewarding of an official (Gen 41:37-45) and several New Kingdom Egyptian tomb paintings.

Figure 3. Hermeneutical circle of image interpretation

2.3. Comparative Method: Time and Place. The conceptual relationship between imagery and image in the psalms as outlined in this article necessitates some reference to the comparative method and its ramifications for biblical studies.

Comparative method involves the comparison of biblical phenomena with other phenomena that occur in the whole realm of the ancient Near Eastern setting in general. The comparisons have to work on the level of cultural systems without isolating individual phenomena from their respective cultural context. The underlying principles of the comparative method are based on the assumption that there are common characteristics between societies and cultures, which allow the researcher to make valid comparisons. Early iconographic studies took place on a grand scale (typological comparison) assuming a general cultural uniformity in the ancient Near East—for example, liberally comparing a text from the Psalter with an Assyrian palace relief. A more contextual approach focuses on both differences and similarities, trying to strike a balance between contrasts and parallels, and needs to be informed by the two governing principles of the comparative method: place (geography) and time (chronology). Without entering the discussion of dating the psalms, there seems to be sufficient evidence to propose a chronological framework from the Iron Age I down to the Persian period for the Psalter from which comparative material could be drawn. Geographically, the period outlined above comprises such a number of historical situations and locations that it seems advisable to advance the geographical limitations beyond the immediate Palestinian/Israelite borders (e.g., Ps 68 presupposes a Trans-Jordanian locale, possibly, even reaching into Syria, while Ps 137 is set against the backdrop of the Babylonian exile) but give preference to objects from Syro-Palestine.

3. Iconography and the Psalms.

Already in the early twentieth century H. Gunkel, in his commentary on Psalms, recognizes the contribution of iconography to the study of the psalms. In his interpretation of Psalm 17:8 he makes reference to objects, especially from Egypt, that show divine beings with wings spread protectively over humans. The purpose was to illustrate the integration of Israelite belief into ancient Near Eastern culture and the evolution of OT religious history out of it. As shown above, the metaphorical character of Hebrew poetry as the principle vehicle of communication in the psalms necessitates an iconographic approach to the Psalter.

3.1. Iconography and Illustration. Figures 1 and 2 draw examples from ancient Near Eastern iconography to illustrate specific biblical texts without paying attention to the methodological issues. While this approach needs to be benchmarked with the parameters of the comparative method mentioned earlier (see 2.2 above), there is a wide interest in this usage of iconography for biblical studies because it can provide a snapshot of ancient cultures, peoples or objects that helps us to visualize and in turn contextualize the biblical text. Keel's foundational work on iconography in the psalms followed this approach and still represents the most important reference work in this area.

The following illustrations show the possibilities of this approach to iconography. The expression in Psalm 68:21, "Surely God will crush the heads of his enemies, the hairy crowns of those who go on in their sins" (NIV), is compatible with the familiar smiting-god motif from ancient Near Eastern iconography. The motif usually depicts weather and war gods with different geographical and chronological characteristics, but it is clear that the gesture always indicates the supremacy of the god versus the subjugation of the enemy or animal respectively. We may take as an example an ivory silhouette inlay from Samaria, dating from the eighth century BC (see figure 4), which shows a male figure standing in a striding position, wearing the double crown of Upper and Lower Egypt. With his right hand raised above his head, he is holding a club ready to strike, while with his left hand he is grasping the hair of an enemy who is kneel-

Figure 4. Ivory from Samaria

ing in front of him with his hands raised toward the standing figure. The detail of the "hairy skull" mentioned in Psalm 68:21 is not a by-product of the psalmist's vivid imagination or an exercise in parallelismus membrorum (see Parallelism) but rather serves as an important part of the imagery, indicating the animal-like character of the enemy. Thus the subjugation of the enemy is closely associated with the triumph over the chaotic forces, represented by the hairy skull. However, a closer look reveals that there are no distinct divine attributes present, so the figure could also be identified with the pharaoh in his typical posture, denoting his dominion over the enemies. Nevertheless, the king often was depicted in postures normally associated with the iconography of deities, and divine attributes frequently were associated with him

Figure 5 shows a typical and rather unambiguous depiction of Ba'al-Seth, the amalgamation of a Semitic deity and an Egyptian one. It is found on a steatite scarab from Lachish (Tell ed-Duweir) and comes from a Late Bronze grave that was reused until the Iron Age IIC (720/700-600 BC). Stylistically, it belongs to the Nineteenth to Twenty-Second Dynasty (1295-900 BC). Although the god is often found in a more passive stance, here he is depicted as fighting the horned snake representing the Apophis-snake in Egyptian mythology, and the chaos-waters in Canaanite myth. It is interesting to note that the enemy has been substituted by an animal that nevertheless exemplifies the equivalent threat. A further modification of the smiting-god motif that may shed light on Psalm 68:21 is found in a number of objects that show the smiting-god without any immediate context; that is, the smiting-god motif has been isolated from a concrete war situation, reducing the gesture of the raised arm holding the weapon to strike at an enemy to a mere emblem, a symbol of victory and dominion. Thus the smiting god becomes the menacing god without active involvement in the battle, portrayed in an almost canonized position.

Figure 5. Steatite scarab from Lachish

Figure 6 shows a cylinder-seal (dated around 1750 BC) on which the Syrian weather-god Ba'al Zaphon is depicted in a smiting-god posture in the middle of a holy wedding ceremony with a banquet scene attached to it, but no enemy at all is present.

Thus the author of Psalm 68:21 is referring not to a literal depiction of Yahweh's intervention in human warfare but rather to God's subjugation of any type of adverse forces that the psalmist may encounter.

3.2. Iconography and Exegesis. The foregoing examples have been employed as illustrations for a text in the psalms more or less along the lines of Keel's popular book (1978), which provided a limited number of categories (conceptions of the cosmos, destructive forces, temple, conceptions of God, king, man before God) for which iconographic illustrations were presented. In comparison, a more systematic approach to the usage of iconography in the exegetical process of a particular passage is demonstrated in the following.

Figure 6. Hermatite cylinder-seal with unknown provenance

Since the discovery of Ugaritic literature and its comparison with the biblical text, Psalm 29 has been linked to a Canaanite background. From this perspective it has served as a paradigm for the examination of Hebrew-Canaanite literary interdependence and thus has been the subject of numerous studies. H. Ginsberg in 1935 suggested a Phoenician origin for this psalm, although a closer look at the text reveals that the Ugaritic parallels viewed from the perspective of recent biblical scholarship may not present such a strong case for a Phoenician origin of the psalm as when Ginsberg, as a precursor of the Pan-Ugaritic school, originally formulated this hypothesis. The geography of the divine thunderstorm described in Psalm 29:3-9 of the poem describes the movement of a thunderstorm from the Mediterranean toward the coast and further inland. The first two toponymies represent few problems (Ps 29:3-6). However, the identification of Kadesh, or the “semi-desert Kadesh,” has been the subject of wide discussion because it could refer to a desert area close to Kadesh on the Orontes, as well as to the arid region in the southern Negev, close to Kadesh Barnea. Although one cannot rule out an underlying figurative meaning for the geographic allusions, it seems clear that in the poet’s description of the thunderstorm they follow a geographical progressive pattern and do not serve as a mythological depiction of the Yahwistic thunderstorm in general. It would then seem thinkable that the author used imagery commonly known from its general Syro-Palestinian background, but that he reworked it according to his rhetorical intentions and filled it with a new content. This line of interpretation, which can be motivated on exegetical grounds (see Klingbeil, 84-99), can also be approached from an iconographic-comparative perspective, as will be demonstrated in the following.

“The voice of Yahweh is upon the waters, the God of glory thunders” (Ps 29:3a-b). The main motif of Psalm 29, the qôl yhw (“voice of the LORD”), has been identified as referring to the approaching sound of a thunderstorm moving inland from the Mediterranean. It depicts Yahweh as a storm and weather god, to which the iconographic motif of the god in the winged sun-disk probably comes closest. The audible sound of thunder, obviously, cannot be easily reproduced by an iconographic image, but the densely feathered wings of the god in the winged sun-disk motif from ancient Near Eastern iconography have been identified as symbolizing the dark clouds and stormy heavens associated with a thunderstorm. Figure 7 shows part of a glazed tile from Assur dating to the time of Tukulti-Ninurta II (890-884 BC). The sun-disk is depicted as encompassing the winged god completely, while there are rays or flames of fire depicted within the sun nimbus. The bearded god has a large feathered tail and a pair of large wings that go beyond the border of the sun-disk. He is wearing a beard and a rounded crown. With his hand, the god is holding a bow that he has stretched to its limits, pointing at an imaginary or at least not visible enemy (the scene has been broken off on the right side). Below (not shown), a chariot scene is visible of which only the head of the charioteer and the upper part of the horse’s head are visible. Around the winged sun-disk are stylized clouds (not shown) with raindrops suspended from the upper border. The association of the god with rain clouds demonstrates his identification with a storm and weather deity, while the wide wings symbolize the dark, thundering heaven. The atmospheric phenomena are directed against the enemies of the Assyrian king, thus creating a complex image of the god fighting from heaven with meteorological weapons. The winged god in the sun-disk can be identified with the Assyrian sun and weather god Samaš.

Figure 7. Glazed tile from Assur

With regard to the thunder, the club that the smiting weather god often holds in his hand has been associated with the sound of thunder in the way of Ba‘al beating the heavens like a drum with his club, but the club rather should be understood as a weapon in the fight against an enemy and not be confused with the thunderbolt (lightning). Figure 8 shows a stela from Ras Shamra (Ugarit), dated on the basis of comparative material to the Late Bronze Age. The relief shows a barefoot male god in a passant position facing to the right. The figure is wearing a short kilt ornamented with horizontal stripes and held together by a broad belt. A curved dagger or sword is attached to the belt. The figure is wearing a helmet with a high point from which a pair of bull’s horns protrudes from the front. He has a long beard reaching to his chest, and his hair ends in long curls. The god has his right hand raised above his head, holding a club ready to strike, while the other hand is holding a spear in a vertical position with the broad blade pointing to the ground. The shaft of the spear spreads out into a plant, not into a shaft of lightning as proposed elsewhere, since the iconography of the weather-god with the bundle of lightning is completely different from this depiction. The identification of the figure does not present major problems, and we are confronted with a depiction of the weather-god Ba'al in his normal posture as the smiting-god, but holding a vegetation spear in his hand, thus establishing his close affinity to fertility and vegetation. In Ugaritic texts Ba'al is described as a god who possesses lightning and thunder (KTU 1.3 III 23, 1.101 obv 3-4) and he is the bringer of rain and fertility (KTU 1.4 VII 29-31 and 1.16 III 5ff.).

"Yahweh is over mighty waters" (Ps 29:3c). The mayim rabbim ("mighty waters") have repeatedly been associated with the chaotic forces represented by the horned snake of Canaanite mythology. Various motifs of ancient Near Eastern iconography show the struggle of the Canaanite-Egyptian god Ba'al-Seth with the spear against the horned snake. The depictions show him thrusting his weapon in a downward movement into the body of the snake. Most of the images depicting this motif originated during the Late Bronze Age and the Iron Age I, and a good example is a steatite scarab of unknown provennance housed in the Musées Royaux, Brussels (see figure 9). Stylistically, it has been assigned to the Ramessidian dynasties corresponding to the period 1300-1150 BC (Late Bronze Age IIB). Depicted on it is a winged figure wearing a short kilt with tassels. Although the body is anthropomorphic, the top part depicts the head of the Seth animal with long ears and a protruding snout. The figure has a pair of wings attached to its back that are typical of Ba'al and Seth and their combination during the Late Bronze Age. With his one hand raised above his head, he is holding a long lance or javelin, thrusting it down into a horned snake that he is grasping with the other hand. The tail of the snake is curved upward behind the god. Although the depiction is clearly Egyptian in style, and the streamers that often betray the Egyptian-Canaanite combination of Ba'al-Seth are missing, the figure should be identified with this god.

Figure 8. Stela from Ras Shamra

Figure 9. Steatite scarab of unknown provenance

However, in Psalm 29 no direct struggle is reflected between Yahweh and the chaotic waters—a fact that necessitates caution toward an interpretation of the biblical text along mythological lines.

"And he makes Lebanon skip like a calf, and Siron like the young of an aurochs" (Ps 29:6a-b). The association of the weather-god with mountains has been noticed in figure 6. The god is standing on three mountaintops, although there is no indication of a destructive earthquake-like event on the seal from northern Syria representing this motif. Whereas in the iconographic depictions of gods striding over mountains the mountains are portrayed as a constant and stabile factor supporting the mountain god, almost as a cultic pedestal, the psalmist describes them as fragile objects subjected to Yahweh's earthquake, which causes them to skip uncontrollably. Although the author of the psalm takes up the familiar mountain motif, he does not use the imagery in the expected manner but rather injects a new content that appears to be rather polemical for the ancient Near Eastern cultural context.

"The voice of Yahweh hews out lightning" (Ps 29:7a). In similar fashion to Psalm 18:15, Yahweh's appearance, in this case, Yahweh's voice, is associated with lightning. Although the imagery is that of the effect of Yahweh's voice on the rocky surface of the mountains, images showing the weather god using the bundle of lightning as a weapon may serve as comparative material. Figure 10 is a basalt stela, 135 cm in height, found at Arslan-Tash. It was found in the temple constructed by Tiglath-pileser III (744-727 BC), which dates it with some accuracy to the second half of the eighth century BC. The image shows a god in a striding position facing to the right. He is standing on top of a bull, one foot on the animal's horns, the other foot resting on its back. The posture is indicating a running motion, whereas the bull is depicted in a similar stance. The god is dressed with a short kilt, over which he is wearing a long robe. On his head the god is wearing the high rectangular horned crown customary to depictions of Neo-Assyrian gods. Above the crown a disk is visible with rays depicted in it. The god is armed with a long sword attached to his belt, pointing toward the back. On his shoulder he is carrying a bow and a quiver. One arm is raised above his head in a striking or throwing position, while the other arm is extended diagonally downward toward the front. In both hands he is holding a double three-forked bundle of lightning. From a Neo-Assyrian perspective, the god can be identified with the weather god Adad, whereas the three-forked bundle of lightning in the striking hand has replaced the weapon that one normally would expect. He is now completely equipped with meteorological weapons, and the character of the lightning as an attacking weapon becomes increasingly evident. It is no longer held in a passive gesture in front of the god as in other depictions; rather, it is raised above his head with the intention to strike down on the imaginary enemy. The single most important element in the identification of the weather god remains the bundle of lightning, although a bull and other elements often also serve as indicators that a depiction of the weather-god is intended.

The famous "Ba'al au foudre" (figure 8) with the vegetation spear may be an indicator of the combination of the imagery of lightning with fertility. However, whereas the iconographic depictions may picture the lightning as a complementing factor to fertility, Psalm 29 portrays its effects on fauna and flora in a rather destructive way, evoking rather an imagery of warfare: "The voice of Yahweh breaks cedars; yes, Yahweh, shatters the cedars of Lebanon" (Ps 29:5a-b), and "The voice of Yahweh causes the desert to writhe; Yahweh causes the desert Kadesh to writhe. The voice of Yahweh makes the hinds to bring forth and lays bare the forests" (Ps 29:8a-9b).

Figure 10. Basalt stela from Arslan-Tash

The overall picture that emerges from a comparison of Psalm 29:3-9 with the iconographic evidence shows a tendency toward using the prevalent iconographic motifs of particularly the northern Syrian and Mesopotamian repertoire but reapplying them polemically and subjecting them to the force of Yahweh's voice as the ultimate controlling factor in the upheaval of nature. The northern geography of the psalm furthermore contributes to such an understanding, while the imagery employed in the psalm has been utilized in such a way that it leads from the known to the surprising—that is, reinterpreting the imagery from the perspective and under the dominion of Yahweh's voice.

3.3. Contribution of Iconography to the Study of the Psalms. Although iconography can supply us with an illustration of the typical and institutional, it cannot provide “historical photographs” on the basis of which history can be reconstructed. Nevertheless, the study of ancient Near Eastern iconography can be used to reconstruct the religious concept world in which the OT was written. However, image and text have to be placed alongside each other continuously in order to create a more complete picture of the Psalter that represents a cross-section of OT religious thought. In comparing the biblical texts with the iconographic images, a number of parallels as well as contrasts can be established. On the whole, it appears that the authors of the psalms utilized imagery that was familiar to them from their general Syro-Palestinian environment and that can be related to iconographic sources reflecting such imagery. However, one can by no means talk of a one-to-one relationship, establishing a simple line of dependency. There are distinct contrasts and variations of motif on such a scale that one is compelled to assume a certain adaptation of the iconographic material in accordance with the intentions of the respective psalmist. In interpreting such a state of affairs, we would assume that the biblical author utilized imagery familiar to the ancient Near Eastern cultural background and applied it to Yahweh. During this process, a number of adaptations took place, and familiar iconographic motifs were filled with new content as they appeared in literary form in the psalms. The motivation for such a practice would be the demonstration of the superiority of Yahweh over against the ancient Near Eastern pantheon, a notion that is clearly monotheistic in orientation. Yahweh sometimes takes on attributes familiar from other gods of the ancient Near East, but he never does so in a static way; he is not restricted by them, and they do not become his emblems, designating him as weather god, war god or any other type of god per se. Rather, he fills them with a new or slightly different content and goes beyond them, which serves to create the dichotomy between the one God and the many gods. Thus Yahweh always remains the totaliter aliter.

An iconographic approach to the study of the psalms is opening new and unexpected vistas onto the Bible, which, although in literary form, often communicates its eternal truths through a variety of imagery that probably is the most appropriate way to speak about God. As a final observation, it is interesting to note that most of the relevant comparative iconographic material that can be related to the Psalter stems from Late Bronze and Iron Age archaeological contexts, a fact that may reopen the long-debated question of dating of the psalms.

See also ANIMAL IMAGERY; ARCHITECTURAL IMAGERY; CHAOS AND DEATH; CREATION IMAGERY; FLORAL IMAGERY; IMAGERY; IMPRISONMENT IMAGERY; LIFE, IMAGERY OF; MOUNTAIN IMAGERY; PROTECTION IMAGERY; THEOPHANY; WARFARE IMAGERY.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. M. Barasch, “The Idol in the Icon: Some Ambiguities,” in Representation in Religion: Studies in Honor of Moshe Barasch, ed. J. Assmann and A. I. Baumgarten (SHR 89; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 2001) 1-26; A. Basson, Divine Metaphors in Selected Hebrew Psalms of Lamentation (FAT 15; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2006); A. Berlin, The Dynamics of Biblical Parallelism (Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1985); W. P. Brown, Seeing the Psalms: A Theology of Metaphor (Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 2002); I. Cornelius, The Iconography of the Canaanite Gods Reshef and Ba'al: Late Bronze and Iron Age I Periods (c. 1500-1000 BCE) (OBO 140; Fribourg: University Press; Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1994); O. Goldwasser, From Icon to Metaphor: Studies in the Semiotics of the Hieroglyphs (OBO 142; Fribourg: University Press; Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1995); O. Jäkel, “How Can Mortal Man Understand the Road He Travels? Prospects and Problems of the Cognitive Approach to Religious Metaphor,” in The Bible through Metaphor and Translation: A Cognitive Semantic Perspective, ed. K. Feyaerts (RD 15; Oxford: Peter Lang, 2003) 55-86; O. Keel, Jahwe-Visionen und Siegelkunst: Eine neue Deutung der Majestätsschilderungen in Jes 6, Ez 1 und 10 und Sach 4 (SBS 84/85; Stuttgart: Katholisches Bibelwerk, 1977); idem, The Symbolism of the Biblical World: Ancient Near Eastern Iconography and the Book of Psalms (New York: Seabury, 1978); idem, “Iconography and the Bible,” ABD 3.358-74; O. Keel and C. Uehlinger, Gods, Goddesses, and Images of God in Ancient Israel (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1998); M. G. Klingbeil, Yahweh Fighting from Heaven: God as a Warrior and as God of Heaven in the Hebrew Psalter and Ancient Near Eastern Iconography (OBO 169; Fribourg: University Press; Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1999); D. Kroneman, "The LORD Is My Shepherd: An Exploration into the Theory and Practice of Translating Biblical Metaphor" (Ph.D. diss., Free University of Amsterdam, 2004); P. W. Macky, The Centrality of Metaphors to Biblical Thought: A Method for Interpreting the Bible (SBEC 19; Lewiston, NY: Edwin Mellen, 1990); M. Malul, The Comparative Method in Ancient Near Eastern and Biblical Legal Studies (AOAT 227; Neukirchen-Vluyn: Neukirchener Verlag, 1990); E. Panofsky, "Ikonographie und Ikonologie," in Ikonographie und Ikonologie: Theorien, Entwicklung, Probleme, ed. E. Kaemmerling (Bildende Kunst als Zeichensystem 1; Cologne: Du Mont, 1979) 207-25; L. Ryken, "Metaphor in the Psalms," ChrLit 31.3 (1982) 9-29; S. Schroer and O. Keel, Die Ikonographie Palästinas/Israels und der Alte Orient: Eine Religionsgeschichte in Bildern, 1: Vom ausgehenden Mesolithikum bis zur Frühbronzezeit (Fribourg: Academic Press, 2005).

M. G. Klingbeil

PSALTER, GROWTH OF. See DEAD SEA SCROLLS; PSALMS 1: BOOK OF.

PSALTER, SHAPE OF. See EDITORIAL CRITICISM; PSALMS 1: BOOK OF.

PSEUDO-SOLOMON. See WISDOM OF SOLOMON.

PUNS. See WORDPLAY.

PURIM

Purim is a Jewish festival dating from pre-Christian times that originally was celebrated on the fourteenth and fifteenth of Adar (February-March), though it came to entail certain practices on the thirteenth as well. The celebration of Purim commemorates the victory of *Esther and *Mordecai over Haman and the resulting conquest of the Jews over their enemies. It is a minor festival within the Jewish liturgical year, meaning that work is permitted during the festival

1. Purim in the Bible and in Early Jewish and Christian Literature
2. Origins
3. History of Celebration

1. Purim in the Bible and in Early Jewish and Christian Literature.

1.1. Esther. The book of Esther presents itself as providing the story of the origins of the festival of Purim, and its rationale is detailed in Esther 9. Haman had orchestrated a plot to exterminate the Jews on Adar 13, but Mordecai and Esther succeeded in having the decree reversed, thus allowing the Jews to defeat their enemies. However, due to the request of Esther, the Jews in *Susa were permitted to continue killing their enemies on the next day as well, the fourteenth of Adar (Esther 9:13-15). Therefore, although Purim is based on the events of Adar 13-14, it actually commemorates the respite that the Jews obtained from their enemies (Esther 9:21-22) and thus is celebrated on Adar 14-15 (see Levenson, 126). It seems clear, then, not only that the author sought to explain the origin of Purim but also why there may have been discrepancies over the date(s) on which it was to be celebrated.

In addition to giving an account of the origin of the festival, the book of Esther offers an explanation as to the origin of the festival's name. In Esther 9:24-26 the author anchors the name "Purim" in the word pûr, and in both places where pûr occurs in Esther (Esther 3:7; 9:24-26) the author translates it with the Hebrew word for "lot," gôrâl. This implies that the composition of Esther had sufficient historical and/or cultural distance from the institution of the festival to require an etymological explanation for its name. The word pûr evidently entered the Hebrew language as a loanword from the East Semitic languages, the possible candidates being either the Assyrian or the Babylonian word pûrû, meaning "lot" (see Bosman and Van Dam, 590).

It is notable that in the LXX of Esther 9:26, 28, 29 the festival is called not Purim but Phrourai ("days of protection"). In fact, the name is omitted altogether in the LXX of Esther 9:31, 32. This is particularly striking because in the LXX Additions to Esther the explanation of the festival is linked specifically to the casting of lots. In fact, the author seems to be answering the question of why the name of the holiday, Purim, is plural. These Additions to Esther were likely composed at a time when it was necessary to defend the validity of the celebration of Purim.

1.2. Early References outside the Old Testament. The earliest extant reference to the festival of Purim outside of Esther is found at the end of 2 Maccabees, where the fourteenth of Adar is called “the Day of Mordecai” (2 Macc 15:36). It is interesting to note in this respect that the author shows no awareness of the Fast of Esther, later held on the thirteenth of Adar as a preliminary event to Purim (see Goodman, 7). The other major early attestation of Purim is found in the work of Josephus (Ant. 11.291-296), who states that Phrourai (following the LXX) was still in regular observance among his contemporaries. Some scholars have also speculated that Purim may underlie the festival reference in John 5:1. However, the content of John 5 does not necessarily make the identification with Purim any more likely than with other festivals such as Tabernacles or Weeks. In any case, the fact that the festival is left unspecified is probably intentional, since that chapter of John focuses on the issue of the Sabbath.

2. Origins.

One of the most debated aspects of the book of Esther remains the origins of the festival of Purim. As one would expect, the conclusion of a particular scholar regarding this issue is largely dependent on that scholar’s view of the historicity of Esther. Those who ascribe a high degree of historicity to the book are more inclined to accept the claims of the author regarding the institution of Purim. While the festival’s Babylonian name could be explained from the Persian setting of the Esther story (contra Moore, 637), one of the primary problems not related to the historicity of Esther for these scholars is the absence of religious motifs that one would expect in a Jewish festival. In fact, there are a number of elements that found their way into the celebration of the festival that run counter to Jewish norms (see 3 below).

Those who regard Esther as primarily a secondary, fictional story that was written in order to provide an etiology for the festival itself have naturally searched for the origins of the festival in other ancient Near Eastern cultures. On the basis of the Babylonian origin of the name and the similarity of the names “Esther,” “Mordecai,” “Haman,” and “*Vashti” to the Babylonian gods Ishtar and Marduk and the Elamite gods Humman and Mashti, the most common hypotheses over the past century and a half have centered on a Persian or a Babylonian provenance for Purim. Indeed, scholars have pointed out a number of similarities between Purim and various pagan festivals such as Farvardigan, the Zoroastrian Festival of the Dead (see Moore, 637) and the Babylonian New Year festival (Polish). However, given the combative nature of the story of Esther, the parallels with Babylonian or Persian cultures could indicate not dependence but rather polemical engagement. A smaller number of scholars (e.g., Herst) have also postulated a Palestinian origin for Purim, arguing that it is an adaptation of the festival held on the thirteenth of Adar to celebrate Judas Maccabaeus’s victory over Nicanor in 161 BC (cf. 1 Macc 7:26-50).

Yet in the final analysis it must be admitted that the alleged external origins of Purim are largely dependent on the assumption that Esther lacks historicity. On balance, the number of proposals for the festival’s origin, none of which has come close to commanding a consensus, indicates that our knowledge of this aspect of early Judaism is insufficient to move us beyond mere conjecture. Consequently, at this point the search for the historical origins of Purim has lost much of its fervor, and it seems unlikely that any theory of the origins of Purim, including that found in the book of Esther, will gain scholarly consensus in the near future.

3. History of Celebration.

3.1. The Second Temple Period and Late Antiquity. As mentioned above, the evidence concerning the celebration of Purim in early Judaism is sparse. Just as there have been no copies of Esther discovered among the *Dead Sea Scrolls, so also there is no evidence that Purim was observed at Qumran. Scholars have offered a number of explanations for this phenomenon, but the precise reason for its absence is still not clear. It is possible, though not certain, that Purim was recognized in Jerusalem as early as the third century BC when the LXX began to be produced (Bloch 1980, 281). From what can be deduced from mishnaic sources, it seems that the earliest celebrations in the land of Palestine did not contain the exuberant customs that would appear later (see 3.2 below). In fact, in Esther Rabbah there are numerous exhortations on the virtues of temperance. Rather, Purim probably was marked by a certain degree of solemnity, with informal retellings of the story of the festival’s origins among families and possibly also the exchange of gifts. By the first century AD the scroll of Esther, or at least parts of it, began to be read publicly in Jerusalem and the surrounding areas. Apparently in conformity with Esther 9:17-18, the feasting and the reading of the Esther scroll took place on different days, on the fourteenth for open cities and on the fifteenth for walled cities. Further allowances were made for the schedules of farmers, who came to market only on Mondays and Thursdays and would therefore have the scroll read to them at that time (b. Meg. 4a). Likewise, if either the fourteenth or the fifteenth of Adar fell on a Sabbath, the reading of the scroll was moved to the thirteenth or the fourteenth respectively.

With the fall of the second temple in AD 70 and the resulting dislocation of the Jews from the land of Israel, the celebration of Purim took on a uniform character, and the allowances for farmers and the divergent dates for celebration were eliminated in favor of one celebration to be held on the fourteenth of Adar (see b. Meg. 2a; cf. b. B. Bat. 25b). The historical reasons for this phenomenon are not completely clear, and several explanations have been offered throughout Jewish history, ranging from Rabbi Yochanan (third century) through medieval times (Bloch 1980, 282-83). Although there were a few who objected to the institutionalization of Purim (b. Meg. 7a), the events of the second century AD made the formal acceptance of Purim relatively easy.

In light of the devastating effect of the destruction of the temple in 70 AD, one can see how the story behind Purim, detailing the deliverance of the Jews from those who were persecuting them, took on added significance. This development was strengthened by the nearly contemporary recognition of Esther's canonicity and helped to elevate the significance of Purim and the corresponding public reading of Esther in the Jewish liturgical calendar. From the second century AD forward, the public reading of the scroll of Esther became the central feature of the celebration of Purim, and typically it was performed in both the morning and the evening (b. Meg. 4a) and with a special cantillation (see Megillot and Festivals). By this time, another major feature of Purim, the collecting of funds for the poor (based on Esther 9:22), was also well established.

3.2. The Post-Talmudic and Medieval Periods.

In subsequent centuries the celebration of Purim began to take on an increasingly jubilant character, most likely from the influence of Babylonian Jews (Segal, 116). Already by the fourth century, the sage Raba had famously declared that on Purim people should become so intoxicated that they could not distinguish between cursing Haman and blessing Mordecai (b. Meg. 7b). In approaching the medieval period, Purim began to take on several customs that added to the drama and pageantry of the festival. Among the most enduring practices is the custom, dating from the twelfth century in Italy and southern France, of producing parodies of everything from the Talmud to popular Jewish culture. The typical method of these parodies was inversion and satire of religious and social structures. Talmud students were permitted to mock their teachers, and in Eastern Europe the practice began of electing a "Purim Rabbi" who would deride and make fun of those in religious and social authority. This motif of inversion and parody also manifested itself in other aspects of Jewish life. Gambling and intoxication were permitted only on Purim. Furthermore, the tradition of masquerading, dating from sometime in the medieval period, eventually developed to the point of cross-dressing, which, though strictly prohibited by the Torah (Deut 22:5), in the fifteenth century was ruled permissible during Purim by Rabbi Moses Mintz (Bloch 1980, 292). Of course, there were some who objected to these practices as being excessive, but on the whole they became widely accepted throughout Judaism.

3.3. The Modern Period. Just as Purim was particularly poignant after the fall of the second temple, it has again taken on special significance in post-Holocaust Judaism due to the manifest parallels between Haman and Hitler. Although some Reform congregations have abolished the observance of the festival, it is still widely observed and enjoyed in modern Judaism and is particularly revered among both Hasidic and Kabbalistic groups. The most visible celebration of Purim since the 1920s, especially in Israel, is the yearly Adloyada (meaning "until one does not know," from Raba's statement) carnival in Tel Aviv, which involves food and drink, a parade, and even a beauty pageant to select a "Queen Esther."

See also MEGILLOT AND FESTIVALS.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. A. Bloch, The Biblical and Historical Background of the Jewish Holy Days (New York: KTAV, 1978); idem, The Biblical and Histori-

- cal Background of Jewish Customs and Ceremonies* (New York: KTAV, 1980); H. Bosman and C. Van Dam, “פּוּרִים,” NIDOTTE 3.590-91; P. Goodman, The Purim Anthology (Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society, 1964); R. E. Herst, “The Purim Connection,” USQR 28 (1973) 139-45; L. Jacobs, “Purim,” EncJud 13.1390-95; K. Jobs, Esther (NIVAC; Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1999); J. D. Levenson, Esther (OTL; Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 1997); C. A. Moore, “Esther, Book of,” ABD 2.633-43; D. Polish, “Aspects of Esther: A Phenomenological Exploration of the Megillah of Esther and the Origins of Purim,” JSOT 85 (1999) 85-106; E. Segal, Holidays, History, and Halakhah (Northvale, NJ: Jason Aronson, 2000).

B. C. Gregory

Q

QINAH METER. See METER.

QOHELET

“Qohelet” is the title of the character to whom the words recorded in Ecclesiastes 1:2—12:8 are attributed, the remainder of the book being the work of an anonymous “frame narrator” (see Frame Narrative). Although Qohelet’s words form the bulk of the book of *Ecclesiastes, it does not necessarily follow that the messages of the book and of Qohelet coincide. Indeed, the fact that the narrator presents what is effectively an extended quotation from Qohelet allows for some distance to be maintained between the two (see Longman 1998; Shields). Consequently, both the book as a whole and the character Qohelet deserve separate examination. This article focuses on the latter.

1. The Meaning of “Qohelet”
2. The Identity of Qohelet
3. The Teaching of Qohelet
4. Summary

1. The Meaning of “Qohelet.”

The designation “Qohelet” is an English transliteration of the Hebrew word qōhelet, used to describe the otherwise anonymous speaker of the words recorded in the first-person voice throughout the body of the book of Ecclesiastes. That the word qōhelet probably is a title rather than a name is suggested by the fact that the morphologically feminine word qōhelet is formally similar to other words describing occupations (e.g., Ezra 2:55, 57; Neh 7:57, 59), that elsewhere substantive participles are used to designate a profession (see Fox, 161), and by the appearance of the definite article on the term in Ecclesiastes 12:8 and probably also in Ecclesiastes 7:27. The translation rather than transliteration of the term in the LXX also suggests that it was likely understood as a title at the time Ecclesiastes was translated into Greek.

Many modern translations render “Qohelet” with “Preacher,” implying a religious context to the activity of Qohelet. This reflects an understanding of the significance of the term qōhelet at least partly influenced by the shift in meaning of the Greek ekklēsia from secular to religious, so that the Greek Ekklesiastēs came also to be associated with a religious context (Whybray 1989, 18). The fact that Qohelet is said to teach the people (Eccles 12:9) and his activities are compared to a shepherd pastoring a flock (Eccles 12:11) is cited as evidence that the religious overtones of “preacher” are appropriate (Seow 2001, 249).

This, however, is probably not the best understanding of the term qōhelet. The epilogue specifies that Qohelet taught knowledge (da‘at [Eccles 12:9]), and although the content of that knowledge is not spelled out, within the context of Wisdom literature such knowledge is parallel with wisdom, which, for Qohelet, offers little information about God. The title qōhelet is nowhere used with reference to any religious functionary elsewhere in the Bible. The identification of Qohelet as a *sage more likely implies that Qohelet taught wisdom to the people, and the content of the wisdom recorded in Ecclesiastes is marked by the absence of references to the major religious tenets of ancient Israel. These considerations highlight the inappropriateness of a religious interpretation for the title.

The root meaning of the term qōhelet lies in “gather,” and most commentators agree that Qohelet is so designated for his work in gathering, whether gathering of wealth, of people for instruction in wisdom, or of wisdom sayings in his guise as a sage. Linguistically, it is perhaps the second of these options that is to be preferred, since the verb qāhal is elsewhere always used in reference to gathering people, and the nominal forms always elsewhere refer to gatherings of people.

2. The Identity of Qohelet.

2.1. Qohelet as King Solomon. Traditionally, Qohelet has been identified with *Solomon, and there are good grounds for concluding that we are meant to associate the two. Qohelet claims to have been a son of *David (Eccles 1:1), who was king over Israel—not just Judah—in Jerusalem (Eccles 1:1, 12). Both Solomon and Qohelet were wise men par excellence (1 Kings 4:29-34; Eccles 1:13-17; 12:9), extremely rich (1 Kings 4:21-28; Eccles 2:7-10), the owners of cattle and gardens (1 Chron 27:27-31; Eccles 2:4-7), masters of many slaves (1 Kings 10:5; Eccles 2:7) and concubines (1 Kings 11:3; Eccles 2:8, although see Seow 1997, 131; Shields, 131-32), and had many musicians (1 Chron 25; 2 Chron 5:12-13; Eccles 2:8). Attempts to associate Qohelet with other historical figures do not share these numerous parallels.

D. G. Meade (57-58) notes the reason for the identification with Solomon: “The choice of Solomon by Qoheleth is also a deliberate attempt to place his work firmly in the context of the Solomonic wisdom tradition.” In addition to this, however, Qohelet’s identification with the foremost sage in ancient Israel puts his wisdom beyond dispute, in spite of his many disturbing conclusions.

There are, however, a few difficulties with identifying Qohelet with Solomon, aside from the failure of the text to make the identification explicit. First, it has long been held that Ecclesiastes 1:12 implies that Qohelet had been king but was, at the time of writing, no longer king. This understanding is reflected in the LXX as well as in Jewish tradition but does not correspond to what is recorded about Solomon’s reign elsewhere in the Bible. C.-L. Seow (1997, 119), however, argues that the verb form here can be understood to indicate an existing state, not necessarily a past state, although elsewhere in Ecclesiastes the perfect form of the verb hyh (“be”) frequently refers to the past (e.g., Eccles 1:9; 3:15; 7:10).

Another oft-cited problem is found in Ecclesiastes 1:16, which extols Qohelet’s wisdom as greater than that of any of his predecessors in Jerusalem. Such a claim sounds a little hollow for Solomon, whose only predecessor was David. Against this, however, is the fact that similar language is explicitly used of Solomon in 1 Chronicles 29:25, suggesting that the assertion may be formulaic and should merely be understood as a superlative reference to his wisdom (see Seow 1995, 282).

Finally, most scholars also believe that Qohelet’s guise as king is a pretense that is dropped after Ecclesiastes 2, where royal status no longer plays any significant part in the argument. This claim is enhanced by the presence of a number of passages thought not to reflect the perspective of a king because they complain about injustices that the king presumably could have redressed (e.g., Eccles 4:1-3; 5:8-9 [see Meade, 56; Kaiser, 84]). Seow (1997, 48) argues that this pretense is a deliberate adoption by the author of the genre of royal autobiography precisely in order to subvert it and demonstrate that even the greatest and wisest kings share the same senseless fate as the rest of us. However, M. V. Fox (153) notes that although Qohelet’s royal status disappears from view after Ecclesiastes 2, it is never “cancelled.” Furthermore, the identification by Longman (1991, 120-23) of generic parallels with fictional Akkadian autobiographies with didactic endings suggests that any disjunction between the “royal fiction” of Ecclesiastes 1–2 and the remainder of the work is ill founded (see Autobiography).

The failure of the text explicitly to identify Solomon as Qohelet, however, should not be overlooked. No other OT text makes such allusions in ascribing authorship, nor is there any reticence in ascribing Solomon as author of substantial portions of *Proverbs as well as of some nonbiblical texts such as Psalms of Solomon. B. K. Waltke (35) notes that the failure of the text to explicitly identify Solomon as the author allows Qohelet to be associated with Solomon while avoiding the “morally questionable practice of pseudonymity.” The fact that Qohelet is never explicitly identified with Solomon suggests that the association exists to serve a purpose other than outright identification, and the most widely recognized reason for the association is to establish the authority and integrity of Qohelet’s wisdom (see Fox, 159-60).

2.2. Qohelet the Sage. Less controversial is the identification of Qohelet as a wise man, a sage. We are told in the epilogue that Qohelet not only was wise but also taught and even corrected the wisdom of others (Eccles 12:9-10 [see Shields, 62-63]). Qohelet also proclaims his own prowess as a sage (Eccles 1:16). He frequently adopts common wisdom forms in his writing (e.g., Eccles 10:1-15). He claims to use his wisdom in search of answers to the problems of life (e.g., Eccles 1:13), and his primary question, “What gain is there for a person in all his toil at which he toils under the sun?” (Eccles 1:3 [see Ogden, 22-26]) essentially underpins the entire wisdom enterprise (see Crenshaw, 10; Shields, 125).

Furthermore, Qohelet is not merely identified as a sage; he is identified as the preeminent sage. This is apparent from his implied identification with Solomon (see 2.1 above), his own testimony (Eccles 1:16), as well as the description in the epilogue (Eccles 12:9-10). He corrected wisdom and taught the people, suggesting that wisdom was more than a hobby—it was his profession. The effect of all this is to assure the reader that Qohelet’s qualifications as a sage were beyond reproach.

2.3. Qohelet the Old Man. Few other things can be said about Qohelet’s identity. Most conclude that he was an older man—an impression built upon the retrospectivity of his autobiographical reflections in Ecclesiastes 1–2 (as well as the time it would have taken to accomplish all that is recorded in those chapters), on his concern over the status of his legacy, on his preoccupation with death, and on the inference that his advice to the young must be made from the perspective of one who can look back on his own youth (Eccles 11:9; 12:1). Although R. N. Whybray (1989, 21-22) notes that these arguments cannot conclusively prove Qohelet’s advanced age, he agrees that he is at least “mature.”

2.4. Was Qohelet a Real Person? The difficulty in identifying Qohelet with any known historical figure, together with the text’s failure to explicitly identify him, do lend some credence to the notion that Qohelet may have been a construct of the frame narrator, a foil through whom the narrator makes plain his meaning (see Fox, 159-60). Furthermore, the fact that most scholars do identify Qohelet as a real person may in part be attributable to the influence of *historical criticism that relegated the frame narrator’s words to a later editor and thus afforded them little significance in understanding the words of Qohelet that they enclose. If the frame is treated as original—and there is no evidence that it is not—then the frame narrator is responsible for the final form of the work and the shape and form of Qohelet’s words.

Ultimately, there is insufficient data to decide whether Qohelet existed or was merely a creation of the frame narrator. Furthermore, the “reality” of Qohelet has little bearing on the ultimate interpretation of Ecclesiastes, for even if he did exist, the material attributed to him in the book of Ecclesiastes has been selected and arranged by the frame narrator for his own ends.

3. The Teaching of Qohelet.

The teaching of Qohelet recorded in Ecclesiastes provides us with insight into Qohelet’s beliefs. The diversity of interpretations of Qohelet’s words indicates that there is consensus neither on their meaning nor on the aim of Qohelet’s teaching or even on much of its substance.

3.1. Qohelet’s Contradictions. One prominent feature of Qohelet’s words that complicates any systematic attempt to understand his thinking on many topics is the apparent contradictions with both the remainder of the OT (such as the advice of Eccles 7:16; 9:2-3; 11:9 [cf. Num 15:39]) and among his own sayings (e.g., on life and death [Eccles 9:4-6 versus Eccles 2:17; 4:2]; regarding wisdom [Eccles 1:17-18; 2:13-16 versus Eccles 7:11, 19; 9:16-18]).

A number of schemes have been devised for handling these inconsistencies. It is widely acknowledged that Qohelet occasionally quotes from another source in order to respond to it, and this understanding has been employed most extensively by T. A. Perry. This allows contradictory passages to be assigned to different voices, not to Qohelet’s one voice. Perry’s approach offers a neat solution to the problem, but is itself improbable because in the vast majority of instances that Perry identifies, the text lacks sufficiently clear indicators that the speaker is changing (Shields, 3-4), and the introductory description of the work as the “words of Qohelet” (Eccles 1:1) conditions the reader to treat the subsequent material as being from Qohelet alone unless there are unambiguous signs to the contrary.

Another solution is the idea that Qohelet’s contradictions reflect the reality of life: not everything can be reconciled, and there are inevitable paradoxes—a notion reflected also in Proverbs 26:4-5 (Fox, 3). Similar is the suggestion that Qohelet's words were designed to present not a unified perspective but rather Qohelet's own developing understanding of the world in which he lived, although the idea of progress in Qohelet's thought is undermined by the narrator's failure to acknowledge it by closing Qohelet's words with the same summary with which they were opened.

In the end, the contradictions may reflect a number of these factors. Within the context of the work as a whole they can be seen as just one expression of the failure of Qohelet to make sense of the world in which he lived, a failure ultimately expressed by the narrator in the summary statement found at the beginning and end of Qohelet's words: "Everything is senseless."

3.2. Everything Is Senseless. There has been some debate about what, if anything, constitutes Qohelet's main thesis. G. S. Ogden (14-15), for example, sees the question of advantage (Eccles 1:3; 2:22; 3:9; 5:16; 6:11) as fundamental to Qohelet's point. Others suggest that Qohelet's main point is to commend joy in life (see 3.6 below). These approaches, however, overlook the fact that the frame narrator has explicitly identified the point he most wants to highlight from Qohelet's teaching: "Everything is senseless [hebel]" (Eccles 1:2; 12:8).

The Hebrew term hebel has been interpreted in a number of different ways, although almost everyone agrees that it is negative. The term has traditionally been rendered in English with the word "vanity," although this word is no longer in favor because it has undergone a decisive semantic shift away from meaning "empty" to meaning "self-pride." Other suggestions include "fleeting" or "transitory," "futile," "senseless," "incomprehensible," "mystery" or "enigma," "meaningless" and "absurd." Although it is both difficult and inappropriate to attempt to equate the Hebrew term with any single English gloss, it is perhaps the idea that everything is senseless that most closely corresponds with Qohelet's awareness that the sage cannot comprehend the world—it makes no sense, and so wisdom's worth is severely constrained (e.g., Eccles 8:17 [see Shields, 112-21; Fox, 31 n. 5]).

3.3. God. There are a number of aspects to Qohelet's theology that are difficult to reconcile with the remainder of the OT. Qohelet gives no indication that he is aware of any form of divine revelation. *God is distant, mysterious and inaccessible (see Dumbrell, 242-43). Qohelet's words, quite unlike those of the psalmists, reflect no personal relationship with God, but only a reluctant admission that life is subject to his unpredictable whims. Knowledge of God, for Qohelet, is based not on revelation but rather on observation and analysis.

Yet in spite of this, for Qohelet, God is absolutely sovereign. In accord with the fundamental presuppositions of wisdom in ancient Israel, he acknowledges that God is in control of all that takes place, and that he appropriately orders all events (Eccles 3:1-8, 11). However, whereas the task of the sage was to learn to benefit from an awareness of the inner workings of God's world, Qohelet discovered that God had not revealed this information, and thus the sages were incapable of fulfilling this task (Eccles 3:11; 8:17). Any chance to enjoy one's toil, according to Qohelet, is entirely contingent upon God (Eccles 2:24-26). J. L. Crenshaw (124) notes that Qohelet "speaks as if God were indifferent power before which we must cower in fear," and "in Qoheleth's mind it was impossible to tell whether God looked on humans with interest or with disdain."

Qohelet's doubts about God's goodness thus are clear: he believes that God is in control and that there are appropriate times for all things, yet the world does not operate according to any discernible principle of justice that was essentially foundational to the thinking of the sages. The logic of the sages and the logic of God are irreconcilable, and so the world makes no sense—all is hebel.

3.4. Wisdom. Qohelet's attitude toward wisdom is not clear-cut. In a number of places he appears to extol wisdom's virtues (Eccles 2:13-14; 4:13; 7:5, 11-12, 19; 8:1, 5; 9:15; 10:10), but elsewhere he urges caution in embracing wisdom (Eccles 7:16), affirms its frailty and its unattainability (Eccles 7:23; 8:16-17; 9:11, 18; 10:1), and warns that it brings only trouble (Eccles 1:18). Although some attribute this apparent ambivalence toward wisdom to Qohelet's quotation of traditional wisdom in order to refute it (see George, 284), it is not clear that all these passages can simply be written off as quotations. Whatever merits wisdom may have, however, are only relative, since both fool and sage share the same fate—death—and so wisdom clearly offers no solution to the ultimate problem facing everyone (Eccles 2:15-16; 9:3). The sage, according to Qohelet, cannot understand the workings of God's world and so is unable to use wisdom to secure good outcomes in life. As such, wisdom is of only relative merit and is sometimes more trouble than it is worth (Eccles 1:18; 7:16). In reaching this conclusion, Qohelet is in agreement with the negative attitude toward human wisdom presented in the bulk of the remainder of the OT (Shields, 7-20; Spina, 271). On the other hand, Qohelet's assessment of wisdom seems at odds with any reading of Proverbs that understands that book as teaching that the attaining of wisdom affords the wise the ability to steer their way through life avoiding strife and gaining wealth and long life, or as teaching that God predictably operates in this world according to principles of retributive justice wherein the good are rewarded and the bad punished (see Sneed, 48-49; Dumbrell, 246).

3.5. Death. A number of scholars have highlighted the centrality and severity of death in Qohelet's thought (see, e.g., Burkes, 35-80). Death is fundamental to all of Qohelet's thought, for it is the inevitability of death that undermines every attempt to make sense of life and so forces him to conclude that everything is senseless (hebel). For Qohelet, wisdom's benefit over folly* is only relative because death comes to both sage and fool (Eccles 2:12-17). Likewise, any benefit gained from hard work is lost because of death (Eccles 2:18-23). W. P. Brown (139-40) summarizes Qohelet's thoughts on death: "Death ultimately undermines all distinctions between the righteous and the wicked, even between humans and animals. It topples all lofty aspirations and thus inspires a profound acceptance of life on its own terms. Instead of espousing suicide as the final solution, Qoheleth commends the fleeting, yet redemptive, nature of enjoyment (9:7-10)" (cf. Burkes, 74).

3.6. Joy. Another repeated theme of Qohelet's is the exhortation to enjoy life (e.g., Eccles 2:10, 24; 3:12, 22; 5:17-18). A few scholars have picked up on this and suggested that it ought to be considered the final message that Qohelet wishes to convey to his readers (see Whybray 1982; Kaiser, 93; Kline, 32-36). Ogden (48) also finds Qohelet's exhortations to enjoy life supersede his despair: "Qoheleth is life-affirming because he envisages human life in all its mystery as a gift of God. He may at times feel despair, and on occasion 'hate' life both for what he sees and experiences in it, but these are only passing responses. His final and decisive response, and thus his advice to all, is 'take and eat,' for God has given you life."

Although it cannot be denied that Qohelet affirms the enjoyment of life, the significance of his affirmation can be (and frequently has been) overstated. Qohelet affirms joy not because it is the goal of life but rather because life itself is empty and senseless—he does not say that joy is good, but only that there's nothing better (see Eccles 2:24). If there is no ultimate purpose, then the best that Qohelet can suggest in his wisdom is that his students enjoy what they can when they can. Yet even this is not the whole story for Qohelet, who also recognizes that enjoyment is contingent upon God's will (Eccles 2:24-25; 6:2 [see Seow 1997, 48]), and since God's ways are inscrutable, joy is sporadic and unpredictable and should be seized when it presents itself. However, it cannot reliably be secured by the sage, because the world makes no sense (see Sneed, 49-50).

4. Summary.

Qohelet is a complex character whose depiction in the text is sometimes difficult to assemble into a consistent figure. Two points stand out. First, the narrator of Ecclesiastes presents Qohelet as a real person with the highest credentials as sage and king and expects us as readers to take his words and his experiences seriously so that we may learn from him as well as from the few words that the narrator appends to Qohelet's teachings. Qohelet's autobiographical speech and first-person reflections, his appeals to his status and experience, and the affirmations of the epilogue all serve to present Qohelet as the ultimate sage, whose reflections on wisdom are both accurate and trustworthy. Qohelet's message was that although wisdom could provide some benefits, in the end it could not solve the great problems of life and death.

Second, much of what Qohelet says is disturbing and difficult to reconcile with the remainder of the OT. Scholars have made numerous attempts to address this problem, and the diversity in approaches highlights the depth of the problem. In the end, however, the frame narrator calls us to recognize that Qohelet is right: the speculative wisdom of Qohelet cannot make sense of the world. The narrator points to another answer: obedience to God (Eccles 12:13).

See also AUTOBIOGRAPHY; ECCLESIASTES 1: BOOK OF; SOLOMON.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. W. P. Brown, Character in Crisis: A Fresh Approach to the Wisdom Literature of the Old Testament (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1996); S. Burkes, Death in Qoheleth and Egyptian Biographies of the Late Period (SBLDS 170; Atlanta: Society of Biblical Literature, 1999); J. L. Crenshaw, Old Testament Wisdom: An Introduction (rev. ed.; Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 1998); W. J. Dumbrell, The Faith of Israel (Leicester: Apollos, 1988); M. V. Fox, A Time to Tear Down and a Time to Build Up: A Rereading of Ecclesiastes (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1999); M. K. George, "Death as the Beginning of Life in the Book of Ecclesiastes," in Strange Fire: Reading the Bible after the Holocaust, ed. T. Linfelt (New York: New York University Press, 2000) 280-93; O. Kaiser, "Qoheleth," in Wisdom in Ancient Israel: Essays in Honour of J. A. Emerton, ed. J. Day, R. P. Gordon and H. G. M. Williamson (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1995) 83-93; M. M. Kline, "Is Qoheleth Unorthodox? A Review Article," Kerux 13 (1998) 16-39; T. Longman III, Fictional Akkadian Autobiography: A Generic and Comparative Study (Winona Lake, IN: Eisenbrauns, 1991); idem, The Book of Ecclesiastes (NICOT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1998); D. G. Meade, Pseudonymity and Canon: An Invest- igation into the Relationship of Authorship and Authority in Jewish and Earliest Christian Tradition (WUNT 39; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 1986); G. S. Ogden, Qoheleth (Readings; Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1987); T. A. Perry, Dialogues with Kohelet: The Book of Ecclesiastes (University Park: Pennsylvania State University Press, 1993); C.-L. Seow, "Qohelet's Autobiography" in Fortunate the Eyes That See: Essays in Honor of David Noel Freedman in Celebration of His Seventieth Birthday, ed. A. B. Beck et al. (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1995) 275-87; idem, Ecclesiastes (AB 18C; New York: Doubleday, 1997). idem, "Theology When Everything Is Out of Control," Interpretation 55 (2001) 237-49. M. A. Shields, The End of Wisdom: A Reappraisal of the Historical and Canonical Function of Ecclesiastes (Winona Lake, IN: Eisenbrauns, 2006); M. Sneed, "The Social Location of the Book of Qoheleth," HS 39 (1998) 41-51; F. A. Spina, "Qoheleth and the Reformation of Wisdom," in The Quest for the Kingdom of God: Studies in Honor of George E. Mendenhall, ed. H. B. Huffman, F. A. Spina and A. R. W. Green (Winona Lake, IN: Eisenbrauns, 1983) 267-79; B. K. Waltke, The Book of Proverbs: Chapters 1-15 (NICOT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2004); R. N. Whybray, "Qoheleth, Preacher of Joy," JSOT 23 (1982) 87-98; idem, Ecclesiastes (OTG; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1989).

M. A. Shields

QUMRAN. See DEAD SEA SCROLLS.

R

REFRAIN

Hebrew poetry features repetitions on many levels, from the phoneme to whole verses. A refrain is a repetition on the macrolevel (i.e., the verse) and is easily observed even in translation. The English word refrain (there is no known ancient Hebrew equivalent) derives from an Old French verb, refraindre (“repeat”), which itself may come from Vulgar Latin refringere. What distinguishes the refrain from other forms of repetition is that it occurs on the verse level and serves to end a section. Refrains occur in songs and poems (and *Psalms and *Song of Songs are both). Refrains may be distinguished from an envelope structure (i.e., *inclusio), which refers to a poetic unit (sometimes the whole poem [see Ps 8]), which begins and ends with the same verse, the repetition occurring only in these two places.

W. Watson (295-99) helpfully distinguishes three types of refrain: strict refrain, variant refrain and chorus. The first type is verbatim, and the second reveal variations, but only enough that they are still recognizable as related. The chorus is differentiated from the other two by frequency of occurrence in the poem (see on Ps 136 below).

1. The Function of the Refrain
2. Refrain in Psalms
3. Refrain in Song of Songs
4. Refrain in Ecclesiastes
5. Refrain in Job 28

1. The Function of the Refrain.

Refrains serve a variety of functions in songs and poems (or even narrative). First, it is a structural device segmenting a composition into different sections, often referred to as a strophe or stanza (Watson, 32, 34; van der Lugt). In this regard, if the refrain ends the poem, it can also give the poem a sense of closure (Pss 42–43). Second, since a refrain is repeated at least twice in a poem, it gives the thought expressed in the refrain a certain importance by means of emphasis. One comes away from a song or a poem with the thought or idea expressed by the refrain reverberating in one’s mind. Third, the refrain, at times at least, invites the participation of the audience. Indications are (see on Pss 24; 136 below) that the performance of some poems involved the leader (a priest?) who would recite or sing parts of the psalm while the audience (congregation?) would respond with the words of the refrain.

2. Refrain in Psalms.

Since the psalms are poems as well as songs, one might expect to find the use of refrains. This is indeed the case, although one might be surprised at their infrequency. The following psalms contain repetitions that seem to be some form of refrain.

2.1. Psalms 24; 46. Psalm 24 has a liturgical feel to its use of the refrain. After a kind of entrance liturgy asking and answering the question of who can enter the holy place, the final verses are an interchange between two parties that are best understood as the priest or priests who are serving as gatekeepers to the city or temple and the priests who are accompanying the ark of the covenant back after successful holy war. The latter call on the former to open the gates to allow entry (Ps 24:7, 9). The gatekeepers then ask, “Who is the king of glory?” (Ps 24:8, 10), followed by the response from the first group that it is the Lord in his appearance as warrior (there is some variety in this refrain).

Psalm 46 is another psalm that celebrates God’s power to protect his people as their warrior in the context of holy war. The psalm’s twice-repeated refrain, “The LORD of heaven’s armies is here among us; the God of Jacob is our fortress” (Ps 46:7, 11), emphasizes this theme and brings both the poem’s first part and the poem as a whole to a close. Some commentators suggest or at least wonder whether there might have been originally a refrain between v. 3 and v. 4, since that would lead to the formation of three equal length stanzas. There is, however, no textual evidence for this (Terrien, 370-71).

2.2. Psalms 42—43. These psalms are united by a common refrain (Ps 42:5, 11; 43:5) and thus are often considered an original unity, though no convincing reason has been suggested for why they were eventually divided. Treating the two psalms as one, we can recognize the composition as a lament bemoaning the psalmist’s separation from the presence of God and the mocking that he receives from other people (see Lament, Psalms of). The psalmist’s grief is intensified by memory of intimate fellowship with God (Ps 42:4). The thrice-repeated refrain then expresses the psalmist’s grief, but it also includes an attempt to transform grief into hope: “Why are you downcast, O my soul? Why so disturbed within me? Put your hope in God, for I will yet praise him, my help and my God.”

The emphasis in the psalm, then, is the psalmist’s present state of mind as well as his hope for transformation from sadness to hope. Besides adding emphasis, the refrain structures the poem into three stanzas (Ps 42:1-5, 6-11; 43:1-5) and provides a sense of closure, since the third repetition ends the poem.

2.3. Psalm 49. This psalm is well known for sharing similar theological and ethical concerns as the book of *Ecclesiastes. The psalmist, however, has a sense, not shared by *Qohelet, that there is a difference between the death of the godly and that of the foolish (Eccles 3:16-22; 9:1-12; 12:1-7). A twice-recurring refrain emphasizes the negative end of the latter: “A man who has riches without understanding is like the beasts that perish” (Ps 49:12, 20).

2.4. Psalm 56. According to the strophic analysis by S. Terrien, the refrain of this psalm, professing trust in God, occurs in the middle of the strophe. The second occurrence (Ps 56:10-11) is longer than the first (Ps 56:4), and both express the kind of confidence that the godly person has even in the presence of dangerous enemies.

2.5. Psalm 57. This psalm begins like a lament, asking God to protect the psalmist from dangerous enemies, and concludes, not atypically for a lament, with a statement of confidence. The twice-repeated refrain, “Be exalted, O God, above the heavens. Let your glory be over all the earth” (Ps 57:5, 11), seeks the exaltation of God.

2.6. Psalm 67. This short psalm has a twice-repeated refrain (Ps 67:3, 5 [in this case, not ending the poem]). The poem expresses the desire that God be praised throughout the world, and that is the hope expressed in the refrain: “May the nations praise you, O God. Yes, may all the nations praise you.”

2.7. Psalm 80. This psalm is meant for a time when God seems absent from his people and they feel pressed by their enemies. The refrain captures the intention of the psalm, which is to persuade God to return his protective presence to them: “Restore us . . . and let your face shine upon us, that we may be saved.” It is repeated three times (Ps 80:3, 7, 19), the second and third occurrences varying from the first in that rather than simply referring to God as “God” (’ēlōhīm), they use God’s battle name, “God of heaven’s armies” (’ēlōhīm sēbā’ōt).

2.8. Psalm 99. This psalm is a kingship *hymn that praises God as king (see Kingship Psalms). The refrain, which varies in its three occurrences, calls on Israel to praise God because of his holy nature (Ps 99:3, 5, 9).

2.9. Psalm 107. This psalm demonstrates an unusual use of two refrains: the one seems to answer the other. Four times the psalmist talks about a specific problem and uses the refrain “Then they cried out to the LORD in their trouble, and he delivered them from their distress” (Ps 107:6, 13, 19, 28), and four times, after describing God’s response to their cry for help, the psalmist says, “Let them give thanks to the LORD for his unfailing love and his wonderful deeds for men” (Ps 107:8, 15, 21, 31).

2.10. Psalm 136. This psalm contains a stellar example of what Watson calls a chorus, which is a refrain that permeates a passage. In this case, all twenty-six verses conclude with the statement “for his covenant love is forever” (kī lē’ōlām hasdō). The first part of the verses typically recounts some great act of Yahweh. The psalm is a remembrance psalm that, after thanking God for who he is (Ps 136:1-3), continues by praising God for what he has done, beginning with the creation and then continuing with the exodus from Egypt and settling his people in the Promised Land. The psalm is traditionally understood to have a liturgical setting, with the priest speaking the first colon of the verses and the congregation responding with the refrain.

3. Refrain in Song of Songs.

Most modern interpreters agree that Song of Songs is love poetry, but differences still exist between those who see it is a drama and those who see it is an anthology, a collection of love poems. Among those who adopt the anthological view of the book, the next question concerns how to divide the poems and whether there is any cohesiveness to the collection as a whole (Longman 2001, 54-56). The appearance of two refrains throughout the book provides strong evidence, along with other verbal echoes, consistency of characters and repetition of scenes, in favor of affirming some level of cohesiveness to the question, though attempts to work out a tight and definite overall structure of the book may be overreaching (Dorsey, 199-213).

The refrains also serve to emphasize certain major ideas in Song of Songs. The first refrain, "His left hand is under my head, and his right hand embraces me" (Song 2:6; 8:3), binds the beginning and end of Songs of Songs and highlights the intimacy of the relationship between the man and the woman in this book, which celebrates human love. The second refrain, "I adjure you, daughters of Jerusalem, by the gazelles or the deer of the field, not to awaken or arouse love until it desires" (Song 1:7; and, with some variation, Song 3:5; 8:4), warns against stepping too quickly into such an intimate relationship (see Schwab)

4. Refrain in Ecclesiastes.

Scholars and translations differ over whether Ecclesiastes is predominantly prose or poetry. No doubt exists, however, about the recurrence of various refrains throughout the book. These refrains include a rhetorical question, "What profit is there . . . ?" (Eccles 1:3; 3:9; 5:16), as well as the statement that pursuing purpose in life is "like chasing the wind" (Eccles 1:14; 2:11, 17, 26; 4:4, 6; 6:9). These and other refrains occur often, but nowhere near as frequently as does "Meaningless, meaningless, everything is meaningless" (Eccles 1:2; 2:1, 15, 19; 3:19; 5:10; 6:11; 7:6; 8:10, 14; 9:9; 11:8; 12:8). The pervasiveness of its use, and the occurrence at the beginning and end of Qohelet's speech, give the reader the impression that this is the teacher's bottom line.

A second refrain (with variation occurring at Eccles 2:24-26; 3:12-14, 22; 5:18-20; 8:15; 9:7-10), however, speaks of finding joy in life. Whether this is spoken with a note of resignation (Longman 1998) or more confidently (Bartholomew) is a matter of debate.

5. Refrain in Job 28.

Job 28 has been a point of intense debate in research on *Job in terms of how it fits with the plot of the book. No question, however, attends the theme of the chapter: it powerfully affirms God's exclusive claim as the source of all wisdom. Twice Job asks expecting a negative answer: "But do people know where to find wisdom? Where can they find understanding?" (Job 28:12, 20). This refrain then points to this assertion: "God alone understands the way to wisdom; he knows where it can be found" (Job 28:23).

See also FORM CRITICISM; LYRIC POETRY; PARALLELISM; POETICS, TERMINOLOGY OF; STANZA, STROPHE.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. C. G. Bartholomew, Ecclesiastes (BCOTWP; Grand Rapids: Baker, 2008); D. A. Dorsey, The Literary Structure of the Old Testament (Grand Rapids: Baker, 1999); T. Longman III, Ecclesiastes (NICOT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1998); idem, Song of Songs (NICOT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2001); T. Muraoka, Emphatic Words and Structures: A Study of Psalms with Refrains (Psalms 42-59) (JSOTSup 104; Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1990); G. Schwab, The Song of Songs' Cautionary Message Concerning Human Love (SBL 41; New York: Peter Lang, 2002); S. Terrien, The Psalms: Strophic Structure and Theological Commentary (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2003); P. van der Lugt, Cantos and Strophes in Biblical Hebrew Poetry: With Special Reference to the First Book of the Psalter (OtSt 53; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 2006); W. G. E. Watson, Classical Hebrew Poetry: A Guide to Its Techniques (2d ed.; T & T Clark, 2005).

T. Longman III

RELIGION. See CULT, WORSHIP: WISDOM

REMEMBRANCE

In the OT books of wisdom and poetry the concept of remembrance typically means more than simply recalling some thought; it also includes acting in accordance with that thought. This is true regardless of whether a person or God does the remembering. The present article explores this concept of remembrance by first defining the basic Hebrew words used to describe remembering and surveying their occurrence in the books of poetry and wisdom as well as the rest of the OT. It then discusses the basic meanings covered by the verb “remember” and its synonyms and describes how the concept varies when used of human or divine subjects. Finally, it treats the less common nouns used for “remembrance” to see if their meanings vary from that of the verbs and thus add to the general field of meaning.

1. Attestation
2. Basic Meanings
3. Humans Remembering
4. God Remembering
5. Remembrance as a Noun
6. Conclusion

1. Attestation.

Hebrew has a basic root zkr, which appears in various forms, used with a range of meanings centered on remembering. The root zkr appears in the wisdom and poetic books most often as a verb (79x) but also as a noun (20x). When used as a verb, zkr appears in three common Hebrew verbal stems, usually with the basic meanings associated with those stems: Qal (simple active, “remember” [66x]), Niphal (passive, “be remembered” [5x]) and Hiphil (causative, “bring to remembrance” [8x]). The nouns zēker (“remembrance, memory” [15x]) and zikkārōn (“memorial, reminder” [5x]) also include the same basic idea of something remembered.

The various Hebrew words derived from zkr appear frequently throughout the OT but are found most often in *Psalms and the other books of wisdom and poetry (99 of 344 total occurrences). This coincides with the occurrences of the word lēb (“heart”), also found most often in Wisdom literature. In Hebrew, the heart is the organ of perceiving and storing knowledge, as the mind is in English. Having something in one’s heart means to be conscious of it or to remember (Wolff, 46-47). Because of this connection in Hebrew thought and language, both “heart” and “remember” occur frequently in the books of wisdom and poetry.

Nearly all of the forms of zkr mentioned above can also be found in the Pentateuch (68x), as well as in the historical (92x) and prophetic (90x) sections of the OT, but typically less often than in the books of poetry and wisdom. By contrast, four nominal forms from the root zkr—²*azkārâ* (“memorial offering”), mazkir (“recorder”) and the proper names zēkaryâ and its variant zēkaryāhū (“Zechariah, Zecharyahu”) as well as zikrî (“Zicri” or “Zichri”)—occur in the other sections of the OT but do not appear in the books of wisdom and poetry. Most of these occurrences of zkr and its related forms relate to the general idea that the Israelites’ God had acted on their behalf as recorded in their historical books, and thus they should remember his deeds and act faithfully toward him. The poetic books describe how the Israelites often celebrated and drew on this historic, vital relationship with their God. When they did not, the prophets called them to account.

2. Basic Meanings.

2.1. “Recall Some Fact.” The Hebrew verb zkr may simply refer to recalling some fact that someone was not currently bearing in mind. For example, one of the accusers of *Job challenges him to act righteously and escape his current troubles, at which time he would remember his former troubles as merely fleeting (Job 11:16). The Judean exiles taken to Babylon recall with fondness their homeland and capital, Jerusalem (Ps 137:1, 6). Similarly, a destroyed Jerusalem (a figure for the city’s inhabitants) recalls the good times before its destruction, in contrast to its current misery (Lam 1:7). These occurrences include the idea most closely associated with the common English idea of remembering: simply thinking again about something that the person had been aware of in the past.

2.2. “Consider, Keep in Mind.” A stronger use of zkr goes beyond just recalling something to considering or keeping something in mind. For this idea, the biblical authors also sometimes used the synonymous roots hgh or śyh (“meditate, consider”) or the negative lō’ śkh (“not forget”). The matter being considered could be positive or negative. Job’s accusers challenge him to consider the positive truth that God protects the innocent (Job 4:7); Job, likewise, also keeps in mind the unpleasant truth that the wicked sometimes prosper (Job 21:6). The matter being considered can also be something physical or nonphysical. The Persian king *Ahasuerus considers his former queen, *Vashti, after he had deposed her (Esther 2:1). Later *Mordecai, the cousin of the new queen, *Esther, commanded his fellow Jews to keep their recent deliverance in mind by making it a perpetual holiday (Esther 9:28). Whatever the item, the person doing the remembering was supposed to bring it to mind and keep it there.

Occasionally, a negated idea of considering had a very different meaning. Not to remember or consider a deceased person meant the end of that person's existence entirely. In common OT thought life ended at the grave. Thus, if one's name or reputation did not live beyond the grave in someone's memory, that person's existence had ceased entirely. Such a fate might happen as a natural part of history (Eccles 1:11), but it might also have moral overtones. The enemies of Israel (and Israel's God) set out to "destroy [Israel] as a nation, so that their name will no longer be remembered" (Ps 83:4). More often, Israel's God brought about this fate on Israel's enemies or on evil people as punishment for their sins (Job 24:20; Ps 109:14-15). With this concept, not being remembered after death was usually a terrible fate that God imposed on those who deserved it.

2.3. "Think About and Act Accordingly." Probably the most common aspect of remembering goes beyond simply considering some truth to thinking about and acting in accordance with that truth. "Recollection concerns not only past events, but also the consequences their memory entails" (Eising, 67). For example, when the author of *Ecclesiastes says to his learner, "Remember your Creator in the days of your youth" (Eccles 12:1), he is urging him to bear in mind that he lives before the one who created (and will ultimately judge) him, and thus he should act as one who will some day face that creator and judge. Sinners do not remember God; rather, they forget God and betray the covenant that they have made with him or perhaps even pursue other Gods (Ps 44:17, 20). Such evil people even think that God has forgotten their actions and will not hold them accountable (Ps 10:11). These illustrations help show that both humans and God remember and forget, as the following discussion will explain more fully

3. Humans Remembering.

When the authors of poetry and wisdom refer to humans "remembering," they might use any of three shades of meaning already discussed. Humans may recall, consider, or think about and act accordingly in regard to places, events or other people, but the passages usually refer to people remembering God. In addition, human remembrance most often includes the idea of appropriate behavior toward God. Even when humans simply recall some matter, they often recall something connected to God—perhaps their past relationship with God, God's sovereignty, or his miracles on behalf of his people (Ps 22:27; 42:4; 77:11).

Remembering God and his deeds often leads to positive action. "So closely is remembering associated with action that at times it functions as a synonym for action of various kinds" (Allen, 1103). This response might be *worship (Ps 103:18; 105:5) or obedience (Ps 103:18). In addition, despondent psalmists often draw courage and hope from considering God's past works and gain strength to persevere during times when danger lurks but God seems distant and silent (Ps 63:6; 77:3; 143:5).

On the other hand, not thinking about God's gracious character and deeds may lead his people to acts of unfaithfulness or rebellion against him (Ps 78:42; 106:7). "The failure to remember was not mere absentmindedness; it was covenant(al) unfaithfulness" (Verhey, 668). This usage provides another example of how God's people need to think often about their God and what he has done for them in order to maintain a proper relationship with him.

A somewhat different nuance of remembering is found in the use of the Hebrew root zkr in the causative Hiphil stem, meaning "cause to remember" or "proclaim." In these relatively rare occurrences a person draws something praiseworthy to the attention of others that they may consider and appreciate it. The praiseworthy item might be something as simple as a laudable relationship between two lovers (Song 1:4), but again, it usually refers to something connected to God. The psalmists praise God by proclaiming how he has helped his people with his mighty deeds. With this proclamation the psalmist expects that his audience will respond with celebration and trust in their God (Ps 20:7 [see Driver]; 45:17; 71:16). Proclaiming, like the other nuances of recalling, considering and thinking about to act accordingly, typically tries to keep the people of God connected to him, the one who helps them. If they do, they can better respond to him as they should.

4. God Remembering.

As described above, humans can remember or proclaim various things. Likewise, God remembers, but the categories of meaning for God's remembering differ somewhat from those used with humans. The texts do not speak of God recalling anything, but they do say that he considers things. Frequently, God acts on what he considers, and this action often is based on his own character or on earlier promises made to his people.

Like humans, God considers or takes notice of things. His consideration often involves his care for or sustenance of the person or thing. To communicate this idea, the Hebrew authors also use the synonym pqd ("care for, come to aid"). God considers or cares for humanity in general and endows us with great significance (Ps 8:4). In a different sense, the psalmist needs God's care to sustain his life lest he perish (Ps 88:5). God's understanding and help are particularly important in light of human nature with its physical weakness and inclination to sin. God indeed does understand and remember these human tendencies, and this leads him to forget or forgive even repeated sin (Job 7:7; 10:9; Ps 78:39; 89:47).

God's sustenance and forgiveness are two examples of how God's consideration or remembrance leads him to act for the benefit of his people, to whom he is committed. "The essence of God's remembering lies in his acting toward someone because of a previous commitment" (Childs, 34). He acts on behalf of his people when he delivers or restores them after judgment (Ps 74:2; 79:8; 106:4). Such restoration can happen only because God also considers aspects of his own character—his mercy and faithfulness (Ps 25:6) and his fidelity in keeping his promises and his covenant with his people (Ps 106:45; 111:5). "The covenant is not just something from the past, and [God] remembering it is not merely the neutral apprehension of an image from the past . . . God . . . is faithful to it . . . and acts in accordance with it" (Verhey, 667). The greatest example of God keeping his covenant and fulfilling his promises is his deliverance of Israel from Egypt, as he had promised to Abraham long before (Ps 105:8, 42-43; cf. Ex 2:24-25). God's faithful acts of deliverance and aid should produce joy and praise in his people, and they should bear witness to others about his marvelous character (Ps 98:3; 106:4-5). A corollary of God acting for his people is that he also acts against their enemies. He protects the afflicted from their oppressors and takes vengeance when necessary (Ps 9:12; 89:50; 137:7).

Thus, the ways that God remembers coincide with the ways that humans remember except that God need not recall anything. Usually, one finds God remembering by acting appropriately for his people based on his gracious character and his faithfulness to his commitments.

5. Remembrance as a Noun.

The preceding discussion of the verbal uses of zkr ("remember") show the major nuances of meaning implied in the verb and how those fit when used of humans and of God. The discussion now turns to the less frequent nominal forms that appear in the poetic and wisdom literature: zēker ("remembrance, memory") and zikkārôn ("memorial, reminder"). The more limited range of meanings found with the nouns overlaps with some of the ideas found with the verbs.

The noun zēker is used largely of some remembrance carried out by humans, in which they may or may not remember other humans or God. If humans maintain a remembrance of other humans after death, it is because the dead were righteous, and their memory is a blessing that continues perpetually (Ps 112:6; Prov 10:7). By contrast, the memory of those who are wicked or oppose Israel does not continue; it "rots" and ends with them (Job 18:17; Ps 9:6; 34:16), sometimes because of God's judgment (Ps 109:15). For the author of Ecclesiastes, such an end of memory will be the fate of all regardless of their character (Eccles 9:5). When zēker describes human remembrance of God, it usually refers to humans considering God's deeds or character—his holiness, goodness or righteousness (Ps 97:12; 111:4; 145:7). Such consideration leads to praise and thanksgiving in each generation (Ps 6:5; 30:4; 102:12), much like with the verbal ideas already discussed.

The noun zikkārôn refers simply to the memory of people or things. This memory may exist in the past or future or refer to wise or foolish people (Eccles 1:11). The word is also used of a royal annal ("book of remembrances" [Esther 6:1]) and the maxims (sayings remembered) of Job's friends (Job 13:12). Apart from these final, rarer uses, the nominal uses of the root zkr fit well within the field of meaning established by the verbs, though the usage is more limited.

6. Conclusion.

In conclusion, remembering is something that both humans and God do. Humans recall, consider and act with some truth in mind. That truth is often a benevolent act of God or some aspect of the person's relationship with God. That relationship exists because God remembers people. He considers and acts graciously toward them, often because he is committed to them. In response, his people should offer him their praise, loyalty and obedience.

See also THANKSGIVING, PSALMS OF; WORSHIP.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. L. C. Allen, “zkr,” NIDOTTE 1.1100-1106; J. Blau, “Reste des I-Imperfekts von ZKR, Qal,” VT 11 (1961) 81-86; H. J. Boecker, Redeformen des Rechtslebens im Alten Testament (2nd ed; WMANT 14; Neukirchen-Vluyn: Neukirchener Verlag, 1970) 106-11; P. A. H. de Boer, Gedenken und Gedächtnis in der Welt des Alten Testaments (Franz Delitzsch-Vorlesungen 1960; Stuttgart: Kohlhammer, 1962); B. S. Childs, Memory and Tradition in Israel (SBT 37; Naperville, IL: Allenson, 1962); G. R. Driver, “Hebrew Homonyms,” VT 16 (1967) 53-54; H. Eising, “זָכַר, זִכָּרוֹן, זִכְרוֹן,” TDOT 4.64-82; T. E. McComiskey, “zākar, zēker, zikkārôn, zekaryâ, zekaryāhu, ’azkārâ,” TWOT 1.551-53; W. Schottroff, “Gedenken” im Alten Orient und im Alten Testament: Die Wurzel ZAKAR im Semitischen Sprachkreis (WMANT 15; Neukirchen-Vluyn: Neukirchener Verlag, 1964); A. Verhey, “Remember, Remembrance,” ABD 5.667-69; H. W. Wolff, Anthropology of the Old Testament (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1974).
B. SeEVERS

RETRIBUTION

The “retribution principle” is the conviction that the righteous will prosper and the wicked will suffer, both in proportion to their respective *righteousness and wickedness. In Israelite theology the principle is integral to the belief in God's justice. Since God is just, the Israelites held that it was incumbent on him to uphold the retribution principle.

Having a worldview in which God was absolutely just and compelled to maintain the retribution principle, the Israelites developed the inevitable converse corollary: those who prosper must be righteous (i.e., favored by God), and those who suffer must be wicked (i.e., experiencing the judgment of God).

Thus, the retribution principle was an attempt to understand, articulate, justify and sys-tematize the logic of God's interaction in the world. The fact that human experience often seemed to deny the tenets of the retribution principle required that the retribution principle be qualified or nuanced in order to be employed realistically in the philosophical/theological discussion. How can God be just if he does not punish the wicked? In order to answer this question, the retribution principle frequently was under discussion in Israelite *theodicy (defense of God's justice in a world where *suffering exists, though in more modern terms the conversation has grown into a philosophical discussion concerning the origin of evil), driven particularly by the context of ethical monotheism. The retribution principle does not of necessity operate in the context of theodicy, but because of Israel's theological commitments this tendency can be observed in the OT. After examining the status of the retribution principle in the ancient Near East, this discussion will return to a consideration of the relationship between the retribution principle and theodicy.

1. Retribution Principle in the Ancient Near East
2. Retribution Principle and Theodicy
3. Resolving Tensions between the Retribution Principle and Experience
4. Underlying Retribution Theology
5. Retribution Principle in the Wisdom Literature
6. Retribution Principle: Israelite Theology versus Biblical Theology
7. Pragmatic Postscript

1. Retribution Principle in the Ancient Near East.

The literature of the ancient Near East continually demonstrates that people believed that the administration of justice in the human world was a concern and responsibility of the gods. It was, for example, considered the principal jurisdiction of the Babylonian god Shamash to administer justice (thus he is the god to whom Hammurapi reports with his legal collection). However, administering justice is not the same thing as being just. If the gods are not truly just by character but rather are simply duty-bound or interested in justice from a heuristic standpoint, then the retribution principle plays a different role. The questions that swirl around the retribution principle lose their philosophical urgency in the ancient world due to the fact that injustice in the world often is not blamed on the gods but rather on demons and humans. In Mesopotamian thinking evil was built into the cosmos by means of the “control attributes” (Sumerian me) that are woven into the fabric of the cosmos, but even those had not been established by the gods. Since evil existed outside of the jurisdiction of the gods, divine administration of justice did not necessarily eliminate suffering. Some misfortune came about simply because of how the world was. In both Egyptian and Mesopotamian thinking the gods were not considered responsible for evil in the world, and therefore the presence or experience of evil did not have to be resolved in reference to the justice of the gods (this in contrast to Israel, where nothing existed outside the jurisdiction of God’s sovereignty). In the Sumerian “Lament over the Destruction of Ur,” the city is destroyed not as an act of justice or injustice but rather because it was time for kingship to be passed on. Likewise with regard to individuals, suffering can sometimes just be one’s lot in life for the present. It is also clear that personal misfortune could be considered to be the result of offending the gods, even if the offense were committed innocently. In such cases it is not that the gods were unjust; they simply were not very forthcoming about communicating their expectations.

The so-called theodicy texts from Mesopotamia consistently fail to affirm or defend the justice of deity. Instead, they affirm pervasive and often ignorant offense by humans and the general inscrutability of the gods.

I wish I knew that these things were pleasing to one’s god!

What is proper to oneself is an offence to one’s god;

What in one’s own heart seems despicable is proper to one’s god.

Who knows the will of the gods in heaven?

Who understands the plans of the underworld gods?

Where have mortals learnt the way of a god?
(Lambert, Ludlul bel Nemeqi, 41:33-38)

A sense and expectation of the retribution principle at a basic level remains evident here, though the gods were relieved of responsibility because of the way the function of the cosmos was perceived. Even in the areas where the gods could be held responsible, they, like human judges, may be doing their best to administer justice, but do so imperfectly.

Although Mesopotamians did not seek to defend the justice of the gods, they still believed in the retribution principle. Since they lack revelation of what the deities required, the people believed that offense to the gods was unavoidable, and thus sin was pervasive. Consequently, no one could claim to be innocent (van der Toorn 2003, 62). But if worshipers had been ritually conscientious, the expectation was that the god whom they worshiped would protect them. This expectation is based on the belief not that the god is just, but rather that the god is sensible. The gods need what humans provide, and the gods in return are capable in most circumstances of providing protection. The offenses committed against the gods in a large majority of cases constituted failure to provide what the gods needed or violation of that which was sacred. The deity naturally responds with anger, disdain or neglect, leaving the individual vulnerable. The system works this way not because the gods are just, but rather because they are needy, and the retribution principle remains intact.

In this sense, though people of Mesopotamia might believe that the gods do indeed punish those who earn their wrath, this conviction cannot offer an explanation for all suffering. The explanation that those who suffer must be wicked could not work because in the ancient Near Eastern worldview much of the suffering that people experienced was not orchestrated by the gods; rather, it was possible because of the inattention of the gods or simply by a course of circumstances or the nature of the world. Even if the gods abandoned a person because of some offense, they were not responsible for the ensuing evil; it is just that they did nothing to prevent it. They had withdrawn their favor and protection.

The gods in the ancient world did not care about defending their character. They were concerned about preserving their prerogatives and their executive perquisites. When a god did not receive the cultic rites to which he was entitled, his status was threatened and his wrath and/or abandonment was predictable. The gods wished for the king and society to be characterized by justice because a stable and prosperous community most effectively provided for the needs of the gods.

In Egyptian thinking the retribution principle represents one aspect involved in the establishment of maat*, which is the ultimate goal of the gods and therefore of those who exercise authority on behalf of the gods in the human realm. This connection between the retribution principle and maat is inherent in this definition of maat: “the principle that forms individuals into communities and that gives their actions meaning and direction by ensuring that good is rewarded and evil punished” (Assmann, 128). So defined, J. Assmann considers maat to represent the totality of all social norms. If maat is to be preserved and attained, positive behavior should be recognized and recompensed while negative behavior should be punished. This is rooted not in divine attributes (e.g., justice) but rather in divine goals (pursuit of maat).

In conclusion, in the ancient Near East the gods have a level of responsibility to see that good and right prevail not because they are compelled by their character or attributes but rather because they have the power to exercise such influence, and it works to their advantage to do so. The retribution principle is understood as a logical syllogism in a context where gods expect their needs to be met and have the power to punish or recompense accordingly. In Mesopotamia the most natural matrix for retribution principle thinking is in the realm of ritual, whereas in Egypt it is one of the primary mechanisms in the establishment of maat.

2. Retribution Principle and Theodicy.

Theodicy in its modern philosophical and existential guise concerns the origin and nature of suffering and evil. In theology proper (whether mythological, broadly metaphysical, or in ethical monotheism) the philosophical question naturally focuses its attention on the divine role in suffering and relationship to evil. The retribution principle progresses from philosophy to pragmatism in trying to understand and formulate how deity acts in the world. The extent to which deity can theoretically be considered responsible for evil is what draws theodicy and the retribution principle together in theological conundrum. In the preceding section of this discussion we noted that the gods in the ancient Near East were somewhat relieved of responsibility because their role in the origin of evil was limited, and because they were often only indirectly considered the cause of suffering. This understanding of the role of deity, along with ambivalence regarding whether the gods were inherently just, nearly eliminates theodicy from the discussion. Although people continued to have deep concerns over how deity acted in the world and therefore their interests in the retribution principle remained robust and vital, the retribution principle could not be employed in theodicy. Given the aforementioned considerations, it is fair to conclude that “theodicy” is a misnomer when applied to the ancient Near East: the origins of evil were impersonal, and the gods were neither just nor took ethical responsibility for suffering.

In Israel the absence of any source of divine authority other than Yahweh limited the philosophical possibilities regarding the origin of evil and the source of suffering (1 Sam 2:6; Job 2:10; Eccles 7:14; Is 45:7). No supernatural power alongside Yahweh or outside of Yahweh’s sphere of power existed. At the same time, Yahweh was considered powerful, good and just. Thus one might say that the theodicy question bloomed in Israel, and in this hothouse of theological tension the retribution principle provided the traditional explanation despite its obvious inconsistencies in accounting for human experience. As we tour the Wisdom literature’s treatment of the retribution principle below, we will see the tension between the retribution principle as theodicy and the retribution principle as theology. The affirmations of the retribution principle in the text are intended to be theological in nature and serve well in that capacity. In contrast, the Israelites were inclined to try to wield that theology in service to theodicy, a role for which it was singularly unsuitable. The role of the book of *Job is to perform the radical surgery that separates theology from theodicy, contending that in the end Yahweh’s justice must be taken on faith rather than worked out philosophically. He does not need to be defended; he wants to be trusted. The entire constellation of God’s attributes is at work in a complex coordinated manner. Justice is part of that constellation, but it does not trump all other attributes. Thus, the retribution principle cannot serve the purposes of theodicy.

3. Resolving Tensions between the Retribution Principle and Experience.

Having addressed the relationship between the retribution principle and the character and activities of deity, we now turn to the relationship between the retribution principle and human experience. The general belief in the retribution principle created certain tensions that needed to be resolved in the face of experiences that did not conform to the retribution principle. Resolution of these tensions could potentially assume a number of different configurations.

3.1. Qualification Regarding the Nature of Deity. In this approach deity is not just, or the quality of divine justice differs from human perception, or deity has simply not given enough information to allow individuals to know what earns divine favor or wrath. We have already encountered this latter option in the ancient Near East where revelation was scant and obligations to deity were often seen in cultic terms. When such was the case, a ritual resolution of suffering was sought by trying to appease a deity who was angry for unknown reasons. This general inclination is observable in the argument of Job's three friends in the dialogue section of the book. The qualification is that sometimes people suffer not because they are wicked, because they are ignorant of their offense, but the retribution principle is retained.

3.2. Qualification Regarding the Purpose of Suffering. Suffering in this approach is not simply punishment from a just God; it may have an educational purpose (the explanation preferred by Elihu in Job 32–37) or may be focused on some spiritual benefit (the position adopted in the NT as Christian suffering is seen as sharing in the suffering of Christ). The qualification is that sometimes people suffer because, as uncomfortable as it is, they stand to benefit from it. This may represent a departure from the retribution principle formula as in the Christian context but can still include an aspect of the retribution principle, as it does in Elihu's position. He maintained that Job's suffering was punishment from God, but it operated in the sphere of prevention rather than remediation (i.e., for sinful inclinations detected rather than past sins being judged).

3.3. Qualification Regarding the Timing of the Execution of the Principle. All agreed that divine reaction to righteousness or wickedness was generally not immediate, but how much time lapse could there be without compromising the integrity of the formula? In societies where varying destinies after death are considered possible, true justice may be deferred when not experienced in this life. In the ancient world (Israel included, Egypt excepted) reward and punishment in the *afterlife was not part of the belief system, so the timing issue deepened the mystery rather than providing a resolution. In Christian thinking, however, this is often a basis for theodicy. The qualification is that people sometimes suffer for now, but that justice must be viewed over the scope of time. The retribution principle is retained, but its scope is extended into the afterlife.

3.4. Qualification Regarding the Role of Justice in the World. This approach suggests that justice is complex and cannot be reduced to a formula like the retribution principle. It recognizes that justice is rarely transparent and requires one to have more information than is readily available. It gives God the benefit of the doubt as it accepts by faith that God is just regardless of how any given individual is faring. As such, it adopts the main statement of the retribution principle ("The righteous prosper, the wicked suffer") as proverbially and theologically accurate. However, it denies the corollary that suggests that a person's prosperity or suffering can serve as the basis for discerning whether a person is righteous or wicked. The qualification is that justice is not the sole foundation of how God works in our world, because given a fallen world, perfect justice is not attainable, and that the basis for God's operation of the world is his character, not just one attribute or another. God, in his wisdom, is concerned with provisional justice, given the parameters of an imperfect world.

4. Underlying Retribution Theology.

In Israelite theology God is just and administers justice in the world. God employs the retribution principle to give insight into his character and to articulate the general parameters of his administration. This activity can be traced on both a corporate and an individual level. The unique shape of the retribution principle within Israelite thought is heavily influenced by two philosophical preconceptions: the existence of only one God, and the absence of a belief in reward and punishment in the afterlife.

4.1. Corporate Level, Covenant Theme. On a corporate level this theology is evident as it is expressed in the covenant blessings and curses. Consequently, it is also evident in the judgment oracles of the prophets, since they pronounce the doom that the Israelites have brought upon themselves by their covenant violations. The corporate aspects of the retribution principle are worked out literarily by the Chronicler as he traces its effects through the history of the monarchy. On the corporate level the retribution principle provided for occasional tension (e.g., Ps 44; Esther), but since it could be worked out over the long span of history, it carried less immediacy, urgency or poignancy. Corporate retribution principle in Israel is a covenant theme, and since covenant violation was rampant, the claim of innocence was difficult to maintain.

4.2. Individual Wisdom Theme. In contrast, the retribution principle on the individual level is a wisdom theme. This connection is laid out plainly in Psalm 1 and is confirmed repeatedly in the central role of the retribution principle in the Wisdom literature. It is important to note, however, that the biblical text offers affirmation only of the main proposition ("The righteous prosper, the wicked suffer"), not of the deduced converse corollary ("The one who prospers is righteous, the one who suffers is wicked"). Logically, the corollary could be asserted only if the main proposition is true universally and consistently. Nevertheless, it appears that the Israelites did tend to extend their expectations to include the corollary, as the book of Job, and the need for a book such as Job, imply. The tension of the book is created by the corollary as both Job and his friends conclude that his suffering can only be explained as punishment from God. We will return to this below.

4.3. Connection to Monotheism and Afterlife. Since Israel was to believe in only one God, who was responsible for every aspect of the cosmos, it was very difficult to absolve him from responsibility for suffering. If he were to be considered just, then they believed that he must maintain the retribution principle. If there were no chance to achieve final justice in the afterlife, then he was obliged to do so within the lifetime of the individual; note Psalm 27:13: "I am still confident of this: I will see the goodness of the LORD in the land of the living." These factors combined to pose the conundrum of the retribution principle and human experience and led to the retribution principle being used for theodicy. It is in Israel, therefore, that we see the formulation of the inherent connection between the retribution principle and theodicy that becomes commonplace in the history of theological discourse.

5. Retribution Principle in the Wisdom Literature.

5.1. Psalms. The psalmist expects the retribution principle to work (Ps 37; 55:22). He considers himself innocent and therefore expects God to relieve his suffering or trials and thus vindicate him from "corollary inferences" (Pss 26; 35). The problem that is most frequently the premise for the psalmist's complaints and his invocation of the retribution principle is the perception that God has abandoned him or is hiding his face from him (e.g., Ps 13; 22:1; 38:21; 44:24). God is not viewed as the cause of his suffering, but God has not come to his aid to relieve his suffering. Yahweh's absence makes one vulnerable to suffering at the hands of the enemies of God and perhaps even to death. What the psalmist longs for is not prosperity per se but rather the presence of Yahweh, which brings life and deliverance (Ps 31:14-24; 84; 102:28). In this sense, the retribution principle in *Psalms could be reformulated more specifically as "The righteous will enjoy God's presence and its accompanying benefits; the wicked will forfeit the presence of God and will suffer the consequences of abandonment."

In contrast to the *lament psalms in which the psalmists' circumstances are under discussion, some of the wisdom psalms turn greater attention on the circumstances of others, specifically, the wicked. Now instead of trying to understand the suffering of the righteous and the apparent abandonment by God, the psalmists seek to understand the prosperity of the wicked and God's apparent failure to judge those whose actions deserve punishment (e.g., Pss 37; 49). The retribution principle thus serves as a backdrop to the psalms of *imprecation in which the psalmist lists specifics of the sorts of things that would have to come upon the wicked in order for the proportionality of the retribution principle to be maintained (see Ps 109). If God is administering justice through the retribution principle, then a slap on the wrist will not suffice.

In Psalms, then, we see the expectation that the retribution principle will govern human experience and the repeated affirmation that the retribution principle gives adequate expression to theologically sound expectations. The experiences, however, of inexplicable suffering by the righteous and the observation of apparent prosperity and success of the wicked lead to questions and confusion about God's stance. These testify to their deep-seated misunderstanding of God's commitment to the retribution principle and the resulting misapplication of it.

5.2. Proverbs. The book of *Proverbs actually has some relief to offer in that it clearly positions the retribution principle in the category of proverbial saying, most notably in a variety of permutations in Proverbs 10—12 (see Prov 10:3, 9, 16, 24, 25, 27, 30; 11:5, 6, 18, 19, 21; 12:2, 7, 21). The significance of this cannot be overstated. Proverbial sayings, by definition, are generalizations, which therefore find their truth in the fact that they stand as probabilities, not as guarantees for what must be true without exception (Van Leeuwen, 25-31). They are to be interpreted existentially (reflecting a possibility that is observed with some degree of regularity; descriptive of tendencies) rather than universally (reflecting necessity on every occasion). Such statements indicate that there is a higher probability of the stated action than of any of the possible alternatives (for an extensive treatment of genre and grammatical issues, see Cook).

5.3. Ecclesiastes. In the book of *Ecclesiastes *Qohelet holds the retribution principle at arm's length, but he does hold it. He advises his readers to fulfill ritual obligations to avoid inciting divine wrath (Eccles 5:1-7), but his most direct discussion of the retribution principle is in Ecclesiastes 8:12—9:4. He labels the experiences that contradict the retribution principle as meaningless (Eccles 8:14), but despite those contradictions he advises that it will go better for those who fear God (Eccles 8:12-13). His teaching can be summarized in the advice that people should live as if the retribution principle were true, but that they should not expect it to be reflected in their personal circumstances. He refuses to employ the retribution principle in theodicy because "No one can comprehend what goes on under the sun" (Eccles 8:17). A further caveat, however, is that the retribution principle itself is ultimately meaningless because "all share a common destiny" (Eccles 9:2): death overtakes them all.

5.4. Job. The book of Job is all about God's policies and what role the retribution principle has in those policies. It is not the retribution principle that is on trial, nor is it Job who is on trial, despite the fact that both he and his friends assume that he is (although from the beginning the book declares him righteous, from God's mouth). The scene in heaven, to which none of the human characters is privy, provides the information that it is God's policies, and particularly his use of and commitment to the retribution principle, that are on trial. The tension of the book is established in the two competing charges offered by *Satan and Job respectively. The former claims that God's policies should be called into question because rewarding the righteous inhibits the development of true, disinterested righteousness ("Does Job fear God for nothing?" [Job 1:9]). Thus the retribution principle is called into question by suggesting that it is counterproductive for the righteous to be rewarded. The latter (Job) claims that God's policies should be called into question because they inexplicably allow for righteous people to suffer, contrary to his stated preferences (i.e., the retribution principle). If God is just, then it is contrary to his character for the righteous to suffer. These two charges set the stage for the book and provide a context for exploration of solutions. The way the book works this out is traced in detail in the article on the book of Job; here we must focus attention specifically on the retribution principle.

M. Tsevat has proposed that the tension in the book can be diagrammed by a triangle depicting the three elements to be defended by various proponents: God's justice, Job's righteousness and the retribution principle. Given the situation that develops in the book, the proponents make choices as to which element must be defended above all, and in the process they must decide which of the three elements is expendable, for all three cannot be maintained.

Job's three friends defend the retribution principle and show themselves willing to deny Job's righteousness to support their defense. In the first round of speeches the focus is on God's protection of the righteous (Job 4:6-7; 5:18-27; 8:5-7). The destruction of the wicked is stated in brief principle (Job 11:11) and alluded to as the problem of Job's sons (Job 8:4). In the second round the emphasis is entirely on the punishment that comes to the wicked (Job 15:20-35; 18:5-21; 20:4-29), and this same theme is picked up from a different perspective in the third round (Job 22:15-20). All of this is defense of the retribution principle, not defense of God or his justice, though Bildad gets the closest in his contention that God does not pervert justice (Job 8:3). At occasional junctures other affirma-tions are made concerning God: he is more righteous than human beings (Job 4:17); he exercises his power in the world to accomplish his will (Job 5:8-16; confirmed by Job in Job 12:13-25); he effects the retribution principle (Job 8:20-22); as judge, he sees and knows (Job 22:12-14); he establishes order in the cosmos (Job 25:2).

As in the ancient Near Eastern literature, the friends fully believe in the retribution principle but do not employ it for theodicy, though their view of God has more of an Israelite shape than an ancient Near Eastern one (specifically in that they do not treat God as having needs, nor do they see the solution in ritual terms). Nevertheless, they agree with the two basic tenets of ancient Near Eastern thinking regarding suffering: (1) they affirm human ignorance of what God demands, thereby affirming innate human sinfulness (Job 4:18-21; 22:5-9; 25:4-6); (2) they affirm the inscrutability of deity (Job 11:7-9; 15:7-16).

Job chooses to defend his own righteousness and, since he sees no possibility of neutralizing the retribution principle, is left with suspicions about God. In Job's speeches we find an anti-theodicy (e.g., Job 19:6; 24:12) as he refuses to defend God or make excuses for him. Indeed, this is what God reprimands Job for (Job 40:8). By his oath in Job 31, Job attempts to pressure God into providing his own theodicy (Nicholson, 79).

In contrast, Elihu is distinct as the participant who actually offers a theodicy. His defense of God's justice is in the category of "educative theodicy"; that is, suffering serves to bring potential problems to our attention so that they can be remedied. Elihu still believes in the retribution principle and defends it, but he builds a case that suffering is not just God's response to past sin. It can also preempt future or potential sin. In choosing to defend God's corner of the triangle, he also calls Job's righteousness into question, but in a more nuanced way than do the other friends. He does so by redefining the retribution principle (preventive not remedial), and on the basis of that redefinition he finds fault in Job (his self-righteous response to suffering).

It is in God's speeches that the true solution is found in a revised perspective on God's policies and priorities, and in a revised vision of the retribution principle. The triangle is too simplistic and reduces God's policies to a narrow system in which justice is the trumping attribute and the retribution principle is law. God does not choose one of the three elements of the triangle to defend; rather, he discards the triangle model as artificial and inadequate.

The book thus offers a modified view of the retribution principle that construes it in proverbial and theological terms; that is, it is useful to describe what God is like and therefore can serve as a basis for identifying general trends in human experience. But the retribution principle offers no guarantees. The book in effect takes a contra-theodicy position: rather than defending God's justice, it defends his wisdom. Though it is not a theodicy, it is very interested in the retribution principle and its legitimacy. In the end, the retribution principle is rejected as a foundation for divine activity in the human realm, but it is reclaimed on the proverbial and anecdotal levels as representative of the character of deity. God delights in bringing prosperity to the righteous, and he takes seriously the responsibility of punishing the wicked. It is therefore of some importance that at the end of the book God restores Job, thus reemphasizing his commitment to the retribution principle properly understood as a theological principle that cannot be employed for either assessment of God's character (theodicy) or of any person's character. Thus the basic premise of the retribution principle is retained ("The righteous prosper, the wicked suffer"), but since it does not represent a strict formula that always maintains, the corollary fails: it cannot be assumed that a suffering person is wicked, or that a prosperous person is righteous.

6. Retribution Principle: Israelite Theology versus Biblical Theology.

Did the Israelites believe the retribution principle and its converse? A sufficient number of texts demonstrate that they were aware that it was not enforced moment by moment (e.g., Ps 37:7, 25). That is, they realized that on certain occasions there might be a time lag before the books are balanced. With that caveat, they largely accepted the truth of the proposition but often were inclined to treat it as the main determining factor for God's activity. Consequently, they show a clear inclination to also accept the converse corollary as true and use it to shape their expectations and to formulate their theodicy.

In contrast to this Israelite theology, the biblical theology of the Wisdom literature is more cautious and nuanced. The text never affirms the converse corollary, so it cannot be framed as a biblical teaching. Furthermore, Proverbs couches the retribution principle in proverbial language, Ecclesiastes casts suspicion on it, and the book of Job details its limitations. Thus biblical theology rejects the retribution principle as providing a theodicy yet embraces it in its theology.

The issue continues to factor in theological discussion into the NT. Jesus confronts it explicitly on two occasions. In John 9:1-3 the disciples ask the retribution principle question, inquiring about the cause of the malady of the man born blind. Jesus' answer turns them away from the issue of theodicy (indicated by the question of cause) and toward an expanded theology: suffering should be evaluated not with regard to cause (actions in the past) but rather with regard to purpose (God's ongoing plan). Thus his reply: "That the work of God might be displayed in his life." As in the book of Job, no explanation for the suffering is forthcoming, possible or necessary. What is important is to trust God's wisdom and to seek out his purpose.

In Luke 13:1-5 the question is asked concerning whether those who had died in recent tragedies deserved their death. Again Jesus answers in a way that turns the attention away from cause, and he even states that a one-to-one correspondence between sin and punishment should not be made. The alternative that he offers is that they should view the incident as a warning. Consistent with John 9, he refuses to engage the question of cause and directs the attention of his audience to purpose.

Paul weighs in on the retribution principle question in Galatians 6:7: "A man reaps what he sows." Here he states the retribution principle proverbially without neutralizing its theological impact. That he adopts this nuancing is clear in that his teaching regarding suffering does not embrace the converse corollary.

7. Pragmatic Postscript.

Based on the foregoing assessment, it is fair to conclude that the retribution principle, properly nuanced and applied, is a biblical teaching about the nature of God and, as such, is true. Still, we must be careful to understand it as theology, not theodicy; as proverbial rather than propositional; as operating within the realm of God's wisdom, not just his justice; and as investigated in relation to purpose rather than to cause.

Given this nuancing, we can see that a proper understanding of the retribution principle offers yet another argument concerning the bankruptcy of certain popular evangelical movements such as "the health-and-wealth gospel." The Scripture passages used as proof texts for such movements are invariably based on an unnuanced propositional reading of the retribution principle that views it as propositional truth that offers promises to be claimed. Simply put, proverbs are not promises, and the retribution principle offers no guarantees.

See also IMPRECATION; JOB 1: BOOK OF; MAAT; PROVERBS 1: BOOK OF; RIGHTEOUSNESS; THEODICY.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. J. Assmann, Mind of Egypt: History and Meaning in the Time of the Pharaohs (New York: Metropolitan Books, 2002); J. A. Cook, "Genericity, Tense, and Verbal Patterns in the Sentence Literature of Proverbs," in Seeking Out the Wisdom of the Ancients: Essays Offered to Honor Michael V. Fox on the Occasion of His Sixty-fifth Birthday, ed. R. Troxel, K. Friebe and D. Magary (Winona Lake, IN: Eisenbrauns, 2005) 117-33; J. L. Crenshaw, Theodicy in the Old Testament (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1983); J. C. de Moor, "Theodicy in the Texts of Ugarit," in Theodicy in the World of the Bible, ed. A. Laato and J. C. de Moor (Leiden: E. J. Brill, 2003) 108-50; H. A. Hoffner, "Theodicy in Hittite Texts," in Theodicy in the World of the Bible, ed. A. Laato and J. C. de Moor (Leiden: E. J. Brill, 2003) 90-107; A. Laato and J. C. de Moor, eds., Theodicy in the World of the Bible (Leiden: E. J. Brill, 2003); W. G. Lambert, Babylonian Wisdom Literature (Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1960); F. Lindström, "Theodicy in the Psalms," in Theodicy in the World of the Bible, ed. A. Laato and J. C. de Moor (Leiden: E. J. Brill, 2003) 256-303; A. Loprieno, "Theodicy in Ancient Egyptian Texts," in Theodicy in the World of the Bible, ed. A. Laato and J. C. de Moor (Leiden: E. J. Brill, 2003) 27-56; E. W. Nicholson, "The Limits of Theodicy as a Theme of the Book of Job," in Wisdom in Ancient Israel, ed. J. Day, R. P. Gordon and H. G. M. Williamson (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1995) 71-82; M. Tsevat, "The Meaning of the Book of Job," in The Meaning of the Book of Job and Other Biblical Studies (New York: KTAV, 1980) 1-38; K. van der Toorn, Sin and Sanction in Israel and Mesopotamia: A Comparative Study (SSN 22; Assen: Van Gorcum, 1985); idem, "Theodicy in Akkadian Literature," in Theodicy in the World of the Bible, ed. A. Laato and J. C. de Moor (Leiden: E. J. Brill, 2003) 57-89; R. C. Van Leeuwen, "Wealth and Poverty: System and Contradiction in Proverbs," HS 33 (1992) 25-36; W. von Soden, "Das Fragen nach der Gerechtigkeit Gottes im Alten Orient," MDOG 96 (1965) 41-59.

J. H. Walton

REWARDS. See PROVERBS 1:BOOK OF.

RHETORICAL CRITICISM

Rhetorical criticism may be defined as the analysis of a text's compositional artistry with an eye to audience impact (Watson and Hauser, 14; Fox 1981, 54). Despite Origen's claim in On First Principles that the Bible was rhetoric-free (lest faith should "rest in the skillful use of words . . . and not in the power of God" [quoted in Patrick and Scult, 30]), recent readers have detected rhetoric emerging widespread from genres as varied as sermon, wisdom and narrative accounts. Even a poem of "thanksgiving serve[s] as testimony . . . which lends persuasive influence to the weighing, waiting human listener for whom the verdict concerning the trustworthiness of Israel's God has not yet been decided" (Brueggemann, 126).

1. Origins
2. Varieties
3. Axioms
4. Method
5. Assets
6. Liabilities
7. Illustrations
8. Conclusion

1. Origins.

Although documented study of rhetoric dates to Aristotle with his three genres (deliberative, judicial, ceremonial), three modes of proof (ethos, pathos, logos)—later expanded under Cicero with his five arts (invention, structure, style, memory, delivery)—the field of biblical research did not engage analysis of rhetoric until the latter half of the twentieth century. After H. Gunkel's *form criticism had invited consideration of those life situations where biblical passages may have originated and operated by attending to any conventions signaling such settings, there grew a discontent among certain readers who heard the text extending a further invitation: to recover the very dynamic of its message by exploring how its arrangement of thought and deployment of literary devices produced distinct effects within the audience. One such discontented reader was J. Muilenburg, whose 1968 SBL presidential address, "Form Criticism and Beyond," launched the movement christened by him as "rhetorical criticism." An avowed debtor to Gunkel, Muilenburg issued a twofold charge for emerging rhetorical critics. Operating from the premise that a literary composition typically is fashioned as a unity capable of careful craftsmanship rather than an unbounded collage, of first importance is "to recognize precisely where and how it begins and where and how it ends" (Muilenburg, 9). Then, second, one may "recognize the structure . . . discern the configuration of its component parts . . . note the various rhetorical devices . . . the sequence and movement" (Muilenburg, 10).

Despite the title "rhetorical criticism" and his determined search for "rhetorical devices," Muilenburg was accused of resurrecting mere stylistic analysis, what G. Kennedy terms "secondary rhetoric"—thoughtfully arranged communication irrespective of persuasive impact (so W. Wuellner, see Trible, 48; Robbins 1997, 26; Patrick and Scult, 29). The years since have seen the pairing of persuasion with stylistics to redefine the nature of rhetorical criticism, reviving the Aristotelian notion that by definition rhetoric involves attempting to influence one's audience (Kennedy's "primary rhetoric").

2. Varieties.

The rhetorical movement has been influenced by an array of other criticisms, including modernism and formalism (C. Brooks, T. S. Eliot), reader-response (K. Burke, W. J. Ong, S. Fish), structuralism and semiotics (F. de Saussure, R. Barthes), deconstruction (J. Derrida, P. de Man), psychological and psychoanalytic (M. Foucault, P. Brooks), Marxism and New Historicism (R. Williams), feminism (E. Showalter, H. Cixous), African-American (H. L. Gates Jr.) and ethical/canonical (N. Frye, J. H. Miller) (see Olbricht, 101). Inevitably, rhetorical criticism responded with various perspectives. P. Trible, who trained under Muilenburg, chronicles five (Trible, 57-67). First, "traditional" rhetorical criticism follows classical patterns as evidenced by the neo-Aristotelian criticism of University of Chicago in the 1940s (Lundbom 1997, xxiv). Second, "expe-rential” emphasizes the impact of text upon the critic, who proceeds to make judgments and experience insights. Third, “dramaturgical” draws attention to symbol as the core of rhetoric, endeavoring to detect motive behind any persuasive presentation. Fourth, “sociological” considers within the communicative exchange the relative status of composer, characters and audience (including critic) as well as social cues implied by setting so as to tease out dynamics of power and potential employ of text as a persuasive force alternatively to conserve or destabilize one’s position (see E. Schüssler Fiorenza’s 1987 SBL presidential address, a marked divergence from Muilenburg’s) (Schüssler Fiorenza, 19, 46; Robbins 1996, 3). This perspective recalls Plato’s objection lest rhetoric “exploit the resources of language to make the ‘weaker cause appear stronger’ and to promote the acquisition of power as an end in itself without consideration for the well-being of the soul” (Gaonkar, 151). Fifth, “postmodern” envisions the original rhetorical “work” emerging as an ever-new “text” through each event of reading. What follows here traces the traditional perspective outlined by Watson and Hauser (see definition above).

3. Axioms.

A cluster of axioms scaffolds rhetorical criticism, sketching its rest and reach. First, a text (oral or written) may evidence sufficient coherence to impact an audience demonstrably—for example, 1 Kings 19:2-3; Esther 4:13-5:2; Job 1:13-21 (Lundbom 1997, xxiii-xxiv). Second, careful examination (close reading) of that text, scrutiny of figures with their function, may illumine means of impact (Campbell, 503, 508; Weiss). Third, to allow for potential coherence, extant form of the text should be studied as a synchronic whole (Watson and Hauser, 5). Fourth, with legal philosopher R. Dworkin, the text merits interpretation as the best text it can be—an interpretation marked by comprehensiveness, consistency, cogency, plentitude and profundity (Patrick and Scult, 21, 85-87). Finally, in the interest of OT studies it is axiomatic that rhetors were capable of tailoring text long before the art donned classifications supplied by Aristotle, Cicero and Quintilian (Lundbom 2001, 325).

4. Method.

How, then, does a rhetorical critic engage the task? If a text may possess coherence, the task begins with detecting outer boundaries (Muilenburg, 8-10). Then one may proceed to map the rhetorical topography within, alert for literary devices marking inner boundaries of constituent units, attentive to form- and content-indications of cohesion, transition, progression or climax (Muilenburg, 10; Amit, 9, 17-18). For literary devices are no mere ornamentation but rather collectively signify the text’s very meaning (Berlin, 17-18). Once isolated, the nature of textual terrain contributed by each unit may be distilled. Such distilled concepts may surface after probing, “What unspoken question may this unit answer, contributing to a comprehensive scheme?” Synthesis follows analysis, mapping the arrangement of unit concepts in hopes of exposing latent logical structure. If structure should emerge, one then may consider the text’s purpose—how it may have impacted the audience (Andrews, 7). All the while the critic must self-monitor, remaining attentive to personal filters that may skew one’s view of the textual landscape.

Fundamental to the entire process is recognition of literary/rhetorical devices and sensitivity to the roles that they play in the text (Lundbom 1997, xxiv). Many instances will illustrate devices not formally catalogued until some three centuries later: accumulation, alliteration, analogy, aphorism, asyndeton, authority, *chiasm, comparison, epithet, euphemism, hyperbole, *inclusio, irony, metaphor, palistrophe, paradox, paronomasia, progression, reason, repetition (esp. anaphora and epiphora), rhetorical question, simile and, occasionally, pathos and ethos (drawn principally from Lundbom 2001, 325-37). But other devices may be uniquely Hebraic, eluding detection by the untrained eye. Features such as extensive repetition, meter variation or abrupt shift of person must not be dismissed prematurely as indicative of inferior composition or careless editorial work. At times these may be shown to serve calculated rhetorical goals (Lundbom 2001, 325-26; Watson and Hauser, 6-7; Berlin, 20-21).

5. Assets.

Two principal assets spring from rhetorical criticism. First, if one allows as axiomatic that an extant text may preserve effectual, audience-impacting meaning, then rhetorical criticism may offer the best avenue for reviving that meaning with its dynamism (Muilenburg, 9; cf.

Berlin, 17-18). This approach excavates the literary unknowing that accumulates inescapably over millennia, so as to expose communicative structures and imagine how they served hearers gone by. It seeks “to move beyond the mere identification of forms and genres toward reconstituting the text as a piece of living discourse” (Patrick and Scult, 13). This asset holds value for all modern readers, not least those persuaded of normative currency in these texts.

Second, discovery of rhetorical coherence in a text otherwise divided along source- and form-critical lines has invited reconsideration of textual integrity (Patrick and Scult, 17; Watson and Hauser, 9; Lee, 8). One may need to reconsider whether at times our ability to detect such fault lines may not exceed the ancients’ ability to produce them.

6. Liabilities.

Along with the assets come two liabilities: under-detection and over-detection of rhetorical devices. Lacking any ancient manual of Hebrew rhetoric, one risks detecting only those later attested in Greek or modern notions of the art. Only careful, sustained exposure to texts of the OT and cognate cultures will accumulate observations yielding confident assertions (Watson and Hauser, 7; Patrick and Scult, 30; Lundbom 1997, xxix).

Conversely, over-detection may posit persuasive impact when none is warranted. Single devices supported by multiple attestation, boundaries reinforced by form-plus-content intersection, logical arrangements that are redundant and without lacunae—all subjected to peer critique—these disciplines guard against wishful subjectivity (see Course, 12; Allen, 577).

7. Illustrations.

The worth of any critical approach may best be assayed by sampling its wares. Just as varied perspectives catalogued by Trible (see 2 above) mapped an array of potential rhetorical trajectories, so also varied literary terrain of individual Bible books will produce yet another array of varied insights (bound, with occasional exception, by a common thread of the neo-Aristotelian perspective). Illustrations below range from isolated poems (*Psalms) to connected poems (Proverbs 1–9), from spiraling disputations (*Job) to gemlike apothegms (Proverbs 10–29), from philosophical reflections (*Ecclesiastes) to explicit love poems (*Song of Songs), from poetic expressions of communal anguish (*Lamentations) to narratives celebrating family or ethnic survival (*Ruth, *Esther). They place a premium on searching for secondary rhetoric and sometimes detect primary rhetoric as well.

The following illustrations present first a sample analysis of a select passage (“The Appeal of Wealth” [Prov 1:8-19]). Then follow briefer examples arranged by book, attesting rhetoric across writings, poetry and wisdom of the OT.

7.1. Sample Analysis of Proverbs 1:8-19. The analysis of “The Appeal of Wealth” moves from consideration of outer boundaries to inner structures. Rhetorical strategies potentially impacting the audience conclude the study.

7.1.1. Outer Boundaries. A vocative summons, “Listen, my son” (Prov 1:8a), appears to mark the upper boundary of this passage, as attested in other passages where a comparable expression calls for attention to an ensuing body of teaching (Prov 2:1; 3:1; 4:1, 10; 5:1; 6:1). This formal boundary marker is endorsed by a content marker as the book introduction plus hallmark apothegm (Prov 1:1-7) gives way to teaching concerning wise associations: company not to keep (Prov 1:10-19) and company to keep (Prov 1:20-33).

The lower boundary appears signaled formally by the particle “such” opening Proverbs 1:19, serving a summary function. Content again intersects form as the theme of wealth-by-violence gives way to Woman Wisdom’s overture in Proverbs 1:20-33 (see Woman Wisdom and Woman Folly).

7.1.2. Inner Structures. Five structures bind units within the poem. First, an imperative-plus-incentive structure lends coherence to the opening quatrain (Prov 1:8-9). Second, the vocative “my son” opens the second unit (Prov. 1:10-19) and a subunit within it as well (Prov 1:15-18). Third, a conditional statement dominates the second unit. Both protasis and apodosis prefigure in Proverbs 1:10 as a dual-theme introduction. An extended protasis unfolds in Proverbs 1:11-14 followed by an extended apodosis (flagged by the vocative “my son”) in Proverbs 1:15-18.

Further sophistication emerges with the fourth structure, a palistrophe (extended chiasm), as protasis components are compared with apodosis counterparts (see Chiasm). Balanced pairing provides strikingly contrastive options for the following implicit questions: (1) Who is about to come to a demise, and how (Prov 1:11-12 :: Prov 1:17-18)? That is, will it be the innocent victim at the hands of the gang, or will it be the gang itself, self-destructing? (2) Why should one take the challenge, whether the gang's challenge to enlist or the father's to withdraw (Prov 1:13 :: Prov 1:16)? That is, should monetary ends move one to enlist, or should violent means move one to withdraw? (3) How must one respond (Prov 1:14 :: Prov 1:15)? Enlist or withdraw? Consideration of these implicit questions yields the outline below. The structure is rife with reversals. With point-for-point rebuttal the father deftly turns the gang's argument inside out, both in terms of form (palistrophe) and content.

The fifth device, dense conclusion, provides maximal closure as terms or concepts earlier encountered recur in a concluding segment. Based on the Hebrew reading, only one word of Proverbs 1:19 fails to recall earlier terms or themes. It is the opening term, "such," a word marking consequence or recapitulation, out of place except in a conclusion: "Such are the ways of one who specializes in violence: the life of its handler will it seize" (my translation).

7.1.3. Rhetorical Strategies. Five rhetorical strategies may be observed in this brief poem. First, an implicit appeal to authority emerges from the father-son/speaker-audience relationship. Second, exposure that the claim to arrogant gain is a mere masquerade erupts from the palistrophic sequence of rebuttal reversals, seriously undercutting the gang's rhetoric. Use of palistrophe enabled the father immediately to counter the apex of the gang's appeal ("Pitch your lot in with us!" [Prov 1:14]) with the most energetic line of his counterappeal ("My son, do not walk along the way with them—withdraw your foot from their path!" [Prov 1:15]). Third, an apothegm of the foolish fowler subjects the gang to rhetoric of ridicule: they display less brains than do birds, tumbling into the net that they themselves have spread (Prov 1:17-18). Fourth, a dense conclusion leaves no prior thought or theme idle, as a lens focusing all earlier shafts of light to a brilliant clausal beam. Finally, the prospect of certain, disastrous consequences reverberates through the poem's apodosis, cresting a logical crescendo in its last line—sufficient, it would be hoped, to deter the youth through fear and instill receptivity for Woman Wisdom's appeal about to be disclosed (Prov 1:20-33).

"The Appeal of Wealth" (Prov 1:8-19)

- A. Parental Summons (vv. 8-9)
 - 1. Admonition (v. 8)
 - 2. Incentive (v. 9)
- B. Parental Warning (vv. 10-19)
 - 1. Dual Theme Introduction (v. 10)
 - a. Gang's Enticement (v. 10a)
 - b. Father's Warning (v. 10b)
 - 2. Enticement by the Gang (vv. 11-14)
 - a. Capital Plan: Inflicting Death on Others (vv. 11-12)
 - b. Rationale for Enlistment: Monetary Ends (v. 13)
 - c. Call to Enlist (v. 14)
 - 2'. Warning by the Father (vv. 15-18)
 - c. Call to Withdraw (v. 15)
 - b. Rationale for Withdrawing: Violent Means (v. 16)
 - a. Capital Consequences: Receiving Death for Oneself (vv. 17-18)
 - 1'. Dense Conclusion (v. 19)

7.2. Further Illustrations from Proverbs. G. D. Pemberton pays particular attention to ethos, pathos and logos within ten "father" speeches of Proverbs 1—9. Pemberton (80) concludes, "These chapters constitute a striking rhetorical anthology that seems less likely to be the fortuitous result of haphazard collecting than the product of careful rhetorical discernment and selection." Not only does the father employ rhetoric, but also persuasive ploys arise from the alien woman (Pemberton, 65). These ten speeches may have served as rhetorical models for training young logicians (Pemberton, 80). M. V. Fox (1997, 621-23) notes in the father's speeches the persuasive traits of authority, promise and warning, intimacy, vividness, irony. *Personification of sapience through the character of Woman Wisdom creates yet another rhetorical ploy, clothing abstract with concrete, and this in a gender most winsome for the *sage's audience (principally, young men).

Among the aphorisms dominating Proverbs 10—29 Fox recognizes enthymemic rhetoric, where an intentionally incomplete syllogism requires the audience to supply omitted premises or conclusions. Thus in Proverbs 13:5 the saying "The righteous man hates a deceitful word, but the wicked will be ashamed and disgraced" implies omitted segments (supplied here in italics): "The righteous man hates a deceitful word and will gain honor, but the wicked loves a deceitful word and will be ashamed and disgraced" (see Fox 2004, 172). By engaging the audience to supply missing portions, the sage effectively enlists their aid in persuading themselves, simultaneously "train[ing] the reader to think like the sage" (Fox 2004, 176).

Full-length commentaries suggesting structural links in *Proverbs are rare. The work of B. K. Waltke (2004, 9-28) in this regard offers a particularly valuable contribution. For Proverbs 10:1–22:16 one should also consult K. M. Heim.

7.3. Illustrations from Psalms. Rhetorical study of Psalms may be distinguished based on orientation to Kennedy's primary rhetoric (persuasive art) or secondary rhetoric (compositional art irrespective of persuasion) (see 1 above). Attention to primary rhetoric is most helpfully illustrated in a treatment of Psalm 61 by W. H. Bellinger. Investigation of structure, intensification and poetics fuels the observation that "each section builds on the preceding one and is somewhat distinct; the psalm moves through a clear sequence," contributing to a persuasive whole (Bellinger, 385, 388).

A study of Psalm 103 by T. Willis provides another instructive model, illuminating not only content-based themes but also stylistic devices. These observations combine to clarify the poem's meaning with its persuasive dimension, calling the audience to imitate the poet's confidence in God during difficult times.

J. H. Coetzee examines politeness strategies in so-called enemy psalms (Pss 2; 3; 13; 41; 42/43). Through this lens he discovers the suppliant at times employing the argumentation strategy of positive politeness (endorsing the divine auditor's positive self-claims) or at other times that of negative politeness (subversively affirming superior traits of the auditor in such a way that he may feel obliged to behave in a corresponding fashion—just as the suppliant hopes) (Coetzee, 212-13).

In metaphors of tree and chaff Y. Gitay detects a persuasive ploy (Ps 1). By wrapping in fresh language a familiar principle (God supports the righteous but undermines the wicked), the sage increases odds of capturing the audience's attention (Gitay, 143).

Studies such as the following sharpen one's grasp of secondary rhetoric. Sensitivity to structure amplifies meaning in a study of Psalm 1 by C. J. Collins. A close reading of Psalm 23 by M. S.

Smith highlights its repeated terms, sounds and concepts, endorsing cohesion across metaphor boundaries of shepherd/host. In an examination of Psalm 69 L. C. Allen surfaces structure, solves ambiguous forms, and strengthens a symmetry-based claim of textual integrity. Attention to *acrostic, first-last verse inclusio, and key words characterize a study of Psalm 145 by A. Berlin, yielding a deeper impact for the poem's message. Again in Psalm 145 R. Kimelman uses close reading techniques to tease out still more inclusions at the subunit level, overturning premature notions that acrostic alone dominates the poem's structure and meaning.

7.4. Illustrations from Job. Unlike relatively independent compositions within Psalms, disputative dialogue spanning most of Job invites exploration of primary rhetoric across multiple chapters. Such is the focus of J. E. Course, who examines recurring words to trace whether successive speeches genuinely respond or merely speak past prior statements. He posits that "windy words" of Job 16:3a responds to "windy knowledge" of Job 15:2a; "indignation" of Job 6:2a responds to the same in Job 5:2a; credentials as a "wise man" in Job 15:2a respond to Job's dismissal of so-called wisdom in Job 12:2b; "mocking" attributed to God in Job 9:23b is turned to an accusation against Job as mocker in Job 11:3b (Course, 145-46).

D. J. A. Clines (1982) similarly traces speeches but clusters together all speeches of a single character. By listening to tone (an admittedly subjective gauge) and topoi (themes), he probes degrees of coherence. Avoiding subjective measures such as tone, P. van der Lugt (486-503) concentrates on transition markers and how they may provide more objective indicators of thought groupings. Nevertheless, some may question whether all fifty-five formal features listed by van der Lugt should be so classed.

Questions capture the attention of M. V. Fox, particularly those posed by God to Job. With characteristic insight, Fox (1981, 57-58) observes that part the a rhetorical question's power lies in its ability to identify knowledge common to speaker and auditor, thus establishing a degree of intimacy between the two parties. D. R. Magary (292, 296-97) studies questions as well, not in closing chapters but in all preceding poetry (Job 3—37). Interrogatives often open these speeches, a device whose function is to produce rapid engagement between speaker and auditor. Further, they generate emphasis by clustering and contribute both coherence and progression.

H. Viviers tries the persuasive effectiveness of Elihu's speech according to classical categories of rhetoric and finds it wanting. "No matter how hard Elihu tries to be the fitting champion of the doctrine of retribution, he becomes the embarrassing devastator thereof, even to the convinced proponents of traditional wisdom" (Viviers 1997, 151). Viviers concludes that he was a novice rhetor, the antimodel. Was this a ploy to amplify God's ensuing speeches by contrast? M. J. Lynch similarly examines Elihu's powers of persuasion. He concludes that Elihu's negative rhetorical ethos (in the Aristotelian sense of a speaker's credibility) supplants his logos (line of reasoning) so that even truthful allegations within Elihu's speech fail to persuade (Lynch, 363).

D. Patrick and A. Scult take a different tack. When considering portions thought to have been confused, they make recourse to textual reconstruction. When contemplating God's responses from the whirlwind, they weigh each interpretation against Dworkin's canon: "Does this produce the 'best Job' reading?" An interpretation presenting a God who would appear capricious, bullying, irrelevant they dismiss as less than the best reading. They do not work at establishing patterns throughout the book but rather seek to make sense of the larger messages contained therein. Fittingly, their chapter devoted to Job is entitled "Finding the Best Job" (Patrick and Scult, 81-102).

7.5. Illustrations from Ecclesiastes. Ecclesiastes may provide the best terrain for detecting rhetorical strategies less common in classical categories. D. B. Miller (163-67) offers a remarkably illuminating examination of ethos, destabilization and restabilization to achieve persuasive aims. Competence, status and moral character of the speaker (*Qohelet) apparent from the text contribute to his ethos, while rhetorical questions supply the primary force eroding the audience's sense of stasis. Rhetorical questions together with wisdom sentences serve the restabilization process as Qohelet helps the audience to escape the trap of "viewing every part of their lives, even their religious practice, as a means of manipulating their own success and security" (Miller, 163).

E. P. Lee (26) discovers a "rhetoric of subversion" operating through miscues and "indirection," cleverly vectoring the reader to unexpected conclusions. As an example, according to Lee (27-28), the aim of the poem concerning times (Eccles 3:1-8) is not so much to describe suitable times for human activity on a temporal plane as to lay subversive groundwork for the sudden introduction of a strikingly untimely dimension: eternity (Eccles 3:11).

G. D. Salyer focuses on first-person statements coloring much of Ecclesiastes, noting their inherent subjectivity. This speaker-voice undermines credibility (ethos), combining with pendulum swings of dissonant illogic to generate a "rhetoric of ambiguity" or "vain rhetoric" (Salyer, 11-17, 388). Such autocentric ambiguity is not ambivalent rather but strategic, intentionally frustrating the reader since "the 'whole truth' is never disclosed in any satisfactory way" (Salyer, 126). This in turn invites the reader to conclude that if autocentric reasoning is so fatally flawed, perhaps one ought explore a transcendental point of view, remembering one's creator before the daylight of temporal life finally dwindles away (Salyer, 238, 398).

Both T. Forti and N. Kamano also explore rhetorical dimensions of Ecclesiastes. Forti closely considers fauna imagery in two verses (Eccles 9:4; 10:1). Kamano appeals to deconstruction as a king transitions to a sage capable of skilled rhetoric. Kamano (420) also proposes a palistrophe (Eccles 1:3—3:9).

7.6. Illustrations from Song of Songs. Even the erotic composition of Song of Songs may display thoughtful arrangement enhancing audience impact. D. A. Dorsey (1990, 94-96) detects seven chiasmatically arranged segments encompassing the entire book, five of which further subdivide into sevenfold structures. Structure endorses content, producing a message of "egalitarianism and mutuality in romantic love that is virtually unparalleled in ancient Near Eastern literature" (Dorsey 1999, 213). H. Viviers (2002) similarly notes freedom of mutual physical enjoyment as an indication that gender power has been leveled, likely a calculated message contrasting patriarchal orientation of the source culture.

7.7. Illustrations from Esther. Narrative terrain presents rhetorical options often distinct from poetry. Nevertheless, secondary rhetoric's attention to boundaries, subunits, logical interrelation of parts, and scrutiny of grammar and syntax still may drive studies of narratives such as Esther, as evident in work by C. V. Dorothy and by S. B. Berg. Berg (185, 108-9) detects "a carefully structured, unified composition” including reversal and a book-length palistrophe. D. J. A. Clines (1984, 35, 39) accords the speech by *Mordecai in Esther 4 “rhetorical brilliance” while sensing logical weakness in Esther 9.

G. Snyman adopts a different perspective, highlighting how people employ text to influence and justify actions, especially when people in power use the Bible to justify oppression. Ideologies and motives are examined, whether motives of interpreter or motives of actors in texts. Fundamentalism is important to Snyman because persons holding texts in a fundamental grasp seem more likely to identify with (and so appropriate the stories of) biblical characters (such as black South Africans under apartheid identifying with Esther and the Jews when counteracting the Persian pogrom).

7.8. Illustrations from Ruth. The priorities of cohesiveness and intentional structure consistent with secondary rhetoric characterize studies in Ruth. B. Rebera (123, 148) traces three key Hebrew lexical items (šûb, mût, ben) through two modes of telling (narrative and dialogic structures) to show integration of the story. E. R. Wendland finds the clarity of Ruth’s message enhanced by two simultaneous structures. First is a four-segment linear structure typical for narrative plot: setting–conflict–complication–climax–resolution–coda (Wendland, 31–39). Second is a concentric or palistrophic structure wherein the first six of seven segments encompassing the book contain concentric patterns (Wendland, 39–46). Furthermore, “two distinct compositional frameworks, the linear and the concentric, converge at key points in the discourse, particularly at the structural core of each Act [sic], to develop and highlight the central theme of ‘hesed in action’—on both the divine and human levels of participant interaction” (Wendland, 55). Due to frequent occurrence of concentric structures, Wendland (40) suspects that “recognition and interpretation of such chiasmic structures were an important part of every mature person’s ‘literary’ competence, whether a text were received aurally or in writing.”

According to D. F. Rauber (165), sensitivity to pattern provides the key to reading Hebrew literature. With singular esteem for Ruth’s subtle artistry, Rauber traces emptiness–fullness along a vector of escalating anguish from agricultural barrenness to the emptiness of a child-bereaved widow. Fullness then returns to the land, followed by Obed’s birth, which restores hope to the family.

7.9. Illustrations from Lamentations. D. A. Dorsey and J. Renkema both sense a high degree of cohesion spanning the five poems of Lamentations. Dorsey uncovers the Qinah lament pattern (three-plus-two meter) operating not only at verse level but also at chapter level. The three chapters of Lamentations 1–3 form a triad typified by three lines per acrostic designation, while the two chapters of Lamentations 4–5 supply the following pair, devoting only two lines per acrostic step (Lam 4) or none at all (twenty-two verses of Lam 5 are not acrostic). Thus the acrostic scheme provides an index over the five chapters displaying a vector of escalating weakness or dissolution, paralleling Budde’s description of Qinah as “rhythm that always dies away” (quoted in Dorsey 1988, 84). Form endorses content to convey exquisite grief in a Hebrew modality.

Renkema concentrates on concentric patterns lending unity to the entire book. These lead to the isolation of Lamentations 3:17 and Lamentations 3:50 as a structurally related pair, comprising the book’s central theme (Renkema 1988b, 333; 1998, 337).

8. Conclusion.

Since its beginnings in 1968, rhetorical criticism has expanded both in depth and breadth. Introduction of multiple perspectives calls for care in reading and precision in writing of secondary literature lest confusion cancel insight. Depth of analysis in turn calls for careful critique lest the “best text” turn out to be little more than a figment of the critic’s imagination. Given these cautions, many remain convinced that rhetorical criticism offers the best avenue enabling the modern reader “to think the thoughts of the biblical writer after him” (or her, in the case of the mother of King *Lemuel in Prov 31) (Muilenburg, 9). To the degree that those thoughts delivered persuasive impact, such an empathetic reading is of particular worth for “our postmodern situation, which refuses to acknowledge a settled essence behind our pluralistic claims, [and which] must make a major and intentional investment in the practice of rhetoric, for the shape of reality finally depends on the power of speech” (Brueggemann, 71).

See also ACROSTIC; CHIASM; DISCOURSE IN PROVERBS; EDITORIAL CRITICISM; FORM CRITI-CISM; FRAME NARRATIVE; HERMENEUTICS; INCLUSION; MERISM; PERSONIFICATION; POETICS, TERMINOLOGY OF; TERSENESS; WORDPLAY.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. L. C. Allen, "The Value of Rhetorical Criticism in Psalm 69," JBL 105 (1986) 577-98; Y. Amit, "Progression as a Rhetorical Device in Biblical Literature," JSOT 28 (2003) 3-32; J. R. Andrews, The Practice of Rhetorical Criticism (New York: Macmillan, 1983); W. H. Bellinger, "Psalm 61: A Rhetorical Analysis," PRSt 26.4 (1999) 379-88; S. B. Berg, The Book of Esther: Motifs, Themes and Structure (SBLDS 44; Missoula, MT: Scholars Press, 1979); A. Berlin, "The Rhetoric of Psalm 145," in Biblical and Related Studies Presented to Samuel Iwry, ed. A. Kort and S. Morschauer (Winona Lake, IN: Eisenbrauns, 1985) 17-22; W. Brueggemann, Theology of the Old Testament: Testimony, Dispute, Advocacy (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1997); K. K. Campbell, "Modern Rhetoric," in Encyclopedia of Rhetoric, ed. T. O. Sloane (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2001) 498-509; D. J. A. Clines, "The Arguments of Job's Three Friends," in Art and Meaning: Rhetoric in Biblical Literature, ed. D. J. A. Clines, D. M. Gunn and A. J. Hauser (JSOTSup 19; Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1982) 199-214; idem, The Esther Scroll: The Story of the Story (JSOTSup 30; Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1984); J. H. Coetzee, "Politeness Strategies in the So-Called 'Enemy Psalms': An Inquiry into Israelite Prayer Rhetoric," in Rhetorical Criticism and the Bible, ed. S. E. Porter and D. L. Stamps (JSOTSup 195; Sheffield: JSOT Press, 2002) 209-36; C. J. Collins, "Psalm 1: Structure and Rhetoric," Presbyterion 31.1 (2005) 37-48; J. E. Course, Speech and Response: A Rhetorical Analysis of the Introductions to the Speeches of the Book of Job (Chaps. 4-24) (CBQMS 25; Washington, DC: Catholic Biblical Association of America, 1994); C. V. Dorothy, The Books of Esther: Structure, Genre and Textual Integrity (JSOTSup 187; Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1997); D. A. Dorsey, "Lamentations: Communicating Meaning through Structure," EvJ 6 (1988) 83-90; idem, "Literary Structuring in the Song of Songs," JSOT 46 (1990) 81-96; idem, The Literary Structure of the Old Testament: A Commentary on Genesis-Malachi (Grand Rapids: Baker, 1999); T. Forti, "The Fly and the Dog: Observations on Ideational Polarity in the Book of Qoheleth," in Seeking Out the Wisdom of the Ancients: Essays Offered to Honor Michael V. Fox on the Occasion of His Sixty-Fifth Birthday, ed. R. L. Troxel, K. G. Friebel and D. R. Magary (Winona Lake, IN: Eisenbrauns, 2005) 235-55; M. V. Fox, "Job 38 and God's Rhetoric," Semeia 19 (1981) 53-81; idem, "Ideas of Wisdom in Proverbs 1-9," JBL 116 (1997) 613-33; idem, "The Rhetoric of Disjointed Proverbs," JSOT 29 (2004) 165-77; D. P. Gaonkar, "Contingency and Probability," in Encyclopedia of Rhetoric, ed. T. O. Sloane (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2001) 151-66; Y. Gitay, "Rhetorical Criticism," in To Each Its Own Meaning: An Introduction to Biblical Criticisms and Their Application, ed. S. L. McKenzie and S. R. Haynes (Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 1993) 135-49; R. G. Hall, "Ancient Historical Method and the Training of an Orator," in The Rhetorical Analysis of Scripture: Essays from the 1995 London Conference, ed. S. E. Porter and T. H. Olbricht (JSNTSup 146; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1997) 103-18; K. M. Heim, Like Grapes of Gold Set in Silver: An Interpretation of Proverbial Clusters in Proverbs 10:1-22:16 (BZAW 273; Berlin: de Gruyter, 2001); N. Kamano, "Character and Cosmology: Rhetoric of Qoh 1,3-3,9," in Qoheleth in the Context of Wisdom, ed. A. Schoors (BETL 136; Leuven: Leuven University Press, 1998) 419-24; R. Kimelman, "Theme, Structure, and Impact," JBL 113 (1994) 37-58; E. P. Lee, The Vitality of Enjoyment in Qoheleth's Theological Rhetoric (BZAW 353; Berlin: de Gruyter, 2005); J. R. Lundbom, Jeremiah: A Study in Ancient Hebrew Rhetoric (2nd ed.; Winona Lake, IN: Eisenbrauns, 1997); idem, "Hebrew Rhetoric," in Encyclopedia of Rhetoric, ed. T. O. Sloane (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2001) 325-28; M. J. Lynch, "Bursting at the Seams: Phonetic Rhetoric in the Speeches of Elihu," JSOT 30 (2006) 345-64; D. R. Magary, "Answering Questions, Questioning Answers: the Rhetoric of Interrogatives in the Speeches of Job and His Friends," in Seeking Out the Wisdom of the Ancients: Essays Offered to Honor Michael V. Fox on the Occasion of His Sixty-Fifth Birthday, ed. R. L. Troxel, K. G. Friebel and D. R. Magary (Winona Lake, IN: Eisenbrauns, 2005) 283-98; D. B. Miller, Symbol and Rhetoric in Ecclesiastes: The Place of Hebel in Qoheleth's Work (SBLAB 2; Atlanta: Society of Biblical Literature, 2002); J. Muilenburg, "Form Criticism and Beyond," JBL 88 (1969) 1-18; T. H. Olbricht, "The Flowering of Rhetorical Criticism in America," in The Rhetorical Analysis of Scripture: Essays from the 1995 London Conference, ed. S. E. Porter and T. H. Olbricht (JSNTSup 146; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1997) 79-102; D. Patrick and A. Scult, Rhetoric and Biblical Interpretation (JSOTSup 82; Sheffield: Almond, 1990); G. D. Pemberton, "The Rhetoric of the Father in Proverbs 1-9," JSOT 30 (2005) 63-82; D. F. Rauber, "Literary Values in the Bible: The Book of Ruth," JBL 89 (1970) 27-37; repr. as "The Book of Ruth," in Literary Interpretations of Biblical Narratives, ed. K. R. R. Gros Louis (Nashville: Abingdon, 1974) 163-76; B. Rebera, "Lexical Cohesion in Ruth: A Sample," in Perspectives on Language and Text: Essays and Poems in Honour of Francis I. Andersen's Sixtieth Birthday, ed. E. W. Conrad and E. G. Newing (Winona Lake, IN: Eisenbrauns, 1987) 123-49; J. Renkema, "The Literary Structure of Lamentations (I)," in The Structural Analysis of Biblical and Canaanite Poetry, ed. W. van der Meer and J. C. de Moor (JSOTSup 74; Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1988a) 294-320; idem, "The Literary Structure of Lamentations (II)," in The Structural Analysis of Biblical and Canaanite Poetry, ed. W. van der Meer and J. C. de Moor (JSOTSup 74; Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1988b), 321-46; idem, "The Literary Structure of Lamentations (III)," in The Structural Analysis of Biblical and Canaanite Poetry, ed. W. van der Meer and J. C. de Moor (JSOTSup 74; Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1988c) 347-60; idem, "The Literary Structure of Lamentations (IV)," in The Structural Analysis of Biblical and Canaanite Poetry, ed. W. van der Meer and J. C. de Moor (JSOTSup 74; Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1988d) 361-96; idem, Lamentations, trans. B. Doyle (HCOT; Leuven: Peeters, 1998); V. K. Robbins, Exploring the Texture of Texts: A Guide to Socio-Rhetorical Interpretation (Valley Forge, PA: Trinity Press International, 1996); idem, "The Present and Future of Rhetorical Analysis," in The Rhetorical Analysis of Scripture: Essays from the 1995 London Conference, ed. S. E. Porter and T. H. Olbricht (JSNTSup 146; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1997) 24-52; G. D. Salyer, Vain Rhetoric: Private Insight and Public Debate in Ecclesiastes (JSOTSup 327; Sheffield: JSOT Press, 2001); E. Schüssler Fiorenza, Rhetoric and Ethic: the Politics of Biblical Studies (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1999); M. S. Smith, "Setting and Rhetoric in Psalm 23," JSOT 41 (1988) 61-66; G. Snyman, "Identification and the Discourse of Fundamentalism: Reflections on a Reading of the Book of Esther," in Rhetorical Criticism and the Bible, ed. S. E. Porter and D. L. Stamps (JSOTSup 195; Sheffield: JSOT Press, 2002) 160-208; P. Trible, Rhetorical Criticism: Context, Method, and the Book of Jonah (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1994); P. van der Lugt, Rhetorical Criticism and the Poetry of the Book of Job (OtSt 32; Leiden: Brill, 1995); H. Viviers, "Elihu (Job 32-37), Garrulous but Poor Rhetor? Why Is He Ignored?" in The Rhetorical Analysis of Scripture: Essays from the 1995 London Conference, ed. S. E. Porter and T. H. Olbricht (JSNTSup 146; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1997) 137-53; idem, "The Rhetoricity of the 'Body' in the Song of Songs," in Rhetorical Criticism and the Bible, ed. S. E. Porter and D. L. Stamps (JSOTSup 195; Sheffield: JSOT Press, 2002) 237-55; B. K. Waltke, The Book of Proverbs (2 vols.; NICOT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2004-2005); D. F. Watson and A. J. Hauser, Rhetorical Criticism of the Bible: A Comprehensive Bibliography with Notes on History and Method (BIS 4; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1994); M. Weiss, The Bible from Within: the Method of Total Interpretation (Jerusalem: Magnes, 1984); E. R. Wendland, "Structural Symmetry and Its Significance in the Book of Ruth," in Issues in Bible Translation, ed. P. C. Stine (UBSMS 3; London: United Bible Societies, 1988) 30-63; T. Willis, "So Great Is His Steadfast Love: A Rhetorical Analysis of Psalm 103," Bib 72 (1991) 525-37.

P. Overland

RHYME. See POETICS, TERMINOLOGY OF; SOUND PATTERNS.

RHYTHM. See POETICS, TERMINOLOGY OF.

RIGHTEOUSNESS

In English Bible translations the word righteousness is used as the equivalent of the Hebrew nouns šedeq and šēdāqā. According to some scholars, the basic meaning of these nouns and their cognates šdq ("be righteous") and šaddiq ("righteous") denotes conformity with a norm or standard (Reimer, 746). Others define the basic meaning as denoting community loyalty (Koch, THAT 2.515 = TLOT 1051-52; von Rad 1957, 368-72 = 1962, 370-74) or underscore the notion of proper order (Scullion).

These various suggestions need not be mutually exclusive, as the words involved can have different meanings in different contexts. Generally speaking, however, one could maintain that when these words are attributed to persons or things, the nature or acts of these persons or things accord with what may be expected from them (cf. e.g., "sacrifices of righteousness" in Ps 4:5 and "paths of righteousness" in Ps 23:3; see Kwakkel, 42-44, 156, 244).

This article mainly deals with texts in *Job, *Psalms, *Proverbs, *Ecclesiastes and *Lamentations, in which most English versions have “righteousness” or “righteous.” In addition, some texts will be discussed in which one of the Hebrew words just mentioned usually is translated differently—for instance, by “right” or “innocent.” Admittedly, the idea of righteousness is not totally absent in *Ruth, *Esther and *Song of Songs. However, these books are not included here because they lack the Hebrew words in question.

1. Psalms and Lamentations
2. Proverbs
3. Ecclesiastes
4. Job

1. Psalms and Lamentations.

1.1. The Righteousness of God.

1.1.1. A Virtue of God as Judge and King. In several psalms God is praised or invoked because of his righteousness. Righteousness is one of the most outstanding virtues of his being the judge of his people and of the whole world.

Psalms 96—99 are *hymns in which God is glorified as king of all the earth. As such, he will judge all the peoples in righteousness (Ps 96:13; 98:9). Righteousness and justice are the foundation of his throne (Ps 97:2). Psalm 50 announces God’s coming as the judge of his people Israel; at his coming, the heavens proclaim his righteousness (Ps 50:6).

As a judge, God also makes use of his righteousness to settle personal conflicts in which his servants are involved. Accordingly, Psalm 35:24 says, “Vindicate me, O LORD my God, according to your righteousness.” If God indeed vindicates his servants, they will praise him because of the righteousness that he shows in dealing with their situation (Ps 7:17; 35:28).

The beneficial results of God’s righteousness are stressed in all psalms in which it is referred to. God’s righteousness brings about the deliverance of those who are in distress because of unjust charges or persecution by enemies (Ps 31:1; 71:2). “The LORD works righteousness and justice for all the oppressed” (Ps 103:6 NIV). God’s right hand, filled with righteousness, protects Zion against hostile kings who attack the city of the Lord (Ps 48:10).

By virtue of God’s intervention as a righteous judge, order is restored among his people and all over the world. This implies, first of all, that the wicked are checked and that the righteous can live safely and freely (Ps 7:9; 9). However, the results of God’s righteousness extend much further than that. Psalm 65:9-13 describes what will happen when God answers his people with awesome deeds of righteousness (Ps 65:5): their land will abound in water, crops and flocks, and the valleys will shout for joy and sing (see also Ps 72:16; 85:12). In a similar vein, the hymns about God’s kingship proclaim the gladness of the heavens, earth, sea, fields, forests, rivers and mountains when he will have come to judge the world (Ps 96:10-13; 98:4-9).

Of course, God’s righteousness as a judge implies that he judges honestly. His verdicts are in accordance with the facts and the norms of justice (see, e.g., Ps 98:9, where sedeq [“righteousness”] is paralleled by mēšārīm [“equity”]). Such righteous judgment is clearly a blessing for society. But as a righteous judge, God does not limit himself to the strict administration of justice, as if he were a judge who is interested not in the people before him but only in the application of the *law. This is evident particularly in those texts in which God’s righteousness is mentioned as a synonymous parallel to his salvation (Ps 71:15; 98:2) or in which it is bracketed with words such as “love,” “truth,” “faithfulness,” “peace,” “goodness” and “compassion” (Ps 40:10; 89:14; 145:7-9). Psalm 51 even refers to God’s righteousness as grounds for the remission of terrible sins, for the psalmist says that his tongue will sing of God’s righteousness if God saves him from bloodguilt (Ps 51:14; see also Ps 103:3, 6, 10, 12, 17; 143:1-2).

All this could be summarized by saying that God’s righteousness stands for his dealing with his people and the world in a way that accords with what could be expected from him in view of his promises. These promises are part and parcel of his covenants with Abraham, Israel and *David. It may strike us, then, that God’s righteousness is only rarely associated with his bērit (the Hebrew word usually translated “covenant”) in the psalms (the exceptions are Ps 50:5, 16; 89:3, 28, 34; 103:18; 111:5, 9; 132:12). In a larger sense, however, God’s particular relationship with Israel is presupposed in many psalms that proclaim his righteousness, as can be inferred from expressions such as “my God” (Ps 7:1, 3; 22:1), “our God” (Ps 48:1, 8; 99:5) and “his faithfulness to the house of Israel” (Ps 98:3).

Given the positive nature of God’s righteousness, it need not surprise us that some scholars have stated that the idea of a punitive righteousness of God is lacking in the OT (von Rad 1957, 389 = 1962, 377). The correct element in this view is that the aim of God's righteousness clearly is the redemption of his people or the salvation of the world. Punishment never figures as the main or the only purpose of God's intervention as a righteous judge (perhaps with the exception of Ps 50, which is dominated by God's accusations against the wicked). Yet redemption and salvation cannot be achieved if God does not proceed against the wicked. Accordingly, their fall is mentioned in several psalms as the indispensable corollary of God's intervention by virtue of his righteousness (e.g., Ps 7:11-16; 9:3, 5-6, 15-17, 20; 11:6). Therefore, one can claim that punishment is not the main goal of God's righteousness but is, nevertheless, part of it.

It might also be punitive righteousness that is alluded to in Lamentations 1:18 (Renkema, 179-81). Strictly speaking, however, the text simply says that in executing his judgments (described in the context) God is in the right; *Zion herself is the only one to blame, for she has rebelled against God's word.

1.1.2. God's Gift to People. Apart from being a virtue of God, righteousness is also mentioned in the psalms as a gift that he bestows on people. Thus, Psalm 72:1 prays to God for righteousness and justice for the Davidic king. The effect of this will be that the king will act as a righteous judge who defends the afflicted and helps the needy. Moreover, his country will be mighty and prosperous.

Similarly, Psalm 132:9 asks God to clothe his priests with righteousness. This is linked to God's promise to clothe the priests of Zion with salvation (Ps 132:16), which is associated with abundance of food (Ps 132:15). According to Psalm 24:5, God gives righteousness to those who come to the temple hill with clean hands and a pure heart, and who look forward to his favor (NIV and NRSV: "vindication" instead of "righteousness"). As the parallel in Psalm 24:5a makes clear, this righteousness is conceived of as a blessing to those who receive it. Both Psalm 24 and Psalm 132 show that righteousness is a gift of God that he distributes in the temple cult. This could also be the reason why the temple gates were called "the gates of righteousness," as may be inferred from Psalm 118:19-20.

1.2. The Righteousness of the People.

1.2.1. In Upholding the Law. Just like God as the judge of all the earth, people who have to act as judges should do so in righteousness. This applies most of all to the king (Ps 45:4, 7; 72:2), but also to other rulers (Ps 58:1; 82:2-3). If they refuse to rule in righteousness, the weak and the poor will fall prey to the injustice and the violence of the wicked (Ps 58:2-5; 82:2-4). In that case, the rulers must fear that God will come to the aid of the righteous by depriving the rulers of their high positions (Ps 58:6-11; 82:6-7).

1.2.2. In Daily Life. In many psalms the righteous are contrasted with the wicked. Unlike the wicked, the righteous fear God (Ps 31:19). They trust in him and take refuge in him (Ps 5:11-12; 37:3, 5). They love his commandments (Ps 37:31; 112:1). They turn from evil and steer clear of the wicked and their schemes (Ps 1:1; 34:14). They seek peace and further other people's well-being by sharing their goods with them (Ps 34:14; 37:21, 26). They do not use their tongues so as to harm other people; rather, they speak truth and wisdom (Ps 15; 37:30).

Quite often the righteous are to be found among the poor and needy (Ps 140:12-13; 146:7-9), while the wicked are rich and powerful (Ps 49:16-20; 73:3-5, 12). But even if they are in need for some time, the righteous are better off, for in the end they will surely prosper (Ps 34:8-10, 19-20; 37; 92:12-14). In Psalm 112:3, 9 the psalmist is so sure about this that "righteousness" is made almost synonymous with "prosperity," describing the blessings of the righteous by means of the phrase "their righteousness endures forever" (see also Ps 37:6).

1.2.3. In Conflicts. Many individual laments, but also psalms belonging to other genres, refer to conflicts between the righteous and the wicked (see also Lam 4:13, where the prophets and the priests are accused of killing the righteous). When appealing to God because of such threats, the psalmists clearly were convinced that they themselves belonged to the righteous. However, when praying to God, they never explicitly say that they are one of the righteous (i.e., a saddiq). In Psalm 143:2 the psalmist even confesses that no one living is righteous before God.

Nevertheless, they do refer to their own righteousness (sedeq [Ps 7:8; 18:20, 24]). In some cases this primarily means that they claim innocence versus the accusations of their persecutors (Pss 7; 17). Yet their claims have a wider scope. The psalmists also claim to be loyal to God in a more general sense. They demonstrate this loyalty by their very appeal to God (Ps 7:1; 17:1-2; 18:6) but also by being obedient to his commandments (Ps 17:5; 18:22).

None of this implies that they consider themselves to be free from sin. The issue at stake in the psalms in which people point to their own righteousness is not whether people can be totally free from sin or not; rather, what is at stake is that those who are loyal to God may expect him to deal with their case in a righteous way. That is, God will keep his promises by saving those who are faithful to him from the lethal attacks of those who rebel against him (Kwakkel, 291-304).

2. Proverbs.

2.1. A Gift of Wisdom. Right at the beginning of the book of Proverbs righteousness is mentioned next to wisdom, discipline, insight, justice, equity, knowledge and the like as one of the virtues that will be acquired by those who are willing to listen to the proverbs of *Solomon (Prov 1:2-6). At least some of the younger people who are addressed by these words may be expected to work as officials or rulers in the future (cf. Prov 1:8, 10; see Lemaire). Proverbs 8:15 says that kings and rulers can make righteous laws and decisions only if they get insight from wisdom, which is, in that chapter, presented as a lady who was brought forth by the Lord before the creation of the world (Prov 8:22-29). In Proverbs 31:8-9 the mother of King *Lemuel points to an important element of ruling in righteousness in that she associates righteous judgment with defending the rights of the poor and helpless.

2.2. A Fountain of Life. The collection of proverbs that opens in Proverbs 10:1 abounds with maxims in which the righteous are contrasted with the wicked. Yet it does not spend many words defining righteousness and righteous behavior. It says, for instance, that righteousness in speech implies that one speaks the truth, and that the mouth of the righteous brings forth wisdom (Prov 10:31; 12:17; 16:13). The righteous hate falsehood (Prov 13:5), they think seriously before they answer (Prov 15:28), and they make just plans (Prov 12:5). They are good and generous to their neighbors, especially the poor, as well as their animals (Prov 12:10; 21:26; 29:7). In times of need they take refuge in the name of the Lord (Prov 18:10). They do not trust in their riches (Prov 11:28). In short, they lead a blameless life (Prov 20:7). Most of these things could be linked with the instructions of God as these can be found in, for instance, the Pentateuch, but Proverbs refrains from doing so; it does not define righteousness in terms of obedience to the laws of Moses.

Many more words are devoted to the beneficial effects of righteousness for the righteous themselves. Righteousness delivers people from death, trouble and punishment (Prov 10:2; 11:8, 21; 12:21). The lives of the righteous are secure, fruitful and prosperous (Prov 12:12, 28; 13:21; 16:31). Their desires will be granted (Prov 10:24). They will receive joy and honor (Prov 10:28; 14:19; 21:21). And although righteousness itself is better than wealth (Prov 11:4; 16:8), the righteous may be sure that they will also receive riches (Prov 13:22; 15:6). In short, "He who sows righteousness reaps a sure reward" (Prov 11:18 NIV).

In most cases these effects are not explicitly ascribed to the intervention of God. One often gets the impression that righteousness rewards itself, while the wicked are punished by their own wickedness. Note, for instance, Proverbs 10:2b, "Righteousness delivers from death," and Proverbs 11:5b, "The wicked falls by his own wickedness" (see also Prov 11:6; 12:13; 13:6; 29:6). According to K. Koch, the concept behind these texts is that good and bad actions create a sphere of influence in which the built-in consequences of an action (i.e., well-being or mischief respectively) take effect. This does not imply that God is not involved at all. He surely is, but not as a judge who distributes rewards and punishments that have no inherent relationship to the human actions themselves. His role rather is to set the built-in consequences of human actions in motion and bring them to fulfillment (Koch 1972, 134-38, 150-52, 166-67 = 1983, 60-62, 70-72, 74, 78; THAT 2.517 = TLOT 1053).

Several texts in Proverbs indeed refer to the active involvement of the Lord (e.g., Prov 10:3; 15:3, 9, 29). These texts should not be contrasted to others that do not explicitly mention God's activities. Instead, it can be maintained that when the latter texts are read in the context of the book of Proverbs as a whole, they presuppose in some way or another the involvement of God. However, the way in which God is involved (i.e., as a judge or otherwise) does not seem to be the main point of interest of the proverbs. What they are claiming is that righteousness certainly will be rewarded, and wickedness surely will lead to disaster (even if one may have to wait some time before these effects are realized [Prov 28:28; 29:16]). The pointed form of the maxims contributes considerably to the powerful expression of this firm conviction (see Janowski, 181-83).

3. Ecclesiastes.

It is precisely this conviction in Proverbs that is challenged in Ecclesiastes. *Qohelet knows that God will judge both the righteous and the wicked, and that it will not go well with the wicked (Eccles 3:17; 8:13). Yet he observes that the righteous and the wicked share the same fate (Eccles 9:2). Sometimes righteous people even get what the wicked deserve, whereas wicked people get what should be reserved for the righteous (Eccles 8:14).

The idea that what one sees need not agree with what should be might also be found in Ecclesiastes 7:15—that is, if the text is read as follows: “(I saw) a righteous person perishing despite his righteousness and a wicked person prolonging his life despite his wickedness.” One could, however, also read “through” instead of “despite.” This interpretation fits the next verse (Eccles 7:16) quite well, as it warns against excessiveness in pursuing righteousness and wisdom. Such zealotry ends in bewilderment or self-destruction because it does not take into account that no one on earth is so righteous as to do good without ever sinning (Eccles 7:20). Moreover, it gives evidence of too high a view of what people can achieve, which contrasts with the humility of those who fear God (Eccles 7:18).

It is clear, then, that in its discussion of righteousness and its effects, Ecclesiastes differs considerably from Proverbs. Nevertheless, they firmly agree with each other in that both point to the *fear of the Lord as the only attitude that befits people and that leads to well being (Prov 1:7; 14:27; 22:4; Eccles 8:13; 12:13-14).

4. Job.

The dialogues of Job and his friends can well be interpreted as a debate about righteousness. Can Job be charged with unrighteousness? If not, how does his fate accord with God's righteousness?

Job's friends hold on to the traditional conviction that the upright will not perish, and that those who plow evil will reap trouble (e.g., Job 4:7-9). This must also apply to Job's case; otherwise, God would pervert justice and righteousness, which he does not (Job 8:3). The friends then account for Job's plight, first, by pointing to the fact that humans cannot be righteous in the sight of God; in other words, God detects shortcomings that deserve to be punished even in those who are as pious as Job (Job 4:17-19; 15:14; 25:4) (see Clines, 112, 132; Reimer, 754). Second, they do not refrain from also accusing him of great wickedness (Job 22:5-9).

In Job 9:2 Job claims that a mortal cannot be righteous in the sight of God. Further on in this chapter, however, it turns out that he does not mean this in the same sense as do his friends. What Job is pointing out is that even if he is innocent, God will declare him guilty. If Job wants to dispute that, God is so powerful that he will always win.

As for himself, Job maintains his righteousness and refuses to deny his integrity (Job 27:5-6). This position is fleshed out in several passages in Job's speeches, most prominently in his oath of innocence in Job 31. In this chapter Job denies, among other things, having committed adultery, falsehood and idolatry. In Job 29:12-17 he defines his righteousness, which surrounded him as his clothing, in terms of help for the poor and needy, which corresponds with Job 31:16-23. He affirms that he has not departed from God's commandments (Job 23:10-12). As long as he lives, his conscience will not reproach him about anything (Job 27:6; see also Job 33:9).

All this agrees with the eulogies on Job's virtues by the narrator and by God himself in Job 1:1, 8; 2:3. If, then, the traditional view on *retribution held by Job's friends is true, Job feels urged to conclude that he is suffering wrongs at the hand of God (Job 16:6-14; 19:6-7; 27:2). The only way out of all this is for God himself to intervene as a judge so as to vindicate Job versus his friends and versus God himself. In spite of his skepticism uttered in Job 9—10, this is what Job asks at the end of his defense in Job 31:35-37 (see also Job 16:19-21; 19:25-27; 23). In this connection, sdq (“be righteous”) should be given legal rather than moral connotations. In other words, it refers in a more concrete way to innocence or being right in a specific case.

Then šdq can be translated as “be right,” “be vindicated” or “be innocent” (thus, e.g., Job 9:15, 20; 11:2; 13:18).

Finally, God fulfills Job’s wish and begins to speak. He fires many critical questions at Job. Yet he never disputes what Job has said about his own upright behavior, nor does he endorse the view of Job’s friends (contrast Job 42:7-8).

What God is reproaching Job with is the latter maintaining his own righteousness at the expense of God’s righteousness (Job 40:8; in this God agrees with Elihu [see Job 32:2; 34:17]). On this point Job must renounce what he has so boldly declared (Job 40:1-5; 42:1-6). Consequently, the purport of God’s speeches is that he, as God, is so great that people must trust that he is behaving righteously, even if they are puzzled by his dealings with them, and even if he does not reveal to them the grounds of his unusual behavior.

See also HONOR AND SHAME; MAAT; SUFFERING; THEODICY; WISDOM THEOLOGY.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. D. J. A. Clines, Job 1-20 (WBC 17; Dallas: Word, 1989); B. Janowski, Die Rettende Gerechtigkeit (BTAT 2; Neukirchen-Vluyn: Neukirchener Verlag, 1999); B. Johnson and H. Ringgren, “šādaq,” ThWAT 6.898-924 = TDOT 12.239-264; K. Koch, “Gibt es ein Vergeltungsdogma im Alten Testament?” in Um das Prinzip der Vergeltung in Religion und Recht des Alten Testaments, ed. K. Koch (WF 125; Darmstadt: Wissenschaftliche Buchgesellschaft, 1972) 130-80; ET (abridged), “Is There a Doctrine of Retribution in the Old Testament?” in Theodicy in the Old Testament, ed. J. L. Crenshaw (IRT 4; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1983) 57-87; idem, “šdq gemeinschaftstreu/heilvoll sein,” THAT 2.507-30 = TLOT 1046-62; G. Kwakkel, “According to My Righteousness”: Upright Behaviour as Grounds for Deliverance in Psalms 7, 17, 18, 26 and 44 (OtSt 46; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 2002); A. Lemaire, “The Sage in School and Temple,” in The Sage in Israel and the Ancient Near East, ed. J. G. Gammie and L. G. Perdue (Winona Lake, IN: Eisenbrauns, 1990) 165-81; D. J. Reimer, “𐤑𐤔𐤁,” NIDOTTE 3.744-69; J. Renkema, Lamentations (HCOT; Leuven: Peeters, 1998 [1993]); H. G. Reventlow and Y. Hoffman, eds., Justice and Righteousness: Biblical Themes and Their Influence (JSOTSup 137; Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1992); J. J. Scullion, “Righteousness,” ABD 5.724-36; G. von Rad, Theologie des Alten Testaments, 1: Die Theologie der geschichtlichen Überlieferungen Israels (Munich: Kaiser, 1957); ET, Theology of the Old Testament, 1: The Theology of Israel’s Historical Traditions (New York: Harper & Row, 1962). G. Kwakkel

ROCK, YAHWEH AS. See MOUNTAIN IMAGERY.

ROYAL IDEOLOGY. See ROYAL COURT.

ROYAL PSALMS. See KINGSHIP PSALMS.

ROYAL COURT

The royal court lies in the background of much that we read in the psalms and Wisdom literature. It is highly likely that both psalmody and wisdom were, to one degree or another, court-sponsored enterprises. That is not to say, of course, that there was no writing of psalms or practice of wisdom outside the royal courts, but there are many indications that the court of the kings of Israel, and later Judah, provided the backdrop to the authorship and use of certain psalms and also the context for the development of at least some of the Israelite wisdom traditions.

It is likely that several of the royal psalms were written to celebrate the major events of court life. For example, Psalm 2 probably was written to celebrate the enthronement of a new king in the line of *David, whereas a royal wedding is the likely Sitz im Leben for the penning of Psalm 45. In other psalms the king appears to lead the people in public worship, celebrating Yahweh’s goodness to the covenant community (e.g., Ps 118), whereas yet others extol the significance of *Zion as the home of both temple and court, Yahweh and David (e.g., Ps 78:67-72; 122).

Throughout the ancient Near East wisdom traditions often were focused around the activities of the royal court. Kings were famed for their wisdom, and courtiers were schooled in the ways of wisdom so that they would be able to advise well. The Historical Books of the OT indicate that such associations between the royal court and wisdom applied every bit as much in Israel as with their neighbours. King *Solomon, for example, is seen as the archetypal wisdom ruler, and the historical narratives frequently point out the influence (for good or for evil) of counselors associated with the court. The psalms and wisdom writings are firmly set in the context of the royal court, a context that provides important background information for the interpretation of many of the poetic texts.

1. The Royal Court and the Psalms

2. The Royal Court and Wisdom
3. Conclusion

1. The Royal Court and the Psalms.

The book of *Psalms is ingrained with indications of court background and ideology. Kingship themes are played out, not only in the specifically royal psalms but also in many others where there are subtle indications of kingly origins (see Kingship Psalms). This should not take us by surprise, for there were many hymnic collections from the ancient Near East in which celebration of the achievements of kings plays a prominent role (see Starbuck, 80-83). There are three elements of the court background to the Psalter that particularly deserve our attention: (1) the Davidic superscriptions; (2) the democratization of psalms; (3) the royal ideology found in the psalms.

1.1. The Davidic Superscriptions. One of the key indications of court influence in the Psalter is the frequent occurrence of the lĕdāwīd ("of David") superscription (e.g., Ps 3:1; 4:1; 5:1). Some seventy-three psalms bear a Davidic title, and in many ways the figure of David dominates the book of Psalms. The meaning of the Davidic superscriptions is discussed elsewhere in the present volume (see Psalms 5: Titles); however, for our purposes, the psalms' repeated titular references to David serve, at the very least, to illustrate the strong ties between the kingly line and Israel's *hymns. So strong is this association that the Midrash Tehillim describes the five books of the Psalter as a Torah given by David akin to the Pentateuch given by Moses, and Rabbi Meir (b. Pesah. 117a) attributes the praises of all the psalms to David. The thoroughly Davidic flavor of the Psalter reflects a long-standing connection between court and psalmody. This association appears to have begun with David himself, but it continues throughout the generations of the Davidic line of kings. Speaking of the kingship psalms in particular, J. I. Durham (428) writes,

Each of these psalms was very probably composed within the circle of the royal court of the Davidic dynasty and for purposes even more specific . . . than the canonical form of the psalm-texts may suggest. The psalms in general have undergone a process of democratisation by which psalms bound to quite specific contexts . . . have been universalised to make them applicable in Israel's worship on a continuing basis. The royal psalms were subject to this process even more than . . . other psalm texts because they were applicable by design to all the Davidic kings, each David in succession. Even the psalms dealing with so specific an occasion as a royal wedding or a national disaster had repeated use. Otherwise, they would not have found place in the canonical Psalter.

It is difficult to say for sure how the link between the royal court and Israel's psalmody worked in reality. The origins of the association are most likely found in the Historical Books' presentation of King David as musician, author of psalms and sponsor of the musical setting of the Jerusalem temple (see 1 Sam 16:14-23; 2 Sam 1:17-27; 1 Chron 25). David certainly wrote psalms, but there are indications that this link went further than kingly authorship of the psalms. Other than Solomon, who is described as having written "one thousand and five songs" (1 Kings 4:32), and to whom two of the canonical psalms are dedicated (Pss 72; 127), the Historical Books do not point to David's descendants being prominent writers of psalms. So the royal court link with psalmody must be broader than simply the fact that David wrote psalms.

This, in turn, speaks to the question of the meaning of the lĕdāwīd superscriptions. Clearly, David wrote psalms, but probably this is not the root of all of the Davidic superscriptions (see Nogalski, 42-48; Wilson, 78-79). It seems likely that the lĕdāwīd superscription also indicates that psalms were written about one or other of the kings in David's line (all of Israel's and, later, Judah's kings from the time of Solomon onwards were "sons of David").

Take, for example, Psalm 20. This psalm has a lĕdāwīd superscription, yet it appears to be a prayer for the king and tribute to Yahweh for his deliverance of the king. The psalm itself is written in the third person, so the author is not speaking about himself, and it ends with the words "O Yahweh, save the king!"—an acclamation often used in support of the king but not usually voiced by the king himself. Therefore it seems that the psalms are influenced more broadly by the royal court. It is very likely that Psalm 20 and many of the other psalms with Davidic and other superscriptions were actually written by representative figures of the court circle and dedicated to the king of the day. These anonymous figures most likely were priests (Wilson, 386), prophets (Mays, 350) or *sages (Terrien, 303) who served within the royal sphere. Their participation in the writing and use of psalms underlines the strong association that existed between the royal court and psalmody.

1.2. Democratization. The Davidic superscriptions indicate something of the broad influence of the royal court on psalmody: certain kings penned psalms, but there were also psalms written in their honor, probably by a range of figures who served a variety of functions within the court (Croft, 179-81). What difference does court origin make to our understanding and interpretation of the psalms? In one sense, royal milieu makes very little difference for today's reader, yet there is a fairly profound significance to be drawn from the psalmic Sitz im Leben.

As we saw above, Durham points to "a process of democratisation by which psalms bound to quite specific contexts . . . have been universalised to make them applicable in Israel's worship on a continuing basis." This was a feature common to much of the hymnody of the ancient Near East, where hymns and poems originally intended for use in a specific context (often some event in life of the court) are later generalized for adoption in a wider context by a broad range of individuals. The net effect of this process of democratization is that many of the specifically royal aspects deriving from the court origins of the psalms have been diluted by their application to the whole of the covenant community. However, if we look closely we can see that indications of this royal background are still discernible.

The significance of the psalms' court setting is found in an interpretive invitation for readers of the psalms throughout all generations to see themselves as part the court of the king. There is a real sense in which the process of democratization is a two-way street. It takes the particular and generalizes it for application to many, but it also particularizes the many by inviting them to see themselves standing in the shoes of the king and his courtiers. A clear example of this is found in the association of the "blessed person" of Psalm 1 with the "king/son/anointed one" of Psalm 2. There are many lexical and thematic links that tie these two psalms together (McCann, 41-43), and the net effect of this close association is to democratize the king of Psalm 2, but also to "royalize" the individual believer of Psalm 1. P. D. Miller (91-92) observes,

The dual introduction [Pss 1—2] creates a certain ambiguity for the reading of the psalms. The subject of the introduction is clearly the king against his enemies. But it is also the ʾiṣ [man] against the wicked, that is anyone who lives by the Torah of the Lord and thus belongs to the righteous innocent who cry out in these psalms. So one may not read these psalms as exclusively concerning rulers. . . . The ruler is the ʾiṣ of Psalm 1, but to no greater extent than any member of the community who delights in the law of the Lord and walks in the way of the righteous. . . . The ʾiṣ of Psalm 1 is as much a ruler as the ruler of Psalm 2 is an ʾiṣ.

So there is a sense in which democratization invites all subsequent readers of the psalms to see themselves in the court of the king. There is a very rich biblical imagery of access implied by the democratization of court imagery. We are invited to sing hymns of praise, to offer prayers of complaint, to meditate on word and world and wondrous works, all in the presence of the King. The human king, as representative of God to the people and the people to God, was assumed to have in some sense "special" rights of access to Yahweh. The democratization of the court-based psalms means that we, as readers, can see ourselves as having these same "privileged" rights of access before the throne of the High King—a rich image indeed.

1.3. Royal Ideology. The similarities between the court setting of the psalms and the court setting of other ancient Near Eastern hymnic collections gives rise to another question that should be addressed. To what extent does the expression found in the royal psalms reflect the inflated royalist ideology found in collections of royal hymns outside Israel? This is often referred to as Hofstil ("court style"). Many of the royal hymns of the ancient world presented a highly exaggerated view of the king: he is described in almost superhuman terms, his feats are elevated to epic status, and every conceivable superlative is adopted. From the time of H. Gunkel, some scholars have argued that the royal psalms, finding their root in the deferential practices of the court, actually express no more than this standard Near Eastern Hofstil in their celebration of the Davidic kingship.

Although the royal psalms definitely display deference towards the king, it would be a giant leap to equate this with the excesses of hyperbole found in some non-Israelite hymnic collections. The universal rule of the Davidic king, celebrated in poems such as Psalms 2; 110, is never attributed to the incredible abilities of the particular king but rather is firmly rooted in the fact that the king is Yahweh's chosen servant and it is Yahweh who rules the whole earth. The royal psalms of the Psalter are, in many ways, more about the kingship of Yahweh than they are about the rule of the human king, because human rule is never more than vice-regency. The rule of the king is one of derived authority; therefore it would be inaccurate to describe the psalms rooted in the royal court as displaying the Hofstil of Israel's neighbors (Waltke, 1111).

2. The Royal Court and Wisdom.

The OT Wisdom literature is also deeply ingrained with background themes and imagery derived from the court. Ancient Near Eastern wisdom schools normally were based around the royal court and served to prepare young men for service at court (the book of Daniel gives insight into this practice in the Babylonian royal court). Equally, many examples of ancient Egyptian wisdom texts that have been discovered seem to be geared around the preparation of young men for service at court (e.g., The Instruction of Amenemope). So it is right to ask whether the royal court is the natural didactic setting for Israel's Wisdom literature as well.

The evidence from the wisdom books themselves seems ambiguous. There is some mention, scattered throughout *Proverbs and *Ecclesiastes (e.g., Prov 14:35; 16:10-15; Eccles 8:1-4), of how one should behave before kings, but this could hardly be described as a major focus of the canonical wisdom books. In terms of content, taking the OT wisdom books at face value, we clearly see that their aim is not specifically to prepare young men for life at court but rather to prepare every reader to live life well. Nevertheless, although the Wisdom literature is not specifically aimed at equipping the next generation of the civil service, there are aspects of the royal background to wisdom that deserve further attention.

2.1. The Sage in the Royal Court.

Although Israel's wisdom practice seems to have extended far beyond the royal court to the family, the marketplace and every aspect of daily life, the Historical Books frequently point to the importance of royal counselors or sages. These figures would advise king and court in a wide variety of situations from legal matters to international diplomacy to military tactics, although there was never any guarantee that the king would follow wise counsel (Whybray, 133-37). The sages are key background players in many of the OT narratives, and their advice often had a climactic impact on the course of Israel's history. For example, 2 Samuel 15—17 points to the significance of good advice from royal advisers from the perspective of King David. He was well aware that a good adviser was a powerful force within the court and prayed for Ahithophel's advice to be thwarted (2 Sam 15:31). Another example of the significance of the sages within the royal court is found in 2 Kings 12, where King Rehoboam follows the wrong advice, and this leads to the division of the kingdom. So we see that the advisers to the court played a significant role in Israel and Judah's political and religious history.

2.2. King Solomon as Sage. Another key link between the royal court and the Wisdom literature is the presentation of King Solomon as the archetypal wise ruler and sage in 1 Kings 1—11. This passage is quite honest in its assessment of Solomon's many failings, and these are presented as an ironic denial of the wisdom with which he was gifted. However, 1 Kings 4:29-34; 10:1-13 present Solomon as practitioner of wisdom par excellence: the author of thousands of proverbs (reflected in the titles of the book of Proverbs), an expert on the natural world and a "big hitter" on the international stage of wisdom schools. There is a real sense in which Solomon becomes conceptually associated with the wisdom books, just as David is associated with psalmody and the Psalter. So we see that wisdom is not just the remit of the royal adviser but also is the purview of the king. However, as with psalmody once again, the extent to which this link between the king and wisdom continues throughout the Davidic line is far from clear. It appears that after the flowering of wisdom in the Israelite court during the reign of Solomon, there are only sporadic examples of wise kings (e.g., Hezekiah [Prov 25:1]).

The image of Solomon as sage is influential more broadly within Israel's wisdom tradition.

Perhaps the classic example of this is seen in the presentation of a “Solomonic” royal persona as the central character of Ecclesiastes. Traditionally, Solomon has been seen as the author of Ecclesiastes, even though the title of the book does not make this explicit claim and Solomonic authorship is difficult to reconcile with several elements of the text (see Longman, 2-9). However, the figure of *Qohelet in Ecclesiastes is consciously presented in the light of Solomon as kingly practitioner of wisdom (see Fox, 159-60; Longman, 57-58). This choice of persona for Qohelet (whether a real person or a literary creation) further indicates the pervasive influence of King Solomon as sage, and therefore of the royal court, within Israel’s wisdom tradition.

3. Conclusion.

Although it is not often an explicit subject of debate in and of itself, Israel’s royal court is a significant background motif within the Psalter and the OT Wisdom literature. King, kingship and the royal court provide the milieu for many of the psalms and for much of the books of Proverbs and Ecclesiastes. In many ways, the significance of the court background to these poetic texts is lost in the passage of time through the democratization of royal texts. However, it is still important for the reader to bear in mind that these texts find their roots in a royal setting. As we noted, it was often thought in the ancient world that the king had special rights of access to God and that courtiers had special access to the king; the democratization of these texts indicates that everyone who fears God has the same access to the divine court as any chosen representative throughout Israel’s history. Another rich image derived from court background is found in one of the wisdom psalms, Psalm 73. We have noted the significance of the sage or royal adviser within the court, but the prayer of *Asaph to God in Psalm 73:24 turns that common image on its head to emphasize once again the access that every believer has into the court of the High King: “You guide me with your counsel, and afterwards you will take me into glory.” The Writings are rife with images of advisers guiding the king with counsel, for good or for evil, but here we are reminded that all those who walk in the ways of Yahweh are guided by the counsel of the King himself.

See also DAVID; KINGSHIP PSALMS; SAGES, SCHOOLS, EDUCATION; SOLOMON.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. S. J. L. Croft, The Identity of the Individual in the Psalms (JSOTSup 44; Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1987); J. I. Durham, “The King as ‘Messiah’ in the Psalms,” RevExp 81 (1984) 425-35; M. V. Fox, A Time to Tear Down and a Time to Build Up: A Rereading of Ecclesiastes (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1999); T. Longman III, The Book of Ecclesiastes (NICOT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1998); J. L. Mays, Psalms (IBC; Louisville: John Knox, 1994); J. C. McCann, A Theological Introduction to the Books of Psalms: The Psalms as Torah (Nashville: Abingdon, 1993); P. D. Miller, “The Beginning of the Psalter,” in The Shape and Shaping of the Psalter, ed. J. C. McCann (JSOTSup 159; Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1993) 83-92; J. D. Nogalski, “From Psalm to Psalter,” in An Introduction to Wisdom Literature and the Psalms: Festschrift Marvin E. Tate, ed. H. W. Ballard and W. D. Tucker (Macon, GA: Mercer University Press, 2000) 37-54; S. R. A. Starbuck, Court Oracles in the Psalms: The So-Called Royal Psalms in Their Ancient Near Eastern Context (SBLDS 172; Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1999); S. Terrien, The Psalms: Strophic Structure and Theological Commentary (ECC; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2003); B. K. Waltke, “Theology of the Psalms,” NIDOTTE 4.1100-1115; R. N. Whybray, “The Sage in the Israelite Royal Court,” in The Sage in Israel and the Ancient Near East, ed. J. G. Gammie and L. G. Perdue (Winona Lake, IN: Eisenbrauns, 1990) 133-39; G. H. Wilson, Psalms, vol. 1 (NIVAC; Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 2002).

J. A. Grant

RUTH 1: BOOK OF

The book of Ruth is widely recognized as a superlative literary achievement of ancient Israel. With its sensitive portrayal of *women in crisis, its admiration for a righteous man, and its profound theology it offers readers in every age not only a window into life in the ancient Near East but also inspiration for good and godly living.

1. Title
2. Date and Authorship
3. Genre and Intention
4. Literary Style
5. Canonical Position
6. Theological Message
7. Outline

1. Title.

The biblical book of Ruth derives its name from one of its three main characters, the Moabite daughter-in-law of *Naomi and eventual husband of *Boaz. Ruth is named twelve times in the book but elsewhere in the Bible only in Matthew's genealogy of Jesus (Mt 1:5). That the book should be named after Ruth is remarkable for several reasons. First, Ruth was not an Israelite. She was a Moabite—a fact that the narrator and Boaz emphasize by their repeated references to her as “Ruth the Moabite” (Ruth 1:22; 2:2, 21; 4:5, 10; see also Ruth 2:6). This is the only book in the OT *canon named after a non-Israelite. Second, it is not clear that Ruth is the main character of the book. Admittedly, she appears as a significant character in more episodes than does either Naomi or Boaz, but the book opens by describing the crisis in Naomi's family, highlighting her own emptiness, and concludes with the resolution of her crisis and the declaration of her fullness in the birth of Obed. Indeed in all of Ruth 4 the narrator appears intent on drawing readers' attention away from Ruth. This impression of the secondary role of Ruth is reinforced by the manner in which the characters relate in the account. Scholars have recognized the importance of direct speech in this book. Of the 1,294 words in the book, 678 occur on the lips of the characters. However, of the three main actors in the drama, Ruth speaks least often, and her speeches are the shortest (Block 1999, 588). Based on the plot, the book could be titled “The Book of Naomi,” but on the basis of the dialogue, the concluding episode and the final genealogy, “The Book of Boaz,” also would be appropriate.

2. Date and Authorship.

Although the Talmud attributed the authorship of both Judges and Ruth to Samuel (b. B. Bat. 14b-15a), like the rest of the books in the OT and most literary texts from the ancient Near East, the book offers no hint of interest in the identity of its author. Efforts to date the book must be deduced from the internal evidence—language and style, historical allusions, themes. However, the frustratingly inconsistent nature of the evidence has led to a wide range of dates, from the time of *David to the postexilic period. Since J. Wellhausen, critical scholars have tended to date Ruth in the postexilic period. This conclusion is based upon five principal arguments: (1) the language of the book, particularly its alleged Aramaisms and late Hebrew forms of expression (Bush, 22-30; Fischer, 86-88); (2) the legal customs reflected, specifically the need to explain the ceremony of the sandal in Ruth 4:7, which presupposes a time when the practice was no longer understood; (3) the interest in genealogies expressed in Ruth 4:18-22, recalling the “priestly” genealogies in the Pentateuch and Chronicles, especially 1 Chronicles 2:3-15; (4) the extremely favorable portrayal of Ruth the Moabite, which, along with Jonah, balances the narrow ethnocentrism of Ezra and Nehemiah (Ezra 10; Neh 13:23-27); (5) the allusions to the allegedly postexilic “Deuteronomistic” work of Judges, especially Ruth 1:1; (6) The canonical placement of Ruth among the Writings (Hagiographa), rather than the (Former) Prophets, suggesting that the latter section had been closed (Nash, 350-51).

In the face of the problem of subjectivity of some of these arguments, F. Bush has attempted to base discussions of the date and provenance of the book of Ruth on more objective footings by focusing particularly on the language of the book. Taking advantage of the work of several recent diachronic analyses of biblical texts, Bush observes that the author employed at least ten linguistic features that are characteristic of standard biblical Hebrew (SBH), which is pre-exilic by definition (see Hebrew Language). These features tempt one to affirm the assertion by E. F. Campbell (26) that “no linguistic datum points unerringly toward a later date.”

But how early should we date the book? Some contend that the book was composed during David's lifetime as an apology for his kingship. The narratives in the books of Samuel suggest that resistance to David's rule persisted throughout his reign. Such opposition came most naturally from the Saulide party, particularly Benjaminites and others from the northern tribes who resented the favoritism with which they perceived David to be treating Judah (2 Sam 19:40—20:2). One can imagine the opposition demeaning David by pointing to his lowly origins in Bethlehem (Mic 5:2) and the contemptuous Moabite connection in his genealogy. Against this backdrop the author intentionally highlights Bethlehem, as an oasis of tranquility and honor in the troubled period of the judges, and Ruth, David's Moabite ancestress, as a paragon of virtue. Noting the narrator's rare literary talent, sensitive disposition toward women, access to the family traditions, devout Yahwistic faith and the literary integrity of the book (it is not simply cheap propaganda), M. Gow (207-10) speculates that Nathan may have been the author.

Others who find in Ruth a pro-Davidic polemic date its composition in the reign of *Solomon (Nielsen, 21-29; cf. Hubbard 1988, 46). On the one hand, some of his subjects may have questioned his character and his right to rule, since he achieved the throne through intrigue and violent elimination of other contenders (1 Kings 1—2). This opposition increased toward the end of his reign (1 Kings 12). On the other hand, the long and relatively peaceful reign of Solomon provided an ideal context for the flourishing of culture, which finds one of its fullest blooms in the book of Ruth. Literarily, the book of Ruth bears a closer resemblance to the so-called Yahwist narratives of Genesis and the stories in Samuel than the accounts in Chronicles and the book of *Esther. Recognizing that the book tells a woman's story, A. Bledstein argues that the book is the work of a female author, perhaps Tamar, the daughter of David, and great-great-granddaughter of Ruth [and namesake of another Tamar involved in the same issues as are dealt with in Ruth], who had herself experienced the tragedies that befell even royal women in a patriarchal culture.

Citing a series of clichés and phrases that have affinities with early Israelite literature but are not found after the period of Elisha, and interpreting the alleged Aramaisms (see below) as evidences of a Northern Hebrew dialect, M. Weinfeld suggests that the book may have been composed in northern Israel during the time of Elisha (EncJud 14.518-22). Although he does not explain why this idyllic account of David's origins would have been an issue for a northern author, one might speculate that a century after the northern kingdom had split off from the Davidic house the book may have been written to convince northerners to abandon their kings and reunite with Judah. However, the book lacks any hint of polemics against the kings of northern Israel. The renaissance of the Davidic house under Hezekiah (716-687 BC) also could have inspired the book of Ruth. In the opening thesis statement of the account of Hezekiah's reign the historian observes that Hezekiah did right in the sight of Yahweh according to all that his ancestor David had done (2 Kings 18:3), and that Yahweh was with him (2 Kings 18:7), which recalls two similar comments concerning David in 1 Samuel 16:18; 18:14. Even the note that Hezekiah defeated the Philistines (2 Kings 18:8) may be intended to link him with David (cf. 2 Sam 5:17-25).

Earlier we noted that the book of Ruth shares a series of linguistic features with standard biblical Hebrew (SBH), which seemed to suggest that the book derives from preexilic times. However, the situation is complicated by an equally impressive series of features that push it in the direction of late biblical Hebrew (LBH), perhaps as late as the Persian period (Sperling, 594). Bush (24-30) concludes that the author of Ruth cannot have lived earlier than Ezekiel, whose work reflects the linguistic transition between SBH and LBH. At the earliest, the work could have been composed in the late pre-exilic or early exilic period, though the cluster of late and Aramaic features in Ruth 4:7 suggests an early postexilic date, perhaps shortly after 538 BC. Recognizing that languages do indeed evolve from generation to generation, Bush has attempted to put the dating of the book on more objective grounds than the subjective ideological or thematic bases that have been appealed to in earlier studies. The faithful in Israel, particularly those associated with the Davidic house, and perhaps women in general, will have delighted in this story of a resourceful Naomi and her courageous foreign-born daughter-in-law and passed it on from generation to generation by word of mouth. In fact, although the language of narrative (in contrast to poetry) tends to be updated with the retelling in each generation, some of the archaic features may represent linguistic fossils from earlier times. Bush suggests that the author's aim was to present Naomi, Ruth and Boaz as models of hesed for his readers to emulate. However, as secondary objectives, the book also affirms God's absolute control over the affairs of this world and his providential involvement in the lives of individuals. The link with David in the dénouement and conclusion/coda (Ruth 4:17-22) elevates both the story and David by focusing the reader's attention on developments beyond the events of the account, and by reflecting David's worth "through the quality of life of his forbears" (Bush, 53). Whereas a previous generation of scholars dismissed Ruth 4:17-22 (exclusive of Ruth 4:17c) as a postexilic "priestly" addition to the story, Bush highlights its role as the capstone of the book.

On the surface, Bush appears to have adduced strong arguments for a late exilic provenance. However, since the entire OT represents but a linguistic fragment of the full Hebrew language spoken in ancient Israel, we do well to hold loosely to our reconstructions of the history of language. If the book of Ruth derives from late exilic or early postexilic times, the fact that scholars have found only eight clearly late features in a composition of 1,294 words is remarkable. But if the Aramaisms and supposedly late features are evidences of a dialect spoken and written some distance from Jerusalem/Judah, then other possibilities emerge.

Beyond the linguistic considerations, the reference to “the days when judges governed” in the opening verse suggests that the author was familiar with the record of the premonarchic period as a distinct era found in the book of Judges. The ignoble qualities of most of the characters in the book of Judges cast into even sharper relief the nobility and integrity of the characters in Ruth. If the book of Judges was composed to alert what remained of the nation of Israel to the people’s spiritual declension during the reign of wicked Manasseh (Block 1999, 64-67), it is unlikely that Ruth was composed before the latter half of the seventh century BC.

The book’s interest in the Davidic house may be best interpreted against the backdrop of the renaissance of the dynasty under the reign of Josiah (540-609 BC) (Sasson, 230-32). Not only is the tender-heartedness of Boaz explicitly attributed to Josiah (2 Kings 22:19), but also Josiah is the only king whose fidelity to the covenant as outlined in Deuteronomy is characterized as “turning to Yahweh with all his heart/mind [lēbāb], and with all his being [nepheš], and with all his resources [mē’ōd]” (2 Kings 23:25 [on this as a quality of Boaz, see further discussion below]). Furthermore, the Moabite connection surfaces in the observation that Josiah removed the high place in Jerusalem that Solomon had built for Chemosh, “the abomination of Moab” (2 Kings 23:13). By highlighting the personal and spiritual integrity of “Ruth the Moabite,” the author may be diffusing charges by Josiah’s detractors that blood of the despicable Moabites flowed through the veins of the king. This date is late enough to accommodate the cultural and chronological distance required between the composition of Ruth 4:7 and the events described in this chapter. Apparently, the original readership was no longer familiar with the custom of the sandal. It may also account for some of the book’s LBH and Aramaic features. Although Bush (30) opts for an early postexilic period for the book of Ruth, he acknowledges the possibility of a date in the late preexilic period.

Like all other proposals for the date of composition for the book of Ruth, my suggestion is provisional and subject to critique. Even if it is correct, the identity of the author remains unresolved. If the book was written by a resident of the territory once part of the northern kingdom, that person could either be a Judean who had moved north or a survivor of the Assyrian conquest and occupation. But why would a resident of the north have composed a literary piece involving a Judahite family from Bethlehem from half a millennium earlier? Perhaps some in the north had objected to Josiah’s political ambitions and denigrated his character by highlighting the ethnic blemish in the royal family. This tractate responds by demonstrating that nobility is more than an issue of blood; it is a matter of character. Both Boaz and Ruth represent all that was virtuous and authentically pious (hesed) in Israel’s own covenantal tradition. Furthermore, the fact that a foreigner such as Ruth could be so thoroughly integrated into the life and faith of Israel opened the door to non-Israelites living in the Assyrian province. With her immortal declaration in Ruth 1:16-17, this Moabite serves as a model for all aliens: if they will cast their lot in with the people of Israel and commit themselves to Yahweh their God, they too may find a home in the covenant community.

Perhaps more important than silencing Josiah’s detractors, with this book the author celebrated the return of his own region to the only legitimate dynasty the Israelites had ever known. The narrator undoubtedly drew on traditions based in Bethlehem, but the story of the rise of the house of David from the chaos of the premonarchic period must have been rehearsed with delight throughout the nation’s history. The linguistic features that link this work with early biblical Hebrew may represent echoes of earlier versions of the story, but in retelling the story for the present generation, the author sought to inspire his fellow northerners to cast their lot with the revived Davidic house. Perhaps in the story he found grounds for hope for his own time. Just as Yahweh had preserved the lineage of David through the dark days of the judges, so also he had preserved the residents of the north through the night of Assyrian domination. The book of Ruth is a testimony to the blessing that comes to those who will live in faithful covenant relationship with God (hesed) and to God's providential hand upon the house of David. In claiming Ruth as an ancestor, the Davidic dynasty has nothing to be ashamed of. On the contrary, she symbolizes the universal scope of the Davidic covenant implied by the enigmatic but profound affirmation in 2 Samuel 7:19: "This is the instruction/revelation for humanity [tôrat hā'adam]."

In view of the composition's obvious interest in women and its sympathetic portrayal of events from a female point of view, some have proposed a female author (Bledstein; cf. Fischer, 93-94). However, the narrator's obvious sympathy toward women does not mean that a man could not have authored it, any more than that an optimist could not have been responsible for the final form of *Ecclesiastes. Analogous to Ecclesiastes, which consists largely of *Qohelet's personal account of life (cast in *autobiographic form) but is framed by the perspectives of a third person (Eccles 1:1-11; 12:8-14), the book of Ruth incorporates stories told from a woman's perspective. However, the opening paragraph (Ruth 1:1-5) and most of the final chapter (Ruth 4:1-13), but especially the concluding genealogy (Ruth 4:17b-22), obviously represent traditional male perspectives (see Bauckham). We cannot a priori rule out the possibility of a woman having authored the book. However, given the paucity of evidence for female literary activity in Israel and in the world around, the theory seems strained. It is better to focus on the gender perspective of the book than on the gender of its author (so also Meyers, 89) (see Feminist Interpretation).

3. Genre and Intention.

Generically, the book of Ruth divides into two unequal parts: (1) a complex narrative account constructed with a typical plot leading from problem/crisis (Ruth 1:1-5 [cf. Ruth 1:21]) to resolution (Ruth 4:13-17); (2) a short genealogy (Ruth 4:18-22). We begin by considering the latter first because the issues are simpler.

3.1. The Concluding Genealogy. Structurally, the genealogy consists of a formal heading, wē'elleh tōlēdôt pāreš ("Now these are the generations of Perez"), followed by nine entries constructed after the pattern, "A sired B," yielding a total of ten names/generations. The form of the title is familiar from Genesis, where it occurs nine times, and Numbers 3:1. Except perhaps for Genesis 2:4, elsewhere the formula always precedes the lists of generations. The linear (as opposed to segmented) form of the genealogy and the pattern of the entries, with ten generations climaxing in the seventh (Boaz; cf. Enoch in Gen 5:21-24; Peleg in Gen 11:18-19 [cf. Gen 10:25]), suggest an artificial construction modeled after Genesis 5; 11:10-26. In 1 Chronicles 2:3-15 is preserved an official version of the present genealogy. The Chronicler repeats all of the information found here but recasts the genealogy in three significant ways: (1) the form is segmented, rather than linear, including the names of brothers and sisters of the persons named in Ruth; (2) the scope is extended by beginning with Judah, the tribal ancestor, and ending with the names of David's sisters; (3) the style is changed from the present consistently formulaic presentation of each entry to a variety of forms of expression. Linear genealogies represent an economic form of historiography by which an author asserts the legitimacy of the last person named to certain rights, privileges, roles and power that come with membership in this direct line. By attaching this genealogy to the story of Naomi and Ruth, the author emphasizes that the significance of the birth of Obed goes far beyond satisfying Ruth's maternal instincts or filling the emptiness that Naomi had experienced at the beginning. The birth of Obed represents a critical link in the sequence of historical events that began with Perez and climax in the (divine) election of David as king over Israel. Although the experiences of Ruth and Naomi and Boaz are of great interest to the reader, and in their responses they serve as models of hesed for all who claim membership in the covenant community, the lives of these women have primary significance for the part that they play in the eventual emergence of David.

3.2. The Narrative. Identifying the genre of the preceding narrative is a more difficult task. Scholars have characterized Ruth as an "idyllic" narrative, "a poetic popular sage" (Gunkel, 82), comparable to an ancient nursery tale in poetic form (Myers). While J. Myers's analysis relies too much on a simplistic distinction between poetry and prose that is no longer accepted, the notion that the book is composed in an elevated poetic style has recently been revived (Korpel). Some have applied the conclusions of the folklorist V. Propp regarding the characteristics of personae found in Russian fairy tales and have concluded that Ruth has the form of a folk tale (Sasson). Others suggest that the present account is a combination of two distinct orally transmitted tales portraying the reversal of feminine fortunes—a Naomi story and a Ruth story—which originally represented separate, although parallel, folk tales. Recent commentators have tended to apply three literary categories to the book of Ruth: tale, *novella, short story. Because biblical scholars sometimes use such expressions slightly differently than do students of other literary traditions, and because their meanings overlap, definitions of these categories are needed (see Block 1999, 601-2; Coats, 63-70).

A “tale” may be defined as a short narrative written or spoken in prose or verse. Typically, the plot of a tale is simple, moving quickly from problem to resolution without complication or subplots. Presentation of the event is more important than developing the characters of the principal participants. In common literary usage a *novella is a fictional narrative often restricted to a single suspenseful situation or event that leads to a surprising though logically consistent conclusion (Cuddon, 954-55). Novellas involve the evolution of characters as well as the evolution of an event (plot). The definition of the “short story” is most elusive. How long is “short”? For some, the difference between a novella and a short story is one of length. If a novella is viewed as a middle-distance race, then the short story is a one- or two-hundred-meter sprint (Cuddon, 865-66). According to others, the short story typically has a simpler plot and fewer characters than the novella has. However, whereas a novella develops its characters, a short story reveals them. In the latter, the issue is not how characters evolve with changing circumstances but rather how different events and situations reveal the true characters of the participants (Humphreys, 84-85).

Given these definitions, it is easier to classify the book of Ruth. With respect to length and complexity, the book falls between the tale and the novella—that is, within the range of the short story. This classification is confirmed by the manner in which the characters are treated: although one may detect some development in the character of Naomi, the author’s primary purpose is to expose the characters of Naomi and Ruth and Boaz. Reflecting great literary skill, all the scenes contribute to the revelation of their hesed, their genuine goodness and loyalty that expresses itself in “loving their neighbors more than they love themselves.”

Furthermore, the book’s fundamentally historical character reinforces its classification as a short story rather than a tale or a novella. Although some treat the book of Ruth as ideological fiction, both the opening clause, “In the days when judges judged Israel” (Ruth 1:1) and the concluding genealogy anchor the events described in a specific historical period. Between these frames the narrative contains no literary or linguistic features that push it in the direction of fiction or invite the reader to interpret this account as a māšāl (“proverb, figure of speech, parable,”) or a šīr (“song, poem”). Furthermore, the book records no miracles, no supernatural visits, no revelations of extra-historical and extraterrestrial realities. The picture of the lives of the characters is entirely realistic and in keeping with what is known of life in Palestine in the late second millennium BC: the famine and consequent migration of Elimelech and his family (Ruth 1:1); the allusions to methods of burial (Ruth 1:17); the geographic portrayal of Bethlehem as a walled town with gates, and the location of the threshing floor outside the town; the scenes of workers harvesting the grain (Ruth 2); emotions of the characters in the face of grief, anxiety, joy; the nature of the social relationships between mother-in-law and daughter-in-law, landowner and workers, citizen and the citizenry, husband and wife, grandmother and grandson; the legal process (Ruth 4:1-12). Indeed, to ensure that readers grasp the historical and cultural significance of events, in Ruth 4:7 the narrator adds a parenthetical explanation for their benefit. In any case, it seems unlikely that the author of a story whose aim was to honor David would have invented a plot in which the great-grandmother of Israel’s greatest king was a despised Moabite (Hubbard, 48). Finally, in the NT Matthew apparently understood the story to recount real events. In his genealogy of Jesus (Mt 1:1-17), the aim of which was to affirm Jesus’ right to the messianic title, he deliberately inserts the name of Ruth (along with Tamar, Rahab and the wife of Uriah [Bathsheba]), even though her name was missing from the genealogy at the end of Ruth and her presence here does nothing to enhance Jesus' royal claims. Without the book of Ruth, Matthew would have had no basis for even knowing Ruth's name.

Like the book of Judges, the book of Ruth should be interpreted as a historiographical document. It describes real experiences of real people in real time at real places. The storyteller does indeed exhibit great literary skill and promote a particular ideology, but to classify the story as fiction is to miss the primary point of the book: to honor David by remembering the noble characters in his family history. Accordingly, the book of Ruth is best classified as an independent historiographical short story. The story of Joseph in Genesis 37–50 or the Gideon cycle in Judges 6–9 may be seen as analogues, except that these have been adapted and integrated into larger compositions.

4. Literary Style.

4.1. Plot. As a piece of literature, the book of Ruth is one of the most delightful ever produced. The narrator is a master at painting word pictures, skillfully employing the techniques of suspense, dialogue, characterization, repetition, reticence, *ambiguity, *word play and *inclusio and creatively adapting ancient traditions to produce this moving work of art. The book of Ruth is constructed as a lively literary piece intended to be read orally and heard at one sitting (see Nielsen, 4). It exhibits a tightly knit and carefully controlled plot (Berlin, 83–110), whose structure may be portrayed graphically as in figure 1.

Figure 1. The Plot Structure of the Book of Ruth

4.1.1. Exposition (Ruth 1:1-2). The opening verses set the stage, introducing what we expect to be the main characters: Elimelech; his wife, Naomi; and their two sons, Mahlon and Chilion. Because of a famine in their hometown of Bethlehem in Judah, they move to Moab.

4.1.2. First Complication (1:3-22). The lives of this family are complicated when first Naomi's husband and then their two sons die, leaving three widows with no men to provide security for them. As the primary character in Ruth 1, Naomi describes her situation: she claims that she went away full and has come back empty (Ruth 1:19-21). This is both incorrect and correct, depending upon how one understands "fullness." If by "fullness" we mean having food and enjoying life, she was wrong, for the family had moved to save their lives from starvation. But if by "fullness" we mean family, she was correct. She had left with a husband and two sons; she returned as a widow, without husband or progeny. Between these verses the narrator introduces Ruth, a second principal character in the plot, who insists on casting her lot with her mother-in-law. In the meantime, Naomi has introduced a fundamental issue in the book: because she is too old to remarry and bear sons, it looks as if the second emptiness will never be resolved. And this creates the real crisis: the line of Elimelech is in danger of dying out. Unless one has read the book to the end, this may not seem of great consequence, beyond the personal grief of Naomi, but for the narrator, this introduces the key issue in the book: how can the line be rescued so that Yahweh's chosen king, David, may appear in due course? Ruth 1:22 is transitional, summarizing the response of Naomi and setting the stage for the next phase.

4.1.3. Solution (2:1-23). The chapter opens with an expository introduction of a third principal, Boaz (Ruth 2:1), and concludes again with Naomi's interpretation of the intervening events, particularly the contact with Boaz (Ruth 2:20-22). The intervening narrative links Boaz and Ruth in an economic relationship and introduces them to each other in ways that reveal the finest aspects of both characters. Naomi's concluding statement heightens the readers' interest and expectation of a quick resolution of the crisis.

4.1.4. Second Complication (3:1-18). Naomi's speech in Ruth 2:20 had raised the prospect of an early resolution of the second form of emptiness, Naomi's lack of progeny and Ruth's lack of security in the house of a husband. Framed by two speeches by Naomi (Ruth 3:1-4, 18), Ruth 3 introduces a complication to this hope. Faithfully following her mother-in-law's instructions and brazenly calling upon Boaz to marry her, Ruth discovers that Boaz is not in a position to do so. Because Boaz is not the first in line to claim the property of Elimelech and, with it, the widowed Ruth, he must decline her proposal. But he offers hope by suggesting that one way or another Ruth will be "redeemed," though both obviously hope that Boaz will be the man to do it (see Kinsman-Redeemer and Levirate).

4.1.5. Resolution (4:1-17). The final act in the drama commences with Boaz taking the initiative to resolve the legal question and concludes with the narrator's announcement that the son born to Naomi is the grandfather of David. Between these borders three groups comment on what has happened, and in so doing they provide important clues to the significance of these events: (1) having won the right to Elimelech's land and Ruth's hand, Boaz declares his intention of preserving the name of the deceased (Mahlon and Elimelech) (Ruth 4:9-10); (2) the men of Bethlehem pronounce a blessing upon Ruth, praying that she will join the ranks of Rachel and Leah and Tamar, who built the house of Israel/Judah (Ruth 4:11-12); (3) the women of Bethlehem announce Naomi's complete fulfillment in her daughter-in-law and her grandson and pray that the son's name will become famous in Israel (Ruth 4:14-15). None of these parties realizes the long-range significance of their pronouncements. But the narrator does, declaring first Yahweh's auspicious role in the birth of the boy (Ruth 4:13), and then on the heels of the naming of Obed, announcing that he was the grandfather of David (Ruth 4:17).

4.1.6. Genealogical Epilogue (4:18-22). The concluding genealogy reminds the readers that the story just told is more than an inspiring tale of a family of genuinely good people. The author has described the critical role played by the seventh link in this chain. Like Enoch in Genesis 5:22, 24, righteous Boaz shows us what it means to walk with God. Furthermore, far from disqualifying David from the kingship of Israel because Moabite blood flows in his veins, it is precisely the Moabite connection that raises his genealogy above the ordinary.

4.2. Intertextual Issues. While the plot of the book of Ruth is intriguing in its own right, through the effective use of echoes and allusions, the narrator seems to betray a familiarity with a wide range of other biblical texts or traditions (Zakovitch, 49-59; Fischer, 47-48). Perhaps the most striking *intertextual link is found in Boaz's characterization of Ruth as an 'ēšet ḥayil ("woman of nobility") in Ruth 3:11. The only other occurrence of this phrase in the Hebrew Bible is found in Proverbs 31:10, in the heading of an *acrostic portrayal of an honorable woman. Some have also interpreted Naomi as a female *Job. The book begins with her struggles over having lost everything, including her family, and ends with the birth of a "son" and the pronouncement that one daughter-in-law like Ruth is to be treasured more than seven sons (Ruth 4:15; cf. Job 42:13).

Reference has already been made to the opening clause, "In the days when judges judged" (Ruth 1:1). This comment does more than fix the events chronologically. As is reflected in the Old Greek's placement of Ruth after Judges, it invites the reader to interpret what follows in the light of the book of Judges as a whole. Judges had ended on a negative note, lamenting the absence of a king in Israel. In Ruth the royal motif surfaces in the first person identified by name, "Elimelech," which means either "El is Milku" or "(my) God is king." Perhaps because of a failure to recognize Yahweh's kingship, when famine strikes, Elimelech and his wife move out to the land where Chemosh reigns. However, throughout history people have read the last statement of Judges as a signal that the solution to the problems represented in the book is to be found in the (coming) king David. The placement of Ruth after Judges appears to reflect this interpretation.

The link to Judges is reinforced by locating Elimelech in "Bethlehem of Judah," an expression that occurs elsewhere only in Judges (Judg 17:7-8; 19:1, 18) and in 1 Samuel 17:12, where David is introduced as "the son of the Ephrathite of Bethlehem of Judah." The former name has not been heard since Genesis 35:19; 48:7, where the place of Rachel's burial was identified as "Ephrathah—that is, Bethlechem." Since this event links Ephrathah/Bethlechem with Ephraim (Rachel was the mother of Joseph; in the book of Judges Bethlehem of Judah is linked with Ephraim through two Levites [cf. Judg 17:1, 7-9; 19:1]), part of the agenda of the book of Ruth may be to highlight Bethlehem as a Judahite/Davidic town rather than an Ephraimite one.

In the book we hear numerous echoes from and allusions to the narratives of Genesis (Gen 2:24; 12:1 in Ruth 2:11; Gen 12:10; 26:1 in Ruth 1:1; Gen 19:30-38 in Ruth 3:1-9; Gen 24:27 in Ruth 2:20). Many have noted that the only two occasions in which the narrator attributes specific actions to Yahweh are Ruth 1:6; 4:13. Remarkably, both references allude to Yahweh's first oracular pronouncements in the Bible (Gen 3:14-19). The reference to Yahweh giving "bread" (lehem) in Ruth 1:6 recalls Genesis 3:16, where Adam is promised "bread" (lehem) as a reward for hard work in a fallen world. Ruth 4:13 and Genesis 3:16 are linked by rare nominal forms of the root hārâ ("conceive, be pregnant"), hērâyôn and hērôn, respectively. It appears from the use of the ʿelleh tōlēdôt formula in Ruth 4:18 that the book of Ruth is to be interpreted as a continuation of the narratives of Genesis, where the formula occurs eleven times. Specifically, by reducing the genealogy to ten entries, the author presents the lineage of David as the third phase of history, preceded by phases that extend from Adam to Noah (Gen 5), and Noah to Terah (Gen 11:10-26). Remarkably, the four patriarchal generations are omitted from this scheme. Furthermore, by identifying Boaz as the seventh link in this chain, the author recognizes in him a watershed of human history, analogous to the periods represented by Enoch (Gen 5:21-24) and Peleg (Gen 10:25).

However, the most important intertextual studies involve the application and adaptation of specific laws found in the Holiness Code and the Deuteronomic Torah (Zakovitch, 42-48): (1) leaving the edges of fields of grain for the poor to glean (Ruth 2:1-7, 15-16; cf. Lev 19:9-10; Deut 24:19); (2) levirate marriage (Ruth 1:15; 4:7-10; cf. Deut 25:5-10; also Gen 38:8); the root ybm ("consummate a marriage with one's brother-in-law") occurs only in these three contexts (cf. van Wolde, 8-24); (3) redemption (gāʾal), though the present text involves the redemption of a widow in addition to land that had fallen out of the family (Ruth 3:9, 12-13; 4:3-6, 9-10; cf. Lev 25:25-28, 47-50 [an indentured slave]); the closest analogues to the present redemption of a widow occur in Isaiah (Is 54:5, 8); (4) marriage to a Moabite; the identification of Chilion's and Mahlon's wives as Moabite (Ruth 1:4) and the six references to Ruth as a Moabite (Ruth 1:22;

2:2, 6, 21; 4:5, 10) invite the reader to interpret these events in the light of Deuteronomy 7:3-4, which prohibits Israelites from marrying pagans, and Deuteronomy 23:3-5, which excludes Moabites from the assembly of Yahweh for ten generations. The liberality with which each of the antecedent laws is interpreted in this book is remarkable.

5. Canonical Position.

The Babylonian Talmud observes that Ruth, like Esther and *Song of Songs, does indeed "make the hands unclean" (b. Meg. 7a), suggesting early recognition of the book's canonical status. The four fragments of the book found in the caves of Qumran attest to its importance in this community (Campbell, 40-41). However, the place of the book of Ruth within the canon of the Hebrew Scriptures was quite fluid (Beckwith, 452-68; Fischer, 95-112; Brandt, 121-39). The Ben Hayyim textual tradition (used in Jewish worship today and followed in the NJPS) has Ruth in the second place among the five *Megillot, after Song of Songs and before Lamentations, Ecclesiastes and Esther. This arrangement is determined by the chronological sequence of the five annual festivals at which these books were read: Passover, Shavuot (Weeks, Pentecost), Ninth of Ab, Sukkot (Tabernacles) and *Purim, respectively. The most obvious explanation for linking Ruth with Shavuot is the timing of the events in the book. Since they occur at the beginning of the barley harvest (Ruth 1:22), late April or early May, it is appropriate to read this book during the festival in which the offering of new grain was an important part of the ritual, Shavuot, celebrated fifty days after Passover (Lev 23:15-21). However, according to tradition, this festival also celebrated Yahweh's establishment of his covenant with Israel at Sinai (Midrash Zuta on Ruth 1:1). Some traditions suggest that the book was read at this festival as an allegorical portrayal of Yahweh's relationship with Israel: just as Ruth sought refuge under the wings of Boaz, so also Israel sought refuge under the wings of God when they received the Torah (see Zakovitch, 70). But it may also have been read for the moral examples that its characters provide inasmuch as they all live according to the will of Yahweh (Fischer, 101). However, a rabbinic tradition links the reading of the book on Shavuot with David by noting that he died on Shavuot, on the Sabbath (Ruth Rab. 3:3; cf. b. Šabb. 30b; y. Beṣah 2:4).

The other three canonical locations highlight the Davidic significance of the book of Ruth even more. Deemed by some to be the earliest arrangement, the Talmudic b. B. Bat. 14b has Ruth at the head of the Ketubim (Hagiographa), before *Psalms. This means that David's genealogy is read immediately before Psalms 1–2, and that the book functions as the prologue not only to the book of Psalms, but also to the following books, Ecclesiastes and Song of Songs, which are linked to Solomon, and even Job, which has a clear royal flavor.

In the Ben Asher family of manuscripts (represented by Codex Leningradensis, the basis of BHS) Ruth is sandwiched between *Proverbs and Ecclesiastes. This location between two Solomonic works not only affirms the Davidic nature of Ruth but also places the story of Ruth immediately after the acrostic celebration of wifely nobility in Proverbs 31:10–31. This location and the fact that the expression ʿēšet ḥayil occurs only in Proverbs 31:10 and Ruth 3:11 suggests that the *scribes responsible for this arrangement viewed Ruth as the supreme example of the nobility described in Proverbs 31.

The placement of the book of Ruth between Judges and 1 Samuel in Christian Bibles follows the arrangement of the Old Greek version. This position seems to have been recognized by Josephus (Ag. Ap. 1.7–8), whose tally of twenty-two books for the OT suggests that Ruth was attached to Judges, just as Lamentations was combined with Jeremiah. This arrangement of the canon provides the reader with welcome relief after the depressing book of Judges. Whereas Judges develops the theme of the increasing spiritual infidelity and its effects in Israel in the premonarchic period, Ruth highlights the nature of genuine covenantal piety during this same period. Perhaps even more important, according to this arrangement, the book of Ruth presents the solution to the fundamental problem in the premonarchic period as reflected in the closing refrain of Judges: Israel has no king (Judg 21:25). Furthermore, in this location the book also prepares the way for the books of Samuel, whose opening sequence of events climaxes in Hannah's oracle predicting a coming king/Messiah (1 Sam 2:10).

It is difficult to determine which of these arrangements is original. Each offers insight into the thinking of the respective "canoniclers," and each contributes to the reading of Ruth as a Davidic book in its own distinctive way.

6. Theological Message.

Like the narratives of Genesis, the Deuteronomic Historians and the Chronicler, the book of Ruth communicates a profound theological and ideological message.

6.1. The Portrayal of God in the Book of Ruth.

6.1.1. Names and Epithets for God. Ruth expresses a theological awareness only in her first speech, where, as a Moabite, she refers to *God by the generic designation ʾēlōhim ("deity"). All the other characters in the book identify God by his personal covenant name, "Yahweh." Indeed, in Boaz's first reference to God when addressing Ruth he expressly identifies Yahweh as "the God of Israel" (Ruth 2:12). Of special interest is Naomi's twofold reference to God as šadday (Ruth 1:20–21), apparently an abbreviation of ʾēl šadday, an ancient epithet of God reflecting his role as chief of the heavenly council that met on top of the sacred mountain (Block 1999, 605). In the Hebrew Bible it is as šadday that God creates and rules the world and supervises the moral order, punishing evil and rewarding good (Hubbard, NIDOTTE 4.1155).

6.1.2. The Sovereign Rule of God. Apart from Ruth 1:6; 4:13, the narrator never refers directly to God, leading some to devalue the theological significance of the book (Sasson, 249). However, others have rightly spoken of "the hidden hand of God" quietly at work behind the scene (Hals). The narrator may not speak directly of God's involvement, but reading between the lines, we may recognize his hand in at least five ways.

First, God's hand is present in apparently natural events. Any Israelite familiar with the stipulations of Yahweh's covenant with Israel, particularly the "blessings and curses," will have seen in the famine referred to in Ruth 1:1 the fulfillment of Leviticus 26:19–20 and Deuteronomy 28:23–24. One may also surmise that in the mind of the narrator the deaths of Elimelech, Chilion and Mahlon in Moab were further consequences of the spiritual crisis in the land. Naomi certainly recognized the hand of God behind her personal misery (Ruth 1:20–21).

Second, God's hand is present in apparently chance events. In context, wayyiqer miqrehā in Ruth 2:3 means "her chance chanced upon," or in colloquial English, "by a stroke of luck" (cf. 1 Sam 6:9). The narrator's choice of phrase forces the reader to sit up and ask how it was that Ruth “happened” to land in the field of a man who was not only gracious but also a potential gōʿel (“redeemer”) Ruth’s arrival at Boaz’s field was one more evidence of the providential hand of God, who is directing the personal affairs of the characters toward the goal announced in Ruth 4:17c. The same could be said for the arrival of the gōʿel just as Boaz sat down at the gate in Ruth 4:1-2.

Third, God’s hand is present in the delicate and daring schemes of humans. Whatever the meaning of margēlōt (“feet”) in Ruth 3:4-14, the scheme to provide security (mānōah) for Ruth concocted by Naomi and implemented by her daughter is suspicious from the standpoint of custom and morality and is fraught with danger. And Ruth’s demand that Boaz marry her is highly irregular from the perspective of custom: a foreigner proposing to an Israelite; a woman proposing to a man; a young person proposing to an older person; a destitute field worker proposing to the landowner. But instead of taking offense at Ruth’s forwardness, Boaz blesses her, praises her for her hesed, calls her “my daughter,” reassures her by telling her not to fear, promises to do whatever she asks, and pronounces her a noble woman (ʿēšet hayil). This extraordinary reaction is best attributed to the hand of God controlling Boaz’s heart and tongue when he awakes.

Fourth, God’s hand is present in the legal process. In Ruth 4 Boaz submits the issue raised by his and Ruth’s desire to marry to the normal legal process. But just then, “Mr. So-and-So” happens to pass by the gate where Boaz had sat down (Ruth 4:1). This unnamed man’s lame excuse for not wanting to take the land and Ruth (Ruth 4:6) leads directly to the desired outcome. The case could easily have gone the other way, but in the mind of the narrator, God seems to have determined the result from the beginning.

Fifth, God’s hand is present in biological and reproductive matters. In Ruth 4:13 the narrator finally attributes a specific action to God: he granted Ruth conception. The statement would not be that significant were it not for Ruth 1:4, which suggests that despite being married to Mahlon for ten years, Ruth had been unable to bear children. Her previous barrenness was another expression of Yahweh’s curse for Israel’s rebellion in this period, and perhaps for Elimelech and Naomi’s move to Moab. But now, in the climactic event, Yahweh enables her to conceive.

Underlying every episode in the book is God’s providential hand, orchestrating events so that David could emerge from the depressing and chaotic Israelite environment during the days of the Judges. Whereas in the book of Judges God’s hand is involved directly punishing Israel for sin, raising up deliverers, and then rescuing his people, in this book he acts quietly through the lives of ordinary people. The seeds of the future dynasty were sown in this private family of Bethlehem. That the greatest king of Israel should trace his roots to a destitute widow, her Moabite daughter-in-law and an aging bachelor from the humble town of Bethlehem is hereby portrayed as a supreme divine accomplishment.

6.1.3. The Gracious Acts of God. Theologically, the most significant statement in the book may be Naomi’s response to Ruth’s first visit to Boaz’s field: “Blessed be he by Yahweh, whose hesed has not forsaken the living or the dead” (Ruth 2:20). Hebrew hesed cannot be translated with one English word. This is a covenant term, wrapping up in itself all the positive attributes of God: love, covenant faithfulness, mercy, grace, kindness, loyalty—in short, acts of devotion and loving-kindness that go beyond the requirements of duty (see Sakenfeld 1978; 1985; 1999, 11-12). Yahweh’s special relationship with Israel is expressed in the phrase “his people” (Ruth 1:6) and in the obverse, “Yahweh, the God of Israel” (Ruth 2:12). How does Yahweh express this commitment in the book? According to the narrator, it is by intervening on behalf of his people (pāqad) and giving them food (Ruth 1:6), and by causing Ruth to conceive (Ruth 4:13). Although Naomi seems for a time to have lost sight of Yahweh’s hesed (Ruth 1:13, 20-21), she tells her daughters that they may expect him to show his kindness by granting rest (mēnūhā) in the house of a husband (Ruth 1:9). Later she sees his hesed clearly in leading Ruth to the field of a man who is not only gracious but also a gōʿel (Ruth 2:20). Boaz declares his awareness of Yahweh’s hesed when he blesses his workers with a plea for Yahweh’s presence (Ruth 2:4), when he prays that Yahweh will reward Ruth’s diligence (Ruth 2:12), when he characterizes Yahweh as one under whose wings the poor and the alien find refuge (Ruth 2:12), and when he invokes Yahweh as the guarantor of his good will toward Ruth (Ruth

3:13). The witnesses to the legal proceedings whereby Boaz gains the right to marry Ruth invoke Yahweh's hesed when they bless Ruth and pray that this Moabite woman might join the ranks of the matriarchs Leah and Rachel (Ruth 4:11) and that he will give Boaz progeny (zera') through Ruth (Ruth 4:12). The women acknowledge Yahweh's hesed by praising him for having provided Naomi with a gō'el (Ruth 4:14). Despite the hardships and frustrations that the characters experience, the tone of the book of Ruth is set and maintained by the blessings that punctuate the narrative from beginning to end (Ruth 1:8-9; 2:4a, 4b, 12, 19 [without naming the Lord], 20; 3:10; 4:11-12, 14a, 14b-15). These benedictions are grounded in the assumption that Yahweh is a gracious, covenant-keeping God.

6.2. The Portrayal of the People of God in the Book of Ruth.

6.2.1. The Personal Fulfillment of Torah Righteousness. Perhaps more than any other book in the Hebrew Bible, in Ruth the participants in the events not only reflect the character of the God behind those events but also, for the most part, embody the best of Torah *righteousness. To be sure, the book opens with a compromising picture of a family headed into exile because of a famine, and the image of Naomi in her bitterness is less than ideal (Ruth 1:13, 20-21), but these are the expressions of a woman deeply wounded by her calamities. Ironically, the divine quality of hesed is expressly attributed only to the character who begins outside the covenant community, Ruth (Ruth 3:10). In this context the expression refers to Ruth's covenantal commitment to the family, especially to Naomi, her mother-in-law. For the most part Naomi is cast in the role of Ruth's matron (Ruth 1:1-13; 2:2; 3:1, 16, 18), with a keen sense of responsibility for securing Ruth's security (mānōah) and well-being (yītab-lāk) (Ruth 3:1). In so doing, she demonstrates hesed. However, those who observe this relationship in action express their particular admiration for Ruth. Boaz commends her for repeated acts of hesed performed out of commitment to her mother-in-law (Ruth 3:10); and the people of Bethlehem attach an epithet to her that no other woman in the Hebrew Bible bears, 'ēset hayil ("woman of standing, noble woman" [Ruth 3:11]); and in the end her devotion to Naomi is described as "love" ('āhēb [Ruth 4:15])—that is, covenant commitment that actively seeks the well-being of the next person.

The roots of this reputation are found in Ruth's immortal verbal commitment to Naomi in Ruth 1:16-17. On the surface, it is possible to interpret these words cynically, as an expression of Ruth's parasitic dependence on her mother-in-law, but the echo of Genesis 31:13 in Boaz's interpretation of Ruth's action (Ruth 2:11) places her actions on par with the migrations of the patriarchs, who also stepped out in faith, leaving the lands of their birth. Within the ancient Near Eastern context, Ruth's claim of Naomi's people as her people and of Naomi's God as her God represents a repudiation of her Moabite status and her initiation into the covenant people of Yahweh. With this commitment, her every act is one of loyalty to her mother-in-law and of faith in Yahweh, even her morally ambiguous actions at the threshing floor (Ruth 3:1-7) and her rather forward proposal to Boaz (Ruth 3:9). As a Moabite, she had lost her father-in-law and her husband and had been unable to conceive a child (Ruth 1:4-4), but as an Israelite, she gained a mother-in-law, a husband, a son and a place in the nation's history alongside Rachel and Leah. In the perspective of the NT, specifically in Matthew's genealogy of Jesus the *Messiah, from which the names of Sarah and Rebekah and Leah and Rachel are missing, we find Tamar and Rahab and Ruth and Bathsheba (Mt 1:3-6).

In terms of covenantal piety, Boaz casts an equally impressive figure. The closest that the narrator comes—or anyone else for that matter—to defining his character is the former's attribution of the epithet 'is gibbōr hayil (Ruth 2:1). This expression is often interpreted socio-economically as a reference to his economic or political standing in the community (NRSV). However, in the light of his actions, and in view of the portrayal of Ruth the 'ēset hayil as his female counterpart (Ruth 3:11), the narrator, with the expression 'is gibbōr hayil, introduces us to "a prominent man of noble character" (TNIV). Ruth's request for permission to glean in the field of one in whose sight she might find favor (hēn [Ruth 2:2]) adds to the reader's anticipation. Judging by the manner in which men treat women in Judges, these qualities are in short supply in Israel at this time. But when Boaz appears, he embodies both nobility and grace. The way that he and his harvesters greet each other expresses a remarkably wholesome relationship with economic inferiors (Ruth 2:4). The kindness that he shows to Ruth in his first encounter with her is anything by patronizing. In commending her for seeking refuge under the wings of Yahweh, the God of Israel, he reveals a profound ethical principle—he represents the wings of God (Ruth 2:12). When he is informed of his potential role as a gōʿēl, he seizes the opportunity to preserve his kinsman's line and his patrimony.

6.2.2. The Corporate Fulfillment of Torah Righteousness. The preceding discussion has focused on individual expression of Torah piety, but the narrative of Ruth also provides a window into the experience of covenantal righteousness in everyday social structures. Some have cynically interpreted the story of Ruth as a “pernicious, exploitative tract” because it supports a patriarchal culture in which women's primary role is to bear children and in which Gentile women are dangerous because they are sexually manipulative (Levine, 79). However, it is preferable to see in its portrayal of domestic and communal relationships a normative patricentrism in which male figures, the heads of the household (bēt ʾāh) perceive their roles not as positions of power but rather as positions of responsibility. This is a peaceable community in which the temptation for those with authority to lord it over those in their charge is restrained, a community in which men seek the interest of women, and in which the weak and marginalized are invited to full participation (see Sakenfeld 1999, 9-11).

The narrative itself reflects this commitment. Many have noted the distinctively feminine perspective from which events are described in the book of Ruth (see Bauckham). The narrator paints some of the key scenes, especially those involving female characters, with a sensitive and sympathetic feminine brush: Naomi's encouragement of her daughter-in-law to return to their homes, since Naomi is returning to her homeland, and Ruth's determination to stay with her (Ruth 1:6-18); the women of Bethlehem's reaction to Naomi's return, and Naomi's response (Ruth 1:19-21); Ruth's request for permission to go and scavenge for grain (Ruth 2:2-3); Ruth's return to Naomi with the fruit of her labor, and Boaz's kindness (Ruth 2:18-23); Naomi's instructions for “snagging” Boaz, and Ruth's response (Ruth 3:1-6); the report of the conversation between the two women upon Ruth's return (Ruth 3:16-18); the response of the village women to the birth of Obed (Ruth 4:14-17). This sensitivity is maintained in the other scenes where men control the action: Boaz's treatment of Ruth in the field (Ruth 2:4-16); his response to her proposal on the threshing floor (Ruth 3:6-15); his handling of the legal proceedings in the gate, especially his interpretation of the honorific role she will play in the ongoing life of the clan (Ruth 4:1-10); the blessing of the elders and witnesses, which, though addressed to Boaz, is effusive in its exaltation of Ruth (Ruth 4:11-12). Even Yahweh's blessing of the sexual consummation of the marriage is presented as a gift to Ruth (Ruth 4:13).

The picture of gender realities in Ruth is a far cry from that which is portrayed in the narratives not only in Judges but also in many scenes in the patriarchal narratives of Genesis and the narratives of David's family life in 2 Samuel. However, it is in keeping with the ideals presented in Deuteronomy. The Deuteronomistic Torah calls for a society that is unapologetically patricentric (see Block 2003, 40-48). However, the trajectory for the kind of patricentrism called for is set in the Decalogue. With subtle modifications, the Deuteronomistic version reinforces the responsibility of the heads of households to ensure the well-being of all in their charge. The particular interest in women's well-being is evident in the invitation to all to join in *worship at the central sanctuary (Deut 12:12, 18), the instructions for the treatment of a captive woman who is claimed as a wife (Deut 21:10-14), the inclusion of the wife in cases involving rebellious children (Deut 21:18-21), the protection of women in cases of divorce (Deut 24:1-5), the regulations regarding levirate marriage (Deut 25:5-10), and elsewhere. Deuteronomy 25:5-10 is especially significant, not only because it has a direct bearing on the interpretation of the legal process in Ruth 4 but also because of the sympathy that it expresses for a woman who has been wronged in such cases. In his responses to the issues that the female characters in the narrative present, Boaz proves that he is governed not merely by the letter of the law but rather by its spirit. This is covenant righteousness (cf. Deut 16:20) at its best.

The same applies to other aspects of the narrative that are linked to the regulations of Leviticus and Deuteronomy. On the surface, Boaz's marriage to Ruth looks like a violation of Deuteronomy 23:3-6, which prohibits admission of a Moabite to the assembly of Yahweh for ten generations. The rabbis rationalized Boaz's action by distinguishing between male and female Moabites. According to m. Yebam. 8:3, the prohibition concerning Ammonites and Moabites is eternal; nevertheless, today their women are permitted. However, within the overall spirit of the Deuteronomic Torah, after Ruth's conversion to the people and God of Naomi, and in view of the Torah righteousness that she demonstrated, it is preferable to look upon Ruth as an Israelite. Given the presence of Rahab in Boaz's own genealogy (Mt 1:5), Boaz, looking at Ruth's faith, may have been blind to her race. If the book of Judges shows that not all who claim descent from Abraham are in covenant relationship with Yahweh, then, just as Caleb had demonstrated in an earlier generation, the book of Ruth establishes that outsiders to this physical lineage may represent the true community of faith. In so doing, the book confirms Paul's adage in Romans 2:28-29: "For a person is not a true Israelite from the outside in, nor is true circumcision an external and physical reality. Rather, a person is an Israelite from the inside out, for real circumcision is a heart issue—it is spiritual, rather than literal. This person does not receive the praise of others but of God." Beyond this, nowhere do the laws of Israel associate the gō'el with the redemption of widows or aliens; rather, the institution of gē'ullâ applies to lost property and lost freedom (slaves [Lev 25:25-28, 47-50]). The application of the notion to Ruth demonstrates again that the persons in the narrative are driven by the underlying spirit of Torah rather than by its letter. Accordingly, the instructions in Deuteronomy should not be viewed as providing final boundaries for covenant righteousness (Moses could not possibly provide legislation for every eventuality); rather, they present minimal requirements, presenting a moral compass and an ethical trajectory for the community of faith.

6.3. The Messianic Significance of the Book of Ruth. Although in the past many have linked the messianic significance of the book of Ruth to Boaz the gō'el as a typological foreshadowing of Jesus the Christ our redeemer, neither the OT nor the NT makes this connection. Indeed, Boaz is never mentioned again outside genealogies (1 Chron 2:11-12; 2 Chron 3:17; Mt 1:5; Lk 3:32). If any character in the book functions typologically of the Messiah, it would be Obed, and this for four reasons: (1) the special circumstances of his birth from a previously barren woman (cf. Isaac in Gen 21); (2) the content of the blessing invoked upon him by the women of Bethlehem—he is identified as a gō'el and one who restores life (mēšib nepeš); (3) the superlative elevation of his mother at his birth; (4) the name given to him by the community: ʿōbēd ("Servant"), which anticipates David, the anointed servant of Yahweh (2 Sam 7), and ultimately the Isaianic servant.

In the providence and grace of God, five hundred years after the writing of this delightful narrative, the NT opens with an announcement of the fulfillment of this promise to another young woman who displayed all the marks of hesed and had found favor with God (Luke 1:26-38). Mary would be most blessed among women, for she too would bear a son. But this son would be greater than Ruth's child and even greater than her great-grandchild. His name will be "Jesus," and he will be called "the Son of the Most High" (LXX: hypsistos; Heb ʿelyōn), and Yahweh will give him the throne of his father David.

According to the genealogy that concludes the book of Ruth and to the NT genealogies, Boaz's significance lies in his representing a critical link (the seventh) in the chain that leads from Perez to David, and ultimately from Abraham and Adam to the Christ. At a time in history when the light of divine revelation was in danger of being extinguished (1 Sam 3:1-3), Boaz appeared, exhibiting true faith and demonstrating Torah righteousness. In lavishing his grace on Ruth and eventually marrying her, he not only served as the wings of Yahweh in the immediate circumstance but also, in long-range terms, secured the identification of the Messiah with all of humanity, Jew and Gentile.

7. Outline.

The preponderance of dialogue in the book of Ruth encourages us to interpret the composition as a drama in four main acts, followed by a genealogical postlude (see Zenger, 15-18; Grant, 424-41). Although each act is set in its own time and place, together they contribute to the artful presentation of the narrator's central theme: the providential hand of God in the preservation of Israel's royal line during the dark days of the judges. For purposes of exposition, the following outline reflects the dramatic manner in which this theme is developed.

Theme: The Preservation of Israel's Royal Line

Outline

Act 1: The Crisis for the Line (Ruth 1:1-21)

1. The Setting for the Crisis (Ruth 1:1-2)
2. The Nature of the Crisis (Ruth 1:3-5)
3. The Response to the Crisis (Ruth 1:6-18)
4. The Interpretation of the Crisis (Ruth 1:19-21)

Act 2: The Ray of Hope for the Line (Ruth 1:22—2:23)

1. The New Setting (Ruth 1:22—2:1)
2. The Initiative of Ruth (Ruth 2:2-3)
3. The Grace of Boaz (Ruth 2:4-16)
4. The Results (Ruth 2:17-23)

Act 3: The Complication for the Line (Ruth 3:1-18)

1. The Scheme of Naomi (Ruth 3:1-5)
2. The Implementation of the Scheme (Ruth 3:6-15)
3. The Results of the Scheme (Ruth 3:16-18)

Act 4: The Rescue of the Line (Ruth 4:1-17)

1. The Legal Resolution (Ruth 4:1-12)
2. The Genealogical Resolution (Ruth 4:13-17)

Epilogue: The Royal Genealogy (Ruth 4:18-22)

See also BOAZ; FEMINIST INTERPRETATION; KINSMAN-REDEEMER AND LEVIRATE; NAOMI; RUTH 2: ANCIENT NEAR EASTERN BACKGROUND; RUTH 3: HISTORY OF INTERPRETATION; RUTH 4: PERSON; SOCIAL-SCIENTIFIC APPROACHES; WOMEN.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. Commentaries: D. I. Block, Judges, Ruth (NAC 6; Nashville: Broadman & Holman, 1999); F. Bush, Ruth, Esther (WBC 9; Dallas: Word, 1996); E. F. Campbell Jr., Ruth (AB 7; Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1975); I. Fischer, Rut (HTKAT; Freiburg: Herder, 2001); R. L. Hubbard Jr., The Book of Ruth (NICOT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1988); A.-J. Levine, "Ruth," in The Women's Bible Commentary, ed. C. A. Newsome and S. H. Ringe (Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 1992) 78-84; K. Nielsen, Ruth (OTL; Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 1997); K. D. Sakenfeld, Ruth (IBC; Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 1999); Y. Zakovitch, Das Buch Rut: Ein jüdischer Kommentar (SBS 177; Stuttgart: Katholisches Bibelwerk, 1999); E. Zenger, Das Buch Ruth (ZBK 8; Zürich: Theologischer Verlag, 1986). Studies: R. Bauckham, "The Book of Ruth and the Possibility of a Feminist Canonical Interpretation," BibInt 5 (1997) 29-45; R. Beckwith, The Old Testament Canon of the New Testament Church and Its Background in Judaism (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1985); A. Berlin, Poetics and Interpretation of Biblical Narrative (BLS 9; Sheffield: Almond, 1983). A. J. Bledstein, "Female Companionships: If the Book of Ruth Were Written by a Woman . . .," in A Feminist Companion to Ruth, ed. A. Brenner (FCB 3; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1993) 116-35; D. I. Block, "Marriage and Family in Ancient Israel," in Marriage and Family in the Biblical World, ed. K. M. Campbell (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 2003) 33-102; P. Brandt, Endgestalten des Kanons: Das Arrangement der Schriften Israels in der jüdischen und christlichen Bibel (BBB 131; Berlin: Philo, 2001); A. Brenner, ed., A Feminist Companion to Ruth (FCB 3; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1993); G. W. Coats, "Tale," in Saga, Legend, Tale, Novella, Fable: Narrative Forms in Old Testament Literature, ed. G. W. Coats (JSOTSup 35; Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1985) 63-70; J. A. Cuddon, A Dictionary of Literary Terms and Literary Theory (3rd ed.; Oxford: Basil Blackwood, 1991); M. D. Gow, The Book of Ruth: Its Structure, Theme and Purpose (Leicester: Apollos, 1992); R. Grant, "Literary Structure in the Book of Ruth," BSac 148 (1991) 424-41; H. Gunkel, "Ruth," in Reden und Aufsätze (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1913) 69-92; R. M. Hals, The Theology of the Book of Ruth (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1969); R. L. Hubbard Jr., "Ruth, Theology of," NIDOTTE 4.1153-57; W. Humphreys, "Novella," in Saga, Legend, Tale, Novella, Fable: Narrative Forms in Old Testament Literature, ed. G. W. Coats (JSOTSup 35; Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1985) 82-96; M. Korpel, The Structure of the Book of Ruth (Pericope 2; Assen: Van Gorcum, 2001); D. A. Leggett, The Levirate and Goel Institutions in the Old Testament, with Special Attention to the Book of Ruth (Cherry Hill, NJ: Mack, 1974); C. M. Meyers, "Returning Home: Ruth 1:8 and the Gendering of the Book of Ruth," in A Feminist Companion to Ruth, ed. A. Brenner (FCB 3; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1993) 85-114; J. Myers, The Linguistic and Literary Form of the Book of Ruth (Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1955); P. T. Nash, "Ruth: An Exercise in Israelite Political Correctness or a Call to Proper Conversion?" in The Pitcher Is Broken: Memorial Essays for Gösta W. Åhlström, ed. H. G. Åhlström and L. K. Handy (JSOTSup 190; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1995) 347-54; K. D. Sakenfeld, The Mean- ing of Hesed in the Hebrew Bible: A New Inquiry (HSM 17; Missoula, MT: Scholars Press, 1978); idem, Faithfulness in Action: Loyalty in Biblical Perspective (OBT; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1985); J. M. Sasson, Ruth: A New Translation with a Philological Commentary and a Formalist-Folklorist Interpretation (2nd ed; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1989); S. D. Sperling, "Ruth, Book of," in Encyclopaedia Judaica (2nd ed.; Jerusalem: Keter, 2007) 17.592-95; E. van Wolde, "Texts in Dialogue with Texts: Intertextuality in the Ruth and Tamar Narratives," BibInt 5 (1997) 1-28; B. G. Webb, Five Festal Garments: Christian Reflections on the Song of Songs, Ruth, Lamentations, Ecclesiastes and Esther (NSBT 10; Leicester: Apollos, 2000); M. Weinfeld, "Ruth, Book of," in Encyclopaedia Judaica (Jerusalem/New York: Keter/Macmillan, 1971-2) 14.518-24.

D. I. Block

RUTH 2: ANCIENT NEAR EASTERN BACKGROUND

The book of Ruth opens, "Now it happened in the days when the judges ruled" (Ruth 1:1). This reference places the events of the book between the death of Joshua after the initial conquest of Canaan (Josh 11:23; Judg 1:1) and the establishment of the monarchy during the time of Samuel the prophet (1 Sam 10:1-2). The exact dates of this period are difficult to determine because of unresolved questions about how to interpret the textual and archaeological data concerning the exodus from Egypt and the conquest. Scholars are divided between the so-called early date (c. 1450 BC) and late date (c. 1250 BC).

Migrations in southeastern Europe and southwestern Asia during the latter half of the second millennium BC led to the disruption of long-established populations in these regions. The disintegration of many cultures (i.e., the Hittite Empire and the Ugarit kingdom) has been attributed to the invasion of the southeastern Mediterranean coast by the mysterious Sea Peoples from the west. Egypt's initial success in repelling these western invaders was not matched in Canaan, where the Sea Peoples established five strongholds in southwestern Canaan. During this period of upheaval the larger international powers of the day (Egypt in the southwest, Mitanni in northern Mesopotamia, the Hittites in western Asia Minor) were preoccupied either with domestic issues or foreign issues that did not concern directly the land of Canaan. Their formidable, though occasional, presence in the area (i.e., Egypt's battles with the Hittites over control of the coastal highway leading to Syria) would provide a strong inducement toward peaceful coexistence among the smaller nations of the Levant. When the pressures from international powers waned, the Israelites often were engaged in warfare with local, hostile neighbors (Moabites, Canaanites, Midianites, Ammonites, Philistines, with the enigmatic Cushan-Rishathaim, king of Mesopotamia, perhaps being a notable exception [see Judg 3:7-11]). The Merneptah Stela (ANET, 320), unearthed by Flinders Petrie in 1896 in Thebes, eulogizes Pharaoh Merneptah, who ruled Egypt c. 1236-1223 BC. In a poem recounting Merneptah's campaign into Canaan, one line reads, "Israel is laid waste, its seed is not." This earliest known reference to Israel outside the Bible places Israel in a grouping with other defeated Canaanite states and coincides with the general time frame of the events related in the book of Ruth.

1. Moab
2. Status of Widows
3. Widowhood and Remarriage
4. Provisions for the Poor and Disenfranchised
5. The Court Scene
6. Genealogy

1. Moab.

In 1868, at the ancient site of Diblon (near the town of Dhiban in modern Jordan), the Moabite Stone was discovered. It is an inscription of the Moabite king Mesha, describing Moab's successful revolt against an unnamed Israelite ruler, presumably Ahab (874-853 BC) or possibly Jehoram his son (852-841 BC) (ANET, 209-10; see also 2 Kings 1:1; 3:4-27). What is important for our purposes is that the language attested by the Moabite Stone is closely related to the *Hebrew language, suggesting that at least the linguistic barriers to social intercourse between Israelites and Moabites were low.

2. Status of Widows.

Life expectancy rates in the ancient Near East were low due to factors such as famine, war, poverty and illness. The odds of surviving many of these disasters favored *women, leading to a proportionally large number of widows. Throughout the ancient Near East the family was the primary source of support for widows. Support could come from a dowry provided by the woman's family to the couple at time of *marriage that remained in the wife's possession after the death of her husband, specific provisions for her in her husband's will, incorporation into the household of one of her surviving male relatives, or remarriage. Most of these remedies and the prevailing patriarchal system of property ownership and inheritance rights in ancient Near Eastern societies made a widow dependent on her surviving male family members for sustenance. This could leave her vulnerable, particularly if, as in the case of *Naomi, she had no surviving male family members, if her sons, father, brothers, father-in-law or brothers-in-law proved negligent in caring for her, or if her husband had not made provision for her in his will. In the worst case, a widow could be left to choose between slavery, prostitution or destitution.

The customary provisions and legal protections for widows varied, but it was widely held that a mark of a good ruler was his care for widows. In the Ugaritic Tale of Aqhat (fourteenth century BC or earlier), a story about a childless ruler named Dan'el, who is blessed with a son, Aqhat, Dan'el's ruling activity is described as "judging the cause of the widow, adjudicating the case of the fatherless" (A.v. 4-7). In another Ugaritic tale about a ruler, "The Legend of King Kirtu" (fourteenth century BC or earlier), the king's son, who desires to seize the throne, constructs an accusation against his father's rule. The accusation begins, "Thou hast let thy hand fall into mischief. Thou judgest not the cause of the widow, nor adjudicatest the case of the wretched" (C.vi. 33-34, 46-50). In the Egyptian text Instructions for King Meri-Ka-Re (copied in the fifteenth century BC but purporting to be written for a pharaoh who ruled in the twenty-second century BC) the ruler is advised, "Do justice whilst thou endurest upon earth. Quiet the weeper; do not oppress the widow" (§45).

In addition to the role of the monarch as insurer of justice, preserved ancient Near Eastern laws dealing with widows give us a varied and incomplete but instructive picture of the extent of legal protection provided for widows. Eshnunna, a city in northern Mesopotamia west of Babylon, was a prominent military power at the end of the nineteenth and early eighteenth centuries BC under King Naram-Sin. The Laws of Eshnunna (LE), the earliest extant law collection written in Akkadian, have been preserved in three school exercise texts in which both the prologue and epilogue are missing. LE §17, while not speaking directly to the situation described in the book of Ruth, offers insight into the historical period: "Should the son of a man bring bride-money to the house of (his) father-in-law, if one of the two deceases, the money shall revert to its owner." In the case of the husband's death, the widow's father is prohibited from using the bride-price for, among any number of other things, maintenance of his widowed daughter.

The Code of Hammurabi (CH [c. 1792-1750 BC]), attributed to the sixth ruler of the Old Babylonian (Amorite) dynasty, is the most comprehensive extant legal code surviving from the ancient Near East. Hammurabi had monumental stelae inscribed with his law code erected throughout major cities of his kingdom as testimony to his repeated claims: "Hammurabi, the devout, god-fearing prince, to cause justice to prevail in the land, to destroy the wicked and evil, that the strong might not oppress the weak" (CH §30). His laws have survived in some fifty manuscripts dating from the reign of Hammurabi to the middle of the first millennium BC. The most impressive artifact is a diorite stela, about 2.3 m tall, depicting the sun-god Shamash's commissioning of Hammurabi to write the law code. The stela was carried off to Susa by Elamite raiders some five hundred years after Hammurabi's death and was discovered by the French archaeologist J. deMorgan in 1901-1902. CH §171-172 provide for a widow to retain possession of her dowry, retain any documented marriage gift given to her by her husband or, in its absence, receive a share of the estate equal to that of the other heirs, and remain in her husband's house until she decides to remarry. If she does remarry, she may take her dowry with her but must leave the marriage gift to her children. CH §177 requires a widow whose children are still minors to get the consent of the court and to sign an affidavit with her new husband that they will protect her deceased husband's estate and raise his children until they come into their inheritance. Implied in these provisions is the widow's control as a trustee over her deceased husband's estate while her children are still minors.

In the Middle Assyrian Laws (MAL), a series of clay tablets discovered in ancient Ashur and dated to the twelfth century BC, MAL §46 deals in some detail with the case of a widow who “does not wish to leave her house on her husband’s death.” This clause most likely refers to the woman’s desire not to remarry outside her husband’s family, since most of the provisions that follow have her moving somewhere else anyway. The law illustrates the wide variety of ways in which a widow might be provided for by her family. First, the husband could have specifically made a bequest for her in his will. If not, she could move in with one of her sons, and the sons of her husband by all his wives would help pay for her support. If she had no sons of her own, she could move in with one of her husband’s sons by another wife. If the sons of another of her husband’s wives are unwilling to support her, her own sons must take on the burden and “she shall do their work.” Finally, one of her husband’s sons (from another wife) could marry her and take full responsibility for her support.

The Neo-Babylonian Laws (NBL), written in Akkadian and commonly attributed to the Neo-Babylonian period (c. seventh-sixth century BC), were discovered in the British Museum by F. E. Peiser, who translated and published them in 1899. Although these are the latest of the extant ancient law codes, they have been poorly preserved, with only nine out of an original sixteen paragraphs being legible. These laws include two provisions relating to widows. NBL §12 stipulates that a widow with no children will receive from the estate only her dowry and any marriage gift given to her by her husband. If she had no dowry, “the judges shall appraise her husband’s property and something commensurate with her husband’s property shall be given her.” NBL §13 grants the widow who remarries the right not only to her dowry but also to any marriage gift from her deceased husband.

These laws assume and attempt to enforce, channel, delimit or supplement the customary family-oriented practices used in ancient Near Eastern cultures to provide for widows. They present not a systematic, comprehensive overview but rather a sampling of solutions to specific problems encountered by courts when parties to customary practices were sufficiently unhappy with the outcome to bring a complaint. They hint at possible alternate solutions to the predicament of Naomi and Ruth. They also point indirectly to the importance of the one remedy that we have largely overlooked in our survey so far: remarriage.

3. Widowhood and Remarriage.

Typically, the father or eldest son in the household made the contractual arrangements with the prospective bride’s parents. A male could negotiate for himself if his father was deceased or if he was an adult. The fact that there is no mention of a father-in-law in BE 6/1.101 (Babylonian Expedition of the University of Pennsylvania, Series A: Cuneiform Texts) and CT 8.2a (Cuneiform Texts from Babylonian Tablets in the British Museum) is interpreted as indicating that the groom was responsible for his own negotiations (Campbell). Depending on local traditions and circumstances, a widow could also negotiate a marriage contract on her own behalf. The Code of Hammurabi speaks of a widow’s remarriage as a free decision. “If that woman has made up her mind to leave [the deceased husband’s house], she shall leave to her children the marriage-gift which her husband gave her (but) take the dowry from her father’s house in order that the man of her choice may marry her” (CH §173). Likewise, in CH §177, when “a widow, whose children are minors, has made up her mind to enter the house of another,” she is legally restricted only to protect the rights of her deceased husband’s heirs.

Another example of this freedom is found with “war widows,” cases in which a woman facing hardship because her husband is away from home for a long period of time remarries. The Laws of Eshnunna (LE §29-30) frame the issue in a way that leaves the woman’s autonomy in doubt: “another man takes his wife.” In other texts, however, the wife clearly seeks remarriage. CH §134 states, “If the seignior was taken captive and there was not sufficient to live on in his house, his wife may enter the house of another, with that woman incurring no blame at all.” MAL §36 and §45 address similar situations by basing the wife’s freedom to remarry on the absence of a father-in-law or sons to support her. A woman without a father-in-law or sons whose husband is missing for a number of years is free to marry the husband “of her own choice.”

The relative freedom of a widow to choose a new marriage partner varied with location and circumstances. In some cases, endogamous remarriage was encouraged due to her deceased husband’s family’s vested interest in the dowry.

In 1929 excavations in modern Iraq unearthed some four thousand clay tablets written in Akkadian cuneiform from the ancient Hurrian city of Nuzi (or Nuzu), which flourished c. 1500-1350 BC. Evidence from Nuzi demonstrates that a widow was penalized for remarrying due to the financial hardship that the loss of her dowry inflicted on her deceased husband's family (JEN 4.444:19-23; see Campbell). Similarly, there appears to have been a tendency toward forced endogamy as a way of providing for the widow and at the same time protecting the deceased husband's family from financial loss. The underlying cultural value is continued ownership of ancestral property.

Variations of the levirate marriage are attested in some ancient Near Eastern law codes, including an Akkadian text from Ugarit, MAL §30, §33, §43, and Hittite Laws §193. MAL §30 addresses the relatively unlikely situation in which a married son dies, his father has only one other son, and that son is already betrothed to another woman. The ruling is that the father will give the widow of his dead son to the other son regardless, the relationship of his remaining son to the betrothed to be determined by other factors. The ruling suggests that marrying a widow to one of her husband's brothers was a common practice. MAL §43 refers specifically to a situation in which the bride had been promised but the relationship had not yet been consummated. It presents a long list of alternate spouses for the betrothed, including any of the deceased's brothers and sons, with the proviso that if the deceased's sons are under ten years of age, the betrothed's father has the option of returning the bride-price instead. MAL §33 deals with the case of a woman whose husband dies while she is still living with her father. The text is damaged, but it appears to give the father the choice of how to provide for his daughter: "If he wishes, he may give her in marriage to her father-in-law. If her husband and her father-in-law are both dead and she has no son, she becomes a widow; she may go where she wishes." Another interesting feature of this law is that the woman is not considered a "widow" (almattu) unless other domestic arrangements cannot be found.

The Hittite Laws (HL) were discovered on two clay tablets at Boğazköy (also known as Hattusas), in modern day Turkey in 1893. They were written in Hittite with cuneiform script sometime near 1200 BC. Several copies written in Old Hittite have turned up since, putting the original composition back at least as far as 1600 BC. HL §193 reads, "If a man has a wife, and then the man dies, his brother shall take his wife, then his father shall take her. If in turn his father dies, one of his brother's sons shall take the woman whom he had." Translators differ over the exact identification of the "man," the "brother," the "father" and the "brother's sons." In any case, there is a clear succession of potential spouses for the widow as in MAL §43.

These laws indicate that in many parts of the ancient Near East it was common practice for a widow to marry a near relative of her deceased husband. In most cases the laws do not explain the purpose of the practice, making it difficult to relate them to the biblical practice of levirate marriage. We can at least say that the practice of a woman marrying a near relative of her deceased husband was part of Israel's cultural milieu and may be reflected in the understanding of the responsibilities of the *kinsman-redeemer (gō'el) found in the book of Ruth.

4. Provisions for the Poor and Disenfranchised.

In the Egyptian "Tale of the Eloquent Peasant" (c. 1800 BC) an unscrupulous official named Thutenakht devises a plan by which to seize the donkeys of an unsuspecting peasant named Khun-Anup, who happens to be journeying through on his way to securing food for his hungry family. Thutenakht has a servant block the road with linen sheets, thus forcing the unsuspecting Khun-Anup to steer his donkeys onto the grain field. When one donkey enjoys a mouthful of the tempting grain, Thutenakht beats the man and seizes his donkeys. The persistent Khun-Anup eloquently pleads his case before the courts and finally wins the hearing of a sympathetic official after being rebuffed by lower court officials. He delivers nine elaborate and impressive speeches, and his rhetorical skill moves the court to grant him justice and punish the offending Thutenakht. The court decision demonstrates the importance of extending justice to the lower classes, in this case hospitality to travelers in Egypt.

Ruth's determination to glean in the fields (Ruth 2:2) reflects her understanding (inferred perhaps from Naomi's teachings) of one of the prescribed rights of the disenfranchised. Mosaic legislation required that the harvesters deliberately leave grain around the edges and in the corners of the field for the economically vulnerable, which included widows, the fatherless and aliens (Lev 19:9-10; 23:22; Deut 24:19). Her words “in whose eyes I may find favor” (Ruth 2:2) reflect the reality that not all were careful to fulfill their obligations to the destitute as prescribed in the Torah.

Ration lists from Mesopotamia reflecting the dietary intake of average citizens may shed light on the significance of the amount of barley that Ruth gleaned on her first day in the fields (Ruth 2:17). Once calculations have been adjusted for variations in time and measurement, it appears that one liter (usually of barley) was the average food ration throughout Mesopotamia. Assuming the preexilic measurement equivalent of an ephah (ten to twenty liters of barley), it appears that Ruth gleaned enough barley on her first day (an ephah) to sustain Naomi and herself for about one week. If one assumes that Ruth continued to glean this much each day (Ruth 2:23), by the end of the harvest season she would have gleaned enough provisions for almost a year. Certainly the abundant generosity of *Boaz would have not been lost on the initial audience, familiar with daily rations (Younger).

A recently published document, “Widow’s Plea,” a fifteen-line Hebrew inscription from Iron Age Israelite society discovered in 1960, recounts a childless widow pleading her case before the king, requesting usufruct privileges of a part of her deceased husband’s fields. Lack of information regarding issues such as the age of the widow, prior inheritance arrangements, and the marital status of the deceased husband’s brother render the inscription of limited value. However, “Widow’s Plea” may shed light on Ruth’s choice of words in her self-descriptions to Boaz. When the startled Boaz awoke from his sleep and inquired as to who was at his feet, Ruth responded by identifying herself as “your servant Ruth” (Ruth 3:9). English translations obscure what are most likely subtle but important distinctions between the various Hebrew words used for servant in the book. Although the words šiphâ and ’āmâ can be used interchangeably (Gen 30:3-4), some scholars suggest that semantic distinctions are discernible. In their first encounter Ruth identified herself as Boaz’s šiphâ (Ruth 2:13), a term used to refer to a female slave who found herself at the bottom of the social ladder, one who performed menial service and thus was not considered as a potential candidate for marriage or concubinage by a freeman. But in the scene at the threshing floor Ruth chose a different Hebrew word, this time identifying herself as Boaz’s ’āmâ, a word never used to refer to menial service, which leads some scholars to suggest that it denotes a female occupying a higher position on the social ladder, one who in particular was an eligible candidate for marriage (or concubinage) to a freeman. The translation “handmaid” or “maid-servant” might bring out this nuance better. Ruth delicately nuanced her self-designation in order to emphasize her social proximity to Boaz and thus establish her potential as a wife. The usage of ’āmâ twice in “Widow’s Plea” appears to support this nuanced understanding of the word as an appropriate discretionary term used by a woman in her pleas to a recognized individual of higher social status and authority (so also Younger).

Furthermore, Ruth went beyond Naomi’s directives and asked Boaz to “spread the corner of your cloak over me, for you are a near kinsman” (Ruth 3:9). Ruth’s request reflected an ancient Near Eastern marriage custom (still practiced among some Arab cultures) whereby a man symbolically secured a wife by placing the corner of his garment about her. Such action indicates his willingness to protect the woman as well as his readiness to consummate the marriage with sexual activity. It has been suggested that the symbolic action further pointed to marriage as an event that covers a woman’s nakedness, as opposed to adultery, which was viewed as the uncovering of a woman’s nakedness.

Ancient Near Eastern towns usually were walled and built on top of a hill for purposes of defense. The town gate was extremely important for the life of the community. In addition to controlling access into the town, it served as an assembly place where judicial, social, religious, business and political matters were discussed and resolved. It contained both inner and outer rooms for conducting business, as well as lookout towers where watchmen would be stationed to alert the inhabitants of an approaching threat. Thus, it is appropriate to think of a gate complex rather than a single structure. Threshing floors are often associated with city gates (2 Aqht 5:6-7; 1 Kings 22:10), although in the book of Ruth the threshing floor is located outside of the town (Ruth 3:15).

5. The Court Scene.

Ruth 4 opens with Boaz going up to the town gate and sitting down with some of the elders of the town, eagerly waiting for the unnamed kinsman to come by so that the legal issue could be resolved. Boaz explained to the relative that Naomi wanted to sell some property belonging to her deceased husband, Elimelech. The designation of the property as the deceased Elimelech's allotment (Ruth 4:3) highlights the Mosaic emphasis on the land as an inheritance from the Lord that was to remain within the family (Lev 25:23). The precise nature of Naomi's situation is unclear. It is possible that her current destitute situation was forcing her to temporarily forfeit the usage of the land. The reference does not seem to refer to her outright selling of the land, since the patricentric nature of property transference did not allow for a widow to claim the land (Num 27:1-11). Here we have an example of divergence between Mosaic legislation and ancient Near Eastern law. According to CH §171, a man could grant, by a sealed and witnessed document, property to his wife, who was then free to dispose of the land as she saw fit, as long as the property remained with one of the man's children. She could not assign the property to her own family or to children by a later husband. Additionally, whereas the Code of Hammurabi acknowledged three classes of society (the amelu, the mushkenu, the wardu), distinguishing them in legislation, the Mosaic law, as written, applied to all Israelites regardless of social or economic status. As may be expected, corruption, especially favoritism toward those in power and mistreatment of the disenfranchised, was found in the Israelite courts (see Is 5:8-10; Mic 2:1-2). However, whereas in the Mosaic legislation, for example, all widows, regardless of social or economic status, were to be treated the same way, in Babylon these recognized distinctives were built into the law itself.

After the relative ceded his responsibilities, he removed his sandal, gave it to Boaz in the presence of the town elders, and publicly rejected the offer (Ruth 4:7-8). The sandal gesture served as a symbolic pointer to the man's waiver of his own rights and transfer of them to another and thus is to be distinguished from the prescription cited in Deuteronomy 25:8-10, where the spurned widow was to disgrace him publicly and spit in his face. A number of legal texts from Nuzi describe transfers of land ownership in terms of the current owner "lifting his foot" off the property and placing the new owner's foot on the property (JEN 59, 9-10). The verbal similarity with Ruth 4:7-8 suggests at least a shared legal tradition.

Boaz then invokes all the assembled elders and other parties at the trial as witnesses to his purchase of the land and acquisition of Ruth as his wife, to which they all agree orally. Numerous legal documents from various sites in the ancient Near East attest to the practice of recording the resolution of a civil case in writing, with the presiding officials and all the parties to the case present at the trial acting as witnesses by having their names affixed to the written record, often accompanied by an identifying mark, such as a thumbnail impression or a seal pressed onto the document using the type of seal cylinders commonly recovered from ancient Near Eastern excavations. Although nothing in the text of Ruth indicates that the decision was documented, Boaz's summary statement and the invocation of witnesses bears a strong resemblance to the procedures followed in these documents.

There is no indication in Ruth 4 that either Naomi or Ruth was present at the proceedings. It appears that Boaz took care of the entire matter. Boaz won the right to purchase the land and marry Ruth. Boaz's marriage to Ruth was followed by the birth of their son Obed, who is called Naomi's kinsman-redeemer by the women of the town (Ruth 4:13-17). The production of an heir was the primary focus of marriage in the ancient Near East. Failure to do so disrupted the generational inheritance system and left the parents in a vulnerable situation with no one to care for them in their later years.

6. Genealogy.

The book of Ruth ends with a linear genealogy (Heb tôlēdôt) that traces Boaz's ancestral line from Perez to the future king *David. The genealogical epilogue attests to God's hesed in providing a king that emerged from the tumultuous period of the judges. Furthermore, David's Judean pedigree is emphasized. The ten-member genealogy finds parallels in the king lists of surrounding ancient Near Eastern cultures, suggesting that the book of Ruth functioned as a royal birth narrative. Both in Babylon (The Genealogy of Hammurabi's Dynasty) and in Assyria (The Assyrian King List) ideal genealogies were constructed to establish the pedigree of the royal lineage. Scholars have also noted that the ten-member construct parallels other biblical genealogies (Adam to Noah [Gen 5:1-32]; Shem to Abraham [Gen 11:10-26]). The impulse to organize important periods of time around the number ten may explain the position of Perez (whose ignoble beginnings would hardly be considered a desirable focal point for a royal genealogy) at the beginning of the list in Ruth 4 rather than the more desirable name (if not character) of Judah, Perez's father, whose name was more readily associated in ancient Israel (Gen 49:8-10) with royal legitimacy. Commencing the genealogy with Perez also assigns Boaz the honorable seventh position and provides a link between Perez's own levirate history (Gen 38) and that of Obed, the child born to Boaz and Ruth through the levirate relationship (Ruth 4:12).

See also KINSMAN-REDEEMER AND LEVIRATE; MARRIAGE AND SEX; SOCIAL-SCIENTIFIC APPROACHES.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. D. Block, Judges, Ruth (NAC 6; Nashville: Broadman & Holman, 1999). K. M. Campbell, Marriage and Family in the Biblical World (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 2003); M. W. Chavalas and K. L. Younger Jr., Mesopotamia and the Bible: Comparative Explorations (Grand Rapids: Baker Academic, 2002). P. R. Davies and J. Rogerson, The Old Testament World (2nd ed.; Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 2005). J. de Waard and E. A. Nida, A Translator's Handbook on the Book of Ruth (London: United Bible Societies, 1973); E. Lacheman, "Note on Ruth 4:7-8," JBL 56 (1937) 53-56; M. D. Matlock, "Obeying the First Part of the Tenth Commandment: Application from the Levirate Marriage Law," JSOT 31 (2007) 295-310; V. H. Matthews, Studying the Ancient Israelites: A Guide to Sources and Methods (Grand Rapids: Baker Academic, 2007); V. H. Matthews and D. C. Benjamin, Old Testament Parallels: Laws and Stories from the Ancient Near East (3rd ed.; New York: Paulist, 2006); K. R. Nemet-Nejat, Daily Life in Ancient Mesopotamia (Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 1998); E. Neufeld, The Hittite Laws (London: Luzac, 1951); J. M. Sasson, ed., Civilizations of the Ancient Near East (4 vols.; Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 2006); idem, Ruth: A New Translation with a Philological Commentary and a

Formalist-Folklorist Interpretation (Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 1979); E. A. Speiser, "Of Shoes and Shekels," BASOR 77 (1940) 15-20; W. von Soden, The Ancient Orient: An Introduction to the Study of the Ancient Near East (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1985). J. H. Walton, Ancient Israelite Literature in Its Cultural Context: A Survey of Parallels between Biblical and Ancient Near Eastern Texts (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1989); idem, Ancient Near Eastern Thought and the Old Testament: Introducing the Conceptual World of the Hebrew Bible (Grand Rapids: Baker Academic, 2006); K. L. Younger Jr., "Two Comparative Notes on the Book of Ruth," <<http://www.jtsa.edu/Documents/pagedocs/JANES/1998%2026/Younger26.pdf>>. E. Moore

RUTH 3: HISTORY OF INTERPRETATION

For over two millennia the book of Ruth has been valued for its literary charm and elegance. From generation to generation Jewish and Christian interpreters of Ruth have found in its pages material relevant for spiritual nurture, preaching, apologetics and everyday living. The wide and varied uses of Ruth reflect the many communities within which Ruth has been read and the challenges faced by those communities as they have applied Ruth in their own social and historical contexts.

1. Place in the Canon
2. Jewish Exegesis
3. New Testament
4. Early Church
5. Medieval Jewish and Christian Exegesis
6. Reformation
7. Modern Era

1. Place in the Canon.

In Hebrew manuscripts the book of Ruth appears among the Writings (Ketubim). The commonly found order of *Proverbs, Ruth, Song of Songs is reflected in the Leningrad Codex and may be inspired by an understanding of Ruth as an illustration of the virtuous woman ('ēšet-ḥayil* [Prov 31:10; also Ruth 3:11]) described in Proverbs 31:10-31. The arrangement of Ruth before Song of Songs connects it to another book in which love and *marriage are dominant interests. Where Ruth follows Song of Songs as the second of the five *Megillot, the intent seems to have been to follow the order of the Jewish festivals at which the books were read. The Talmud

(B. Bat. 14b) offers a list of books in which Ruth appears ahead of *Psalms as the first book of the Writings. This arrangement may arise from the association both books have with *David. For its part, the LXX counts Ruth among the Historical Books, placing it between Judges and Samuel. This arrangement seems inspired by the reference to the Judges period in Ruth 1:1 and may also reflect the rabbinic belief that all three books were authored by Samuel. The Talmud, by virtue of its discussion of authorship (B. Bat. 14b) and by introducing quotations from Ruth with the phrase “As it is written” (e.g., b. Sotah 42b), shows the book to have been accepted as inspired at an early date within Judaism.

2. Jewish Exegesis.

2.1. Josephus. In his Jewish Antiquities the Jewish historian Josephus provided a retelling of Ruth (Josephus Ant. 5.318-337) designed to present the Jewish people favorably to a Greco-Roman audience and demonstrate that God rewards the virtuous (Josephus Ant. 1.20) (see Sterling, 105). Josephus significantly condenses and alters the biblical account by his omission of most instances of direct speech and references to God. The latter tendency is curious because it pushes the activity of God into the background and seems at odds with Josephus’s stated desire to show how God can elevate anyone regardless of humble origin (Josephus Ant. 5.337). At several points Josephus alters the text of Ruth in keeping with the sensitivities and expectations of his Gentile readership. Most notable among these is the way in which he glosses over the episode of Ruth’s conversion, proselytism being a sensitive issue in first-century Roman society where traditional religion and values were in decline. Elsewhere, Josephus shows deference to those same Roman values in the scene in which Ruth visits *Boaz at the threshing floor. Although Josephus is not reluctant to imply that the intention of *Naomi was for Ruth to have intercourse with Boaz (Josephus Ant. 5.328), he makes it clear that no intercourse took place, going so far as to state that Obed was born a full ten months after the marriage of Boaz and Ruth (Josephus Ant. 5.330, 335). Further on, Josephus presumably anticipates the sensitivities of his audience when he departs from the biblical text and explains the nearest relative’s reluctance to redeem as being rooted in the fact that he was already married (Josephus Ant. 5.334), thus avoiding a portrayal of polygamy. The insertion at the end of his account of the statement that God had decreed a twenty-one-generation lifespan for David’s house (Josephus Ant. 5.336) allows Josephus at once to reassure his audience and register his own tacit disapproval of the Davidic messianism that flourished in first-century Roman Palestine. Despite his interest in virtue, it is the case that Josephus exhibits less of the pietistic and didactic interests that characterize the work of his rabbinic contemporaries.

2.2. Talmud and Targum. Within the Talmud Ruth is revered for her place in the ancestry of David (b. Ber. 7b; b. B. Bat. 14b). In b. Šabbat 113b the manner in which Ruth prepares for her meeting with Boaz is interpreted spiritually in order to provide a model for the observance of the Sabbath.

Like other texts of the same genre, the *Targum to Ruth is an Aramaic paraphrase of the Hebrew text that adds background, addresses interpretative problems, and explains the meaning of the original. The Targum adds background information by identifying Boaz with the judge Ibzan (Tg. Ruth 4:21; cf. Judg 12:8-10) and Ruth as a daughter of the Moabite king Eglon (Tg. Ruth 1:4; cf. Judg 3:12-30). It also seeks to situate the book liturgically by connecting the reference to the barley harvest in Ruth 1 with the fact that Naomi and Ruth arrive in Bethlehem at Passover (Tg. Ruth 1:22). The logical problem of how Ruth is able to transport the large amount of grain given to her after her nocturnal encounter with Boaz is addressed by the remark that she was given miraculous strength for the task (Tg. Ruth 3:15).

Throughout the Targum observance of Torah is emphasized and celebrated. For example, the sons Mahlon and Chilion die because they violated the Torah’s ban on intermarriage with Moabites (Tg. Ruth 1:4; cf. Deut 23:4). Occasionally, Torah is expounded by the creation of expanded conversations that move from the biblical story line to legal instruction. Elaborating on the conversation that Ruth and Naomi have on the road to Judah, the author places in the mouth of Naomi specific details regarding the number of commandments and the length of a Sabbath day’s walk (Tg. Ruth 1:16-17). The legal problem of Ruth’s foreign status is addressed when Ruth first encounters Boaz and quotes to him the Deuteronomic injunction against Moabites entering the congregation of Israel (Deut 23:4). In response, Boaz remarks that this edict was intended to apply only to males, and that he himself had received prophetic knowledge that from Ruth there would arise both kings and prophets (Tg. Ruth 2:10-11). Although the moral and spiritual admonitions of the Targum on Ruth are generally unremarkable, at times the treatment of specific points of halakah follows a view that is at odds with that espoused in the Mishnah—a fact that may suggest an early origin for at least parts of the Targum (É. Levine, 6-8; Beattie, 11).

2.3. Midrash. The Midrash Ruth Rabbah contains a wide range of rabbinic teaching inspired by, or at least structured around, the book of Ruth. Throughout, slight or imagined oddities in the text inspire questions or comments that become catalysts for densely packed rabbinic speculation or instruction on a wide range of topics. After this manner, even the first verse of the book gives rise to teaching on topics so diverse as leadership, rejection of wisdom, weights and measures, and global famines (Ruth Rab. 1.1-5 [Neusner V]). At Ruth 1:14, the similarity in sound between the name “Orpah” and the number “four” in Hebrew gives rise to the opinion that Orpah traveled only four miles (Aram my lyn) with Naomi, and that four heroes would descend from her (Ruth Rab. 2.20 [Neusner XVIII:i.1.A-2.B]). At many points the text of Ruth leads to the exegesis of an entirely different biblical book. The death of Mahlon and Chilion (Ruth 1:5), for example, prompts a note about the warnings that God gives prior to exercising judgment, which in turn leads to a treatment of the first chapter of *Job and the death of Job’s children (Ruth Rab. 2.10 [Neusner IX:i.1]).

The Midrash interprets the names in Ruth as having narrative and spiritual significance. “Elimelech,” for example, is understood (erroneously) to mean “To me belongs kingship” (Ruth Rab. 2.5 [Neusner VI:ii.1.A-D]), while the name “Orpah” is related to the word for “back,” signifying the manner in which she turned her “back” on her mother-in-law and returned to her gods (Ruth Rab. 2.9, 21 [Neusner VIII:i.2.A-D; XIX:i.1]). The death of Elimelech is viewed as divine punishment brought on because he had abandoned the people of Bethlehem in their time of need (Ruth Rab. 1.4 [Neusner V:iii.1.B-I]). The conversion of Ruth in Ruth 1:16 provides impetus for a discussion of what is proper behavior for a good Israelite woman. Consequently, Naomi is described as instructing Ruth to avoid the theater and the circus, but to ensure that her house has a mezuzah (Ruth Rab. 2.21-22 [Neusner XX:i.2.A-3.I]). Both Ruth and Boaz are celebrated for their virtue, with Ruth being praised for her modesty (Ruth Rab. 4.6 [Neusner XXXI:i.2]) and Boaz for his love of Torah (Ruth Rab. 5.15 [Neusner LVI:i.1-3]). The emphasis on Torah is evident elsewhere in the way in which the closer relative is derided for being unaware of it (Ruth Rab. 7.7, 10 [Neusner LXVIII:i.3; LXXII:i.1]).

The theme of social justice emerges quite naturally in rabbinic comments on the book of Ruth. The episode in which Ruth gleanes in Boaz’s field, for example, provides an opportunity to discuss the importance of caring for the needy, with the rabbis going so far as to say that when God judges the world, it will be for Israel’s failure to care for the poor (Ruth Rab. 5.9 [Neusner XLV:i.1-9]). The midrashic treatment of Ruth sounds strange to modern ears, but it is a testimony to the value that the rabbis placed in the book as Scripture and to the effort that they made to ensure that it remained relevant for Jewish life and learning.

3. New Testament.

Ruth is mentioned in the NT only once, appearing alongside Tamar and Rahab in the genealogy of Jesus provided by Matthew (Mt 1:1-18). The fact that this list makes no attempt at thoroughness in its mention of *women shows that those who are included are in some way exceptional. Although interpreters going back to Jerome (Comm. Matt. 1.1.15-20) have emphasized the allegedly scandalous aspect of each woman’s story, it is better to see each figure as an example of one who demonstrated a remarkable faithfulness and strength of character that allowed her to overcome serious disadvantage to contribute to the messianic line. That this is the case is suggested by the fact that Bathsheba is alluded to only as “Uriah’s wife,” placing the emphasis not on her adultery but rather on Uriah the Hittite’s faithfulness to David. Thus, Matthew presumably includes Ruth as one who, despite her foreign origin, demonstrated profound covenant faithfulness in the manner in which she supported Naomi and entered into a marriage primarily intended to benefit her mother-in-law.

4. Early Church.

The earliest references to the book of Ruth among the writings of the church fathers are to its place in the *canon. Where Ruth is treated theologically, the person of Ruth is often understood to represent the church. Origen (c. 185-251/254), for example, views the story of how a Moabite came to be counted among Israel to represent the manner in which pagans enter the church (Origen Fr. Matt. 7 [1:5]). Ambrose of Milan (c. 333-397) regards the removal of the relative's sandal in Ruth 4:8 to mystically prefigure John the Baptist's claim to be unworthy to remove Christ's sandals (Mark 1:7; Luke 3:16; John 1:27; Acts 13:25) and to be symbolic of the marriage between Christ and the church (Ambrose Fid. 10.69-70). Similarly, Jerome (c. 347-419) sees Ruth as a type who fulfilled the prophecy of Isaiah 16:1 that a ruler would come out of the "rock of the wilderness" (i.e., Moab) (Jerome Epist. 53.8). Occasionally, Ruth is also identified with Israel. John Chrysostom (344/354-407), regards Ruth's appearance in the genealogy of Christ as a reminder that God espoused himself to those who would be unfaithful (i.e., Israel) and shows that a person is not limited by the unworthiness of their ancestors (Chrysostom Hom. Matt. 3.5; also Hom. Matt. 1.14).

Other patristic use of Ruth is didactic, pietistic and pastoral. For Augustine (354-430), Ruth teaches that widows could remarry (Augustine de bono Viduitatis 5) but also suggests that the most blessed women were those who married out of obedience rather than lust (Augustine de bono Viduitatis 10). Ambrose regards Ruth as an example of the benefits that accrue to those widows who invest in the spiritual development of younger women (Ambrose De viduis 6.33-34). Jerome often uses the book pastorally. When writing to a grieving friend, he once likens himself to Ruth, who had comforted a similarly bereaved Naomi (Jerome Epist. 39.5). More daring in his use of Ruth is Ephrem the Syrian (b. c. 306), who sees in Ruth's nocturnal encounter with Boaz a sexual advance symbolic of the boldness with which penitents should approach Christ (Ephrem the Syrian Hymns on the Nativity 7).

5. Medieval Jewish and Christian Exegesis.

Medieval Jewish exegesis builds upon the interest and content found in the Targum and the Talmud. In keeping with his predecessors, Rashi frequently employs the rabbinic technique of using a detail of the text to raise a question that in turn introduces a point of teaching. Rashi moves beyond earlier interpreters, however, by his use of grammatical observations in his exegesis.

For Rashi, the text can be a source of practical wisdom ranging from the sensitivity required when dealing with proselytes (Ruth 1:8) to the benefits of vinegar in hot weather (Ruth 2:14). More significant, however, is the way in which Rashi consistently interprets details of the text in conformity to talmudic teaching and ethics, even if this means overlooking the plain meaning of the Hebrew text. When Ruth and Naomi arrive at Bethlehem, the city is stirred up, not on account of the return of Elimelech's widow, but rather because of the sudden death of Boaz's wife (Ruth 1:19)—a detail made necessary by the fact that the Talmud required a potential levir to be unmarried. Likewise, the indication in the biblical text that Boaz was in a good mood while at the threshing floor is, according to Rashi, attributable to the fact that he was meditating on Torah (Ruth 3:7).

Medieval Christian interpretation of Ruth shows indebtedness to both Jewish and patristic exegesis. Treatments of Ruth from this era reflect a range of interpretative approaches, from the historical to the literal to the allegorical. Isidore of Seville (c. 560-636) provides a short allegorical treatment that continues the patristic tradition of seeing Ruth as a type of the church, pledging to follow Naomi in the same way that the church is committed to suffer for Christ (On Ruth [in Smith, 7-8]). A widely used medieval reference tool was the twelfth-century Ordinary Gloss (Glossa Ordinaria). This work arranged primarily allegorical comments around the framework of Jerome's translation. Its presentation of multiple lines of allegorical interpretation demonstrates the range of opinions then current in the medieval church. According to the Ordinary Gloss, the famine that struck Bethlehem represents a scarcity of men learned in spiritual things, and the sojourn of Elimelech ("my God is king") in Moab represents the manner in which Christ sojourned in this world with his bride the church (Naomi). Naomi's two sons stand for the prophets and the apostles. The death of Elimelech in Moab is identified with Christ's ascension, after which the church/

Naomi is left on her own in the world. Boaz represents Christ at his second advent, intervening to rescue the church from the powers of the world. According to another view, however, Elimelech and Naomi stand for the Ten Commandments and synagogue respectively, and the death of Elimelech stands for the manner in which the Ten Commandments gave way to the Beatitudes (Smith, xiv-xv, 11-30). The later Additions to the Ordinary Gloss adds material that is less allegorical and reflects the enduring influence of Jewish and patristic traditions, culled as it is from sources including the Targum, Josephus, Jerome, Theodoret, Chrysostom and Ambrose (Smith, 31-36).

A short, largely historical, treatment of Ruth formed part of the Scholastic History produced by the French scholar Peter Comestor (d. c. 1179). This distillation of the biblical text, supplemented with material from Josephus and Comestor's own comments, has a decidedly historical slant, being generally limited to a straight explanation of the text with little allegorical embellishment. Reflective of this interest is the disproportionate attention given to the problem of the ritual involving the exchange of the sandal in Ruth 4 (Scholastic History 23: On the Book of Ruth [in Smith, 37-39]).

The two later works by Hugh of St. Cher (c. 1200-1263) and Nicholas of Lyra (c. 1270-1340) treat the book of Ruth from literal and allegorical perspectives and incorporate material from earlier Jewish and Christian exegesis. Hugh anticipates later canonical interests in his discussion of the reasons for the placement of Ruth between Judges and Kings, arguing that the beginning and the end of the book show it to be a bridge between the eras of the Judges and David. Although occasionally straying into the symbolic, Hugh's treatment of the literal sense is generally limited to offering clarification of the text and highlighting items of devotional interest.

In his comments on the allegorical aspect of the text Hugh shows an overarching interest in contrasting the church with the errors of Judaism and so reflects something of the anti-Semitism that was common in medieval Christian Europe. Thus, the famine that struck Bethlehem was an era of spiritual want in which the *law had become corrupted by Judaic traditions. In keeping with this tendency, Orpah is presented as the synagogue, which remained in unbelief, and Ruth as the Gentile church, which clung firmly to Christ. The manner in which Ruth washes, anoints, and dresses prior to her nocturnal meeting with Boaz is taken as reflecting the way in which the believer receives baptism, the anointing of the Holy Spirit, and virtue respectively. Naomi's barrenness represents the synagogue and its inability to bear spiritual descendants except through the church. In a similar vein, the rejoicing of the neighborhood women is understood as symbolic of the virtuous inhabitants of heaven who praise the fertility of the church (Postills on Ruth [in Smith, 41-55]).

Nicholas of Lyra was a scholar of such stature that his commentaries were among the first to be printed. More than most medieval commentators, he incorporates a significant amount of Jewish interpretation, drawing heavily on the work of Rashi. Nicholas emphasizes the literal aspect of the text, showing a keen interest in placing the events of Ruth chronologically within the era of the Judges, noting particularly the difficulty in identifying Boaz as the judge Ibzan (Judg 12:8-10) and Ruth as the daughter of Eglon, king of Moab (Judg 3:12-30). Elsewhere, Nicholas draws upon the OT and Jewish exegesis to explain customs such as betrothal and levirate marriage (see Kinsman-Redeemer and Levirate). On occasion, Nicholas works to draw spiritual lessons even from a straightforward reading of the book. Typical of this is the manner in which he holds up Ruth's obedience to her mother-in-law, Naomi, as an example of humility and virtue.

Most of the spiritual teaching in Nicholas's work appears in his treatment of the moral sense of the text. Here Nicholas sometimes goes beyond the biblical text itself and finds his interpretation on Jewish tradition. For example, the belief that Elimelech's death was punishment for his miserly character is presented as a warning to the wealthy that they should not ignore the pleas of the less fortunate. Here too, Nicholas uses the allegorical method to provide instruction. The way, for example, that Ruth gleanes in Boaz's field is seen as illustrative of the manner in which the humble and devout believer should listen to sermons and draw from them precepts that will provide guidance in life (Postills on Ruth [in Smith, 57-67]). The work of Nicholas of Lyra betrays a general awareness and admiration of Jewish learning. He sees the story of Ruth as a picture of one who converts to Christianity, but he does so without the anti-Jewish undertone that colors the work of many of his predecessors, including Hugh of St. Cher.

6. Reformation.

When the Reformer Martin Luther (1483-1546) broke with the Roman Church, he did so not only over theological and ecclesiological issues but also by his eventual abandonment of the fourfold interpretative method that had long dominated Christian hermeneutics. For Luther, this involved a new emphasis on the literal sense of the text at the expense of the allegorical. This did not mean, however, that Luther ceased to read the OT christologically. For example, Luther describes the redemption of the foreigner Ruth as demonstrating how the divine word attracts and blesses not only members of the church but also outsiders (Lectures on Genesis 12.4 [Luther 2.276]; 35.2 [Luther 6.227-28]). Similarly, the manner in which Ruth lays down before Boaz is taken to be a picture of the way in which the soul lays down at the humanity of Christ and is covered by his righteousness (Lectures on Romans 4.7 [Luther 25.265]). Animosity toward the Jewish people sometimes found in medieval Christian exegesis surfaces in Luther's belief that Ruth's incorporation within Israel demonstrates that Jews and Gentiles are one flesh and shows Jewish arrogance to be without warrant (Lectures on Genesis 38.1-5 [Luther 7.14]; 41:45 [Luther 7.200-201]).

During this era of turmoil and persecution many Protestants strongly identified with the characters of Ruth and took comfort from the book's theme of deliverance. The Geneva Bible of 1560—the preferred translation of the English Reformers and Plymouth Colony—reflects this situation in its introduction to Ruth: "Wherein also figuratively is set forth the state of the Church which is subject to manifold afflictions, and yet at length God giveth good and joyful issue, teaching us to abide with patience till God deliver us out of troubles." During this period and subsequently the homiletical and devotional use of Ruth flourished. Ludwig Lavater (1527-1586), the Swiss reformer and son-in-law of Heinrich Bullinger, published no fewer than twenty-eight sermons on the book of Ruth. In the following century homiletically derived commentaries on Ruth were produced by the English preachers Richard Bernard (c. 1567-1641) and Thomas Fuller (1608-1661).

Around this same time John Bunyan (1628-1688) rendered the entire book of Ruth as poetry.

7. Modern Era.

Late nineteenth- and early twentieth-century interpretation of Ruth reflects the higher-critical interests then dominating the academy. During this period an awareness of Ruth's placement among the Writings, the alleged presence of Aramaisms, and the need to explain the rite involving the sandal (Ruth 4:7) moved discussion of dating beyond the rabbinic view and convinced many of the likelihood of a postexilic date of composition. Details such as the fact that Ruth's son is proclaimed as belonging to Naomi (Ruth 4:17) suggested to some the presence of distinct literary sources (Volz)—an approach that continues to have adherents (Brenner 1983). This era also witnessed the rise of an appreciation of the book's aesthetic qualities, anticipating the trend toward literary analysis that would emerge in the late twentieth century. Hermann Gunkel is representative of this era in seeing the book of Ruth as a poetic, popular legend that preserves nothing historical. Gunkel regarded the original story as featuring only Naomi as a destitute Judaeon widow restored through the institution of levirate marriage. Only at a later stage was the character of Ruth incorporated into the narrative in a way that enhanced its overall poignancy. Gunkel broke new ground in the study of Ruth by describing it as a *novella—a short work of fiction featuring modest character development and a single, dominating event (Gunkel 1913; 1930).

Throughout the twentieth century much scholarly interest in Ruth focused on the character of the legal proceedings depicted in Ruth 4 and their possible relationship to the Israelite custom of custom levirate marriage (Gordis; Leggett; Anderson). Also of interest was the dating of the book, with much attention paid to the 1975 work of E. F. Campbell, who expressed doubt about both the benefits of attempting to reconstruct the oral and literary history of Ruth and the criteria used to argue for a late date for the book's composition. In the wake of the latter, more recent studies have tended to argue for the possibility of a preexilic, or early postexilic, origin for the book (Bush, 18-30). At present, however, no consensus on dating exists. Continuing the aesthetic interest initiated by Gunkel, many recent studies have focused on literary aspects of Ruth. Significant among such treatments have been analyses of the shape of the work (Bertman; Gow), its inner biblical allusions (Fewell and Gunn; Black) as well as its plot (Green) and theme (Bush, 47-53). Appreciation of the book's sophisticated literary structure has rendered earlier source-critical analyses of the book outmoded. Likewise, recognition of covenant loyalty (hesed) as a dominant theme has won many away from the earlier view that saw the book solely as a polemic against racial intolerance in the post-exilic era of Ezra and Nehemiah.

Treatments of the book by feminist writers have often explored issues left unaddressed by the text but that are increasingly relevant given the distance between the patriarchal culture of ancient Israel and the very different social landscape of the industrialized West (see Feminist Interpretation). For example, the nineteenth-century struggle to open a wider range of career opportunities to women provided a context for the retelling of Ruth by pioneering feminist Elizabeth Cady Stanton, who described the Moabite widow as one who "believed in the dignity of labor and of self-support" (Stanton, 39). Among feminist authors perceptions of the book's message and value have varied widely, with some seeing the story as a model for lesbian relationships (Alpert), and others as a celebration of the relationship between two strong and resourceful women (Brenner 1983). For many, the patriarchy underlying the book renders it potentially exploitative, teaching that a woman's worth can be fully realized only through marriage and child-bearing (A.-J. Levine; Masenya). Those who fall into this category sometimes find the emphasis on male inheritance in Ruth 4 to be in tension with the female interests in Ruth 1-3. For P. Tribble (192-96), this tension is resolved by the women of Bethlehem who do not allow the story to be subverted by patriarchy, but who transform it into a "story of women making a new beginning with men." A few writers, however, have addressed this inner tension by examining the function of patriarchy within an ancient social context of female vulnerability and in so doing have been able to focus on the book's theme of covenant loyalty (Rowell).

Increasingly, Ruth is read from different social locations (see Social-Scientific Approaches). Some who have written from the perspective of a visible minority have seen in Ruth the story of an outcast who challenges negative stereotypes (Masenya) or a tale that speaks to the plight of foreign workers (Brenner 1999). Still others have sought to interpret the story against the background of the Native American experience (Donaldson 1999).

For many interpreters, the literary beauty of Ruth remains its most compelling feature. It is a remarkable achievement that in just eighty-five verses, an unknown author has woven a tale of covenant loyalty, the hidden work of God, and the ancestry of the Davidic line that has taught, comforted, and challenged readers for over two millennia.

See also HERMENEUTICS; MEGILLOT AND FESTIVALS; RUTH 1: BOOK OF; RUTH 2: ANCIENT NEAR EASTERN BACKGROUND; SOCIAL-SCIENTIFIC APPROACHES; TARGUMIM.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. R. T. Alpert, "Finding Our Past: A Lesbian Interpretation of the Book of Ruth," in Reading Ruth: Contemporary Women Reclaim a Sacred Story, ed. J. A. Kates and G. T. Reimer (New York: Ballantine, 1994) 91-96; A. A. Anderson, "The Marriage of Ruth," JSS 23 (1978) 171-83; D. R. G. Beattie, ed. and trans., The Targum of Ruth (ArBib 19; Collegeville, MN: Liturgical Press, 1994); S. Bertman, "Symmetrical Design in the Book of Ruth," JBL 84 (1965) 165-68; J. Black, "Ruth in the Dark: Folktale, Law and Creative Ambiguity in the Old Testament," LT 5 (1991) 20-36; A. Brenner, "Naomi and Ruth," VT 33 (1983) 385-97; idem, "Ruth as a Foreign Worker and the Politics of Exogamy," in Ruth and Esther, ed. A. Brenner (FCB 2/3; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1999) 158-62; F. W. Bush, Ruth, Esther (WBC 9; Dallas: Word, 1996); E. F. Campbell Jr., Ruth (AB 7; Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1975); L. E. Donaldson, "The Sign of Orpah: Reading Ruth Through Native Eyes," in Ruth and Esther, ed. A. Brenner (FCB 2/3; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1999) 130-44; D. A. Fewell and D. M. Gunn, "A Son Is Born to Naomi!": Literary Allusions and Interpretation in the Book of Ruth," JSOT 40 (1989) 99-108; E. Giannarelli, "Ruth and the Church Fathers," SIDIC 23.2 (1990) 12-15; R. Gordis, "Love, Marriage and Business in the Book of Ruth: A Chapter in Hebrew Customary Law," in A Light unto My Path: Old Testament Studies in Honor of Jacob M. Meyers, ed. H. N. Bream et al. (GTS 4; Philadelphia: Temple University Press, 1974) 241-64; M. D. Gow, The Book of Ruth: Its Structure, Theme and Purpose (Leicester: Apollos, 1992); B. Green, "The Plot of the Biblical Story of Ruth," JSOT (1982) 55-68; H. Gunkel, "Ruth," in Reden und Aufsätze (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1913) 65-92; idem, "Ruthbuch," in Die Religion in Geschichte und Gegenwart, vol. 4, ed. H. Gunkel and L. Zscharnack (2nd ed.; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 1930) 2180-82; D. A. Leggett, The Levirate and Goel Institutions in the Old Testament, with Special Attention to the Book of Ruth (Cherry Hill, NJ: Mack, 1974); A.-J. Levine, "Ruth," in The Women's Bible Commentary, ed. C. A. Newsom and S. H. Ringe (2nd ed.; Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 1998) 84-90; É. Levine, The Aramaic Version of Ruth (AnBib 58; Rome: Biblical Institute Press, 1973); M. Luther, Luther's Works (55 vols.; St. Louis: Concordia; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1955-1986); M. Masenya, "Ruth," in Global Bible Commentary, ed. D. Patte (Nashville: Abingdon, 2004) 86-91; G. M. Rowell, "Ruth," in The IVP Women's Bible Commentary, ed. C. Clark Kroeger and M. J. Evans (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 2002) 146-53; L. Smith, ed. and trans., Medieval Exegesis in Translation: Commentaries on the Book of Ruth (TEAMS Commentary Series; Kalamazoo, MI: Medieval Institute Publications, 1996); E. C. Stanton, ed., The Woman's Bible (2 vols. in 1; repr., Salem, NH: Ayer, 1988); G. E. Sterling, "The Invisible Presence: Josephus's Retelling of Ruth," in Understanding Josephus: Seven Perspectives, ed. S. Mason (JSPSup 32; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1998) 104-71; P. Trible, God and the Rhetoric in Sexuality (OBT; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1978); P. Volz, "Review of D. W. Nowack, Richter-Ruth übersetzt und erklärt (HKAT I.4)," TLZ 26.13 (1901) 345-49.

B. P. Irwin

RUTH 4: PERSON

Ruth is one of three major characters in the book of Ruth. Although *Naomi is "brought on stage" before Ruth and "taken off" after Ruth, Ruth is the heroine, and the book that bears her name is suitably titled. The etymology and meaning of Ruth's name are uncertain and so do not figure into the message of the book. Outside of the book of Ruth, Ruth is mentioned only in Matthew 1:5 as the mother of Obed.

1. Ruth's Context
2. Ruth's Commitment to Yahweh
3. Ruth's Faith in Action
4. Ruth's Legacy

1. Ruth's Context.

The opening verse of the book of Ruth sets the context of Ruth's life in the period of the judges. The judges followed the conquest, as narrated in the book of Joshua, and preceded the rise of the monarchy in Israel, as described in the books of Samuel. Ruth, however, spent her early years in Moab. Because of Ruth's *marriage to an Israelite man, and because of extensive interaction between Israel and Moab, Ruth must have had some awareness of the political and social chaos described in the book of Judges, as well as of the tense relations between her homeland and that of her husband (Num 21-25; Judg 3:12-30). She would have known both the Moabite and Israelite perspectives on these events.

As suggested by Ruth 1:1, this background came into play for Ruth at the time of Mahlon's death and Naomi's decision to return to Bethlehem. Naomi advised her daughters-in-law to go back to their mothers. She undoubtedly knew that Orpah and Ruth would not be accepted in Bethlehem (Block, 632; Sakenfeld, 32), but Moabite women who were formerly married to Israelite men may also not have been accepted back into their Moabite circle of relations. The Moabites were hardly sympathetic with the Israelites' conquest of Canaan or the theological justification of it. Although it is hard to say how religious Elimelech, Naomi, Mahlon and Chilion were, even a nominal commitment of Ruth's in-laws to Yahweh could have led to her being ostracized from her family and friends.

If Naomi's future was uncertain because of losing a husband and two sons and living in an alien land, Ruth's future (and Orpah's) was equally uncertain. Nevertheless, Ruth committed herself to a disillusioned older woman who apparently had nothing and departed with her to a land where she would hardly be welcome. Why would Ruth not follow Orpah's example and remain in Moab?

2. Ruth's Commitment to Yahweh.

Ruth stayed with Naomi because she knew that the God of Israel accepted people regardless of background. How Ruth knew this about Yahweh is uncertain. Ruth 1 does not give the impression that Naomi was an energetic evangelist. According to J. C. Howell (283), "Naomi is hardly the kind of winsome witness sometimes paraded in church life today." Still, Ruth's faith apparently owed something to her in-laws, through whom she must have learned about Yahweh's acts and promises. Naomi's blessing of Orpah and Ruth in Yahweh's name (Ruth 1:8-9) would have made no sense if neither Orpah nor Ruth knew who Yahweh was.

The text is clear about why Ruth stuck with Naomi. Certainly Ruth cared for her mother-in-law, but Ruth clung to Naomi because of her devotion to the God of Naomi's people. In Ruth 1:16 Ruth exhibited the essence of clinging by her modification of the covenant motto. Instead of "I will be your God, and you will be my people" (cf. Ex 6:7), Ruth affirmed that God and God's people would be hers. Although the extent of Ruth's conversion is a debated issue (see Berlin, 48; Block, 641; Hubbard, 120; Sakenfeld, 32-33), Ruth left her homeland and entrusted her destiny to Naomi's God.

The Targum captures the sense of Ruth 1:16 with the following expansion: "Ruth said, 'Do not urge me to leave you, to go back from after you for I desire to be a proselyte'" (Beattie, 20). What God had done through the descendants of Abraham had accomplished its intended purpose of drawing this Gentile to faith (cf. Gen 12:2-3). "Proselyte," however, may be too weak a term. Ruth underwent more than a religious conversion. Perhaps more accurately stated, Ruth's religious conversion included a willingness to forsake all other ties—familial, ethnic, national (Block, 641). Did she understand even more than many of the Israelites what it meant to be a daughter of Abraham and part of the people of God? A person's blood descent from Abraham did not guarantee a relationship with Abraham's God (Grant, 439); rather, one had Abraham as spiritual father through sharing Abraham's faith in Yahweh and observing Yahweh's commands.

*Boaz recognized Ruth's commitment from what he had heard about her and also observed. When they first met, he was not disturbed by her nationality. Ruth had given up everything and had cast herself completely on the God of Israel. Although she was not a blood descendant of Abraham, her faith had the same object as his. As Abraham had left his family behind in Haran, so also Ruth had recently separated herself from the Moabites and identified with God's people (Sakenfeld, 33). Here was the essence of holiness to which God's people were called. Moreover, Ruth upheld the *law by showing kindness to disadvantaged Naomi. She had done all this because of her trust in the God of Israel. Boaz properly regarded Ruth as a member of the covenant community. She was no foreigner barred from the assembly of God's people. The OT never called for ethnic or racial separation per se. Its standard for separation was theological (Atkinson, 67). God's people could not mix the tenets and practices of incompatible worldviews, and Ruth was not trying to do so. She had committed herself unreservedly to the content of Israel's faith, and her actions indicated her continuation in a true profession.

Ruth's devotion to this God who saved irrespective of nationality led her to make unusual decisions. Rather than take the seemingly safer option of staying in Moab, Ruth threw herself on the mercy and care of the God of Israel. Her trust in a covenant-making God caused her to abandon all other sources of security. If Orpah followed the sensible advice of Naomi, Ruth, it would seem, threw caution to the wind and made a foolish decision. She cast her lot with a destitute mother-in-law in an alien land. This decision occurred in the context of personal upheaval and emotional distress. When Ruth declared that her mother-in-law's God would be her God, there was nothing calm and ideal about her circumstances. Along with Naomi, Ruth had suffered a devastating loss that made her future insecure. Nevertheless, she, a Moabite, affirmed the essence of the Abrahamic covenant. Indeed, her faith surpassed Abraham's because she had no personal command or promise from Yahweh (Nielsen, 49; Sakenfeld, 33); rather, she acted on what God had promised to Abraham, and this in devastating and dire circumstances. She surely knew the risks from a human perspective, but the God of Israel (her God by faith) was, to her way of thinking, bigger than her predicament.

3. Ruth's Faith in Action.

The first chapter of Ruth ends with the return of Naomi to Bethlehem. Although Ruth was with her, Naomi did not seem eager to introduce her daughter-in-law to the people of Bethlehem and, in fact, brushed her off indirectly with references to emptiness and misfortune. Perhaps Naomi was embarrassed in front of the home-folks by a Moabite daughter-in-law. Still, they had returned because there was food in Bethlehem. They were now dependent on each other for survival.

The availability of food, however, did not automatically alleviate hunger. Whatever the status of Elimelech's property, Naomi and Ruth did not have a crop to harvest or money to buy food from someone else. Moreover, Naomi gave no indication that the nearer kinsman, Boaz, or anyone else was available to help. The immediate situation for these two widows was nothing short of desperate.

It was at this point that Ruth showed initiative and went out to the fields to glean. The law allowed for poor people and aliens to do this (Lev 19:9-10; Deut 24:19-22). Landowners could harvest their crops by passing through their field or orchard once. Any fruit or vegetable that was missed or dropped was to be left for the less fortunate to gather. Landowners were also not to reap the corners of their fields. It was, then, the responsibility of the disadvantaged person to pick up what remained. The landowner did not have to expend time and energy to make the ripe produce more readily available to the needy. Although the text is silent about how Ruth learned these details and provisions of the law, Ruth continued to evidence an active faith that trusted God and God's people to care for the needy.

Oppression, of course, was always a possibility, especially during times of spiritual coldness. It was one thing to have laws, another to keep them. Other passages from later periods of apostasy and apathy indicted God's people for taking advantage of widows (Ps 94:6; Is 1:23, 10:1-2; Mal 3:5). Ruth hoped to find a landowner who would allow her on his property, but there were no guarantees. The law told God's people how to live as such, but it could not coerce godly conduct. As events turned out, Ruth met not the owner of the field but rather his foreman, who, in keeping with the law, allowed Ruth to glean in the field that had already been harvested. When Boaz came later in the day, he exceeded the provision of the law by granting Ruth permission to pick grain alongside of his servant girls (Bush, 128).

Ruth 2:3 offers insight into the book's theology. The sentence literally reads, "Her chance chanced the portion of the field belonging to Boaz." A more idiomatic translation would capture the sense of the Hebrew: "It just so happened that she found herself in a portion of the field that belonged to Boaz." The reference to blind chance is a brilliant rhetorical device that makes for good storytelling and theologizing. The writer did not believe in luck (Ruth 1:6, 4:13) but rather used this expression to get the reader thinking about the providential activity of God in the lives of Naomi and Ruth (Hals, 11-12; Sakenfeld, 47). Ruth's good fortune strained any belief in chance. From a human perspective, Ruth happened to glean in Boaz's field. She wandered into his field without intention or even knowledge. She could have just as unknowingly entered the field of the nearer kinsman or someone else. From the author's perspective, though, Ruth was on Boaz's property by design, and something significant was about to happen.

The "chance" wandering of Ruth onto Boaz's property is reinforced by what Naomi did not say in Ruth 2:2. When Ruth indicated her intention to glean in the field of "anyone in whose eyes I find favor," Naomi offered no suggestion as to where to inquire first. If Naomi had said nothing about kinsmen and levirate marriage while she, Orpah and Ruth were still in Moab, she again remained silent about advantageous possibilities (see Kinsman-Redeemer and Levirate). Being back home in Bethlehem had apparently not raised her hope for any familial solution to her (and Ruth's) destitution. The reader, therefore, cannot assign any credit to Naomi for Ruth's success in Boaz's field. Naomi's seemingly half-hearted consent to Ruth's initiative at the start of the day heightens the providential intervention of Yahweh later in the day. It also accentuates the faith and hope of Ruth.

Ruth continued to display faith during the nocturnal meeting on the threshing floor. The text does not report what she thought about Naomi's scheme and why she went ahead with it. It merely records her assent and compliance. Ruth went to the threshing floor, waited for the right moment, uncovered Boaz's legs, and lay down. In the context of a nocturnal meeting of a man and woman, the suggestive language—uncovering feet (or legs) and lying down—charges this encounter with sexual innuendo. Still, Ruth and Boaz did not commit fornication. If the double entendre indicates how awkward and tempting the situation was for both, the dialogue reveals their mutually godly intentions (Bernstein, 19-20; Campbell, 138). Ruth put Naomi's plan into action so as to ask Boaz to be the answer to his earlier prayer (Ruth 2:12) by redeeming Elimelech's land and fathering a child for Naomi. Ruth went to the threshing floor for more than herself (Sakenfeld, 61-62). Boaz's praise of Ruth demonstrated his understanding of her true intentions. By referring to her as a woman of noble character, he applied the same term to her that was used of him in Ruth 2:1. Ruth became his equal. She went from being a Moabite, a foreigner, and one less than Boaz's servant girls to being "my daughter" and now a woman of noble character.

Her background meant little now, for she had confessed her faith in Yahweh and demonstrated what was arguably the highest act of regard for the perpetuity of God's covenant with his people: pursuing levirate marriage. If the townspeople already knew that Ruth was a woman of noble character, all that would remain for them to say is that she was worth more than a son, even seven sons. This they did after Ruth and Boaz married and had a son (Ruth 4:15).

4. Ruth's Legacy.

In the first half of the twentieth century scholars typically considered the book of Ruth a charming and idyllic tale about humans who persevered against great odds in a bleak time and survived (Hals, 1). Ruth, of course, modeled industry, sacrifice and risk-taking. It is common today for feminist scholars to deny that the book of Ruth is charming and instead denounce the book's patriarchy (Linafelt and Beal, 81; Sakenfeld, 10). The intimate scene with a more domestic flavor in Ruth 3 regrettably gives way both to the legal proceedings at the gate between Boaz and the nearer kinsman and later to the genealogy of David. Still, feminist scholars salvage the book by lauding Naomi and Ruth for taking the initiative for their well-being and securing their place in society without male patronage (see Feminist Interpretation).

One cannot help but notice that Ruth acted with other interests in mind. Ruth approached Boaz on the threshing floor in order to invoke the law of levirate marriage for her and Naomi's situation. Ruth had earlier made use of the law that allowed needy people to glean in another person's field. Ruth understood that these laws were given to benefit her, not oppress her as a woman (Bauckham, 35). Rather than think that the male proceedings at the gate reduced her to a piece of merchandise, she would have considered them a necessary part of the solution to her and Naomi's plight. In a seemingly hopeless situation the law provided a way forward to prevent scandal and produce a happy outcome. Ruth wanted the scene at the gate to occur in order to legitimize what she and Boaz had agreed to do earlier on the threshing floor. Together, they were humbly and unselfishly acting on behalf of deceased relatives and surviving Naomi.

Ruth's legacy is not securing her future in reaction to patriarchy; rather, it is unconventionally but covenantally responding to God's grace by ministering to others in mundane yet extraordinary circumstances. Ruth could have never anticipated how Yahweh would take care of her and Naomi, but her commitment to Yahweh became the stage for him to act mightily and redemptively. Ultimately, her son became an ancestor of King David (Ruth 4:17) and of Jesus the *Messiah (Matt 1:5).

See also BOAZ; NAOMI; RUTH 1: BOOK OF; WOMEN.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. D. Atkinson, The Message of Ruth (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 1991); R. Bauckham, "The Book of Ruth and the Possibility of a Feminist Canonical Hermeneutic," BibInt 5 (1997) 29-45; D. R. G. Beattie, trans., The Targum of Ruth (ArBib 19; Collegeville, MN: Liturgical Press, 1994); A. Berlin, "Ruth: Big Theme, Little Book," BRev 12 (1996) 40-43, 47-48; M. J. Bernstein, "Two Multivalent Readings in the Ruth Narrative," JSOT 50 (1991) 15-26; D. I. Block, Judges, Ruth (NAC 6; Nashville: Broadman & Holman, 2002); F. Bush, Ruth, Esther (WBC 9; Dallas: Word, 1996); E. F. Campbell Jr., Ruth (AB 7; Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1975); R. Grant, "Literary Structure in the Book of Ruth," BSac 148 (1991) 424-41; R. M. Hals, The Theology of the Book of Ruth (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1969); J. C. Howell, "Ruth 1:1-18," Int 51 (1997) 281-84; R. L. Hubbard Jr., The Book of Ruth (NICOT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1988); T. Linafelt and T. K. Beal, Ruth and Esther (Berit Olam; Collegeville, MN: Liturgical Press, 1999); K. Nielsen, Ruth (OTL; Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 1997); K. D. Sakenfeld, Ruth (IBC; Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 1999).

D. Ulrich

S

SAGES, SCHOOLS, EDUCATION

The place of the sage, or wise person, in Israelite society is not clear, although some attended kings. Although presumably they were responsible for “wisdom writings,” which inculcate good and godly behavior in the young, there is no evidence for them running schools. *Scribes probably taught apprentices to read and write in the OT world. Traces of basic education survive in ancient Hebrew epigraphs, but, while the range of school texts known from Babylonia and Egypt is lacking, the biblical texts themselves may have served as standard works for training scribes.

1. The Sage
2. Schools in the Ancient Near East
3. Schools in Ancient Israel
4. Wisdom Books and Schools
5. Education in Ancient Israel

1. The Sage.

The sage, or wise person, is mentioned more often in the books of biblical wisdom, poetry and writings than in other books. The Hebrew hākām (fem. hākāmā) signifies not merely one with knowledge or skill but rather one with the ability to apply that experience advantageously, as the illustration of the small animals in Proverbs 30:24-28 shows. The Aramaic cognate is comparable in meaning (see. e.g., Ahiqar 1, 12, 178), as is the Akkadian emqu. In these biblical books knowledge of the world and its ways as God’s creation is almost always in view, even if not stated explicitly, so the sage is one who acknowledges and reveres God. That knowledge of God derives from his revelation, so the sage’s wisdom is based upon the principles of God’s *law and the ways they can be applied in the varied situations of life. Not unnaturally, the wisdom books extol the wise as finding greater joy in life (Prov 3:35; 14:24; 21:20; 24:5; Eccles 8:1), but they recognize that not all the wise enjoyed prosperity (Eccles 4:13), for even when their advice led to success, they might gain little or no credit (Eccles 9:14-15).

There was no profession of being a sage, but it is likely that once a person’s wisdom had been recognized, a group of followers might gather to benefit in whatever way they could, to learn and develop their own abilities, for the wise share knowledge (Prov 15:7), and their sayings were passed on orally or in writing (Prov 1:6; 22:17; Eccles 12:9-10). There is no evidence that there were schools where the wise taught in a formal way, although their services may have been employed to educate youngsters in the *royal court in order to prepare them for political and diplomatic service or to advise the king. Certainly, the wise were expected to counsel kings in their decisions (Esther 1:13; 6:13), and so a king such as *Solomon or Hezekiah might make or have made collections of the sayings of the wise (Prov 1:1; 25:1).

2. Schools in the Ancient Near East.

Wherever writing was established, scribal education followed. Reading and writing held a distinctive place in life, but they should not be understood as being entirely apart from other crafts; they were skills that could be learned like any other (e.g., potting, weaving, metal-casting), although the training may have taken longer. However, because only scribes could give precise permanence to events and open records of the past, their skill gave them a privileged position, access to information that could affect others deeply, as, for example, determining who sold a property to whom or when a loan was to be repaid. A major element in scribal training, therefore, was clarity and accuracy in writing and copying, vital for administration, for legal contracts and for surveying, either for construction projects or for estimating yields and so taxes. These aspects are particularly evident in the relics of scribal training from Babylonia and Egypt versus those from the Levant, where the materials used have mostly perished.

2.1. Babylonia. The most extensive remains of ancient Near Eastern scribal education come from Babylonia. Among the oldest cuneiform tablets, written slightly before 3000 BC, are numerous copies of lists of words arranged by category (e.g., names of fish, pottery vessels, human occupations), the start of a tradition that continued to be maintained in various forms over the next three millennia (Nissen, Damerow, and Englund, 105-9)—enduring tradition is a feature of Babylonian culture. By the middle of the third millennium BC, Sumerian hymns and prayers, magical spells, myths and wisdom literature were being written down, some by pupil scribes, and many continued to be copied for several centuries. Scribes also began to compose “royal” inscriptions, celebrating the achievements or piety of their rulers. Although few school tablets—that is, lists of signs with their values, lists of words, mathematical tables—are available from the next half millennium, the enormous clerical activity of the Third Dynasty of Ur (c. 2112-2004 BC), visible in tens of thousands of clay tablets, attests a centralized training system, with the names of over 1,500 scribes being recorded.

Schooling is best known from the eighteenth and seventeenth centuries BC, by which time Sumerian had ceased to be a widely spoken language; so, although many Sumerian texts were copied, increasingly texts were written in Semitic Babylonian. Excavations at houses in Nippur, Ur, Uruk and other towns have yielded hundreds of clay tablets produced by pupil scribes. They reveal a curriculum running from elementary writing exercises, learning individual signs, through copying the teacher’s text of a few lines, often a proverb, then word lists, mathematical tables and model contracts to extensive literary compositions. Some of the literary works probably were written versions of traditional *oral poems, some may have been composed in writing for particular purposes (e.g., hymns honoring individual kings), some may have been compiled for didactic purposes (e.g., collections of proverbs, debates), and the students themselves may have made up accounts of school life. Often only the first few dozen lines of long compositions were copied.

Babylonian scribes did not learn their craft in large classrooms; the houses where the school texts have been found were not big. In some cases canceled or discarded exercises survive. Teaching most probably was in the hands of individual scribes, with small numbers of pupils attending them in their homes, learning their trade as apprentices, but all followed a similar syllabus. Within the highly organized administration of the kingdom of Ur, King Shulgi (c. 2094-2047 BC) may have prescribed this curriculum, following older practices and setting the pattern for subsequent generations (on Babylonian schooling, see Black et al., xl-l, 275-352). Scribal exercises exist from later periods showing a similar syllabus continued in use, with some of the same compositions continuing to be copied, but evidence for teaching arrangements is meager. Pupils learned in private houses in the first millennium BC, but there were also “schools” attached to temples (Wiseman, 86-92; Gesche). At that time, scribes belonged to “families” who traced their professional ancestry back to renowned scribes of earlier centuries. Very successful or ambitious scribes could rise high in royal service, but the majority were employed in administrative tasks or sold their services to any who required them. Through each period of Babylonian history there is a remarkable uniformity in the script, which implies interchange of scribal activities between major centers, despite the training of scribes in most towns.

2.2. The Levant. Beyond the boundaries of Babylonia and Assyria, training in the cuneiform system followed the same basic syllabus, so that tablets from sites in Syria or Anatolia or Elam may be used to fill gaps in broken tablets found in Babylonia. However, the distance and lack of central control meant that, at the same time, local variations arose, and the influence of local languages is visible, as seen clearly in the texts of Ebla, c. 2300 BC (Biggs).

At Ugarit, on the coast of Syria in the Late Bronze Age, scribes learned the Babylonian cuneiform script and language and, beside it, a cuneiform alphabet created for their local West Semitic language. Clay tablets inscribed with traditional Babylonian school texts and others bearing the characters of the thirty-letter “Ugaritic alphabet” in order are witnesses to educational processes, but no school building has been identified. The Babylonian school texts and the tablets bearing the Ugaritic alphabet shared the same provenances as administrative and religious compositions, implying that scribes taught pupils alongside their regular work (see Pedersén, 68-80).

Throughout the Levant in the Late Bronze Age there were scribes in quite small towns who could read and write Babylonian cuneiform and so had received training somewhere. The recovery of school texts at such sites as Hazor, Megiddo (a fragment of the Epic of Gilgamesh) and Aphek shows that the training was not confined to the major centers (Horowitz, Oshima and Sanders).

Pharaohs had monumental inscriptions in Egyptian erected along the paths of their marches through the Levant, and where they established garrisons and administrative centers they left scribes who would have written in Egyptian and possibly trained local youths. Regrettably, their work, written on perishable materials, is lost, apart from a few brief ostraca concerning taxes (see, e.g., Goldwasser).

2.3. Egypt. Information from Egypt is less extensive because few town sites have been excavated, and papyrus, the common writing material, perishes in all but the driest environments. Inscriptions refer to a “room of writing” attached to some temples where boys of upper-class families could learn the scribal skills for about four years. Letter writing, grammar, foreign languages, onomastics, geography, mathematics and geometry, and ethics and morals are listed as the subjects covered (Fischer-Elfert; Williams 1972; ABD 2.395-99). The majority went on to work in the administration and could rise to very high positions in palaces and temples, but most would be occupied with daily routines of administration and accountancy.

School exercises survive in the form of extracts from literary works written on stone flakes, wooden boards and potsherds, some with a teacher’s corrections, and, when more advanced, on papyrus. The onomastics, or lexical lists, are similar to Babylonian ones and have been seen to underlie the enumerations of creation in Job 38—39; Psalm 148; Proverbs 30:24-31 (von Rad), but dependency of the Hebrew texts on these Egyptian lists is far from certain, for the areas that they cover and their order are not so particular (see Proverbs 2: Ancient Near Eastern Background). Frequently copied compositions include The Satire on the Trades, which lauds the scribal profession above all others, and Satirical Letter, in which one scribe chafes another, principally about his ignorance of the geography of the Levant, evidently a part of the curriculum (ANET, 432-34, 475-79; COS 1.48:122-25; 3.2:9-14). Noteworthy is the apparent “syllabus” of three “wisdom” texts in the early second millennium BC: the Satire on the Trades, the Instruction of a Man for his Son and the Loyalist Instruction (Simpson, 329-36, 337-39, 198-200). The word rendered “instruction” is šoyet, which corresponds to Hebrew tôrâ (“teaching, instruction, guidance”) and mûsar (“teaching”), although it does not share the element of the fear of God so clearly. Egyptian “instruction” was concerned primarily with the maintenance of good order, inculcating moral and cultural values. As in Babylonia, a uniformity of script prevailed, which suggests that a single authority had ultimate control of scribal training.

3. Schools in Ancient Israel.

Evidence for schools in ancient Israel is slight. The word “school” does not occur in the Hebrew Bible, making its first appearance in Sirach 51:23: “Turn to me, you unlearned, and stay in my house of instruction” (bêt midraš). Some scholars think that a few biblical passages hint at the existence of schools, Proverbs 22:17-21 among them, but their interpretation is dubious (Weeks, 132-36; Davies, 199-201). The expectation that schools in antiquity were comparable with European schools has given rise to the concept of buildings organized with classrooms having desks or benches. The Babylonian and Egyptian contexts make that most unlikely, so no physical schools would be discovered in Israel. Pupils sat on the floor around their teacher, in his house or street, who probably wrote on the ground initially. The discovery of monumental inscriptions in adjacent kingdoms of the Ammonites, Moabites, Phoenicians and Aramaeans dating from the tenth to the sixth centuries BC points to a high level of scribal training in the major centers in those countries, which makes it improbable that the same did not hold in Israel and Judah. The uncertainty of the biblical references to schools has to be set beside the epigraphic evidence.

Greater impetus to adopt the concept of schools in Israel came from A. Lemaire, who set that beside the biblical texts and the situation in Babylonia and Egypt (Lemaire 1981; 1992; cf. Puech 1988). In opposition, in 1991 D. W. Jamieson-Drake mounted a theoretical argument against the existence of schools in “Monarchic Judah.” He asserted that a socio-archaeological model of Judean society did not allow for “formalized scribal training” to exist outside Jerusalem, and Jerusalem only became sufficiently powerful to sustain such training in the eighth and seventh centuries BC. The weak archaeological indications for settlement, public works and luxury objects that he collected were his proof of that (see Jamieson-Drake; cf. Weeks, 132-56). Although some writers cite his work favorably, Jamieson-Drake’s mishandling of the archaeological remains and his failure to take proper account of all the epigraphic material seriously undermine his case (see Lemaire 1992; Millard 1992). Even if “formalized scribal training” in the sense of a “school” did not exist outside Jerusalem, the existence of Hebrew inscriptions from the tenth century BC onward is proof that teaching of some sort occurred, and the wide distribution of Hebrew writing in the eighth and seventh centuries BC, scribal exercises included (see 3.1 below), implies that instruction in the rudiments of writing and accountancy took place far from the capital (see DOTHB, Hebrew Inscriptions).

3.1. Writing Exercises and Basic Education. The basic task of learning the script was far lighter for Israelite pupils than for Babylonian or Egyptian. The Hebrew alphabet, adopted from the Canaanites, of only twenty-two letters could be mastered quite rapidly, unlike the complicated scripts of those other cultures, which needed some years of study. Unhappily, little of the Hebrew pupils’ work is visible, for in ancient Israel most writing was done on leather or papyrus sheets and rolls or on wooden tablets coated with wax, all of which decay when buried in the damp soil of most of the land. Occasionally people scratched on stone, and one specimen is generally agreed to be the oldest piece of Hebrew writing and to be a scholar’s exercise. That is the Gezer Calendar, a small stone tablet roughly engraved with seven lines listing farming activities through the year. It is dated to the late tenth century BC (Renz, 1.30-37). The discovery in 2005 at Tel Zayit in the Shephelah of the letters of the alphabet incised on a boulder built into a wall brings a significant new witness to the spread of writing in the tenth century BC (Tappy).

Recovery of potsherds used as writing materials (ostraca) has attested the skill of Hebrew scribes and some aspects of their training. Scores of ostraca result from official or commercial accounting; others preserve brief messages and lists of names. In several places alphabets have been found, whole or partial (see Renz, 2.1.22), which are practice pieces or idle scribbles or examples of bragging. The last may be seen at Kuntilet ‘Ajrud, on the desert road to Elath, where, on two large jars, graffiti were written about 800 BC. They include three incomplete alphabets and the opening phrases of letters, some overlapping, as if one man was trying to outdo another in displaying the extent of his education (Renz, 1.59-64). At Kadesh Barnea, in the far south, ostraca include two lists of numbers, in the form borrowed from Egyptian hieratic, on one followed by the weight unit “gerah,” on the other perhaps by “homer” and the sign for “shekel” (Renz, 1.339-43). These appear to be pupils’ exercises. At Arad one ostrakon (88) carries three lines of a narrative, each incomplete, which may have been copied from a royal inscription as writing exercise. It begins, “I was king in . . .” and refers to the king of Egypt (Millard 1978, 26; Renz, 1.302-5).

The uniformity of the Hebrew script and language (see Hebrew Language) in texts from the preexilic period indicates some kind of central authority ensuring that all communications were intelligible (Rollston, 68), although the use of vowel letters remained optional (Millard 1991). The rare examples of formal inscriptions on stone (Siloam Tunnel Inscription, Siloam Tomb and two fragments found in Jerusalem; a crumb of a stela from Samaria [Renz, 1.178-89, 261-65, 190-91, 266-67, 135]) reveal the ability to create longer texts, like those from the Moabite and Aramaean kingdoms. Almost all of the ostraca, graffiti and inscriptions display authorial ability to write the script rapidly and the language fluently—signs of efficient teaching producing the “skillful writer” (Ps 45:1).

3.2. Further Education. The epigraphic remains demonstrate the initial stages of scribal education but are too meager to inform us about any broader syllabus that pupil scribes in Israel may have followed. However, the texts from Babylonia and Egypt suggest a wide range of subjects, and the biblical books themselves are witnesses to more advanced levels of education. The authors of the poetic and wisdom books had learned how to narrate history (*Esther), to write philosophical treatises (*Ecclesiastes), to create a dialogue dealing with the problem of theodicy (*Job), write hymns and compose lyric poetry (*Psalms, Song of Songs), and gather and arrange good advice (Proverbs). The wide-ranging knowledge of the world that Job and Proverbs display attests good general knowledge and detailed observation (e.g., mining [Job 28:1-11]; “Leviathan” [Job 41]; the “four small things” [Prov 30: 24-28]). The “wise” are the most likely authors of the “wisdom” books. The book of Proverbs has Solomon’s name both in the initial sentence (Prov 1:1) and at the head of Proverbs 25, where additions were made in Hezekiah’s reign. Nothing is known of Agur and Lemuel (Prov 30:1; 31:1) (see Lemuel and Agur). Here the name need not denote the originator of every sentence but rather that the collecting was done at his behest or in his honor. This does not mean that he had no part at all in the composition. A similar situation obtains with Egyptian instructional works (Millard 2006).

Babylonian pupils learned Sumerian and Akkadian, and some learned other languages so that they could interpret for mercantile or diplomatic purposes, either orally or in writing. In the third and second millennia BC some Levantine scribes had to learn Babylonian, and some Egyptian. At least six languages were read at Ugarit in the thirteenth century BC, with interpreters rendering messages from foreign rulers into the local tongue. Scribes in other small independent principalities in Syria-Palestine wrote to the pharaohs in Babylonian, occasionally adding notes in their own, Canaanite, language, and the pharaoh’s scribes responded in Akkadian. In the Egyptian Instruction of Any there is mention of teaching Nubians, Levantines and others to speak Egyptian (COS 1.46:114). In Israel during the monarchy, besides traders who acquired a working knowledge of languages relevant to their businesses, there were officials who learned Aramaic, and in the Persian Empire, while Aramaic had come to be widely used for administrative purposes, local languages also were written (Esther 3:12; 8:9).

4. Wisdom Books and Schools.

It is widely maintained that “Wisdom literature” may have been one element in the education of more advanced Babylonian and Egyptian students in preparation for careers at court or in the temples. The address to “my son” and the instructions in good behavior, etiquette and morals are common to them and to Proverbs. The terms “father” and “son” in these compositions often are taken to mean “teacher” and “pupil.” However, there are no references to students or schools, so the intimate family setting is the preferable context for the composition of these pieces. In the Egyptian texts a father addresses his son—for example, “The maxims of good speech spoken by . . . Ptahhotep. . . . Thus he said to his son . . .” and “Written by . . . Amene-mope . . . for his son” (ANET 413, 421; COS 1.47:116). Likewise, in the oldest Sumerian “wisdom” book, copied already c. 2500 BC, “Shurup-pak gave instructions to his son Ziusudra” (Black et al., 284-92).

There is no good reason to suppose that these books, once written, were confined to schools or that established scribes may not have copied them, either for their own delectation or for other educated professionals, priests among them. Kings too might enjoy these and similar books. The Egyptian Prophecies of Neferti claim that a pharaoh called for his counselors to send a “wise” son of theirs to entertain him with his eloquence. When Neferti spoke, the king wrote his words on a scroll (COS 1.45:107). Nevertheless, where texts from scribal training are found, copies of “wisdom books” are often among them, both in the areas where the cuneiform script was current and in Egypt. Literature and “school texts” lay together in libraries in a Late Bronze Age temple at Emar on the middle Euphrates, and at Ugarit the same was true (Peder-sén, 61-80). In the old Assyrian capital city, Assur, a family of scribes active in the eighth and seventh centuries BC owned a large collection of tablets, with “wisdom” texts among them that may have served as textbooks. However, a family of exorcist priests flourishing in the seventh century BC in Assur owned a large library of about six hundred clay tablets bearing literary works. Their technical texts predominate, beside copies of hymns, prayers and epics; they do not appear to have been teaching the scribal art or literary skills. In another small library, beside incantation texts for curing the sick was, perhaps appropriately, a copy of part of the Poem of the Righteous Sufferer (ANET, 434-37; COS 1.152:486-92). To the northwest, a family of priests living at Huzirina (modern Sultantepe), near Haran, in the seventh century also owned many books, including “wisdom” works (for these libraries, see Pedersén, 134-36, 178-79). Wisdom books from Egypt apparently were deposited in tombs or tomb chapels, but most texts on ostraca were produced in teaching the workers who decorated the tombs in the Valley of the Kings and elsewhere (Quirke 1996).

5. Education in Ancient Israel.

In Israel everyone who practiced a craft or profession would have been in a position to train younger people to follow them. The apprentice system is the simplest and most likely means of education in all societies, especially in villages and small towns, and reading and writing are skills readily acquired in that way. Norms of behavior are learned in the family circle, parents and older relations teaching children. For higher levels of education, youngsters might go to recognized teachers, whether for advanced scribal skills or other subjects in which there may have been an involvement for the wise. Observing that modern knowledge of Sumerian, Babylonian and Egyptian literature depends to a large degree on the discovery of texts copied by pupil scribes, Lemaire (1981) offered the hypothesis that the biblical texts survive because they were selected for use in schools. Here a distinction has to be made between the texts from those areas and those from Greece and Rome, for none of the former survive because they are religious works that other circles may have wished to preserve. The circumstances of the fall of Jerusalem to Nebuchadnezzar perhaps make it easier to suppose that priests and prophets, rather than schoolteachers, saved books (see Barr 1983). Whatever the means by which the biblical books were collected and transmitted, it is to the training and education of ancient Israelites that they are owed.

See also DEAD SEA SCROLLS; HEBREW LANGUAGE; SCRIBES.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. J. Barr, review of Les écoles et la formation de la Bible dans l'ancien Israël, by A. Lemaire, BO 40 (1983) 137-42; R. D. Biggs, “Ebla Texts,” ABD 2.263-70; J. Black et al., eds., The Literature of Ancient Sumer (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2004); H. Brunner, Altägyptische Erziehung (Wiesbaden: Harrassowitz, 1992); M. Civil, “Education (Mesopotamia),” ABD 2.301-5; J. L. Crenshaw, Education in Ancient Israel (New York: Doubleday, 1998); G. I. Davies, “Were There Schools in Ancient Israel?” in Wis- dom in Ancient Israel: Essays in Honour of J. A. Emerton, ed. J. Day, R. P. Gordon and H. G. M. Williamson (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1995) 199-211; H.-W. Fischer-Elfert, “Education,” OEA 1.438-42; P. D. Gesche, Schulunterricht in Babylonien im ersten Jahrtausend v. Chr. (AOAT 275; Münster: Ugarit-Verlag, 2001); O. Goldwasser, “Hieratic Inscriptions from Tel Sera’ in Southern Canaan,” TA 11 (1984) 77-93; W. Horowitz, T. Oshima and S. Sanders, Cuneiform in Canaan: Cuneiform Sources from the Land of Israel (Jerusalem: Israel Exploration Society, 2006); D. W. Jamieson-Drake, Scribes and Schools in Monarchic Judah: A Socio-Archaeological Approach (JSOTSup 109; Sheffield: Almond Press, 1991); K. A. Kitchen, Poetry of Ancient Egypt (Documenta mundi 1; Jonsered: Paul Åströms, 1999); A. Lemaire, Les écoles et la formation de la Bible dans l'ancien Israël (OBO 39; Fribourg: Editions Universitaires; Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1981); idem, review of Scribes and Schools in Monarchic Judah: A Socio-Archaeological Approach, by D. W. Jamieson-Drake, JAOS 112 (1992) 707-8; idem, “Education (Israel),” ABD 2.305-12; A. R. Millard, “Epigraphic Notes, Aramaic and Hebrew,” PEQ 110 (1978) 23-26; idem, “Variable Spelling in Hebrew and Other Ancient Texts,” JTS 42 (1991) 106-15; idem, review of Scribes and Schools in Monarchic Judah: A Socio-Archaeological Approach, by D. W. Jamieson-Drake, Society for Old Testament Study Book List (1992) 34-35; idem, “Authors, Books and Readers” in Oxford Handbook of Biblical Studies, ed. J. W. Rogerson and J. Lieu (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2006) 641-57; H. J. Nissen, P. Damerow and R. K. Englund, Archaic Bookkeeping: Writing and Techniques of Economic Administration in the Ancient Near East (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1993); O. Pedersén, Archives and Libraries of the Ancient Near East 1500-300 B.C. (Bethesda, MD: CDL Press, 1998); P. Piacentini, “Scribes,” OEA 3.187-92; E. Puech, “Les écoles dans l'Israël préexilique: Données épigraphiques,” Congress Volume: Jerusalem 1986 (VTSup 40; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1988) 189-203; S. G. Quirke, “Archive” in Ancient Egyptian Literature: History and Forms, ed. A. Loprieno (PÄ 10; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1996) 379-401; J. Renz, Handbuch der althebräischen Epigraphik (3 vols. in 4; Darmstadt: Wissenschaftliche Buchgesellschaft, 1995); E. Robson, “The Tablet House: A Scribal School in Old Babylonian Nippur,” RA 95 (2001) 39-66; C. Rollston, “Scribal Education in Ancient Israel: The Old Hebrew Epigraphic Evidence," BASOR 344 (2006) 47-74; M.-J. Seux, Hymnes et prières aux Dieux de Babylonie et d'Assyrie (Paris: Cerf, 1976); W. K. Simpson, The Literature of Ancient Egypt (new ed.; New Haven: Yale University Press, 1973); R. E. Tappy et al., "An Abecedary of the Mid-Tenth Century B.C.E. from the Judean Shephelah," BASOR 344 (2006) 5-46; G. von Rad, "Job XXXVIII and Egyptian Wisdom," in The Problem of the Hexateuch, and Other Essays (Edinburgh: Oliver & Boyd, 1966 [1955]) 280-91; S. Weeks, Early Israelite Wisdom (Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1994); R. J. Williams, "Scribal Training in Ancient Egypt," JAOS 92 (1972) 214-21; idem, "Egyptian Literature (Wisdom)," ABD 2.395-99; D. J. Wiseman, Nebuchadnezzar and Babylon (Oxford: Oxford University Press, for the British Academy, 1985).

A. R. Millard

SALVATION AND DELIVERANCE IMAGERY

By far the greatest concentration of salvation and deliverance imagery in our literature is found in the psalms, which are the focus of this article. As the ordinary Israelite appealed to the king for deliverance (hōšī'ā hammelek [2 Sam 14:4]), so too the psalmist, who by tradition frequently was King *David, appealed to God for deliverance (hōšī'ā yhwh [Ps 12:1]) from his personal, tribal and national enemies (see Fabry and Sawyer, 445-46). Images of salvation and deliverance abound in the book of *Psalms, with the root for "save" (yš') appearing in almost half the psalms. And God, who is present in the temple, is therefore praised and exalted for his salvation. Indeed, the act of praise is a multifaceted act of faith, protest and hope (Brueggemann, 112-32). The God of Israel is the God of salvation.

1. General Features
2. Images of Salvation
3. God, My Savior
4. Salvation from What?
5. Arguments for Salvation
6. Benefits of Salvation

1. General Features.

The focus of the various images for salvation and deliverance in the psalms is on personal deliverance from enemies and life's real troubles rather than, as is often the case in Christian theology, on images of salvation in the *afterlife for the individual (see Holladay). It is this focus on real-life problems, such as being surrounded by enemies intent on killing the psalmist, that gives to the psalms a potent vision not only of salvation but also of a life of faith, a life of prayer, and a life of petitioning God for deliverance from physical dangers. Thus, Psalm 54:4-5: "But surely, God is my helper [ōzēr]; the Lord is the upholder of my life [napšī]. He will repay my enemies for their evil. In your faithfulness [ba'amittēkā], put an end to them." Here God's redemptive help emerges from his faithfulness into preservation of the petitioner's life and judgment on those who work evil. If the major focus of redemption is rescue from one's personal enemies, it remains true that the Psalter is primarily a public book of the cultus rather than of private piety (Kraus 1988, 77; 1986, 138-43). The formerly individual cry has become the cry of the cultic-shaped community.

Sometimes the psalmist extends this earthly form of salvation to become national: return to the land and the return of God's favor on his people are perceived as forgiveness and pardon and the withdrawal of wrath (Ps 85:1-3). National confession leads to national salvation and deliverance, as history shows: "Both we," the psalmist says, "and our ancestors have sinned. . . . Yet he saved them for his name's sake. . . . So he saved them from the hand of the foe. . . . They forgot God, their Savior. . . . Many times he delivered them. . . . Save us, O LORD our God" (Ps 106:6, 8, 10, 21, 43, 47 NRSV throughout article). A common expression for this is that of God restoring the fortunes of Israel (e.g., Ps 53:6).

However, even if the focus in the psalms is on the psalmists' more physical dangers and national condition, one psalm stands tall as a focus on personal forgiveness and redemption from sin: Psalm 51. David has committed murder, and he pleads with the "God of my salvation" for forgiveness from "bloodshed" (Ps 51:14).

Formally, the appeal to deliverance (yēša', yēšū'ā, tēšū'ā, as well as the roots mlt and nsl) in the book of Psalms takes on the form of a legal or a heart-rending plea (Ps 7:6-8; 22:19-21) and lament (Miller, 55-134). Fundamentally, the deliverance expected is earthy, physical and life-saving. At the personal level, the cries for deliverance in the psalms are graphically real and express an individual pleading with God in the most demanding of situations, when life seems to be in danger (Ps 6:4-5). The theme of redemption in the psalms emerges from the world of military violence and victory, suggesting that some of the psalms may have been written on the night of celebrating a battle victory (see, e.g., Ps 18).

A paradigmatic expression of the psalmist's understanding of salvation and deliverance as the act of God is found in Psalm 74:12: "Yet God my King is from of old, working salvation in the earth." A paradigmatic psalm expressing the theology of salvation and deliverance is Psalm 3. After rehearsing his case before Yahweh that his foes are many and are making accusations not only against him but also against the reputation of God (Ps 3:1-2), the psalmist (traditionally, David) says, "But you, O LORD, are a shield around me, my glory, and the one who lifts up my head" (Ps 3:3). In confidence, the psalmist then speaks of crying aloud to Yahweh, who hears from "his holy hill" (Ps 3:4). So confident is he in Yahweh's saving powers that he is able to sleep, unafraid of "ten thousands of people who have set themselves against me all around" (Ps 3:5-6). Suddenly, as if the enemies have arrived, the psalmist utters, "Rise up, O LORD! Deliver me, O my God!" (Ps 3:7a). God's deliverance, the psalmist testifies, is characterized by striking the psalmist's enemies on the cheek to shatter their teeth (Ps 3:7b-c). Finally, the psalmist utters a theological statement in parallelistic fashion: "Deliverance [ḥayēšū'ā] belongs to the LORD; may your blessing [birkātekā] be on your people" (Ps 3:8).

2. Images of Salvation.

A central notion of salvation is seen in Psalm 31:1: "In your righteousness deliver me." God's *righteousness is God's saving faithfulness that results in deliverance, surely evoking God's covenant faithfulness from the days of Abraham. Notice how each of these terms fills the others with meaning: "Your steadfast love, O LORD, extends to the heavens, your faithfulness to the clouds. Your righteousness is like the mighty mountains, your judgments are like the great deep; you save humans and animals alike, O LORD" (Ps 36:6, NRSV, italics added). God's steadfast love, faithfulness, righteousness and judgments lead to the psalmist's salvation.

God's salvation can be expressed in a number of ways, each of which is deserving of separate treatment (see Fabry and Sawyer; Stolz). Thus, salvation can be seen as a form of protection from an immoral generation (Ps 12:7-8; 17:8-9; 31:6-8; 69:29) and from those who seek death (Ps 17:11-12; 71:1-6). Thus, "preserve my life" is in parallel with "save" in Psalm 86:2, and "steadfast love" with "delivered" in Psalm 86:13. God can "answer" (nh [Ps 20:6; 60:5]) and "deliver" (nsl [Ps 59:2; 71:2]); God's deliverance is at the same time "blessing" (brk [Ps 28:9]). Another word for this is "save" (plṭ [Ps 37:40; 71:2]) because God has "rendered and established justice" (dyn [Ps 54:1]) and "vindicated" (špt [Ps 72:4]) his own. This occurs because God can "preserve the life" (šāmṛā napšī [Ps 86:2]) of his chosen ones.

Yet another expression is "redeem" (gā'al [Ps 19:14; 106:10]). God saves as the shepherd who will guide his people through life (Ps 28:9). God's shining face of blessing expresses the presence of salvation and restoration to the land (Ps 31:16; 80:3, 7, 19). Salvation from sin implies being washed (Ps 51:2, 7) and God hiding his face from one's sins (Ps 51:9) in addition to God creating a clean, new heart (Ps 51:10). Naturally, salvation implies forgiveness (Ps 79:9; 85:2). All of these expressions echo "save" or "deliver" in the psalms.

At times the images for deliverance can be cosmic, extravagantly so if not even apocalyptic in tone. After the psalmist of Psalm 18 prays, "the earth reeled and rocked," and then the psalm lays out a poetic litany of the cosmic echo as God delivers (Ps 18:7-15; cf. Ps 74:12-17).

3. God, My Savior.

If the psalms are shaped by earthly concerns, the psalmists know that there is only one Savior, the one and only God of Israel (Ps 62:1-2 [see Kraus 1986, 17-49]). "The LORD looks down from heaven; he sees all humankind"; therefore, "A king is not saved by his great army; a warrior is not delivered by his great strength. The war horse is a vain hope for victory, and by its great might it cannot save" (Ps 33:13-17 [cf. Ps 44:6-7; 118]). Why? God alone is the Savior, and he is steadfast in his love and in his righteousness to save (Ps 145:13-21). This Savior God is faithful (Ps 36:6, 10). "Why are you cast down?" the psalmists ask, urging instead, "Hope in God" (Ps 42:5, 11; 43:5).

God is exalted above the heavens and therefore can act mightily to rescue his own (Ps 57:5, 11). Thus, "For God alone my soul waits in silence; from him comes my salvation" (Ps 62:1).

And thus victory is salvation and deliverance: “O sing to the LORD a new song, for he has done marvelous things. His right hand and his holy arm have gotten him victory” (Ps 98:1).

God is the “shield around me” and “my glory” and the “one who lifts up my head”; God is on “his holy hill” and will “strike all my enemies” to whom “deliverance” belongs—all from Psalm 3 as expressions of God as Savior. God is a fortress-like and walled “refuge” (Ps 7:1; 18:30), one whose right hand provides salvation (Ps 17:7). God’s saving work leads to praise of God as “rock,” “fortress,” “deliverer,” “shield,” “horn of salvation” and “stronghold” (Ps 18:2). God is invoked to rise up in anger and fury to exact “judgment” (mīšpaṭ [Ps 7:6-7]). A thematic statement is found in Psalm 20:7: “Some take pride in chariots, and some in horses, but our pride is in the name of the LORD our God.”

This God is partial to the brokenhearted, the crushed in spirit, and the oppressed and poor and needy (Ps 34:18; 76:9), and so someone prays that King *Solomon (according to the superscription) may have the same discernment and justice-establishing ways (Ps 72:1-4, 13 [see Kraus 1986, 150-54]). God is also partial to his righteous people who serve and take refuge in him (Ps 34:19-22). But there is a universal dimension to salvation in the psalms, one that is cosmic (Ps 65:5-8). God’s saving act, expressed as forgiveness, is also an act of judgment against oppressors (Ps 79:8-13), showing that forgiveness at times is God’s social and earthly vindication and restoration of Israel. Because he knows God’s victories intimately, David the king cries out, “You are my Father, my God, and the rock of my salvation!” (Ps 89:26)

At times the psalmist expresses the ultimate longing as the visio Dei, as in Psalm 17:15: “As for me, I shall behold your face in righteousness; when I awake I shall be satisfied, beholding your likeness.” One thinks of Moses (Num 12:8; Deut 4:12, 15) or the archetypal benediction (Num 6:4-5), but one would be hard-pressed to demonstrate that the psalmist here is thinking of the afterlife. Instead, we are to envision the psalmist knowing that he has been vindicated because the face of God is upon him (Ps 17:2 [see Goldingay, 245]).

Because God is Savior, the psalmist loves God and turns toward him in praise and exaltation (Ps 18:1). Because God alone is Savior, the psalmist appeals repeatedly to faithfulness and obedience to the God who will save and deliver those who are faithful and obedient (Pss 37; 119).

4. Salvation from What?

Salvation in the psalms is intensely partisan, political and personal. It is panoramic as well: “For he has delivered me from every trouble, and my eye has looked in triumph on my enemies” (Ps 54:7). Familiarity with the psalms of Israel leads one to see in Psalm 27:1 the heart of salvation: “The LORD is my light and my salvation [’ōrī wēyīš‘ī]; whom shall I fear? The LORD is the stronghold of my life; of whom shall I be afraid?” Here we are not to think so much of eternal life as of earthly enemies and situations that fail to buckle the knees of the psalmist because he knows God is the Savior who can protect, deliver and exalt over all of one’s foes. The psalmist proceeds to offer evidence of why he ought to be afraid but continues to express confidence in God because he can say “O God of my salvation!” (Ps 27:9). So he exhorts others (and himself) to “wait for the LORD” (Ps 27:14 [cf. Ps 109:31]).

Deliverance, then, is most often from enemies, and salvation is a social experience in this world (Ps 31:14-16; 109; 119:94, 117, 146 [on the enemies in the psalms, see Tate, 60-64]). Thus, in the context of complaining about enemies, which psalms of David are in the habit of doing, David can say, “But I call upon God, and the LORD will save me.” How often will he complain? “Evening and morning and at noon I utter my complaint and moan, and he will hear my voice” (Ps 55:17; see also Ps 57:1-6; 59:2). David has plenty of capacity to speak extravagantly of how many enemies he has: “More in number than the hairs of my head are those who hate me without cause” (Ps 69:4), so he calls on God to save him (Ps 69:1, 13, 18) and his people (Ps 69:35). Sometimes the psalmist pleads to be saved from the immoral condition of those around them, characterized by dishonest words and oppression of the poor (Ps 12).

The psalmist seeks deliverance from foes who are personally accusing the psalmist (Ps 3:1-2); from intense pain and weeping over his expectation of imminent death (Ps 6:5-7; 31:9-10; 69:19-21) at the hands of his “foes,” who are “workers of evil” (Ps 6:7-8); from pursuers who are like a lion that “will tear me apart” and “drag me away” (Ps 7:2); from adversaries (Ps 17:7; 25:2); from “my strong enemy” who was too mighty for him to defeat and who had confronted him (Ps 18:16-19 [cf. Ps 22:12-13]). We are told repeatedly that the psalmist was spared death by conquering the military enemy (Ps 18:31-42; cf. Ps 69:22-28). Indeed, he “beat them fine, like dust before the wind; I cast them out like the mire of the streets” (Ps 18:42). The helpless psalmist is helped by the mighty God from the “day of trouble” (Ps 20:1, 6). The psalmist is at times depressed and scorned and mocked (Ps 22:7-8, 14-18). At times he is fearful, and God saves him from those fears (Ps 34:4-10). Often his life is on the line (Ps 116:1-4, 12-13). Most often the psalmists seek to be delivered from death in order to preserve life (Ps 6:4-5; 31:13). “The cords of death encompassed me; the torrents of perdition assailed me; the cords of Sheol entangled me; the snares of death confronted me” (Ps 18:4-5).

A classic formation of this is found in Psalm 18, a victory song for “salvation” from one’s enemies (see also Ps 20:9). Because of the Deuteronomistic view of history, captivity or defeat was perceived as discipline, and that meant that restoration in the land or victory was expressed as salvation and forgiveness (Ps 60:5; cf. Ps 69:35-36; 80; 85). Salvation at times means return to the land or restoration of divine favor toward those in the land (Ps 85:4, 7). “Surely his salvation is at hand for those who fear him, that his glory may dwell in our land” (Ps 85:9). This statement precedes a few lines where redemption is nearly synonymous with springs and rain for the land and crops of abundance.

Common human experiences give rise to God’s saving acts. Psalm 107 perhaps best puts this all into one grand display: some wandered hungry and thirsty in deserts, some lived as prisoners in darkness and gloom because of their rebellion against God, some were deathly ill because of their sinful ways, some experienced the terror of storms at sea (Ps 107:4, 10-11, 17-18, 25-27), but then “they cried to the LORD in their trouble, and he saved them from their distress” (Ps 107:6, 13, 19, 28).

David’s classic confessional psalm, Psalm 51, clearly states that salvation is from one’s sins and sinful state (Ps 51:5), and that salvation creates newness and joy (Ps 51:10-12).

5. Arguments for Salvation.

The psalmists plead with God for deliverance for a variety of reasons (Miller, 114-26), not the least of which is the reputation of God, which can be enhanced by the psalmist who seeks to remember God in praise (Ps 6:5). The psalmist expects and hopes for deliverance from his enemies because he trusts in God (Ps 28:7). The arguments for God to answer the plea that one finds on the lips of the psalmist often evolve as the psalmist moves from disorientation to orientation (Brueggemann, 3-32, 67-83).

David, at least, pleads with God not on the basis of his own merits but rather on the basis of his brokenness (Ps 51:17). However, the psalmist routinely appeals to his own virtues of goodness, righteousness (Ps 7:8), integrity (Ps 7:8), uprightness of heart (Ps 7:10), godliness/piety and faithfulness (Ps 12:1). He can state that his deliverance is the reward of his righteousness, cleanness of hands, obedience, blamelessness and guiltlessness (Ps 18:20-24). God’s judgments correspond to human behaviors (Ps 18:25-27). Those who know the mighty warrior God of salvation is the creator, who sits on the top of the hill (Zion), who dwells in a holy place, who dispenses blessings and who vindicates his people are also they who live properly: clean hands, pure hearts, honesty, and those who seek God (Ps 24:1-6, 7-10). A psalm of *Asaph says much the same: “Those who bring thanksgiving as their sacrifice honor me; to those who go the right way I will show the salvation of God [bēyēša’ ʾēlohīm]” (Ps 50:23).

What Israel is to “remember” shapes the identity of Israel, and so appeal to the past shapes how the psalmists petition God for salvation. Thus, “In you our ancestors trusted; they trusted, and you delivered them [wattēpallējēmō]. To you they cried, and were saved [wēnimlāṭū]” (Ps 22:4-5 [cf. Ps 44:1-8]).

The psalmist is willing to be put to the test: “If you try my heart, if you visit me by night, if you test me, you will find no wickedness in me; my mouth does not transgress” (Ps 17:3).

At times the psalmist offers a concession and suggests that if he has sinned, he does not deserve salvation but instead whatever consequences he gets: “If I have done this, if there is wrong in my hands, if I have repaid my ally with harm or plundered my foe without cause, then let the enemy pursue and overtake me, trample my life to the ground, and lay my soul in the dust” (Ps 7:3-5). The psalmist can even remember his former sins and appeal to God to lead him in the way of salvation, a salvation (Ps 25:5) that means deliverance from enemies (Ps 25:20).

6. Benefits of Salvation.

God's act of delivering, rescuing or granting victory over one's enemies or foes is simultaneously an act of righteousness or justice, suggesting that righteousness is not simply a moral attribute but is a saving action (šēdāqā [Ps 7:17; 31:1; 71:15]). The psalmists know that God can bring them their desires by lifting up the head (ūmerim rō'šī [Ps 3:3]) and turning back in shame their opponents (Ps 6:10), even cutting off their lips for their dishonest words (Ps 12:3-4). The psalmist is "made the head of the nations" (Ps 18:43) by the saving act of God. Those who are delivered are spared shame (Ps 22:5; 31:1).

God's might (ōz [Ps 21:1; 28:7-8; 140:7]) empowers the psalmist to "crush a troop" and "leap over a wall" (Ps 18:29) and to use war weapons with agility and success (Ps 18:34-42); God's might leads to enemies cowering before the conquering commander (Ps 18:43-45). That might leads to the exaltation of the king (Ps 18:46-50) and to exultant song (Ps 98). God's deliverance brings light (Ps 18:28; 27:1) and sets the psalmist on "the heights" (Ps 18:33).

The psalmist knows of the benefit of blessing both for himself (bērākā [Ps 3:8]) and, not unusually, for others within his ambit of influence (Ps 22:21-31). He makes promises of what he will do because of God's salvation (Ps 71:14-24).

Finally, the psalmist's evocation of the incident at Meribah and Massah (Ex 17:7) in Psalm 95 makes one think that the "rock" of our salvation speaks of God's provision of living water (Ps 95:1, 8-11).

See also CHAOS AND DEATH; CONFIDENCE, PSALMS OF; DIVINE PRESENCE; FEAR OF THE LORD; LAMENT, PSALMS OF; PROTECTION IMAGERY; SUFFERING; THANKSGIVING, PSALMS OF; THEODICY; WARFARE IMAGERY.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. W. Brueggemann, The Psalms and the Life of Faith (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1995); H.-J. Fabry and J. F. Sawyer, "עֶשֶׂה," TDOT 6.441-63; J. Goldingay, Psalms 1-41 (BCOTWP; Grand Rapids: Baker Academic, 2006); W. L. Holladay, The Psalms through Three Thousand Years: Prayerbook of a Cloud of Witnesses (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1996); H.-J. Kraus, Theology of the Psalms (Minneapolis: Augsburg, 1986 [1979]); idem, Psalms 1-59 (Minneapolis: Augsburg, 1988 [1978]); P. D. Miller, They Cried to the Lord: The Form and Theology of Biblical Prayer (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1994); F. Stolz, "Ys' hi. To Help," TLOT 2.584-87; M. H. Tate, Psalms 51-100 (WBC 20; Dallas: Word, 1990).

S. McKnight

SATAN

Although the Israelites undoubtedly believed in the reality of a demon world, demonology is little attested in the OT. In fact, there is no agreed upon term for demons. What can be gathered from the data from the ancient Near East and the OT in general would place demons in the terrestrial realm, generally in waste places, having little contact with the legitimate divine realm, aside from occasionally being used as instruments for punishment. Nothing here matches the information offered about the character identified by the term śāṭān in the OT.

1. Lexical Profile
2. The Profile of Satan in Job
3. Socioreligious Profile

1. Lexical Profile.

"Satan" is one of the few words that English has borrowed from Hebrew. In the OT it finds usage both as a verb (śāṭan) and a noun (śāṭān). As a verb, it means "oppose as an adversary" or "accuse" (Ps 38:20; 71:13; 109:4, 20, 29; Zech 3:1). As a noun, it can be applied to a human being, thus designating an adversary (1 Sam 29:4; 2 Sam 19:23; 1 Kings 5:4; 11:14, 23, 25; Ps 109:6). Finally, in the category of most interest to this study, the noun is applied to celestial beings (Num 22:22, 32; 1 Chron 21:1; Job 1—2 [14x]; Zech 3:1-2 [3x]).

There are no cognates to the Hebrew term in Semitic languages, so they offer no help in unraveling the history of the term. If the technical usage (noun applied to supernatural being) were original and the other usages developed from it, we would have to conclude, judging from the nuances of those derived terms, that there was little of a sinister nature in the being, for these other usages evidence none of that element. In contrast, however, the broadly generic sense of the common noun and verb usage suggests that the technical usage is a secondary development (Day, 17-23).

If this were indeed the case, it would be logical to assume that a supernatural being would have been given this designation as a description of his function—that is, a heavenly adversary. This finds confirmation in the fact that in most of the cases where the noun is applied to a supernatural being, the definite article is attached to it. In English, when we refer to someone by means of a proper name, we do not use a definite article (e.g., “Sarah,” not “the Sarah”). In this practice Hebrew behaves identically. Therefore we must conclude that the individual in Job 1—2 and Zechariah 3:1-2 should be identified as “the accuser” (description of function) rather than as “Satan” (proper name) (for a discussion of whether 1 Chronicles 21:1 evidences the word as a proper name or an indefinite accuser, see Japhet, 374-75). P. Day (128-29) suggests that the shift to using “satan” as a proper name does not occur until the second century BC:

The earliest datable evidence for שָׂטָן used as a proper name comes from Jub. 23:29 and As. Mos. 10:1, both of which can be dated to the persecutions of Antiochus IV ca. 168 B. C. E. The deuterocanonical texts that antedate 168 B. C. E. speak of evil demons and corrupt angels, but no text uses the name Satan. In Tobit, for instance, the evil demon who had to be restrained before Tobit could marry Sarah is named Asmodeus (Tob 3:8, 17). In the earliest level of 1 Enoch 6—11, the leader of the angels who were punished as a consequence of their intercourse with the daughters of men is Shemihazah; in a later addition to these chapters, he is called Asael. In short, whereas the deuterocanonical literature prior to 168 B. C. E. speaks of specific names for evil demons and corrupt angels, no extant tradition employs the proper name Satan. The available evidence, therefore, points to the second century B. C. E. for the earliest occurrences of the proper name Satan.

Another assumption that we have often carried blindly into the OT is that the technical term always applies to the same supernatural being, a single satan. This is easily refuted by the fact that Numbers 22:22, 32 refer to the angel of the Lord as being a satan. Not only can we identify “satan” here as a functional designation, but also we can now consider the possibility that as a function it is not intrinsically evil (Weiss, 35-41). Furthermore, since we would not assume that the angel of the Lord is the accuser in every context, it follows that the accuser is not necessarily always the same supernatural being.

Job 1:6 would lead us to understand that a certain divine being whose precise identity is unimportant and who has the current and temporary status of accuser is being introduced into the narrative. The advantage of this interpretation is that it is consistent with known Israelite (and Mesopotamian) legal practice in that “accuser” was a legal status that various people temporarily acquired in the appropriate circumstances, and not a post or office. (DDD² 728)

Consequently, it is possible that the individual designated the accuser in *Job is not the same individual designated as the accuser in Zechariah or Chronicles. Though they may be the same individual, we cannot simply assume that they must be, or that the Israelites would have considered them to be the same individual. Pseudepigraphic literature refers to many satans (e.g., the list of five satans in 1 En. 69:4-12, first century BC at the earliest [see D. Russell, 254-55]).

2. The Profile of Satan in Job.

If we had no name for this individual and had to build his profile from the text of Job, what conclusions could we draw? First, we would observe that the satan comes among “the sons of God” (Job 1:6). It is clear, therefore, that he has access to the heavenly throne and likely that he is counted among the members of this *divine council (cf. Ps 89:5-8; see Mullen, 190-244; Weiss, 31-33), though some have identified him as an intruder (see discussion in Page, 25-26). Secondly, the satan does not initiate the discussion of Job; he merely offers an alternative explanation of his righteous behavior. Though it is common for the satan’s job to be portrayed as seeking out human failings (Page, 26), it is God’s policies that are the true focus of the challenge (Day, 80-81). Job’s character is only the test case. In that vein, the existence of disinterested *righteousness and the effect of a reward system on a person’s motives are both legitimate issues. God neither scoffs at the challenge nor discounts the legitimacy of the question.

What the satan is in fact challenging is God’s blueprint for divine-human relations. In other words, the satan is questioning the validity of a moral order in which the pious unfailingly prosper. The test of true righteousness would be worship without the promise of reward. (*DDD*², 728)

The common view that the role of the satan should be compared to the Persian “secret service,” the eyes and ears of the king (e.g. Forsyth, 114), would be unacceptable if he serves to question the policies of God rather than the behavior of humans. In this sense we might consider a loose analogy to someone designated as “parliamentarian” in a group organized by Roberts Rule of Order. His/her job is to identify procedures that are out of order. The role is intended to serve, not disrupt.

Another question introduced by whether the satan targets God or Job concerns his demeanor toward Job. Some have inferred that the satan relished the opportunity to strike at Job. The text does not attribute to God or to the satan any personal emotional response to Job’s tragedy. God has struck Job as much as the satan has (implied in Job 1:12; 2:3; see Weiss, 37), and both lack any sympathetic response. It would be arbitrary, then, to assume that the satan enjoyed it while God sadly endured it. There is no expression of glee; there is no diabolical chuckle. “Nothing personal, Job—there is a major philosophical issue on the line that supersedes individual circumstances.”

M. Weiss concludes that nothing intrinsically evil emerges in the author’s portrayal of the satan in Job. Certainly what he does has negative consequences for Job, a righteous man, but the text makes it clear that God is at least equally responsible for what happens to Job, thus freeing the actions from being implicitly evil (Weiss, 37 [contra Page, 27-28]). There is no tempting, corrupting, depraving or possessing.

The result of this profile is that we are not in a position to claim that the satan in the book of Job should be identified with Satan as we know him in the NT on the premise that they act the same way. In fact, there is little if any overlap between their two profiles. This does not prove that they are not the same individual; it merely reduces (if not eliminates) the basis for claiming that they must be equated. The profile of the Hebrew satan in the book of Job does not answer to the same description as the Christian view of Satan in the NT. The pictures are not contradictory, and they may even be complementary, but we could not consider them homogeneous.

3. Socioreligious Profile.

The profile of the satan in Zechariah 3:1 shows a great deal of similarity to that in Job, so it is important to take a brief look there to see what it contributes to formulating a larger profile. When Joshua the high priest stands before the presence of God, he is confronted by the satan and opposed because he is covered with the stains of his and his people’s guilt. Is the satan wrong to oppose him on this count? Weiss (36-37 [see also Meyers and Meyers, 185-86]) says no:

True, he “opposes,” though not in a spirit of malice, but rather because he meticulously clings to justice, on the principle “Let justice be done though the heavens fall.” After all, Joshua the high priest was in fact guilty: he was dressed in garments covered with excrement, and he himself donned them in his guilt. Satan did not garb him in foul clothes through an unjust accusation. The garments are removed when God forgives his sin: he is acquitted not through justice, but through mercy, through pardon.

On the other hand, one significant difference between the scenarios in Job and Zechariah is that in the latter the satan is rebuked, while in the former he is not (Weiss, 37). C. Meyers and E. Meyers (186) contend that this rebuke is not directed against the satan performing his function but rather concerns the evidence that he brings. Here again we find the satan raising issues concerning God’s policies. In Job it was the policy of rewarding the righteous that was being questioned; in Zechariah it is the policy of forgiveness and restoration (Day, 118-21). Rather than a lengthy test to confirm the legitimacy of God’s policy as we had in Job, in Zechariah the satan is rebuked on the grounds that punishment had been appropriately accomplished (Joshua is a smoldering brand drawn from the fire; Zech 3:2).

A different profile emerges in other passages. In Numbers 22; 1 Kings 11; 1 Chronicles 21 the satan is viewed as a quasi-independent agent by means of whom punishment is initiated. How does this compare to the profiles in Job and Zechariah? There, his function was one directed toward God, in the sense that he initiated challenges concerning God’s policies. In these other books, however, his function is directed toward humans. Are we dealing in the OT with two separate profiles or simply two aspects of a single profile? Only speculation could provide answers to these questions. But again, we must note how different the profile(s) is from that which is later provided by the NT, where Satan is linked directly to a principle of evil (J. Russell, 189). The NT profile reflects the development of thought that took place throughout the intertestamental period, traceable through literature that evidences some of the progression in theological thinking that is later affirmed by the NT (see Ringgren, 313-16). By the time of the NT much of this thinking has been accumulated into the profile of the one called "Satan," the diabolical enemy leading the forces of evil.

If the profile shows no features of demon, fallen angel or tempter, what alternatives remain? A glance into the cognitive environment of the ancient Near East may provide another possibility. In comparative literature it must be observed first that there is no parallel to the satan character in the pieces from Mesopotamia that explore the case of the pious sufferer. Likewise, there is no concept of a chief of demons or a being who is the source and cause of all evil (DDD² 236). Since the heavenly court at times features legal proceedings among the members of the court, another place to look for parallels is in the roles within the legal system. A number of different terms refer to individuals (divine or human) who can bring a variety of formal accusations, serve as litigants or informants, or call for accountability (amkil karsdi [CAD K, 222]; beml dabambi [CAD D 3-4]; beml dimni [CAD D 155]; batiqu [CAD B 166]). None of these offer precise parallels to the role of the satan, but they have the most potential. A final note: in the court system, whether human or divine, no evidence is extant that suggests that a single being was assigned any of these roles permanently (see discussion in Magdalene).

The role of the satan in the book of Job would be seen as one who acts as a court functionary challenging the policies of God, specifically, his policy of blessing the righteous, though it is unclear whether he should be seen as legal opponent, litigant or informant. His challenge strikes right to the heart of the *retribution principle, a tenet for which the book seeks to provide a corrective. The satan's case is pressed unwittingly by the three friends, for if Job listens to them and confesses to sin simply to appease deity and be restored to favor, then the satan wins his case.

When the role of the friends ends in Job 27, the satan's case also is shown to be groundless, and there is no need to mention him again.

See also DIVINE COUNCIL; JOB 1: BOOK OF.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. P. L. Day, An Adversary in Heaven: Šaṭān in the Hebrew Bible (HSM 43; Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1988); N. Forsyth, The Old Enemy: Satan and the Combat Myth (Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1987); L. K. Handy, "The Authorization of Divine Power and the Guilt of God in the Book of Job: Useful Ugaritic Parallels," JSOT 60 (1993) 107-18; S. Japhet, 1 & 2 Chronicles (OTL; Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 1993); K. R. Joines, Serpent Symbolism in the Old Testament (Haddonfield, NJ: Haddonfield House, 1974); F. R. Magdalene, On the Scales of righteousness: Neo-Babylonian Trial Law and the Book of Job (Brown Judaic Studies 348; Providence, RI: Brown University, 2007); C. L. and E. M. Meyers, Zechariah 1-8 (AB 25B; Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1987); E. T. Mullen, The Assembly of the Gods: The Divine Council in Canaanite and Hebrew Literature (HSM 24; Missoula, MT: Scholars Press, 1980); H. Ringgren, Israelite Religion (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1966 [1963]); D. S. Russell, The Method and Message of Jewish Apocalyptic (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1964); J. B. Russell, The Devil: Perceptions of Evil from Antiquity to Primitive Christianity (Ithaca, NY: Cornell University Press, 1977); S. H. T. Page, Powers of Evil: A Biblical Study of Satan and Demons (Grand Rapids: Baker, 1995); M. Weiss, The Story of Job's Beginning (Jerusalem: Magnes, 1983).
J. H. Walton

SCHOOLS. See SAGES, SCHOOLS, EDUCATION.

SCRIBES

The role of scribes in the poetic and wisdom writings is significant. This article surveys the ancient Near Eastern and specifically the West Semitic background of the scribe and its influence upon the scribe in ancient Israel. The article then turns to consider the occurrences of the scribe and the art of writing in the poetry and writings of the OT.

1. Background
2. Scribes in the Poetry and Writings of the Bible

1. Background.

In the ancient Near East scribes often used these same types of literature to practice their skills in writing. This is true in the major civilizations of Babylon, Assyria, Egypt, the Hittites and their scribal centers. Similar literature is found in the second-millennium BC archives of the West Semitic world, including Alalakh, Emar, Mari and Ugarit. All preserve evidence of wisdom literature and its various forms. The great mythological stories, including the Epic of Gilgamesh, the Enuma Elish and many others, were recorded in poetic form. The scribes used difficult and challenging compositions to develop their skills. Writing in syllabic and ideographic scripts, they could exhibit their abilities with the use of esoteric signs. Thus the scribal art was a difficult occupation to learn and one that meant there were few who could skillfully read and write their scripts.

This was not the case in ancient Israel. There, the written script was alphabetic and included only about twenty-two different signs versus the hundreds found in the cuneiform and hieroglyphic scripts of many of the surrounding civilizations. The result was that reading and writing were more accessible. It may well have been the case that more people could acquire scribal training more easily. Already in the eleventh-century BC village of Izbet Sartah (biblical Ebenezer) there existed an alphabetic text on which a student was practicing the writing of letters of the alphabet. Judges 8:14 bears witness as to how a young man, caught at random from the Jordan Valley town of Succoth, could write out the names seventy-seven local officers. Another alphabetic practice text was discovered in 2006 at tenth-century Tel Zayit southwest of Jerusalem (Hess 2006). Although the degree of literacy might not be clear, it is evident from these and other examples, throughout the land and in every century (Hess 2002), that from early in Israel's settlement the ability to write was not so limited as in the neighboring civilizations (see DOTHB, Hebrew Inscriptions).

In other matters, however, the scribes of Israel did resemble their counterparts elsewhere. Royal officials employed scribes to record the events of their reign. The priests also preserved written records for purposes of maintaining precise instructions regarding their rituals, and for tax and other records of income and expense. Even more direct is the relationship between the scribal traditions of those who wrote the psalms and other poetry of Israel, and the West Semitic scribes of the Late Bronze Age (Day). Thus there is a continuity of specific expressions as well as parallelisms and forms between the poetry of thirteenth-century BC Ugarit and that of the psalms. The style of expression of the fourteenth-century BC Hymn to the Sun by the Egyptian pharaoh Akhenaten has some remarkable similarities of phrasing and structure with parts of Psalm 104. Further, the Amarna letters from the same period, with their expressions of worshipful loyalty and their pleas for assistance from Canaanite city leaders to the pharaoh in Egypt, bear resemblances on many levels to many of the psalms where there is a writer who, as a leader of Jerusalem and its land, expresses worshipful loyalty and requests assistance from his overlord in the heavens. Further, specific expressions such as “the strong arm of pharaoh” and “set his name on Jerusalem” parallel “the hand of the LORD” (Job 12:9; Ps 75:8) and “the dwelling of your name” (Ps 74:7) in biblical poetry. This, along with the *chiasm, synonymous *parallelism and other poetic structures bear witness to the continuation of a scribal tradition from Canaanite antecedents to David and the poets of the Hebrew Bible (Hess 1989).

2. Scribes in the Poetry and Writings of the Bible.

The role of the scribe in ancient Israel could and did take on components of creativity and composition. Thus Psalm 45:1 records how the psalmist's tongue is that of a skilled writer who is able to compose the wedding song that follows. This statement itself indicates something of the manner in which the scribe displaced the oral tradition of storytelling and oral composition (see Oral Poetry). The root for the word scribe and scroll, spr, can also be used to describe the oral recitation of a story, a song or any matter. This is only one example of the transition from oral to written of which the Bible is aware and in which the scribes of Israel played an important role (Goody; Niditch; Millard; Schniedewind 2004; van der Toorn). In the wisdom corpus it may find a reflection in the observation about the making of scrolls and the weariness that work with scrolls produces (Eccles 12:12 [note that the word translated “study” here is a good guess, but it occurs only here and perhaps in a related form in Ugaritic, where it appears in parallel with the word for “document”]).

Elsewhere in the psalms the use of the root spr for “scribe” and “scroll” envisions compositions that have a divine origin. This includes the enigmatic reference to a scroll that contains writing about the psalmist (Ps 40:7), and the written decree regarding the fate of the enemies of God's people (Ps 149:9). It is clearer in the description of the psalmist's enemies as blotted out of the book of life (Ps 69:28) and the observation that the days of the psalmist are written in God's book (Ps 139:16). Elsewhere Yahweh writes in a document about nations (Ps 87:6), and writing takes place in anticipation of a future generation (Ps 102:18).

In *Job as well, God functions as a scribe who writes against Job (Job 13:26) and to whom Job makes a request that the indictment against him be placed in writing (Job 31:35). Elsewhere Job longs for his words to be written on a scroll (Job 19:23), although it is not clear who is writing the words.

In *Proverbs the student is commanded to write the instruction. However, the place of the writing is on the "tablet of your heart" (Prov 3:3; 7:3). Thus the writing is not literal but rather a metaphor for the memorization and internalization of the material that the student learns. In Proverbs 22:20 the teacher refers to writing some thirty proverbs for the student. Compare this with Ecclesiastes 12:10, where the teacher also writes good words for the student. Proverbs 25:1 refers to the proverbs of *Solomon that the men of Hezekiah, presumably *sages of that era, passed along. Given that the material is now in written form, it is reasonable to assume that they were scribes who wrote this material. However, the verb describing what was done with the proverbs carries the basic sense of "transmit" or "pass along." Therefore it could define something that was orally transmitted. Nevertheless, the presence of extrabiblical seal impressions and other texts (such as the Siloam Tunnel inscription), as well as indications from the editorial notes in the books of Kings and the work of the prophet Isaiah (and Micah), combine with the archaeological and geopolitical evidence of the period to suggest that Hezekiah's reign at the end of the eighth century BC was a time of relatively prolific production of biblical literature (Schniedewind 2004), and thus a time of significant scribal activity.

Of all the books in the corpus under consideration, the one that contains the greatest number of references to scribal activity is *Esther. Set in the Persian period, it is also one of the latest of the books. Here the use of writing is connected with authoritative decrees to be enacted. Royal decrees are often so described (Esther 1:19, 22; 3:9; 8:5, 8-10, 13; see also the apocryphal Add Esth 13:1), as well as the decree of Haman (Esther 3:12-14; 4:8). Royal annalistic records are also mentioned (Esther 2:23; 6:1-2; 10:2). *Mordcai conducts his own correspondence with the provinces (Esther 9:20-32).

Thus the scribe and the scribal arts of Job and *Psalms (and perhaps *Ecclesiastes as well) focus on the role of God and the divine authority of decisions that are made in heaven regarding mortals on earth. In the Second Temple period the scribes may have been responsible for collection of the psalms into the work as we now have it. However, this role in *canon formation is disputed insofar as the evidence from Qumran does not necessarily support an agreed-upon canonical book before the first century AD. Scribes continued to read and interpret the poetic and wisdom texts of the Bible as suggested by the Wisdom literature of the intertestamental period. The figure of the scribe in Proverbs is largely one concerned with the preservation and instruction of wisdom to the next generation of students. In Esther the scribe is tied with authoritative decrees that are often royal and make decisions of life and death for the people of the Persian empire, both Jews and Gentiles.

The important role given to scribes would continue in Judaism in the context of poetic and wisdom writings. In the second-century BC wisdom scroll of *Sirach there is this statement: "One's prosperity comes by the hand of the Lord, and he gives his glory to (the face of) a scribe" (Sir 10:5). Thus, even though the NT would place a negative evaluation on various scribes, both it (Mt 13:52) and Judaism's heritage in the Mishnah and later Jewish literature would remember the key role of scribes in the continuity of God's word, including the wisdom traditions of instruction and authority.

See also EDITORIAL CRITICISM; HEBREW LANGUAGE; ROYAL COURT; SAGES, SCHOOLS, EDUCATION; TEXT, TEXTUAL CRITICISM.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. J. L. Crenshaw, Education in Ancient Israel: Across the Deadening Silence (ABRL; New York: Doubleday, 1998); J. Day, Psalms (OTG; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1990); J. Goody, The Logic of Writing and the Organization of Society (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1986); R. S. Hess, "Hebrew Psalms and Amarna Correspondence from Jerusalem: Some Comparisons and Implications," ZAW 101 (1989) 249-65; idem, "Literacy in Iron Age Israel," in Windows into Old Testament History: Evidence, Argument, and the Crisis of "Biblical Israel," ed. V. P. Long, D. W. Baker and G. J. Wenham (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2002) 82-102; idem, "Writing About Writing: Abecedaries and Evidence for Literacy in Ancient Israel," Vetus Testamentum 56 (2006) 342-46; A. R. Millard, review of Oral World and Written Word: Ancient Israelite Literature, by S. Niditch, JTS 49 (1998) 699-705; S. Niditch, Oral World and Written Word: Ancient Israelite Literature (LAI; Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 1996); W. M. Schniedewind, "Orality and Literacy in Ancient Israel," RelSRev 26 (2000) 327-21; idem, How the Bible Became a Book: The Textualization of Ancient Israel (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2004); K. van der Toorn, Scribal Culture and the Making of the Hebrew Bible (Cambridge: Harvard University Press, 2007).

R. S. Hess

SEA, PRIMORDIAL. See CHAOS AND DEATH.

SEX. See MARRIAGE AND SEX; SONG OF SONGS 1: BOOK OF.

SHAME. See HONOR AND SHAME; SOCIAL-SCIENTIFIC APPROACHES.

SHEOL. See CHAOS AND DEATH.

SIMILE. See POETICS, TERMINOLOGY OF.

SIRACH, BOOK OF

Sirach, one of the books of the OT Apocrypha, was written originally in Hebrew in Jerusalem during the first quarter of the second century BC and translated into Greek by Ben Sira's grandson in Egypt around 132 BC. It is similar to the book of *Proverbs in form and content, but it contains unique features atypical of the traditional Wisdom literature. As part of the Second Temple Jewish Wisdom literature, the book sheds light on the intellectual and social situation of Judaism during the Hellenistic era. The author demonstrates the superiority of Jewish wisdom and encourages his readers to keep their traditions. For him, Jewish wisdom finds its ultimate expression in the Mosaic Torah, and it is by subscribing to this Torah that one can be wise.

1. Historical Background
2. Literary Analysis
3. Wisdom Teaching
4. Sirach and the New Testament

1. Historical Background.

1.1. Authorship, Title, Date. The author of Sirach is identified as "Yeshua ben Eleazar ben Sira" (yēšūa' bēn 'el'āzār ben sîrā' [Sir 50:27; 51:30 MS B]) or "Jesus" (Iēsou [Sir Prologue 7]), also known as Ben Sira. The book is known under several names: "Sirach" (NRSV), "The Wisdom of Jesus Son of Sirach" (Sophia Iesou huiou Seirach [LXX]), "The Wisdom of Joshua Son of Sira" (hokmat yēšūa' ben sîrā' [Hebrew]), "Ecclesiasticus" (Vulgate), "The Book of Ben Sira" (sēper ben sîrā' [b. Hag. 13a; b. Nid. 16b]) and "The Books of Ben Sira" (sipri ben sîrā' [t. Yad. 2:13]). In short, "Sirach" is the Greek name, "Ben Sira" the Hebrew, and "Ecclesiasticus" the Latin. Following the NRSV, "Sirach" is adopted here for the title of the book, and the name "Ben Sira" is used in reference to the author.

It is generally believed that Sirach was written in the period 200-175 BC, and that the Greek translation was made in the period 132-116 BC (but see Hengel 1974, 1.131; Peters, xxxiv-xxxvii). The dating of the book is extrapolated from its prologue, which speaks of Ben Sira's grandson's time of arrival in Egypt in 132 BC (i.e., the thirty-eighth year of King Euergetes' reign). It is further established in conjunction with the fact that the book does not mention the persecution of Antiochus IV (176-164 BC), and with the reference in Sirach 50 to Simon II (219-196 BC), who presumably is dead by then.

1.2. Text and Canon. The watershed studies of Sirach began in 1896, when the first Hebrew fragment (Sir 39:15—40:8) from the Cairo Geniza was identified by S. Schechter (see Reif). The textual history of the book is, nevertheless, notoriously complex. There are at least two forms of Sirach in the Greek version (G I and G II), numerous Hebrew manuscripts (A, B, C, D, E, F, M, 2Q18, 11QPs^a), several manuscripts in the Syriac version and an Old Latin translation. There exist two Hebrew versions, a shorter Hebrew original (H I) and a longer text of more than one Hebrew recension (H II). Whereas H I (200-175 BC) is the basis for G I, the grandson's Greek translation, H II (mid-first century BC-AD 150) is the basis for G II (MS 248 [AD 150-200]), on which the Old Latin is based (Kearns). The combination of H I and H II serves as the Vorlage of the present Peshitta (Winter). Despite the complexity of the textual history, the Greek translation, particularly J. Ziegler's critical edition, constitutes the standard text for the study of Sirach. Recently, P. Beentjes arranged all the extant Hebrew MSS and compiled a somewhat user-friendly Hebrew text edition (without the critical apparatus), which, although not without problems, provides a valuable tool for Ben Sira research in years to come.

The status of the book is debated among the Jews. Some excluded it from their *canon (y. Sanh. 28a; b. Sanh. 100b; t. Yad. 2:13), while others, such as the Qumran community (2Q18; 11QPs^a; Mas1h), the Jews in the Diaspora (LXX) and some rabbis (citing the book with the standard formula for scripture citation: "it is written" [b. Hag. 13a; b. Nid. 16b, y. Ber. 11c]), considered it authoritative. By the end of the first century AD the book was officially excluded from the Jewish canon. One of the main reasons for this exclusion was the belief during the time of Ben Sira that the Jewish canon had been set, according to the Greek prologue of Sirach (cf. Sir 39:1), which speaks of the existence of a tripartite Scripture (Beckwith, 80-93, 111; but see VanderKam).

The early Christian church adopted the Jewish canon (i.e., the so-called Palestinian Canon) as its OT and assigned Sirach to the Apocrypha (Beckwith, 386-95). However, together with the other books of the Apocrypha, the book has been accepted as part of the deuterocanonical writings in the Catholic tradition (Council of Trent [1546]). The Reformers consistently excluded the Apocrypha from their canon (Belgic Confession, Article 6 [1562]; Westminster Confession of Faith 1.3 [1647]), although among Protestant churches today, the Anglican Church continues to use the Apocrypha in its lectionary (Articles of Religion, Article 6).

Despite the noncanonical status of the books of the Apocrypha, Protestants have begun to recognize their importance, along with the other Second Temple Jewish writings, because of their value in the study of Second Temple Judaism, biblical interpretation and early Christianity (Carson, xlv-xlvii). Today virtually all of the Apocrypha is included in the NRSV.

1.3. Ben Sira and His Time.

1.3.1. The Profile of Ben Sira. Ben Sira saw himself as a *scribe (Heb sôpêr; Gk grammā teus), as well as a wisdom teacher, and his book as a source of wisdom (Sir 38:24; 50:27). He also considered himself a latecomer in the long sapiential tradition (Sir 33:16-18), when he may have started his career at a relatively young age (Sir 51:23-30; cf. Sir 39:1-5). Ben Sira devoted himself to the diligent study of the Torah, the Prophets and other writings (Sir Prologue 7-10), and he acquired much wisdom through the study of "the wisdom of the men of old" (Sir 39:1) and from his travels (Sir 34:9-12). Judging from his conviction that only those who are free from manual labor could pursue wisdom (Sir 38:24-25), it is likely that he never was engaged in such work. He is also thought to be a priest, given his familiarity with and high regard for the priesthood (e.g., Stadelmann). He was considered to be a rich Jewish intellectual, a landowner and a slave owner (Blenkinsopp 1995a, 15-20), a judge, counselor and member of the assembly or a temple scribe (Hengel 1974, 1.133). All these are, at most, only conjectures. What is clear is that Ben Sira was a "transitional" *sage. He is, on the one hand, a traditional wisdom teacher, and on the other hand, an interpreter of Scriptures. As a transitional figure, he was doing more than what the traditional wisdom teachers were doing. He interpreted Scriptures, making it part of the subject of his inquiry (Kugel, 10-11).

1.3.2. Judaism and Hellenism. The older view (e.g., Smend) that there appeared a direct antipathy between Judaism and Hellenism no longer holds true (Hengel 1974, 1.104-5). The relationship between Judaism and Hellenism is a complex and multifaceted one. Hellenism infiltrated subtly into the political, religious, economical, intellectual and social aspects of the ancient Near East. Although the Greek language, as well as the Greek way of life, had dominated all strata of the population, the traditional Jewish religious heritage remained uncompromised among the vast majority of the Jews. Initially, the Jews in Palestine considered the Greeks their "eschatological enemies" and experienced a polemical, rather than a cultural, confrontation. It was at the beginning of the third century BC, with the political stability and the return of the Diaspora Jews, that an intellectual milieu began to flourish. In particular, Jewish wisdom and apocalypticism began to directly encounter Greek ideas (Hengel 1980, 110-12), and Sirach is one book that shows direct Greek influence (Sanders, 27-59). It is appropriate to see Judaism during the Second Temple period as “Hellenistic Judaism” (Hengel 1974, 1.104).

1.3.3. Purpose of the Book. Set within Palestine of the Second Temple period, Ben Sira was, without doubt, faced with the challenge of Hellenism. His struggle was immediately noticeable: to fight the liberal aristocracy and at the same time to keep a low profile before the powerful (e.g., Sir 4:7; 7:14a; 8:11, 14; 9:13). The attitude that Ben Sira had toward Hellenization, however, is a matter of debate. M. Hengel (1974, 1.138-53) sees an “apologetic-polemical” character against Hellenistic liberalism in Ben Sira’s teaching (Sir 41:8-9), while B. Mack (101-2) argues that Ben Sira was sympathetic to the Hellenistic culture (Sir 38:24—39:35), and J. Collins (41, 54-56) contends that Ben Sira’s intention was constructive rather than apologetic. For T. Middendorp (173-74), Ben Sira was holding a mediating position, seeking to bridge Greek civilization and ancient Jewish tradition. Indeed, nowhere in Sirach do we find any explicit polemic against, or advocacy of, Greek civilization. Nevertheless, it is impossible to rule out the apologetic tone when Ben Sira seeks to convince his readers to acquire wisdom (e.g., Sir 2:7-17; 14:20-15:10; 19:20-30; 32:18-33:3; 42:2). P. Skehan and A. Di Lella (16) maintain that Ben Sira’s purpose “was not to engage in a systematic polemic against Hellenism but rather to convince Jews and even well-disposed Gentiles that true wisdom is to be found primarily in Jerusalem and not in Athens, more in the inspired books of Israel than the clever writings of Hellenistic humanism.”

2. Literary Analysis.

In the past, Ben Sira was often seen as a “successor” (Nachfolger [Middendorp, 78]) and a “conscious imitator” (Schechter, 12) of Proverbs. Compared to the other earlier wisdom writers, he was less of a “creative thinker,” “master stylist” or even an “innovator in literary genres” (Skehan and Di Lella, 21, 43). Recently, however, scholars have come to believe that Ben Sira made distinct contributions (Coghins, 62-68). His style of writing reflects wisdom poetry of his time, and his thinking is greatly influenced by earlier nonsapiential biblical writings as well as by Greek and Egyptian literature (Sanders, 27-59).

2.1. Literary Genres. Like Proverbs, the poetry of Sirach is generally marked by *parallelism, either in single or multiple couplets. But the sayings of Ben Sira consist of both long and short teachings made up from various genres, such as “proverbs,” “hymns of praise,” “songs of thanksgiving,” “laments,” “prophetic speeches” and “wisdom personified speeches” (see Baumgartner, 165-92), with the genres of māšāl (Sir 1—43) and rewritten Bible (Sir 44—49) being the most prominent ones.

2.1.1. māšāl. The basic meaning of māšāl is “likeness/comparison,” and it is generally used to describe a popular aphoristic saying (TDOT 9.67). Like Proverbs, Sirach contains “better” sayings, with the standard formula tōb min (Heb) or kreissōn (Gk) (e.g., Sir 20:31; 40:28). Numerical sayings usually take the form “x/x plus one” and have their emphasis on the second, larger number (e.g., Sir 23:16-18; 25:1-2, 7-11; 26:5-6, 28; 50:25-26). Ben Sira’s numerical sayings stretch from 2/3 (Sir 23:16-18) to 9/10 (Sir 25:7-11). Other types of māšāl include, among others, “happy” sayings (e.g., Sir 14:1-2, 20; 25:8-9; 26:1) and “woe” sayings (Sir 2:12-14; 41:8).

2.1.2. Rewritten Bible. The section known as the Praise of the Fathers (Sir 44—49) has been understood differently: for example, a hymn in praise of men (Baumgartner), encomium of Simon (Lee), encomium of Israel’s heroes (Collins) and epic historiography (Mack). Since the tales of the heroes were told in an “augmented” manner (Enns, 17), and in accordance with the biblical order, the best designation is “rewritten Bible” (Hayward). Although the form of rewritten Bible is entirely lacking in the biblical Wisdom literature, it is present in the OT (e.g., Ps 78; 105; 106; 135; 136; Neh 9:6-37) and in the NT (e.g., Acts 7; Heb 11). Similar to the OT, the history of Israel is retold in poetic form, and selected characters, from Enoch to Nehemiah, are singled out as ideal figures.

2.1.3. Others. Other than māšāl and rewritten Bible, there are two unique genres worth mentioning: the autobiographical saying and the hymn of praise. Although the autobiographical saying is also found in the biblical Wisdom literature (Prov 4:3-9; 24:30-34), Ben Sira, like *Qohelet before him, regularly uses his personal experience (e.g., Sir 33:16-17; 51:13-16) as a basis for his teaching (cf., e.g., Eccles 2:17-26). A hymn of praise is an expression of one’s gratitude to God. But in Sirach several hymns appear in which Ben Sira extols both divine wisdom and human wisdom (e.g., Sir 39:12-35; 42:15-43:33; 44:1—50:24; 51:1-12).

2.2. Structure and Content. Sirach is not merely a collection of collections, for it has a clearly set out structure and organized content. It begins with an introductory poem (Sir 1:1-10) and an alphabetic *acrostic (Sir 1:11-30) and ends with another alphabetic acrostic (Sir 51:13-20), which forms a literary *inclusio for the book (Skehan and Di Lella, 74). The book may be structured thematically as follows:

Greek Prologue
 Wisdom Sayings (Sir 1:1—43:33)
 The Praise of the Fathers (Sir 44:1—49:16)
 Conclusion (Sir 50:1—51:30)

2.2.1. Greek Prologue. The value of the prologue is not limited to the understanding of the development of the biblical canon. It provides important information regarding the Greek translation. The grandson not only explains his purpose and the issues involved in the process of translation but also provides reading strategies and insists that his work is comparable to the Jewish-Greek Scriptures. Thus, the prologue, written a couple of generations later, is to be seen as an integral part of the book (Wright).

2.2.2. Wisdom Sayings (Sir 1:1—43:33). Wisdom sayings in proverbial form permeate Sirach, leading many to think of Sirach as being patterned after Proverbs. The content of Sirach (fifty-one chapters!), however, is more diverse and covers a wide range of topics. No less than thirty-one topics have been identified in Sirach 1—43 (Murphy, 73). Although they are not arranged in any systematic order (Skehan and Di Lella, 4-5), they are made up of two major collections: Sirach 1:1—23:28; 24:1—43:33.

Both collections have similar structure. They start out with a wisdom poem that speaks of the source of wisdom, which is the Lord (Sir 1:1-10; 24:1-34), and the application of wisdom, which is the *fear of the Lord (Sir 1:11—2:17; 25:1-11). Notably, in the introductions to both collections similar language, such as “the depth of the abyss” (Sir 1:3; 24:5), wisdom as a tree spreading its branches (Sir 1:20; 24:16), wisdom as coming from the Lord (Sir 1:1; 24:3), and wisdom being created first by God (Sir 1:4; 24:9), is employed.

In Sirach there are various types of wisdom sayings—for example, on friendship (Sir 6:5-17; 22:19-27; 37:1-6), wealth and poverty (Sir 13:15-24; 13:25—14:10; 31:1-11), speech and tongue (Sir 19:4-17; 20:1-8, 18-26; 23:7-15; 27:11-21; 28:12-26; 32:3-13), death and life (Sir 14:11-19; 38:16-23; 41:1-4), relationship with *women (Sir 9:1-9), relationship with parents (Sir 3:1-16), relationship with the needy (Sir 3:30—4:10), pride and humility (Sir 3:17-29; 9:12-13; 10:26—11:6), generosity (Sir 18:15-18), leadership (Sir 9:17—10:18), food (Sir 30:18-25; 31:12—32:2; 37:27-31), slaves (Sir 33:24-31), sacrifice and offering (Sir 34:21—35:13), prayers (Sir 35:14-20), children (Sir 30:1-17; 42:9-14), sickness and health (Sir 38:1-15), character (Sir 27:4-10; 27:30—28:11), dreams and divination (Sir 34:1-11), giving (Sir 29:1-28) and hard work (Sir 40:28-30). They are placed in the context of the fear of the Lord. This means that these sayings can no longer be treated as traditional teachings but rather must be applied in light of this new context.

It is characteristic of wisdom teachers to compare and contrast wisdom and foolishness (Sir 19:20-30; 21:11—22:2, 7-18; 37:16-26). Ben Sira also gives readers the option to choose between wisdom and *folly (Sir 15:11-20). With the intention of encouraging readers to embrace wisdom, on the one hand, he lays out the consequences of foolishness: death (Sir 21:1-10), disgrace (Sir 23:16-27), divine wrath (Sir 27:22-29), shame (Sir 33:20-24; cf. Sir 41:15—42:8) and judgment (Sir 16:5-14; 40:10); on the other hand, he insists that a wise person will have a good name (Sir 41:11-14), glory (Sir 1:11, 19; 4:13) and honor (Sir 10:19-20), will find favor with God (Sir 32:14-17), and is promised a life of peace and security (Sir 34:14-20).

There are several topics in Sirach that are rare for Wisdom literature, the first of which is prayer. In Proverbs there is only one brief prayer (Prov 30:7-9). In Sirach there are two extended prayers, one in each of the two wisdom collections. The prayer for self-discipline (Sir 22:27—23:6) reveals Ben Sira's piety, and the prayer for God's people (Sir 36:1-22) shows Ben Sira's love for his country. Another topic is that of women, comprising about 7 percent of Sirach (Trenchard, 1). Ben Sira appears to be extremely negative toward women. For example, he attributes the origin of sin and its resultant death to Eve (Sir 25:24) and criticizes women of improper conduct. His forthright comments on women (Sir 9:1-9; 19:2; 23:22-26; 25:16-26; 42:13-14), however, do not necessarily make him a misogynist (so Trenchard, 172-73); rather, this biased attitude toward women may be a reflection of the view of women current in his male-dominated society (Camp).

2.2.3. The Praise of the Fathers (Sir 44:1—49:16). This hymn, a continuation of Sirach 1—43 (Mack, 189-93), is entitled “Praise of the Fathers of Old” (Heb) or “Praise of the Fathers” (Gk). It begins with a prelude (Sir 44:1-15), which provides a hermeneutical key to the reading of the Praise of the Fathers. Several key words, notably hesed (“piety”), kābôd (“glory”) and šēm (“name, reputation”), are listed as wisdom criteria by which the fathers are evaluated. A list of twelve categories of offices is given (Sir 44:3-6), but without mentioning the individual office holders. This shows Ben Sira’s lack of favoritism toward any office and his emphasis on wisdom over status. For example, rulers are praised not because they are rulers per se but rather because of their wise dominion (Sir 44:3a).

Immediately after the prelude, a catalogue of historical personas from Enoch to Nehemiah is introduced (Sir 44:16—49:16). Enoch, the ideal wisdom figure, is the first and the last person mentioned (Sir 44:16; 49:16), creating an inclusio to situate all the fathers in the wisdom perimeter (cf. Sir 45:2, 7, 12, 23; 46:2; 50:5, 11). These ancient fathers are presented in accordance with the canonical division from Enoch to Phinehas (Pentateuch: Sir 44:16—45:26) and from Joshua to Nehemiah (Prophets: Sir 46:1—49:16).

What is unique is that certain characteristics of these figures are nowhere to be found in the OT. For example, Enoch is seen as a sign of knowledge (Sir 44:16 MS B), and Abraham as a keeper of the *law (Sir 44:20). Most strikingly, Aaron receives a great amount of attention (Sir 45:6-22) compared to Moses (Sir 45:1-5).

Ben Sira regards Joshua a prophet after Moses (Sir 46:1), and the judges, whose bones returned to life, as being free from idolatry (Sir 46:11-12). As for the kings, Ben Sira speaks of *David as playing with the lions, and his “horn” as being exalted by God forever (Sir 47:3, 11). *Solomon is indicted not on the basis of his accumulation of wealth and of having had many wives but rather because of his submission to women (Sir 47:19), which is the cause of the schism (Sir 47:21). With reference to the defeat of the Assyrian army, he gives credit to the people’s prayer (Sir 48:20), which brought down a deadly plague (Sir 48:21 Heb). It has nothing to do with the angel’s work (cf. 2 Kings 19:35-37) or the prayer of Hezekiah (cf. 2 Kings 19:14-19). He compares Josiah with a threefold quality that relates to the senses (Sir 49:1): incense (smell), honey (taste) and music (hearing). Ben Sira speaks highly of the prophets. He sees in the return of Elijah (Sir 48:10) the fulfillment of Malachi 4:5-6. Elisha was a great prophet filled with the spirit. After he died, his body continued to prophesy (Sir 48:13 [cf. 2 Kings 13:21]). For Ben Sira, it was Isaiah, not God, who prolonged Hezekiah’s life (Sir 48:23). He believes that the bones of the twelve (minor) prophets, like the bones of the judges, had returned to life and given strength and hope to Jacob (Sir 49:10).

2.2.4. Conclusion (Sir 50:1—51:30). The Praise of the Fathers is culminated in the person of Simon II (Sir 50:1-24), who was an ideal priest and a wise person. Like the fathers, he demonstrated his wisdom in his building activities (Sir 50:1-4; cf. Sir 48:17-22) as well as in his priestly duties during the Day of Atonement or the daily whole-offering (Sir 50:5-21; cf. Sir 45:6-22). The praise of Simon is followed by a numerical saying (Sir 50:25-26) and an epilogue (50:27-28 [50:29 Gk]), which summarizes the blessing of wisdom. The last chapter contains a prayer of thanksgiving for deliverance (Sir 51:1-12), a hymn of praise (Sir 51:12 i-xvi MS B [cf. Ps 136]) and an acrostic wisdom poem in the form of autobiography (Sir 51:1-30).

3. Wisdom Teaching.

Sirach is about wisdom. It is constructed with a wisdom frame: a wisdom poem at the beginning (Sir 1:1-10), at the end (Sir 51:13-30) and in the middle (Sir 24:1-34). Ben Sira deals extensively with interpersonal relationships, such as those among family members (e.g., parents, children, slaves), friends, women, rulers and the poor. He also touches on various aspects of social ethics—for example, speech, table etiquette and discrimination. He takes seriously matters of life and death, religious obligations, the problem of evil and the justice of God. As a wise teacher, Ben Sira not only learns wisdom but also contributes to it (see Sir 21:15). Compared to the teachings of the earlier wisdom teachers, his is more comprehensive (von Rad, 241-42). Two areas of his teaching will suffice to illustrate this.

3.1. Wisdom and the Fear of the Lord. According to his grandson in the prologue, Ben Sira’s purpose is to write something pertaining to instruction and wisdom, in order that “those who love learning might make even greater progress in living according to the law” (Sir Prologue 12-14 NRSV).

This purpose is also stated at the end of the book: “Instruction in understanding and knowledge I have written in this book. . . . Happy are those who engage in these things; and those who take them to heart will become wise. For those who do them will be strong for all things, for the light of the Lord is their path” (Sir 50:27-29 Gk). In Ben Sira’s words, this wisdom, first and foremost, is to be found in the Lord: “All wisdom is from the Lord, and it is with him forever” (Sir 1:1 Gk). He affirms that only the Lord is wise (Sir 1:8-9), and that wisdom was first created by God (Sir 1:4, 9; cf. Sir 24:8-9).

To obtain this wisdom, however, is not impossible. Ben Sira follows the traditional understanding: “To fear the Lord is the beginning of wisdom” (Sir 1:14a Gk). The expression “fear God” occurs some sixty times in Sirach. Together with wisdom, it depicts the central concern of Ben Sira. Traditional wisdom teachers affirmed that the fear of God is the beginning of wisdom (e.g., Prov 1:7), but Ben Sira had more to say. The fear of the Lord is not only the beginning of wisdom (Sir 1:14); it is also the fullness of wisdom (Sir 1:16), the crown of wisdom (Sir 1:18), the root of wisdom (Sir 1:20) and, above all, life (Sir 50:28c Heb). For Ben Sira, fearing God is a covenantal concept equal to loving God, keeping his commandment, and walking in his ways (cf. Deut 6:4-6; 10:12-13; 30:11-20). He maintains, “Those who fear the Lord will not disobey his words, and those who love him will keep his ways. Those who fear the Lord will seek to please him, and those who love him will be filled with his law” (Sir 2:15-16 Gk), and “The one who fears the Lord will do this, and the one who holds to the law will obtain her [wisdom]” (Sirach 15:1 Gk). Indeed, “The whole of wisdom is the fear of the Lord, and in all wisdom is the performance of the law” (Sirach 19:20 Gk).

The relationship between wisdom and Torah is not entirely new in earlier biblical texts (e.g., Deut 4:6-7; 30:11-16). The idea permeates Sirach (e.g., Sir 1:26; 2:16; 6:37; 10:19; 15:1, 14-15; 19:20; 21:11; 23:27; 31:8-10; 32:15-16, 23-24; 33:1-3; 34:8, 22-23; 35:1, 8; 39:1-2; 41:8; 42:2) and comes to a sharper focus in the great wisdom poem in Sirach 24:1-34. Closely resembling Proverbs 8 in form, with seven stanzas of five lines (Skehan and Di Lella, 331), Sirach 24 portrays wisdom in greater detail. Wisdom personified, which is a contextualization of the aretology of Egyptian Isis (Marböck, 47-54), disclosed her origin (Sir 24:3-17), identified herself with the law (Sir 24:23-29) and likened herself to a channel of instruction (Sir 24:30-34) (see Woman Wisdom). She journeyed from the mouth of the Most High (Sir 24:2) to “the heights” and a “pillar of cloud” (Sir 24:4), to heaven, the abysses, the sea, and to all the world (Sir 24:5-6 [cf. Job 22:14]) in search of a resting place (Sir 24:7). Eventually, she found her abode in the “holy tabernacle” in Jerusalem (Sir 24:8, 10). It is in this context that Ben Sira equates wisdom with the book of the covenant of the Most High God (Sir 24:23). For the first time in Jewish tradition the correlation of wisdom and Torah is explicitly pronounced. Whereas the focus on Deuteronomy is on corporate covenantal obligation, in Sirach the emphasis is on the individual quest for wisdom (Blenkinsopp 1995b, 86-87, 152-53). Through this identification of wisdom with the law, Ben Sira is able to combat Hellenism more effectively (Hengel 1974, 1.157-62). Wisdom is not found in Greek culture; rather, it is located in the temple of Jerusalem (Sir 24:7-8, 23-27). In essence, the way to wisdom is through obedience to the Mosaic law.

The relationship between wisdom and Torah is demonstrated in the lives of the ancient fathers (Sir 44—49). For example, Enoch pleased the Lord (Sir 44:16; cf. Sir 2:16); Noah was found perfect (Sir 44:17; cf. Sir 31:10); Abraham kept the commandments (Sir 44:20; cf. Sir 6:37; 23:27); Moses demonstrated humility (Sir 45:4; cf. Sir 10:26-11:6); Aaron offered acceptable sacrifices (Sir 45:14; cf. Sir 35:1-13); Phinehas feared the Lord (Sir 45:23; cf. Sir 1:11-20); Joshua and Caleb trusted the Lord (Sir 46:4-6; cf. Sir 2:1-6); the judges did not fall into idolatry (Sir 46:11; cf. Sir 30:19); David loved the Lord (Sir 47:8; cf. Sir 2:15-16); Hezekiah pleased the Lord with his work (Sir 48:22; cf. Sir 35:20); Josiah had a lasting name (Sir 49:1; cf. Sir 41:11-14). These ancient fathers are praised not merely because of the role they played in the history of salvation; rather, they are praised because wisdom is not hidden in them (Sir 41:14).

3.2. Wisdom and the History of Israel. The most distinctive contribution of Ben Sira in his sapiential instruction, however, is not in his association of wisdom with the Mosaic law but rather in his attention to the history of Israel. This historical data is highly selective; certain individuals are highlighted and emphasized (e.g., the priestly figures Moses, Aaron, Phinehas, prophets as miracle workers), while other characters (e.g., Ezra, famous women such as Ruth and Deborah) are omitted. Even some significant historical events (e.g., the exodus and the crossing of the Red Sea) are absent.

Ben Sira's retelling of history shared with, and, to a certain extent, was guided by, certain exegetical traditions circulating during his time. For example, Sirach 44:16 Heb (Cowley and Neubauer, 20) reads, "Enoch was found perfect and walked with the Lord, and he was taken, a sign of knowledge to all generations." The language "a sign of knowledge" is found in 1 Enoch 92:1, a retelling of Genesis 5:24. According to Jewish tradition, Enoch was taken up to heaven and returned from heaven with revelation. It is in this regard that he has become a sign of knowledge (Kugel, 174-78). The Greek translation has Enoch as an example of repentance rather than as a sign of knowledge, which reflects a different tradition that speaks of Enoch repenting of his sinful life, walking with the Lord, and thus pleasing the Lord and being taken up (cf. Wis 4:10-14; Philo, QG 1.82; Abr. 17 [see Kugel, 193-94]).

Israelite history is retold from a wisdom perspective, as was expected of a wisdom teacher (Sheppard, 13, 117-19). Thus, even the fathers, who were not seen as wise in the Pentateuch or the Prophets, are now viewed from the perspective of wisdom (cf. Wis 10). They are portrayed strictly as either good or evil, or as men of wisdom or men of folly (Kugel, 22), just like the wisdom sayings which are given in two opposites—for example, good and evil, life and death, the godly and the sinner (Sir 33:14-15), *honor and shame (Sir 10:19). Specifically, they are measured against three wisdom criteria: piety, glory and reputation (Sir 44:1-15). For example, Solomon (Sir 47:12-21), a wise king par excellence according to the popular standard, is not wise according to Ben Sira's measure. Ben Sira questions Solomon's piety by exposing his motive and priority in his building activities (Sir 47:13), points out that Solomon ceased to be wise in his old age (Sir 47:14a), and indicts Solomon for subjecting himself to women (Sir 47:19). As a result, Solomon failed to be a wise king.

4. Sirach and the New Testament.

Although Sirach is not explicitly cited in the NT, A. Sundberg (54-55) has compiled at least forty-one references of Sirach in the NT, with the majority found in the Gospels and the Epistle of James. In the Gospels many of Jesus' teachings parallel Ben Sira's. For example, with reference to prayer, both of them warn against unnecessary repetition in prayer (Mt 6:7; Sir 7:14) and insist on perseverance in prayer (Lk 18:1; Sir 7:10). They agree that forgiveness of others is the prerequisite of God's forgiveness (Mt 6:12; Sir 28:2). But Jesus went beyond Ben Sira and stressed the need to pray even for one's enemies (Mt 5:44)—an example that he himself set for his followers (Lk 23:34; cf. Sir 50:25-26). In the area of almsgiving, Jesus and Ben Sira emphasize generosity (Mt 5:42; Sir 4:4-5), for it is a sign of God's children and reflects God's generous love (Mt 5:45; Sir 4:10). Ben Sira, however, limits his generosity to the godly person and to one's friend (Sir 12:4-7; 14:13). For Jesus, one's generosity should be extended to all, without any bias, and it must be done in secret (Mt 5:42; 6:23). The most prominent parallel between Jesus and Ben Sira is their wisdom invitation (Mt 11:28-30; Sir 51:23-27; cf. Sir 6:24-28; 24:19). Both invitations entreat listeners to take up their yoke and are given in the context of wisdom learning. Whereas Ben Sira's invitation is extended to the youth, Jesus' invitation is directed to all the weary. Moreover, in Sirach, it is Wisdom who utters the invitation, but in Matthew, it is Jesus, wisdom personified, who offers the invitation.

Although the Epistle of James does not fit into the genre of wisdom literature, James's teachings are sapiential and have several contacts with Sirach. They have the same basic understanding of wisdom, which is from God (Jas 1:5; Sir 1:1) and allows one to face testing and trials (Jas 1:2-4; Sir 2:1-6). They speak of two kinds of wisdom, a true one and a false one (Jas 3:15-17; Sir 19:20-30). For Ben Sira, the difference between the two lies in the fear of God and in the keeping of his commandments. James, on the other hand, is more specific in showing the difference. For him, true wisdom is manifested in one's character, humility and good deeds, while false wisdom belongs to the devil and is reflected in one's bitter envy and selfish ambition.

James and Ben Sira deal extensively with speech and the tongue. The evil of the tongue is portrayed in pictorial language, and the readers are encouraged to properly handle it (Jas 3:1-12; Sir 28:12-26)—for example, to be slow to speak but quick to hear (Jas 1:19; Sir 5:11-12). Interestingly, with reference to sickness, both authors believe that prayer is vital. Prayer not only brings physical recovery but also deliverance from sin (Jas 5:14-16; Sir 38:9-15). Whereas Ben Sira advises the ill to seek the help of physicians as well as to offer sacrifices, James advises the assistance of church elders. For him, the sick person is to be anointed with oil, but for Ben Sira, it is the offering, rather than the sick person, that is anointed with oil.

These similarities do not necessarily mean that NT authors are dependent on Sirach, but they are a reflection of a shared worldview in a similar milieu. Despite all the similarities, there is a radical difference between Sirach and the NT. Ben Sira has correctly highlighted the origin of wisdom and the relationship between wisdom and the law, but the NT authors have come to a deeper understanding of wisdom. For them, traditional wisdom has a trajectory. Wisdom finds its fulfillment in Jesus, and the cross has become the ultimate expression of God's wisdom for human kind (1 Cor 1:18-31).

See also WISDOM OF SOLOMON.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. W. Baumgartner, "Die literarischen Gattungen in der Weisheit des Jesus Sirach," ZAW 34 (1914) 161-98; R. Beckwith, The Old Testament Canon of the New Testament Church (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1985); P. C. Beentjes, The Book of Ben Sira in Hebrew: A Text Edition of All Extant Hebrew Manuscripts and a Synopsis of All Parallel Hebrew Ben Sira Texts (VTSup 68; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1997); J. Blenkinsopp, Sage, Priest, Prophet: Religious and Intellectual Leadership in Ancient Israel (LAI; Louisville, Westminster John Knox, 1995a); idem, Wisdom and Law in the Old Testament: The Ordering of Life in Israel and Early Judaism (rev. ed.; Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1995b); G. H. Box and W. O. E. Oosterley, "The Book of Sirach," in The Apocrypha and Pseudepigrapha of the Old Testament in English, ed. R. H. Charles (2 vols.; Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1913) 1.268-517; C. V. Camp, "Understanding a Patriarchy: Women in Second Century Jerusalem through the Eyes of Ben Sira," in "Women Like This": New Perspectives on Jewish Women in the Greco-Roman World, ed. A.-J. Levine (SBLEJL 1; Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1991) 1-39; D. A. Carson, "The Apocrypha/Deuterocanonicals: An Evangelical View," in The Parallel Apocrypha, ed. J. R. Kohlenberger III (New York: Oxford University Press, 1997) xlv-xlvii; R. J. Coggins, Sirach (GAP; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1998); J. J. Collins, Jewish Wisdom in the Hellenistic Age (OTL; Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 1997); A. E. Cowley and A. Neubauer, eds., The Original Hebrew of a Portion of Ecclesiasticus, XXXIX.15 to XLIX.11, Together with the Early Versions and an English Translation, Followed by the Quotations from Ben Sira in Rabbinical Literature (Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1897); P. Enns, Exodus Retold: Ancient Exegesis of the Departure from Egypt in Wis 10:15-21 and 19:1-9 (HSM 57; Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1997); C. T. R. Hayward, "Rewritten Bible," in A Dictionary of Biblical Interpretation, ed. R. J. Coggins and J. L. Houlden (London: SCM, 1990) 595-98; M. Hengel, Judaism and Hellenism: Studies in Their Encounter in Palestine during the Early Hellenistic Period (2 vols.; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1974); idem, Jews, Greeks and Barbarians: Aspects of the Hellenization of Judaism in the Pre-Christian Period (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1980); C. Kearns, "Ecclesiasticus, or the Wisdom of Jesus the Son of Sirach," in A New Catholic Commentary on Holy Scripture, ed. R. C. Fuller et al. (London: Nelson, 1969) 541-62; J. L. Kugel, Traditions of the Bible: A Guide to the Bible as It Was at the Start of the Common Era (Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1998); T. R. Lee, Studies in the Form of Sirach 44-50 (SBLDS 75; Atlanta: Scholar Press, 1986); B. L. Mack, Wisdom and the Hebrew Epic: Ben Sira's Hymn in Praise of the Father (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1985); J. T. Maertens, L'Éloge des pères: Ecclésiastique XLIV-L (Bruges: Abbaye de Saint-André, 1956); J. Marböck, Weisheit im Wandel: Untersuchungen zur Weisheitstheologie bei Ben Sira (BZAW 272; Berlin: de Gruyter, 1999); T. Middendorp, Die Stellung Jesu ben Siras zwischen Judentum und Hellenismus (Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1973); R. E. Murphy, The Tree of Life: An Exploration of Biblical Wisdom Literature (3rd ed.; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2002); N. Peters, Das Buch Jesus Sirach oder Ecclesiasticus (EHAT 25; Münster: Aschendorff, 1913); S. C. Reif, "The Discovery of the Cambridge Ben Sira MSS," in The Book of Ben Sira in Modern Research: Proceedings of the First International Ben Sira Conference, 28-31 July 1996, Soesterberg, Netherlands, ed. P. C. Beentjes (BZAW 255; Berlin: de Gruyter, 1997) 1-22; J. T. Sanders, Ben Sira and Demotic Wisdom (SBLMS 28; Chico, CA: Scholars Press, 1983); S. Schechter, "A Fragment of the Original Text of Ecclesiasticus," Expositor 4 (1896) 1-15; G. T. Sheppard, Wisdom as a Hermeneutical Construct: A Study in the Sapientializing of the Old Testament (BZAW 151. Berlin: de Gruyter, 1980); P. W. Skehan and A. Di Lella, The Wisdom of Ben Sira (AB 39; Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1987); R. Smend, Die Weisheit des Jesus Sirach (Berlin: Reimer, 1906); H. Stadelmann, Ben Sira als Schriftgelehrter: Eine Untersuchung zum vormakkabäischen Sofer unter Berücksichtigung seines Verhältnisses zu Priester-, Propheten- und Weisheitslehrertum (WUNT 2/6; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 1980); A. C. Sundberg, The Old Testament of the Early Church (HTS 20; repr., New York: Kraus, 1969); W. C. Trenchard, Ben Sira's View of Women: A Literary Analysis (BJS 38; Chico, CA: Scholars Press, 1982); J. C. VanderKam, "Revealed Literature in the Second Temple Period," in From Revelation to Canon: Studies in the Hebrew Bible and Second Temple Literature (JSJSup 62; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 2000) 1-30; G. von Rad, Wisdom in Israel (London: SCM, 1970); M. M. Winter, "The Origin of Ben Sira in Syriac," VT 27 (1977) 237-53, 494-507; B. G. Wright, "Why a Prologue? Ben Sira's Grandson and His Greek Translation," in Emanuel: Studies in Hebrew Bible, Septuagint, and Dead Sea Scrolls, ed. S. M. Paul et al. (VTSup 94; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 2003) 633-44; J. Ziegler, ed., Sapientia Iesu Filii Sirach (Septuaginta: Vetus Testamentum graecum 12/2; (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1965).

M. Phua

SOCIAL-SCIENTIFIC APPROACHES

The body of literature in the OT that has been identified as wisdom, poetry and writings is an interesting collection because in many ways these books stand outside the historical framework that exists in much of the Pentateuch, the chronicle of nation-building in Joshua—2 Kings, and the prophetic corpus. Instead, the emphasis here is on the basic values of Israelite society and on the ways in which individuals and groups learn to cope with their world in good times and bad. Of course, Israelite society is exemplified in *law, royal annals and prophetic speech, but often it is deeply embedded in what is referred to as emic (= insider) perspective, and little explanation is provided for the benefit of the audience. The text in fact contains presuppositions about social situations that were quite understandable to the original audience but have now lost some of their meaning for modern readers. However, in a piece of wisdom literature or a short story like that of *Ruth, a basic assumption about their society's understanding of both human and divine actions represented by the principles of reciprocity or social identity can be examined in greater detail and thus may provide a more thoughtful approach to biblical interpretation. In other words, these works do not simply affirm a particular value or position; they also provide intellectual data that can in turn be analyzed in the light of life experience or a sequence of events that test the measure of the ancient society's views on patience and perseverance, as well as group identity and self-identity.

One particularly helpful method of biblical criticism that addresses the fabric of society evidenced in these books of wisdom and poetry is the social-scientific approach. It outlines a set of established social protocols and identifies theories and methods with which to analyze the basic social values and understandings in ancient Israel (Elliott, 50; Jonker, 3-5). In this way, it becomes a somewhat easier task to recognize how the social world of ancient Israel operated. Of course, no one social-science model can be touted as the most reliable or most useful for the reconstruction of the ancient world. Although some scholars may favor a particular method or theory, most choose to take a more eclectic approach, applying a variety of social theories to what is revealed by the ancient textual material and the exposed archaeological data (see Esler and Hagedorn). Most also recognize that building a social model of an ancient culture based on information drawn from the study of modern cultures has its dangers (Sneed). Presuppositions or the desire to make the data fit the chosen model simply discredit the process (Herion; Carter, 23-28). However, a careful application of these models can be useful in tying data together. By taking a more objective stance on the relative value of these models, the researcher and the reader can engage in continuous self-evaluation and a restructuring of the interpretative approach as needed. To demonstrate this, this article examines several basic social settings, situations and mechanisms that draw on examples from the biblical text.

1. Honor and Shame
2. Kinship and Identity
3. Reciprocity
4. Spatiality

1. Honor and Shame.

The concepts of *honor and shame are two sides to the same cultural coin, and they function within a Mediterranean culture like that of ancient Israel as incentives for “correct” behavior as defined by their community and as disincentives to “incorrect” behavior. Striving to be honorable or to acquire honor is status-building for both the individual and the household. Shame attaches to every member of a household if any member engages in speech or action that threatens their honorable state or endangers the existence of the household. In this way, wisdom serves as a guide to behavior in ancient Israelite society, and it is used to determine what is considered to be “right thought,” “right speech” and “right action.” Beyond actual behavior patterns, what also occurs is the labeling of individuals as either honorable or shameful as an indication of how the village reacts to a particular household in their community (Goode, 60-61). Thus what can be termed as life-giving behavior was labeled “wise” or “cool-headed” (= honorable) in wisdom tradition, and clearly destructive or antisocial behavior was identified as “foolish” or “hot-headed” (= shameful). Wisdom therefore is an expression of both the common sense and the moral tone of a society. Aphorisms, laws and the official chronicle of events in a king’s reign all reflect the basic attitudes about correct behavior and speech. In this regard, it is possible to take note of the string of evildoers found in *Proverbs: “sinners” (Prov 1:10-19) whose greed leads them to rapacious acts, ambushing the innocent, but losing their lives in the end; and the “loose woman” whose adulteries entice fools to their death (Prov 2:16-19; 5:3-6; 7:6-27; 9:13-18). A similar contrast is found in admonitions praising hard work as the key to success and prosperity (Eccles 5:12). The wise are called on to take note of the industriousness of the ant (Prov 6:6-11), and they are cautioned that a “child who sleeps in harvest brings shame” (Prov 10:4-5). In fact, the lazy are “like vinegar to the teeth and smoke to the eyes” to their employers (Prov 10:26).

1.1. Honorable and Dishonorable Behavior. Ultimately, honor was the true measure of a household’s ability to care for its members and to provide assistance to the weak in society (widows, orphans, strangers) who for whatever reason could not care for all of their own needs.

Thus, *Job models honorable behavior in caring for strangers, not allowing them to “spend the night in the street” (Job 31:32). It could be said that Job is imitating God, who guarantees under the covenant to “watch over the alien and sustain the fatherless” (Ps 146:9). A household was labeled as dysfunctional or without honor when it refused to meet these social obligations (Ps 94:6) or worked actively to “bring down the poor” (Ps 37:12, 14). The disrepute that they obtained from their antisocial behavior endangered the entire community and justified the curtailment or restriction of their license to make a living in the village, to buy, sell, trade, marry, arrange marriages, serve in assemblies and send warriors to the tribe (Matthews and Benjamin 1993, 143). An exemplar of this is found in the “x + 1” sequence detailed in Proverbs 6:16-19, where we are told that the Lord hates “haughty eyes, a lying tongue, and hands that shed innocent blood, a heart that devises wicked plans, feet that hurry to run to evil, a lying witness who testifies falsely, and one who sows discord in the family” (compare similar sentiments in Ps 18:27; 27:12; 120:2; Prov 1:6).

1.2. Dispute Resolution. To deal with potential and actual disputes within society and to maintain a measure of social stability, certain controls (laws as well as customs) are established to set standards of acceptable/honorable behavior. This explains the continual reaffirmation of trust in and obedience to the law as a measure of honorable behavior and wisdom that becomes a hallmark of the biblical *sage and psalmist (Esther 1:13; Ps 1:2; 19:7-10; Prov 28:7; 29:18). One method that assists with the interpretation of the social character of legal pronouncements is the sociology of law, which is capable of tracing (1) the evolution of social controls and the causes behind their development; (2) forms of legal reasoning and discourse; (3) “the degree of freedom and coercion existing in the form of law” coupled with the connection between economics and politics (Milovanovic, 3-4). Of course, not all social controls can be defined as law. Customary behavior, adherence to rules, or social norms may or may not be dependent upon physical coercion by a deputized group or be based on a written set of laws (Hoebel). This seems clear when we note the role of village elders who worked toward consensus to make a judgment or settlement on the legal disputes involving the legal status of Ruth and *Naomi and the disposition of Elimelech's property near Bethlehem (Ruth 4:1-12). There is also a cohesion attached to actively shaming individuals who may have engaged in incorrect behavior or who have harmed the community by their actions. Psalm 129 details the blessings that will be obtained by those who "fear the LORD" and "walk in his ways" (Ps 129:1-5) and calls on God to "put to shame" those who hate *Zion. In cursing Israel's enemies, the psalmist expresses a national identity and political resolve and uses shaming as a weapon to increase Israel's honor at the expense of "out-groups" that have caused great harm (Boda, 1407-11).

2. Kinship and Identity.

Every person has a network of associations based on blood relations, commercial ties, political alliances or membership within a particular village, community or tribe (Coote, 40-47). All of these can be defined in kinship terms, although the strongest are blood ties. There may be some confusion in reading ancient literature because social labels such as father, son, mother, daughter and sister (see Song 5:1) may refer to blood kinship, marital relationship, political status or economic alliances. For instance, in the Egyptian teachings of Ptah-hotep (c. 2500 BC) the protégé or apprentice is referred to as "son." Similarly, in Proverbs the relationship of father and child or of son to father and mother can be construed either as a blood tie or as a broader association based on common interests (Prov 4:1-5; 23:22-25).

2.1. Social Dislocation. Because no culture lives entirely in a social vacuum, kinship ties become even more complicated when they are expanded to include temporary or long-term relationships with neighboring peoples in the form of economic or political agreements. When that occurs, family-based values and relationships inherent to both cultures come to the fore in the social mixing, requiring that each maintain its singular identity amidst a larger society comprised of crisscrossing social differences (Bahloul, 27). Persons deprived of these relationships due to a natural disaster or war or as a result of immigration become liminal, persons who do not belong to the society in which they find themselves (see the depiction of the ruined Jerusalem as a displaced widow in Lam 1:1-7). Sometimes they attempt to associate themselves with other persons who are in a similar social condition, or they simply accept the label of resident alien (gēr) that marks them as outsiders (Judg 19:16). Those who do not choose to accept this type of dislocation may seek a form of social repositioning. For instance, Ruth attempts to redefine herself in Naomi's eyes from Moabite widow into the widow of an Israelite (Ruth 1:16-18), someone who wishes to transfer her identity to that of an Israelite culture and community (see Matthews 2006). Once Naomi accepts Ruth's resolution, the narrative then hinges on the uncertainty of the reaction by her audience in Bethlehem and is not resolved until she marries Boaz (Ruth 4:11-12).

2.2. Social Obligation. Each social tie is also associated with recognized social obligations that govern behavior. For instance, Job's concern for his children extends to making sacrifices in their name in order to insure that their obligations are met (Job 1:5). In the complex realm of kinship ties, encompassing both blood and socially constructed relationships, those that are termed righteous are recognized as persons "who deal generously and lend, who conduct their affairs with justice," and their name "will be remembered forever" (Ps 112:5-9). It is therefore understood that "those who are greedy for unjust gain make trouble for their households" (Prov 15:27), and in so doing they damage the ability of the household to establish honorable ties with other households.

3. Reciprocity.

In all of its forms, reciprocity functions as a balancing principle insuring that every act has a social and/or legal consequence (Stansell, 69). As a result, gift-giving (both kin-based and not kin-based), hospitality, social welfare systems and patron-client associations operate according to a recognized protocol within ancient Israelite culture. The questions asked by social scientists focus on the "why" or the logic of the gift, incorporating an economic analysis as well as an examination of social rank and status of the exchange involved (Sahlins, 185-210; Bourdieu). Of course, imbalances can occur if one party chooses to abuse the practice or disregards standards of behavior (i.e., commits a crime or abuses a weaker individual [note Abraham's hard dealings with Ephron in Gen 23]). Forms of generalized reciprocity include charity, gifts given to kin or one's circle of friends, and in no instance requires or expects immediate return or service in exchange. Charity is a form of gift-giving, but it does not carry with it an expectation of return and instead serves as a form of honorable, moral behavior (note Boaz's gift of additional grain to Ruth when she is gleaning in Ruth 2:15-16). In the third century *Sirach goes so far as to state that a person should "show a cheerful face" when giving a gift because the Lord "will repay you sevenfold" (Sir 35:11-13 [cf. Prov 11:25]).

3.1. Symmetrical Exchange. One of the most common forms of reciprocity is a balanced or symmetrical exchange of gifts with little or no delay in the process of exchange (Cook, 81-82). This usually serves as part of the process of building social or political relationships or as a commercial transaction (see the injunctions on fair practices in Prov 20:10-23). The assumption here is that an unbalanced exchange can create measurable tensions and is therefore to be avoided (see the admonitions to maintain honest balances and scales in Prov 11:11; 16:11; Ezek 45:10). In a fair exchange, an enterprising individual like the "capable wife" of Proverbs 31:10-31 can engage in a cottage industry such as the production of linen garments and sashes that she can sell to merchants, thereby strengthening the financial standing of her household and adding honor to its members through her diligence (Prov 31:24-27). The value of honest exchange benefiting both parties is also chronicled in Sirach's list of items that bring no shame, which includes making a profit "from dealing with merchants" (Sir 42:1-5).

3.2. Asymmetrical Exchange. When an imbalanced exchange does occur, this may be the result of asymmetrical reciprocity in which the participants are of unequal social status. Their dealings, like those in symmetrical reciprocity, generally include an exchange of goods and services with the intent of benefiting both parties (patron and client), but they maintain a clear sense that the weaker party is expected to make payment in terms of "homage and loyalty or political support or information" (Stegemann and Stegemann, 36 [see Prov 19:22; 20:6]). There are also situations in which an imbalanced exchange occurs that represents an aggressive tactic to gain favor (Prov 19:6). It also may be designed to shame someone by giving a gift that cannot be financially or socially balanced and thus is used to intimidate or bribe (Ps 26:10) an opponent (Matthews 1999). With this in mind, the wise are cautioned against becoming a borrower and thus a slave to the lender (Prov 22:7; see also Ahiqar, Saying 41.ix:127 in Matthews and Benjamin 2006, 307). Sirach points out the charitable aspects of providing a loan to a neighbor in need but also is clear that repayment may lead to "empty promises" and curses (Sir 29:1-7).

4. Spatiality.

Spatiality examines "lived space" (those places in which human occupations and activities occur) as a means of determining group identity and social boundaries (McNutt, 37). For it is "by acting in space in a particular way [that] the actor is inserted into a particular relation with [his/her society's] ideology" (Cresswell, 17). However, physical space is continuously redefined by human presence and individual interpretation of the ideology of place (Matthews 2003, 12). In dealing with this phenomenon, cultural geographers use the term "landscape" when referring to "the relation between the natural environment and human society" (Rose, 86). In order to decipher the spatial understanding of the ancient Israelites as they viewed or lived in particular places, we can identify the physical places where the Israelites work, worship, transact business, practice and execute legal decisions. These mundane social practices take on different meanings, purposes or intentions depending on where in space and time that they occur and who is performing the action in question. Thus the content or substance of the act (farming, speech, ritual, transaction) derives meaning from the rank, authority or status of the person involved and from the physical and symbolic "space" (including time, place, occasion, setting) involved. It should also be noted, however, that the meanings that can be derived from place often "have more to do with everyday living and doing than with thinking" (Buttimer, 171).

4.1. Rural Social Space. One graphic example of how recurrent patterns of behavior lead to an expansion in the understanding of spatial usage is found in the agricultural practices of ancient Israel. Farmers brought their harvested stalks of grain to a centrally located communal threshing floor (Deut 16:13; Job 5:26). They processed the grain there using a threshing sled to separate the stalks or chaff from the grain (2 Sam 24:22; Job 41:30). This was followed, when the wind was just right (Sir 5:9), by a winnowing and sieving process that eventually resulted in piles of grain arranged around the facility (Ruth 3:2-3). At that point, the threshing floor took on an enhanced social character. Instead of being just a communal place of work, processing grain, it became a place associated with the future plans of the community, embodied in the distribution of their harvest (Borowski, 59-62). And, because of its complex social character, it provides the perfect setting for the negotiation between Ruth and Boaz over her identity and presence in the Bethlehem community (Ruth 3).

4.2. Urban Social Space. Within ancient cities and towns zones of influence, both economic and political, were established based on proximity to market space, entry gates and physical and social elevation within the boundaries (city walls) of the community as a whole (Soja, 65-66). The ability to fill or use particular "social space," therefore, is based on communal expectations that are attached to that "place" (Cresswell, 21-27). This is sometimes based on law (Lev 12:1-4) and sometimes is enforced by tradition or common understanding. For example, there is no law that says that the elders must spend their time sitting in the gate waiting to see if a legal case would be brought before them. Instead, it is clear that they often chose to sit in the gate because it was a place to transact business, share gossip, and demonstrate their status as men of property and influence (note Lot in Gen 19:1, and the "well-served" husband who is "known in the city gates" in Prov 31:23). On a more formal basis, the demonstration of bravery by *Esther in placing herself "in the inner court" of the palace in a spot where the king, "sitting on his royal throne . . . opposite the entrance to the palace" would see her plays on the concentric zones of priority attached to private spaces (Esther 5:1). These are magnified in palaces and temples, where restrictions on entrance magnify as a person passes through these zones to the heart of power.

This article does not, of course, contain a full list of social-scientific concepts and the methods used to analyze them, but it does suggest some avenues for research into the world of ancient Israel. They demonstrate that the examination of social values, customs and "lived experiences" as exemplified in the biblical text are indeed avenues worth exploring.

See also HERMENEUTICS; HONOR AND SHAME;

KINSMAN-0REDEEMER AND LEVIRATE; MARRIAGE AND SEX; WOMEN.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. J. Bahloul, The Architecture of Memory: A Jewish-Muslim Household in Colonial Algeria, 1937-1962, trans. C. du Peloux Ménagé (CSSCA 99; Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1996); P. J. Boda, "A Social-Scientific Reading of Psalm 129," HvTSt 58 (2002) 1401-14; O. Borowski, Agriculture in Iron Age Israel (Winona Lake, IN: Eisenbrauns, 1987); P. Bourdieu, "Marginalia—Some Additional Notes on the Gift," in The Logic of the Gift: Toward an Ethic of Generosity, ed. A. D. Schrift (New York: Routledge, 1997) 231-41; A. Buttimer, "Home, Research, and the Sense of Place," in The Human Experience of Place and Space, ed. A. Buttimer and D. Seamon (London: Croom Helm, 1980) 166-96; C. E. Carter, "A Discipline in Transition: The Contributions of the Social Sciences to the Study of the Hebrew Bible," in Community, Identity, and Ideology: Social Science Approaches to the Hebrew Bible, ed. C. E. Carter and C. L. Meyers (Winona Lake, IN: Eisenbrauns, 1996) 3-36; Z. A. Cook, "Reciprocity—Covenantal Exchange as a Test Case," in Ancient Israel: The Old Testament in Its Social Context, ed. P. F. Esler (Minneapolis: Fortress, 2006) 78-91; R. B. Coote, "Tribalism: Social Organization in the Biblical Israel," in Ancient Israel: The Old Testament in Its Social Context, ed. P. F. Esler (Minneapolis: Fortress, 2006) 35-49; T. Cresswell, In Place, Out of Place: Geography, Ideology, and Transgression (Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 1996); J. H. Elliott, What Is Social-Scientific Criticism? (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1993); P. F. Esler and A. C. Hagedorn, "Social-Scientific Analysis of the Old Testament: A Brief History and Overview," in Ancient Israel: The Old Testament in Its Social Context, ed. P. F. Esler (Minneapolis: Fortress, 2006) 15-32; E. Goode, Deviant Behavior (3rd ed.; Englewood Cliffs, NJ: Prentice-Hall, 1990); G. A. Herion, "The Impact of Modern and Social Scientific Assumptions on the Reconstruction of Israelite History," JSOT 34 (1986) 3-33; A. A. Hoebel, The Law of Primitive Man: A Study in Comparative Legal Dynamics (New York: Atheneum, 1974); L. Jonker, "The Influence of Social Transformation on the Interpretation of the Bible: A Methodological Reflection," Scriptura 72 (2000) 1-15; P. M. McNutt, "'Fathers of the Empty Spaces' and 'Strangers Forever': Social Marginality and the Construction of Space," in Imagining Biblical Worlds: Studies in Spatial, So- cial, and Historical Constructs in Honor of James W. Flanagan, ed. D. M. Gunn and P. M. McNutt (JSOTSup 359; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 2002) 30-50; V. H. Matthews, "The Unwanted Gift: Implications of Obligatory Gift Giving in Ancient Israel," Semeia 87 (1999) 91-104; idem, "Physical Space, Imagined Space, and 'Lived Space' in Ancient Israel," BTB 33 (2003) 12-20; idem, "The Determination of Social Identity in the Story of Ruth," BTB 36 (2006) 49-54; V. H. Matthews and D. C. Benjamin, Social World of Ancient Israel, 1250-587 BCE (Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 1993); idem, Old Testament Parallels: Laws and Stories from the Ancient Near East (3rd ed.; Mahwah, NJ: Paulist, 2006); D. A. Milovanovic, A Primer in the Sociology of Law (2nd ed.; New York: Harrow & Heston, 1994); G. Rose, Feminism and Geography: The Limits of Geographical Knowledge (Minneapolis: University of Minnesota Press, 1993); M. Sahlin, Stone Age Economics (Chicago: Aldine-Atherton, 1972); M. Sneed, "Wisdom and Class: A Review and Critique," JAAR 62 (1994) 651-72; E. W. Soja, Postmodern Geographies: The Reassertion of Space in Critical Social Theory (Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1987); G. Stansell, "The Gift in Ancient Israel," Semeia 87 (1999) 65-90; E. W. Stegemann and W. Stegemann, The Jesus Movement: A Social History of Its First Century (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1999). V. H. Matthews

SOCIOLOGICAL INTERPRETATION. See HERMENEUTICS; SOCIAL-SCIENTIFIC APPROACHES.

SOLOMON

In the OT and in later traditions Solomon is understood to have been the personal exemplar of wisdom within the framework of Israel's covenant with the Lord. Solomon is to wisdom much as Moses is to Torah, and *David to the psalms (Moberly).

1. Solomon's Wisdom
2. Solomon's Folly
3. Conclusion

1. Solomon's Wisdom.

Solomon is established as the exemplar of wisdom in 1 Kings 1—11; 1 Chronicles 28—2 Chronicles 9. Within OT Wisdom literature his name is connected with *Psalms (Pss 72; 127), *Proverbs, *Ecclesiastes and *Song of Songs. Jesus is said to have identified Solomon as an exemplar of wisdom (Mt 12:42; Lk 11:31). Apart from these texts, most references to Solomon in both Testaments speak either of his wealth (1 Kings 14:26; Mt 6:29; Lk 12:27) or his oversight of the construction of the temple (2 Kings 21:7; 24:13; 25:16; 1 Chron 6:10, 32; 18:8; 22:5-7, 17-19; 23:1; 2 Chron 12:9; 33:7; 35:3; Ezra 2:58; Neh 7:60; Acts 7:47). In spite of his introduction of pagan shrines and worship (2 Kings 23:13; Neh 13:26), his reign is depicted as something of a golden age in Israel's history (1 Chron 22:9; 2 Chron 11:17; 30:26; 35:4; Neh 12:45). During the Second Temple period and beyond, works and stories associating Solomon with wisdom multiplied (Duling).

According to 1 Kings, Solomon's wisdom covered, specifically, the domains of politics (1 Kings 1:52-53; 2:6, 9), building (1 Kings 3:1-3; 5—7; 9:10; 10:14-22), dreams and visions (1 Kings 3:5-15; 6:11-13; 9:1-9; 11:9, 11-13), judicial decisions (1 Kings 3:16-28; 5:7, 12), academic and scientific research and literary composition (1 Kings 4:29-34), as well as the ability to solve the most difficult questions. It was his wisdom that attracted the attention of the Queen of Sheba (1 Kings 10:1-22) and others (1 Kings 10:24). Significantly, the final summary of Solomon's life in 1 Kings 11:41-43 makes no mention of his wealth or temple building but rather mentions only his wisdom.

Chronicles, while framing the account of Solomon within an *inclusio that refers to his wisdom, omits what is not relevant to the temple and cult (Dillard; Selman 1994a; 1994b).

1.1. Solomon in the Wisdom Literature. When we turn to the works within the OT wisdom literature that are linked to Solomon's name, we are immediately confronted with some significant changes in focus. Here the wisdom of Solomon is predominantly set in the context of family life—a picture that not only departs significantly from the domains mentioned in Kings and Chronicles but also raises questions, given the picture presented of Solomon's domestic life (1 Kings 3:1; 11:3-8; Neh 13:26). Indeed, his son Rehoboam could be seen as the epitome of the fool of the book of Proverbs, being the son who rejected wisdom (1 Kings 12).

References to Solomon in Psalms 72:1; 127:1; Proverbs 1:1; 10:1; 25:1; Song of Songs 1:1 are most easily understood as ascriptions of authorship. According to 1 Kings 4:32, Solomon wrote 1,005 songs (LXX: five thousand) and "coined" three thousand proverbs. Similarly, 2 Samuel 23:1 links *David with the writing of songs (see Music, Song). Occasionally, titles of this type are used within Psalms in contexts that give additional specific information concerning the circumstances under which the song was composed (e.g., Pss 3; 18; 51 [see also 2 Sam 22:1]). We also have instances of this form used outside the book of Psalms where authorship is clearly ascribed (Hab 3). Critical questions concerning the veracity of such ascriptions turn on matters of historicity, proposed sources, editorial activity and so forth rather than on the nature of the conventional meaning of the idiom (see Psalms 4: Titles).

1.2. A Solomonic “Golden Age.” G. von Rad spoke of Solomon’s reign as a high point in Israelite culture as well as commerce. Less helpful was his attempt to draw a parallel between the Solomonic era and the European “Enlightenment.” Solomon did import into Jerusalem the cults and ideas of the Gentiles, but this did not represent a step into a rationalistic, secular worldview or the product of a naturalistic conception of “wisdom” (Alt; Whybray; Fox). The wisdom associated with Solomon in the OT is consistently one rooted in the *fear and knowledge of the Lord (Prov 1:7), accessed by divine revelation (Prov 2:6; cf. 30:1-6), and maintained by the discipline of the Lord (Prov 3:11-12). It is therefore not merely secular, or the rational product of “the power of the human mind” (contra Fox). It is made manifest in a righteous lifestyle that is faithful to the Lord (Provan; Waltke) in a corrupt and dangerous world.

R. Whybray (133) points out, “No Israelite king other than David (2 Sam 14:20) and Solomon is specifically credited with wisdom in the Old Testament,” nor is any group identified as “the wise” to be found at the court of any Israelite king (noting the lack of the Hebrew definite article in Prov 22:17; 24:23).

Apart from Moses and David, the only named authors of psalms included in the collection are men who, like Solomon, were appointed to office by David (*Asaph, the sons of Korah, Jeduthun). Thus the wisdom of this “golden age” is closely tied to the temple and cult, in keeping with the selective presentation of Solomon’s regime in 1—2 Chronicles.

This correlation can further be seen in the references that connect Solomon to the book of Ecclesiastes (Eccles 1:1, 12-17; 2:12; 12:9-10) and other references in Song of Songs (Song 1:5; 3:9, 11; 8:11-12). The nature of Solomon’s connection with these works, however, is difficult to determine.

1.3. Psalms.

1.3.1. Psalm 72. This psalm title most naturally would be taken to attribute authorship to Solomon, but the location of Psalm 72 immediately before the closing statement to Book 2 of the collection implies that this psalm was understood to be one of “the prayers of David the son of Jesse” (Ps 72:20). Most scholars therefore understand it to be a prayer of David “for Solomon” as Solomon was about to assume the throne. Certain elements in the psalm reflect the concerns of the historical narratives of Solomon’s reign. Although there is no mention of wisdom in either of the psalms bearing his name, there is concern for his ability to make just decisions and specifically to rescue the children of the poor (Ps 72:1-4 [cf. 1 Kings 3:9, 6-28]), for *righteousness and peace to be maintained, and for his rule to extend beyond the bounds of God’s covenant promise to Abraham (cf. 1 Kings 4:21, 24). The kingdom of Sheba is mentioned twice, firstly to call for the king of Sheba to present gifts and bow down to him (Ps 72:10-11) and then specifically for the gold of Sheba to be given to him (Ps 72:15). The language of the psalm recalls the covenants with both Abraham and David (Ps 72:17 [cf. Gen 12:3; 2 Sam 7:9, 13, 16]).

1.3.2. Psalm 127. Psalm 127, in contrast to Psalm 72, is clearly attributed to Solomon and links the building of the temple (Ps 127:1-2) with the building of a family (Ps 127:3-5). These two things being placed in parallel under the ascription to Solomon serves to tie together the two dominant aspects of his place: first, as head of the dynasty that was the house God promised to build for David (2 Sam 7:11), second, as the one who would build the house for the Lord’s name (2 Sam 7:13) in Jerusalem. These two themes are then intricately woven together throughout the writings of the NT both with respect to the person and work of Jesus and in the foundation and growth of the new-covenant church as both bride and temple.

1.4. Proverbs. The heading to the book of Proverbs clearly was intended to ascribe the entire work to Solomon, if not as the originator of every saying, at least as the one who gathered them together. Further notices throughout the book (Prov 10:1; 25:1; 24:23; 30:1; 31:1) indicate that the work is a collection. Part of this collection was “copied” (not “collected” [NLT]) by “the men of Hezekiah” (Prov 25:1). It is widely recognized that much of this teaching in similar content and form can be found in the extant literature of the ancient Near East dating more than a millennium before Solomon’s era. The extensive assertion of wisdom’s origins as being with the Lord God of Israel, the creator and judge of all humankind, serves both to domesticate the wisdom of the nations to him and to give the work a polemical function. In this the work also exemplifies the principle advanced in the prologue depicting “the wise” as men who will “listen and add to their learning . . . for understanding proverbs and parables, the sayings and riddles of the wise” (Prov 1:5-6) and so complements the accounts of Solomon’s throne as the place to which foreign rulers would come who seek wisdom.

Proverbs and Ecclesiastes share the setting of a father teaching wisdom to his son (Prov 1—9; 31:2; Eccles 12:12). T. Longman (2001) notes that the sequence of books in the Hebrew order of the Kethubim, locating the book of *Ruth between Proverbs and Song of Songs, appears to be an intentional linking of texts that focus on the ideal wife, this theme forming an inclusio in Proverbs. The reference to the wisdom of King *Lemuel as coming from his mother (Prov 31:1) forms its own inclusio with *Woman Wisdom (Prov 1:20).

Proverbs is concerned to equip one to deal with the realities of an unrighteous and corrupt world. It therefore seeks to ensure that the faithful are not also the naïve. Jesus’ instruction to his disciples to “be as crafty as the snakes and as pure as the doves” (Mt 10:16, my translation) well summarizes the concerns of the book. Thus Solomon’s apostasy would be seen, in the categories of the Proverbs, as foolishness, not just weakness or wickedness.

1.5. Song of Songs. The title of “Song of Songs” (Song 1:1) indicates that this, the “Best Song,” was written by Solomon. As in the case of Proverbs 1:1, we might understand authorship here to include editorial collection of other people’s work into an anthology. There is nothing in the text to support, and much that would militate against, understanding the bridegroom of these songs to be Solomon himself (see discussion in Murphy; Longman 2001). As songs, these do not purport to be historical accounts and could best be described as inspired and didactic fantasy.

The most significant difficulty with respect to Solomonic authorship comes from the picture of Solomon’s marital situation as presented in the Historical Books. Certainly, given the description and evaluation of Solomon’s marriages and family life as presented in 1 Kings 3:1; 11:1-8; Nehemiah 13:26, one would not expect Solomon to be the source of any sound wisdom pertaining to the kind of marital relationship that had the sanction of Israel’s covenant Lord (see Marriage and Sex).

The erotic nature of this work has produced its own challenges for interpreters. At the most challenging point, the unpleasant reality must be faced that a man reputed to have had a thousand *women in his harem is here credited with composing a song or collection of songs depicting erotic love and making no mention of God. Any understanding of wisdom as “skill” independent of covenant faithfulness and piety is then at liberty to take what may fairly be called a cynical approach to this work (see Clines, cited in Longman 2001, 8). Such an understanding requires that the work first be considered apart from its canonical context, and then the question is raised, with greater intensity, as to how it could have found and maintained a place in that context. Thus the reader, depending on his or her underlying assumptions and values, could either take a cynical view of the work or could imagine Solomon as a man who, by the reality of his errors, both understood the ideal and was able to describe and commend its virtues to others. The reader is left to speculate and to imagine the various possibilities that may connect Solomon with such a work.

It is appropriate at this point to make the connection between this question and the inherent dilemma presented by “wisdom” literature, particularly in its common expression in the form of the māšāl (proverb, riddle, parable). Solomon was renowned for his ability to solve problems. It is in the nature of such literature to set forth problems but not always to solve them, except by implication. T. Polk (573) notes, with respect to the function of the māšāl, “Telling a parable is a matter of presenting to others an imaginatively shaped paradigm (a model of reality, a description of experience) and asking that they recognize it as somehow true. From the point of view of the parable, the readers’ determination toward it, whatever their responses, identifies their place in the parable's world, and hence their relation to its truth. In our judgments toward the parable, the parable judges us." One wonders, then, whether "the Song of Songs that is Solomon's" was not intended to have such a function.

1.6. Ecclesiastes. Ecclesiastes similarly poses some interesting difficulties in its connection with the name and person of Solomon. Although Solomon is not named either as the author or as one of the characters in the narrative, the frame author does indulge in a very deliberate presentation of clues that are most easily recognized as identifying Solomon as the source of the wisdom under consideration (see Frame Narrative).

The main figure in the book is identified by a coded title: *"Qohelet." The word means literally "the one who calls or assembles." Longman (1998, 2) notes a possible connection with Solomon's role in assembling Israel as recorded in 1 Kings 8:1-2, 14, 22, 55. The title may be used here as something of a nickname such as critics might use of a head of state, although the NIV's translation, "teacher," seems to import meaning beyond the semantic range of the term.

He is "son of David, king in Jerusalem" (Eccles 1:1). Certainly, the subsequent descriptions make specific connections with the account of Solomon in 1 Kings (Eccles 1:12-13, 16; 2:4-16; 12:9-10). Although none of these references need refer only to Solomon, and the reference to kings (plural) "who ruled in Jerusalem before me" seems strange, the specific links to Qohelet's devotion to wisdom are sufficient to make Solomon the most obvious candidate.

Use of the title "Son of David" (Eccles 1:1) makes this identification far stronger than might first appear. Except for the references to Amnon and Absalom in 2 Samuel 13:1, this title is found elsewhere in the OT only to refer to Solomon (1 Chron 29:22; 2 Chron 1:1; 13:6; 30:26; 35:3; Prov 1:1). The title is not used of anyone past the first generation of David's sons, and of these, only Solomon was king in Jerusalem. In the context of a book that seems to be deliberately hinting at the identity of Qohelet, it is difficult to see this reference as the only exception. Any other possibility would place these hints in the domain of the insoluble, and one would then wonder at the purpose of the author in offering them.

The connection between Qohelet and Solomon does not imply Solomonic authorship of the material attributed to Qohelet. Clearly, the frame author is reflecting on the life and work of Qohelet and drawing from this material his own conclusions that are then conveyed to his son (Eccles 12:9-14). In framing the work as a father-son wisdom lesson, the frame author may have been deliberately mimicking the father-son scenario of Proverbs 1—9 as a polemical device.

While affirming the value of the many proverbs and sayings, the frame author is ultimately highly critical of Qohelet/Solomon as a wisdom figure. Pointedly, he reminds his son that real wisdom is a gift of "one Shepherd," and that, unlike Qohelet, one needs to "fear God and keep his commandments" because ultimately everything, including one's wisdom, must be brought before the judgment of God.

2. Solomon's Folly.

In the light of the criticism of Solomon found in Ecclesiastes, 1 Kings and Nehemiah, we must face the question as to how the man so closely identified with wisdom could have ended his days in such *folly.

Here we are confronted with one of the very remarkable characteristics of the OT portrayal of significant figures in the history of redemption. Across a range of centuries, sources, authors and works, a consistent pattern in the OT canonical documents may be observed. Nearly all of the people who play significant parts in the accomplishment of God's redemptive and revelatory purposes—for example, Noah, Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, Judah, David, Solomon, Gideon, Samson or even a figure such as *Esther—are presented as people who are, by the standards of the OT *law, seriously, if not fatally, flawed in their life and character. There is almost a contrived inconsistency between their positive contribution to God's plans and purposes and their failures in their personal lives. Significantly, the flaws in their characters are usually or most prominently located in the domain of family life.

In this tradition, while Solomon stands out most brightly as the one who serves to bring Israel to the climax of their national history as the chosen people of God, he is also the most prominent example of personal and public unfaithfulness. The fact that this is such a consistent pattern throughout the OT must be taken into account in any attempt to interpret both the man and the texts associated with his name.

It may be helpful to draw a parallel between our understanding of Samson and Solomon in this regard. Given the accounts of his feats of physical strength, Samson is commonly depicted as a figure that one might associate with Hercules, and yet the point of the narrative is that his strength was a manifestation of the Spirit of God working in and through him. When he chose to be unfaithful with Delilah, the Spirit of God left him, and he was as weak as any other person. Given the extensive role that Solomon plays as a person of wisdom across a range of OT texts, we might be excused for treating his words in 1 Kings 3:7, "I am only a little child and do not know how to carry out my duties" (NIV), as a conventional expression of false modesty. Nevertheless, the author of the Kings narrative stresses the fact that Solomon's wisdom was a gift of God. This reality is also a theme in Proverbs and forms the conclusion of the polemic of Ecclesiastes (Eccles 12:13-14).

3. Conclusion.

The overall impression of Solomon's wisdom is that it is a gift of grace given by God to an inadequate and naturally foolish and dysfunctional man, a man raised in privilege who lived without restraints, and who ultimately failed to live up to his calling. He, along with the rest of the persons who are used as teaching models in the OT (see 1 Cor 10:6, 11), leaves the reader longing for something and someone better. The juxtaposition in OT texts of Solomon's wisdom with Torah, throne and temple was a stimulus for later and varied eschatological developments within Judaism. In such a context, the NT writers presented Jesus as that man who is "greater" than Solomon (Mt 12:42; Lk 11:31) and such other exemplars (Mt 12:41; John 4:12-14; 8:53-58; Heb 3:3), precisely because there was no such discontinuity between his nature and conduct as a man and his endowment by the Holy Spirit.

See also ECCLESIASTES 1: BOOK OF; PROVERBS 1: BOOK OF; QOHELET; SONG OF SONGS 1: BOOK OF; WISDOM OF SOLOMON.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. A. Alt, "Die Weisheit Salomos," TLZ 76 (1951) 139-44; ET, "Solomonic Wisdom," in Studies in Ancient Israelite Wisdom, ed. J. L. Crenshaw (New York: KTAV, 1976) 102-12; R. B. Dillard, 2 Chronicles (WBC 15; Waco, TX: Word, 1987); D. C. Duling, "Solomon, Exor-cism, and the Son of David," HTR 68 (1975) 235-52; M. V. Fox, Proverbs 1-9 (AB 18A; New York: Doubleday, 2000); A. Lemaire, "Wisdom in Solomonic Historiography," in Wisdom in Ancient Israel: Essays in Honour of J. A. Emerton, ed. J. Day, R. P. Gordon and H. G. M. Williamson (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1995) 106-18; T. Longman III, The Book of Ecclesiastes (NICOT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1998); idem, Song of Songs (NICOT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2001); R. W. L. Moberly, "Solomon and Job: Divine Wisdom in Human Life," in Where Shall Wisdom Be Found? Wisdom in the Bible, the Church and the Contemporary World, ed. S. C. Barton (Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1999) 3-17; R. E. Murphy, The Song of Songs (Hermeneia; Minneapolis: Fortress, 1990); K. I. Parker, "Solomon as Philosopher King? The Nexus of Law and Wisdom in 1 Kings 1-11" JSOT 53 (1992) 75-91; T. Polk, "Paradigms, Parables, and Meshalim: On Reading the Mashal in Scripture," CBQ 45 (1983) 564-83; I. W. Provan, "On 'Seeing' the Trees While Missing the Forest: The Wisdom of Characters and Readers in 2 Samuel and 1 Kings," in In Search of True Wisdom: Essays in Old Testament Interpretation in Honor of Ronald E. Clements, ed. E. Ball (JSOTSup 300; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1999) 153-73; M. J. Selman, 1 Chronicles (TOTC; Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 1994a); idem, 2 Chronicles (TOTC; Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 1994b); G. von Rad, "The Beginnings of Historical Writing in Ancient Israel," in The Problem of the Hexateuch, and Other Essays (Edinburgh: Oliver & Boyd, 1966 [1944]) 166-204; B. K. Waltke, The Book of Proverbs (2 vols.; NICOT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2004); R. N. Whybray, "The Sage in the Israelite Court," in The Sage in Israel and the Ancient Near East, ed. J. G. Gammie and L. G. Perdue (Winona Lake, IN: Eisenbrauns, 1990) 133-39; G. H. Wilson, "The Use of Royal Psalms at the 'Seams' of the Hebrew Psalter," JSOT 35 (1986) 85-94.

D. R. Jackson

SONG. See MUSIC, SONG.

SONG OF SONGS 1: BOOK OF

Song of Songs is one of a number of wisdom (or sapiential) books of the OT. It is meant to be read along with *Proverbs, *Job and *Ecclesiastes. Each of these three books explores God's wisdom in various ways, as does Song of Song. Song of Songs presents to the reader the highs and lows of the experience of love—everything from lovesickness and warnings to the revelry of marital bliss. Read canonically, this love points away from itself to its Creator, who is intimately at issue in matters sexual (for a canonical reading, see 4 below).

1. Introduction
2. Authorship and Date
3. History of Interpretation
4. Why the Song of Songs Is in the Bible
5. Outline

1. Introduction.

1.1. Interpretative Issues. S. Freehof suggests that the whole book is a dream. M. Sadgrove reads it as a wisdom book, finding in it an exploration of the mystery of love comparable to *Job exploring the mystery of suffering, and *Ecclesiastes the mystery of existence. P. Tribble uses the garden of Eden as the key to understanding Song of Songs—a celebration of humanity created male and female. But a new reader to Song of Songs immediately experiences an onslaught of images that blur and reel from one to the next without an obvious organizing principle. It leaves one's head spinning. One wonders if there is any order to it all, or if a story is being told with identifiable scenes, characters, plot or story line. To the novice reader, the book is a confusing riddle.

In addition, the imagery is enigmatic. Why is the girl's nose compared to a tall tower (Song 7:4)? Is this meant to be funny? Much of the material in the book is blatantly sexual and erotic, as, for example, "Your stature is like that of the palm, and your breasts like clusters of fruit. I said, 'I will climb the palm tree; I will take hold of its fruit.' May your breasts be like the clusters of the vine, the fragrance of your breath like apples" (Song 7:7-8 NIV).

Here the reader is treated in poetic form to the thoughts and intentions of the boy who is sexually interested in the girl. He desires to "climb" her and "lay hold of" her breasts. Why is material of this sort in the Bible? And if it is intended to arouse interest in sexual matters, why are many of the images (such as the girl's nose compared with a tower) seemingly so uncomplimentary? To many, Song of Songs remains hopelessly inaccessible.

1.2. Where Is God? In addition to the questions already raised, the reader may also expect the text to reveal something about the character and mighty works of God. After all, the Bible is a religious book, treating sacred matters of faith. But Song of Songs seems uninterested in God, his covenant with Israel or any of the usual critical issues in the OT. This book of the Bible seemingly defies Paul's assertion that "all Scripture is profitable for reproof, correction and training in righteousness" (2 Tim 3:16-17). Instead, it treats human sexuality and passion, but without noting children or clearly requiring *marriage as a prerequisite. And the girl's father is not even mentioned.

This absence of what one naturally expects from a biblical book creates tension for the reader. Since Song of Songs is included in the *canon, it "lives" in a context seemingly at odds with its own unique message and viewpoint. This tension (a heavenly book that celebrates quite earthly material) forces the reader to look for meaning beyond the obvious. In a word, this calls for interpretation.

1.3. The Need for Interpretation. Christians often approach the Bible expecting every part to be about salvation and Christ, as NT books assert (Mt 5:17; Lk 24:27; 2 Cor 1:20). But Song of Songs seems completely uninterested in salvation. How, then, can it point to the Savior? Is it an allegory of the covenanted love relationship between God and Israel? It does not read like such an allegory. For example, the girl is usually more aggressive in her pursuit than the boy, running out into the streets to seek him. Does this imply that the girl represents the Lord, and the boy represents Israel? Although this conclusion may seem bizarre, it is the kind of unavoidable confusion entailed when Song of Songs is read allegorically. After all, modern-day churches sing the hymn "Rose of Sharon" about Jesus, whereas in Song of Songs the flower celebrates the girl. If the boy allegorically represents God, then who is his mother (Song 8:5)? Does Song of Songs 5:10-16 really describe the *Messiah, or even God, from head to foot (Loewe)? If not, then where will the reader find God in Song of Songs; why is this book in the Bible (on this issue, see 4 below)?

After examining issues of authorship and date for Song of Songs, we will take a brief overview of the history of interpretation—how Jewish and Christian interpreters have sought to resolve these tensions and bring clarity to its many images and poems. This is followed by a discussion of the theological implications of the modern-day scholarly consensus of answers, such as it is.

2. Authorship and Date.

The dating of Song of Songs is complex because the book has some features that appear late and others that seem early or Solomonic. Scholars have argued for completion dates ranging from the time of *Solomon to the third century BC.

2.1. Solomon. The title associates Song of Songs with the name of Solomon and literally reads, “The Song of Songs which is to Solomon.” But in the book the institution of the harem is critiqued. This calls into question Solomon’s reputation and casts him in a bad light. For example, Song of Songs 6:8-10 unfavorably compares the bloated harem with the singular charms of one unique young woman. Hers is an undiminished glory, celestial in proportions, outshining his many wives and concubines. Another example is near the close of the book, where the harem is a “vineyard” that has become a bureaucratic business, again unenviable to those enjoying a single woman (Song 8:11-12). Solomon is not an active character anywhere in the book but rather a foil against which the true characters (the boy and girl) interact and pursue love. Thus Solomon may not have personally penned any of the actual poems of Song of Songs. Surely he did not create the book to undermine his own interests and reputation.

On the other hand, love lyrics that predate Solomon and have very similar features to Song of Songs have been discovered in various locales, most notably Egypt (Fox). Song of Songs in some ways seems cut from the same cloth as these. Thus it is patent that Solomon could have produced much of the book, and that songs like Song of Songs (in many ways) did in fact exist in his time. In addition to the Egyptian materials, there are Mesopotamian, Tamil and Canaanite texts that bear some affinity with Song of Songs and reach as far back as the Bronze Age (Pope; Meek 1922-1923; Rabin). A Solomonic date is generally consistent with ancient Near Eastern evidence.

2.2. Evidence from Hebrew. It is precarious to try to date a biblical book from its particular brand of Hebrew and select vocabulary (see Hebrew Language). An example of this is seen in how Song of Songs’s use of the prefix še- to denote the relative pronoun has been used to argue both for a late date (Harman; Pope) and for an early date (Rabin). It is possible that what might be mistaken for a “datable” characteristic is actually an idiosyncratic dialect, the by-product of a place, not a time. However, there are some words that do in fact suggest a late date. For example, in Song of Songs 4:13 the Persian word pardes (“paradise”) is found, which suggests a date from the Persian period. Yet there are few of these, and no Greek loan words.

2.3. Conclusion. As usual with biblical books, Song of Songs exhibits some features that appear to be early and others that appear to be late. We must keep in mind that even if one adopts the traditional view that Solomon authored all or part of the book, it was the property of literate *scribes who copied and transmitted it from generation to generation. Very late was the stage when their task was merely to make commentary and reproduce as accurately as possible the “original.” Before then, they enjoyed freedom to be creative in reworking and formatting their texts. These copyists lived through very different times, faced various spiritual struggles over the years, were immersed in cultures of great diversity, and even spoke in different languages. Although the essential core of Song of Songs originally was intended to answer a spiritual need at some point in time (perhaps the time of Solomon), as the centuries passed, these needs changed, and perhaps so did Song of Songs to some extent, until it finally solidified into the form known today in the MT.

3. History of Interpretation.

It has been common in the history of interpretation to imagine that Song of Songs is about the covenanted love between God and Israel (see Song of Songs 3: History of Interpretation). After all, the prophets conceptualized this covenant as a marriage. Hosea was told to marry Gomer, and the dysfunctional couple became a picture of what it was like for the Lord to love his wayward people (Hos 1–3). In the light of these other texts, it is easy to follow an argument that allegorically reads Song of Songs as speaking of God and his people.

Yet if Song of Songs were found in any other forum than the biblical canon, it would be universally recognized as a collection of love poems that revel in a man and woman’s physical passion and lovemaking. Many such lyrics have been discovered that date from about the time of Solomon, and no one reads them as allegories of anything. They are simply love songs, akin to romantic music that one might hear in modern culture today.

Thus a tension exists between what Song of Songs is and how it functions in a religious book. We now turn to various ways of resolving this tension in the history of interpretation (on why the book is in the Bible at all, see 4 below).

3.1. Earliest Hints. The Old Greek translation of Song of Songs presents a more or less uninterpreted and untampered rendering. Some difficult words, such as the place name “Amana” (ʿamānā) in Song of Songs 4:8, are rendered in terms that reveal spiritual values—in this case, “faith.” But the almost complete absence of this sort of interpretation is evidence that the translators did not read the text in general as a repository of these same spiritual virtues. In other words, “faith” is unabashedly found in the text where the Hebrew word seems to warrant it, yet this kind of warrant occurs quite infrequently. The great bulk of the text is woodenly glossed without being transformed into a series of allegorical or metaphorical expressions of theology. Thus, Song of Songs seems to have been understood in its literal sense by the Old Greek translators in the centuries following the close of the Hebrew canon.

The Talmud records an ancient tradition (perhaps c. AD 100) that depicts Rabbi Aqiba distressed and angry because the Jews of his day were singing Song of Songs for entertainment while wining and dining (b. Sanh. 101a). Of course, in these cases the revelers would be singing not about the relationship between God and Israel but rather of much earthier subject matter. The tension felt by Aqiba and later Christians between Song of Song’s sexual content and its placement in the Bible was not an issue for these revelers. The talmudic notation also demonstrates that early medieval rabbis already were interpreting the book as being about something other than human sexuality.

Of course, if Song of Songs had been discovered written on a pottery shard in an excavated mound by an archeologist, it would have been immediately and universally recognized as an erotic love song treating sexuality between human paramours. This observation alone goes a long way toward establishing the genre of the book and thus how to read it. A number of ancient love songs of just this sort have been discovered, dating to about the time of Solomon. One must conclude that Song of Songs as originally understood was regarded as a celebration of love and sex, and the propensity to read it as an allegory of spiritual things was a late innovation in its history. The tension between its sexual content and religious setting simply was not felt in earliest times. The book was not about God and Israel, or about Christ and the church; rather, it was about any man and woman in love, without God being explicitly in view. It is this fact that prompted the later rereadings of the book.

3.2. Allegory: Read in Context of Scripture.

3.2.1. Why Allegory? Long before the conversion of pagans throughout the ancient world to Christianity, many of them had already learned to read their own scriptures (e.g., the Iliad and the Odyssey) in an allegorical sense. Much in the Greek poets was deemed unworthy of high philosophical ideals and demeaning to true religion. The poets wrote of humans causing injury to gods in earthly battles, of the cannibalistic Cyclopes (beloved son of blue-maned Poseidon), of crooked-minded Kronos emasculating his father, of Ares (bane of all humankind, crusted with blood, breacher of walls), and so on. These stories were embarrassing in the face of philosophical ideals and religious scruples. Thus, a technique of reinterpreting the old stories as allegories with a higher meaning was developed to help alleviate the cognitive dissonance that such unworthy descriptions of the gods produced.

The Christians of antiquity inherited the philosophical technique of interpreting difficult passages as pointing away from themselves to a profound and virtuous meaning. One example of this is seen in the ancient Christian interpreter Origen. When he approached any text, he looked for misrepresentations of reality, unbelievable events, distortions or mistakes, heresy, immorality, contradictions, absurdities and statements about biblical figures that he felt should apply only to Christ. He understood these and other observations to be unerring clues from God that the text was not meant to be taken at face value, but rather that a “spiritual” reading was intended. Thus, problems in the Bible would in fact be considered mistakes or errors if left to be understood merely in the literal sense. But the tension between the Bible being God’s word and what the text actually says was resolved through allegorizing it, thereby bringing it into line with the rest of Scripture. This method also characterized Jewish interpretation.

3.2.2. The Context of Scripture. Any part of the Bible was read in the context of the whole, and the whole counsel of God in Scripture was the context in which any one part was read. For example, Song of Songs does not explicitly speak of God, the worshiping soul, salvation, the history of Israel or any religious matters. This is a problem because the Bible as a whole is a holy book. Within this book various observations may be made. First, Hosea and other prophets used the metaphor of marriage to describe the relationship between God and Israel; in fact, at times in Hosea this metaphor is explored in a quite earthy fashion. Second, the one other love song in the Bible (Ps 45) is cited in Hebrews 1:8 and read there as speaking of Christ. This naturally would lead a reader with a penchant for allegory to Song of Songs. Third, the Old Greek version of Song of Songs often translated the Hebrew term for sexual love as agapē. This word had a sexual use in the Old Greek, but not so in the NT. When Amnon raped his sister Tamar, the word used for his feelings of “love” for her is agapē in the Old Greek (2 Sam 13:1). But in the NT agapē is almost a technical word that denotes a selfless, sacrificial love. It is not hard to imagine that when a reader with the eyes of an allegorist encountered agapē in Song of Songs, nonsexual meanings suggested themselves. This is how allegorists handle every text of the Bible, not only the Song of Songs.

The allegorical approach more or less typified how Song of Songs was handled throughout the patristic and medieval eras (c. AD 500-1500), and this continued through the Reformation and post-Reformation periods. Some who read it in a literal fashion questioned why it was part of the Bible at all. After all, removing it from the Bible is one way of resolving the tension. O. Keel (7) argues along these lines to conclude that Song of Songs must have “achieved canonical status in its ‘profane’ sense.”

“Tell me, O thou whom my soul loveth, where thou feedest, where thou makest thy flock to rest at noon” (Song 1:7 KJV). As a typical Puritan allegorist, H. Aisworth (c. 1612) sees here the church’s request to Christ for instruction in the administration of his kingdom on earth; “As he formerly made her partaker of his heavenly calling, so he would direct her further in to the place where, and manner how, he feedeth his flock.” Two centuries later, J. Gill (83) preserved this interpretation of Song of Songs 2:7: “The Church says not to stir up my love, which is applicable to Christ, the charge that this love should not be stirred up but with pleasure agrees with Christ, who is endued with sovereignty, and ought to be at his own liberty to stay with or remove from his people when he pleases.” In modern times the allegorical method persists (e.g., Daniélou; Leahy; Tournay; Fountain).

“Historical allegories” read Song of Songs as if it were about the love between God and Israel (or Christ and the church); “philosophical/mystical allegories” read the book as being “about the communion between God and the individual soul” (Longman, 26). For example, note what some interpreters have done with Song of Songs 1:6: “Do not stare at me because I am dark, because I am darkened by the sun. My mother’s sons were angry with me and made me take care of the vineyards; my own vineyard I have neglected” (NIV).

B. Kamel notes that the girl thinks of herself as “very dark” due to her sin, but God sees only beauty. “The beauty of human nature captivates the heart of God, it is all black in its nature and character but God has washed it in baptism, thus the beauty in us is God’s work, ‘We will make for you ornaments of gold studded with silver’” (Kamel, 14). Contrast this with the comment on the same verse by J. Sizoo (150), who calls her cry “I tended other’s vineyards, but not my own!” a “devastating criticism of those who in seeking to minister to others neglect to keep alive in their own souls the fires of faith.” Sizoo also notes that Song of Songs features a garden, and the girl calls the north and south winds to blow upon it (Song 4:16). The southern wind is spring, and this makes the garden flourish; the northern is winter, representing loneliness and disillusionment. Sizoo then references philosophers and poets who have benefited by hardship. The elements in Song of Songs thus interpreted represent not God’s relationship with his people, but ideals, principles to live by, philosophical concepts.

All of these allegorical approaches generally can be found echoed in ancient Christian and Jewish apologists (Longman, 26-30). Both communities of faith needed to explain the presence of Song of Songs in their holy book. They did not invent allegory; they simply used it as an interpretative technique perfectly acceptable in their day. And until recently allegory was the traditional method of treating Song of Songs.

3.2.3. The Ultimate Failure of Allegory. “Allegory involves so much interpretative ambition that it can create the impression that the real source of meaning is in the reader’s imagination and not in the text itself” (O’Keefe and Reno, 90), being revelatory of the interpreter’s genius rather than the Scripture. With allegory, the text becomes whatever the interpreter wants it to become, and no two allegorists agree on an interpretation (note the readings of Song 1:6 in 3.2.2). Allegory does not elucidate the text’s meaning but rather obscures it. Origen argued thus: one of the midwives whom Pharaoh commanded to kill the Hebrew infants was named Puah; “Puah” means “modest” or “blushing”; blushing is the color red; red is the shed blood of Christ. Allegorization was one technique that Christian interpreters used to make the text point to Christ (Fairbairn). But each step leads further and further from the text itself, the end result having virtually no connection with it. M. Silva (74) likens allegory with arbitrariness: “The most powerful argument against the allegorical method is that it seems to allow for no controls. In effect, anyone can see any meaning he or she wishes to see in any passage.”

The Protestant Reformers, trying to test church traditions against Scripture, were suspicious of impromptu interpretations such as this and abandoned allegorical interpretation for most texts. Without controls, it is impossible to determine the relative worth of variant interpretations. Illuminating the text thus necessitates staying as close as possible to what it actually says and not launching off into flights of theological fancy. Song of Songs was perhaps the last bastion of allegorical reading, until the discovery of ancient love lyrics put to rest any remaining doubts as to its subject matter.

But to reject allegory is to reject a long-standing technique that tried to resolve tension between Song of Song’s literal sense and the Bible’s religious character. If not allegory, then what? How else might the book be read so that it produces a meaning consonant with the expectations of a reader of Scripture? What, then, does Song of Songs have to say to a community of faith?

3.3. Seeking to Identify Song of Song’s Genre.

Various alternative ways of reading Song of Songs were employed in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries. Here we briefly recount some of them.

3.3.1. Drama. One nonallegorical way of regarding Song of Songs is to read it as an ancient sample of performance art, a drama meant for the stage. Hypotheses were advanced to discover a plot, identify the characters, reverse-engineer scenes and acts and chorus lines, and so on. The context for this reading was not the Bible (which has no other plays) but rather a generic context of the love story.

F. Delitzsch popularized the two-character romance, having discerned six acts, each with two scenes. The two characters were the man and woman. Here is a literalistic reading of Song of Songs (Delitzsch was not looking for a higher, spiritual meaning) that put on display certain moral virtues, such as single-minded devotion to one’s lover. The book becomes, then, a sort of parable whereby the overall virtue can be deftly transferred into the sphere of the religious, without every detail being pressed into artificial service as in allegory.

The dramatic approach spawned many permutations. Delitzsch argued against other dramatists such as G. H. A. von Ewald, who envisioned a three-character drama. Von Ewald found five acts, and the overall storyline treats the lecherous King Solomon attempting to woo the simple but beautiful shepherdess away from her true love. S. R. Driver later popularized the three-character approach, finding a serious exploration of the moral issues of fidelity in the face of great temptation there, which again easily dovetails as a metaphor for the Israelite’s call to be faithful to God in the face of idols. I. Provan (246) reads Song of Songs as a “stirring tale of fidelity to first love in the face of power, coercion, and all the temptations of the royal court.”

Although the dramatic approach has some more recent proponents (e.g., Seerveld; Glickman; Dillow; Provan), it is doomed to be unpersuasive. This is so because the dramatic approach depends upon the correct identification of the storyline for its meaning. As with allegory, no two dramatists agree on the cues for the performance. Every scholar has a different set of scenes, acts, and so on. They cannot even agree on the number of characters or on what the overall plot is. The various theories cancel each other out. In addition, it is doubtful that a story such as a romantic novel or morality play existed in antiquity.

3.3.2. Syrian Weddings. In addition to reading Song of Songs in the generic context as a drama, Delitzsch suggested a traditional wedding ceremony as an alternative provenance. Parts of the book are similar to practices today in Arabic villages that might preserve ancient forms. The placement of Song of Songs in this context was influential in the early part of the twentieth century, but modern-day scholarship has moved away from this stance because of ancient Near Eastern cognate materials deemed more relevant. A number of ancient poetical forms have been identified as possible original settings for Song of Songs. Three will be presented here (3.3.3-5 below).

3.3.3. Tamil Love Poetry. C. Rabin suggests that Song of Songs reflects the high point of Israelite trade with South Arabia and South India and is cut from the same cloth as Tamil (Akam) poetry. The atmosphere of expensive spices and perfumes finds its provenance not among shepherds but rather among merchants who travel between the source of these and Jerusalem. Nard, myrrh and cinnamon are Indian products. This incense created the “pillars of smoke” seen on the caravan from afar (Song 3:6). This trade did not necessarily flourish only in Solomon’s era but perhaps also in the days of Hezekiah or Josiah (Brenner 1983).

Although there are many parallels between Song of Songs and Tamil love poetry, there are also many differences. For example, the dialogues in Song of Songs between the boy and girl are lacking in the comparable literature. Song of Songs does not follow many of the poetic conventions of the Tamil poetry. In the Tamil poems the girl is not described in detail in linear fashion, a form important in Song of Songs (the “wasf”*). Perhaps most importantly, the Tamil poems clearly and expressly have marriage in view as the culmination of love, while for the most part Song of Songs avoids making this explicit (Mariaselvam). Comparing Song of Songs with Egyptian and Tamil poetry, H. Fisch (85) notes, “But when all the parallels have been noted, the Song really stands out as unique. It touches heights and depths that are unknown in love poetry of the ancient Middle East, indeed the love poetry of any time.”

The comparison with Tamil poetry has not generated nearly as much interest as two other generic contexts: the ancient fertility cult and Egyptian love lyrics, to which we now turn.

3.3.4. Ancient Fertility Cult. Like other nations, ancient Israel worshiped many gods and participated in the cultic rites of the Canaanites and the Babylonians. For example, the prophets condemned the observance of the marzēah feast (Jer 16:5; Amos 6:7). This was a feast of drunkenness meant to affirm life over death (Wittenberg). Although this feast was condemned by the prophets, M. Pope read Song of Songs in light of it and other cultic acts. The key verse is Song of Songs 8:6, which sets love over against death. According to this theory, Song of Songs is what remains (having been purged and rewritten by Yahwist scribes in later years) of an originally religious text, part of a liturgy used in pagan worship. He cites as examples the wine house where the feast was held (Song 2:4), the spices used for burial (Song 5:1), the black maiden who originally was the moon goddess (Song 1:5), and the recounting of Ishtar’s search through the underworld for her lover (Song 5:5-7). Pope concludes that Song of Songs once was a religious text that celebrated divine love between god and goddess. Of course, having a religious provenance would help to explain its inclusion with other religious texts—the Bible. Thus, the present context of Song of Songs as religious literature is actually offered as evidence that it was once used as part of a fertility ritual.

The major difficulty with this is that the extant Song of Songs does not treat divine love at all but rather treats love that is quite earthly. The liturgical theory postulates that the sacred elements have been edited out. In the words of T. Meek (95), “The transforming influence of later Yahwism has almost completely obliterated the elements of the dying and rising god, the sacred marriage, and the place of the king in the rites.”

The tension between the present Song of Songs and its place in sacred Scripture is quite similar to the tension between Song of Songs and its placement among ancient religious texts: it just does not seem to fit. One final generic context has been proposed that has the advantage of not being in tension with the Song: ancient Egyptian love lyrics.

3.3.5. Egyptian Love Lyrics. Lyrics dating from one hundred to three hundred years before Solomon are the most similar literature discovered so far to the present Song of Songs. They treat love between humans, not gods. They are more or less secular. In addition, they are small and do not add up to an overall narrative. They are not meant to be performed on stage. Song of Songs seems cut from the same cloth as these, without having to hypothesize a past where Song of Songs was more religious in character. For example, compare M. Fox's translation of selected lyrics with Song of Songs (RSV) in Table 1.

As can be readily observed in these examples, the Egyptian material seems consonant with Song of Songs. In fact, it is more so than any of the other contexts thus far explored by modern scholarship. Thus there is extant material that bears remarkable likeness to Song of Songs, that is secular, and that even can be dated to the Solomonic era, from which a number of conclusions can be drawn regarding the nature of the biblical Song of Songs. In light of this, a consensus regarding Song of Songs has emerged, although it is not universally held.

3.3.6. Consensus. The most recent and best commentaries approach Song of Songs as an anthology of individual love lyrics that do not comprise an overall storyline with plot and so forth, but that instead explore one or another aspect of love as in the Egyptian model (e.g., Fox; Murphy; Exum; Longman; Schwab 1997; 2002; Forthcoming; Keel). Thus Song of Songs is like the book of *Psalms, wherein each individual psalm stands on its own, and the psalms do not form an ongoing narrative beyond very general observations. "There is no 'story' or plot to speak of, but a series of encounters (or encounters sought) expressed through the sighs and wishes of lyrical language. And threaded throughout, there is vibrant, perplexing imagery" (Black, 303).

Song of Songs is about human, not divine, love. Thus, its placement in Scripture is not due to any explicitly cultic setting. It seems as though the way in which the book is regarded by most today has returned to the perspective of the audience in the Second Temple period. In addition, the appropriate method of interpretation is a literalistic one that highlights the book's explicit subject matter—passionate sex—not one that allegorizes this topic away. Each scene explores human love and passion, which are timeless and dynamic human realities. But this leaves unresolved the tension of why such material was ever included in the Bible. This question we explore next.

4. Why Song of Songs Is in the Bible.

"It was its allegorical interpretation that indubitably made possible its canonization as part of Holy Scripture" (Waterman, 1). Alternatively, a cultic past is suggested by both Pope and Meek. But Song of Songs has more affinity with secular love songs than with religious texts, and the allegorical approach followed its inclusion in Scripture, as a way of resolving the tension brought about by the presence of an erotic work in a holy book. So the question remains: Why is it there?

The secular character of Song of Songs suggests that it was not used as a religious text per se, but its perspective does suggest a particular

Table 1. Comparison with Egyptian Love Lyrics.

Egyptian Lyrics	Song of Songs
I am yours like the field planted with flowers and with all sorts of fragrant plants.	My beloved is to me a cluster of henna blossoms in the vineyards . . . I am a rose of Sharon, a lily of the valleys.
To hear your voice is pomegranate wine (to me): I draw life from hearing it.	Your cheeks are like halves of a pomegranate behind your veil.
Come spend the day in pleasure, (one) morning, then another—two days, sitting in (my) shade.	With great delight I sat in his shadow, and his fruit was sweet to my taste.
Her friend is at her right as she gets him intoxicated and does whatever he says.	O that his left hand were under my head, and that his right hand embraced me!
The beer hut is disarrayed from drink.	He brought me to the banqueting house, and his banner over me was love.
But she has remained with her brother.	How sweet is your love, my sister, my bride! How much better is your love than wine.

cultural and religious setting. God is not the explicit subject of the book, but religious matters are at issue in its treatment of sexuality, to which we now turn.

4.1. History of Israel. As noted by liturgical theorists, ancient Israel was a religious plurality (see 3.3.4 above). This was true under Solomon as well, who built temples to many gods for his wives. In the Hebrew Bible there were predominantly two philosophies of life at issue, two principal ways of thinking that were contending for the hearts and minds of the people. One contestant was Yahweh, the God of Abraham, Isaac and Jacob, who delivered his people from Egypt and gave righteous laws through Moses; the other was represented by Baal, the fertility god, who was worshiped through ritual prostitution and sex. The fertility cult offered to Israel a radically different understanding of human sexuality. As C. J. White-sell (93-94) observes, they believed that “sexual intercourse releases divine power into the world to refresh the reproductive forces of nature, to renew the power of the king, and to stimulate fertility in domestic animals and in women. Even sex occurring privately and spontaneously between individuals recalls this primary religious archetype; as a result, where the goddess reigns, the personal aspect of sexual interplay does not fully emerge.” In order to break the hold of Baalism on the people, a very different interpretation of sexuality had to be asserted and taught and embraced.

Israel’s unique tradition was of one God, the Creator of heaven and earth, who made his people to serve and honor him. This faith necessitated a very different view of sex: it has no magical properties; it is part of the creation rather than being divine and transcendent; it is for private enjoyment rather than public exhibition. Song of Songs portrays this monotheistic view of sex, which stands over against the alternative view of Baal worship. According to J. Snaith (5), “The Song is unashamedly sexual, and . . . is also quite free of any specific references to the fertility cults of Israel’s neighbors. Since no cultic-mythological significance is apparent, we should acknowledge the Song’s free and open attitude to human sexuality as opposed to the sexual religious practices of Canaanite fertility religion. Perhaps the Song was included in the canon because it was a non-mythological, non-cultic, non-idolatrous, outright, open celebration of God-given sexual love.” The contest between Yahweh and Baal included a contest between two different viewpoints about sexuality. It is to this that Song of Songs eloquently speaks.

4.2. Monotheistic Interpretation of Sex. Song of Songs seems to be a sampling of a Yahwistic understanding of human sexuality, seen against the backdrop of the polytheistic fertility cult. It presents a viewpoint that may have helped to wrest Israel away from its infatuation with Baal.

One’s view of sex has in it a theology, a view of God. Sex is intrinsically religious and points to this. For example, Genesis begins with God alone speaking, until Eve is brought to Adam. Then Adam blurts out his joy at the sight of her, “Bone of my bones, flesh of my flesh,” because “The two shall become one flesh.” God is being worshiped in Adam’s rejoicing over his wife, because sex is inherently religious. In the Bible there are three things in which a person can be utterly lost. One is negative: alcohol. The person who drinks too much loses control and behaves foolishly. But alcohol is used as a metaphor for two positive ways to lose oneself. First, being “drunk in the Spirit” and losing oneself in worship and devotion to God; second, to lose oneself with one’s beloved. Note Proverbs 5:19, “Let her [your wife] . . . satiate you always,” and Song of Songs 5:1, “Eat, O friends, and drink; drink your fill, O lovers.” Passion between lovers also images God’s passion for his people and his people’s for him. In the NT Paul uses this viewpoint to describe how Christ loves his church (Eph 5:24-33).

This monotheistic vision of sexuality—it is a part of creation meant for private enjoyment, governed by God’s laws, which images his love for his people—has won the day. Since the perspective offered in Song of Songs has so decisively triumphed and become formative for the Judeo-Christian civilization, students of the Bible today read it and wonder why it is there at all. Song of Songs seems simply to be stating the trivially obvious. But when it is remembered that this vision has not always been accepted, and that ancient Israel flirted with a very different understanding of sex, then Song of Songs, with its tacit polemic against Baal, makes perfect sense. Sex and God go together—tamper with one’s view of either, and the other is also affected. The liturgists and allegorists are right in that Song of Songs speaks to religious matters, but those matters concern human sexuality as understood by Yahwist traditionalists over against the fertility cult.

5. Outline.

5.1. Overview. The traditional chapter divisions do not help one to read Songs of Song with understanding. As we noted earlier, a novice reader experiences an onslaught of images that blur and reel from one to the next without an obvious organizing principle, a confusing riddle (see 1.1 above). Various ways of parsing up the book into manageable and meaningful portions have been proposed in order to help bring some order to the chaos. Note the nine columns in Table 2. The first is the standard chapter divisions of Song of Songs. The second is Schwab's divisions into fourteen units, followed by Goulder's different division into fourteen units. This is followed by the fourth and fifth (Delitzsch; von Ewald), two-character and three-character dramatist divisions. The latter tried to divide up the book into acts and scenes, but no such attempt was ultimately successful.

Other approaches to parsing the Song of Songs are represented in the next columns. The sixth is that of M. Falk, who found thirty-one different units. Dividing a book into chapters or units is done so that order may be brought to what would otherwise be an undifferentiated mass of verses. When a small book such as Song of Songs is broken up into thirty-one tiny units (although some units are longer), the goal of finding a meaningful order is lost. In other words, Falk has more or less brought the book full circle to having no divisions at all. Of all the books of the Bible, Song of Songs is perhaps the most fluid and least amenable to organizational analysis. Like love itself, the structure that one discovers is the structure one brings to it. But in the human mind there is a need for chapter-level divisions. If Song of Songs were merely verses strung together, there would be no sense of order or control. A meaningful structure should actually help the reader to read the book.

The ninth column is a summation of these various approaches. Dashed lines are subdivisions of major sections. The division points that almost all have in common are shown. This clearly reveals the artificiality of those who impose a chiasmic structure on the text, for only the supposed *chiasms fail to show a division where all other approaches have one. The points of agreement between the others are the strongly typed poems (the "dream" poems in Song 3:1; 5:2; Solomon's procession in Song 3:6; the break at Song 6:4) and the three adjurations of Song of Songs 2:7; 3:5; 8:4. The drama theorists sometimes also fail to recognize an otherwise universally acknowledged break.

5.2. Identifying the Outline. Various clues are suggested by the text of Song of Songs to help us decide how to parse it into manageable portions. A sampling of these is given here.

5.2.1. Inclusio. The phenomenon of *inclusio occurs where the opening line of a poem is re peated in the closing line, thus forming an identifiable boundary. For example, Song of Songs 2:8-9 begins a scene with "The voice of my beloved! Behold, he comes, leaping upon the mountains, bounding over the hills. My beloved is like a gazelle, or a young stag" and ends in Song of Songs 2:17 with "Until the day breathes and the shadows flee, turn, my beloved, be like a gazelle, or a young stag upon rugged mountains" (RSV). The opening and closing lines relate to one another and contain the material between them as a unit. Thus, ideally the reader may expect the material of Song of Songs 2:8-17 to be a literary unit of text, a single poem, that treats an identifiable subject. In the case of Song of Songs the subject always has something to do with love.

Another poem begins in Song of Songs 6:4 with "You are beautiful as Tirzah, my love, come, as Jerusalem, terrible as an army with banners" and ends in Song of Songs 6:10 with "Who is this that looks forth like the dawn, fair as the moon, bright as the sun, terrible as an army with banners?" (RSV). It is contingent on translators whether or not such possible inclusios are made visible to the reader. Unfortunately, this is not always done, as in the NIV. Compare the two verses below.

Song of Songs 6:4

You are beautiful,
my darling, as Tirzah, lovely as Jerusalem,

majestic as troops
with banners.

Song of Songs 6:10

Who is this that appears like the dawn, fair as the moon,

bright as the sun,
majestic as the stars
in procession?

In Hebrew the last line is identical, but can be read various ways. The NIV supplies two dif-

Table 2. Comparison of Proposed Divisions of Song of Songs

Standard chapters	Schwab	Goulder	Delitzsch	Ewald	Falk	Webster	Dorsey	Summaryy
1	1	1		Act 1	1	A1	A
					2
					3
					4
		2	2		Act 2				5
									6
									7 8
2	3	3		Act 2	9	A2	B
					10 11 12
3	4	4			13		C
	5	5		Act 3	14	xxxx	D
4	6	6			15	B1
	7	7			16	B2
					17 18
5	8	8			19	C	C'
	9	9
6	10	10		Act 4	20	B'1
	11					21			B'2
7		11
	23
8	12	12			24			B'
	8	13	13	Act 5	25	A'1		A'
26
27
14		14			28
					29 30
				31	A'2

ferent ways, thus completely obscuring the possible inclusio. When seeking to discover the organization of a work of poetry, the reader should stick with a more literal translation so as to recognize when the original language is conveying significant repetitions.

5.2.2. Strongly Typed Scenes. Some scenes are obviously a unit. For example, the wedding procession in Song of Songs 3:6-11 is an integral poem that everyone recognizes. The dream sequences also read as single poems and have no need of other devices (such as inclusio) to identify them.

No two scholars agree on where every section begins and ends, but if Song of Songs is read as an anthology of poems with no overall plot or story to tell, the overall meaning of the book is not compromised by this failure of consensus.

5.3. Results of This Analysis. The analysis in the outline below assumes that the four calls to the daughters of Jerusalem not to stir up love, or what to tell her lover, are endings of sections (Song 2:7; 3:5; 5:8; 8:4). Sometimes the ending is obvious, as in scene 7. After the man has relished his bride, tasted every titillating fruit, the erotic scene closes with “Eat, O friends, and drink: drink deeply, O lovers!” (Song 5:1 RSV).

Song of Songs may be divided into fourteen separate scenes. Each scene should be read in the way we read the psalms—somewhat independently of the others. This analysis is from Schwab (forthcoming).

The Title (Song 1:1)

The Anthology of Songs (Song 1:2—8:12)

Scene 1: Daydreams and Perfume in the Presence of the King (Song 1:2-12)

- A. In the Presence of the King (Song 1:2-4)
- B. Reminiscences (Song 1:5-8)
- C. In the Presence of the King (Song 1:9-12)

Scene 2: An Outdoor Fantasy (Song 1:13—2:7)

- A. Love in the Glade (Song 1:13—2:3a)
- B. Love in the Wine House (Song 2:3b-6)
- C. Adjuration to Beware of Love (Song 2:7)

Scene 3: Turn, My Beloved, Be Like a Gazelle! (Song 2:8-17)

- A. My Lover Arrives (Song 2:8-9)
- B. My Lover Calls (Song 2:10-15)
- C. My Response (Song 2:16-17)

Scene 4: Upon My Bed I Sought Him, but I Did Not Find Him (Song 3:1-5)

A. My Disturbing Dream (Song 3:1-4)

B. Adjuration to Beware of Love (Song 3:5)

Scene 5: Who Is This Coming Up from the Desert? (Song 3:6-11)

Scene 6: You Are All Beautiful; There Is No Flaw in You (Song 4:1-7)

Scene 7: I Have Come into My Garden, My Sister, My Bride! (Song 4:8—5:1)

A. Lebanon (Song 4:8-11)

B. Paradise (Song 4:12—5:1a)

C. Drink Deeply, O Lovers! (Song 5:1b)

Scene 8: I Opened To My Lover, but He Had Turned and Gone (Song 5:2-8)

A. My Disturbing Dream (Song 5:2-7)

B. Adjuration: What to Say (Song 5:8)

Scene 9: Tell Us about This Lover! (Song 5:9—6:3)

A. What Kind of Lover Is He? (Song 5:9-16)

B. Where has he Gone? (Song 6:1-3)

Scene 10: Who Is This, as Awesome as an Army with Banners? (Song 6:4-10)

Scene 11: Let Us See If the Vine Had Budded (There I Will Give you My Love) (Song 6:11—7:12)

A. Looking for Signs of Spring (Song 6:11-13)

B. How Fair You Are (Song 7:1-6)

C. I Am My Lover's, and His Desire Is for Me (Song 7:7-10)

D. Let Us Look for Signs of Spring (Song 7:11-12)

Scene 12: O, That You Were Like a Brother to Me! (Song 7:13—8:4)

A. If Only You Were Mine (Song 7:13—8:3)

B. Adjuration to Beware of Love (Song 8:4)

Scene 13: Who Is This Coming Up from the Desert? (Song 8:5-7)

A. Love and Death (Song 8:5-7a)

B. Love and Pauperization (Song 8:7b)

Scene 14: Solomon, You Can Keep Your Silver (Song 8:8-12)

A. Reminiscence (Song 8:8-9)

B. Assessment of Her Youth (Song 8:10)

C. Parable of Solomon's Vineyard (Song 8:11-12)

Final Thought, Conclusion to the Whole Song (Song 8:13-14)

5.4. Conclusion. As was noted earlier, no two critics parse Song of Songs in the same way. Many subjective decisions must be made to analyze the book in the way it is presented above. For example, each adjuration is read as a closing line (e.g., Song 2:7; 3:5). But it is possible that these form an inclusio that contains the material between. The *inclusios discovered by Schwab (see 5.2.1 above) to bound material may not in fact be inclusios at all but rather may demarcate common beginnings or endings of units, or may be simply accidentally placed with no structural significance whatsoever.

In the end, there is no scientific or objective way to determine with certainty where one scene ends and another begins. It is poetry, and it is not intended to be easy. The reader must slow down, carefully imbibe the imagery, the highs and lows of emotion, the shifting settings and perspectives of the “Greatest Song,” and let it have its way.

See also FEMINIST INTERPRETATION; LYRIC POETRY; MARRIAGE AND SEX; ORAL POETRY; POETICS, TERMINOLOGY OF; SONG OF SONGS 2: ANCIENT NEAR EASTERN BACKGROUND; SONG OF SONGS 3: HISTORY OF INTERPRETATION; WASE; WOMEN.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. Commentaries: F. Delitzsch, Commentary on the Song of Songs and Ecclesiastes (Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1877); C. Exum, Song of Songs (OTL; Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 2005); D. Garrett, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, Song of Songs (NAC 14; Nashville: Broadman, 1993); J. Gill, An Exposition of the Song of Solomon (Puritan Classics; Grand Rapids: Sovereign Grace Publishers, 1971 [1854]); S. C. Glickman, A Song for Lovers: Including a New Paraphrase and a New Translation of the Song of Solomon (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 1976); O. Keel, The Song of Songs (CC; Minneapolis: Fortress, 1994); T. Longman III, Song of Songs (NICOT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2001); R. E. Murphy, The Song of Songs (Hermeneia; Minneapolis: Fortress, 1990); M. H. Pope, Song of Songs (AB 7C; Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1977); I. Provan, Ecclesiastes, Song of Songs (NIVAC; Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 2001); G. Schwab, “Song of Songs” in Expositor’s Biblical Commentary (rev. ed.; Grand Rapids: Zondervan, forthcoming); J. G. Snaith, Song of Songs (NCBC; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1993). Studies: H. Ainsworth, Annotations on the Pentateuch, the Psalms, and the Song of Solomon, vol. 2 (Ligonier, PA: Soli Deo Publications, 1991 [1612]); F. Black, “Beauty or the Beast? The Grotesque Body in the Song of Songs,” BibInt 8 (2000) 302-23; A. Brenner, “Aromatics and Perfumes in the Song of Songs,” JSOT 25 (1983) 75-81; idem, “To See Is to Assume: Whose Love

Is Celebrated in the Song of Songs?” BibInt 1 (1993) 265-84; J. Daniélou, “The Canticle: A Song of Sacraments,” OF 25 (1950-1951) 97-103, 161-65; S. J. Dillow, Solomon on Sex (New York: Thomas Nelson, 1977); D. A. Dorsey, “Literary Structuring in the Song of Songs,” JSOT 46 (1990) 81-96; S. R. Driver, Introduction to the Literature of the Old Testament (Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1909); D. Fairbairn, “Patristic Exegesis and Theology: The Cart and the Horse,” WTJ 69 (2007) 1-19; M. Falk, Love Lyrics from the Bible: A Translation and Literary Study of the Song of Songs (BLS 4; Sheffield: Almond, 1982); H. Fisch, Poetry with a Purpose: Biblical Poetics and Interpretation (ISBL; Indianapolis: Indiana University Press, 1988); T. E. Fountain, “A Parabolic View of the Song of Solomon,” BETS 9 (1966) 97-101; M. Fox, The Song of Songs and the Ancient Egyptian Love Songs (Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 1985); S. B. Freehof, “Song of Songs,” JQR 39 (1949) 397-402; M. D. Goulder, The Song of Fourteen Songs (JSOTSup 36; Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1986); A. M. Harman, “Modern Discussion on the Song of Solomon” [review of Song of Songs, by M. H. Pope], RTR 37 (1978) 65-72; B. Kamel, “Repentance in the Song of Solomon,” CCR 6.1 (1985) 13-16; R. Kimelman, “Rabbi Yohanan and Origen on the Song of Songs: A Third Century Jewish-Christian Disputation,” HTR 73 (1980) 567-95; F. S. Leahy, “Song of Solomon in Pastoral Teaching,” EvQ 27 (1955) 205-13; R. Loewe, “The Divine Garment and Shi’ur Qomah,” HTR 58 (1965) 153-60; A. Mariaselvam, The Song of Songs and Ancient Tamil Love Poems (Poetry and Symbolism (AnBib 118; Rome: Editrice Pontificio Istituto Biblico, 1988); T. J. Meek, “Canticles and the Tammuz Cult,” AJSLL 39 (1922-1923) 1-14; idem, “The Song of Songs: Introduction,” in The Interpreter’s Bible, ed. S. Terrien (New York: Abingdon, 1956) 5.91-98; F. Meleka, “A Review of Origen’s Commentary on the Song of Songs,” CCR 1 (1980) 125-29; J. O’Keefe and R. R. Reno, Sanctified Vision: An Introduction to Early Christian Interpretation of the Bible (Baltimore: Johns Hopkins University Press, 2005); Origen, Homilies on Genesis and Exodus (FC; Washington, DC: Catholic University of America Press, 1981); W. E. Phipps, “Plight of the Song of Songs,” JAAR 42 (1974) 82-100; C. Rabin, “Song of Songs and Tamil Poetry,” SR (1973-1974) 205-19; S. J. Rieckert, “A Few Notes on the Tannaitic Interpretation of Canticles,” in Aspects of the Exegetical Process, ed. W. Wyk (Pretoria West: NHW Press, 1977) 130-48; H. H. Rowley, "The Interpretation of the Song of Songs," in The Servant of the Lord and Other Essays on the Old Testament, ed. H. H. Rowley (London: Lutterworth, 1952) 189-234; M. Sadgrove, "The Song of Songs as Wisdom Literature," in Studia Biblica 1978: Sixth International Congress on Biblical Studies, Oxford, 3-7 April 1978, 1: Papers on Old Testament and Related Themes, ed. E. A. Livingstone (JSOTSup 11; Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1979) 245-48; C. J. Scalise, "Allegorical Flights of Fancy: The Problem of Origen's Exegesis," GOTR 32 (1987) 84-88; G. Schwab, "Cultivating the Vineyard: Solomon's Counsel for Lovers," JBC 15.3 (1997) 8-20; idem, The Song of Songs' Cautionary Message Concerning Human Love (SBL 41; New York: Peter Lang, 2002); C. Seerveld, The Greatest Song: In Critique of Solomon (Palos Heights, IL: Trinity Pennyasheet Press: 1963); M. Silva, Has the Church Misread the Bible? The History of Interpretation in the Light of Current Issues (FCI 1; Grand Rapids: Academie Books, 1987); H. Simke, "Cant 1:7f in Altchristlicher Auslegung," TZ 18 (1962) 256-67; J. R. Sizoo, "Winds of God [Song of Solomon 4:16]," JRT 10.2 (1953) 149-54; R. J. Tournay, "Les Chariots d'Aminadab (Cant 6:12): Israël, peuple théophore," VT 9 (1959) 288-309; P. Tribble, God and the Rhetoric of Sexuality (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1978); G. H. A. von Ewald, Das Hohelied Salomo's: Übersetzt mit Einleitung, Anmerkungen und einem Anhang über den Prediger (Göttingen: Rudolph Deuerlich, 1826); L. Waterman, The Song of Songs: Translated and Interpreted as a Dramatic Poem (Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 1948); E. C. Webster, "Pattern in the Song of Songs," JSOT 22 (1982) 73-93; C. J. Whitesell, "Behold, Thou Art Fair, My Beloved," Parabola 20 (1995) 92-99; G. H. Wittenberg, "Amos 6:1-7: 'They Dismiss the Day of Disaster but You Bring Near the Rule of Violence,'" JTSA 58 (1987) 57-69. G. Schwab

SONG OF SONGS 2: ANCIENT NEAR EASTERN BACKGROUND

Song of Songs—can one find another work so fascinating, so splendid? The title "Song of Songs" is a nearly literal translation of the Hebrew šir haššîrîm, which is that language's way, among others, of saying "the most sublime of all songs."

While love enriches the human as oak enhances Cabernet, one must appreciate no less the diversity of its expression. No single culture has the market on love. No one group experiences love to the exclusion of others. Love has found expression in the hands of gifted writers throughout the world, throughout time. Joy, ecstasy, yearnings, puzzlement and, yes, pain and sorrow find voice within love.

Song of Songs, while certainly "most sublime" for those who placed it within the *canon of Hebrew Scriptures, was but one literary expression of love among the cultures of the ancient Near East. We turn to consider these other ancient cultures and the literature that they have left behind.

1. Egyptian Literature
2. Sumerian Literature
3. Akkadian Literature
4. (North)west Semitic Literature
5. Song of Songs within the Ancient Near East

1. Egyptian Literature.

What we have of Egypt's ancient love songs come, primarily and interestingly, from one particular era: the Ramessides of the Nineteenth and Twentieth Dynasties (c. 1300-1150 BC). This is not to say that Egypt had no love songs before the Ramessides, but only that we possess nothing earlier.

Among the first scholars to notice similarities between Egypt's love poetry and Song of Songs was A. Erman. The fête of love in these Egyptian lyrics, when compared with the Mesopotamian inventory, as we will see below, is distinctly more human-oriented. Unlike Sumerian love songs, very little in Egypt suggests cultic settings and rituals, divine sex acts, acted out by royals and surrogates, in part, to promote well-being and fertility in the land. Deities are mentioned (e.g., Hathor and Sothis in Chester Beatty I #35, #31, respectively), but Egyptian poetry warmly portrays rapturous human sexual attraction and emotion. Here, however, we must be cautious. Although Egyptian love poetry is more "secular" than its Mesopotamian counterpart, the distinction between religious and nonreligious is likely nowhere near as sharp as it would be to modern readers, who should not lose sight of the ancients' fusion of religion with their conceptual understandings. For example, the star Sirius, after about a seventy-day disappearance from the night sky, would reappear at dawn around June 21, coinciding generally with the start of the Nile's life-infusing inundation (Davis, 112). To the Egyptians, Sirius was the goddess Sothis. This is an underpinning to the simile about the female lover in Chester Beatty I #31: she is "like Sothis rising at the beginning of a good year." A fine simile, to be sure, to the modern reader, it is deeply intertwined with the divinized conceptual outlook of those ancient writers.

The language in Egypt is far less sexually explicit than in Mesopotamia. In the latter, the goddess Inanna, for example, speaks explicitly of her "vulva" (Sum gal₄) as a "well-watered, rising mound," asking Dumuzi, her lover, to "plow" it (Inanna-Dumuzi P ii). The same anatomical region might be in mind in Egypt in the more coyly expressed "double doors" open in the "middle of her house" (Papyrus Harris 500 #7) (Fecht, 76). (On a nonfigurative level, the latter song comprises the words of a male outside his lover's home, much like Romeo outside Juliet's window.) Here, in its subtlety and its focus on human lovers, is where Egypt's literature, not Mesopotamia's, is arguably more similar to Song of Songs.

The Egyptians may well have composed love songs before the Ramessides, but their emergence within this era reflects cultural developments of the day (Fox 1985, 183; White, 74-79). The poetry's roots likely belong to the Amarna age, roughly half a century before the occurrence of the first extant love songs. Out of Pharaoh Akhenaton's heretical devotion to Aton (rather than to long-standing Amon) blossomed a revolution in art and literature, a prominent characteristic being the open depiction of intimacy between royal family members. Pharaoh eats with his family, plays with his daughters, embraces and kisses his wife. A. Hermann (62) has argued that such depictions of intimacy programmatically reinforced Akhenaton's ideology that Aton's influence should permeate personal emotions (see also Fox 1985, 183). Though worship of Aton would die shortly after Akhenaton's own death, intimate portrayals would continue without their fusion to Aton. Enter the Ramessides.

The Egyptian inventory of love songs is systematically numbered, thanks to the initial work of Hermann (1959). Though M. Fox's later seminal work on Egyptian love songs needed to adjust the numeration (1985), Hermann, by and large, is still followed, as is the case here.

1.1. Papyrus Harris 500. This papyrus from Egypt's Nineteenth Dynasty (thirteenth century BC) was discovered in a casket within Ramesses II's mortuary temple, the Ramesseum. Likely an anthology, the papyrus's verso holds two fictional tales. The love songs are found on the recto.

Badly damaged in parts, the songs are placed within three groupings (A, B, C). Pause marks divide each of the songs, and many have titles in red ink. Group A (#1-8) and B (#9-16) contain sixteen songs, while Group C (#17-19) comprises a single, three-stanza song. The papyrus holds an additional two songs, badly fragmented.

The literary voice in Group A switches between female and male, but not consecutively. The lovers express their affection both in second and third person. Though at least one scholar has tried to weave these songs into one storyline (Suys), such attempts have been met with skepticism. Couched within a variety of settings, the songs seem to be not a true dialogue between two lovers but rather an anthology of eight autonomous songs (Fox 1985, 196). The female is lying with her lover in song #1; the male is sailing to Memphis in #5; in #7 the male, at least on a nonfigurative level, is a frustrated lover outside the female's house. Group B, which begins with the phrase "The Beginning of the Entertainment Song," is a collection of eight independent songs written only in female voice. Here is a sampling from these two groups (translations are from Fox 1985, 7-25):

#2 (Female)

Your love is mixed in my body, like . . . ,

[like honey(?)] mixed with water, like mandragoras in which gum is mixed,

like the blending of dough with. . . .

Hasten to see your sister, . . .

#3 (Male)

The vegetation(?) of the marsh(?) is bewildering.

[The mouth of] my sister is a lotus,

her breasts are mandragoras,

[her] arms are [branches]. . . .

#4 (Female)

My heart is not yet done with your lovemaking,

my (little) wolf cub!
Your liquor is (your) lovemaking. . . .

#9 (Female)

The beauty of your sister,
the beloved of your heart, when she has come back from the meadows!

My brother, my beloved,
my heart longs for your love,

. . .

All the birds of (the land of) Punt—they have descended on Egypt, anointed with myrrh.

The first to come takes the bait.

His fragrance is brought from Punt;
his claws are full of balm.

My heart desires you,
Let us release it together. . . .

#12 (Female)

I have departed [from my brother].
[Now when I think of] your love, my heart stands still within me.

When I behold sw[et] cakes,
[they seem like] salt . . .

The scent of your nose alone is what revives my heart. . . .

Group C (songs #17-19) is a single poem with three stanzas, each one beginning with a *word-play on a type of flower. Appropriately titled “The Flower Song,” the three flower types offer a conceptual coherence throughout each respective stanza. The mhmh-flower, for example, plays on the Egyptian word mḥ3 (“balance”): “mhmh-flowers: my heart is in balance with yours. For you I’ll do what it wills, when I am in your embrace” (Fox 1985, 26, 197).

1.2. Cairo Love Songs. Written on a now fragmented vase from either the Nineteenth or the Twentieth Dynasty are two songs (Davis [111] has argued for one, cyclical song) known as the Cairo Love Songs. In one of the songs, which Fox (1980, 102, 104; 1985, 31, 36) has entitled “The Crossing,” the female thinks only of her absent lover, his voice, his form. She desires to bathe in his presence at river’s bank in a diaphanous linen tunic. There, along the river, we discover that the male is present, but on the other side, separated from her by crocodile and current. Strengthened by her spell-like love, he finds the crocodile to be “a mouse,” and the current “dry land.” Rapturously they embrace, and he kisses her parted lips. Passion building, he orders the preparation of a bed for their lovemaking. On her bed, linen tucked between her legs, fragrance on her body, the lovers leave us—the poem ends.

In the song “Wishes,” or perhaps “If only,” after the opening phrase in each stanza, a man opines for the woman he desires. His is the only voice we hear. Each stanza develops his particular wish. He wishes that he were his lover’s private attendant, able, as she, to be close and to envisage her unclothed body. He yearns to be her laundryman, rubbing himself with her clothes. He desires to be her seal ring, with her every day. He imagines himself spending mornings throughout his lifetime as her mirror. He longs for her to be close to him, like flowers on a wreath. He wishes that she would come to him, promising a festival to the god capable of granting this.

1.3. Papyrus Chester Beatty I. This long papyrus from Thebes, dated to the Twentieth Dynasty (twelfth century BC), has three groups of love songs (A, B, C), all intact. Additionally, the papyrus holds a myth about Horus and Seth, two royal hymns (one certainly related to Ramesses V) and several short business documents.

Though the papyrus itself reads, “The Beginning of the Sayings of the Great Entertainer,” Fox (1985, 51) has labeled Group A (songs #31-37) “The Stroll,” after the central event that underpins the drama of this grouping. Alternating through each of the seven stanzas, the voices of a young man and woman ponder their passion for each other, without, sadly, the other knowing fully the obsession that they share. The stanzas do not appear to follow a chronological storyline, but they do seem to rehearse events that bind these two lovers together. In #31 the lad, as the young lady walks by, reflects on her physical beauty, in rhetoric similar to the *wasfs, or physique descriptions in Song of Songs (e.g., Song 4:1-7). He speaks of her skin, eyes, lips, neck, breasts, hair, arms, fingers, waist, derrière and thighs. In #32 the girl, in her voice, says that “love of him has captured me.” The boy has come close to her house, but the girl’s mother prevents her from going to him. In song #33 the boy describes how he set out one day to go to the girl’s house.

He meets a “Mehi in his chariot, together with the lovers.” The lad becomes confused, afraid to join Mehi lest he become involved with him. The meaning of all this remains unclear to us, but the boy’s hesitation prevents him from reaching the girl. In #34 the girl’s heart “jumps” after him, but she wrestles to keep it within her, and she does. As the male’s hesitation in #33 prevented his meeting her, her struggle to contain her heart keeps her from meeting him. In the remaining three stanzas (#35-37) their mutual hesitancy restrains them from meeting one another. The boy, we read, finally becomes ill with love, declaring how only a visit from his lover would cure him. The song ends without the two ever being together.

Group B (#38-40) represents a poem of three stanzas, all from the female’s voice. Each stanza follows a structure. (1) The girl invites the boy to hurry to his “sister”—the girl herself. (2) The wishful hastening is couched in three images of swiftness: a royal messenger, a horse, a gazelle. (3) Each is then developed in rhetoric that draws from the stanza’s “speed” image. The third stanza (#40) is illustrative of the structure and imagery that hastens toward love, perhaps complete with the faintness that may come from high passion. The swift gazelle, at times shaky, is to arrive at the lover’s “cave”—by most all accounts, a metaphor for the female’s most private part (Fox 1985, 68; Hermann, 152; White, 101).

If only you would come to (your) sister swiftly,
like a gazelle bounding over the desert,
whose legs are shaky, whose body is weary,
for fear has entered his body.

...
(Then) ere (you) kiss your hand four times, you will arrive at her cave. (Fox 1985, 66-67)

Group C (#41-47) begins with the rubric “The beginning of the sweet saying, which was found in a book container, and which the scribe Nakhtsobek from the necropolis wrote.” These seven songs appear to be an anthology, though common imagery and themes perhaps make them appear to be more unified than they really are (Fox 1985, 200).

1.4. The Turin Love Song. This love song, three stanzas (#28-30), comes from a Twentieth Dynasty papyrus, whose present home is Turin, Italy. The copyist wrote the first line of each stanza in red, helping us to recognize its three-unit composition. Two lovers, probably not the same two in each stanza (Fox 1985, 50), hiding away, concealing their sexual intimacy among branches and leaves, underpin the song. The true characters are three trees, one in each stanza, personified with thought as they gaze upon the couple’s sexual frolic beneath them. The first two, proud of their splendor, decry the couple’s self-absorption, threatening to call them out and expose them. The third tree, however, pledges shelter and secrecy. Forbidden love and stealing away to a secretive tryst among luxuriant foliage has its echo in Song of Songs 1:16-17.

1.5. “Love Song” Memorial Inscriptions. Although not precisely love songs in the sense as those above, some memorial inscriptions seem, in effect, love songs to departed ones. We look at two examples.

1.5.1. Inscription for Mutirdis. From the Twenty-Second Dynasty (tenth-eighth centuries BC) comes a sixteen-lined inscription praising the life and physical attributes of Mutirdis, priestess of Hathor. “Sweet, sweet of love, says King Menkheperre. Sweet, say men. Mistress of love, say women.” Praise for her physical features follow: “Blacker her hair than the black of night ... [whiter] her teeth than bits of plaster ... her breasts are set firm on her bosom” (Fox 1985, 349; White, 189-90).

1.5.2. Petosiris’s Song to His Wife, Renpet-nefret. This Ptolemaic tomb inscription extols the virtue of Renpet-nefret. “Sweet in speech, excellent in counsel ... great of praise in her city, ... who speaks good things ... greatly loved by all.” The rhetoric is not unlike the “Noble Woman” in Proverbs 31.

2. Sumerian Literature.

Sumerian love poems abound. In Egypt, though, where the love and lovemaking appear to be among commoners, most Sumerian love songs, but not all, are divine lyrics expressing divine lovemaking—deities fill the roles of lovers. These arguably cultic texts likely played their most prominent role in an annual rite known as “sacred marriage.” Indeed, S. Kramer (1962, 25), building on the work of T. Meek, adamantly suggested that portions of Song of Songs, too, were “cultic in origin, and were sung in the course of the hieros gamos, or ‘sacred marriage,’ ... [which] has Mesopotamian roots ... back to ... the Sumerian Dumuzi-Inanna cult.” Precisely what the “sacred marriage” entailed is not obvious. Indeed, for some, the rite’s arguably scanty, less-than-clear evidence casts a shadow on whether it existed at all (Rubio, 269; Sweet). Some rite, however, appears to call out through the texts. Related to celebrations surrounding the New Year, between the second half of the third millennium to the beginning of the second millennium BC, the king, representing Dumuzi, would have sexual intercourse (real or otherwise) with a woman, probably a priestess, representing the goddess Inanna (Rubio, 269). Echoes of this apparent ritual survive into the first millennium in the poems of the new characters of Nabu and Tashmetu (see 3.8. below). A “blessing” motif, present in most all of these cuneiform songs, attests to an important purpose: securing good fate for the ruler and country. The king’s union with the (surrogate) goddess secured fertility and abundance for the land and its population (Sefati, 48-49).

The poems focus on more than a mere sex act. They, like their Egyptian and biblical counterparts, express a wide range of love’s emotions. In contrast, though, to the subtle, even coy eroticism in Song of Songs and Egyptian love poems, sexual explicitness, as we noted above, is vivid in Sumerian compositions:

[Inanna = female:]
My own vulva [Sum gal₄], a well-watered, rising mound—
 I, the maiden—who will plow it?
 My vulva, the wet and well-watered ground—
 I, the young lady—who will station there an ox?
 [Dumuzi = male:]
 Young lady, may the king plow it for you,
May Dumuzi, the king, plow it for you!
 (Inanna-Dumuzi P ii, lines 25-30 [adapted from Sefati, 91])
 The king goes with lifted head to the holy lap,
 Goes with lifted head to the lap of Inanna,
Ama-ušumgalanna beds with her,
He delights in her pure lap. (Iddindagan
 A, lines 185-88 [Sefati, 105])
 Your right hand you have placed on my vulva,
 Your left, stroked my head,
You have touched your mouth to mine.
 (from Inanna-Dumuzi [Kramer 1969, 105; see also COS 1.169A:541])

Although these Sumerian poems and Song of Songs share similar nature and garden imagery along with brother-sister address, though only “sister” appears in the latter, most scholars find that the differences undermine any theory suggesting that Song of Songs was derived from a cultic liturgy. Song of Songs is disinterested in fertility and lacks (1) blessings, (2) the ritual rhetoric of the cuneiform, (3) nature’s reinvigoration in imagery of resurrection.

The ancient scribes commonly would add to a composition a subscript, which apparently categorized the work according to genre. The subscript could also name the deity or hero to whom the song was dedicated. Among those with a subscript, the classification balbale dominates. Though somewhat unclear, these balbale songs perhaps are a special category of declamation (Sefati, 25), connected in one way or another to the “theme of love, courtship, sacred marriage and the fertility of fields and flocks” (Sefati, 28). The majority have no narrative to set the background or to introduce the characters’ voices; nearly all of them are dialogues or monologues (Sefati, 24)—a similarity with Song of Songs. An interesting feature, with character voice in mind, is the use of emesal (Sum eme-sal), a dialect, likely a “genderlect,” not uncommonly used when women speak in these and other Sumerian texts. Pronunciation and specific words, in part, distinguish emesal from standard Sumerian, emegir.

2.1. Inanna and Dumuzi Love Poems. A divine couple, Inanna (prominent goddess associated, in part, with love, fertility, rain, storm and war) and Dumuzi (deified primeval shepherd-king), appears extensively in Sumerian literature. The literary works focus principally on (1) the couple’s love affair and marriage, (2) Dumuzi’s death, (3) his fate in the netherworld (Sefati, 17).

The love poems exploring their love affair and marriage—at present some thirty-eight songs involving roughly 1,700 lines (Sefati, 18)—are our primary focus here. They vividly describe their love and marriage. The lyrical descriptions on the lips of those who speak have fewer parallels with Song of Songs when compared with those associated with Shu-Suen and Ludingirra (see 2.2 below). This is not to say, though, that one finds no similarities. The epithet of “sister” for the female is a connection. Dumuzi’s vocational epithet of “shepherd” accords with shepherd imagery in Song of Songs (Song 1:7). The female voice, both in the Inanna-Dumuzi poems and in Song of Songs, speaks of the male's left arm by her head while his right arm caresses her body. In Song of Songs, though, the male (coyly) "embraces," while in Inanna-Dumuzi his right arm is (explicitly) "placed on [her] vulva." And, as we noted earlier, nature and garden imagery abound in both.

Looking at one poem, Love by the Light of the Moon (title in COS 1.169C:542-43; see also ANET, 639-40), will give us a brief yet meaningful glimpse. Inanna, innocently singing and dancing under a night sky, is met by Dumuzi (here named Ama-ushumgalanna [a by-name]), who embraces her. Inanna pleads with him to let her go home, apparently fearing her mother's wrath should she discover Inanna's absence from home in the presence of a stranger. Dumuzi talks of women's "false words," suggesting the idea of deceit, allowing the two to spend the night making love. Because of a fragmentary text, we do not know their actions that night. The story, however, continues with the two arriving at Inanna's home. The poem ends with praise, likely by Ningal, Inanna's mother, for Dumuzi, who, she claims, makes plants grow abundantly and thus is worthy of Inanna's "pure lap."

2.2. Message of Ludingirra to His Mother. A beloved son, Ludingirra, commissions a royal courier to journey to the city of Nippur with greetings to his mother, Shat-Ishtar. Should the messenger not know her, Ludingirra says, "I shall give you some signs" (line 9 [Civil, who offers a full translation]). Ludingirra follows with five such signs, poetic descriptions of his mother's charms and beauty. The first sign focuses on her diligent lifestyle in rhetoric somewhat similar to the Noble Woman (= a *personification of wisdom) in Proverbs 31:10-31.

The remaining signs appear more personal, focusing on the lady's person in rich, metaphoric imagery. Although sensual language seems appropriate for Song of Songs, such talk about one's mother, if indeed present in this poem, strikes a modern reader as less than seemly. The language, unlike Inanna-Dumuzi's, is, to be sure, subtle—the courier (and the modern reader) is spared explicit reflections on the mother's intimate anatomy. J. Cooper (161-62), however, argues that sensuality permeates the poem. Cooper compares the third sign with Song of Songs 4:12-15:

My mother is a heavenly rain, water for the best seeds,
A bountiful harvest, which grows a second crop:
A garden of delight, full of joy,
An irrigated fir-tree, covered with fir-cones;
An early fruit, the yield of the first month;
A canal which brings luxuriant waters to the irrigation ditches,
A sweet Dilmun date, sought in its prime.
(lines 33-39 [Civil, 4-5])

The male lover in Song of Songs says the following about the woman:

An enclosed garden is my sister, my betrothed,
An enclosed pool, a sealed spring is my sister.
Your irrigated fields are an orchard:
Pomegranates along with the choicest fruit,
Henna along with nard, nard and saffron,
cane and cinnamon,
Along with all scented woods, myrrh and aloes,
Along with all the finest spices.
You are a garden spring, an artesian well, streaming from Lebanon. (Song 4:12-15)

2.3. Royal Love Songs. Sumerians composed royal love songs about their kings and their consorts. The king often filled the role of Dumuzi, while the female, often a priestess, played Inanna. Such songs appear to be closely linked with the so-called sacred marriage rite.

2.3.1. Shulgi of Ur. In a text known as Shulgi X we read of King Shulgi of Ur (c. 2050 BC) traveling on his royal boat, stopping at several cities (Klein, 124-66). In four episodes Shulgi enters the local deity's temple bearing gifts. The deity responds by blessing him.

In the first episode—the longest—Shulgi docks at the quay of Uruk-Kullaba amid the adulation of his people. As he enters the Eanna temple complex, the goddess Inanna, seeing him, spontaneously chants a sensuous poem in the emesal dialect, recollecting the sexual pleasure in, most likely, her annual sacred consummation with Shulgi. She then blesses him. It is this episode, with its erotic language, that most closely resembles Song of Songs. Shulgi then travels on, the poem taking us along his journey.

We are uncertain whether this text depicts Shulgi's journey during the New Year festival, celebrating the sacred marriage rite. Such a thought has been the most common interpretation. Shulgi X, however, may simply be the end of another text (Shulgi D). If so, Shulgi, after a triumphal return from battle, visits major Sumerian temples, bestowing gifts to the various deities (Klein, 129).

2.3.2. Shu-Suen of Ur. Associated with King Shu-Suen, who reigned after Shulgi in the Ur III dynasty, are three balbale songs worth our attention. The first, Shu-Suen A, is a text difficult to understand fully, and Y. Sefati (344-50) rehearses the history of interpretation. In a balbale pertaining to the goddess Baba, a female lover praises the queen mother for bearing Shu-Suen. The lover beckons Shu-Suen, who has brought much pleasure, to pay her attention and invites him to her genitals, which are “sweet like her beer.” In Shu-Suen B and C, both balbales pertaining to Inanna, the female lovers draw heavily on imagery related to honey and sweetness. In Shu-Suen B the woman wishes to run after him to the bed, beckoning him to “sleep in our house till dawn,” and opining, “If only you would do to me your sweet things.” In Shu-Suen C the female lover, whose “hair is lettuce, well-watered,” describes Shu-Suen as a “handsome man,” a “farmer who brings superb grain,” and “honey to my eyes . . . charm of my heart.”

2.3.3. Iddin-Dagan of Isin. A love poem focuses on Iddin-Dagan, third ruler of Isin. It offers a clear expression of a New Year’s sexual liaison between Inanna (actually, her human surrogate) and Iddin-Dagan. In imagery reminiscent of Song of Songs 6:10, Inanna first is praised for ... her coming forth radiantly at evening,

... the holy torch which fills the heaven,
... her stance in heaven, like the moon and the sun.

*From above and below, all the lands know
(of these things).* (lines 11-14 [Reisman, 186])

Later, after lengthy accounts of processions and praise for Inanna, on “New Year’s day, the day of ritual” (line 174):

My lady bathes (her) pure lap,
She bathes for the lap of the king.
She bathes for the lap of Iddin-Dagan,
The pure Inanna washes with soap,
She sprinkles cedar oil on the ground,
The king approaches (her) lap proudly,

He approaches the lap of Inanna proudly,
Ama’ušumgalanna lies down beside her,
He caresses her pure lap.

...

She makes love with him on her bed,
(She says) to Iddin-Dagan: “You are surely my beloved.” (lines 180-188, 191-192

[Reisman, 191])

2.3.4. Anonymous King of Uruk. This text (D1 in Sefati, 301-11), about seventy extant lines over three columns, is set within a sacred marriage ceremony between an unnamed king and the goddess Inanna. The king talks of his “good house,” likely later identified as the Erigal temple (line 9), which is in Uruk. Here, preparations are made for a sexual liaison. Inanna, over the course of some twenty lines, longs for the bed. Spreading it out, she beckons the king. Ninshubur, faithful majordomo, escorts the king to Inanna’s lap. Blessing are then spoken for the king: “Grant him a propitious and renowned reign . . . may there be carp-floods under him in the river . . . may wild sheep and goats multiply under him in the forests . . . may lettuce and cress grow under him in the garden-beds.” The king, in the following lines, as the extant text ends, consummates the union, going “with lifted head to the holy lap [of Inanna].”

3. Akkadian Literature.

The Akkadian corpus embraces cultic, like Sumerian, and secular love lyrics. The texts range from early to late in respective dialects. Old Akkadian is the dialect of the last half of the third millennium BC. At millennium’s turn, the language is classified according to two regional dialects: Babylonian and Assyrian. Each of these regional dialects has chronological classifications. Love lyrics occur in Old Akkadian, Old Babylonian (first half of the second millennium), Middle Babylonian (second half of the second millennium), Neo-Babylonian and Neo-Assyrian (both in the first half of the first millennium).

3.1. Old Akkadian Magical Love Charm. Discovered at Kish, this thirty-eight-lined tablet, written in the Old Akkadian dialect, is a “love magic” incantation invoked by a man to enable him to gain a woman’s favor (Foster, 1.56; Gelb, 7). The language is not easy to understand; one only need compare the rather different translations offered by I. Gelb (7-12) and B. Foster

(1.56-57). Foster (1.56-57) proposes the following events. The chanter invokes Ea, the god of wisdom and incantations, and mentions that a love charm sits in the lap of Ishtar surrounded by "sap." Two "demonic" maidens fetch the charm. With it in hand, the man casts the spell upon the woman whom he desires. The woman's imagined response of erotic desire for him is offered, with the text then suggesting that the spell has done its work.

3.2. Old Babylonian Love Lyrics of Rim-Sin of Larsa. Associated with Rim-Sin, King of Larsa in the Old Babylonian period, this dialogue celebrates his cultic sacred marriage rite with a priestess during the New Year festivities (Foster, 1.98; van Dijk, Goetze and Hussey, 28). The voices of Rim-Sin and his anonymous lover speak. A third voice, a chorus of cultic singers, interjects into the dialogue.

3.3. Old Babylonian Love Song Discovered at Kish, Text 1063. This fragmentary love song expresses the desire for lovemaking. The language is quite erotic and passionate and appears devoid of cultic overtones, appearing "secular." In the first column a female addresses a man, encouraging him to make love to her. She refers to herself in the plural, not uncommon in amatory texts expressing the words of Ishtar and Inanna (Westenholz, 417): "Reach forth with your left hand and stroke our vulva, play with our breasts." Later we read, "I will make [love] and do your pleasure, lusty one" (Westenholz, 423).

3.4. Old Babylonian Love Song of Nanay and Muati. Understanding this text is complicated by the uncertainty of which side is the obverse, which side the reverse (Foster, 1.96-97). What is certain is that the poem celebrates the love of Nanay, a goddess of love, for Muati, a god about whom we know little. Nanay looks favorably upon Babylon and its king, Abieshuh, mentioned in the text. Attracted to Muati, Nanay apparently brings him to the city. The lyrics extol the pleasure of their lovemaking. If the tablet's sides are correctly comprehended, the song ends with a prayer for King Abieshuh's longevity.

3.5. Old Babylonian Love Poem of a Faithful Lover. The faithful lover is a young lady, deserted by her man for another woman. Despite the young man's harsh words to her, she is restrained and persistent in her view that she will recapture his affection. Only when she speaks of her rival does her tone grow harsh. Her patient, quiet love, in the end, wins. Shunning the rival, the man declares, "May the other woman be our enemy, Ishtar being witness!" Humor peppers the dialogue, and lyrics rarely if ever focus on sex or anatomical descriptions. An embrace and a kiss are as far as the lyrics take us. Gossipy women intrude into the text, reminding one, somewhat, of the "Daughters of Jerusalem" in Song of Songs. The poem appears to be "secular," lacking cultic overtones (Held, 4).

3.6. Middle Babylonian Love "Ballad" of Ishtar and Dumuzi. A tablet, residing today in the British Museum (BM 47507), uniquely inscribed with a "monumental" script, is a love song, according to its editor, "not quite like anything else in Akkadian" (Black, 25). An intent to be sung, a brisk narrative style, secular rhetoric (despite the presence of the two deities) and lack of poetic dialogue inspire J. Black (25) to describe this love song as a "ballad."

The ballad, according to Black, has two storylines: a fantasy in the mind of Ishtar, followed by reality. Ishtar, cast as an infatuated but restrained young girl, fantasizes that she invites Dumuzi to spend the night with her in her parents' house. She envisions the door and bolt (an image found in Song 5:5) rejoicing as he enters, and she contemplates his "lusty" presence. She, still in her fantasy, expresses how she would ask him to remove his sandals and eat, forgetting for the moment his shepherding duties. Damage to the tablet prevents us from reading more of her reverie. The balance of the tablet appears to narrate what Ishtar actually did. The bathos is heartrending. She finds Dumuzi at his sheepfold (compare Song 1:7-8) and can only utter small talk about how pleasant the waters are for the sheep. The ballad ends.

3.7. Neo-Babylonian "Love Lyrics." In this badly fragmented text Marduk and Ishtar speak amorously to each other. Devoid of clear context, "bed chamber" and the cleansing of female genitalia nevertheless set an erotic tone. Ishtar here is Marduk's concubine, with the text apparently reciting angry words from Marduk's wife, Šarpanitum. Originally interpreted as a sacred marriage rite between Marduk and Ishtar (Lambert), another view sees it as a jealousy ritual addressing Šarpanitum's anguish over her husband's love of Ishtar (Edzard).

3.8. Neo-Assyrian Love Lyrics of Nabu and Tashmetu. These lyrics are the dialogue between the deities Nabu (Marduk and Šarpanitum's son) and Tashmetu, encouraged by a chorus. A brief introductory entreaty offers devotion to the two gods. The dialogue, with choral interjection, intimately describes the lovers' physiques and richly uses garden imagery, much like Song of Songs: Tashmetu's thighs are "a gazelle in the steppe . . . ankles are a springtime apple . . . she washes herself, she climbs into bed . . . Why are you so adorned, Tashmetu? So I can go to the garden with you, my Nabu" (Foster, 2.903; see also Livingstone, 35-37). Most commentators see this poem as evidence for the practice of the sacred rite marriage continuing into the first millennium.

3.9. Miscellaneous Late Magical Love Charms.

From the first millennium we have a number of "love magic" incantations, similar in genre to the Old Akkadian love charm (see 3.1 above). Potency is a recurring concern. Foster (1.884-85) provides convenient translations. One, entitled "Harpstring," incants, "Let my potency be (steady as) running river water, Let my penis be a (taut) harpstring, Let it not slip out of her." Another, "I Have Made a Bed," chants, "Potency! . . . What Ishtar does for Dumuzi, What Nanay does for her lover . . . Let me do for my lover!"

4. (North)west Semitic Literature.

From the Late Bronze Age, the ancient city of Ugarit (near the Mediterranean coast in modern Syria) affords us a couple worthwhile texts.

4.1. Descriptive Love Lyrics in the King Kirta/Keret Epic. Within the epic of King Kirta (KTU 1.14-16) we encounter the repetition of physique description. Job-like King Kirta loses his family—wife and heirs are gone. The god El, however, notices his plight and in a dream shows Kirta how to find a wife, keeping him from ruin. Kirta is to wage a war campaign against King Pabil of Udm, taking his daughter, Hurriy, for his wife. The epic continues, developing a story of intrigue, illness and jealousy. The brief descriptions of Hurriy, however, are our focus here. Refusing wealth and other spoils of war, Kirta asks for Hurriy, expressing that "her beauty is Anat's beauty, Athirat's loveliness is her loveliness, her eyebrows are lapis lazuli, her eyes are alabaster bowls . . . I rest in the gaze of her eyes" (KTU 1.14 iii 41-45 // vi 26-30 [author's translation]; see also Wyatt, 196-98, 204).

4.2. The Gracious Gods (KTU 1.23 = RS 2.002). This myth, interspersed with liturgy, depicts the sexual liaison of El with two divine females, Athirat and Rahmay. The sexual encounter, explicitly told, produces two divine offspring, Shahar (Dawn) and Shalim (Dusk). Either they are the "gracious gods" or they and other born gods comprise the "gracious." Ironically, these gracious gods begin to devour birds of the sky and fish of the sea. El banishes them and their mothers into the desert to hunt for their food. During a seven-year trek they come upon a "watchman" of irrigated fields who provides for them. The function of this myth is unknown. A sacred marriage rite (de Moor, 117), a famine-relief liturgy (D. Pardee in COS 1.87:274-83) and a royal marriage liturgy (Wyatt, 324-25) have been suggested.

The sexual union is lengthy and vivid. Double-entendre teases out the imagery. We read of El's "hand" (Ugar yd), a well-known "penis" euphemism, growing "as long as the sea." He grabs, raises up, and aims his "staff" and "walking stick" (real and figurative?). He kisses the women's lips, "sweet as pomegranate," and "from kissing came conception, from embracing, 'heat' [impregnation?]."

5. Song of Songs within the Ancient Near East.

What insight might our look at ancient Near Eastern love songs offer in understanding Song of Songs? Love poetry served cult; it also expressed rapturous secular passion among royals and commoners. If Song of Songs served a cultic function among the Israelites, it does not show that purpose as translucently as do Mesopotamian and Ugaritic texts. If the book expresses secular obsession, as Egypt's culture demonstrates, should we look for a storyline or classify the contents as little more than an anthology? The ancient Near East clearly shows us the possibility for both. That no distinct storyline has won the day among scholars might tip the balance that Song of Songs is, at the end of the day, an anthology of sensuous lyrics.

Song of Songs, however, appears to be more than a hodgepodge, and, in the end, I am persuaded that it is best understood as a collection of love lyrics unified through associative links: (1) repetends, (2) portrayal of characters, (3) a loose narrative frame (Fox 1985, 209-22).

Words ("lily," "blooming-vine," "dear"), phrases ("my dove," "my perfect one"), clauses ("My beloved is mine, and I am his"), adjurations (Song 2:7; 3:5; 5:8; 8:4), themes of searching and finding (Song 3:1-4; 5:2-8) and imagery through metaphor and simile recur throughout the book. Such repetends bolster Song of Song's unity.

Two personae—two lovers—express their passion throughout the book. Egyptian love poetry clearly “role plays.” The same lovers, through literary fiction, can be royalty, servants or shepherds. Escaping their true circumstances, Egyptian lovers assume these various roles or disguises. Dumuzi, in the Inanna-Dumuzi love poems, is often a shepherd. Had we only Song of Songs, we could easily insist on three distinct main characters: a king (no less than *Solomon himself), a shepherd, a woman. Ancient Near Eastern parallels, however, push one to consider the plausibility that Song of Songs expresses the words of a single couple, who, at times, use royal and shepherd imagery.

Springtime is the only season behind Song of Songs. Leaving the city to steal away to the countryside is a theme that runs throughout. The female lover and her brothers quietly develop in their relationship. These, in part, embolden Fox (1985, 222) to talk of the book's loose narrative framework.

Through the lens of the wider context of love lyrics among ancient Near Eastern cultures, we perhaps ought to see Song of Songs as a woven anthology of secular lyrics that celebrate passion between two young lovers.

See also MARRIAGE AND SEX; SONG OF SONGS 1: BOOK OF; SONG OF SONGS 3: HISTORY OF INTERPRETATION; WASF; WOMEN.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. J. A. Black, “Babylonian Ballads: A New Genre,” in Studies in Literature from the Ancient Near East by Members of the American Oriental Society Dedicated to Samuel Noah Kramer, ed. J. M. Sasson (AOS 65; New Haven: American Oriental Society, 1984) 25-34; M. Civil, “The ‘Message of Lú-Dingir-Ra to His Mother’ and a Group of Akkado-Hittite ‘Proverbs,’” JNES 23 (1964) 1-11; J. S. Cooper, “New Cuneiform Parallels to the Song of Songs,” JNES 90 (1971) 157-62; V. L. Davis, “Remarks on Michael V. Fox's ‘The Cairo Love Songs,’” JAOS 100 (1980) 111-14; J. C. de Moor, An Anthology of Religious Texts from Ugarit (Nisaba 16; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1987); D. O. Edzard, “Zur Ritualtafel der sog. ‘Love Lyrics,’” in Language, Literature, and History: Philological and Historical Studies Presented to Erica Reiner, ed. F. Rochberg-Halton (AOS 67; New Haven: American Oriental Society, 1987) 57-69; A. Erman, The Literature of the Ancient Egyptians: Poems, Narratives, and Manuals of Instruction, from the Third and Second Millennia B.C., trans. A. M. Blackman (London: Methuen, 1927); G. Fecht, “Die Wiedergewinnung der altägyptischen Verksunst,” Mitteilungen des deutschen archäologischen Instituts, Abteilung Kairo 19 (1963) 54-70; B. R. Foster, Before the Muses: An Anthology of Akkadian Literature (2 vols.; Bethesda, MD: CDL Press, 1993); M. V. Fox, “The Cairo Love Songs,” JAOS 100 (1980) 101-9; idem, The Song of Songs and the Ancient Egyptian Love Songs (Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 1985); I. J. Gelb, Sargonic Texts in the Ashmolean Museum, Oxford (MAD 5; Chicago: University of Chicago Press, 1970); M. Held, “A Faithful Lover in an Old Babylonian Dialogue,” JCS 15 (1961) 1-26; A. Hermann, Altägyptische Liebesdichtung (Wiesbaden: Harrassowitz, 1959); J. Klein, Three Shulgi Hymns: Sumerian Royal Hymns Glorifying King Shulgi of Ur (BSNELC; Ramat Gan: Bar-Ilan University Press, 1981); S. N. Kramer, “The Biblical ‘Song of Songs’ and the Sumerian Love Songs,” Expedition 5 (1962) 25-31; idem, “The Sacred Marriage and Solomon's Song of Songs,” in The Sacred Marriage Rite: Aspects of Faith, Myth, and Ritual in Ancient Sumer (Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1969) 85-106; W. G. Lambert, “Divine Love Lyrics from Babylon,” JSS 4 (1959) 1-15; A. Livingstone, ed., Court Poetry and Literary Miscellanea (SAA 3; Helsinki: Helsinki University Press, 1989); T. J. Meek, “Babylonian Parallels to the Song of Songs,” JBL 43 (1924) 245-52; D. Reisman, “Iddin-Dagan's Sacred Marriage Hymn,” JCS 25 (1973) 185-202; G. Rubio, “Inanna and Dumuzi: A Sumerian Love Story,” JAOS 121 (2001) 268-74; Y. Sefati, Love Songs in Sumerian Literature: Critical Edition of the Dumuzi-Inanna Songs (BSNELC; Ramat Gan: Bar-Ilan University Press, 1998); É. Suys, “Le genre dramatique dans l'Égypte ancienne,” Revue de questions scientifiques 105 (1934) 437-63; R. F. G. Sweet, “A New Look at the ‘Sacred Marriage’ in Ancient Mesopotamia,” in Corolla Torontonensis: Studies in Honour of R. M. Smith (Toronto: University of Toronto Press, 1994) 85-104; J. van Dijk, A. Goetze and M. I. Hussey, Early Mesopotamian Incantations and Rituals (YOS 11; New Haven: Yale University Press, 1985); J. G. Westenholz, “A Forgotten Love Song,” in Language, Literature, and History: Philological and Historical Studies Presented to Erica Reiner, ed. F. Rochberg-Halton (AOS 67; New Haven: American Oriental Society, 1987) 415-25; J. B. White, A Study of the Language of Love in the Song of Songs and Ancient Egyptian Poetry, (SBLDS 38; Missoula, MT: Scholars Press, 1978); N. Wyatt, Religious Texts from Ugarit (BibSem 53; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 2002).

G. A. Long

SONG OF SONGS 3: HISTORY OF INTERPRETATION

The Song of Songs, or Canticle of Canticles from canticum canticorum in the Latin tradition, has long held a prominent place in both Jewish and Christian communities. It has not only contributed to the formation of their corporate understandings of their relationship to God, spirituality, and notions of love and human sexuality but also played a significant role in individualistic expressions of spirituality and engagement of God. As a result, the history of interpretation as well as the hermeneutical issues posed by the book reveal to us the challenges of reading and interpreting the biblical documents, and demonstrate the degree to which culture and the social location of the readers impact their interpretation of Scripture. And in the case of the Song, important insights into the ties that bind humanity's physical existence with experience of God are made evident.

While it may be somewhat surprising to find such a sensual, erotic text within the canon, the Song's popularity has resulted in a complex interpretive history. Furthermore, the Song presents unique hermeneutical challenges; it has been read both corporately and individualistically, allegorically and profanely. To illustrate its impact, one need only note the commentaries written on it. By the sixteenth century over a hundred commentaries had been composed on the Song, whereas texts like Romans and Galatians, central in today's Christian imagination, could muster only a handful. Deemed inappropriate for the immature, who might be lured into pursuing sensual pleasures outside the ethical boundaries of the text and community, the Song was understood for many generations as a vault that contained treasures solely for the mature, and its meaning was thought to be encrypted within imagery that could only be unlocked by the key of allegorical interpretation.

With the rise of scientific models of historical biblical exegesis, it has become fashionable to discard the seemingly subjective heritage of Jewish and Christian allegory in favor of an "objective" analysis and interpretation that clear the way for the recovery of the text's "original meaning" in a proposed historical context. While such investigation can be elucidating, an unfortunate repercussion of this venture has deprived modern readers of certain theologically rich elements that an allegorical approach afforded. In this article we will explore issues that arise in its complicated interpretive history.

1. Canonization
2. Jewish Interpretation
3. Early Christian and Medieval Interpretation
4. Reformation Interpretation
5. Sixteenth- and Seventeenth-Century Roman Catholic Interpretation
6. Modern Interpretation
7. Hermeneutical Issues and Implications

1. Canonization.

The public reading of passages like Song of Songs 7:8-9, "I said, 'I will climb your palm tree, I will take hold of its branches, let your breasts be like the clusters of the vine, and the fragrance of your breath like apples, Your mouth is like the best wine,'" causes a degree of discomfort in most multigenerational faith settings today. This is not surprising given that the Song is one of the most profane texts included in the Hebrew *canon. In addition to its erotic language and themes, the name of God is nowhere mentioned or alluded to. The Song neither possesses a notion of salvation history or divine *law nor offers explicit moral guidelines.

So why is the Song included in the canon? The answer remains elusive, in part because there are few early traditions that discuss the topic, and there is a decided lack of information concerning introductory matters. It is often implied that if one could only unravel the reason for its inclusion into the canon, we would have an early witness to how the text was read and understood. But it may in fact be just the opposite: understanding its interpretive tradition may lead to reasons for its inclusion. Furthermore, one might also argue that the manner of reading that gave rise to its canonical status provides a hermeneutical key for the faith communities that read it today. Thus, the interpretive issues related to the Song have existed since its inclusion into the canon. The struggle today over whether the Song ought to be read simply as humanistic love poetry or an allegory is not a new question.

One position holds that the Song acquired its revered status because of its association with Solomon (Song 1:1). Early Jewish traditions seem to suggest as much. A difficult text in Josephus Contra Apion 1.8 observes that twenty-two agreed upon books constitute the canon. Of these, four are Solomonic “hymns to God and precepts for the conduct for life.” Unfortunately, these books are never named. The “hymns to God” are most likely the book of Psalms and the three remaining are Proverbs, Ecclesiastes and one other. Most argue that Josephus was referring to the Song, but we cannot be sure. An even less convincing allusion possibly occurs in a statement by Ben Sirah in Sirach 47:17, “Your [Solomon’s] songs, proverbs and parables.” What these two citations may indicate is that the Song was associated with Solomon early on, which could in part account for its inclusion. It is not clear how the Song was read, whether as Wisdom literature (and thus a collection of poems/songs extolling human love) or as an allegory.

The traditional position, if one exists, maintains that the Song achieved canonical status in the OT because it was read symbolically/allegorically, depicting Israel’s relationship to the LORD. There are a few early traditions that may affix a symbolic, though not necessarily allegorical in the strict sense, reading by the first century and early second century AD.

That the well-known Rabbi Aqiba (d. AD 135) thoroughly knew and highly esteemed the Song suggests that it had already been considered Scripture for some time. Several quotes attributed to Aqiba are important for this discussion. In the first, Aqiba disputes about the use of the Song in settings deemed inappropriate for Scripture. In t. Sanhedrin 12:10 he is quoted as saying, “Whoever sings the Song of Songs with a tremulous voice in a banquet hall and so treats it as a sort of ditty will not participate in the world to come.” In ’Aggadat šir hašširim Aqiba reputedly said, “Had not the Torah been given, Canticles would have sufficed to guide the world.” And perhaps the most important tradition related to the issue of canonicity is another saying attributed to Aqiba in dialogue with Rabbi Yose in the Mishnah (m. Yad. 3:5): “God forbid!—no man in Israel ever disputed about the Song of Songs that it does not render the hands unclean, for all the ages are not worth the day on which the Songs of Songs was given to Israel; for all the Writings are holy, but the Song of Songs is the Holy of Holies.” The phrase “render the hands unclean” affirmed the canonicity of a document. This final tradition suggests that there was still some debate in the first century regarding the canonicity of the Song and Ecclesiastes. From Aqiba’s perspective, not to include the Song in the canon was unthinkable. These quotes provide evidence that a respected rabbi deemed the Song worthy of its canonical status and indicate that there was probable broad acceptance of the Song’s inclusion into the canon early, at the latest by AD 100, and likely much earlier, since Aqiba’s death is dated to AD 135. Further, Aqiba’s outspoken disapproval of the frivolous public use of the Song implies there is an appropriate sacred use. Thus, some have concluded that the Song, although associated with Solomon and love poetry, was read symbolically, and it was this reading that led to its inclusion into the canon.

In an odd twist, four manuscripts of the Song were found among the Dead Sea Scrolls. One might wonder what a monastic group of celibate males was doing with four copies of this mildly erotic text. One of the scrolls is diminutive in size, leading to speculation that it was reduced for travel and possibly served as a devotional text. Another has a significant lacuna in which a major section of chapters 5–7 was removed. Regardless of the peculiarities of the text, it is reasonable to conclude that the Song was read as Scripture at Qumran, over a century prior to Aqiba. And while it is impossible to know exactly how it was read, given the theology and practices of that community there is good reason to believe that it was read symbolically.

The reason for the inclusion of the Song is another point that is not especially clear. Its association with Solomon may be an important contributing factor. Whether it was read as Wisdom literature alongside Proverbs and Ecclesiastes is doubtful. But having said this, it is difficult to establish what genre it was considered. The argument goes that because of its Solomonic connection, it had to be Wisdom literature and thus was initially understood as depicting love between a man and a woman. The difficulty is that this seemingly goes against the earliest readings of the Song. This broader cultural and linguistic context, when added to the Jewish narrative of God’s marriage with Israel, might add a further implicit influence upon how the Song was read within Jewish communities. It is perhaps significant to mention that the earliest Christian canonical lists include the Song (as early as the end of the first century AD).

2. Jewish Interpretation.

The Song was widely read and valued throughout the history of Judaism, but it was not for the faint of heart. It was included on the short list of passages that the young and immature were forbidden to read. The power of the Song could not exist were it not for the authentic voice derived from human experience, and such explicit passion, as beautiful as it is, could lead the young astray. As noted above, the earliest attested interpretation of the Canticles is found in a few provocative appellations attributed to Rabbi Aqiba. Aqiba lived during the later part of the first and early second centuries AD. One of the most respected rabbis of his period, he died during the Bar Kochba Revolt, supporting Bar Kochba as messiah. Other traditions also suggest that Aqiba read the Song symbolically as a love song between Israel and the LORD (m. Ta'anit 4:8). The most substantial occurrence is found in the Mekilta de Rabbi Ishmael, Shirata 3:49-63, which comments on Exodus 15:2. In this text an explicit symbolic reading of parts of the Song is developed to express the intimacy between God as the Beloved and Israel (e.g., Song 5:9). The section concludes, "But Israel reply to the Nations of the World: You have no part of Him; on the contrary, 'My Beloved is mine, and I am His' (Cant 2:16), 'I am my Beloved's and Beloved is mine' (Cant 6:3)." This does not necessarily represent an allegorical interpretation, but it does suggest that the Song was read symbolically very early. Nevertheless, Aqiba's aforementioned comment about people misusing the Song in wedding banquets, etc., indicates that some regarded the text as a profane document.

A symbolic reading of the Song would not have spontaneously erupted. There existed popular notions of hieros gamos in the surrounding Hellenistic culture known mostly through the initiation rites and rituals of the mystery cults. These cults date back to as far as 600 BC and many promoted notions of a relationship/experience of a god within the context of human sexuality. There was already a potent, well established metaphor within Jewish traditions from which it could even more naturally develop. Within Israel's earliest history, the Torah recounts the unique, monogamous relationship expected of Israel by the LORD. As M. Weinfeld has observed, "I will be your God, and you will be my people" (Lev 26:12) may also echo marital language. In fact, the intimate language of marriage—of love, loss, desire, yearning, separation, divorce and renewal—composes one of the dominant metaphors of the OT and is used to describe the relationship between the LORD and his people Israel. As this relationship degenerated, the prophets used marital language to address Israel's unfaithfulness to the LORD, often describing Israel's behavior pejoratively as "harlotry" (Jer 3:1-5; Ezek 16:25). We find similar motifs throughout the prophets, such as Hosea 1—3 and Isaiah 62:3-5.

The Song, however, makes no mention of past infidelities and unfaithfulness; rather, it extols a relationship in full bloom. It is in this context that Isaiah 62:3-5 may offer insight. The language of Isaiah, while acknowledging prior indiscretions, points to a new beginning and betrothal:

You shall no more be termed Forsaken, and your land shall no more be termed Desolate; but you shall be called My Delight Is in Her, and your land Married; for the LORD delights in you, and your land shall be married. For as a young man marries a young woman, so shall your builder marry you, and as the bridegroom rejoices over the bride, so shall your God rejoice over you. (NRSV)

The Song captures in glorious detail the feelings both bridegroom and bride share for each other. E. Davis and others have argued that this vision of Isaiah for a broken Jerusalem prompted the composition of the Song, which imaginatively expanded on the theme. Certainly the symbolic world of betrothal, of the bridegroom rejoicing over the bride, provides a rich resource for Israel's theological imagination of its relationship to God. What is fascinating is that the Song includes no hint of past indiscretions or pain. If it is a composition reflecting upon the future hope for a broken Jerusalem, it is thoroughgoing in its application.

The motivation for the composition of the Song may thus be more complicated than it first appears. Whether or not the text is a loose collection of love songs or composed as an allegory from the outset, there existed within the imagination of the Jewish people the constructs that would form the basis for a symbolic and, eventually, an allegorical reading. It is impossible to know if this notion lies at the heart of the reading in the Dead Sea Scrolls or Aqiba; however, a symbolic reading of the Song does represent a shift in the use of marriage imagery from its “plain sense” meaning to understanding the relationship of the Jewish people and their God.

Although a later development, the inclusion of the Song with the other four scrolls in the *Megillot provides further information regarding how it was interpreted within Judaism. Each scroll was read during one of the feasts in the Jewish calendar. The Song comprises the first scroll and was read during Passover. Reasons for this relationship between the Song and Passover are not entirely clear; however, it most probably is because of the linkage of the exodus with the interpretation of Song of Songs 1:9 (see also the tannaitic Mekilta de Rabbi Ishmael) and possibly the reference to spring in Song of Songs 2:11-13. Although it is doubtful that the Megillot provides evidence for an early allegorical reading of the Song, since it is difficult to determine when this connection first occurred, it is another important piece of evidence in reconstructing the traditional reading of this book. From the point of Aqiba on, the majority of texts support an allegorical model.

The allegorical interpretation is most developed in the Targum on the Song (see Targumim). The Targum, an Aramaic translation/interpretation of the Song, is dated to the seventh century AD. But this is the closing date of the work. It may, and many would argue it does, contain ancient material within it, since the Targum is not simply a translation but also the received interpretation of the book throughout the ages. It presents a carefully constructed allegory of Israel's relationship with the LORD that moves from the Exodus to the coming of messiah. P. Alexander observes that in the language and various states in which the bride and bridegroom are described, the Targumist locates the communion, estrangement and reconciliation of Israel and its God. The structure and development of the Targum reflects this rhythm:

- | | |
|---------|--|
| 1:1—3:6 | the exodus and wilderness wandering |
| 3:7—5:1 | the temple, God's presence and reception of beautiful, chaste Israel |

- | | |
|-----------|---|
| 5:2—6:1 | exile and estrangement |
| 6:2—7:9 | release from exile, reconciliation, renewal |
| 7:10—8:14 | exile, renewal and coming of messiah |

The allegory is both complex and thoroughgoing. The young, chaste bride represents Israel and Jerusalem, and the bridegroom is the LORD. Song of Songs 1:2 opens with the exodus, and the giving of revelation is likened to “the kisses of his mouth.” In Song of Songs 1:8 the assembly of Israel is the beautiful young woman whom the bridegroom loves. And Song of Songs 1:17, which extols the beauty of the first temple, anticipates the temple to be built by the *messiah out of cedar from the Garden of Eden. Many of the details of the text are woven into the history of salvation understood in Israel's metanarrative. That it culminates with the coming of messiah offers an eschatological tone, which provides both a hopeful future and expresses the joys and sorrows of human existence.

During the medieval period an allegorical reading was dominant throughout most of the Jewish tradition, the differences occurring in the referents of the terms and phrases within the Song. However, the Jewish interpretive history did expand beyond this allegorical model. Maimonides (d. 1204), the great rabbi of the thirteenth century AD, explores a spiritual, individualized interpretation. He suggested that the Song also expressed the desire of the human soul for God. The voice of the woman captures the soul's longing for God. As with many of his positions, Maimonides's views on the Song were adopted by rabbis that followed him. Another view that had some prominence understood the virgin/bride to be personified Wisdom (Don Isaac Abrabanel). The impact of the ideas and cultural change of the Renaissance and Enlightenment would also impact the synagogue and their interpretation of the Song, but not as radically as that of Christianity. The Jewish model of interpretation was adopted from the beginning in the early Christian community, and the two communities in many ways parallel each other throughout history. This is not surprising given the interchange between the synagogue and church in many regions.

3. Early Christian and Medieval Interpretation.

The Song first becomes explicitly visible in the Christian tradition in the work of Hippolytus, whose commentary on the Song is the earliest known. Allusions to the Song may have appeared much earlier, however, even in the NT documents themselves. As is well documented, the NT contains certain elements of the hierogamos (sacred marriage) traditions. For example, Jesus employs the metaphor of the bride and bridegroom to describe his relationship to his disciples (Mt 9:15; 25:1, 5; Jn 3:29). This vivid metaphor is infused with eschatological implications and expresses metaphorically his relationship to the people of God. Although the background for nuptial imagery in the NT is much disputed and many point to its possible similarities with the Hellenistic mystery cults, there are good reasons to believe that the Song forms the basis for the tradition. The most obvious is that the theological imagination of the early Christian population was shaped primarily by the OT and the theological world of Judaism. Thus the manner in which the Song was read in early Judaism is foundational for understanding how the text was read in early Christianity. As such, it is probable that the Song lies behind Jesus' use of this concept since when read symbolically it remains one of the few positive, eschatological portrayals of nuptial imagery within the Bible. This is especially so if the Song was read symbolically during his life. The Song and the Jesus material may also lie behind the theologically rich notion of the church as the Bride of Christ (Eph 5), texts like 2 John and the image of the new Jerusalem in Revelation 21. Regardless of how one decides on this issue, there is within the pages of the NT a world of reference that includes an eschatological, even mystical relationship between God and his people.

Hippolytus of Rome (d. 235) is the first of the early Christian authors we know of who produced an actual written work on the Song, although it has only survived in pieces (Song 1:1—3:8) that are difficult to access. One of the most prolific authors of the Roman church in the early centuries, Hippolytus is important for many reasons. His work is the first extant commentary that explicitly addresses the Song in early Christianity. It seems that Origen, a younger colleague, may have visited him in Rome. Thus, it is possible that Origen's work on the Song was influenced by Hippolytus, whose views on the Song clearly support a broadly allegorical reading of it. He read it as a love song between Christ and the church. This corporate reading is important, especially in light of the more individualistic reading that would appear later. Further, in keeping with this corporate notion, he was interested in the broad salvation-historical movement of the text. Israel is replaced by the church. He is the first to interpret the male breasts of Song of Songs 1:2 (so LXX) as the two testaments. Further, his is a generally soteriological reading of the Song. Since so little of his work survives, it is difficult to be more comprehensive in one's comments; however, Hippolytus clearly establishes a symbolic/allegorical reading of the Song very early and lays the foundation for Origen's work, which would become the most influential commentary for later authors.

Origen's commentary and homilies on the Song (c. 244) are perhaps the most crucial for understanding the interpretation of the Song in the medieval period, an era in which the Song was the most loved and commented upon text of all. There are, for example, over one hundred extant commentaries and homilies on the Song from the sixth to the fifteenth centuries. This focused literary output is to a large extent reliant on the early work of Origen. Origen was born in Alexandria and moved later to Palestine, and his writings betray an awareness of Hellenistic thought while simultaneously demonstrating a profoundly Jewish influence. It is too simplistic to describe his reading of the text as allegorical, which would lead to a repressed sexuality and mystical introspection. His method is more complex than that. Careful with literary issues, he affirms that it is a marriage song composed by Solomon in the form of a drama, and he comments extensively on the literary conventions used, making reference to Greek literature. Key to understanding Origen is his prologue to the Song, in which he makes clear that his use of the allegorical method is an attempt to get at the theological relevance of the text for his audience. In his opinion, the literary character of the Song essentially demands such a reading. With regard to Origen's understanding of humanity, his work does betray an affinity to the Neo-Platonism of his day. The human person possesses an outer shell and an inner soul, and this dualism shapes his understanding of the physical and of love. He parallels the concern of the Jewish rabbis for the immature who might read the Song, suggesting that they may be led into pursuit of fleshly lust. Instead, the mature learn to listen to the Song, which speaks to the needs of the inner soul; love in the Song refers to love directed toward God. It is Origen's concern for both the plain sense of the text and the symbolic readings that shape the spiritual meaning of the text that lays the framework for the subsequent medieval commentaries. Perhaps most importantly, Origen offers both an ecclesiological, corporate reading of the Song and an individualistic one. The bridegroom is Christ and the bride the church, and what is true for the church is true for each individual. Origen opened the door to the notions of the inward spiritual journey of the individual and the marriage of the soul to God.

There are few commentators through the medieval period who interpret the Song in a literal fashion. Theodore of Mopsuestia, bishop from 392 to 428, deemed the Song a secular love song not suited for the canon and strenuously resisted Origen's approach to the text. Another, Julian of Eclanum, a Pelagian, produced a non-allegorical commentary that was subsequently challenged by Bede.

On the other hand, Jerome, in spite of his cautions against Origen, had great respect for his commentary on the Song and adopted the approach in his own work. Gregory the Great did likewise in his work on the Song, and its popularity reinforced the allegorical reading of the Song throughout the empire. The Song for Gregory may literally be a collection of erotic love poems and speeches between two lovers, but it is through this medium that God calls the soul of the believer to a more passionate embrace of his love.

A thoroughgoing Marian exegesis was first expounded by Rupert of Deutz at the beginning of the twelfth century. Deutz was a prolific author and theologian from the period. His study on the Song sought to explore the idea of the incarnation. When he considered more fully the role of Mary as the one through whom the incarnation occurred, he developed a reading of the Song with those sensitivities. Bernard of Clairvaux's commentary on the Song is perhaps the pinnacle of the medieval period, both for its literary and spiritual quality. It is powerful both in its spiritual insight and the evocative language that urges devotion and the experience of unification with God. But Bernard is clear that such passion and devotion is reserved for the monastery and that the union of the person, both body and soul, will not occur until the veil of death is crossed.

The motivation for and use of allegory in medieval texts is often represented by modern scholars as resulting from an ascetic push within the church due to a rejection of physicality and sexuality and a pursuit of spirituality. Such a negative caricature misunderstands the medieval situation and allegory. Notions of the body, human sexuality, spirituality and the pursuit of God were much more nuanced even amongst the ascetics. Medieval commentators on the Song do not betray this repulsion with the physical nor the repression that is so often attributed to them. Instead, there is more often than not an appreciation for the physical. Recent studies of this issue suggest that it is more of a projection of erotic obsession from the modern period. Rather the hermeneutic that underlies allegory marks an attempt to demonstrate the love of God through Christ in the OT documents. Nuptial imagery, the intimate love between Christ and the church and the individual soul, is perhaps the most intimate form. Further, the language from the commentators is marked by purity, and a chaste, even innocent devotion to Christ. As E. A. Matter argues, the modern mind seems fundamentally to misunderstand the medieval mind with regard to this topic.

4. Reformation Interpretation.

The Renaissance and the Reformation initiated a shift in how the Song was interpreted. Luther's work on the Song, while not thoroughgoing in its execution, is an important marker for this change in the exegesis of the book. As noted earlier, there were already in the history of interpretation those who emphasized a more literal reading that viewed it as a piece of profane literature. But these were marginal voices. In Luther we discover an important voice in the shaping of exegesis for the Reformation. He produced one of the few extended expositions on the Song, which is itself an important observation given the Song's prominence up until this time. He rejects, at least in part, the emphasis upon the individual, a mystical reading, and even the historical notion that it is a collection of love songs by Solomon for Pharaoh's daughter. Instead, he intentionally attempts to chart a new course in interpretation that is historically located. His method is perhaps more important than his actual position. He suggests that the Song was written as a political encomium that addressed issues relating to the political state of Israel. Solomon's composition gives thanks to God for the love God has given to Israel. Even with his historical method, however, allegory remains a part of his practice. God is the male figure throughout the Song and the bride is the people of Israel. The woman can also represent the church and, occasionally, even the individual's soul. Luther may be less than consistent in his application of his hermeneutical model, but his work does represent a sustained attempt to break from the previous centuries of interpretation.

Calvin and many of his followers, however, maintained a more traditional, ecclesial reading of the Song. Some went so far as to argue, in a manner similar to the historical reading of the Talmud, that it detailed the history of the Protestant church, culminating with the victory over the Catholic Church. Given the hostility toward Catholicism at this time, it should not surprise us that Protestant scholars held a similar disdain for a Marian reading of the Song. Nevertheless, a renewed concern for philology, historical analysis and a critical engagement with hermeneutical assumptions that lie behind the interpretation of the text begin to emerge during this period, and would radically alter how the Song was interpreted within the community of faith. The rise of the historical-critical approach sought to establish controls or boundaries for the meaning of the text through an increasing emphasis on its historical and literary character.

5. Sixteenth- and Seventeenth-Century Roman Catholic Interpretation.

Roman Catholic interpretation of the Song remained within the broad stream of approaches that developed during the medieval period. The primary interpretation viewed the Song as an allegory depicting Christ and the church (ecclesial), but in some quarters, particularly the monasteries, there was also further exploration of the individual, inward spirituality that began with Origen. The well-known Spanish Carmelite mystics St. Teresa of Avila (1515-1582) and St. John of the Cross (1542-1591) continued with the notion of the "spiritual marriage" of the soul with Christ. The Marian interpretation also flourished. But alongside these approaches, there was also an emphasis upon the Hebrew text and philology, and an engagement of Jewish scholarship on the Song.

The work of Erasmus represents a progressive voice in Roman Catholicism during this period. Although he enjoyed only limited influence during his lifetime, he had a substantial impact upon the scholarship of the subsequent seventeenth century and beyond. His emphasis upon the plain sense of the text and an exegetical model that focused upon the grammatical-historical countered the mystical, individual and Marian readings that had become so deeply embedded in the medieval imagination. Several important works followed those of Erasmus that explored in greater detail the historical background for the Song. For example, H. Grotius (1583-1645) called attention to potential Hellenistic parallels for the Song. He argued that a Hellenistic provenance would mark the Song as a collection of humanistic love songs. Another influential work was that of Bishop Bossuet (1627-1704), who was one of the earliest to argue that the Song was composed as a Solomonic nuptial liturgy. These are only a few examples from a rich diversity that arose within Catholic circles. The struggle between the scholars and the monasteries was beneficial in that it helped preserve the strengths of both the allegorical and historical approaches to this complex text. It is unfortunate that this period marked the shift in the theological imagination of both Protestants and Catholics. The Song, and much that it stood for, was sidelined, and theological texts like Romans and Galatians moved to the forefront.

6. Modern Interpretation.

The transition to the modern period and the impact of the Enlightenment is writ large in the scholarly literature on the Song. The intellectual energy and curiosity of this period and its interdisciplinary engagement has led to many thoughtful analyses of the Song. It has become, however, one of the lesser studied books of Bible due to its esoteric and seemingly non-theological content. During the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries there was a decided move away from medieval allegorical interpretations to a more historically grounded model after Theodore of Mopsuestia, Origen, Luther and Erasmus. The focus shifted from ecclesial and individual spirituality to a critical investigation of its origins, language, context and the potential sources that may have influenced its composition. Perhaps as importantly, the discussion turned from how the text was read in the church or synagogue to more academic matters. If the medieval interest was almost solely in the rich allegorical interpretation of the Song that had christological, ecclesial and soteriological themes in view, the shift that began with the Reformers, Erasmus and others was marked by a concern to understand its history. Whether this latter view is as scientific as it assumes is currently being questioned, but the emphasis upon philology, the Hebrew text, archeology and literary elements has served to provide a wealth of information that would frame the context for the present-day interpreters of the Song.

There are three general approaches to the Song in modern scholarship, each with their own variations. They include: (1) The Song celebrates Israel's marriage to God through the use of cultic nuptial imagery derived from the cultures surrounding ancient Israel; (2) The song is a collection of love songs that extols the virtues of human love and nothing more; (3) The Song is an allegory that depicts the lavish love affair between God and Israel. Each of these assumes that the original compositional history provides the hermeneutical key to unlock the Song's meaning and in turn shapes how it should be read within a community of faith. From these, two further issues emerge. First, its compositional history is important since its genre, date, authorship, style, conceptual world and so forth tell us much about what the text means, but because it is poetry, this is a much more complicated issue than first appears. Second, for communities of faith that read the Song as sacred text, the relationship between its historical origins and how the text ought to be interpreted is not immediately clear.

The publication of the Akkadian and Sumerian texts opened a new world for interpreters who were looking for comparisons for the Song in the surrounding ancient Near Eastern cultures. Scholars focused upon the ancient texts and assumed that the belief systems, practices and rituals that may have existed in these cultures necessarily also existed in Israel and shaped the writing of the Song. These ancient religious rites explored and celebrated their relationship to their god in ways that are reflected in the erotic nuptial imagery. Given the difficulty in demonstrating beyond a surface level that the Song reflects such cultic rituals within Israel's cultus, the supposed similarities have not proved overly convincing for most scholars.

A more promising model that now commands the majority opinion among scholars suggests that the origin of the Song is best explained through parallels with Egyptian love poetry (thirteenth to eleventh centuries BC). The Song bears striking similarities with the Egyptian love songs (Fox), which are not tied to an experience of the divine but are simply short poems/songs that celebrate human love and affection. Similarities in language, motifs, metaphors and content may suggest that the Song derives from this period in history in Israel's history. If this is the case, then the Song is a loose collection of love songs/poetry that extols human love and probably fits well within the broader category of wisdom literature. With this identification, the interpretation of the Song and its role within a community of faith differs from that conjured by the medieval imagination. The Song now becomes a beautiful erotic poem that lauds human sexuality between a man and woman within a monogamous relationship. Some sex therapists go so far as to use it as a handbook of sorts for helping couples with difficulties in their sexual relationship.

Given the popularity of understanding the Song as a collection of humanistic love songs, one might be forgiven for disregarding other trends in scholarship which have brought to light fascinating dimensions of the Song. Rather than viewing the Song as merely a loose collection of love songs, recent interests in literary criticism have pointed out the development of themes, characters and certain dramatic elements. And although it is difficult to trace a single unifying plot, as one might expect to find in a narrative or drama, there is something of a unified whole. The inclusion of dialogue, for example, serves to assist in the creation of this unity. If there is a unity, however, an important question emerges regarding whether it is an edited collection of mildly erotic poetry, or whether the author sought to create a poetic drama. Another school of interpretation argues that the book is a drama (F. Delitzsch, C. D. Ginsberg, S. R. Driver, I. Provan). In fact, a century ago this was the dominant position. The difficulty remains, however, in determining whether there are two or three characters in addition to the chorus, and in understanding the exact nature of the plot of the drama.

Other scholarly investigations have caused some to posit female authorship for the Song based on the voice of the woman and her behavior throughout. The woman's openness regarding her desires and pursuit of the groom is remarkable given the likely cultural constraints of the time. Others have pointed to possible theological reflection as a subtext through allusion to important biblical texts, Genesis 2–3 in particular (Trible). Although less dominant, there remains a strong voice that continues to support an allegorical reading. Much depends on the definitions of a symbolic or allegorical reading. Positions vary from a broad symbolic poetic model that does not seek to press details to a more engaged allegory. Intriguing are the allusions to the OT that are seemingly present in the Song (Is 62:3-5) that perhaps shape the message and content of the allegory (Davis), infusing it with theological content that makes a statement about Israel and its relations with God. Whether allegorical, or psychological and mystical, or simply exploring an amorous, freely expressed relationship between a male and female, the Song evokes a beauty and Edenic quality (Gen 2–3) that transcends culturally embedded notions of love and desire. The haunting question of whether the meaning of the text necessarily resides in this social and historical context of human love and passion or whether it points to another dimension has not been resolved. The twists and turns of interpretive models and their societal and cultural parallels suggest that the answer may not be easily found, but they certainly raise a host of hermeneutical issues that are fascinating to explore.

7. Hermeneutical Issues and Implications.

As mentioned above, the Song, which was once one of the most esteemed books in the canon, has fallen from its exalted position to become largely marginalized. Such a demotion is unfortunate, and modern readers are deprived as a result. The Song is one of those texts in which we encounter beauty and learn about true humanity and love, emotional and physical attraction in all its human complexity and power. When compared to expressions of human passion in the surrounding cultures of that time and ours today, however, the Song presents a different portrait of human sexuality than might be expected. While honest and authentic, it remains discrete, innocent, even naïve in some ways. Such innocence and authenticity are evident in both the bride and groom. As is frequently noted, the bride speaks openly and without embarrassment about her desires, her passions, her sexuality and interests. She refers to his body and her desire for him without self-consciousness. This is a picture we perhaps least expect given common misconceptions about the traditional culture from which it arose. And the groom expresses himself similarly. Theologically, these observations are important for understanding the Song. Regardless of how it is read, the “plain sense” or surface reading of the text offers a robust physicality embodied in two people who extol with their community the free expression of their love, sexuality and desire for fulfillment within the confines of a monogamous relationship.

But how is a person or community in our time to read and interpret such a document? Is it a book solely about sex and love, a biblical text for sex-education classes or counselors? Or is there another level of meaning that explores the relationship between the human and the divine? Very often the historical-critical and allegorical interpretations are treated as polar opposites, apparently irreconcilable. But is this cleavage necessary? As the early and later allegorists well understood, the plain sense of the text is a crucial first step in the interpretation process.

The historical-critical approach that has characterized much of biblical scholarship over the past few centuries has contributed greatly to understanding the Song and provided some interpretive controls that limit the inherent subjectivity of other approaches. The judicious philological, cultural and historical analyses helped frame the context of the content and message of the Song. This is particularly the case with the metaphors and imagery, which demand an awareness of the cultural and linguistic context to unlock their meaning. The authority that is conferred upon the Song as a result of its reception into the canon renders the Song's exploration and expression of passion as exemplary for the community of faith. But lest one think that it be read simply on its own, the canonical location of the Song within the canon suggests further boundaries for meaning. For example, the woman who pursues her beloved in the Song is starkly contrasted with the loose, adulterous woman of Proverbs 2:16-19. Here the canon places constraints upon the meaning of the Song and further develops the motifs of faithfulness, trust, monogamy, covenant and so forth that are implicit in the Song but explicit in the surrounding books. Regardless of whether one considers the text fundamentally as allegory, the expression of love between the man and woman within the text must itself cohere with God's view of an appropriate expression of human love and sexuality as expressed through the cultural medium of that period. Thus the Song provides a poetic expression of love and passion for the people of God in which physicality is an important element in the experience of life's beauty. And this too is a gift of God.

The overwhelming tendency of both Jewish and Christian communities has been to read the Song either symbolically or allegorically. Apart from a few disparate voices, it was not until the development of the historical-critical method that there was a noticeable shift concerning how the text was read. While there has been a need to arrive at agreed-upon controls for meaning in order to limit the almost limitless possibilities that an allegorical model offers the reader, perhaps too frequently the challenge to the allegorical reading is based on the misconception that it diminishes the import of the physical in its quest for a spiritual engagement of God. This rejection of the plain sense meaning, it is assumed, derives from a decided distrust of and distaste for physical matters, the result of a gnostic or neo-Platonic influence. While no doubt true in some cases, the better allegorical treatments devoted much energy and care to investigating the plain sense of the text. It was clear that the physical provided an authentic portrait of the human relationship with God. The Song loses its symbolic power if it lacks coherence. The use of such intimate, physical, emotive language itself validates the physical, and validates the lovers as paradigmatic.

Several questions emerge for the reader of this text. To what degree should the historical-critical method and its assumptions and conclusions, in this case unknowable conclusions regarding date, authorship, genre and historical situation, shape the reading of the text? To this one might further inquire about the role that the history of interpretation ought to play in interpreting the text. Rejection of a minority or ab-errant reading is one thing, but to dismiss many centuries of a particular method may not be entirely appropriate. Further, if the Song was received into the canon based on a symbolic/allegorical reading, it seems legitimate to ask whether this does not itself provide a hermeneutical key for interpreting the book. It is perhaps the poetic nature of the Song that allows for a level of meaning beyond the literal. The poetic opens windows to worlds unknown and unexplored, inviting us to love openly and passionately, with all our being. It moves us beyond the rational, to engage all that it means to be human. It may also be that it expresses in poetic form what it means to love the Lord your God with all your heart, soul and might.

See also FEMINIST INTERPRETATION; SONG OF SONGS 1: BOOK OF; SONG OF SONGS 2: ANCIENT NEAR EASTERN BACKGROUND; TARGUMIM; WASF.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. P. S. Alexander, The Targum of Canticles: Translated, with a Critical Introduction, Apparatus, and Notes (ArBib 17A; Collegeville, MN: Liturgical Press, 2003); A. Brenner, "Women Poets and Authors," in A Feminine Companion to the Song of Songs, ed. A. Brenner (Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1993); E. F. Davis, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, and the Song of Songs (WestBC; Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 2000); M. V. Fox, The Song of Songs and the Ancient Egyptian Love Songs (Madison, WI: University of Wisconsin, 1985); T. Longman III, Song of Songs (NICOT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2001); E. A. Matter, The Voice of My Beloved: The Song of Songs in Western Medieval Christianity (Philadelphia: University of Pennsylvania Press, 1990); R. E. Murphy, "History of Exegesis as Hermeneutical Tool: The Song of Songs," BTB 16 (1986) 87-91; idem, The Song of Songs: A Commentary on the Book of Canticles or the Song of Songs (Hermeneia; Minneapolis: Fortress, 1990); R. A. Norris, trans. and ed., The Song of Songs: Interpreted by Early Christian and Medieval Commentaries (The Church's Bible; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2003); M. Pope, Song of Songs: A New Translation with Introduction and Commentary (AB 7C; Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1977); A. Robert, R. Tournay with A. Feuillet, Le Cantique des Cantiques: traduction et commentaire (EBib; Paris: Librairie Lecoffre, 1963); W. H. Schoff, ed., The Song of Songs: A Symposium (Philadelphia: The Commercial Museum, 1924); P. Trible, God and the Rhetoric of Sexuality (OBT 2; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1978).

R. Beaton

SONS OF KORAH. See ASAPH AND SONS OF KORAH.

SOUND PATTERNS

Careful readers of Hebrew poetry, even in translation, are well aware of patterns formed by repeated thought (semantic *parallelism and occasionally *stanzas/strophes), grammar and syntax (grammatical parallelism), and even words (*wordplays). Patterns are also formed on the level of the sound of words (sound play or phonological parallelism). Sound plays are less pervasive in Hebrew poetry than semantic parallelism, and of course they may be detected only by readers of the original language. They do not carry over easily or elegantly into translation in another language.

As an occasional trope, sound patterns may be considered a secondary poetical device, though they function in both a structural and an aesthetic way. Rarely, sound plays demonstrably support the thought of a poetic line (see 2 below). Studies of Hebrew poetry often recognize four types of sound patterns: rhyme, consonance, assonance, onomatopoeia. In this article, alliteration refers to a combination of consonance and assonance.

1. Definitions
2. Functions
3. Types
4. Conclusion

1. Definitions.

In general, a sound pattern is based on the “sound-identity of words” or the “echoing of words” in near vicinity to each other (Goldsmith, 15). An obvious example of a sound pattern comes from the children’s verse “Peter Piper picked a pair of pickled peppers.” The constant repetition of the consonant p links these words together, but so does the predominance of i and e vowels.

The repetition of consonants is consonance, while assonance indicates the near identity of the vowel sounds. When both assonance and consonance occur in a poetic line, it is referred to as alliteration. Some interpreters, however, use alliteration and consonance as synonyms in reference to consonantal sound patterns (see Watson, 225-26; contra McCreesh, 27; Goldsmith, 15-16). Whereas alliteration and assonance permeate a poetic unit, rhyme exists between two or more whole words. Take the English proverb “A stitch in time saves nine,” where “time” and “nine” create a jingle. Onomatopoeia is also on the level of the word, in this case the single word, whose meaning and sound are related. A snake’s “hiss” and an owl’s “hoot” provide helpful examples.

It is often difficult to determine when these sound patterns occur in Hebrew poetry. After all, language has a limited number of consonants and, especially, of vowels, so accidental congruence is a genuine possibility. From the given examples below, however, it is hard to escape the idea that the ancient poets were conscious of these devices and used them to enhance their poems.

2. Functions.

Why do poets bother to create sound plays? Specifically, why do ancient Hebrew poets expend creative energy forming patterns of sounds? Looking at the same question from a different perspective, we can ask, “What effects do alliteration, assonance, rhyme and onomatopoeia have on the hearer/reader of poetry?”

In the first place, we recognize sounds patterns as part of a panoply of artistic devices available to the poet to draw attention not only to the message of the poem but also to its beauty. In other words, sound plays serve an aesthetic function. Poets are concerned about how they present their message as well as the thought content of their poetry. Poetry is artificial language, which is distanced from everyday speech. Indeed, literary prose is also artificial, but less so. Alliteration draws attention to itself. Of course, in everyday conversation someone might very occasionally voice an alliterative statement. If too much alliteration is used, however, the speaker is considered affective (a negative assessment). On the other hand, multiple sound plays often enhance the beauty of the poem. Sound plays also indicate that even if the poems were not composed orally, which they may have been, they were certainly to be heard, since that is the realm in which sound plays have their effect.

Sound plays do more than beautify language, though that is important enough. They often create cohesion in a literary unit. In Hebrew poetry that unit is most often the verse or poetic line. In this way, sound patterns, which might be considered a type of phonological parallelism (Cooper, 86-93), support the cohesion provided by semantic and grammatical parallelism.

Though the phenomenon is rarely attested, sound plays can support the meaning of a passage. One of the most developed discussions of this phenomenon, however, is found in the study of Nahum 1:10 by A. Cooper (86-88).

kî 'ad-sîrîm šebūkîm ûkšob'âm šebû'im
'ukkêlû kēqāš yābēš mālē'

Like thorns they are entangled, like drunkards stinking of drink;
they will be fully consumed like dry stubble.

In a context that speaks of drunkards, the verse uses a superabundance of sibilants that produce a kind of slurry effect that mimics drunken speech. (Note also the use of many sibilants in Job 12:25, a verse that refers to the staggering of drunkards.)

3. Types.

3.1. Rhyme. Rhyme occurs when two or more words sound the same. A rhyme is not dependent on identical or nearly identical consonantal or vowel sounds. Although critics suggest a number of different categories of rhymes based on whether the rhyme exists in the last syllable, the second-to-last stressed syllable and so forth, the scarcity of rhyme in Hebrew does not invite further development here.

This is not to deny the existence of some rhyme in Hebrew. After all, in Genesis 1:2 the primordial heavens and earth are described in what is certainly an intentional rhyme as tôhû wābôhû ("formless and void")

Though present, rhyme does not appear to be a significant interest of ancient poets (or of prose writers, as the Genesis passage reminds us). At least that is the persuasive position of W. Watson (232), who says that "some cases of rhyme may be fortuitous, due to the limited number of word-endings available." In other words, rhyming may be purely accidental in a language such as Hebrew, which forms words in predictable ways. Even so, M. O'Connor represents scholars who defend the idea that Hebrew poets had a larger appreciation and more frequent use of rhyme. His arguments have some persuasive power to them. Among other things, he points to Arabic poetry (a Semitic language like Hebrew), which clearly utilizes rhyme, and to C. Krahmalkov's study of neo-Punic poetry.

Based on the evidence that we have, it is probably best not to deny that poetry has rhyme, but we should not expect widespread use. We should be hesitant to ascribe rhyme to a passage if the connection is drawn through common grammatical features. Even more, any attempt to emend a text to reconstruct rhyme should be abandoned.

3.2. Consonance. Consonance occurs when a particular consonantal sound dominates a poetic unit. This may be a single consonant, but more often it is a group of related consonants. Consonants may be grouped according to how they are formed by the mouth, throat and lips. In the example from Nahum 1:10, the consonance is formed by sibilants (produced by a stream of air directed through a narrow passage in the mouth toward the teeth: šādē, sāmek, šin, šin, zayin). Proverbs 30:20 has a predominance of labials (articulated with both lips or the lower lip and the upper teeth). They include bêt, mêm, pê:

kên derek 'iššâ mēnā'āpet
'āklâ ûmāhātâ pihâ
wē'āmrâ tô'pā'altî 'āwen

This is the way of an adulterous woman:
she eats and wipes her mouth,
and she says, "I have done nothing wrong!"

The use of labials likely suggested itself to the poet because of the intent of the verse, which draws attention to the mouth of the adulterous woman.

Nahum 1:10 and Proverbs 30:20 demonstrate consonance supporting the meaning of the passages, but it is more often the case that consonance is not directly related to the meaning but rather serves a cohesive function, helping to bind the poetic line. Proverbs 13:17 uses labials in a proverb on messengers:

mal'āk rāšā' yippōl bēra'
wēšir 'ēmûnim marpē'

A wicked messenger will fall into evil, but a reliable envoy brings healing.

3.3. Assonance. To repeat, assonance refers to the "sound-identity" of vowels and is thus the flip side of consonance. Semitic language has three classes of vowels (a, e/i, o/u). With only three classes of vowels, the possibility of accidental assonance is likely, though it is also likely that poets on some occasions exploited vocalic sounds to produce an effect that they thought pleasing and also perhaps produced cohesion.

Ecclesiastes 7:2 provides an example. The transliteration demonstrates the frequency of i/e vowels that does not seem coincidental:

ṭôb lāleket ʿel-bêt-ʿēbel

milleket ʿel-bêt mišteh

Better to go to a house of mourning than to go to a house of drinking.

3.4. Alliteration. Alliteration refers to those occasions where both assonance and consonance are found. An example that borders on rhyme is seen in Song of Songs 1:3:

šemen tûraq šēmekā

Your name is poured-out oil.

3.5. Onomatopoeia. Here the sound play has to do with the origins of the word itself. The word's sound is related to its meaning. Watson (235) provides an excellent example from Song of Songs 1:2, where the sound Hebrew word for kiss is formed from a sound that resembles a kiss:

yīššāqēnī minnēššiqōt pihū

Let him kiss me with the kisses of his mouth.

4. Conclusion.

Sound patterns such as rhyme, consonance, assonance, alliteration and onomatopoeia are part of the Hebrew poets' strategy for ornamenting their language and occasionally supporting their message or, even more frequently, imposing cohesion on a poetic unit, particularly the line. On many occasions we are left to guess whether the "sound-identity" of a poem is accidental or occasional. On virtually all occasions it is impossible to replicate the sound pattern in English or other languages without sounding stilted. Even so, the careful reader of Hebrew poetry will be sensitive to the potential presence of such patterns.

See also HEBREW LANGUAGE; POETICS, TERMINOLOGY OF; WORDPLAY.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. A. Cooper, "Biblical Poetics: A Linguistic Approach" (Ph.D. diss., Yale University, 1976); U. R. Goldsmith, "Alliteration," in Princeton Encyclopedia of Poetry and Poetics, ed. A. Preminger (Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1965) 15-16; C. R. Krahmalkov, "Two

New-Punic Poems in Rhymed Verse," Revista di studi fenici 2 (1975) 169-205; T. P. McCreesh, Biblical Sound and Sense: Poetic Sound Patterns in Proverbs 10-29 (JSOTSup 128; Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1991); M. O'Connor, Hebrew Verse Structure (Winona Lake, IN: Eisenbrauns, 1980); W. G. E. Watson, Classical Hebrew Poetry: A Guide to Its Techniques (2nd ed.; London: T & T Clark, 2005); J. P. van der Westhuizen, "Assonance in Biblical and Babylonian Hymns of Praise," Semitics 7 (1980) 81-101. T. Longman III

SPACIALITY. See SOCIAL-SCIENTIFIC APPROACHES.

SPIRIT, DIVINE. See DIVINE PRESENCE.

STANDARD BIBLICAL HEBREW. See HEBREW LANGUAGE.

STANZA, STROPHE

The terms canto, stanza and strophe refer to structural divisions within a poem. Scholars use these terms with different meanings, and so confusion often accompanies their use. Further, disagreement exists whether such terminology is appropriate for Hebrew poetry. This article describes the issues and debate.

The study of these larger structural units takes a practical turn in the formatting of modern translations. Stanza/strophe divisions typically are marked by an additional space. Thus, translators must make determinations of structure in order to format the psalm.

1. Definitions
2. Do Hebrew Poems Have Stanzas/
Strophes?
3. Examples
4. Conclusion

1. Definitions.

Canto, stanza and strophe are the most popular terms for verse formations in Hebrew poetry above the level of the individual poetic line (although van der Lugt [522-35] and Watson [168-200] use strophe in reference to the line). The language derives from the analysis of classical poetry. Indeed, the word strophe comes from the Greek word for "turn" and refers to the fact that the Greek chorus would walk in a certain direction on stage when delivering a speech and then turn to deliver the next unit (the antistrophe). In classical poetry these poetical units normally were of the same length.

Unfortunately, the terminology has not been used consistently in the study of Hebrew poetry. For instance, most scholars use strophe and stanza interchangeably in reference to any grouping of verses above the poetic line. Others, such as W. Watson (160-63), argue that stanzas are composed of strophes. He notes that a possible etymology of stanza is from the Italian for “room,” and that the stanzas are like the rooms of a house, while the strophes are the furniture that composes the room. Although it is unlikely that stanza has this etymology, the picture image clarifies Watson’s understanding of the relationship of the parts of a poem. P. van der Lugt (72) now prefers the term canto to stanza.

The rest of this article focuses on the question of the existence of larger structures in Hebrew poems. Rather than using strophe to refer to the elements that compose a stanza (alternately canto), I will use stanza and strophe interchangeably (and avoid canto) to refer to macrostructures within a poem.

2. Do Hebrew Poems Have Stanzas/Strophes?

Van der Lugt (1-68) has performed an important service by narrating the history of the discussion of macrostructure of Hebrew poems from the early nineteenth century to the early twenty-first century. The first scholar to use strophe as a category in the study of Hebrew poetry was J. L. Saalschütz in 1825. He delineated four marks that help distinguish the strophes of a poem: (1) *acrostic; (2) *refrain; (3) the Hebrew term šēlā; (4) content (see van der Lugt, 4). As we will see, these markers are still considered significant.

Since the time of Saalschütz to the present day (see van der Lugt; Watson; de Moor) a minority of scholars have focused on the analysis of strophic structures. Indeed, in his commentary on the Psalms, S. Terrien constructed his outline of each psalm on an investigation of strophic structure. On the other hand, from soon after Saalschütz to the present day there have also been naysayers. Although it is hard to deny that certain psalms fall into sections larger than the poetic line, these are rarely regular, uniform divisions. Also, as we can already see from Saalschütz’s four markers of strophes, some (acrostic, refrain, šēlā) do not occur widely in Hebrew poetry and do not always coincide with the fourth category, content.

For instance, in Psalm 67 a refrain appears: “May the peoples praise you, God; may all the peoples praise you” (Ps 67: 3, 5). But does it separate stanzas? A close look suggests that it does not. It is more likely that it serves as a kind of *inclusio in the middle of the poem, surrounding Psalm 67:4, which also has the form of a wish.

The term šēlā may, indeed may often, separate units within a poem. The use of šēlā in Psalm 3 roughly divides logical units in the poem (though one might expect a šēlā after Ps 3:6) and also brings the psalm to closure. But šēlā also occurs in contexts where there is no obvious major break between sections (i.e., Ps 4:4; 68:32).

When all is said and done, it should be recognized that most poems divide nicely into larger units based on content, sometimes bolstered by rhetorical devices such as acrostic, refrain and šēlā. Watson (163), in my view, gets it right when he states, “It is generally agreed that (a) stanza division tends to be based on content; (b) there are certain stanza-markers showing where stanzas begin and/or end and (c) there are no hard and fast rules. It is a matter of feel.” As we will observe in the examples below, these stanza markers include a judicious use of acrostic, refrain, šēlā and content.

3. Examples.

3.1. Marked by Acrostic. Acrostics are clear and undisputed markers of structure within psalms, and examiners of strophic structure have devoted a lot of attention to them. That said, in most cases, acrostics are really better indicators of structure on the level of the poetic line, since most acrostics have a new letter every line and do not form larger structures (see Pss 111; 112). There are two exceptions to this rule. The first and the most impressive is Psalm 119. This psalm changes successive letters in eight-verse blocks. These eight-verse blocks also utilize eight different Hebrew words that are in the semantic domain of “law.” These two features produce a magnificent poem of twenty-two strophes. Lamentations 3 is a second example. While Lamentations 1; 2; 4 are verse-by-verse acrostics, Lamentations 3 moves to a successive letter in three-verse blocks (see Longman).

3.2. Marked by Refrain. Previously, we noted that refrains do not always indicate strophes; sometimes they provide emphasis on a theme within the psalm or serve some other purpose. They rarely divide the psalm into even or nearly even sections. Even so, it is hard to deny that at least occasionally refrains provide closure to a major unit within a psalm that could be called a strophe. Psalms 42–43 are good examples. It is commonly recognized that these two psalms were originally one psalm, as is indicated by the thrice-repeated refrain “Why are you cast down, O my soul, and why are you disquieted within me? Hope in God; for I shall again praise him, my help and my God” (Ps 42:5, 11; 43:5). The refrain neatly divides the poem into three units, with the refrain serving to close the strophes (Ps 42:1-5, 6-11; 43:1-5). For a full discussion of this topic, see Raabe.

3.3. Marked by Content. Here is where Watson’s assertion that structural analysis is a “matter of feel” comes most into play, although typically appeal can be made to rhetorical features of the psalm. Psalm 98 can serve as an example. A close reading indicates that this psalm falls into three equal strophes (Ps 98:1-3, 4-6, 7-9). Each strophe calls on its hearers to praise God. The dynamism of the psalm is in part that the group of hearers expands from strophe 1 (Israel) to strophe 2 (all the inhabitants of the earth) to strophe 3 (all creation, animate and inanimate). Further, each strophe praises God for different reasons. The first praises God as Israel’s Savior, the second as the earth’s King, and the third as the Judge of all creation. Finally, there is also movement in terms of the time frame. Strophe 1 looks to the past, strophe 2 considers the present, and strophe 3 looks to the future.

3.4. Marked by Generic Components. Modern scholars recognize typical components of the major genres of the psalms. A lament, for instance, often contains an invocation, pleas to God for help, complaints, a confession of sin or assertion of innocence, *imprecations, a statement of confidence in God’s response and/or a *hymn (see Lament, Psalms of). Not every lament has all these elements, but whatever elements a particular psalm contains may indicate stanza/strophe breaks. An outline of Psalm 69 looks like this:

- Invocation and Initial Plea to God for Help (v. 1a)
- First Complaint (vv. 1b-4)
- Confession of Sin (vv. 5-6)
- Second Complaint (vv. 7-12)
- Second Plea to God for Help (vv. 13-18)
- Third Complaint (vv. 19-21)
- Imprecation (vv. 22-28)
- Third Plea to God for Help (v. 29)

Hymn of Praise (vv. 30-36)

3.5. Marked by śelâ. Among the more intriguing features of certain psalms (and Hab 3) is the appearance of the Hebrew word śelâ. This word occurs within the body of the psalm but not in the verse itself. It appears to be some kind of direction for the performance of the psalm. Much uncertainty surrounds its meaning and translation (see Craigie, 76-77). The problem is that more than one possible philological argument can be made, and since the word does not appear in a sentence, context gives no guidance to the lexicographer. This problem goes back to ancient times, since the versions translate the word in different directions.

Our present interest in śelâ does not require that we define its meaning; rather, we are interested in whether it might mark stanza/strophe divisions in those psalms in which it appears. In some cases (such as Psalm 3) it seems to appear in places of major division in the thought of the psalm, but in some psalms (see Ps 68:7) śelâ appears in the middle of a sentence. The best that can be said is that śelâ occasionally may help modern interpreters confirm stanza divisions that they would likely recognize through close attention to the transitions (whether content or generic) of the psalm.

4. Conclusion.

Attention to the issue of stanzas/strophes within a poem reminds readers of Hebrew poetry that there are larger units within a poem than the poetic line. The line is where most scholarly attention is directed. However, attempts to develop scientific-type criteria for the determination of boundaries are likely to fail. Although the markers discussed above (acrostic, refrain, śelâ, content, genre components) will often aid the interpreter, in the final analysis the delineation of the structure of a poem is, to repeat the words of Watson, a “matter of feel.”

See also ACROSTIC; LYRIC POETRY; MUSIC, SONG; PARALLELISM; POETICS, TERMINOLOGY OF; REFRAIN.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. P. C. Craigie, Psalms 1-50 (WBC 19; Waco, TX: Word, 1983); J. C. de Moor, “The Art of Versification in Ugarit and Israel II: The Formal Structure,” UF 10 (1978) 187-217; T. Longman III, Jeremiah and Lamentations (NIBC; Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 2008); P. R. Raabe, Psalm Structures: A Study of Psalms with Refrains (JSOTSup 104; Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1990); J. L. Saalschütz, Von der Form der hebräischen Poesie, nebst einer Abhandlung über die Musik der Hebräer (Königsburg: A. W. Unzer, 1825); P. W. Skehan, "Strophic Patterns in the Book of Job," CBQ 23 (1961) 125-42; S. Terrien, The Psalms: Strophic Structure and Theological Commentary (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2003); P. van der Lugt, Cantos and Strophes in Biblical Hebrew Poetry: With Special Reference to the First Book of the Psalter (OtSt 53; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 2006); W. G. E. Watson, Classical Hebrew Poetry: A Guide to Its Techniques (2d ed.; London: T & T Clark, 2005). T. Longman III

STORM IMAGERY. See CHAOS AND DEATH.

STORY. See NOVELLA, STORY, NARRATIVE.

STRONGHOLD. See ARCHITECTURE; PROTECTION IMAGERY.

STROPHE. See STANZA, STROPHE.

SUFFERING

Suffering is evidence that something is terribly wrong with the world. The pain, loss, distress and affliction connected to suffering are problematic in a world created and ruled over by God. At times it appears that suffering trumps the goodness of God. However, there is more emphasis in Scripture on how people respond to suffering than on explaining the origin of suffering. This article takes a thematic approach to suffering in *Psalms, *Lamentations, *Proverbs, *Job and *Ecclesiastes and examines the causes of suffering, the responses to suffering, God's relationship to suffering and, finally, the resolution of suffering. Although the agony of suffering is fully expressed in the laments, there are clear affirmations that God's justice will ultimately prevail.

1. The Causes of Suffering
2. Responses to Suffering
3. God's Relationship to Suffering
4. The Resolution of Suffering

1. The Causes of Suffering.

1.1. Sin, Wickedness, Foolishness. The psalms express the wide range of human experience and emotion, from the praise of the *hymns to the pain of the *laments. The laments are a response to suffering and can be used to explore some of the causes of suffering. The source of trouble in the laments is either God, or the enemy, or the self, which threatens one's relationship with God, one's social standing in the community or the meaning of life (Westermann 1981a, 169-71). Psalm 13:1-2 seems to have all three in view. Sandwiched between God and enemies, the psalmist engages in self-examination over the experience of sorrow (Ps 13:2). Such despair over the affect of suffering is not sinful, but there are times when suffering is caused by one's own sin. For example, sin brings alienation from God and the possibility of his judgment (Ps 6:1; 51:11; 102:2). Sin causes inner spiritual turmoil, disrupts a person's well-being (Ps 6), and may cause physical distress (Ps 32:3-4). Alienation from God because of sin brings misery, and the only way to gain relief is to confess the sin to God and receive cleansing and restoration (Ps 51).

According to the book of Proverbs, a person's own foolishness and wickedness can cause suffering. Part of the purpose of Proverbs is to demonstrate the negative consequences of foolishness and wickedness so that people will walk in the way of wisdom and *righteousness in order to experience the benefits that come from wisdom. A rejection of wisdom may lead to calamity, terror, distress and anguish (Prov 1:24-27). People who reject wisdom will eat the fruit of their way (Prov 1:31), which ultimately includes ruin and death (Prov 1:32; 2:22; 9:18). Although it is clear that sin and *folly may lead to suffering, not all suffering can be related in a mechanical way to foolishness and sin.

1.2. The Actions of Enemies/Others. A lament psalm might focus on the enemies as the cause of the suffering. They are hard to identify because of the typical and metaphorical language used to describe them. Such language allows the enemies to be broadly defined as those who are troubling anyone who uses the psalms (Miller). The enemy can be personal, such as a close companion who becomes a traitor (Ps 41:9; 55:13), or a national enemy, like Babylon, which conquered Israel and destroyed Jerusalem and the temple (Ps 137). Such nations were instruments of God's judgment against the sinfulness of Israel (Lam 1:5). Yet, there is hope expressed in the pleas for the renewal of Israel (Ps 79:9; Lam 5:21) and judgment for the nations (Ps 79:6-7; Lam 1:22). Others, though not necessarily termed enemies, can be the cause of suffering. The wicked display antisocial behavior that is disruptive of the community, which may lead to injustice (Prov 14:31). The kings and the judges were supposed to uphold justice, but wicked kings and unjust judges could also be the source of oppression (Prov 13:23). Thus many times suffering is the result of external causes brought about by the actions of others.

1.3. Unfulfilled Expectations of Life. When life does not turn out as it should for the wise and the righteous, the result can be inner turmoil, despair and struggle with the meaning of life. Psalm 73 struggles with the prosperity of the wicked—a struggle that almost led to the conclusion that it was vain to live for God (Ps 73:13). The psalmist wrestled with this question so much that it became a wearisome task (Ps 73:16) and almost resulted in stumbling (Ps 73:1). *Qohelet had the same struggle with the apparent unfulfilled expectations of a life lived by wisdom. Not only does wisdom not deliver on its promises, but also the righteous experience what the wicked deserve while the wicked experience what the righteous deserve (Eccles 8:14). Although there is reward (hēleq) to labor that should be enjoyed (Eccles 2:10; 9:9), there is no profit (yitrôn) to labor (Eccles 1:2; 2:11). It does not really matter if one is wise or a fool, for the wise die just like the foolish (Eccles 2:13-14). Qohelet wonders why he was so wise (Eccles 2:15), and he asserts, “I hated life” and “I hated all my toil” (Eccles 2:17-18). The benefits of wisdom fall short for the righteous and the wise, which is a source of Qohelet’s struggle with the meaninglessness of life.

1.4. Frustration with God.

1.4.1. Lament Psalms. Unfulfilled expectations cannot be separated from one’s relationship with God, for God has promised certain things to his people. The lament psalms give voice to suffering and are a legitimate way to express frustration with God when he is perceived as part of the problem (Ps 13:1). Psalm 22 moves back and forth between the psalmist’s horrible situation and what is known to be true about God. How does one reconcile being abandoned by God (Ps 22:1-2) with God’s deliverance of his people in the past (Ps 22:3-5)? How does one reconcile the mocking treatment of the psalmist by others (Ps 22:6-8) with the psalmist’s own close relationship to God from the womb (Ps 22:9-11)? Although W. Brueggemann may be too venturesome when he says that the supremacy of God, the greater party in the relationship, is called into question in the laments, and that all power relations are under review, he is correct to affirm that the speech of the petitioner is heard, and that it is appropriate to raise justice questions before the throne. There are times when the psalmist struggles with God’s lack of response to suffering. In Psalm 88 the psalmist is facing a crisis situation, and three times prayer goes out to God for help (Ps 88:2, 9b, 13), but each time there is no response from God. The situation is not resolved, and the psalm ends in darkness (Ps 88:18).

1.4.2. Job. God also becomes a problem from Job’s perspective. Whereas *Satan complained that God had hedged Job in and protected him (Job 1:10), Job complains that God has confined him (hedged him in) to his situation of suffering (Job 3:23). Job perceives God as a hunter who pursues the prey so that he experiences “the terrors of God” (Job 6:4 NASB). Job wishes that God would leave him alone and quit harassing him (Job 7:17-19). He sees himself in contention with God without any possibility of winning because God destroys the blameless and the wicked (Job 9:17-19, 22). In fact, it seems that God has given Job over to the wicked (Job 16:11), and that God is Job’s enemy (Job 30:20-21). In the midst of his struggle Job states that he loathes his life (Job 10:1). G. von Rad points out that suffering is not the real problem of the book, but rather God’s role in the suffering. God himself has become the enemy (Westermann 1981b, 45), expressed in accusations against God (Job 16:9, 19:7-12).

1.4.3. Lamentations. The book of Lamentations, which contains five laments related to the fall of Jerusalem, also wrestles with God in a situation of grievous suffering. God is the one who has brought this calamity against his people because of their sin (Lam 1:13-14). God is a divine warrior who has fought against his people like an enemy (Lam 2:4-5). He has abandoned his people, leaving them without hope (Lam 2:7; 3:18). God is challenged to see the horrible suffering of the people (Lam 2:20). The book ends with a focus on God’s anger without resolution of the problem (Lam 5:21-22). Although E. Gerstenberger refers to God as scornful, it may be better to understand God as faithful to his covenant promises of judgment, for as Gerstenberger notes, there is confession of sin but no protestations of innocence in Lamentations.

1.4.4. Ecclesiastes. Whereas Job addressed

God directly and pursued him with passion, Qohelet does not address God directly. God is always called Elohim, never Yahweh, which is the more personal covenant name of God. The first time God is mentioned (Eccles 1:13) is to assert that he has given to human beings “a grievous task” (NASB), which is a negative statement no matter how one understands raʿ (“evil, grievous”). Although God is within the horizon of Qohelet’s view, he is never brought in as a solution to the problems with which Qohelet is struggling. Part of the reason is that it is impossible for anyone, including the wise, to figure out what God is doing in the world (Eccles 3:11; 8:16-17). The unfulfilled expectations of life are related to a breakdown of the deed-consequence relationship, with the result that the righteous and the wicked do not get their due rewards (Eccles 2:15-17). Qohelet should be comforted that the deeds of the righteous and the wise are in the hand of God, but that makes little difference. One cannot be sure what lies ahead, because in the end it does not really matter if one is righteous or wicked (Eccles 9:1-2). Overall, God is distant and is to be approached carefully (Eccles 5:1-3, 7), which has implications for how one understands the “fear of God” in sections of Qohelet’s struggle (see Longman). Although some (e.g., Whybray) argue for a joyous Qohelet, others (e.g., Crenshaw 1987, 73) argue that there is not the warmth of a trusting relationship with God in Qohelet. The confusing nature of the ways of God in the world is a source of despair. The key word of the book is hebel, used in the refrain “Utterly meaningless! Everything is meaningless” (Eccles 1:2 NIV).

2. Responses to Suffering.

A key term that describes a sufferer is ʿānî, with ʿōnî describing the situation of suffering, both physical and mental. These terms occur regularly in Psalms, Lamentations and Job where suffering and responses to suffering are described. Many times ʿānî describes the spiritual condition of the sufferer as one who belongs to the people of Israel (Ps 72:2), who cries out to Yahweh (Ps 34:6), and who is delivered (Ps 35:10). The affliction itself can cause the sufferer to turn to God (Ps 25:16).

2.1. Submission and Worship. Just as there are a variety of causes to suffering, so there are a variety of responses to suffering. Job’s initial response to suffering is submission. After losing his children, his wealth (Job 1:13-19) and his health (Job 2:7-8), he responds with *worship. He acknowledges God’s sovereignty (Job 1:20-21), refuses to curse God, and is willing to accept both good and calamity from God (Job 2:9-10). Although Job does not know what has gone on between Satan and God in the heavenly council and thus does not understand his suffering, he worships God. The challenge by Satan, that God is worthy of being worshiped only because he is the dispenser of blessings (Job 1:9-10; 2:4-5), is shown to be false by Job’s initial response to his suffering.

2.2. Questions. Worship and submission are the right way to respond to suffering, but many times such a response comes at the end of a process of wrestling with God, which is described in the laments. Whenever God seems distant and unresponsive, it is natural for questions to arise. Many times these questions wrestle with what appears to be the ineffectiveness of God’s own covenant promises. The questions in Psalm 89:46-48 come in the context of the troubles of the monarchy. Has God renounced his covenant promises to *David (Ps 89:38-39)? Questions also arise because the lack of response from God is not in character with the way God has acted in the past (Ps 22:3-5) and in the psalmist’s own life (Ps 22:9-11). The questions in Psalm 88:10-12 are a way for the psalmist to continue to appeal to God to act in the situation of suffering. They show the desperate nature of the crisis and plead with God to do something before death takes over and the opportunity for God to demonstrate his covenant faithfulness is gone. Psalm 88 ends in darkness and leaves the psalmist in an unresolved situation.

The book of Lamentations also describes an unresolved situation. The high point of the book comes in the middle poem, where the steadfast love and faithfulness of God are affirmed (Lam 3:22-27). The rest of the book continues to lament the suffering. The book ends with a “why” question addressed to God, a plea for God to restore the people, and a reminder of the cause of the suffering (Lam 5:20-22).

The questions in the lament psalms and Lamentations are not arrogant, challenging questions but rather are questions that arise out of a covenant relationship with God. Not only do they call on God to be faithful to his covenant promises, but also they are a way to express the deep anguish of soul in the midst of suffering. Life does not always turn out the way people expect, and there are times when God seems absent and his covenant promises unfulfilled. But these questions are ultimately the response of faith in God. They do not express mere resignation to the situation of suffering but rather demonstrate the hope that God will act in faithfulness to the covenant promises. Ultimately, they are an acknowledgment of the goodness and faithfulness of God.

2.3. Perseverance. A key question in the midst of suffering is whether the sufferer will persevere in faith. The lament psalms move beyond the questions toward the praise of God. There must come a time when the sufferer worships God even if the situation does not appear to have a resolution. Otherwise, the questions might turn into challenges to God's sovereignty and justice. Such a scenario happens to Job, whose response of submission changes in Job 3 with his curse (Job 3:1-10) and his lament (Job 3:11-26). Job moves from a compliant, submissive response to a challenging, questioning one. The stark reality of this change is seen when one compares Job 1:11; 2:5, 9, where the issue is whether Job will curse God, with Job 3:1, where Job "cursed the day of his birth" (NIV). Although Job curses something that is in the past and cannot be altered, it shows the change in Job. He moves from a God-centered emphasis to a human-centered focus. The lament ends with a barrage of "I" and "my" pronouns (Job 3:24-26). Instead of waiting on God, Job waits on death (Job 3:21) because he has lost the purpose for living (Job 3:23). God is now seen as a problem. Instead of protecting Job by putting a hedge around him (Job 1:10), God has confined him to this situation of suffering so that he cannot escape (Job 3:23). God seems to be on trial as Job questions God's justice in asserting that God destroys both the blameless and the wicked, and that God mocks the calamity of the innocent (Job 9:20-23). It is apparent that unrelieved suffering of the kind Job experienced may produce shifts in attitudes toward God and toward the suffering itself. One now wonders whether Job has gone too far, whether he will persevere, and whether true wisdom will be found to help Job in his struggles.

3. God's Relationship to Suffering.

One of the key issues of suffering is the relationship of suffering to God. Israel affirms the goodness and faithfulness of God, who pours out covenant blessings upon his people. God is the sovereign Creator, who has the power to implement his justice in the world. God is also near to his people and is their shield and defender. Thus it is a problem when justice is not evident and blessings are not experienced by God's people.

3.1. The Sovereignty of God. Although suffering may at times appear to call into question God's justice, the Wisdom literature clearly affirms that God is sovereign and is in control of the events of this life. Every event falls under the sovereign control of God, even the casting of the lot into the lap (Prov 16:33). People can make all kinds of plans, but the purposes of Yahweh will stand (Prov 19:21). Instead of seeing God as sovereign, N. Habel argues that in Job 1—2 God is presented as a capricious, arbitrary deity, more like a Canaanite god, who destroys a human being to win a wager with Satan. However, J. Hartley points out that the discussion is not a wager, for no sum was set to be handed over to the winner. Rather, God is sovereign over Satan and the tragedies that come into Job's life, as each time God places limits on what Satan can do (Job 1:12, 2:6). Job's initial responses to his suffering focus on God as the ultimate source of all things, including blessing and tragedy (Job 1:21-22; 2:9-10).

3.2. The Mystery of God's Ways.

3.2.1. The Deed-Consequence Relationship Is Not Mechanical. J. Crenshaw (1995, 396-97) argues that the book of Proverbs is a didactic obstacle to biblical salvation faith because the emphasis on wealth goes against other Scriptures that focus on the plight of the poor, eventually leading to a collapse of the view of *retribution. However, an understanding of the nature of the genre of a proverb as not giving the whole picture (Waltke), along with a more nuanced view of the structure of Proverbs (Van Leeuwen 1992), leads to much different conclusions. Many of the proverbs in Proverbs 10—15 are antithetical sayings that set forth the contrast between the wise and the foolish, or the righteous and the wicked. On the one hand, the wicked will be cut off (Prov 2:22; 10:27) and come to ruin (Prov 3:25); on the other hand, the righteous will experience God's blessings, which include security (Prov 1:33), favor with God and people (Prov 3:4; 12:2), healing (Prov 3:8), wealth (Prov 3:16; 10:22) and long life (Prov 3:16; 10:27). The blessings of wisdom are rooted in the fear of Yahweh (see Fear of the Lord), so that the blessings of wisdom ultimately come from God. Thus, it is a mistake to draw a mechanical connection between righteousness and these blessings. There is mystery in the way life works out. Proverbs itself recognizes the possibility of the suffering of the wise and the prosperity of the wicked. The blessings of wisdom, such as health, wealth and long life, are not absolute goods in this life. This is clearly set forth in the “better than” sayings, such as, “Better is a little with righteousness than great income with injustice” (Prov 16:8 NASB). Having less wealth with righteousness is better than having more wealth with injustice. Wealth is a relative good, subordinated to righteousness. Thus, to be poor does not necessarily indicate that one is not wise or righteous: “Better the poor walking in integrity than one perverse of speech who is a fool” (Prov 19:1 NRSV). The implication of these proverbs is that suffering is not always a sign of foolishness or wickedness, and wealth is not always a sign of righteousness or wisdom.

3.2.2. False Conclusions Based on Suffering. It is a mistake for people to draw conclusions related to God’s justice or another person’s righteousness based solely on suffering. Qohelet does the former, and Job’s friends do the latter. Qohelet operates on the basis of observation (note the many uses of the verb rā’ā [“see”]). Based on his own observations, he comes to the conclusion that wisdom does not deliver on its promises, and justice is not accomplished in this world. These concerns lead to the assertion “All is vanity [hebel] and a striving after wind” (Eccles 1:14 ESV). Even though it is clear to the reader from Job 1—2 that Job is blameless (Job 1:1) and is not suffering for sin (Job 1:8-12), Job’s friends argue that he is suffering because of sin that he has committed (Job 4:8; 8:4; 11:13-14). They are operating with a mechanical concept of the deed-consequence relationship. They cannot affirm at the same time both God’s justice and Job’s integrity, because of Job’s suffering. When Job continues to proclaim his innocence, the debate deteriorates into meaningless talk (Job 27:12) and false accusations (Job 22:5-11). Job dramatically asserts his integrity in a series of self-imprecations in Job 31, which calls upon God to activate the curses or clear him (Hartley). Thus, it is the integrity of Job that unites the submissive Job of the prologue and the questioning Job of the dialogues (Brown).

It seems clear that an answer to Job’s dilemma cannot be found on a human level, since such wisdom resides only with God (Job 28:23), who finally responds in Job 38. He accuses Job of darkening counsel by speaking of things that he does not understand (Job 38:2). In the first speech (Job 38:1—40:2) God asserts his power to maintain the universe as the Creator and Lord. Job is shown the power and glory of God in contrast to his own limited understanding and power. The panorama of creation in the first speech stands in contrast to the self-centered perspective of Job’s world (compare Job 3:23-26). Job has no answer for God’s questions, admits his own insignificance, and no longer calls for vindication (Job 40:3-5). God’s second speech (Job 40:6—41:34) accuses Job of discrediting his justice in trying to justify himself while he condemns God. God challenges Job to govern the world, and it becomes clear that only God has the power to govern the world. Job ultimately submits to the mystery of God’s sovereignty in suffering. Although Job is correct, over against the friends, that he is not suffering because of sin, he is wrong in calling into question God’s justice. Job’s second response is confession and repentance (Job 42:1-6). Although there is some debate concerning the meaning of nāham (for the options, see Newell), a common view is that it means “repent” or “recant” in the sense of changing one’s mind or course of direction (Habel; Hartley; Newell). Brown sees a double entendre with the added meaning that Job found “comfort” (another nuance of nāham) over his state of utter destitution. In the end, Job is vindicated over against his friends on the major issue of whether Job is suffering because of sin (Job 42:7). God tells Job to pray for his friends, and he does so before his suffering ends (Job 42:8).

Although Crenshaw (1995, 467) wonders if the exaltation of God in Job comes at the expense of human beings, it is better to acknowledge that human beings must come to terms with the greatness of God and the mystery of his governing the world. God feels no compulsion to tell Job about the events of Job 1—2 or to explain to Job the reason for his suffering. A simplistic reason for suffering does not suffice, especially one that operates with a mechanical connection between deed and consequence.

There is always a temptation to give a simplistic answer or to allow the experience of suffering to call into question the justice of God.

4. The Resolution of Suffering.

4.1. The Faithfulness of God. There is great mystery connected to suffering. Sometimes suffering comes as a result of sin, and only confession and repentance will bring relief. However, there is not always a clear explanation for the purpose of suffering. Whatever the cause of suffering, the resolution of suffering is rooted in God's faithfulness. God's justice will prevail, and God's people will be delivered. This is the underlying hope in every situation of suffering. Even in seemingly unresolved situations there is hope. In the psalm that ends in darkness there is a glimpse of light in the appeal to "the God of my salvation" (Ps 88:1). Although still stinging from the anger of God and the destruction of Jerusalem, the writer of Lamentations affirms God's faithfulness (Lam 3:22-23). The use of *acrostic poems in Lamentations points to a belief in the order and stability of life even in the chaos of suffering.

4.2. God's Justice Will Prevail.

4.2.1. Affirmation of God's Justice in Job and Ecclesiastes. The resolution of suffering in Job comes when Job is willing to submit to the mysterious ways of God's sovereignty and abandon the claim that God is unjust. God never explains to Job the reasons for his suffering, but he is concerned about Job's response to his suffering. Although Job questions God's justice, there are times when he is confident that justice will prevail. He affirms a witness in heaven who will testify on his behalf (Job 16:19) and a redeemer (gōʾēl) who will come to his defense (Job 19:25). Whether Job 19:25-26 expresses the prospect of vindication in this life or after his death (see discussions in Hartley; Habel), it is a strong confirmation that he will receive justice in the debate concerning his integrity, which occurs in Job 42:7 and in Job's restoration. Qohelet may at times doubt whether God's justice is at work in this world (Eccles 7:15), but the book ends by affirming God's justice (Eccles 12:13-14). The important thing is to fear God and keep his commands because God will bring every work into judgment, including the secret things of life. Both Job and Ecclesiastes struggle with issues of justice but end by affirming God's justice.

4.2.2. The Final Destination of the Righteous in the Psalms. The lament psalms have a movement from despair to confidence in God's response and the praise of God (Ps 13:5-6; 22:22-31) (see Confidence, Psalms of). There are more laments in the Psalter than there are hymns because the psalms recognize the suffering of life and allow for its full expression. And yet suffering does not have the last word. Psalm 1 lays out the destiny of the righteous and of the wicked. As one moves through the Psalter, one experiences all the joys and trials of life, including the dark night of the soul experienced in suffering. However, just as the laments move toward the praise of God, so the Psalter moves toward the final destination of the righteous, which is the all-out praise of God (Ps 146—150).

4.2.3. Trusting in Yahweh (the Lord). The call to trust Yahweh in Proverbs is a call to commit the experiences, outcomes and suffering of life into God's sovereign hands (Prov 3:5-6). The connection between wisdom and blessing and between wickedness and ruin is not part of an impersonal world order, nor is there just an inner connection between deed and consequence with Yahweh acting like a midwife (Koch), but the world order is created and sustained by the Lord (Waltke). God will ensure that justice is done, and that ultimately the righteous and the wise are rewarded. If humans fail each other, and even if the earthly system of justice fails, Yahweh will not fail, even though the method or the process of justice is left unspecified. Ultimately, the wicked will receive what they deserve, and the desire of the righteous will be granted (Prov 10:24). Hope perishes with the death of the wicked (Prov 11:7), and wealth makes no difference in the day of death (Prov 11:4). However, the suffering of the righteous will give way to life, represented by the tree of life (Prov 3:18).

4.2.4. The Hope of Life. The horrible nature of suffering and the expressions of grief in suffering need to be given their full due. People may need to work through their suffering, and God is able to handle all their questions. If lament is lost, we are left with anxiety, despair and a God of the status quo (Brueggemann). But lament gives hope that God will respond, that God's justice will ultimately prevail, and that the righteous and the wise will receive all the blessings that are promised to them. Job's honor and wealth are restored when he receives twice as much as he had before (Job 42:10-17). There is hope that the blessings of God will be experienced in this life, but there is also a recognition that these blessings encompass more than this earthly life. Although H.-J. Kraus is hesitant to affirm life after death in Psalm 16:9-11, arguing that life on earth and deliverance from death are in view, he does recognize that the direction of such verses is toward life beyond death because Yahweh's liberating power knows no limits (the same can be said for Ps 49:15). The reward of life in Proverbs includes all the blessings for which one would hope, such as health and prosperity, but it also includes no death (Prov 12:28). Although in the Wisdom literature death can refer to an early, premature death (von Rad), it seems clear that there is more at stake than just a long life on this earth. R. Van Leeuwen (NIB 5.17-264) understands the tree of life (Prov 3:18; 11:30) to be a metaphor for the good life offered by wisdom, without the connotations of everlasting life in the garden of Eden. However, it is hard to limit the blessings of wisdom to this life alone. Life associated with the tree of life would include eternal life because of its connection with the garden (Waltke). Although the OT is not as clear as the NT on *afterlife, the fact that God's justice will prevail and God's people will experience life give hope for the one who fears the Lord to persevere in the face of suffering.

See also CHAOS AND DEATH; DIVINE PRESENCE; JOB 1: BOOK OF; THEODICY.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. W. P. Brown, Character in Crisis: A Fresh Approach to the Wisdom Literature of the Old Testament (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1996); W. Brueggemann, "The Costly Loss of Lament," JSOT 55 (1986) 57-71; J. L. Crenshaw, Ecclesiastes (OTL; Philadelphia: Westminster, 1987); idem, Urgent Advice and Probing Questions: Collected Writings on Old Testament Wisdom (Macon, GA: Mercer University Press, 1995); F. W. Dobbs-Allsopp, Lamentations (IBC; Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 2002); E. S. Gerstenberger, Psalms, Part 2, and Lamentations (FOTL 15; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2001); N. C. Habel, The Book of Job (OTL; Philadelphia: Westminster, 1985); J. E. Hartley, The Book of Job (NICOT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1988); K. Koch, "Is There a Doctrine of Retribution in the Old Testament? (1955)," in Theodicy in the Old Testament, ed. J. L. Crenshaw (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1983) 57-87; H.-J. Kraus, Psalms 1-150 (2 vols; CC; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1993); T. Longman III, The Book of Ecclesiastes (NICOT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1998); P. D. Miller Jr., Interpreting the Psalms

(Philadelphia: Fortress, 1986); B. L. Newell, "Job, Repentant or Rebellious?" WTJ 46 (1984) 398-416; R. C. Van Leeuwen, "Wealth and Poverty: System and Contradiction in Proverbs," HS 33 (1992) 25-36; idem, "The Book of Proverbs," NIB 5.17-264; G. von Rad, Wisdom in Israel, trans. J. D. Martin (Valley Forge, PA: Trinity Press International, 1972); B. K. Waltke, The Book of Proverbs (2 vols.; NICOT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2004); C. Westermann, Praise and Lament in the Psalms (Atlanta: John Knox, 1981a); idem, The Structure of the Book of Job: A Form-Critical Analysis (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1981b); R. N. Whybray, "Qoheleth, Preacher of Joy?" JSOT 23 (1982) 87-98. R. P. Belcher Jr.

SUMERIAN CITY LAMENTS. See LAMENTATIONS 2: ANCIENT NEAR EASTERN BACKGROUND.

SUPERSCRPTIONS. See PSALMS 4: TITLES

SUSA

Susa was the major city of Elam, the area of southwestern Iran. Susa was located in a fertile alluvial plain 150 miles north of the Persian Gulf and at the base of the Zagros Mountains. Since the area is intolerably hot in the summer, the Achaemenid kings spent only the spring in Susa, spending the summer in the palace at Ecbatana and several months of the winter in Babylon. C. Tuplin (73) comments, "All the calendar dates in Nehemiah and Esther make Susa a winter or early spring location." Susa was the site of the story of *Esther in the days of *Ahasuerus (Xerxes). Esther contains numerous references to the (citadel) of Susa (Esther 1:2, 5; 2:3, 5, 8; 3:15; 8:14; 9:6, 11, 12). Daniel saw himself in a vision in the citadel at Susa by the Ulai Canal (Dan 8:2); he also heard a man's voice from the Ulai (Dan 8:16). Nehemiah was at Susa when he received news of the desolate state of Jerusalem's walls (Neh 1:1).

1. Classical References
2. Archaeological Discoveries
3. The History of Susa

1. Classical References.

Because Susa was the eastern terminus of the Royal Road from Sardis (Herodotus Hist. 5.52-53; 8.98), established by Darius I, many notable Greeks appeared at the royal court of Susa, including Histiaeus of Miletus (Herodotus Hist. 5.30), Demaratus of Sparta (Herodotus Hist. 7.3) and Callias of Athens (Herodotus Hist. 7.151).

2. Archaeological Discoveries.

2.1. The Mounds. There are four major mounds at Susa, which the French excavators call (1) Acropolis, (2) Apadana, (3) Ville Royale, (4) Ville des Artisans. The first three form a diamond-shaped area with sides about 1,000 m (3,280 ft.) long. The Acropolis is the most important of the mounds for the earlier Elamite eras. It was settled at the earliest date and has been the most extensively excavated. The Acropolis rises steeply at its highest point 38 m above the waters of the Shaur River. A castle built by French excavators, using bricks from the site, now stands on the northern point of the Acropolis. Susa was occupied continuously from 3500 BC to the thirteenth century AD. Today the modern village of Shush lies on the Shaur below the slopes of the Acropolis.

2.2. The Excavations. The famous Jewish traveler Benjamin of Tudela (Spain) visited the site in AD 1165 and observed the Jewish community of Shush, noting that there were seven thousand Jews and fourteen synagogues there. W. K. Loftus, a Scot, visited the site in 1850 and correctly identified the site as ancient Susa. The French have sponsored annual excavations at Susa from 1897 to the present except for the periods of the World Wars. The first director, from 1897 to 1912, was J. de Morgan, who during the 1901/1902 season found the stela of Hammurabi's Code. R. de Mcquenem cleared the palace on the Apadana from 1909 to 1923. From 1946 to 1966 the expedition was directed by R. Ghirshman, who uncovered an Achaemenid village in the Ville des Artisans. In the 1960s M.-J. Steve and H. Gasche conducted extensive work on the Acropolis. From 1969 to 1979 J. Perrot and D. Ladiray excavated the Achaemenid palace.

3. The History of Susa.

3.1. The Third and Second Millennia BC. The earliest pottery from Susa comes from a depth of 11 m from a cemetery and is dated to 3500 BC. In the third millennium BC Susa was closely connected with Sumer in southern Mesopotamia. Sargon of Agade (2371-2316 BC) conquered Susa. The rulers of the Ur III period married Elamite princesses from Susa. This did not prevent the sack of Ur by the Elamites in the reign of Ibbi Sin (2029-2006 BC).

3.2. The Middle Elamite Era. The apogee of Elamite culture was reached in the Middle Elamite period (1300-1100 BC), when Elamite kings from Susa attacked Mesopotamia, bringing an end to the Kassite Dynasty (c. 1160 BC). But then the Elamites disappeared from history for three centuries.

3.3. The Neo-Elamite Era and Ashurbanipal's Destruction of Susa. The Elamites supported various Chaldean rebels, such as Merodach-baladan, in their struggles against the dominant Assyrians. Ashurbanipal (668-627 BC) utterly destroyed Susa in 646 BC and deported some of its peoples to Samaria (Ezra 4:9-10).

3.4. Achaemenid Susa. When the Persian king Cyrus (see Ezra 1:1-4) conquered Babylon in 539 BC, he returned Elamite gods that had been taken back to Susa. Darius I made Susa his capital in 521 BC. The city covered about 300 acres. He built a great defensive wall about the palace, surrounded by a moat filled with water. He erected his palace on an artificial terrace 49 ft. high.

3.4.1. The Apadana. The Apadana was a hypostyle audience hall, which had six rows of six columns each, covered 12,000 m². The fluted stone columns were topped with capitals decorated with bulls' heads. Although none of the columns remain standing, they were probably 65 ft. high.

3.4.2. The Palace. There was a series of public courts connected by passageways to the inner residential rooms and to storerooms. The palatial complex covered an area of 38,000 m². The palace and the Apadana were decorated with molded glazed brick panels colorfully depicting griffins, winged bulls and lions.

In 1970 two foundation inscriptions in Elamite and Akkadian were discovered in situ in the palace. A trilingual (Elamite, Old Persian, Akkadian) inscription of Darius, known as the "Charter of Foundation," boasted that Darius employed materials and workers from every part of the vast Persian Empire (cf. Esther 1:1-6). It reads in part, "The cedar timber, this a mountain by name Lebanon from there was brought. . . . The gold was brought from Sardis and from Bactria, which here was wrought. . . . The silver and the ebony were brought from Egypt. . . . The stonemasons who wrought the stone, those were Ionians and Sardians."

3.4.3. The Gate House. In the 1970s the French discovered a monumental gatehouse 80 m to the east of the palace. The gate was 40 x 28 m, covering about 1,200 m². Its central room was a square, 21 m per side. This would have been the gate where *Mordecai sat (Esther 2:19, 21; 5:9,13; 6:10). The discovery of the gate has convinced the French excavators that the author of Esther had an accurate knowledge of Susa. Also, by the gate an oversized statue of Darius, missing its head, was discovered. It was engraved with four languages, including hieroglyphics, indicating that it was made in Egypt. At the Ville Royale another monumental gate, a propylaeum, measuring 24 x 24 m was discovered.

3.4.4. Xerxes and the Later Achaemenids. Xerxes made Susa his principal winter residence. In 1973 the excavators discovered two column bases with trilingual inscriptions of Xerxes. It was to Susa that Xerxes retired from Sardis after his disastrous campaign in Greece in 480/479 BC (Herodotus Hist. 9.108). Inscriptions from the gate indicate that Xerxes completed his father's work at Susa. During the reign of Artaxerxes I (464-424 BC), under whom Nehemiah served, the Apadana burned to the ground. No inscription attests to the building activities of Artaxerxes I at Susa. The Apadana was reconstructed by Artaxerxes II (404-359 BC), who faithfully reproduced Darius's structure. In 1969 bulldozers accidentally uncovered a new hypostyle hall, measuring 123 x 114 ft., with eight rows of eight columns, on the plain west of the Shaur. Inscriptions indicate that this was the provisional palace of Artaxerxes II while he proceeded with the reconstruction on the Apadana. The central area was free of buildings and perhaps was used for military parades.

3.5. Alexander and His Successors. In 331 BC Alexander captured Susa and its enormous treasure without resistance. Alexander then proceeded to Persepolis, which he burned down. In 324 BC, after his return from campaigns in the east, Alexander celebrated the symbolic marriage of himself and eighty Macedonian officers to native brides at Susa. Under the Seleucids Susa was renamed Seleucia-on-the-Eulaios. The area later fell under the Parthians, who gave the Greek inhabitants of Susa considerable freedom.

3.6. Parthian Sasanian and Islamic Eras. Ghirshman excavated in the Ville des Artisans a necropolis of the Partho-Seleucid period (300 BC to AD 200). From about AD 250 Susa began to flourish under the Zoroastrian Sasanids. A revolt by Christian Nestorians was suppressed by Shapur II (AD 309-379) with the destruction of Susa. The Arabs captured Susa in AD 638. A mosque, with a striking conical tower, at the edge of the Shaur has been venerated as the tomb of Daniel, a tradition that may go back to the eighth or even seventh centuries AD.

See also AHASUERUS; ESTHER 2: EXTRABIBLICAL BACKGROUND; VASHTI.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. P. Amiet, Suse: 6,000 ans d'histoire (Monographies des musées de France; Paris: Ministère de la culture et de la communication, Editions de la Réunion des musées nationaux, 1988); R. Boucharlat, "The Palace and the Royal Achaemenid City: Two Case Studies—Pasargadae and Susa," in The Royal Palace Institution in the First Millennium BC: Regional Development and Cultural Interchange between East and West, ed. I. Nielsen (Monographs of the Danish Institute at Athens 4; Aarhus: Aarhus University Press, 2001) 113-22; P. O. Harper, J. Aruz and F. Tallon, eds., The Royal City of Susa: Ancient Near Eastern Treasures in the Louvre (New York: Metropolitan Museum of Art, 1992); J. Perrot and D. Ladiray, "La porte de Darius à Suse," Cahiers de la délégation archéologique française en Iran 4 (1974) 43-56; idem, "Susa—City of Splendour," in Royal Cities of the Biblical World, ed. J. G. Westenholtz (Jerusalem: Bible Lands Museum, 1996) 237-53; J. Tricher et al., "Suse, les dernières découvertes," Dossiers d'archéologie 138 (May 1989) 8-90; C. Tuplin, "The Seasonal Migration of Achaemenid Kings: A Report on Old and New Evidence," in Studies in Persian History: Essays in Memory of David M. Lewis, ed. M. Brosius and A. Kuhrt (Achaemenid History 11; Leiden: Netherlands Instituut voor het Nabije Oosten, 1998) 63-114; F. Vallat, "L'inscription trilingue de Xerxes à la porte de Darius," Cahiers de la délégation archéologique française en Iran 4 (1974) 171-80; idem, Suse et l'Elam (Recherche sur les grandes civilisations 1; Paris: ADPF, 1980); E. Yamauchi, Persia and the Bible (Grand Rapids: Baker, 1990), chap. 7. E. Yamauchi

SYLLABIC METER. See METER.

SYNONYMOUS PARALLELISM. See PARALLELISM.

SYNTHETIC PARALLELISM. See PARALLELISM.

T, U, V

TABERNACLES, FESTIVAL OF. See MEGILLOT AND FESTIVALS.

TARGUMIM

The quadriliteral root trgm is used in rabbinic literature to refer to any translation of the Scriptures, as well as an individual who mediates the teaching of an important *sage to the gathered audience. It has come, however, to refer specifically to the numerous Aramaic translations of the Hebrew Bible made by Jews in late antiquity. Despite the multiplicity of Aramaic translations, only two of the Targumim became “authorized” (Targum Onqelos to the Torah and Targum Jonathan to the Prophets) by the Babylonian Jewish community, despite originating in the Palestinian Jewish community. In Palestine, however, numerous Targumim for all portions of the Bible flourished during the first centuries of the Common Era (second-ninth centuries AD).

The Targumim to the Writings fall into two categories. First, there are the five scrolls (mēgillōt): *Lamentations, *Song of Songs, *Ruth, *Ecclesiastes and *Esther, which were read on the Ninth of Av, Passover, Shavuot, Sukkot and *Purim respectively (see Megillot and Festivals). The date at which each book became associated with a particular festival and thus incorporated into the liturgy is unclear, although we know that Esther was read, and translated, at Purim from Tannaitic times (see t. Meg. 3:20-21 [mēgillā literally means “scroll” and refers specifically to the book of Esther]). For the other books, it appears that their incorporation into the liturgical celebrations, with their respective Targum, occurred much later.

The second group comprises *Psalms, *Job and *Proverbs (Chronicles is also part of the Writings in Jewish tradition [see DOTHB, Chronicles, Books of]), none of which were read publicly in the synagogue.

1. The Origin and Purpose of the Targumim
2. Targum Psalms (Tg. Ps.)
3. Targum Job (Tg. Job)
4. Targum Proverbs (Tg. Pr.)
5. Targum Canticles (Tg. Cant.)
6. Targum Lamentations (Tg. Lam.)
7. Targum Qohelet (Tg. Q.)
8. Targum Ruth (Tg. Ruth)
9. Targum Esther (Tg. Est.)
10. Conclusion

1. The Origin and Purpose of the Targumim.

The Babylonian Talmud (b. Meg. 3a) records divine displeasure at the prospect of a Targum to the Writings of the Hebrew Bible being revealed by Jonathan ben Uzziel. This tradition in reality represents an attempt at censorship of those Targumim that were not authorized by the Babylonian Jewish community (i.e., all Targumim other than Targum Onqelos for the Torah and Targum Jonathan for the prophets). Such an attempt at censorship actually serves as testimony to the very presence of those forbidden Targumim, and today we have Targumim to every book of the Writings except for Daniel and Ezra-Nehemiah. The questionable status of such Targumim remained into the late tenth/early eleventh century AD, where we find Rabbi Hai Gaon, in response to a question on the Targum of Esther, describing the Targumim of the Hagiographa as the translation of “common folk” because God had forbidden Jonathan ben Uzziel from translating the Writings.

Scholars have always asserted that the Targumim arose within a liturgical setting and were designed for the uneducated masses that no longer understood *Hebrew (Shinan). However, we now know that Hebrew was still a living language in the first centuries AD (Fraade). This, combined with the fact that we have Targumim to books that were not read publicly in the synagogue (see m. Šabb. 16:1; b. Šabb. 115a; 116b), raises the question of the original function/intention of all the Targumim. Recent scholarship, therefore, has stressed the importance of their educational function, both in the school (bêt hasēper) and in the study house (bêt hamidrāš) (Fraade; Van der Kooij). Scholarship has also shown that the Targumim themselves assume knowledge of the Hebrew from their readers (Fraade). It would seem, therefore, that they did not necessarily originate among a populace that needed a translation, or that the synagogue was necessarily their place of origin. In other words, the Targumim seek to bring their readers to the Hebrew text, as opposed to bringing the Hebrew text to the readers (Fraade). In this respect, the Targumim are unique among early Bible translations (except, perhaps, for the very initial stages of the LXX), all of which seek to bring the Hebrew text to a populace that does not understand it. Such a view is particularly important for those Targumim that have no liturgical function, as it provides a Sitz im Leben in which they can be placed and studied.

Despite some (disputed) suggestions that the Targumim (in general) arose within a priestly community, the Targumim of the Writings belong firmly within rabbinic tradition (except, perhaps, for Targum Proverbs), and as such, they “rabbinize” the Scriptures. Thus we find that the unspecified day on which *Satan appeared before God in Job 1:6 is identified in the Targum as Rosh Hashanah, the day of judgment; the “divine assembly” in Psalm 82:1 the Targum identifies as Torah scholars; and the “kisses of his mouth” in Song of Songs 1:2 are specified as the “Torah, six orders of the Mishnah and the Talmud.” The Targumim therefore hold a unique mediating position between the written Torah and the oral Torah of rabbinic tradition; dependent upon the written Scripture, the Targumim, however, lead their readers/hearers to a rabbinic understanding of those Scriptures. In other words, they combine the text with tradition and make sure that the text leads to tradition and not away from it (see Sipre Devarim 161).

Before proceeding to a description of the individual Targumim, we must note that all the Targumim to the Writings are anonymous, undated and have undergone a process of transmission that has added to the text in such a way as to make it impossible to uncover an original Urtext. (At what point “oral” Targumim were committed to writing and then the “text” was stabilized is extremely difficult, if not impossible, to ascertain.) Such a situation should not lead to the conclusion that the Targumim are simply collections of disparate traditions. The extant versions are not; rather, they are carefully crafted texts that evince creativity from within the broader context of rabbinic tradition. As such, they record for us how particular books (not simply verses, as is often found in the various midrash collections) were read, as books, in (rabbinic) Jewish late antiquity.

2. Targum Psalms (Tg. Ps.).

As yet, there is no critical edition of Targum Psalms, although various individual manuscripts have been published (Diez Merino 1982; Cohen; de Lagarde). The manuscript tradition has been grouped into three distinct families with various differences between them. Until the publication of a critical edition, a complete picture of their relationship cannot be painted, although the similarities between the traditions far outweigh in number and significance the differences and point to an original Targum of Psalms that has undergone textual revision over time, as opposed to numerous versions gradually conforming to one another.

Targum Psalms, along with Targum Job, is written in Late Jewish Literary Aramaic, a dialect that contains both eastern and western forms as well as numerous Hebraisms. Numerous Greek and Latin loan words are also present in the Targum, which derived from Palestinian Judaism not before the fifth century AD, and quite probably later. The manuscript tradition is medieval, and it is clear that later copyists/editors added to the text during its transmission.

Targum Psalms contains a mixture of styles, translating some psalms literally with no expansions, whereas others, while remaining close to the Hebrew, will use two or three Aramaic words to translate the various nuances found within the one Hebrew root (e.g., Ps 2:6). Yet again there are some psalms (e.g., Pss 68; 110; 137) that contain numerous midrashic expansions to the text, with more than one translation for some verses incorporated into the text, marked by the phrases tārgūm ’aḥēr or lāšōn ’aḥēr (e.g., Ps 110:1). It is important to note, however, that even in the most expansive of “translations” it is possible to see the connections to the Hebrew text that lie behind them.

Targum Psalms clearly belongs within the rubric of rabbinic Judaism and incorporates themes such as Torah study, prayer, the final judgment with reward for the righteous and *retribution for the wicked, and the patriarchs and their merit. Therefore, God’s “dwelling places” in Psalm 43:3 are changed in Targum Psalms to “study halls,” and “commune with your own heart upon your bed” in Psalm 4:4 becomes “say prayers with your mouth and petitions in your heart; pray upon your couch.” It should not be viewed, however, as simply a pastiche of rabbinic ideas, as there is ample evidence of creativity. Such creativity was exercised from within rabbinic tradition and utilized rabbinic methods of study. Its aim was to marry the written Scriptures with the oral tradition and thus make the biblical psalms relevant in a different age and in different circumstances.

3. Targum Job (Tg. Job).

The translation of Job into Aramaic began in Second Temple times, as is evidenced by the finds at Qumran (4QtgJob; 11QtgJob) and by the tradition in the Talmud (t. Sabb. 13:2-3), where we find Rabban Gamliel the elder enclosing an Aramaic Targum of Job in bricks on the Temple Mount. The Qumran “Targum” is literal, in contrast to parts of Targum Job, and although there appears to be no direct relationship between the two texts, some similarity in method has been uncovered (Gold), which suggests that further research in this area would be fruitful. However, caution is required, as similarity in method on its own cannot demonstrate any specific relationship between the two texts.

Targum Job, grouped linguistically alongside Targum Psalms, also contains numerous (over forty) multiple translations for single verses indicated by the rubric tārgûm ’aḥēr or lāsôn ’aḥēr. The number of these multiple translations varies according to each manuscript, and for some verses there are three translations given. The origin of these multiple translations is disputed. W. Bacher suggested that a late glossator added a more literal translation of verses that he viewed as too midrashic and then placed the literal translation into the text and relegated the expansive one. P. Churgin, however, saw the midrashic translations as being added later. The consensus now views Targum Job as a creation of a copyist who utilized numerous manuscripts that differed from one another. The differences from each manuscript were first placed in the margin, and then later copyists added them into the text marked with tārgûm ’aḥēr or lāsôn ’aḥēr. Such a solution is yet to account for the origins of these multiple traditions, and thus more research is needed before the complete picture can be painted. Such research is possible since the publication of a critical edition by D. Stec (1994). The similarity in style and language between Targum Job and Targum Psalms has led some to suggest a common author. Such a conclusion is premature and is based on insufficient evidence, and therefore much research remains to be done on both texts before issues of common authorship are addressed comprehensively.

Throughout Targum Job there are numerous midrashic additions. The *law and its study are commonly added to the text (see Tg. Job 3:17; 24:13), as is the reward for meritorious works (Tg. Job 2:11; 3:17). Heaven, angels and life in the world to come are also added on various occasions. Many of these additions are less overtly rabbinic than in other Targumim to the Writings, which may suggest that its origins are earlier. Scholars have cited various reasons for an early date, including phrases such as “Father in Heaven” (Tg. Job 34:36) and “fire of Gehenna” (Tg. Job 3:17), alongside the pronominal use of memra for humans (e.g., Tg. Job 7:8; 19:18). Such evidence points to a possible early date and suggests that it is possible to find early traditions within the text; yet, as we have it today, the aforementioned conclusion stands: as a whole, Targum Job is a creation of a later copyist.

4. Targum Proverbs (Tg. Pr.).

There is no critical edition of Targum Proverbs, and only one manuscript has been published (Diez Merino 1984), alongside de Lagarde’s publication of the text of Targum Proverbs from the Biblia Rabbinica. J. Healey has published an English translation, using de Lagarde’s text as the source.

Targum Proverbs is unique among the Targumim of the Hagiographa on many levels. First, it evinces an extremely close relationship to the Peshitta (around thirty percent of the verses in the Targum agree with the Peshitta against the Hebrew). Some scholars have suggested that this relationship came about because the Peshitta was dependent upon an earlier version of Targum Proverbs. The Targum was then reworked at a later date by a copyist/translator into the form we have today (M. Z. Segal). However, other scholars have claimed that the Targum is dependent upon the Syriac version, with the translator consulting the Hebrew and thus translating some verses independently, this latter point being used to explain the differences (Weitzman; Diez Merino 1984). The problem, expressed by some, for this latter solution is that of Jews relying on a Christian translation. However, Rabbi Hai Gaon (AD 939-1038) is known to have dispatched someone to consult with the Nestorian Catholicos on an obscure verse in Psalms (Ps 141:5)—a fact that goes some way to allaying this problem (Weitzman).

Second, compared to the other Targumim of the Hagiographa, Targum Proverbs is unusual also in that it has no midrashic or haggadic expansions, despite various midrashim on verses from Proverbs, particularly connecting the Torah with wisdom and assigning it a role in the creation of the world, as well as those that pick up on *Solomon as author and relate it to his request for wisdom in 1 Kings 3. There is also no particular avoidance of anthropomorphisms within Targum Proverbs, with some actually being inserted by the Targum itself (see Tg. Pr. 22:11).

Many issues remain open with Targum Proverbs and will remain so until the publication of a critical edition of the text allows further research to proceed on a more solid footing.

5. Targum Canticles (Tg. Cant.).

Linguistically, Targum Canticles is written in Late Jewish Literary Aramaic (along with Tg. Ps. and Tg. Job), probably in Palestine sometime in the eighth or ninth century AD. There is as yet no critical edition, although numerous texts have been published (e.g., Melamed; Fontela), reflecting both the eastern and western recensions of the manuscript tradition.

Targum Canticles opens with the Midrash of the Ten Songs, beginning with Psalm 92, which, according to Jewish tradition, was sung by Adam when he repented and the Sabbath came and protected him from punishment, and ending with the song that is spoken of in Isaiah 30:29 and sung by the returning exiles at the dawn of the messianic age. This last song provides a smooth link into Targum Canticles in that it is sung at the time of Passover, and Song of Songs was read during the Passover celebrations. The Midrash of the Ten Songs as a whole also serves both to explain the name of the book and to set the stage for the historical sweep that the Targum gives to the book, beginning with the exodus, “When the people of the house of Israel went out from Egypt” (Tg. Cant. 1:4), and ending with the Messianic age, “And at that time the King Messiah will be revealed” (Tg. Cant. 8:1). As such, there is clearly an attempt to read the book as a book and to provide it with a coherent unity. In this reading God is the “beloved” and Israel is the “bride,” in keeping with rabbinic interpretations of the book. Such a unified structure suggests a single author; however, there remain differences between the eastern and western recensions of the text, but these are not so significant as to deflect from the essential unity of the Targum. A full treatment of this issue, however, depends upon the publication of a full critical edition.

The author clearly was learned in and committed to rabbinic tradition and held the rabbinic academy in great esteem. Thus we find that the world is sustained by the merit of the “head of the college” (Tg. Cant. 7:3). The merit of the righteous is a theme throughout the Targum and not only secures protection and sustenance for them in the years of exile (Tg. Cant. 1:8) but also results in the coming of the *Messiah (Tg. Cant. 7:13-14). The righteous are also portrayed as those who study the law and the words of the sages, and who rise early to go to the house of study.

The lateness of its composition is also signified by its messianism. Although we find in Tg. Cant. 4:5 mention of two Messiahs—“Messiah son of David and the Messiah son of Ephraim”—the final “messianic” section of the book (beginning at Tg. Cant. 7:13) refers only to the King Messiah (Son of David), who is described in Tg. Cant. 8:1 as a Torah scholar. The Targum’s positive attitude to the Hasmoneans also suggests a late date, as it is in contrast to the decidedly indifferent attitude toward them in the Talmud.

The Targum ends with an exhortation to the house of Israel, through the mouth of Solomon, to commit themselves to Torah study and to pray for the coming of the Messiah.

6. Targum Lamentations (Tg. Lam.).

The Ninth of Av is the preeminent day of mourning in Jewish tradition, remembering five events in Jewish history: the decree that the generation of the desert would die in the wilderness, the destruction of the first temple and of the second temple, the fall of Bethar in the Bar Kokhba rebellion, and the plowing up of Jerusalem by the Romans (see m. Ta'an. 4:6). The reading of the book of Lamentations accompanied this fast, first privately and then publicly, and its accompaniment with the Targum is first recorded in Soperim 42b. This late reference (seventh century AD) suggests that Targum Lamentations must have originated sufficiently before this date in order for it to be accepted and incorporated into the liturgy. It should also be borne in mind that a text's reception into the liturgy does not preclude its earlier use in private or public study. The dating of this text therefore remains, as with many of the Targumim to the Writings, an open question.

Targum Lamentations begins in a very expansive style (especially chap. 1), with many expansions designed to justify the destruction in terms of Israel's sin, so immediately in Targum Lamentations 1:1 the exile of Jerusalem, described as a punishment, is likened to that of Adam and Eve, and the "attribute of Justice" declares, "Because of the greatness of her rebellious sin that was within her, thus she shall dwell alone." The Targum continues in Targum Lamentations 1:2-4 by describing the bad report brought by the spies and then the destruction of the temple by Nebuchadnezzar and subsequent exile of Judah because of their treatment of orphans and widows, the hard labor inflicted upon fellow Israelites and their failure to observe the three pilgrimage festivals. Thus the Targum is rightly seen to be a rabbinic response to the book of Lamentations, in which God is vindicated for the destruction of Jerusalem (Brady). As well as this "vindication," it is also designed to encourage its readers to respond appropriately to their present situation—that is, in repentance, study, prayer and synagogue attendance:

Arise, O Congregation of Israel dwelling in exile. Busy yourself with Mishnah in the night, for the Shekinah of the Lord is dwelling before you, and with the words of Torah at the beginning of the Morning watch. Pour out like water the crookedness of your heart and turn in repentance. And pray in the synagogue before the face of the Lord. Raise your hands to him in prayer for the life of your children who thirst with hunger at the head of every open market. (Tg. Lam. 2:19)

The Targum is not without hope, for the Lord will see the repentance of Israel and their change in behavior, and thus Targum Lamentations transforms a bleak verse in the Hebrew into one of hope: "You [God] will declare freedom to your people, the House of Israel, by the King Messiah, just as you did by Moses and Aaron" (Tg. Lam. 2:22). Many of these exegetical traditions have parallels in rabbinic midrashim and particularly in Lamentations Rabbah.

There is as yet no critical edition of Targum Lamentations, although the textual tradition has been discussed at length (Alexander 1986). There are two recensions: one Yemenite and one western, with the western recension being more expansive and possibly influencing the later Yemenite manuscripts.

7. Targum Qohelet (Tg. Q.).

The custom of reading the book of Ecclesiastes on the intermediate Sabbath of Sukkot is late and therefore has no influence on Targum Qohelet whatsoever, which can be dated (approximately) to the seventh-ninth centuries AD. Targum Qohelet provides a systematic, rabbinic reading of the biblical book that once struggled both for acceptance and for its place in the *canon (see m. Yad. 3:5). Therefore the book is described as "words of prophecy" from "Solomon, the son of David" (Tg. Q. 1:1 [see also Tg. Q. 1:4; 3:11; 4:15]). The prophetic nature of Solomon's work was a significant factor in its acceptance by some as "inspired"; thus we find him prophesying in Targum Qohelet 1:1-2 of both the future division of the kingdom under Rehoboam and the destruction of Jerusalem and the temple by the Babylonians. It is this vision of the future that causes him to utter, "Vanity of vanities"; however, the universal vanity of life in this world has been transformed by the Targum into a specific cause and effect, with the addition "Vanity of vanities of everything for which I and David my father labored."

Targum Qohelet also seeks to smooth out any theological difficulties that the book raises and to explain within the confines of rabbinic ideology some of the more elliptical passages. Therefore, the conclusion in Ecclesiastes 2:24, "There is no good thing for a man but that he should eat and drink and let himself experience pleasure in all his toil," is transformed in Targum Qohelet: "There is nothing worthwhile for a man except that he eat and drink and enjoy himself before the people, to obey the commandments of the Lord and to walk in straight paths before Him so that He will do good to him for his labor." On numerous occasions the Targum simply adds ideas to the text that transform its general, universal nature to a very specific rabbinic context. Therefore we find the "time to be born and a time to die" (Eccles 3:1) transformed into "a time chosen to bear sons and a time chosen to kill rebellious and blaspheming sons, to kill them with stones," and the "time to embrace and a time to refrain from embracing" (Eccles 3:5) changed to "a time chosen to embrace a wife and a time chosen to refrain from embracing a wife during the seven days of mourning." Many of these "additions" are similar to interpretations found in Qohelet Rabbah, and it seems likely that both were dependent upon the same source(s).

A. Levy prepared a critical edition of Targum Qohelet in 1905, and a new edition is needed. There is a translation in the Aramaic Bible series (vol. 15); it is based, however, upon an eclectic text using both western and eastern manuscripts.

8. Targum Ruth (Tg. Ruth).

Targum Ruth contains many additions to the biblical text that have parallels in rabbinic literature, and in particular Ruth Rabbah. Thus we find the Targum beginning with a list of ten famines decreed to be on the earth from creation until the coming of the Messiah (cf., the Ten Songs in Tg. Cant.), and *Boaz in Targum Ruth 2:11 declaring, "It has been told to me on the authority of the sages, that when the Lord decreed [against intermarriage with Moab], He did not decree against the women, but against the men." We also find that Jesse was considered sinless and died only because the sin of Adam and Eve brought about the decree of death on all (Tg. Ruth 4:22). These and other interpretations are explicitly rabbinic and evince a close relationship with the rabbinic world. Targum Ruth, however, is unusual in that there are passages that have prompted some to suggest a sectarian origin for this Targum. In Targum Ruth 1:17 four types of death penalty are listed: stoning, burning with fire, being put to the sword and hanging on the gallows. Rabbinic law has a similar list but does not permit hanging, but rather strangulation (see m. Sanh. 7:1; Ruth Rab. 2:24). However, 11QT^a LXIV, 6-11 permits "hanging" as a form of punishment, and thus some have suggested that Targum Ruth reflects premishnaic, sectarian (even Sadducean) law. To suggest a sectarian origin for the whole Targum from this text seems exaggerated (other texts cited by those in favor of a sectarian origin, Tg. Ruth 1:22; 4:7, lack any reason to be considered sectarian), yet the conflict with mishnaic law remains, and therefore some have proposed a pre-rabbinic/mishnaic origin for Targum Ruth. Such an early dating is bold and sometimes relies on an assumption that material that contradicts the Mishnah must be premishnaic, which clearly is unsustainable. It is possible that there is some Karaite influence, which would clearly rule out a premishnaic date. Those suggesting an early date, however, also point to the pronominal use of memra (Tg. Ruth 3:8; 1:17 in some manuscripts), which is assumed must belong to a period before the word took on any theological import. Suffice to say the exact origins of Targum Ruth remain unclear, and as with the other Targumim to the Writings it may well contain some traditions that are early and some that are much later.

Further research into Targum Ruth can now proceed on a firmer footing after the publication of a critical text (Beattie).

9. Targum Esther (Tg. Est.).

There is some debate over the number of Targumim there are to the book of Esther. There is a scholarly consensus over the two Targumim to the book that appear in Bomberg's Biblia Rabbinica (Venice, 1517), Targum Esther 1 and Targum Esther 2; however, there is debate over the authenticity of the third Targum that is found in the Antwerp Polyglot of 1569-1572. The presence of more than one Targum to Esther has been acknowledged for a millennium or more. Rabbi Hai Gaon, writing at the end of the tenth century AD states, "Furthermore, we have here in Babylonia several versions of Targum Esther, differing from each other; and one has many additions and midrashim in it, while another does not." Targum Esther 1 and Targum Esther 2 are expansive, with the latter being the more expansive of the two, whereas the disputed third Targum is very literal. M. Goshen-Gottstein (and later B. Grossfeld) does not accept the authenticity of the third Targum, viewing it rather as a product of a sixteenth-century humanistic editing policy that purged the expansive texts of their many additions. P. Grelot, however, views it as an authentic Targum that represents the oldest recension of Targum Esther.

These complexities cannot be easily resolved, and, as the foregoing quotation from Rabbi Hai Gaon indicates, the multiplicity of Targum texts to the book of Esther is a historical phenomenon, and one that precludes definite conclusions in identifying the earliest strata or even an Urtext. Both Targumim are very expansive, with Targum Esther 2 being twice as expansive as Targum Esther 1. Many of these additions serve to rabbinize a book that, like Ecclesiastes, struggled to be accepted. Thus, although the Hebrew does not contain any explicit reference to God, both Targumim to Esther have numerous references and epithets for him (e.g., “Father in Heaven” [Tg. Est. 2 1:1; 3:8]; “the Holy One” [Tg. Est. 1 5:1]); the biblical book of Esther has no mention of the law, dietary regulations, covenant, and so on, whereas both Targum Esther 1 and Targum Esther 2 have Esther observe the commandments: “Sabbath and festivals she would observe; during the days of separation she watched herself, cooked dishes and wine of the nations she did not taste, and all the religious precepts which the women of the house of Israel were commanded, she observed” (Tg. Est. 1 2:20).

Within Targum Esther 1 and Targum Esther 2 numerous legends appear that have parallels only in the late Midrash collection Esther Rabbah, and thus it seems that these Targumim did not reach their final form until the early Middle Ages. There are parallels to other rabbinic midrashim, and by far the majority from Amoraic collections. This late date should not, however, deflect the fact that the book of Esther was read during the feast of Purim from Tannaitic times, and as such, there may well have been a Targum read alongside it from an early date (see t. Meg. 3:20-21).

Targum Esther 1 and Targum Esther 2 contain much parallel material, yet there are numerous differences between them, which suggests that both are dependent upon the same source but were created independently of one another. Such a situation accounts for both the similarities and the differences.

10. Conclusion.

Despite troubled beginnings and, in particular, their questionable status within the Babylonian Jewish community, the Targumim of the Writings eventually became established within rabbinic Judaism, with Rabbi Nathan ben Jehiel of Rome (AD 1102) quoting freely from them in his Aruch, and all of them included in the Rabbinic Bible, published in the sixteenth century. Today, among the remaining Yeminite Jewish communities in Israel, the Targumim to the five mēgillōt are still recited (if not understood by many) in the synagogues during their respective feasts. These Targumim, with their long history, remain an important witness to how Jews read these books in antiquity (and still read them today). They were seen, however, as more than “translations”; they became part of the revelation (oral Torah) that was handed to Moses on Mount Sinai and passed on through the generations (m. ’Abot 1), and as such, they were viewed as “revelation,” not merely human ingenuity.

The Jews, as with their Christian counterparts, viewed the entire Hebrew Scriptures as divine revelation, whose component parts could not be confined to a single meaning, but whose contents had to be “turned, turned and turned again” in order to unearth the treasures contained therein. The Targumim of the Writings, as we have them today, provide a glimpse of some of the treasures that were unearthed.

See also MEGILLOT AND FESTIVALS; PURIM.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. P. S. Alexander, “The Textual Tradition of Targum Lamentations,” Abr-Nahrain 24 (1986) 1-26; idem, The Targum of Canticles (Ar-Bib 17A; Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 2003); W. Bacher, “Das Targum zu Hiob,” MGWJ 20 (1871) 208-23, 283-84; D. R. G. Beattie, “The Targum of Ruth: A Preliminary Edition,” in Targum and Scripture: Studies in Aramaic Translation and Interpretation in Memory of Ernest G. Clarke, ed. P. V. M. Flesher (SAIS 2; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 2002); C. M. Brady, The Rabbinic Targum of Lamentations: Vindicating God (SAIS 3; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 2003); P. Churgin, Targūm Kētūbīm (New York: Horeb, 1945); M. Cohen, ed., Miqrā’ōt Gēdōlōt Hāketer (2 vols.; Ramat-Gan: Bar Ilan University Press, 2003); P. de Lagarde, ed., Hagiographa Chaldaice (Leipzig: Teubner, 1873); L. Diez Merino, Targum de Salmos: Edición príncipe del Ms. Villa-Amil n.5 de Alfonso de Zamora (BHB 1; Madrid: Consejo Superior de Investigaciones Científicas, Instituto Francisco Suárez, 1982); idem, Targum de Proverbios: Edición príncipe del Ms. Villa-Amil n.5 de Alfonso de Zamora (BHB 6; Madrid: Consejo Superior de Investigaciones Científicas, Instituto Francisco Suárez, 1984); T. M. Edwards, "The Targum of Psalms," in Interpreting the Psalms: Issues and Approaches, ed. P. J. Johnston and D. G. Firth (Leicester: Apollos, 2005) 279-94; C. H. Fontela, El Targum al Cantar de los Cantares (Edición Crítica) (Colección Tesis Doctorales 92/87; Madrid: Editorial de la Universidad Complutense de Madrid, 1987); S. Fraade, "Rabbinic Views on the Practice of Targum and Multilingualism in Jewish Galilee of the Third-Sixth Centuries," in The Galilee in Late Antiquity, ed. L. I. Levine (New York: Jewish Theological Seminary of America, 1992) 253-86; S. L. Gold, "Targum or Translation: New Light on the Character of Qumran Job (11Q10) from a Synoptic Approach," JAB 3.1/2 (2001) 101-20; M. Goshen-Gottstein, "'The Third Targum' on Esther and MS Neofiti 1," Bib 56 (1975) 301-29; P. Grelot, "Observations sur les targums I et III d'Esther," Bib 56 (1975) 53-73; B. Grossfeld, The Two Targums of Esther (ArBib 18; Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1991); J. F. Healey, The Targum of Job (ArBib 15; Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1991); E. Levine, The Aramaic Version of Qohelet (New York: Sepher-Hermon Press, 1978); R. H. Melamed, The Targum to Canticles: According to Six Yemen MSS, compared with the "Textus Receptus" as Contained in de Lagarde's "Hagiographa chaldaica" (Philadelphia: Dropsie College for Hebrew and Cognate Learning, 1921); reprinted from JQR 10 (1919-1920) 377-410; JQR 11 (1920-1921) 1-20; JQR 12 (1921-1922) 57-117; A. Shinan, "The Aramaic Targum as a Mirror of Galilean Jewry," in The Galilee in Late Antiquity, ed. L. I. Levine (New York: Jewish Theological Seminary of America, 1992) 241-51; D. M. Stec, The Text of the Targum of Job: An Introduction and a Critical Edition (A GJU 20; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1994); idem, The Targum of Psalms (ArBib17; Minnesota: Liturgical Press, 2004); A. Van der Kooij, "The Origin and Purpose of Bible Translation in Ancient Judaism: Some Comments," AR 1.2 (1999) 204-14; R. Weiss, The Aramaic Targum of Job [in Hebrew] (Tel Aviv: Chaim Rosenberg School for Jewish Studies, Tel Aviv University, 1979; M. Weitzman, The Syriac Version of the Old Testament: An Introduction (UCOP 56; Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1999).

T. M. Edwards

TEMPLE. See ARCHITECTURAL IMAGERY.

TERSENESS

Literary specialists make a broad genre distinction in written language between poetry and prose. In spite of J. Kugel's otherwise probing analysis, most scholars believe that there is a distinction between poetry and prose in ancient biblical Hebrew literature. The vast majority of modern English versions recognize this by their formatting of the printed page. Even the casual reader of Hebrew poetry can differentiate poetry from prose in the OT at a mere glance, since a page of poetry is distinguished by lots of white space. This feature is a result of one of the key traits that distinguish poetry from prose: terseness. The term is borrowed from Kugel (87-94), who, though denying the poetry-prose distinction, does see terseness as a feature that "heightens" biblical style. Kugel (87) says that "it amounts to far more than the concision and compression of expression that one associates with poetry. It is more reminiscent of 'telegraph style' ('Urge support tax reform package for increase housing starts 1980') or the elliptical language of some popular sayings ('Red sky at morning, sailor take warning'), in which some of the signposts of ordinary discourse have been stripped away."

1. The Features of Poetry
2. The Definition of Terseness
3. The Production of Terseness
4. Ambiguity

1. The Features of Poetry.

The reader of English translations of the Bible can easily tell whether a page of text is poetry or prose, but the Hebrew scholar has more difficulty. It is true that three books—*Job, *Psalms, *Proverbs—have a distinctive accentuation (te'amûm), but these were added by the Masoretes (AD 400-1000).

Part of the problem of definitively distinguishing poetry from prose in the Bible is that there does not appear to be a single trait or even a group of traits exclusive to poetry and absent in prose. For many years it was thought that *meter might fulfill that function as it does in other poetic traditions, but meter remains undiscovered and may not even exist in Hebrew poetry (Longman). Even so, there are three features that are pervasive in poetry: *parallelism, *imagery, terseness. Of these three, terseness is arguably the most distinctive to poetry (though we will see that it is partly a function of the other two). Terseness, of course, is the focus of the present article.

2. The Definition of Terseness.

“Terseness” simply refers to the brevity of the poetic line. Whereas prose is built on sentences that form paragraphs, poetry is built on cola that form parallel lines. The cola typically are short, with the first line often longer than the second. Although it is not uncommon that the two cola are of equal length, it is rare indeed when the second colon is longer than the first. A colon typically contains two to four words. The first two verses of Psalm 3 can be used to illustrate (hyphens connect English words that constitute a single word in Hebrew, and parentheses indicate words that are not in Hebrew):

Yahweh, how many (are) my-foes;
many are-those-who-rise against-me.
Many say to-me:
“(There is) no victory for-him in-God.”

*yhwh mâ-rabbû šārāy rabbîm qāmûm ‘ālāy
rabbîm ‘ōmrîm lēnapšî
‘en yěšû‘atâ lô bē’lōhîm*

Terseness adds punch to poetry. Poetry says a lot using a few words. As a result of this feature, poetry is not easily skimmed; rather, the compactness of poetry requires the interpreter to slow down and reflect or meditate. As we will also observe later, this feature raises the level of *ambiguity of the poetic line as well.

3. The Production of Terseness.

3.1. General Economy of Words. In the first place, the poet is conscious of the number of words that he or she uses. Literature in general is a self-conscious use of language. Poets are just as conscious of how they say something as they are of what they say. The brevity of the poetic line is noticeable in English translation, but it is even more obvious in the Hebrew original. For instance, the NIV renders Psalm 70:2a with the following twelve words:

May those who seek my life be put to shame and confusion.

In Hebrew, however, there are two words per colon:

*yěbōšû wěyahpěrû
mēbaqšē napšî*

This can be literally rendered with hyphens showing single words in the Hebrew (notice that the NIV transposes the cola):

May-they-be-shamed and-may-they-be-confused those-who-seek my-life.

But besides what appears to be a general self-consciousness on the part of the poet as to the number of words used, the terseness of Hebrew poetry is achieved in some other recognizable ways.

3.2. Parallelism and Imagery. Parallelism is the echoing effect in Hebrew poetry. Within a poetic line most elements in the first part are echoed in some fashion in the second part. However, typically the poet finds a way to use fewer words in the second colon. Parallelism is one way in which linguistic concision is achieved.

A second poetic convention that contributes to terseness is *imagery. Imagery is often achieved through association (metonymy) or, more often at least in Hebrew poetry, through comparison (metaphor). Metaphor brings together two things that are essentially different from each other, though they are similar in some fashion that merits the comparison. When Psalm 23:1a states, “The LORD is my shepherd,” we are invited to unpack the comparison. This unpacking reveals how metaphor contributes to terseness. First, in keeping with the point in 3.1 above, it is important to point out that the five words of the English translation are really only two in Hebrew: “The-LORD [is] my-shepherd.” Second, the metaphor packs a lot of meaning. When the interpreter asks what it means, the answer can only come by means of a lengthy prose statement: “It means that the Lord guides, protects and comforts his people, who are the sheep.” And this prose description can go on, especially if one tries to represent the emotional impact of the metaphor. Indeed, it is almost certainly impossible to translate everything that the metaphor intends to communicate by transposing the metaphor into prose.

3.3. Prose Particles. An attentive reading of obviously poetic texts reveals a radically diminished use of the definite article ha, the relative pronoun ʾāšer and the direct object marker ʾet. Often they are missing where one would expect to find them in a standard piece of prose. F. Andersen and D. Freedman (1980) have followed up on this intuition and have run statistical analyses showing that in a typical prose text these “prose particles,” as they call them, constitute fifteen percent or more of all words, while in typical poetic text they constitute five percent or less. Furthermore, Andersen and Freedman (60-61) claim that the “gap is a fairly wide one and while some pieces fall between the two categories, most cluster at the high and low ends of the scale.” These scholars use this data to differentiate prose from poetry in questionable instances, such as Hosea, but their insight is also a further contribution to a proper understanding of how terseness is produced by Hebrew poets.

3.4. Lack of Conjunctions. Poets restrict the use of conjunctions. Conjunctions are words that join clauses and sentences and often guide the reader as to the relationship between these semantic units. It is not that there are absolutely no conjunctions in poetry, but they are used more sparingly. Notice the relationship between the first and second lines of Psalm 23:1: “The LORD is my shepherd; I will lack nothing.” There is no conjunction between v. 1a and v. 1b. One can easily imagine a prose verse saying something like “The LORD is my shepherd; therefore, I will lack nothing” or “Since the LORD is my shepherd, I will lack nothing.” But such conjunctions are rare. Indeed, though it does occasionally appear, the simple waw conjunction is more rare in poetry than in prose. Although this observation is a fair one based on extensive reading of the literature, it must be admitted that the same kind of careful statistical study has not been done on this aspect as it has on the prose particles.

One notable exception to the lack of conjunctions in Hebrew poetry is the use of the conjunction kī in the causal (“because”) sense. It is often used in a *hymn to indicate the reasons for praise: “Sing to Yahweh a new song, for [kī] he has done marvelous acts” (Ps 98:1a). In psalms of *lament the kī marks the reasons for grief or complaint: “By the rivers of Babylon, there we sat and wept, as we remembered Zion. In the midst of the poplars we hung our harps, for [kī] there those who captured us asked us for songs” (Ps 137:1-3).

So again, although poets employ conjunctions on occasion, there is a significantly diminished usage. One result is the heightening of an intentional ambiguity, and a second result, germane to the present article, is a further reduction in line length.

3.5. Ellipsis. A final major way by which Hebrew poets produce terseness in their lines is through the use of ellipsis. *Ellipsis is the omission from the second colon of a major element found in the first colon (e.g., verb or noun or prepositional phrase), though the missing element is understood in the second.

It is true that completely parallel lines may be found in Hebrew where each element in the first colon is echoed in the second:

Let them exalt him in the assembly of the people,
and praise him in the meeting of the elders.
(Ps 107:32)

Frequently, however, the second phrase will omit a part (usually the first element) of the first clause with the understanding that the omitted part of the first clause is to be read into the second clause. Usually it is the verb that is omitted:

You have put me in the lowest pit, in deep and dark places. (Ps 88:6)

The verb is missing in the second phrase, but of course we are to understand the sense of the second phrase as “(You have put me) in deep and dark places.”

The effect of ellipsis is to bind two phrases more closely together. There is no question as to whether the two phrases go together in a single line. A further effect, however, is economy of expression. In other words, ellipsis promotes terseness.

Proverbs 31:4 is a good example of a nonverbal ellipsis:

Not for kings, Lemuel, not for kings to drink wine, and for rulers to desire strong drink.

In this case it is the negative that is elided.

4. Ambiguity.

Poets say a lot using a few words. Thus, poetry packs rich meaning in few words. This feature requires readers to slow down and meditate as they interpret a poem. Many of the features that contribute to terseness also heighten *ambiguity. Poetry does not speak as directly as prose, but on the other hand, it involves readers as whole people, not just an intellect, as they engage a poem.

Here is a fairly literal translation of Psalm 131:

Yahweh, my-heart (is) not exalted;
my-eyes not lifted up.
And-I-do-not-concern-myself-with-great-things,
and-things-too-wonderful-for-me.
But I-have-stilled
and-quieted my-soul.
Like-a-weaned-child with its-mother,
like-a-weaned-child (is) my-soul-to-me.
Israel, hope in-Yahweh,
from-now-until-forever.

Although some conjunctions appear in this psalm, some are missing between cola, and this requires the interpreter to supply them, thus creating ambiguity. For instance, what is the connection between v. 1a and v. 1b? Though not lending to the ambiguity, the ellipsis of v. 2b ("I do not concern") helps create the terseness. The imagery of v. 2 (in what way my soul's relationship to God is like that of a weaned child to a mother) is also ambiguous.

All in all, terseness, with its often attendant ambiguity, lends interest to the poem and requires the reader/interpreter to be deeply engaged with the material.

See also AMBIGUITY; ELLIPSIS; PARALLELISM; POETICS, TERMINOLOGY OF.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. F. I. Andersen and A. D. Forbes, "'Prose Particle' Counts of the Hebrew Bible," in The Word of the Lord Shall Go Forth: Essays in Honor of David Noel Freedman in Celebration of His Sixtieth Birthday, ed. C. L. Meyers and M. O'Connor (Winona Lake, IN: Eisenbrauns, 1983) 165-83; F. I. Andersen and D. N. Freedman, Hosea (AB 24; Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1980); D. N. Freedman, "Pottery, Poetry, and Prophecy," JBL 96 (1977) 5-26; idem, "Another Look at Hebrew Poetry," in Directions in Biblical Hebrew Poetry, ed. E. R. Follis (JSOTSup 40; Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1987) 11-28; J. L. Kugel, The Idea of Biblical Poetry: Parallelism and Its History (New Haven: Yale University Press, 1981); T. Longman III, "A Critique of Two Recent Metrical Systems," Bib 63 (1982) 230-54.

T. Longman III

TEXT, TEXTUAL CRITICISM

The term text refers to the precise wording of an extant manuscript (handwritten copy) of a literary composition. The term textual criticism is used of the science and art that seeks to determine the most reliable wording of a text (see McCarter, 18; Tov 1992, 1). It is a science because specific rules govern the evaluation of various types of copyist errors and readings, but it is also an art because these rules cannot be rigidly applied in every situation. The goal of OT textual criticism is to work back as closely as possible to the final form of the text that was maintained by early *scribes and was later canonized.

This article provides a brief overview of OT textual evidence in general and then, more specifically, for each of the poetic books. It then describes textual critical principles used to determine the best reading of the text. Finally, two examples give an idea of the issues encountered in the poetic books during the process of textual criticism.

1. Textual Evidence
2. Textual Critical Principles
3. Textual Critical Examples

1. Textual Evidence.

1.1. General Overview. Little is known about the earliest stages of the transmission of the biblical texts. Divine revelation was most likely initially handed down orally from generation to generation, but at some point it was committed to writing to ensure its accuracy. These original manuscripts, or autographs, of the OT no longer exist, but we have copies of copies made by scribes, whose primary job was to retain God's revelation. The autographs probably were written on scrolls made from papyrus or leather (see Jer 36). When biblical scrolls began to show signs of wear from everyday use, they were copied and then reverently buried (since they contained the sacred name of God). There was little reason to retain these worn copies, since scribes were meticulous in copying them. Sometimes worn copies were placed in a genizah ("hidden" place) until there were enough to bury. One of these genizahs was found in the late nineteenth century when an old synagogue in Cairo was being renovated.

Initially, priests (or a special group of priests) maintained the sacred traditions. Then, from about 500 BC to about AD 100, there arose an influential group of teachers and interpreters of the *law called the soferim ("scribes"). The Babylonian Talmud states, "The older men were called soferim because they counted [sfr: "count, recount, declare"] all the letters in the Torah" (b. Qidd. 30a). Scholars often discuss the difficult question of what this early text may have looked like and how closely it corresponds to the modern Masoretic Text (MT), the common form of today's Hebrew Bible. Evidence from about the mid-third century BC on indicates that for several centuries a variety of Hebrew texts coexisted (e.g., proto-MT, LXX, Samaritan Pentateuch and possibly others suggested by some of the Dead Sea manuscripts). The Hebrew manuscripts copied before the first century AD show two tendencies: they preserved the accuracy of the text, while at the same time the text was revised or updated within certain boundaries. The scribes assigned to Scriptures a high degree of authority and upheld them with great reverence, but they desired to have their readers understand them. When the scribes came across something that they felt was inappropriate or objectionable, they would modify the text but place notes in the margin so that the reader would be aware of the change (e.g., a superlinear nūn was added in Judges 18:30 along with the scribal note indicating that the nūn was added because Jonathan's actions better resembled those of a son of the wicked Manasseh [מְנַשֶּׁה] than a son of Moses [מֹשֶׁה]). Scribal notations may also have been used to indicate a question or reservation about a specific reading of a text (e.g., Kethib/Qere readings; inverted nuns, sebirin). From about AD 100 to AD 300 a group of scribes called the tan-naim ("repeaters") maintained the sacred traditions and developed meticulous rules that were to be followed when copying biblical scrolls (e.g., no word or letter was to be written from memory; if more than three mistakes were found on any page, it had to be destroyed and redone). These rules helped maintain an accurate text, but the scribes also allowed certain types of revisions: (1) matres lectionis were added (certain consonants included as precursors to vowel points) and the modernization of archaic spellings; (2) corrections were made (see 4QIsa^a where words are crossed out or consonants written above the text); (3) about 350 BC texts began to be written in Assyrian (square) script instead of paleo-Hebrew (paleo-Hebrew manuscripts were eventually looked down upon).

W. F. Albright (1957, 79) describes a practice common throughout the ancient Near East: "Instead of leaving obvious archaisms in spelling and grammar, as later became the fashion in Greece and Rome, the scribes generally revised ancient literature and other documents periodically." However, sometime shortly after the turn of the century the scribes no longer allowed the text to be modified, and their job narrowed to preserving the accuracy of Scripture, which they did with amazing precision. There is very little variation in any of the extant manuscripts dated to the first and second centuries AD (e.g., from Masada, Naḥal Ḥever, Wadi Murabba'at and Naḥal Še'elim), each reflecting the proto-MT. There is still debate over how and why the text became so unified following the first century AD. Some argue that the group that maintained the proto-MT was the only one to survive the destruction of the second temple (Tov 1992, 195; Albrektson 1978). Others suggest that there was a purposeful standardization of the text (Waltke 1978, 57; Würthwein, 15-16). The latter seems most likely for two reasons: (1) there was a desire to provide a consistent standard for debates between Christians and Jews in the first century AD (cf. Justin Martyr, Dial. 68); (2) Hillel the Elder needed a standardized text on which to base his seven rules of biblical hermeneutics ('Abot R. Nat. 37A). Both the sheer number of manuscripts and the quotations in the rabbinic literature suggest that the proto-MT was maintained by the authoritative center of Judaism. Thus sometime during the first century AD the proto-MT apparently became the dominant textual tradition.

Evidence for the OT text comes primarily from two major sources: (1) Hebrew manuscripts, and (2) recensions, translations or versions. Some of the most important in each category are as follows.

1.1.1. Hebrew Manuscript Evidence. In the middle of the twentieth century the number of early OT manuscripts increased significantly, largely due to the discovery of the manuscripts popularly known as the *Dead Sea Scrolls. The discovery of the Dead Sea Scrolls revolutionized the field of OT textual criticism because for the first time Hebrew manuscripts (or at least fragments) from at least as early as the first century AD were available for most of the OT. Nonetheless, most of the earliest extant Hebrew manuscripts are still a significant distance from the autographs of the OT.

The extant Hebrew manuscripts of the biblical books include approximately 222 manuscripts from the Dead Sea area, a few other early Hebrew manuscripts and about two thousand Hebrew manuscripts from medieval times or later.

1.1.1.1. Dead Sea Scrolls. The Dead Sea Scrolls provided texts of the OT from approximately one thousand years earlier (i.e., from about 250 BC to AD 135) than what had been available prior to their discovery. Currently, manuscripts or fragments (usually several copies) of all the biblical books (except *Esther and possibly Nehemiah) have been found in eleven caves surrounding Qumran (about seven miles south of Jericho) and in several other caves around the Dead Sea.

1.1.1.2. Silver Amulets. Currently the oldest extant fragment of any of the OT is written on two silver amulets dated to the mid-seventh century BC. They contain part of the priestly benediction of Numbers 6:22-27 and are similar to the MT, though there are some omissions. However, these omissions may be due to the limited size of the amulets.

1.1.1.3. Later Hebrew Manuscripts. From the second half of the eighth century AD to the mid-tenth century AD the Ben Asher family played a leading role in recording and maintaining the MT at Tiberias. Two manuscripts are the earliest and most complete copies of the MT. First, there is the Aleppo Codex. According to its colophon, the consonantal text was attributed to Shelomo ben Buya'a, and Aaron ben Moses ben Asher added the pointing and the Masorah about AD 930. This is the earliest manuscript of the MT, but in the early twentieth century a fire destroyed one quarter of it (Gen 1:1—Deut 28:16; Song 3:12 to the end of the OT, including *Ecclesiastes, *Lamentations and *Esther). Second, there is Codex Leningradensis (Leningrad Ms. B19^A, L). This manuscript was the base text for the most recent critical editions of the Hebrew OT (BHK, BHS, BHQ), since it is the oldest and most complete manuscript of the OT presently accessible. A colophon dates this important witness of the Ben Asher family to AD 1008.

1.1.2. Evidence from Recensions, Translations and Versions. There are three important concepts to remember in dealing with secondary sources. First, the process of translating a text from one language to another involves a distinct set of problems, such as the grammatical/syntactical differences between languages and the difficulties of finding equivalent words. Second, it is not always possible to tell if divergences reconstructed from the various versions arose from discrepancies in the Hebrew text or from idiosyncrasies of the translators who may have modified the text, either intentionally or unintentionally. Third, it is important to know which translations are related so that particular readings are not given too much weight. For example, the LXX was the basis for the Old Latin, Sahidic, Ethiopic, Syro-Hexapla and Georgian versions. In addition, works such as the Vulgate claim to be translations of an original Hebrew text and yet were heavily influenced by Greek and Old Latin versions.

1.1.2.1. Septuagint (LXX). Historically, the LXX had an important influence on both Jews and Christians. Jewish immigrants living in the cosmopolitan city of Alexandria were compelled to abandon their native language, but the translation of their laws into Greek was one way for them to maintain their faith. This Greek translation became so popular, however, that it was increasingly seen as the standard form of the OT and was subsequently adopted by Christians. About seventy percent of the NT's quotations of the OT appear to come from the LXX. The more Christians embraced the LXX and used it to argue their beliefs (e.g., Is 7:14), the further the Jewish community distanced themselves from it. As a result, other Greek translations were made by Jewish scholars (e.g., Aquila, Symmachus, Theodotion) to meet their needs.

1.1.2.2. Aquila. Aquila, from Sinope (in Pontus on the Black Sea), converted to Judaism and became a disciple of Rabbi Akiba. About AD 130 he produced a literal Greek translation that closely followed the Hebrew text—even the Hebrew definite direct object marker ('et), usually left untranslated, is indicated by the article or by the Greek word syn ("so, with, together with") followed by the accusative case (i.e., grammatical case marking the direct object).

1.1.2.3. Theodotion. Early church tradition says that Theodotion was a Jewish proselyte who lived in Ephesus during the second century AD (Irenaeus Haer. 3.21.1, according to Eusebius Hist. eccl. 5.8, 10). His Greek translation was midway between the strictly literal translation of Aquila and the literary elegance of Symmachus. Theodotion succeeded in producing a translation that retained much of its Semitic flavor and yet was readily understandable to his Greek-speaking audience. One peculiarity of his work is that he often transliterated rather than translated words, even fairly common ones.

1.1.2.4. Symmachus. This translation probably dates to the early mid-third century AD. According to Eusebius and Jerome, Symmachus was an Ebionite (an early Christian sect considered heretical by the early Christian fathers for observing some form of the Jewish law) (Jerome Vir. ill. 54; Comm. Habac. 3.13; Praef. Job; Eusebius Hist. eccl. 6.17). Symmachus's elegant Greek style enabled him to prepare an idiomatic translation of the MT that occasionally manifests significant independence and originality.

1.1.2.5. Aramaic Targumim. Aramaic translations and explanations regarding the interpretation of the text arose, and these are known as *Targumim. Some Targumim contain a fairly literal translation of the MT (e.g., Targum of Job, Targum of Proverbs), whereas others are paraphrastic, adding interpretive and explanatory material (e.g., Targum of Song of Songs). Only a fraction of these Targumim have survived; nevertheless, they are important to textual criticism for at least three reasons: (1) some include translations of the text (lemmata); (2) they mention early Jewish traditions regarding the interpretation of the biblical texts; and (3) they are written in Aramaic (see DOTHB, Aramaic Language), which is closely related to biblical Hebrew (see Hebrew Language). The quality of the translations varies greatly among the Targumim, but on the whole they reflect the MT.

1.1.2.6. Latin Versions. "Old Latin" is a collective term for the Latin versions in existence before the Latin Vulgate. Fragments in Old Latin exist from the Pentateuch, *Psalms and the Major and Minor Prophets; more can be gleaned from works of the church fathers. The fragments most likely were translated from a copy of the LXX, though some passages seem to reflect a reading closer to the Hebrew text. Jerome (c. AD 345-420) was commissioned to revise and standardize the many differences in the Old Latin texts. At first he began by translating the psalms from Old Latin texts based primarily on the LXX (Psalterium Romanum), and then from the LXX (Gallican Psalter), but these proved unsatisfactory, so eventually he learned Hebrew in order to translate them from the original language. Even though his proficiency was limited, it was better than any other previous church father. His Latin version of the OT (AD 390-405), translated from the original Hebrew text, became the standard edition of the Bible for over one thousand years.

1.1.2.7. Syriac Versions. There are two major translations of the OT into Classical Syriac (Eastern Aramaic). The first and most important is the Syriac Peshitta (peshitta probably means "simple or common"), translated from the Hebrew, and the second is the Syro-Hexapla, translated from the Greek. Around the fifth century AD the Syriac Peshitta emerged over other Syriac translations. The OT text of the Peshitta appears to have been translated quite literally from a Hebrew text fairly close to the MT but was subsequently revised with the aid of the LXX (Würthwein, 81).

1.2. Specific Evidence for the Poetic Books. There are relatively few early Hebrew manuscripts pertinent to the poetic books, but they are largely in agreement with the text of the MT. The texts of some of the poetic books appear to be fairly well preserved in the MT (e.g., Ecclesiastes, Song of Songs), while others are not as well preserved (e.g., *Job, Psalms, *Proverbs). Due to the nature of the books and their rare vocabulary, these latter works raise a number of difficulties.

1.2.1. Psalms. Comparison of parallel passages of the MT of Psalms indicates a number of divergences. For example, there are over one hundred differences between the parallel psalms in Psalm 18 and 2 Samuel 22 (cf. also Ps 14 and Ps 53; Ps 40 and Ps 70). However, on the positive side, there are more early manuscripts for comparison than for any other poetic book. Thirty-nine scrolls or fragments of Psalms (i.e., thirty-six from Qumran; two from Masada; one from Nahal Hever) and four commentary texts containing portions of psalms texts were found in the area of the Dead Sea. Most are fragmentary, and some do not appear to have ever been part of complete psalters (e.g., 4Q89 [4QPs^g]; 4Q90 [4QPs^h]; 5Q5 [5QPs]). Of the 150 canonical psalms, only 126 appear in the thirty-nine psalm scrolls or in the peshirim from the Dead Sea area, and there are at least fifteen apocryphal psalms (Flint, 703). At least ten of these psalm compositions are arranged stichometrically, reflecting a poetic format (1Q10 [1QPs^a]; 3Q2 [3QPs]; 4Q84 [4QPs^b]; 4Q85 [4QPs^c]; 4Q89 [4QPs^g]; 4Q90 [4QPs^h]; 4Q93 [4QPsⁱ]; 5Q5 [5QPs]; 8Q2 [8QPs]; Mas1e), while twenty-one are arranged in prose format (1Q11 [1QPs^b]; 1Q12 [1QPs^c]; 2Q14 [2QPs]; 3Q2 [3QPs]; 4Q83 [4QPs^a]; 4Q87 [4QPs^e]; 4Q88 [4QPs^f]; 4Q91 [4QPs^j]; 4Q92 [4QPs^k]; 4Q94 [4QPs^m]; 4Q95 [4QPsⁿ]; 4Q96 [4QPs^o]; 4Q97 [4QPs^p]; 4Q98 [4QPs^q]; 4Q98a [4QPs^r]; 4Q98f [4QPs^w]; 4Q522 [4QapocrJosh^{c?}]; 6Q5 [6QpapPs?]; 11Q6 [11QPs^b]; 11Q7 [11QPs^c]; 11Q8 [11QPs^d]), and at least one is mixed (11Q5 [11QPs^a]). They are dated as shown in Table 1.

The order of the psalms often differs from the MT (e.g., 4Q83 [4QPs^a]; 4Q84 [4QPs^b]; 4Q86 [4QPs^d]), but the superscriptions are generally very similar (e.g., Ps 123, “A Song of Ascents. [Of David]” [MT: simply “A Song of Ascents”]; Ps 145, “A Prayer. Of David” [MT: “A Song of Praise. Of David”]).

One of the most important of these is Psalms Scroll^a (11Q5 [11QPs^a]) from Qumran cave 11, found in February 1956. This scroll dates to the first half of the first century AD. It is in very good condition at the top, but the bottom third is in an advanced state of decomposition. It contains forty-one canonical psalms from the last third of the Psalter (though not in canonical order), seven apocryphal psalms, Psalm 151 (which is recorded in the LXX), and a psalm from Sirach 51:13-20. The name “Yahweh” (יהוה, yhw) is also written in paleo-Hebrew script. Its text basically follows the MT, though it contains hundreds of relatively minor textual differences—a small number are more substantial (e.g., inclusion of the nûn verse in Ps 145:13, which does not appear in the MT [11Q5 (11QPs^a) XVII, 2-3]). Excavations at Masada in 1963-1965 uncovered the remains of fourteen scrolls, including biblical, sectarian and apocryphal texts. They date to sometime before AD 73, when the Romans stormed the fortress, and provide further evidence that the Hebrew text was unified during the first century AD. Some of the more interesting biblical texts for our purposes are fragments from Psalms (Psalm^a [Mas1e], containing Ps 81:2b to Ps 85:6a) and Psalm 150 (Psalm^b [Mas1f]). The Masada manuscripts are written in Hebrew square script and are very similar to the MT (e.g., one variant: ’ohelê ’dwm, “the tents of Edom” [MT Ps 83:7], reads ’lhy ’dwm, “the gods of Edom” [Mas1e II, 19]). In 1952 a fragmentary Hebrew manuscript of Psalms (5/6Hev1b) was discovered at Naḥal Hever (Wadi Habra), located about one mile south of Ein Gedi on the western shore of the Dead Sea. In 1960 a larger portion of the same manuscript was found (XHev/SE4). All the biblical texts from these caves are dated to about AD 130, and their translations are virtually identical to the MT.

The Qumran texts are by far the most helpful for textual critical purposes on the book of

Table 1. Qumran Psalm Manuscripts

DATE	MANUSCRIPT
Second century BC	4Q83 [4QPs ^a]; 4Q98f [4QPs ^w]
First century BC	1Q10 [1QPs ^a]; 4Q84 [4QPs ^b]; 4Q86 [4QPs ^d]; 4Q88 [4QPs ^f]; 4Q92 [4QPs ^k]; 4Q93 [4QPs ^l]; 4Q95 [4QPs ⁿ]; 4Q96 [4QPs ^o]; 4Q98d [4QPs ^u]; 4Q522 [4QapocrJosh ^{c?}]; Mas1f
Herodian (early first century BC)	1Q12 [1QPs ^c]; 2Q14 [2QPs]; 4Q90 [4QPs ^h]; 4Q94 [4QPs ^m]; 4Q97 [4QPs ^p]; 4Q98a [4QPs ^r]
First century AD	1Q11 [1QPs ^b]; 3Q2 [3QPs]; 4Q85 [4QPs ^c]; 4Q87 [4QPs ^e]; 4Q89 [4QPs ^g]; 4Q91 [4QPs ^j]; 4Q98 [4QPs ^q]; 4QPs ^s ; 4Q98b [4QPs ^s]; 4Q98c [4QPs ^t]; 5Q5 [5QPs]; 6Q5 [6QpapPs?]; 8Q2 [8QPs]; 11Q5 [11QPs ^a]; 11Q6 [11QPs ^b]; 11Q7 [11QPs ^c]; 11Q8 [11QPs ^d]; 11Q11 [11QapocrPs]; Mas1e; XHev/Se 4

Psalms. The LXX version is probably even more corrupt than the Hebrew text. The Latin Vulgate version of Psalms comes from the Gallican Psalter, which is a translation from the LXX, not a Hebrew text like the rest of the Latin Vulgate. The Syriac Peshitta apparently was translated from a Hebrew text but subsequently was revised in light of the LXX. Therefore the versions are often of little help for textual criticism in the book of Psalms.

1.2.2. Job. The Hebrew text of the book of Job appears to have suffered more corruption in the course of transmission than any other book of the OT, forcing commentators and textual critics to regularly suggest emendations. Even when the text does not appear to be corrupt, the meaning is often uncertain, as is testified in several of the ancient translations. Qumran yielded only four fragments of this book, dated between about 225 and 150 BC (4Q101 [4Qpaleo-Job^c] and AD 50 (2Q15 [2QJob]; 4Q99 [4QJob^a]; 4Q100 [4QJob^b]). These last three manuscripts are written in Herodian script and are quite fragmentary. 4Q99 (4QJob^a) is the largest manuscript and contains Job 31:14-19; 32:3-4; 33:10-11, 24-26, 28-30; 35:16; 36:7-11, 13-27, 32-33; 37:1-5, 14-15. 4Q100 (4QJob^b) is the next largest and contains Job 8:15-17; 9:27; 13:4; 14:4-6; 31:20-21. 2Q15 (2QJob) contains only five words from Job 33:28-30. These manuscripts mainly follow the text of the MT with only a few orthographic differences and variant readings (Newsom, 412). The last manuscript of Job (4Q101 [4Qpaleo-Job^c]), dated between 225 and 150 BC, contains portions of Job 13:18-20, 23-27; 14:13-18 and is written in paleo-Hebrew script. Its text is written stichometrically, has dots or strokes between words, contains very few matres lectionis, and is very close to the MT. There are also two Targumim of Job (4Q157 [4QtgJob]; 11Q10 [11QtgJob]), both of which are dated by their script to the early first century AD, though several scholars have dated 11Q10 (11QtgJob) much earlier, to the second century BC. 4Q157 (4QtgJob) contains an Aramaic translation of Job 3:5-9; 4:16-5:4, and 11Q10 (11QtgJob) includes most of Job 17—42. Both appear to closely follow the text of the MT, but the ending of 11Q10 (11QtgJob) differs significantly from the MT, and in a few cases this manuscript agrees with the LXX against the MT.

The LXX text of the book of Job is sometimes a very literal translation and at other times is closer to a paraphrase than a translation. This may be due to the obscurity of the Vorlage. The text of the LXX is about 350-400 lines shorter than the MT. There is little reason to favor the shorter text, since the passages omitted do not seem to have a different characteristic form or style, and their absence often destroys the parallel structure seen in the MT. Origen added the missing lines from the later Greek text of Theodotion, but subsequent copyists often were not careful to distinguish between the two texts and combined them as if they were the original LXX text. The Greek versions seldom resolve the difficulties of the MT due to paraphrasing and occasional theological bias (e.g., revocalizing the negative particle in Job 13:15 to affirm trust in God [Pope 1973, xlv-xlv; see also Orlinsky 1935-1936; 1957; Wevers, 187-90]. G. Gerleman (18) has argued that the LXX translator(s) of the book of Job used a Vorlage very similar to the proto-MT but had limited understanding of the language (see also Waltke 1979, 221-22). The ancient versions in general seem to follow the MT quite literally (e.g., Syriac, Latin Vulgate, Aramaic Targumim), but they need to be examined carefully in passages where the MT is questioned. The Syriac Peshitta sometimes clarifies the meaning of an obscure Hebrew word, and the Aramaic Targum contains some interesting interpretations but offers little help in resolving difficulties. There is a curious situation in the Latin Vulgate of the book of Job. Jerome appears to have translated very literally in some places but quite freely in others. This work also appears to have been influenced by the Greek translations of Aquila, Theodotion and Symmachus.

1.2.3. Proverbs. The text of the book of Proverbs also has significant difficulties, but some of the alleged corruptions may merely be questions regarding grammar and the rare vocabulary of this book (e.g., in Prov 26:23 kesep sigim ["silver dross"] perhaps should be revocalized as kēsapsāgim ["like glaze"] [Albright 1955, 12]). The Qumran manuscripts contain only two fragments from the book of Proverbs, dated between 50 BC and AD 50. 4Q102 (4QProv^a) has thirty-nine verses (Prov 1:27—2:1), and 4Q103 (4QProv^b) has 125 verses (Prov 9:16 [possibly Prov 9:4]; 13:6-9; 14:6-13; 14:27-28[?]; 14:31-15:8; 15:19-31). Together they yield only four minor and two more significant variants from the MT (in Prov 15:28 the omission of yehgeh ["meditate”], and in Prov 1:32 mōškōt [“cord”] instead of mēšūbat [“apostasy”] (Jastram, 702).

There are some interesting differences between the text of the LXX in the book of Proverbs and the MT. First, several texts are in the MT but not in the LXX (e.g., Prov 4:7; 8:33; 16:1, 3; 20:14-19) or are in the LXX but not in the MT (about thirty partial verses, according to Fox, 363). Second, there are notable differences in the order of the latter parts of these two texts (see Table 2). H. Washington (194-97) is probably

Table 2. Differences in Order in Proverbs

Masoretic Text	Septuagint
24:23-34 “Further Sayings of the Wise”	30:1-14 “Agur”
25:1—29:27 “Hezekiah’s Men”	24:23-34 “Further Sayings of the Wise”
30:1-14 “Agur”	30:15-33 “Numerical Parallelisms”
30:15-33 “Numerical Parallelisms”	31:1-9 “Lemuel’s Mother”
31:1-9 “Lemuel’s Mother”	25:1—29:27 “Hezekiah’s Men”
31:10-31 “Virtuous Wife”	31:10-31 “Virtuous Wife” correct in suggesting that this rearrangement is due to the author’s attempt to strengthen the Solomonic authorship of the book of Proverbs.

There are also other considerable differences between the text of the MT and that of the LXX. E. Tov argues that they come from different editions of the book, but J. Barr and B. Waltke probably are more correct in understanding them as a free translation of the Hebrew text influenced strongly by Stoic philosophy and Jewish midrashic thinking. Barr (1975, 158) says that the LXX text of Proverbs often starts out with a very literal translation of the text but then breaks loose “from literality and completes the sentence with a composition so loosely related to the original that it might equally be considered as an original composition rather than a rendering.”

The Targum of Proverbs is a fairly literal translation, but it is unique in that when the Hebrew text is unclear, it sometimes follows the Peshitta (it is identical to the Peshitta in 300 out of 915 verses) and sometimes the LXX (in 85 places it is closer to the LXX than the Hebrew). The Latin Vulgate and Syriac Peshitta seem to reproduce the Hebrew fairly literally, but both show significant dependence upon the LXX.

1.2.4. Ruth. The text of the book of Ruth is relatively free from significant problems; according to R. Hubbard (2) only one text (Ruth 2:7) “resists satisfactory solution.” There are just eight fragments from four different Qumran manuscripts of the book of Ruth. The largest fragment, 2Q16 (2QRuth^a), is dated by paleography to the first century AD and contains Ruth 2:13-23; 3:1-8; 4:3-4. It is the only Ruth manuscript with enough surviving text to assure that it follows the MT fairly closely. The next largest, 2Q17 (2QRuth^b), dated to about 50 BC, contains Ruth 3:13-18 and does not appear to follow the MT as closely. The smallest fragments, 4Q104 (4QRuth^a), containing Ruth 1:1-12, and 4Q105 (4QRuth^b), containing Ruth 1:1-6, 12-15, are dated by paleography to the first century AD and are not complete enough to assess their textual nature. The Targum of Ruth follows the MT quite closely, except for a few paraphrastic departures. The LXX text of Ruth is a fairly literal (occasionally even slavishly literal) translation of the MT; paraphrases that are included demonstrate a good understanding of the Hebrew language (e.g., Ruth 1:9; 4:1, 7). The Syriac Peshitta is a much freer translation and seldom has preferred readings to the MT (possible exceptions are Ruth 1:9; 4:1, 7). There are only about twelve places where the texts of the versions differ from the MT, and these generally do not significantly help resolve textual critical issues in the book of Ruth.

1.2.5. Song of Songs. The text of Song of Songs is fairly well preserved, but its unique vocabulary (it has many hapax legomena) and terse style still make it one of the most difficult to interpret in the OT. There are only four minor fragments of this book from Qumran. The largest, 4Q107 (4QCant^b), is dated to the end of the first century BC and includes Song of Songs 2:9-17; 3:1-2, 5, 9-10; 4:1-3, 8-11, 14-16; 5:1. The next largest, 4Q106 (4QCant^a), is dated to the early first century AD and contains Song of Songs 3:7-11; 4:1-7; 6:11(?) -12; 7:1-7. 6Q6 (6QCant) is dated later than the other fragments to the early first century AD but contains only Song of Songs 1:1-7. The smallest fragment, 4Q108 (4QCant^c), is dated to the end of the first century BC and has only Song of Songs 3:7-8. The texts of all of these manuscripts deviate only slightly from the MT. For example, in Song of Songs 3:11 the text of 4Q106 (4QCant^a) has “daughters of Jerusalem” instead of the MT’s “daughters of Zion.” It is interesting that in 4Q106 (4QCant^a) and 4Q107 (4QCant^b) some passages appear to have been intentionally left out, suggesting that they may have been liturgical manuscripts, not biblical scrolls.

There are very few places where the text of the versions appears preferable to the MT (e.g., Song 4:8, ^אוֹרָא [“come”] instead of the MT’s ^אוִּי [“with me”]; Song 7:10, ^אשְׁנֵי שִׁפְתָּי [“my lips and my teeth”] instead of the MT’s ^אשְׁנֵי שִׁפְתָּי [“lips of sleepers”]). Yet there are still places where the MT is uncertain (e.g., Song 6:12). The LXX provides a very literal Greek translation of the Hebrew text in Song of Songs; however, there are a few harmonistic readings and expansions. The translator of the Targum of Song of Songs frequently used the Hebrew text as a launching pad to soar into interpretational expositions that are not always obviously connected to the original Hebrew text (Pope 1977, 21). Both the Latin Vulgate and the Syriac Peshitta are fairly literal renderings of the MT, with only minor variations.

1.2.6. Ecclesiastes. The text of Ecclesiastes is largely free from textual corruptions. The main difficulties relate to the unusual vocabulary and the message of the book. Only two fragmentary manuscripts of Ecclesiastes were found, in cave 4 at Qumran. The first and larger one, 4Q109 (4QQoh^a), is dated by paleographic evidence to 175-150 BC. It contains Ecclesiastes 5:14-18 [MT 13-17]; 6:1, 3-8, 12; 7:1-10, 19-20. The second one, 4Q110 (4QQoh^b), is dated to about 50 BC and has Ecclesiastes 1:10-14(15?). Both manuscripts follow the MT very closely, with only slight variants. The versions are of some help to textual criticism, for the text of the LXX of Ecclesiastes is so literal that some of the idioms do not make sense in Greek (e.g., Heb definite direct object marker indicated by Gk syn + accusative [similar to Aquila’s version]). Some have even argued that Aquila translated it (Barthélemy, 21-33) or edited it (Hyvärinen, 88-99), but this probably is unnecessary. T. Longman (25) argues that the majority of the differences between the LXX and the MT are mistranslations of the Hebrew text. The Targum of Ecclesiastes contains parts that are paraphrastic and interpretive, as well as parts that offer a literal translation of the Hebrew text. The Latin Vulgate is fairly close to the MT, as is the Peshitta, though the latter occasionally departs from the MT and appears to be dependent upon the LXX.

1.2.7. Lamentations. The text of Lamentations is in a relatively good state of preservation, possibly due to the structure of the poems. In general, the ancient translations are of little help in determining the original text in difficult passages, since they arise from a text essentially the same as the Hebrew text. Four manuscripts of the book of Lamentations from Qumran are all quite fragmentary and probably date to the first century AD. The largest text, 5Q6 (5QLam^a), contains Lamentations 4:5-8, 11-16, 19-22; 5:1-13, 16-17, but according to J. Milik (175), the character of its text is uncertain. The next largest text, 4Q111 (4QLam), contains Lamentations 1:1-16 and a fragment of Lamentations 2:5. It is written in a vulgar, semiformal script that mainly follows the MT but makes a significant number of changes to it. In some places its readings may improve the MT (White Crawford, 296). The last two texts are quite fragmentary. 5Q7 (5QLam^b) contains Lamentations 4:17-20 and has handwriting different from that of 5Q6 (5QLam^a). 3Q3 (3QLam) includes Lamentations 1:10-12; 3:53-62 and appears to follow the MT. This latter text has the divine name “Yahweh” written in paleo-Hebrew script.

The LXX seems to be a literal translation of a Hebrew text that is very similar to the MT (at times extremely literal) (see Albrectson 1963, 208). Differences may be attributed more to transmissional corruptions within the LXX than to a difference in Hebrew Vorlage. The Greek text of Lamentations appears to come from the Kaige recension, which is a Greek text that has been brought into line with the MT by its ancient editors (Hillers, 41). The Targum of Lamentations, the Latin Vulgate and the Syriac Peshitta likewise come from a Hebrew text very similar to the MT. The Targum of Lamentations seems to have entirely rewritten the book and is more helpful for polemic reasons than for textual evidence.

1.2.8. Esther. Even though there are no significant problems with the MT of the book of Esther, J. Baldwin (42) notes, “No other book of the OT has come down to us in so many variant forms.” Presently, the oldest extant Hebrew text of the book of Esther is dated to the eleventh century AD (Codex Leningradensis, 1009); there are no manuscripts from Qumran. The traditional LXX text is similar to the MT, but the Lucianic text differs significantly from the MT at certain points and appears to derive from a considerably different Hebrew text. There are 107 verses (the Hebrew text has 167 verses) that have become known as the Greek additions to the text of Esther. Jerome knew that these were not part of the Hebrew text and placed them in his section of deuterocanonical works. A colophon at the end of the additions dates the book to the “fourth year of the reign of Ptolomy and Cleopatra,” suggesting a date of 114 BC, and some of the details in these additions even contradict the Hebrew text. When Jerome translated the Latin Vulgate, he found the Old Latin texts of the book of Esther to be extremely corrupted; he therefore claims to have rendered a literal translation of the Hebrew text. It still contains numerous minor variants from the MT that may reflect another version of the Hebrew text. The Syriac Peshitta appears to follow closely, and at times almost rigidly, a Hebrew text very similar to the MT. Both Aramaic Targumim of Esther use a Hebrew text very similar to the MT and then add explanations and embellishments. The first Targum is twice as long as the MT, and the second one is four times longer.

2. Textual Critical Principles.

Since the texts were transmitted over such a long period of time, it is understandable that minor errors crept into various manuscripts. Therefore the job of the OT textual critic is to work back as closely as possible to the original reading of the text by comparing the external evidence (other Hebrew manuscripts and ancient versions) and internal evidence (hints from grammar, style, vocabulary, etc.). Intuition and common sense must guide this process. Informed judgments about a text depend upon one’s familiarity with copyist errors, manuscripts, versions and their authors.

2.1. Types of Errors. Even though the scribes copying the manuscripts had a strong desire to maintain an authoritative, standardized text, common copyist errors still appear, including confusion of similar letters, homophony (substitution of similar-sounding letters or words), haplography (omission of a letter or word), dittography (doubling a letter or word), metathesis (reversal in the order of two letters or words), fusion (two words being joined as one) and fission (one word separated into two). These types of mistakes are unintentional but still are introduced into the text through the copying process. However, as we noted above, there are also intentional changes that are introduced into the text, including updating spelling or grammar, euphemistic changes and theological changes.

2.2. The Process. One of the best ways to locate possible corruptions in the Hebrew text is to search for difficulties in translation, faulty or awkward grammar, apparent textual corruptions or variants in the various versions of the OT. Modern critical editions of the MT (e.g., BHS, BHQ, the Hebrew University Bible Project) have already done much of this work in their textual apparatuses. They note the pertinent external evidence from the various Hebrew sources (e.g., Hebrew manuscripts [Dead Sea Scrolls, medieval manuscripts]) and versions (e.g., LXX, Samaritan Pentateuch, Syriac Peshitta, Latin Vulgate) to help determine the most plausible original reading of the text. The next step is to examine internal evidence to see if there are any hints to help determine the original reading (e.g., grammatical structures, similar vocabulary, stylistic features). Four questions will help determine the most plausible original reading. (1) Which reading could most likely give rise to the others? (2) Which reading is most appropriate in its context? (3) Which reading is favored by the weight of the manuscript evidence? (4) Does the passage contain a secondary reading or gloss? This is where skill, knowledge and balance on the part of the textual critic are needed to help determine the most plausible reading of the text. In general, only about ten percent of the Hebrew text has any question regarding the original reading of the text, and of these, only a small portion make any significant difference in meaning.

3. Textual Critical Examples.

We will first illustrate an easy textual variant and then a more difficult as examples of the types of textual issues encountered in the poetic books.

3.1. Song of Songs 4:8. Here there is merely a change in vowel points, which were added much later by the Masoretes between AD 500 and 800. The first word in the verse is וְעִמִּי (’itti), which, as pointed in the MT, means “with me.” The editors of BHS suggest reading this text as וְעִנִּי (’ēnī), meaning “come,” which is supported by the LXX

(δεῦρο), Syriac Peshitta and Latin Vulgate. This reading also corresponds well with the parallel unit, which uses בֹּא (bô'), meaning "come, go." It is easy to see why the Masoretes would have vocalized this word as "with me," since the second unit also contains this word. If בֹּא is not pointed as a verb, then one needs to be supplied by the readers. Given the grammar and the external evidence, it seems reasonable to argue that the pointing of the passage is incorrect in the MT and should instead read בֹּא (ʿēfi), meaning "come."

3.2. Psalm 2:11-12a. Here we find one of the most difficult textual corruptions. Read literally, the text says, "Serve the LORD with fear and rejoice with trembling. Kiss the son, lest he become angry and you perish in the way." If this translation is correct, בָּר (bar) is translated as the Aramaic, not the Hebrew, word for "son" (the Hebrew word for "son" appears in Ps 2:7). Using the Aramaic word for "son" is plausible because the psalm appears to be addressing the nations that would most likely speak Aramaic (cf. רְוִינִים ["and rulers"] in Ps 2:2). But why use the Hebrew word for "son" just a few verses earlier? The editors of BHS suggest a variety of other options for reading this text. First, they, along with the collections of variants from Kennicott, De Rossi and Ginsburg, suggest the reading בְּשִׂמְחָה ("in joy") instead of בִּיָּרָא ("in fear"). Second, the BHS editors prefer reading the phrase גִּילּוּ בְרַעְדָּה: נִשְׁקוּ בָר ("rejoice with trembling. Kiss the son") as: גִּילּוּ בְרַעְדָּה נִשְׁקוּ לְרַגְלָיו ("in trembling. Kiss his feet"). The supposition is that the word גִּילּוּ was misplaced and should appear at the end of the phrase (in addition to metathesis of the yôd and lāmed). A final suggestion is to read the text as וְנִגְדְּלוּ שְׁמוֹ בְּרַעְדָּה ("and magnify his name in trembling") and delete the "kiss the son" as dittography. The versions are of little help here because they either read something very similar (Syriac Peshitta) or seem to entirely misunderstand the passage (e.g., the LXX has the curious reading δρᾶξασθε παιδείας ["accept correction"], and the Latin Vulgate reads similarly). It is also possible that בָּר could be translated as "field," so that kissing the ground is a sign of submission (Ringgren, 12). At this point there does not seem to be a clearly superior resolution to what appears to be a corruption of this text.

See also CANON; DEAD SEA SCROLLS; ESTHER 4: ADDITIONS; ESTHER 5: GREEK VERSIONS.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. B. Albrektson, Studies in the Text and Theology of the Book of Lamentations, with a Critical Edition of the Peshitta Text (STL 21; Lund: Gleerup, 1963); idem, "Textual Criticism and the Textual Basis of a Translation of the Old Testament," BT 26 (1975) 314-24; idem, "Reflections on the Emergence of a Standard Text of the Hebrew Bible," in Congress Volume: Göttingen, 1977 (VTSup 29; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1978) 49-65; W. F. Albright, "Canaanite-Phoenician Sources of Hebrew Wisdom," in Wisdom in Israel and in the Ancient Near East: Presented to Harold Henry Rowley in Celebration of His Sixty-fifth Birthday, 24 March 1955, ed. M. Noth and D. W. Thomas (VTSup 3; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1955) 1-15; idem, From Stone Age to Christianity: Monotheism and the Historical Process (2nd ed.; Baltimore: John Hopkins Press, 1957); J. G. Baldwin, Esther (TOTC; Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 1984); J. Barr, "B'RS-MOLIS: Prov XI.31, 1 Pet IV.18," JSS 20 (1975) 149-64; idem, Comparative Philology and the Text of the Old Testament: With Additions and Corrections (Winona Lake, IN: Eisenbrauns, 1987); W. D. Barrick, "Current Trends and Tensions in Old Testament Textual Criticism," BT 35 (1984) 301-8; D. Barthélemy, Les devanciers d'Aquila: Première publication intégrale du texte des fragments du Dodécaprophète trouvés dans le désert de Juda, précédée d'une étude sur les traductions et recensions grecques de la Bible réalisées au premier siècle de notre ère sous l'influence du rabbinat palestinien (VTSup 10; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1963); E. R. Brotzman, Old Testament Textual Criticism: A Practical Introduction (Grand Rapids: Baker, 1994); J. Cook, "The Dating of Septuagint Proverbs," ETL 69 (1993) 383-99; F. E. Deist, Towards the Text of the Old Testament (2nd ed.; Pretoria: Kerkboekhandel Transvaal, 1981); idem, Witnesses to the Old Testament: Introducing Old Testament Textual Criticism (LOT 5; Pretoria: Kerkboekhandel Transvaal, 1988); P. W. Flint, "Psalms, Book of," EDSS 2.702-7; M. V. Fox, Proverbs 1-9 (AB 18A; New York: Doubleday, 2000); G. Gerleman, Studies in the Septuagint I: The Book of Job (LUÅ 1/43.2; Lund: Gleerup, 1946); C. D. Ginsburg, The Old Testament, Diligently Revised According to the Massorah and the Early Editions with the Various Readings from MSS and the Ancient Versions (4 vols.; London: Trinitarian Bible Society, 1926); M. H. Goshen-Gottstein, "The Textual Criticism of the Old Testament: Rise, Decline, Rebirth," JBL 102 (1983) 365-99; L. J. Greenspoon, "Symmachus," ABD 6.251; idem, "Theodotion," ABD

- 6.447-48; D. R. Hillers, Lamentations (2nd ed.; AB 7A; New York: Doubleday, 1992); R. L. Hubbard, The Book of Ruth (NICOT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1988); K. Hyvärinen, Die Übersetzung von Aquila (ConBOT 10; Lund: Gleerup, 1977); N. Jastram, "Proverbs, Book of," EDSS 2.701-2; S. Jellicoe, The Septuagint and Modern Study (Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1968); P. Kahle, The Cairo Geniza (2nd ed.; Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1959); idem, Der hebräische Bibeltext seit Franz Delitzsch (Stuttgart: Kohlhammer, 1961); P. Katz, Philo's Bible: The Aberrant Text of the Bible Quotations in Some Philonic Writings and Its Place in the Textual History of the Greek Bible (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1950); B. Kennicott, Vetus Testamentum Hebraicum cum variis lectionibus, (2 vols.; Oxford: Clarendon, 1776-80); R. W. Klein, Textual Criticism of the Old Testament: The Septuagint after Qumran (GBS; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1974); E. Levine, The Aramaic Version of Lamentations (New York: Hermon, 1976); T. Longman III, The Book of Ecclesiastes (NICOT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1998); P. K. McCarter, Textual Criticism: Recovering the Text of the Hebrew Bible (GBS; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1986); B. M. Metzger, The Text of the New Testament: Its Transmission, Corruption, and Restoration (3rd ed.; Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1992); J. T. Milik, "Textes des Grotte 5Q," in Les "petites grottes" de Qumrân (DJD 3; Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1962); C. M. Moore, Esther (AB 7B; Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1988); C. A. Newsom, "Job, Book of," EDSS 1.412-13; H. M. Orlinsky, "Some Corruptions in the Greek Text of Job," JQR 26 (1935-1936) 133-45; idem, "Studies in the Septuagint of the Book of Job," HUCA 28 (1957) 53-74; HUCA 29 (1958) 229-71; HUCA 30 (1959) 153-67; idem, "The Textual Criticism of the Old Testament," in The Bible and the Ancient Near East: Essays in Honor of William Foxwell Albright, ed. G. E. Wright (London: Routledge & Kegan Paul, 1961) 113-32; D. F. Payne, "Old Testament Textual Criticism: Its Principles and Practice," TynBul 25 (1974) 99-112; M. H. Pope, Job (3rd ed.; AB15; Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1973); idem, Song of Songs (AB 7C; Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1977); H. Ringgren, The Messiah in the Old Testament (SBT 18; London: SCM, 1956); B. J. Roberts, The Old Testament Text and Versions: The Hebrew Text in Transmission and the History of the Ancient Versions (Cardiff: University of Wales Press, 1951); idem, "The Textual Transmission of the Old Testament," in Tradition and Interpretation: Essays by Members of the Society for Old Testament Study, ed. G. W. Anderson (Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1979) 1-30; G. B. De Rossi, Variae Lectiones Veteris Testamenti . . . (4 vols.; Parmae: Ex Regio typographeo, 1784-88); S. Talmon, "The Old Testament Text," in The Cambridge History of the Bible, vol. 1, ed. P. R. Ackroyd and C. F. Evans (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1970) 159-99; repr. in F. M. Cross and S. Talmon, eds., Qumran and the History of the Biblical Text (Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1975) 1-41; J. A. Thompson, "Textual Criticism, OT," IDBSup 886-91; E. Tov, "The Text of the Old Testament," in The World of the Bible, ed. A. S. van der Woude, trans. S. Woudstra (BH 1; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1986) 156-86; idem, "Recensional Differences between the Masoretic Text and the Septuagint of Proverbs," in Of Scribes and Scrolls: Studies on the Hebrew Bible, Intertestamental Judaism, and Christian Origins Presented to John Strugnell on the Occasion of His Sixtieth Birthday, ed. H. W. Attridge, J. J. Collins and T. H. Tobin (CTSRR 5; Lanham, MD: University Press of America, 1990) 43-56; idem, Textual Criticism of the Hebrew Bible (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1992); idem, "Textual Criticism, Old Testament," ABD 6.393-412; B. K. Waltke, "The Textual Criticism of the Old Testament," in Biblical Criticism: Historical, Literary and Textual, by R. K. Harrison et al. (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1978) 47-65; also in Expositor's Bible Commentary, vol. 1, ed. F. E. Gaebelin (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1979) 211-28; idem, "Aims of Old Testament Textual Criticism," WTJ 1 (1989) 93-108; idem, "Old Testament Textual Criticism," in Foundations for Biblical Interpretation: A Complete Library of Tools and Resources, ed. D. S. Dockery, K. A. Matthews and R. B. Sloan (Nashville: Broadman, 1994) 156-86; idem, "How We Got the Hebrew Bible: The Text and Canon of the Old Testament," in The Bible at Qumran: Text, Shape, and Interpretation, ed. P. W. Flint (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2001) 27-50; H. C. Washington, "Wealth and Poverty in the Instruction of Amenemope and the Hebrew Proverbs: A Comparative Study in the Social Location and Function of Ancient Near Eastern Wisdom Literature" (Ph.D. diss., Princeton Theological Seminary, 1992); J. Weingreen, Introduction to the Critical Study of the Text of the Hebrew Bible (New York: Oxford University Press, 1982); J. W. Wevers, "Septuaginta-Forschungen," TRu 22 (1954) 85-138, 171-90; S. White Crawford, "Five Scrolls," EDSS

1.295-97; T. D. Winton, "The Textual Criticism of the Old Testament," in The Old Testament and Modern Study: A Generation of Discovery and Research; Essays by the Members of the Society, ed. H. H. Rowley (Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1951) 238-59; A. Wolters, "The Text of the Old Testament," in The Face of Old Testament Studies: A Survey of Contemporary Approaches, ed. D. W. Baker and B. T. Arnold (Grand Rapids: Baker, 1999) 19-37; E. Würthwein, The Text of the Old Testament: An Introduction to the Biblia Hebraica, trans. E. F. Rhodes (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1979) 12-100; J. Ziegler, Antike und moderne lateinische Psalmenübersetzungen (SBAW 3; Munich: Verlag der Bayerischen Akademie der Wissenschaften, in Kommission bei Beck, 1960).

P. D. Wegner

THANKSGIVING, PSALMS OF

Psalms of thanksgiving give thanks to God because he has responded to a specific request for help, which leads to offering a sacrifice of thanksgiving at the temple to celebrate God's deliverance. Although there is much agreement among scholars concerning these psalms, genre assumptions do affect how they are understood. This article discusses how the psalms of thanksgiving have been understood in light of the different approaches to the history and development of genre. A fluid concept of genre and more flexibility in regard to the Sitz im Leben (setting in life) greatly enhance our understanding of the psalms of thanksgiving.

1. Individual Psalms of Thanksgiving
2. Community Psalms of Thanksgiving
3. The Importance of Thanksgiving

1. Individual Psalms of Thanksgiving.

1.1. Identification. The list of individual psalms of thanksgiving varies from scholar to scholar. For example, H. Gunkel includes Psalms 18; 30; 32; 40:2-12; 41; 66; 92; (100); (107); 116; 118; 138; S. Mowinckel lists Psalms 30; 32; 34; 73; 92; 103; 116; and C. Westermann includes Psalms 9; 18; 30; 31:7-8, 19-24; 32; 40:1-12; 66:13-20; 92; (107); 116; (118); 138. Such variety is due in part to different assumptions concerning the history and development of genres (see 1.2 below).

1.2. Genre Analysis.

1.2.1. Sitz im Leben. Genre analysis usually focuses on mood, content, structure and Sitz im Leben. Most scholars affirm that the Sitz im Leben of the psalms of thanksgiving is a *worship service at the temple in connection with the thanksgiving offering (tôdâ). Such an offering might be brought in response to a vow made by the worshiper in a difficult situation (Ps 50:14-15; 66:13-14). The bringing of a sacrifice in the payment of a vow is an opportunity to praise God in the presence of the people (Ps 116:14) by declaring how God had answered prayer and brought deliverance (Ps 66:16). A thanksgiving song (hōdâ) sung by temple servants in the sanctuary would also be part of the service (see Music, Song).

1.2.2. Mood and Structure. The dominant mood of the thanksgiving psalms is thanksgiving for deliverance, which is emphasized in the structure of these psalms. A declaration of intent to give thanks usually comes near the beginning, followed by the account of the distress and the change that has come to the psalmist's life because of the deliverance. Gunkel calls this account the identifying mark of the genre, which consists of the report of the distress, a summons to Yahweh and the deliverance. The second main part is a confession directed to others that Yahweh was the one who delivered from the distress (Ps 18:27-28; 34:6-9). The third main part consists of the thanksgiving sacrifice brought by the worshiper (Ps 66:13-15). The psalm might end with further affirmations of thanksgiving or exhortations for others to give thanks (Ps 118:28-29). It is recognized that the aforementioned order is flexible (Gunkel), and that the third part may be lacking (Mowinckel). Such a general structure is recognized by others (e.g., Westermann 1981; Weiser; Gerstenberger 1988).

1.2.3. Relationship to the Hymn. The mood of a thanksgiving psalm is similar to the *hymn. Gunkel distinguishes the hymn from the psalm of thanksgiving in that the latter gives thanks to God for a specific act of deliverance in the life of the worshiper, while the former gives general praise for God's great being and deeds. The distinction between the thanksgiving psalm and the hymn has been generally followed by scholars. Westermann, however, has argued that there is not a separate concept of "thanks" in Hebrew. The verb yādâ, many times discussed under the imperative form hōdâ, is never used in the OT as an expression of thanks between people. And in relationship to God, our concept of thanks is too centered upon ourselves to communicate the meaning of this verb. Rather, Westermann argues, the expression of thanks to God should be seen as a way of praising God. Thus, instead of the separate categories “psalm of thanksgiving” and “hymn,” he places both under the category “psalms of praise.” He calls hymns “descriptive psalms of praise” because they praise God for his actions and for his being. He calls psalms of thanksgiving “declarative psalms of praise” because they praise God for a specific act of deliverance, which is then reported, or declared, in the song of thanksgiving (see Westermann 1981, 25-32).

Although Westermann shows that the concepts associated with the psalms of thanksgiving and the hymns can at times be placed under the general idea of praise, the original categories are still followed by most scholars—E. Gerstenberger (1988) being a more recent example—because there is a legitimate distinction between hymns and psalms of thanksgiving. Westermann himself recognizes the basic distinction between general praise of God for his actions and being, which is the focus of hymns, and specific praise for a specific act of deliverance, which is the focus of psalms of thanksgiving. There are enough distinctions between these two ideas to justify the separate concept of thanksgiving. Linguistically, there is a distinction between the imperative call to praise of the hymn, which uses hillel, and the expression of thanksgiving arising out of a particular situation, which uses yādā (Westermann, TLOT 2.504). Although there is overlap between the two verbs, so that yādā may at times be translated “praise,” there is also an independent use of yādā in the Psalter, where it is appropriate to translate it “give thanks.” Such a translation is particularly appropriate when the psalm reflects a response of the psalmist to God’s deliverance from a particular situation of distress. Psalms of thanksgiving may also mention vows and a thanksgiving offering (tôdā). When a psalm gives evidence of such a setting, the best translation of yādā is “give thanks.”

1.3. Different Approaches to Genre Affects Interpretation: Psalm 32. Significant differences among scholars concerning the history and development of the genres affect the interpretation of the psalms of thanksgiving. These differences can be seen in an examination of Psalm 32, where the passion of the psalmist raises questions concerning genre and the relationship of the psalm to the *cult.

1.3.1. Mixed Genres and Passion Evidence of Lateness. H. Gunkel argued that the oldest genres were pure and simple, and that mixed genres occurred later when the genres influenced each other. In earlier times the individual was less forthcoming, but in later times the individual was empowered to express something personal, which is where the power and religion of the individual poet came to prominence. The prophetic era, with its negative evaluation of external worship, was key to the development of pious spiritual songs, which were sung apart from the temple ceremonies. However, these latter spiritual poets continued to use the form of the different genres, breathing new life into them. Psalm 32 has been influenced by the prophetic movement. It probably was sung by the psalmist outside the sanctuary, perhaps even in the home. Earlier psalms of thanksgiving would have been composed by temple personnel, which explains their uniformity and impersonal tone, but Psalm 32 is full of passion because the poet speaks from his own experience of forgiveness. The influence from other genres is seen in that wisdom has penetrated this psalm in the use of the beatitude (Ps 32:1), the similitude (Ps 32:9) and the instruction (Ps 32:6-8).

1.3.2. Cult Emphasis. S. Mowinckel turns Gunkel’s scenario on its head by arguing that the unmixed simple forms are later than the composite forms. The great poets were not late in history but early. Mowinckel placed most psalms in the period of the monarchy in the context of a New Year festival. The psalms were composed for the cult, so they use indefinite wording. The personal element is not omitted, because the temple personnel may have written the psalms on the basis of their own personal experience, even if they wrote for cultic purposes. Thus in Psalm 32 the traditional basic type is hidden behind the personal and didactic.

A. Weiser connects the psalms to a yearly covenant festival that reenacts the *theophany of God at Sinai. This provides the external framework in which most preexilic psalms, such as Psalm 32, had their setting. Psalm 32:6 speaks of offering prayer at the right time, which refers to the moment when God appears in a theophany at the festival cult.

1.3.3. Native Genre Designations. H.-J. Kraus develops genre categories that are derived from the terminology in the psalms themselves in order to avoid foreign categories. Psalm 32 is placed among the “songs of prayer” (tēpillā), which includes prayer songs of the individual, community prayer songs and thanksgiving songs. Although Kraus eliminates some of Gunkel's categories, he shares the latter's assumptions concerning the influence of wisdom. Psalm 32 is a thanksgiving psalm and is to be dated late, perhaps even used apart from the temple.

1.3.4. Small-Group, Postexilic, Synagogue Use. E. Gerstenberger (1988) calls into question the priority of the cult and emphasizes that there were rituals throughout Israel's history that served the needs of the common people in their small-group settings. These personal structures persisted even when secondary organizations, such as tribal, monarchical and temple structures, arose. Small-group settings became prominent in the form of local community worship in the final phase of OT history. The Psalter became a hymnbook for the synagogue communities of the Persian and Hellenistic periods. As older prayers were set in the postexilic context, a new emphasis on individual guilt and personal salvation arose. Psalm 32 reflects this changed social structure. It is used by the community of the faithful in a synagogue setting. No references are made to sacrifices, and the wisdom element is dominant. Such individual forms of exhortation seem to be indicative of postexilic religion.

1.4. A Better Understanding of Genre.

1.4.1. A Fluid Concept of Genre. While acknowledging the contributions that the aforementioned scholars have made to form-critical analysis of the psalms, we nonetheless should note problems with some of their assumptions (see Form Criticism). Gunkel operated with a rigid view of genre that limited each genre to one social setting and made any "mixture" of genres late. Based on more recent theories of genre, T. Longman argues for a fluid concept of genre that pays attention to the similarities of a text with other texts but also attends to the peculiarities of a text. Psalm 32, in a broad sense, could be classified as poetry, but more narrowly it could be classified as a thanksgiving psalm, or a thanksgiving psalm concerning forgiveness, or a thanksgiving psalm with wisdom elements for the instruction of God's people. Such an analysis does not solve all problems related to the role of wisdom in the psalms, but it recognizes that the poets had some freedom in the composition of their poems in order to accomplish their purposes. The passion expressed in Psalm 32 is not necessarily a sign of lateness. Kraus's category "songs of prayer" covers too broad a range of psalms to be useful (see Day). Although there may be some benefit to genre designations that are intrinsic to the psalms, Longman shows the benefit of using genre terms that are not native to the time of the literature.

1.4.2. A More Flexible Concept of the Sitz im Leben. A rigid view of the setting of the psalms is also problematic. Mowinckel argued that the psalms were composed by temple personnel using basic types for temple use, but then it is difficult to explain the passion of the poets. He recognized that they may have written out of their own experience even when composing for the temple. However, although many psalms were written for temple use, the origin of the psalms should not be forced into one festival setting. Gerstenberger called into question the connection of the psalms to the cult, but he also understood the psalms to be liturgical in origin and placed them in a small-group setting of the synagogue in the postexilic period. He contends that Psalm 32 is not a private meditation but rather is meant to be witnessed by the congregation. However, little is known of the existence of synagogues in the Persian period, and many psalms are accepted by scholars as preexilic. Westermann (1981) also calls into question a close relationship of the psalms to the cult and sees the setting of the psalms related to life situations. This gives more flexibility to their origin. The psalms of thanksgiving arise out of everyday experience, which is prior to the worship service in the temple. The passion of Psalm 32 thus comes from the life experience of someone who has been forgiven. Perhaps a dichotomy between being written by temple personnel for temple use and being written by an individual and adapted to temple use is a false one. Flexibility in the concept of genre and life setting better explains the evidence that one finds in the psalms.

2. Community Psalms of Thanksgiving.

2.1. Identification Debated. There is much overlap between the individual psalms of thanksgiving and the community psalms of thanksgiving, including the mood of thanksgiving, the central structural element of deliverance from distress, and the connection to a service in the temple. However, the number of community psalms of thanksgiving is debated.

Weiser lists only Psalm 124, but Gerstenberger (1988) and Gunkel list Psalms 66; 67; 124; 129. Perhaps there are few community psalms of thanksgiving because of the influence of a later style (Gunkel) or the influence of other genres, such as the hymn (Gerstenberger; Weiser). Westermann (1981) connects the community psalms of thanksgiving to songs of victory in Israel's history (Judg 5), which do not make it into the Psalter because after the Babylonian exile Israel did not experience any victories.

2.2. Focus on Main Elements. If one takes into account the main elements that make up a psalm of thanksgiving in the context of a community response, a few more psalms would seem to fit this genre. For example, although Psalm 107 does not make Weiser's list, he later identifies it as a community thanksgiving offered at the festival. Gerstenberger (2001) also recognizes strong thanksgiving elements in the psalm, although he identifies it as a "reflection on praising," perhaps because of the hymnic elements in Psalm 107:33-41. Gunkel and Mowinckel list Psalm 107 as an individual psalm of thanksgiving, perhaps because different groups of individuals give thanks, but the psalm is directed to the community of the redeemed, evidenced by the use of the plural (Ps 107:1-2). Psalm 107 expresses the mood of thanksgiving (Ps 107:1, 8, 15, 21, 31), includes an account of four different situations of danger from which the people were delivered (Ps 107:4, 10, 17, 23), and calls for those delivered to offer sacrifices of thanksgiving (Ps 107:22). A more flexible view of genre allows Psalm 107 to be classified as a community psalm of thanksgiving. Other psalms, such as Psalms 65; 75, could also be included.

3. The Importance of Thanksgiving.

The psalms of thanksgiving show the importance of giving thanks to God. They also demonstrate the active involvement of God in the life of the people. It is no surprise that thanksgiving dominates the NT in light of God's greatest act of deliverance in the death, burial and resurrection of Jesus Christ. As the Israelites offered up sacrifices in thanksgiving to God, so believers today give thanks to God always and in every situation (Eph 5:18; 1 Thess 5:13).

See also HYMNS; LAMENT, PSALMS OF; PSALMS 1: BOOK OF.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. J. Day, Psalms (OTG; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1992); E. S. Ger- stenberger, Psalms: Part 1, with an Introduction to Cultic Poetry (FOTL 14; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1988); idem, Psalms: Part 2; and Lamentations (FOTL 15; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2001); H. Gunkel, Introduction to Psalms: The Genre of the Religious Lyric of Israel (Macon, GA: Mercer University Press, 1998); H.-J. Kraus, Psalms 1-59 (CC; Minneapolis: Fortress, 1988); idem, Psalms 60-150 (CC; Minneapolis: Fortress, 1989); T. Longman III, "Form Criticism, Recent Developments in Genre Theory, and the Evangelical," WTJ 47 (1985) 46-67; S. Mowinckel, The Psalms in Israel's Worship (2 vols.; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2004); A. Weiser, The Psalms (OTL; Philadelphia: Westminster, 1962); C. Westermann, Praise and Lament in the Psalms (rev. ed.; Atlanta: John Knox, 1981); idem, "יְהִי לְהִלְלוֹתָּ, yhd hi. To praise," TLOT 2.502-8. R. P. Belcher Jr.

THEODICY

Theodicy is discourse about the justice of *God in the face of indications to the contrary—the presence in the world of evil in all its forms. How can God allow evil to exist in his world if he is capable and desirous of removing it? Must we limit either the omnipotence or the benevolence of God because of the reality and prevalence of injustice or calamity? Stated thus, the problem is a "trilemma": God must not be good, or God cannot be in control, or evil is an illusion. Further, if God is not to be thought of as lacking knowledge of all the consequences of his well-intentioned actions, then omniscience is also at least a tacit assumption of classical theodicean discussion. The issue, as formulated in Western philosophical and theological enquiry, thus has to do with the coherence of the Christian portrayal of God. It deals with the core of theology: what is God like, and how does he relate to the world? Did the writers of the OT wisdom books and their contemporaries perceive the issue in these terms, and if so, did they attempt to write theodicies in an endeavor to mount a coherent defense of God against the charge of negligence or willful injustice?

1. Theodicy in the Ancient World
2. Theodicy in the Old Testament Wisdom Books
3. A Synthesis of Theodicy in Old Testament Wisdom Books
4. Conclusion

1. Theodicy in the Ancient World.

Israel was not the only nation of the ancient world to have cause to reflect on issues of divine justice. The wisdom literatures of Egypt and Mesopotamia in particular include some material analogous to that contained in the OT, and theodicy, as a central wisdom issue, is no exception.

The texts from Egypt that treat issues broadly concerned with theodicy cover a range of genres, from mythological texts to philosophical discourse, and there is no single approach to the problem of evil in relation to the activity of the gods. Generally considered central to the discussion is the concept of maat*, the divine order or harmony in the world, to be upheld by the gods and the pharaoh. Within that framework there are texts such as The Story of Sinuhe, which reflects a predestinarian stance, and the Instruction for Merikare, with its optimistic outlook on the punishment of evil and the power of magic. There are the Coffin Texts, which see evil as an inevitable aspect of the world order, brought to expression through gods or humankind. The Admonitions of Ipuwer struggles with questions of divine justice. Why does the “herdsman of all men” allow confusion and death to go unchecked? The Wisdom of Amenemope sets out a view of maat that relates the upholding of order to the unpredictable free will of the gods.

In the Sumerian poem A Man and His God a man protests his righteousness and blames his suffering* on the neglect of his god, though the poet acknowledges universal human sinfulness. The Babylonian text I Will Praise the Lord of Wisdom presents the complaint of a righteous sufferer that the divine will is incomprehensible. The Dialogue of Pessimism adopts a nihilistic stance with regard to life, and the Babylonian Theodicy, like the book of Job*, is in the form of a dialogue (see Disputation) between a sufferer and his “friend” as a means of exploring the god’s dealings with humanity.

This is not the place for a full treatment of the relationship of any of these texts to the OT wisdom texts (in this dictionary, one could explore the entries on ancient Near Eastern background for each of the OT Wisdom books). There are no compelling reasons to regard any of the biblical discussions of theodicy as being direct borrowings of non-Israelite material, although some influence from Wisdom of Amenemope on Proverbs 22:17–24:22 is considered likely (see Washington). Much of the similarity frequently observed may be due to the fact that the texts deal with universal questions in a culturally cognate milieu.

2. Theodicy in the Old Testament Wisdom Books.

All sections of Scripture have material relevant to the discussion of theodicy. The Historical Books from Joshua to 2 Kings, for example, may be viewed as an extended theodicy designed to provide an explanation as to why God was justified in punishing Israel for covenant unfaithfulness. It is principally the Wisdom literature, however, notably Proverbs*, Psalms*, Job and Ecclesiastes*, that deals in greater depth with the issues of evil and human suffering in relation to the character and purposes of God.

There is a widespread understanding that Israelite wisdom can be divided into two fundamentally different outlooks on the world: a conventional wisdom that sees right conduct bringing rewards and evil having dire consequences, and a more pessimistic and skeptical wisdom that questions the assumptions of conventional wisdom and undermines the basis of covenantal obedience. Thus D. Clines (lxi) can speak of the “determinism” of the book of Proverbs, with its “rather rigid notion of cause and effect,” whereas the books of Job and Ecclesiastes “introduce that needed element of sophistication and realism into the philosophy of Wisdom, calling into question as they do so the universal validity of the tenets of Proverbs.” These more skeptical works, it is believed, dare to question the naive outlook that held to an ultimately coherent and moral universe. For W. Brueggemann (317-403), all of Israel’s wisdom tradition, but particularly those elements that stress the hiddenness, ambiguity or negativity of God, constitute Israel’s “countertestimony,” which must be held in tension with the “core testimony” set forth elsewhere in the OT.

The view adopted here (cf. Provan, 31-39) is that although there are different emphases and perspectives among the OT writers and within the wisdom tradition, there is no simple antithesis of conventional and skeptical wisdom on issues relating to the moral order, nor any incompatibility with Israel’s covenant faith. Not every writer will adopt the same stance or foreground the same truths of a complex theological conundrum. Statements on the outworking of the “retributive principle” (the righteous are rewarded and the wicked punished) (see Retribution) may stand alone or be juxtaposed with laments and probing discussions on injustice. Given that their observations were astute in numerous other ways, if the biblical wisdom writers are to be worthy of the name “sage,”* we should be slow to think them obtuse in their reflections on the moral order of the universe simply because counterexamples to their expressions of confidence in retributive justice can be cited. When the psalmist makes use of a proverbial sentence in noting that he has “not seen the righteous forsaken or their children begging food” (Ps 37:25 [cf. Prov 13:25]), we wonder, Did he walk around with his eyes closed? Or are his words in context designed to make us look beyond the hardship that we do observe? Why would we be tempted to “fret” (Ps 37:1) if evildoers did not sometimes flourish while the innocent suffer?

In an influential essay first published in German in 1955, K. Koch argues for the operation of an impersonal “action-consequence relation” rather than any notion of the retribution of God against behavior that is contrary to a fixed norm. L. Boström (90) refines this relationship to character-consequence, where, he observes, promises of reward and threats of punishment are characteristically linked with lifestyle. As indicated below, both character and actions are best regarded as outworkings of a covenantal relationship—the “fear of Yahweh”—that is at the core of the wisdom writers’ concern as the fundamental and determinative principle for living in God’s world (see Fear of the Lord). Each of the major OT Wisdom books will be considered in turn for its contribution to the theodicy discussion.

2.1. Theodicy in Proverbs. The book of Proverbs contains numerous formulations of the retributive principle, many of which, it is true, make no reference to God—for example, “The wages of the righteous lead to life, but the income of the wicked leads to punishment” (Prov 10:16). Hence some, following Koch, assume that Proverbs portrays a mechanistic outlook in which consequences follow inevitably upon actions (see discussion in Murphy). Aiding this perception is the observation that Hebrew words for “evil” can refer both to moral evil and to its consequences in judgment.

Some pairings of action and consequence are inherently logical associations (Prov 10:4; 24:33-34). In other proverbs the consequence is expressed in the passive voice (Prov 10:9, 24, 31; 14:11, 14; 20:20; 21:28), as the writer seems unconcerned to identify the source of the punishment. Whatever the origin of the individual sentences of the book of Proverbs (and it may be that many of them had an independent life as popular maxims before their incorporation into the canonical book), their adoption into the literary and theological matrix of Proverbs entails a transformation of meaning. Proverbs 1–9, an extended encomium on the benefits of wisdom, sets the book in a theological context where it is the fear of Yahweh that is to undergird the instruction and one’s reflection on and response to the principles of morality (Prov 1:7; 2:5; 9:10). Behavior and its consequences grow out of a covenant relationship (Prov 1:29-33). It is Yahweh who dispenses justice (Prov 3:31-35; 16:4-5; 22:22-23; 23:10-11). Some proverbs indicate God’s displeasure at certain behavior, with no explicit reference to its consequence (Prov 12:22; 15:8-9, 26; 17:15), while the personal involvement of God in judgment is given as a motive for not taking revenge (Prov 20:22).

Counterproverbs such as Proverbs 26:4-5 suggest that each is to be approached thoughtfully, not treated as absolute and universal in its application. They encourage reflection on the circumstances and the sense in which every proverb, not least those of the action-consequence type, is true. So a statement such as “The fool will be servant to the wise” (Prov 11:29) is there to be pondered, whether or not Proverbs gives any counterexamples of fools rising to positions of prominence (Prov 30:22; cf. Eccles 10:6). Moreover, Yahweh will not be bound with respect to the manner and timing of his responses. He is sovereign in all that he does (Prov 16:4, 9, 33; 19:21; 20:24; 21:1).

The realistic perspective on evil presented in Proverbs gives us pause to reflect on the character of the seemingly simple formulae of *righteousness and reward. The world of Proverbs abounds with those “who delight in doing wrong and celebrate the perversity of evil” (Prov 2:14). Regrettably, the guilty are sometimes acquitted, and the innocent condemned (Prov 17:15). The “better” proverbs offer the reader a value judgment on the options that may present themselves in a world that is far from ideal (Prov 15:16-17; 16:8). There is something enviable in the condition of the wicked (Prov 3:31; 23:17; 24:1, 19). The “how long?” sayings of the psalms of lament find their counterpart in Proverbs 1:22; 6:9. While these two instances are addressed to the “simple” and the “lazy,” since God is viewed as in control, there is an implicit appeal, as in the lament genre, for God to bring an end to the perversity.

Retribution may be delayed, but the reader is urged to wait for God to bring justice (Prov 20:22). There will be a settling of accounts, for nothing escapes God’s scrutiny (Prov 24:12). How and when God will intervene to reward the righteous and punish the wicked is left unclear, but the life that Proverbs holds out for the wise righteous ones may hint at something beyond the temporal (Prov 3:2; 4:10; 9:11; 14:32; 15:24; cf. Is 53:10 [see Waltke, 104-5]). The life on offer is relationship with God (which, as Jesus notes in Mt 22:32, does not allow death to have the final word).

In the end, though, there is much about the world that is not clearly understood. The process of reflection is encouraged (Prov 25:2), but with no expectation that it will yield simple and satisfying answers. The path of wisdom lies in trust in Yahweh, not reliance on human understanding (Prov 3:5).

2.2. Theodicy in Psalms. The book of Psalms presents many moods in dealing with aspects of the justice of God. A dominant note of the Psalter is the celebration of Yahweh’s kingship over creation (see Kingship Psalms), and his exercise of justice is acclaimed in association with this sovereignty (Ps 9:7-8; 10:16-18; 89:11-14; 96:10-13). The focus is on personal and sovereign divine agency in reward and punishment (Ps 75:7). God’s righteousness is seen by the nations but is exercised particularly on behalf of the elect (Ps 37:28; 50:1-6; 67:4; 98:1-9) and the more defenseless members of society (Ps 10:18; 68:5; 72:2; 76:9; 103:6; 146:7).

Psalm 1 is generally thought to have been consciously composed as a preface to the completed collection. This opening psalm speaks confidently of the two ways: the righteous flourish, while the wicked are blown away like chaff. This is due not to impersonal retributive forces but rather to the providential “knowledge” of Yahweh (Ps 1:6). On any view that understands the compilation of the Psalter as an intentional theological activity, it must be apparent that the compilers did not see any incompatibility between such overarching statements and those psalms in the corpus that cry out in anguish at the injustice in the world. Hence we should be slow to dismiss Psalm 1 and the many expressions of the retributive principle in the Psalter as naive.

Another characteristic of the Psalter is its reflection on God’s covenant promise to David as the one through whom his just rule is to be mediated to the world (Pss 2; 110). The failure of the Judean monarchy prompts agonizing heart-searching over God’s apparently failed promises (Pss 89; 132).

Many psalms appeal to God to act in judgment—that is, in salvation (Ps 5:11-12; 7:6; 26:1; 35:23-24; 43:1; 54:1; 71:2; 94:2). The appeal for God to intervene can be on the basis of one’s righteousness (Ps 7:8; 35:24; 58:11), while there can also be a recognition of sin (Ps 32:5; 51:4) or of the fact that before God no one can claim to be in the right (Ps 14:3; 143:2). The psalmist’s affliction can be acknowledged to be consistent with God’s righteousness (Ps 119:75), and the ultimate recourse is an appeal to his love and mercy (Ps 4:1; 6:4; 25:16; 27:7; 31:9; 40:11; 51:1; 90:13; 109:21). The “how long?” cries of anguish are among the most poignant of the many expressions of lament that echo through the Psalter (Ps 6:3; 62:3; 82:2; 89:46; 90:13; 94:3; 119:84). As I. Fløysvik (135-77) demonstrates, the heart of the distress expressed in the psalms lies in the wrath of God, his passionately aroused hostility, and sometimes for no apparent reason (Pss 22; 44; 88), not in the impersonal operation of a retributive principle. What is most troubling is when God fails to heed the cry of his suffering people, when he “hides his face” in time of trouble and hence justice is delayed (Ps 10:1; 18:41; 22:1-2; 43:2; 44:9-16; 74:1; 143:7) (see Balentine).

Three psalms that deal at some length with issues of theodicy are Psalms 37; 49; 73 (see Ross). Psalm 73:1-16 laments the prosperity and the carefree arrogance of the wicked. There is seemingly no point to the psalmist’s own integrity. At Psalm 73:17, however, a shift of mood occurs. The poet’s proximity to God in the (earthly? heavenly?) “sanctuaries of God” gives him access to a divine perspective on things. He sees beyond present appearances to the “end” that God has in store for the psalmist’s opponents. His previous anguish over the situation of those who live in defiance of God, relative to his own, is admitted to be lacking in depth (Ps 73:21-22). God will set the wicked on a slippery slope to ruin, while “glory” awaits the one whose highest good is to be near God (Ps 73:23-28). Had the poet stopped short at v. 16 (cf. Ps 88, which ends on a gloomy note), we might have been inclined to categorize the psalm as an example of the “skeptical” wisdom that calls into question God’s active “knowledge” and mastery of the moral order of the universe, whereas the latter verses, with their affirmation of confidence in God, make the psalm a conventional expression of Israel’s covenant faith, albeit one that gives expression to the perplexity of life’s present circumstances. Not every reference to the circumstances of the wicked and the righteous should be expected to cover both perspectives—present anguish and ultimate reassurance—within a given compass. The psalms of *confidence sit comfortably alongside the psalms of lament in the same collection. There is nothing in the laments that contradicts the theology of God’s commitment to his covenant. The laments presuppose this theology but agonize over the apparent conflict between their theology and their experience of God. Their “solution” is prayer; that is, the lament is directed to God himself, a personal and relational God who has it in his power to “wake up” (Ps 35:23) and act on behalf of his people.

There is an eschatological dimension to the justice of God when the psalmists express confidence that God will come to establish justice and turn tears into joy (Ps 96:13; 98:9; 110:6; 126:5; 135:14). Some psalms lament the finality of death (Ps 6:5; 30:9), but there are, as recognized by L. Greenspoon, glimpses of resurrection in Psalm 22:29; 23:6; 49:15; 73:23-28.

2.3. Theodicy in Job. The bulk of the book of Job is a poetic dialogue involving the suffering Job and his “comforters” (Job 3:3—40:6). Readers (but not the characters of the dialogue) are given a glimpse of a heavenly perspective in Job 1—2, where we overhear the divine evaluation of Job (“blameless and upright” [Job 1:8]). We learn that it is “the satan,” the heavenly prosecutor and agent of disruption, who inflicts on Job an escalating series of disasters. There can be no resort to dualism as a response to evil, however, as the satan clearly acts only as permitted by God (see Satan).

The premise of the book is that suffering is under God’s control. Job asks, “Are we to accept good from God and not trouble?” (Job 2:10). While protesting his innocence, Job seems to have feared just such calamity as befalls him (Job 3:25), and he laments the fact that God treats both good and bad the same way (Job 9:22). Hence, from the outset, the character of Job is portrayed as having a nuanced view of the application of the retributive principle.

Eliphaz is typical of the response of the interlocutors: “What innocent person ever perished; where were the upright ever destroyed?” (Job 4:7). These comforters are often taken as representatives of conventional Israelite wisdom, spokesmen for the principle of retributive justice as elsewhere expressed in biblical wisdom (e.g., Clines, 123). They are more accurately seen as caricatures, guilty of a simplistic overstatement and inappropriate application of these principles. With the advice of Job’s comforters, and even Job himself, as the foil, the writer challenges the view that there is a simple correlation of wrongdoing and suffering. While at one level the work may be seen as an encouragement to patient perseverance in the event of unexplained suffering (cf. Jas 5:11), the suffering of Job is a backdrop against which to portray something of the nature of God’s government of the world and to raise the question of how humankind is to relate to such a God. Is it on a transactional basis of reward for loyal service, or one of love and trust despite personal hardship (Job 1:9; 2:10)?

The voice of God from the whirlwind (Job 38—41) highlights the disparity of creator and creature. God is the source and measure of wisdom and does not owe Job an explanation. Job ought not to have condemned God in pursuing his own vindication. The outcome is Job’s “repentance” (Job 42:6), not in the sense that Job assents to his comforters’ charge of hidden sins that merit his suffering, but rather in acknowledging his woefully limited horizons (Dumbrell).

The epilogue, in which Job is vindicated and restored to health, wealth and good standing in society, demonstrates that the work is not antithetical to the retributive principle as such. The experience of suffering is always made more unbearable by the sense of abandonment by family, friends or God, with “none to comfort” (Ps 18:41; 22:1; 69:20; Eccles 4:1; Lam 1:2, 9). In the end, in a very “conventional” wisdom outcome, Job receives not only the approbation of God for having spoken what was right (Job 42:7) but also the genuine and tangible support of family and friends (Job 42:11).

2.4. Theodicy in Ecclesiastes. Ecclesiastes operates for much of the work on the level of empirical observation, a perspective on life “under the sun” (Eccles 1:3 [and 25x]), with perhaps only a hint of an ultimately revelatory perspective (Eccles 12:11). Whether from two or more hands—the voice identified as *Qohelet, responsible for the bulk of the material, and a *frame narrator/epilogist(s), responsible for the opening and closing sections (so Longman)—or (more traditionally) from the one hand who adopts a persona and a limited perspective, which may not be the author’s ultimate perspective, is not important for our purposes. The perspective of Qohelet is that “all is hebel” (Eccles 1:2 [and 29x]). Although hebel is often translated as “meaningless” (which may be encompassed within the semantic domain of the word), there is good reason to see in this thematic statement not so much a philosophical comment as a psychological one—“bewildering, frustrating” (cf. the LXX’s mataiotēs and its echo in Rom 8:20). Frustration, compared to “chasing the wind” (Eccles 1:14), a hatred of life (Eccles 2:17) bordering on despair (Eccles 2:20), anger (Eccles 5:17) and perhaps a resigned acceptance of one’s lot (Eccles 2:24; 3:12, 22) are some of the varying moods of this sage.

What Qohelet observes is troubling. Things are not as they ought to be (though he does not clearly tell us how he knows what ought to be). There is an unfairness in life’s vicissitudes (Eccles 2:21-23; 3:16-21; 7:15-18; 8:10-14; 9:1-6). Qohelet is a realist, observing the injustice, oppression and evil that plague the world (Eccles 3:15-17; 4:1, 3; 5:8; 9:11). This is a fallen world, and D. Clemens has drawn attention to the echoes in Ecclesiastes of language from the narrative of the fall (Gen 3). The righteous do perish, while the wicked live long (Eccles 7:15; 8:14). From all observation, death offers no solution in terms of rewards and punishments, for a common fate awaits humans and animals, the wise and the foolish, the righteous and the wicked (Eccles 2:15-16; 3:18-21; 9:2). It might not be so troublesome but for the fact that humanity seems destined for higher things. We long to understand things from an eternal perspective (Eccles 3:10-11) but find ourselves exasperatingly incapable (Eccles 7:24; 8:17; 11:5). Everything happens in its time in ways that are beyond human control (Eccles 3:1-8). The “heavy burden” that people endure is one that God has laid on them (Eccles 1:13). We must learn to accept that there are things we cannot alter (Eccles 1:15). Life’s circumstances are not some hand dealt by an impersonal fate; they are attributable to divine providence (Eccles 5:19-20; 6:2; 7:13-14; 9:1).

Taking all of this on board, for Ecclesiastes, what should characterize the human experience is to “fear God and keep his commandments” (Eccles 12:13) (see Enns). Perplexities may remain, but it is not our place to resolve them, but rather to abide in a relationship of trust in our maker (Eccles 12:1). The work concludes with an intimation of final judgment (Eccles 12:14).

In Ecclesiastes we certainly have no theodicy in the sense of a solution to the problem of evil. As with any issue, however, perhaps the first step toward a solution is a clear and honest statement of the problem—“Life is frustrating, and then there’s death”—and Ecclesiastes has at least provided this. The world that we experience is not ultimately as God designed it.

2.5. Theodicy in Lamentations. The book of Lamentations is an emotional outpouring in response to Jerusalem’s downfall. In genre it is similar to the communal laments of the book of Psalms. Even more distressing than the physical devastation at the hands of enemies is the sense of shame and disgrace that this engenders as Jerusalem’s conquerors gloat over the city’s fate (Lam 1:7, 8, 21; 2:17; 3:45; 5:1). The city feels abandoned by God (Lam 2:3, 7; 3:44; 5:20). Worse, God was actively responsible for the disaster and is the real enemy (Lam 1:12, 14, 15, 17; 2:4, 5, 21; 3:43; 4:11). Yet, while the individual of Lamentations 3 (probably corporate Jerusalem) laments the calamity (Lam 3:59-66), there is no charge of injustice against God or any doubting of his power to intervene. God is still sovereign (Lam 5:19) and is in the right (Lam 1:18). The cause of Jerusalem’s rejection is rebellion (Lam 1:5; 4:13). What has happened is not a whim on God’s part; it has been planned (Lam 1:17; 2:17; 3:37-38)—an outworking, it would seem, of the covenant curse (see Deut 28—29). God does not enjoy the affliction of his people and will not reject them forever (Lam 3:31-33). If the calamity is due to covenant unfaithfulness on Israel’s part, then that same covenant, and the character and purposes of the God who initiated it, give rise to a longing that once again God might bring about a restoration in the spirit of Deuteronomy 30 (Lam 1:21; 4:22).

The vision of hope positioned centrally to the book is founded on the divine character (Lam 3:22-33). Although almost certainly the events in mind are those surrounding the destruction of Jerusalem by the Babylonians in 587 BC, the lack of specific historical reference facilitates the book's service as an expression of the bewilderment of the people of God to distressing circumstances in any age and an encouragement to renewed confidence in the rightness of God's actions.

3. A Synthesis of Theodicy in Old Testament Wisdom Books.

Rather than a confusion of competing theodicies (or anti-theodicies), the biblical wisdom writers present a coherent, though multifaceted, approach to the issue. The following sections present a synoptic approach to the central issues canvassed by the OT wisdom books as they relate to theodicy.

3.1. The Reality of Evil. The biblical wisdom writers affirm and bemoan the reality of evil as a part of the makeup of this present world. Nowhere do they assume it to be inherent or necessary in a material universe. The ideal of the created order is represented in, for example, Psalm 8, where we see a marvelous world originally placed under the dominion of humankind (Ps 8:5-8; cf. Gen 1:26). Yet humanity exercises that dominion neither within God-given constraints nor for God-honoring purposes.

Although evil is often divided by philosophers and theologians into physical (natural calamities), moral (intentional harm perpetrated by responsible agents) and religious (rebellion against the revealed will of God), the OT writers regard all evil as a perversion of God's intended order for his creation and a manifestation or consequence of universal human sin (Ps 14:3; Prov 20:9; Eccles 7:29). There is no effort to probe beyond human sin to ascertain its ultimate origins or to ponder why God allowed such a state of affairs to come into being. The result is a universe that has become subject to frustration (Eccles 1:2; cf. Rom 8:20). The created order is warped as a consequence of sin and God's response (Eccles 1:15; 7:13).

3.2. The Sovereignty of God. Although the fool may disregard God and his sovereignty ("practical atheism" [Ps 14:1; cf. Prov 30:2-3]), theoretical atheism is never considered a viable option by the voices that we hear in the biblical texts.

The biblical writers portray the God of Israel as the unrivaled sovereign over the universe.

3.2.1. The Sovereignty of God over Natural Forces. A number of wisdom passages celebrate God as the creator and maintainer of all (Job 38—39; Pss 104; 139; Prov 8:22-31; Eccles 3:14; 12:1). The outcome of all that happens in God's world, even the casting of a lot, is dependent on his decision (Prov 16:33). The physical elements, even as agents of destruction, are under his command (Ps 18:7; 29:9-10; 65:6-7; 74:15; 78:47; 104:4, 7; 107:29, 33; 148:8). There is no attempt by the biblical writers to hide behind some notion of limited sovereignty when it comes to "natural" evil (Ruth 1:21; Ps 104:9; Prov 8:29).

3.2.2. The Sovereignty of God over Human Actions. God is also said to be in control of human activities (Ps 66:12; Prov 16:9; 20:24; 21:1, 30-31; Eccles 9:1). Even evil people and evil actions are not beyond the reach of God's power (Prov 16:4, 7; 29:13). Unless, with J. Crenshaw (2005, 75-86), we assume that human freedom is incompatible with divine omnipotence, and that by creating humans as free agents God circumscribed his own sovereignty (and the biblical writers nowhere do this), the problem as it affects the justice of God encompasses the human cruelty and oppression that are rife in our world.

3.3. The Omniscience and Wisdom of God. There is no recourse to a notion of limited knowledge or wisdom on God's part. In wisdom God brought into being all that is (Ps 104:24; Prov 8:22-31), and his watchful eye is upon all (Prov 15:3). Psalm 139 is an exposition of God's complete knowledge of human nature. God is the source of all wisdom and knowledge (Prov 2:6). It is on the basis of his complete knowledge that God can be relied on to execute justice (Prov 15:11; 22:12; 24:11-12; cf. Job 11:11).

3.4. The Incomprehensibility of God. A consequence of all of the above is that God's plans and procedures in dealing with humanity and the world are beyond our understanding. The wisdom poem of Job 28 is, in context, designed to remind the reader of the limitations of human understanding on the deep issues that are the theme of the book (see also Job 12:13; 36:29; 37:5; 42:3; Ps 92:5; 127:1-2; 131:1; 139:6, 17; 147:5; Prov 30:18-19; Eccles 8:17; 11:5).

3.5. The Benevolence of God. God is acclaimed as benevolent toward his creation (Ps 145:9). More commonly, God is represented as committed to doing good to or blessing his elect people (Ps 5:12; 29:11; 34:8; 84:11; 86:5; 100:5; 103:8; 106:1; 135:3; Lam 3:25). This does not lead the OT writers to take such benevolence for granted, and it is a constant prayer on their lips that God act in accordance with his revealed character (Ps 25:6; 28:9; 40:11; 51:1; 67:1; 69:16; 119:132; 125:4; 134:3; Lam 5:1, 21-22). It is this clear understanding of God's love and goodness that makes his occasional apparent failure to act all the harder to bear (Job 7:21; 13:24; Ps 42:9; 77:9; Lam 5:20). Partial answers may be found in God's loving but painful discipline designed to bring about repentance and instill character in his people (Ps 118:18; Prov 3:11-12). Elsewhere, suffering is presented as that which fosters a closer trust in God and delight in his word (Ps 119:50, 143), and the covenant promise "I will be with you" (Gen 26:24) finds its most comforting application in the darkest times (Ps 23:4).

God is himself portrayed as sharing in the sufferings of his people. T. Fretheim (138-48) notes how God's restraint of his anger (e.g., Ps 78:38) is not without pain to himself, and God risks his reputation in subjecting his people to judgment (Ps 74:10-11; 78:61).

3.6. The Justice of God. Creation and the maintenance of order in the universe belong closely together. It is the task of the sovereign to uphold justice in his realm; how much more should we expect God, who made the world, to establish and uphold righteousness and punish wrongdoing. Many instances can be found where God's role is not stressed, but contextual considerations leave no room for an impersonal operation of an action-consequence relation.

3.6.1. Present Justice. The biblical writers portray God as a righteous judge to whom the oppressed may turn in the expectation of finding the justice they seek. However, God is sovereign also in his manner of dispensing justice. It is this sovereignty that gives rise to so much of the perplexity expressed. If God is able to withhold punishment and show mercy, then God's exercise of justice does not proceed according to a formula (Ps 30:5; 85:1-3; 103:10). M. Seifrid (416) observes that there are more than four times as many references to a "saving righteousness" in the OT than to punitive divine justice; thus, there has been significant discussion as to whether God's righteousness is to be seen as primarily relational, consistent with his saving purposes toward the elect, or norm-based and retributive. This question cannot be explored in the present article, but it may be the case that a resolution is to be found in an understanding of the character of the new covenant (Jer 31:31-33), with its congruence of covenantal relationship and heart-inscribed righteousness.

Sometimes the involvement of God in the administration of justice is not in the foreground (*Esther), which might lead us to assume that the writer accepted with equanimity the fact that God seems inactive, remote or hidden. More commonly, the distance of God compounds the distress factor, all the more perplexing because it seems out of character for God to be silent to his people's pleas, or worse, actively hostile toward them (Job 13:24; 24:1; 34:29; Ps 10:1; 13:1; 44:24; 69:17; 88:14; 102:2).

The OT wisdom writers believed they lived in an ordered and moral universe in which virtue is rewarded and wickedness is punished, or, to be more precise, in which relationship with God ("the fear of Yahweh") and the lifestyle consistent with that relationship lead to blessing. All biblical writers are aware of the problems in maintaining such a notion, feeling the tensions intensely at times but maintaining it nonetheless.

3.6.2. Future Justice. The nations around Israel had notions of life beyond death and it would be strange if Israel did not do so also (see Afterlife). Although final judgment, resurrection and re-creation customarily have been regarded as at best peripheral to OT theology, some recent study suggests that the resurrection hope is more central to the OT, including the psalms and wisdom books (Greenspoon). The teaching of Jesus would suggest a hermeneutic of the OT that sees resurrection as built into the fabric of Israel's covenant faith (Lk 24:44-46). It is this faith, rather than some older notion of "international wisdom," that undergirds the OT Wisdom literature. Whether, with Y. Hoffman, we see the idea of retribution as a major factor in shaping Israel's eschatology, life beyond the grave offers another arena for retribution and restitution.

Although there is no easy recourse to a theodicy of ultimate retribution, Proverbs may hint at a balancing of the books beyond the grave (Prov 24:16, 19-20). Ecclesiastes, despite its prevailing empirical stance, looks to a time when "God will summon up the past" (Eccles 3:15) and ends on a note of confidence in ultimate justice (Eccles 12:14). Though of uncertain meaning, Job 19:26 may be an indicator of Job's faith in his ultimate vindication in the resurrection, a hope also held out in some psalms (see 2.2 above).

4. Conclusion.

The OT wisdom writers were well aware of the real tensions and perplexities raised by their covenant faith and their experience of the world. They were realists who struggled to comprehend the ways of God. They provide material, sometimes intensely felt, pertinent to the theodicy discussion, but it does not appear that they ever saw themselves as metaphysical theologians setting out to solve a logical conundrum. Their statements on the moral order, though often cast in the form of overgeneralizations and hyperboles so far as present experience indicates, are affirmations of faith, grounded in the character of God and statements of the principle on which he ultimately operates, though his ways are beyond discovery. If Job (and the reader of Job) cannot have access to the answers for the barrage of questions in Job 38–41, why should Job (or we) expect to be given the answer to inexplicable suffering? We are put in our place by such challenges as God utters in Job 40:8: “Would you discredit my justice? Would you put me in the wrong to put yourself in the right?” Thus the wisdom writers, while rhetorically seeking answers, were actually content to leave some questions unanswered in the spirit of Deuteronomy 29:29. Their “answer” lay in acknowledging that God is God. They might attempt to put God in the dock as a literary device to give vent to their bewilderment and pain, but ultimately they reject the notion that God is subject to human scrutiny. Rather than attempt to offer a rational explanation, to resolve the tensions by limiting God’s power or denying his goodness, they (even the so-called skeptical writers) seek to instill in their readers the fear of Yahweh (Job 28:28; Ps 111:10; Prov 1:7; 9:10; Eccles 12:13). We may not understand God’s ways, but God knows what he is doing, and the OT wisdom writers inspire confidence that the tensions will receive their ultimate resolution. A Christian perspective is that the OT is not God’s ultimate word, and although the NT will continue to leave many questions unanswered (1 Cor 13:12; 1 Jn 3:2), the confidence that Christians have in the justice and wisdom of God finds its confirmation in Christ (1 Cor 1:30).

See also CHAOS AND DEATH; DIVINE PRESENCE; GOD; PROTECTION IMAGERY; RIGHTEOUSNESS;

SUFFERING; THEOPHANY.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. S. E. Balentine, The Hidden God: The Hiding of the Face of God in the Old Testament (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1983); L. Boström, The God of the Sages: The Portrayal of God in the Book of Proverbs (ConBOT 29; Stockholm: Almqvist & Wiksell, 1990); W. Brueggemann, Theology of the Old Testament: Testimony, Dispute, Advocacy (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1997); D. A. Carson, How Long, O Lord? Reflections on Suffering and Evil (Leicester: InterVarsity Press, 1990); D. M. Clemens, “The Law of Sin and Death: Ecclesiastes and Genesis 1-3,” Them 19.3 (1994) 5-8; D. J. A. Clines, Job 1-20 (WBC 17; Dallas: Word, 1989); J. L. Crenshaw, Urgent Advice and Probing Questions: Collected Writings on Old Testament Wisdom (Macon, GA: Mercer University Press, 1995); idem, Defending God: Biblical Responses to the Problem of Evil (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 2005); idem, ed., Theodicy in the Old Testament (London: SPCK, 1983); W. J. Dumbrell, “The Purpose of the Book of Job,” in The Way of Wisdom: Essays in Honor of Bruce K. Waltke, ed. J. I. Packer and S. K. Soderlund (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 2000) 91-105; P. Enns, “kl-h’dm and the Evaluation of Qohelet’s Wisdom in Qoh 12:13 or ‘The ‘A is So, and What’s More, B’ Theology of Ecclesiastes,” in The Idea of Biblical Interpretation: Essays in Honor of James L. Kugel, ed. H. Najman and J. H. Newman (JSJSup 83; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 2004) 125-37; I. Fløysvik, When God Becomes My Enemy: The Theology of the Complaint Psalms (Saint Louis: Concordia Academic Press, 1997); T. E. Fretheim, The Suffering of God: An Old Testament Perspective (OBT; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1984); L. J. Green-spoon, “The Origin of the Idea of Resurrection,” in Traditions in Transformation: Turning Points in Biblical Faith, ed. B. Halpern and J. D. Levenson (Winona Lake, IN: Eisenbrauns, 1981) 247-321; Y. Hoffman, “The Creativity of Theodicy,” in Justice and Righteousness: Biblical Themes and Their Influences, ed. H. G. Reventlow and Y. Hoffman (JSOTSup 137; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1992) 117-30; K. Koch, “Is There a Doctrine of Retribution in the Old Testament?” in Theodicy in the Old Testament, ed. J. L. Crenshaw (IRT 4; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1983) 57-87; A. Laato and J. C. de Moor, eds., Theodicy in the World of the Bible (Leiden: E. J. Brill, 2003); T. Linafelt and T. K. Beal, eds., God in the Fray: A Tribute to Walter Brueggemann (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1998); T. Longman III, The Book of Ecclesi- astes (NICOT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1998); R. E. Murphy, "Wisdom—Theses and Hypotheses," in Israelite Wisdom: Theological and Literary Essays in Honor of Samuel Terrien, ed. J. Gammie et al. (Missoula, MT: Scholars Press, 1978) 35-42; L. G. Perdue and W. C. Gilpin, eds., The Voice from the Whirlwind: Interpreting the Book of Job (Nashville: Abingdon, 1992); L. G. Perdue, B. B. Scott and W. J. Wiseman, eds., In Search of Wisdom: Essays in Memory of John G. Gammie (Louisville: Westminster John Knox Press, 1993); I. Provan, Ecclesiastes, Song of Songs (NIVAC; Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 2001); J. F. Ross, "Psalm 73," in Israelite Wisdom: Theological and Literary Essays in Honor of Samuel Terrien, ed. J. Gammie et al. (Missoula, MT: Scholars Press, 1978) 161-75; M. Seifrid, "Righteousness Language in the Hebrew Scriptures and Early Judaism," in Justification and Variegated Nomism, 1: The Complexities of Second Temple Judaism, ed. D. A. Carson, P. T. O'Brien and M. Seifrid (WUNT 2/140; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2001) 415-42; B. K. Waltke, The Book of Proverbs: Chapters 1-15 (NICOT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2004); H. C. Washington, Wealth and Poverty in the Instruction of Amemope and the Hebrew Proverbs (SBLDS 142; Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1994); J. W. Wenham, The Enigma of Evil: Can We Believe in the Goodness of God? (Grand Rapids: Academie Books, 1985).

J. Davies

THEOPHANY

A theophany is a manifestation of God. The English word theophany is formed from two Greek words, theos ("God") and phainō ("appear"). Descriptions of theophanies are prominent in *Job and *Psalms, and this article focuses on these texts (for more general treatments, see the entries in DOTP and NIDOTTE; for theophany in narrative, see Savran). In Job and Psalms the appearance of Yahweh is accompanied by cosmic disturbances that shake the earth, bring mighty winds, deep clouds, coals of fire, lightning and smoke. When God reveals himself in these ways, his absolute uniqueness is communicated. This revelation of God results in vindication and right thinking among his people, while his enemies are thrown down and confounded. In some ways, theophanies capture the whole point of biblical theology in that they show the incomparability of Yahweh as he reveals himself to save his people through the judgment of their enemies (see Hamilton 2006a). In this he is showing mercy to those who fear him and justice to those who disregard his claim on their allegiance (see Ex 34:6-7).

1. Characteristics of a Theophany
2. Content of a Theophany
3. Consequences of a Theophany
4. Theophany in Biblical Theology

1. Characteristics of a Theophany.

In Job 38:1; 40:6 Yahweh speaks to Job out of the tempest, or storm wind (śē'ārā). In Psalm 18:7-15 the appearance of Yahweh is marked by the reeling and rocking of the earth and the trembling and quaking of the foundations of the mountains at the anger of Yahweh (Ps 18:7). Yahweh is depicted in anthropomorphic terms as smoke goes up from his nostrils and fire from his mouth (Ps 18:8). He descends from his heavenly dwelling place by bending the heavens, and there is thick darkness under his feet (Ps 18:9). Yahweh is depicted as riding on a cherub, and the cherub is poetically synonymous with "the wings of the wind [rûah]" (Ps 18:10) (see Craigie, 174). The darkness of thick water clouds serves as his canopy and cover (Ps 18:11), and there is brightness before him as hail and hot coals of fire burst forth (Ps 18:12). His voice is the thunder (Ps 18:13), and the lightning is his arrow with which he routs the enemy (Ps 18:14). The great wind of the blast of his nostrils moves the waters so that the sea floor is revealed (Ps 18:15). As T. Hiebert (510) has observed, theophanies such as this combine the imagery of a mighty thunderstorm with anthropomorphic depictions of God as a conquering deliverer.

The theophany in Psalm 18 is particularly full in that it describes elements of thunderstorms and earthquakes accompanying the manifestation of Yahweh (see Eichrodt, 2.17-18). As the fullest description of a theophany in the Psalter, Psalm 18 also informs the earlier calls in Psalms for God to arise and help (or statements that he will do so [e.g., Ps 2:5; 3:7; 6:8-10; 10:12; 17:13]) as well as the shorter descriptions of God appearing to judge his enemies and save his people that come later in the collection (e.g., Ps 50:1-3; 77:16-20; 83:15; 94:1-2; 97:2-5; 104:1-3; 144:5-8). These features of the biblical texts also influence later extrabiblical literature, as J. VanderKam has shown.

2. Content of a Theophany.

2.1. Communicating Theological Truth.

2.1.1 To Answer Job's Questions about the Problem of Evil. In the theophany at the end of the book of Job the overpowering manifestation of Yahweh in the whirlwind arrests attention so that the matchless knowledge, power and authority of Yahweh can be declared. This is accomplished through a salvo of queries that the Lord directs at Job. The questions start with the created realm in Job 38 and move to living beings in Job 39 (for the suggestion that the material is arranged in both a linear and *chiastic fashion, see Miller). In Job 40 Job is questioned as to his audacity to contend with Yahweh, before having his attention directed to Behemoth, and then in Job 41 he is questioned about his ability to control Leviathan. All of this is intended to reveal the unique wisdom and power of God, vindicating God's righteousness in the face of the evidence from Job's life that God has not been fair to Job or that God might not be able to ensure that cosmic justice is upheld.

Beginning with the cosmos, Yahweh questions Job regarding his knowledge of the scope and results of the laying of the earth's foundation (Job 38:4-7). Next come questions regarding the shutting in of the sea so that it does not escape its set boundaries (Job 38:8-11). Job is asked if he has commanded the day, with all the morning light brings, to dawn (Job 38:12-15). Yahweh next challenges Job to declare his experiential knowledge (which Job obviously does not have) of the springs of the sea (Job 38:16), the gates of death (Job 38:17), the expanse of the earth (Job 38:18), the dwelling places of light and darkness (Job 38:19-21), the storehouses of the snow and hail (Job 38:22-23) and the point from which light and wind are distributed (Job 38:24). Yahweh next asks Job to explain to him the physics of rain, lightning and ice (Job 38:25-30), before asking if he can control the stars (Job 38:31-33), summon the clouds (Job 38:34) or send out the lightnings (Job 38:35).

Questions regarding living beings are introduced in Job 38:36, when God asks Job who gave wisdom to the inner parts of humanity and understanding to the mind. This is followed by a final question about the clouds and the waterskins of heaven (Job 38:37-38), before all the questions in Job 39 focus on living beings. With the overlap of these topics, the questions regarding the created realm and those who inhabit it are interlocked.

In Job 39 Yahweh asks Job about mountain goats and does (Job 39:1-4), wild donkeys (Job 39:5-8), the wild ox (Job 39:9-12), the ostrich (Job 39:13-18), the horse (Job 39:19-25), the hawk (Job 39:26) and the eagle (Job 39:27-30). As Job is asked to explain the mysteries of the cosmos and the ways of its living beings, the deluge of questions makes the point stated clearly elsewhere in the Wisdom literature: "Just as you do not know what is the way of the spirit as the bones are in the full womb, so you do not know the work of God who has made the whole" (Eccles 11:5).

This becomes explicit in Job 40:1-2, as Yahweh says, "Shall the one who contends with Shaddai be one who finds fault? The one who reproves God, let him answer it!" Throughout the book Job has been insisting on the merits of his case and calling for justice (e.g., Job 6:2, 24, 30; 10:1-22; 19:7; 23:1-10; 27:2), and the theophanic manifestation of Yahweh forces Job to recognize that if he does not fully comprehend the way of Yahweh in the created realm and in the animal kingdom, he cannot expect to fully comprehend the way of Yahweh in his dealings with human beings. Job recognizes this and pledges silence in Job 40:3-5.

Yahweh, however, is pleased to give Job more to think on concerning his sovereign power, so he continues to question Job out of the whirlwind (Job 40:6-7). Having dared Job to show himself equal to God in splendor (Job 40:8-14), Yahweh directs Job's attention to Behemoth (Job 40:15-24). Job is then asked if he can control Leviathan (Job 41:1-10), and this is concluded with a piercing question from Yahweh in Job 41:11: "Who has given to me that I should repay? Everything under heaven is mine!" From this climactic statement of his own absolute freedom from obligation, Yahweh goes on to extol the might of Leviathan (Job 41:12-34). The implication of Yahweh's questions as to whether Job can conquer and control Leviathan is that Yahweh has such power. Leviathan is the great beast of the sea, the place whence evil comes. As the lord of the evil sea, Yahweh's ability to bait (Job 41:1) and employ (Job 41:4) Leviathan for his own purposes corresponds to Yahweh's ability to entice *Satan to accomplish his will at the outset of the book of Job (Job 1:7-12; 2:3-6). Thus, the theophany at the end of Job communicates that Yahweh is the irreducible, incomprehensible, unconquerable Lord of all, including the evil that seems to prevail in events such as those that happen to Job (see Fyall).

2.1.2 Encouragement for the Faithful. It appears that these descriptions of the appearance of Yahweh are intended encourage those who trust him. So, for instance, the celebration of Yahweh's glory in Psalm 29 communicates that in whatever circumstances faithful Israelites may be, the reality is that the sons of God should ascribe glory to Yahweh (Ps 29:1-2). Yahweh, in majestic power, speaks with authority over the waters (Ps 29:3-4), over Lebanon and Sirion (Ps 29:5-6), over the wilderness of Kadesh (Ps 29:7-8), with the result that all who behold him gasp, "Glory!" (Ps 29:9). Yahweh's sovereignty is announced (Ps 29:10), and the psalm closes with a prayer that Yahweh give strength to his people and bless them with peace (Ps 29:11). The rhetorical effect of the exultant announcement of Yahweh's powerful word in Psalm 29:3-9 is to encourage the fainthearted and bring the awareness of Yahweh's greatness to bear on difficult circumstances. This is also apparent in Psalm 10:17: "The desire of the afflicted you hear, O Yahweh, you will establish their hearts."

2.2. Calling for and Celebrating Deliverance. The theophanies in Psalms are unlike the one in Job in that the beneficiaries of the theophany are not engaged in a propaedeutic dialogue with Yahweh. Instead, the superscription to Psalm 18 speaks of the day Yahweh rescued *David from all his enemies and from Saul. The Psalms theophanies are about the deliverance of God's people and the defeat of his and their enemies (see 3 below).

Psalm 18 opens with a statement of love for Yahweh because of what Yahweh is for the psalmist: strength, rock, fortress, deliverer, refuge, shield, horn of salvation, stronghold (Ps 18:1-2). In the next verse the psalmist states that he calls upon Yahweh, who is worthy of praise, and Yahweh responds by saving him (Ps 18:3). After this introduction the distress that the psalmist faced is described (Ps 18:4-5), followed by an illustration of the cry for help described in Psalm 18:3. The cry comes to Yahweh in his temple, and it reaches his ears (Ps 18:6). The cry coming to Yahweh's ears is part of the anthropomorphism of the imagery, the full picture of which has Yahweh enthroned in the heavens with the ark of the covenant in the holy of holies as his footstool. Yahweh sits as king, and his temple in Jerusalem is the place on earth from which he is accessed. This understanding informs the theophany of Psalm 18:7-15 summarized earlier (see 1 above; see Divine Presence).

Yahweh is depicted in these theophanies in Psalms as rising from his throne in heaven (Ps 17:13), bending the heavens (Ps 18:9), and riding a cherubim as a chariot (Ps 18:10) to rescue his servant (Ps 18, superscription).

3. Consequences of a Theophany.

After God confronts Job, Job despises himself and repents in dust and ashes (Job 42:5-6), but then Job is vindicated, and those who tormented him are rebuked (Job 42:7-9). Similarly, the coming of the Mighty One in Psalm 50 is first a call for his faithful ones (Ps 50:5) to *worship him correctly (Ps 50:1-15), followed by a rebuke of the wicked (Ps 50:16-23). When Yahweh appears in conquering glory, his enemies are terrified (Ps 2:5). The enemies of God's people have their teeth shattered from Yahweh's blow to their cheek (Ps 3:7). These enemies are warned that they will be ashamed (Ps 6:10). The shameful defeat of the enemies of God's people results in the vindication of those who trust him, and this dual aspect of God's appearance on behalf of his people is expressed in Psalm 9. There we read that enemies perish before the presence of Yahweh (Ps 9:3), while the psalmist is lifted up from the gates of death (Ps 9:13). When Yahweh is urged to rise up and remember the afflicted (Ps 10:12), he is simultaneously called upon to break the arm of the wicked (Ps 10:17). The psalmist exhorts Yahweh to arise and confront and subdue the wicked, which is also the deliverance of the psalmist's soul (Ps 17:13). When Yahweh appears, he will utterly destroy his enemies (Ps 21:8-13). The cumulative teaching of these representative indications (many similar texts could be cited) of what happens when Yahweh appears on behalf of his people is that nothing and no one can stand against Yahweh. Neither the sea (Ps 74:13) nor Leviathan (Ps 74:14) nor foes of Israel (Ps 74:10) have any hope of overcoming Yahweh when he arises to defend his cause and stretch forth his mighty right arm to save (Ps 74:11, 22).

4. Theophany in Biblical Theology.

In Psalm 2 Yahweh terrifies his enemies (Ps 2:5), but then the executor of his wrath is his anointed king, who breaks enemy nations with a rod of iron (Ps 2:9). Obeisance to Yahweh takes the form of kissing God's "son" (Ps 2:10-12). When the king rides out victoriously in Psalm 45:4, his throne is identified with the throne of God (Ps 45:6). Psalm 110 speaks of Yahweh shattering heads on the day of his wrath (Ps 110:6 [rō's here typically is rendered "chiefs"]), and there is a close connection between the day of Yahweh's wrath in Psalm 110:6-7 and the day of the king's power (Ps 110:3; see Hamilton 2006b). These texts, and there are others, seem to bring together the day of victory for Israel's king and the day on which Yahweh rises to save his people and judge their enemies (see Kingship Psalms).

The Gospels present Jesus in theophanic glory at the transfiguration (Mk 9:2-8 par.), and the mountain setting, the radiant glory and the human response—a desire to worship—provide points of contact with the theophanies of Psalms. The pleas in Psalms for God to rise and defeat his enemies and save his people find their ultimate answer in what is described in the book of Revelation. There the risen and glorified Jesus promises comfort for his battered people (Rev 1—3) before unsealing the scroll (Rev 5—8), which results in the seven trumpet blasts (Rev 8—11), which in turn give way to the seven bowls of God's wrath (Rev 15—16). The outpouring of God's wrath results on the final overthrow of Babylon, God's great enemy (Rev 17—18), and the appearing of the messianic warrior king, Jesus, to save and judge (Rev 19—20). T. Glasson (259) contends, "The importance of the OT theophanies in relation to NT conceptions of the End has never been sufficiently realized." Once all this is accomplished, God dwells with his people in the new heavens and new earth (Rev 21—22).

See also GOD; SALVATION AND DELIVERANCE IMAGERY; THEODICY; WARFARE IMAGERY.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. G. K. Beale, The Temple and the Church's Mission: A Biblical Theology of the Dwelling Place of God (NSBT; Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 2004); P. C. Craigie, Psalms 1-50 (WBC 19; Nashville: Thomas Nelson, 1983); W. Eichrodt, Theology of the Old Testament, trans. J. A. Baker (2 vols.; OTL; Philadelphia: Westminster, 1961-1967); R. S. Fyall, Now My Eyes Have Seen You: Images of Creation and Evil in the Book of Job (NSBT; Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 2002); T. F. Glasson, "Theophany and Parousia," NTS 34 (1988) 259-70; J. Hamilton, "The Center of Biblical Theology: The Glory of God in Salvation through Judgment?" TynBul 57 (2006a) 57-84; idem, "The Skull Crushing Seed of the Woman: Inner-Biblical Interpretation of Genesis 3:15," The Southern Baptist Journal of Theology 10.2 (2006b) 30-54; T. Hiebert, "Theophany in the OT," ABD 6.505-11; T. Longman III and D. G. Reid, God Is a Warrior (SOTBT; Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1995); J. E. Miller, "Structure and Meaning of the Animal Discourse in the Theophany of Job (38,39-39,30)," ZAW (1991) 418-21; J. J. Niehaus, God at Sinai: Covenant and Theophany in the Bible and the Ancient Near East (SOTBT; Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1995); idem, "Theophany, Theology of," NIDOTTE 4.1247-50; M. F. Rooker, "Theophany," DOTP 859-64; G. W. Savran, Encountering the Divine: Theophany in Biblical Narrative (JSOTSup 420; London: T & T Clark International, 2005); J. VanderKam, "The Theophany of Enoch I 3b-7, 9," VT 23 (1973) 130-50. J. Hamilton

TIME

Time is a manifold aspect of the created order in which both God and humanity act. Rather than using one main term or concept for time, the OT uses diverse terminology for time or temporal realities. The materials relevant to time can be fruitfully organized and explained by using the categories of natural time, historical time and eschatological time. The theology of time also involves reflection on eternity and its relationship to temporal realities and experiences.

1. Terms Related to Time
2. Different Kinds of Time
3. Time and Eternity

1. Terms Related to Time.

Although Hebrew terminology and syntax are capable of expressing an abstract concept of "time in general" (Barr, 96-104; see Eccles 9:11), the OT does not emphasize such an abstract concept of time (de Vries, 343-50; Tomasino, NIDOTTE 3.564; von Rad, 99-100). Instead, its writers usually use terms and phrases that refer to specific, concrete temporal moments, periods, cycles or experiences of time. For the purposes of this article, the following two Hebrew terms are the most important.

1.1. "Day" (yôm). The most frequently used temporal term in the OT is yôm, usually translated "day." Its primary meaning is the period of light as opposed to night (Esther 4:16; Job 17:12 [used figuratively]; 24:16; Ps 1:2; 139:12). Yet it is an exceptionally flexible term, often used in various prepositional phrases. It is frequently used to refer to the whole cycle of night and day, a “twenty-four hour” day (e.g., Ruth 4:5; Esther 1:10; Job 3:1, 6), or a more general time period (Job 15:23; 21:13; 38:23; Ps 102:2; Prov 11:4; Lam 2:16, 21). It also has many specific uses either by itself or in idioms, such as “lifetime” (Job 14:6; Eccles 7:15), “every day” (Ps 140:2), “holiday” (Esther 8:17) or a previously announced special “day” (Lam 1:21). The plural, yāmim, often refers to an extended period, either indefinite (Prov 3:2; 9:11; Eccles 2:16; 7:10) or set within certain parameters, such as a person’s or people’s lifetime (“my days” [Job 17:11; Ps 39:4-5; 102:11]; “all the days of my life” [Ps 23:6; 27:4]; cf. “our days” [Ps 90:9-15]). In the phrase “all the days” it means “forever” or “always” (similar to a use of ’ôlām). We can learn much about the OT temporal perspectives from a contextual analysis of various adverbial expressions containing yôm, whether they relate to the past (“the day past” or “yesterday”), the present (“present day” or “today”) or the future (“the day future” or “tomorrow”) (see de Vries).

1.2. “Time” (‘ēt). The Hebrew term most commonly translated “time” is ‘ēt, which is used some forty times in *Ecclesiastes and twenty-two times in *Psalms. The term ‘ēt can usually be translated as “a time” and usually expresses “a point in time” or “a period of time” when an event or set of events occur (Tomasino, NIDOTTE 3.563-64). It can also express the “appropriate time” or “right time” for an event (Prov 15:23; Eccles 8:5; cf. Eccles 3:2-8, 11; see Kronholm, 447). Occasionally, ‘ēt seems to refer to time in general, as when Qohelet states, “The race is not to the swift, nor the battle to the mighty . . . but time [’ēt*] and chance befall them all” (Eccles 9:11) (see Barr, 98; Kronholm, 449).

2. Different Kinds of Time.

Time may be discussed in terms of three interrelated but distinguishable types: natural time, historical time and eschatological time (see Preuss). Each of these three aspects of time has both negative elements arising from human sin and divine judgment upon it and positive aspects arising from the goodness of creation and God’s redemptive work within it. Natural, historical and eschatological time correspond loosely to God’s works of creation, redemption and consummation respectively. Biblical writers urge humans to relate to time’s varied faces with wisdom and appropriate ethical and liturgical behavior.

Much debate has taken place as to the extent to which various biblical writers have a “cyclical” conception of time or a “linear” conception of time. This way of construing the debate can be critiqued for problematically imposing concepts upon the OT writings that do not fit its patterns of thinking (Childs, 76-84). The OT includes both the cyclical understanding of time and linear concepts of time (Kronholm, 446-47; Tomasino, NIDOTTE 3.564), with cyclical (natural) time constituting the “building blocks” of linear (historical and eschatological) time.

2.1. Natural Time.

2.1.1. Natural Cycles of Time. There are several cycles of time rooted in nature through the heavenly bodies—sun, moon and stars (see Ps 104:19-23). Thus, natural time refers to the daily, monthly, seasonal and yearly rhythms that mark everyday experience in what Qohelet calls life “under the sun” (see Preuss). The most basic natural marker of time is the day (yôm), which can be subdivided into evening and morning or into evening, morning and noonday (Ps 55:17), and which forms a seven-day week that culminates in the Sabbath. Although the week is established by direct divine ordination without the mediation of the heavenly bodies, we may consider it to be part of the natural cycles of time.

In addition, there are cycles of time set by the natural life cycles and developmental stages of human beings. There are the generational cycles of about forty years (Ps 78:5-8; Eccles 1:4) and the natural life cycle of about seventy years (Ps 90:11). Exceptions to the typical human lifespan are understood as signs of divine action. Such exceptions could be a sign of divine judgment, as in the case of premature death, which some writers understand as dying before one’s time (Job 15:32; Eccles 7:17). Alternatively, such exceptions could indicate extraordinary divine favor, as in cases of unusually “long life” (Ps 21:4). Developmental stages mark human lives: prenatal (Ps 58:3; 139:13-16), birth, infancy (the period of breastfeeding), childhood (after weaning [Ps 131:2]), youth (Eccles 12:1; Lam 3:27), adulthood (child-rearing age) and old age (Ps 71:9).

Much about natural time is predictable and orderly, but it also involves a measure of unpredictability because human beings cannot foresee the temporal unfolding of life with precision. For example, one cannot determine whether or exactly when a child will be born. Or one cannot predict the precise timing of death, though surely will it come (Eccles 9:11).

The predictable cycles of natural time and the unpredictability within it speak volumes about the finite, time-bound and uncontrollable character of human creaturely life. The order and limits of natural time largely organize and determine human life and activity. People are not free simply to ignore natural temporal cycles by going without sleep when it is nighttime or trying to grow crops in the winter. One cannot simply choose to live as few or as many years as one wants to.

All human beings are subject to the order, limits, predictability and unpredictability of natural time. But depending on the beholder, such characteristics can be experienced in different ways. For some, natural time is experienced as frustrating and stultifying in its constraints on human freedom and disruptive hindrances upon human efforts. Viewing the temporal cycles apart from God's good purposes, Qohelet declares the natural cycle of time to be meaningless, wearisome and frustrating—along with everything else (Eccles 1:4-5). "There is nothing new under the sun," and this is depressing (Eccles 1:9; cf. Eccles 1:9-10; 3:1-15; 9:11; see Kronholm, 448-49). Yet, for the godly, the stability and predictability of the natural cycles of time provide a reassuring reminder that, under divine providence, there is meaningful order in created life (Pss 104; 139). The limitations and unpredictability function as reminders to submit to the eternal God, who transcends human limitations (as in Pss 90; 102).

2.1.2. Natural Time and Divine Providence. Indeed, through the eyes of faith and wisdom biblical writers (including Qohelet) generally understand all of life in time as sustained, ordered and governed by the wise and good hand of God (Ps 104:19-23; 145:15). *Job points to the existence of specific, divinely ordered times even for the animals to give birth (Job 39:1-2).

At the heart of God's providence is God's sustenance and governance of humanity, of whom God is particularly "mindful" (Ps 8:4). The psalms often express a deep sense of God's sovereign and providential care: "My times are in your hands" (Ps 31:15; cf. Ps 39:5-7; 90:9-10, 12, 14; 139:1-18; also Job 7:6; 8:9; see Sæbø, 27). Despite the generally pessimistic tone of his writing, Qohelet, in Ecclesiastes 3, confirms the reality of divine providence. He declares, "There is an appointed time [zēmān] for everything, and there is a time [ʿēt] for every event under heaven" (Eccles 3:1 NASB). There is a time for each one of a whole variety of activities, events and emotions (Eccles 3:2-8). God's providential order even includes the time of distress or of trouble (Eccles 3:2-8; cf. Job 38:23; Ps 37:19, 39; Prov 25:19). Qohelet concludes with the conviction that God "has made everything appropriate [yāpeh; 'fair, beautiful'] in its time [ʿēt]" (Eccles 3:11 NASB).

2.2. Historical Time. Besides the kind of time that runs in repetitive natural cycles, there is historical time, the meaningful unfolding of distinctive events under divine providence. Although one may speak of historical time as "linear," some texts point to the linear history itself as being marked by cyclical patterns in which "nothing is new under the sun" (Eccles 1:9 [cf. the cyclical patterns in Judges]). The concept of historical time is more important for narrative books such as *Ruth and *Esther, but wherever an awareness of God's providence over human life is evident, the concept of historical time typically is close at hand. Historical time includes several different ideas within it.

2.2.1. Chronology. Historical time includes the basic idea of chronology, understood as the neutral notion of one event following another in a countable, measurable manner. The books of Ruth and Esther work with this aspect of time whenever they record when something happened (using the language of "in the *n*th year, the *n*th month"). Ruth opens with a time reference, "in the days when the judges ruled" (Ruth 1:1 NASB), and offers temporal markers at key seams within the book (e.g., Ruth 1:4, 22; 2:23). Ruth also concludes with a genealogy (Ruth 4:17-22), a paradigmatic biblical way of patterning historical time in relation to God's purposes, especially God's promise to bless Abraham's descendants. Esther is full of temporal markers, including some twenty-four uses of the term for "month" (hōdeš). "Temporal sequence is of great importance in the development of the book of Esther" (de Vries, 114), especially to highlight key junctures in the narrative's plot.

2.2.2. Divine and Human Action in History. Historical time transcends mere uniform, quantitative chronology to tell the story of the qualitative history-shaping actions of God and humans (on the quantitative-qualitative distinction, see de Vries, 343-46). Historical time is marked by times and seasons that tell a dramatic story with stretches of “flatland” (periods of everyday time that may be cyclical or repetitive) interspersed with “peaks and valleys” (positive and negative epoch-shaping actions). The most important peaks and valleys of history are constituted by purposeful divine acts of salvation and judgment, with or without the active participation of humanity. As some psalms testify, God’s redemptive work in human history includes judgment for the sin of both Israel (e.g., Ps 44:9-16; 60:1-5; 81:11-12; 137:7) and the nations (e.g., Ps 60:6-12; 105:23-45; 108:9-13). The book of *Lamentations emphasizes the judgment that comes on God’s own people, speaking of the “day of the LORD’s wrath” (Lam 1:12; 2:1, 21-22) (see Sæbø, 31). Yet when God’s wrath comes on the enemies of Israel, the day of God’s wrath is often also portrayed as the day of God’s salvation for his people (e.g., Ps 108:9-13).

Although God is the primary actor in and sovereign over historical time, godly people can become redemptive agents who participate in shaping the historical course of Israel and the nations. As the books of Ruth and Esther suggest, these agents can include *women. In the book of Esther implicit divine providence meets individual responsibility and risk-taking. God’s good purposes for individuals and groups are fulfilled in a paradoxical interweaving of divine and human action. This mysterious conjunction is evident in the well-known question that *Mordecai poses to Esther: “And who knows whether you have not attained royalty for such a time as this?” (Esther 4:14 NASB).

Despite the significance of individual persons and their actions, the view of time and history is often marked by communal and transgenerational ways of thinking that stand in contrast to (post)modern Western individualism. For example, the psalms understand retribution for the good or evil actions of individuals in intergenerational terms (Ps 37:28-29; 112:2). More obviously, God’s election and love for Israel extend from generation to generation (Ps 103:17; Lam 3:22-23).

Remembering and celebrating the past redemptive events form an important part of historical time and the life of the righteous. A corporate liturgical celebration in the book of Esther includes the inauguration of the festival of *Purim (Esther 9:24-28). As is true of all annual liturgical feasts and festivals (see Megillot and Festivals), Purim integrates remembrance of a once-for-all event of corporate deliverance (historical time) into the yearly seasonal calendar (natural time). The psalms include a multitude of personal and corporate declarations of thanksgiving based on God’s past deliverance of the psalmist. *Worship that celebrates God’s past actions also involves hope and trust that God can and will act in a similar way in the near and distant future.

A proper response to God as the Lord of history also includes remembering God’s past acts of judgment or discipline as an incentive to live obediently in the present and the future: “Today, if you would hear his voice, do not harden your hearts, as at Meribah, as in the day of Massah in the wilderness” (Ps 95:7-8 NASB). The liturgical “today” in Psalm 95:7 refers to any day in which God’s people can hear and respond to God, showing the capacity of liturgical time to bring past, present and future together under God’s everlasting lordship (cf. Heb 3:7, 13, 15; 4:7).

2.3. Eschatological Time. The appointed time for final salvation and judgment is not now but rather in the future, in what can be called an eschatological future. Eschatological time is the final consummation of God’s purposes for creation (including the final destiny of nations and individuals).

Eschatological time exists in both continuity and discontinuity with the time that precedes it, including natural and historical time. On the one hand, the final state of history or human existence is qualitatively different from life in time as we know it; on the other hand, eschatological time also stands in continuity with the time that precedes it, for two main reasons. First, eschatological time involves a restoration or recovery of the uncorrupted time of the original created order—an order that is partly reflected in natural and historical time. As such, there is truth to the notion that “beginning time” (German Urzeit) corresponds to “end time” (German Endzeit), although the biblical writers overcome the mythical idea of a complete and ahistorical repetition of the beginning at the end (Childs, 73-84). Second, there is also continuity between time as humans know and experience it (i.e., time as fallen and redeemed) and eschatological time. The merciful and judging actions of God in natural and historical time point to a future in which God's redemptive purposes will be consummated or perfected.

The general description of "eschatological time" given so far awaits further concretization through the testimony of the texts considered below. These texts can be divided into those that are primarily concerned with the future of collective bodies (like Israel and the nations) and those that concern the future of individuals respectively. Whether corporate or individual in focus, texts on eschatological time have important functions in the life of the righteous (see 2.3.3 below).

2.3.1. Corporate Eschatological Time. Many psalms address the corporate eschatological destiny of Israel and the nations. Consider these words from Psalm 22: "All the ends of the earth will remember and turn to the LORD, and all the families of the nations will bow down before him, for dominion belongs to the LORD and he rules over the nations. . . . Posterity will serve him; future generations will be told about the LORD" (Ps 22:27-28, 30 NASB). This future global victory rests upon God's universal, everlasting and ultimately unrivaled reign (Ps 45:6; 103:19), manifested in both wrathful judgment and merciful salvation. Some texts highlight the distinctiveness of Israel in God's unchanging covenant purposes (Ps 102:13, 16; 147:19-20; cf. the promise to *David in Ps 89), but not in a way that is incompatible with the ultimate blessing and worship of the nations (Ps 47:1-2; 66:4, 8; 67:1-7; 86:7; 102:15-16, 21-22). Although these texts are open to differing levels of fulfillment (historical, eschatological or both), they do indicate what the final end of history will be like under the rule of God.

2.3.2. Individual Eschatological Time. Some scholars would significantly restrict the theme of life after death in the OT (which some see only in the book of Daniel), but contrary to that view, a few texts clearly speak of final destiny of individuals as transcending this earthly life. Although some texts speak in an agnostic or pessimistic manner about what happens at or after death (e.g., Ps 39:13; Eccles 3:19-21), many others speak differently. God has not yet carried out all the divine plans in history. There is a future that awaits both the righteous and the unrighteous that is qualitatively different than the present order of existence. The wicked will perish and be cut off from the presence of God (Job 27:8; Ps 22:29; 49:19-20; 73:17-20, 27; Prov 5:11). The wicked have no future ('ahārīt), and their "lamp will be put out" (Prov 24:20 [cf. Prov 13:9; 20:20]). In contrast, the righteous will be received by God after death and delivered from šē'ōl (Ps 16:10-11; 49:15; 73:24; Prov 15:24; 23:14). So then, even the book of Proverbs, known for its emphasis on this-worldly, temporal retribution, seems to speak of a future for the righteous beyond this life: "Do not let your heart envy sinners, but live in the fear of the LORD always. Surely there is a future ['ahārīt*; lit., "latter end"], and your hope will not be cut off" (Prov 23:17-18 NASB [cf. Prov 24:14]). Such texts point to a future in which, through the eternal God, people can participate in abundant and everlasting life.

2.3.3. Functions of Eschatological Time. A biblical perspective on eschatological time has several divinely ordained functions in the life of the righteous. First, it produces in the righteous, individually and corporately, hope in what God can and will do in the future. The author of Lamentations testifies to the power of remembering the faithfulness of God, as proven in past actions, to fuel hope for the future in the midst of present darkness and adversity (Lam 3:20-26, 31-33). The future hope of the righteous is not one of a Hellenistic dualism, which downgrades the goodness of life in time and materiality. Accordingly, the godly are invited to enter into the blessings of everlasting life with God even during this life.

Second, the proper hope in a coming eschatological time also produces patience and the ability to persevere through *suffering. Job manifests these qualities in an exemplary fashion, and the blessed end of his story points indirectly to the final eschatological blessings that await righteous sufferers (Job 42:11-17; cf. Jas 5:11). Accordingly, diverse writers provide ample attestation of the need to "wait on God" (or "hope in God") for his future action (Job 14:14; Ps 25:3, 5, 21; 27:14; 37:7, 9, 34; 39:9; 69:3, 7; 130:5; 147:11; Prov 20:22; Lam 3:26; cf. Ruth 3:18). Patience and endurance are crucial especially when suffering elongates time in our subjective experience (the converse of the popular notion "Time flies when you are having fun").

Third, eschatological time produces an awareness of eventual moral justice of life. Human actions will be judged and rewarded. Besides rewards and punishments in the earthly life, the outworking of retribution can be extended into future generations and into the *afterlife (see the texts cited in 2.3.1-2 above).

3. Time and Eternity.

The foregoing discussion of aspects of a biblical theology of time has left several questions unanswered. Perhaps the most important is the question of the relationship between time and eternity. Insofar as it is possible to determine, how do these writers understand eternity, and how does it relate to time in all its complexity?

3.1. “Eternity” (‘ōlām). The term ‘ōlām, used no less than 440 times in the OT, is sometimes translated “eternity” or “everlasting” (there are similar terms, but ‘ōlām is by far the most frequent and important). Its most basic meaning is “far” or “distant time,” which allows the word to be used (sometimes within construct forms) in the sense of “ancient” or “long ago” and, more commonly (over 260x in the OT), in the sense of the (distant) “future” or “forever” (Preuss, 533-36; Tomasino, NIDOTTE 3.346-50). The term cannot be used as equivalent for philosophical notions about God, such as purely timeless eternity or even unbounded time (“everlasting”). That said, some texts do use the term ‘ōlām to refer to all time, stretching backward and forward. For example, the psalms use the phrase “from everlasting to everlasting” for praise (Ps 41:13) for God’s hesed (Ps 103:17) and for God’s own existence (Ps 90:2). Whereas the first two references may be restricted to the range of human history or existence, the last reference (Ps 90:2) refers to God as everlasting or eternal in a more complete sense. Although ‘ōlām and related terms are used to refer to God and God’s activities, they also are frequently applied to human activities.

3.2. God’s Eternity and Time. There are certain questions about the nature of time and eternity that the Bible does not answer for us with precision, yet certain themes remain clear. God, as creator of heavens and earth, transcends the limitations of time that humans experience; God exists forever from the past to the future (Ps 90:2; 102:12, 26-27; 135:13). Yet as a redeemer and Lord of the heavens and earth, God is immanent in natural, historical and eschatological time. Accordingly, God’s covenant faithfulness (hesed) “endures forever” (Ps 89:2; 100:5; 106:1; 107:1; 118 [passim]; 136 [passim]), and God rules as a king forever (Ps 9:7; 10:16; 29:10; 66:7; 145:13; 146:10; Lam 5:19).

In this conjunction of transcendence and immanence, God is eternal yet closely related to time. K. Barth (621-40) describes God’s multifaceted transcendent and immanent relation to time in terms of three categories that are helpful for our thematic analysis here: the eternal God is pretemporal, supratemporal and posttemporal.

God is pretemporal as the creator of heavens and earth (Ps 90:2; 102:25; 121:2; 124:8; Prov 8:23-26). As the creator of the world and its time, God is not bound or limited by time. God does not need time to accomplish creative miracles: “For he spoke, and it was done; he commanded, and it stood fast” (Ps 33:9 NASB). After the initial act of creation, God’s ongoing relation to time is quantitatively and qualitatively different from humankind’s relation to it. God exists everlastingly, without a beginning or an end, and exists outside of time in some sense (Barth, 608-40). God is “from everlasting to everlasting” (Ps 90:2).

God is supratemporal as the sustainer, sovereign and redeemer of time. God, who transcends time and is in that respect “timeless,” is also immanent in time and positively related to time. God continually acts in time to providentially sustain the temporal structures of nature and to bring about the divine redemptive purposes, becoming voluntarily subject to the certain limits and constraints of time in the process. Yet, in other respects, God is not bound to the limits of time. It is precisely God’s transcendent eternity and constancy that prompt the psalmist to reach out to God in prayer as a trustworthy and ever-present help (e.g., Ps 90:1-2). God’s eternity enables God to be present to people in all times. Again, God experiences time differently than do human beings: “For a thousand years in your sight are like yesterday when it passes by, or as a watch in the night” (Ps 90:4 NASB [cf. Job 10:5]). The God who acts in natural and historical time is therefore neither purely timeless nor purely time-bound. (For the view that God everlastingly exists inside of the “unending duration” of the linear time that God providentially directs, see Cullmann, 62, and passim. This view stands in some contrast to the view presented here and represented by Barth.)

God is posttemporal as the consummator of all things in eschatological time (see 2.3 above).

The heavens and earth and their time will perish; “But you [God] are the same, and your years will not come to an end” (Ps 102:27 NASB). Natural time will perish along with the created heavenly bodies, but the eternal God remains fundamentally the same in and beyond creation, redemption and consummation.

3.3. Humanity and Eternity. Although human beings are emphatically limited by time, they can also participate in eternity through God’s gracious action and the proper human response to it. This is clear in several ways.

First, human life derives from eternal God, and human beings have “eternity” within them, although their final destiny may or may not be with God and his blessings. “He has also set eternity [‘ôlām] in their heart” (Eccles 3:11 NASB). Although it is impossible for human beings to comprehend eternity fully, their hearts long for it.

Second, although human life on earth is fleeting, human beings are called to enter a meaningful relationship with the Eternal One, who has entered into human life and human time to act and to save. Through a covenant relationship with the eternal God, human beings can enter into God’s constancy and eternity, for God’s covenant faithfulness and love “endures forever.” Such human participation in everlasting covenant relationship involves the enduring corporate existence of God’s people on the earth. Those who do good will “abide forever [‘ôlām],” be “preserved forever [‘ôlām]” by God, and “dwell forever [‘ôlām]” in the land (Ps 37:27-29 NASB).

Third, covenant relationship with God on earth, individual or corporate, issues in an everlasting relationship with God after this life. The godly are invited into the presence of the eternal God (see 2.3.2 above). The psalmist confesses that God upholds him and sets him in the divine presence forever (‘ôlām) (Ps 41:12-13). God therefore will be praised forever, and his redeemed and perfected people surely will participate in this. The Lord is to be blessed by his people “from this time forth and forever” (Ps 113:2; 115:18; 121:8; 131:3). The godly, therefore, have derivative eternity or everlastingness. Human eternity in the eternal God’s presence, then, is not an unaided, natural quality or capacity; rather, it is a divine gift that can be forfeited through an ungodly life or confirmed through right relationship with God.

See also ECCLESIASTES 1: BOOK OF; GOD.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. J. Barr, Biblical Words for Time (SBT 33; London: SCM, 1962); K. Barth, Church Dogmatics, vol. 2.1 (Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1957); B. S. Childs, Myth and Reality in the Old Testament (2nd ed.; SBT 27; London: SCM, 1962); O. Cullmann, Christ and Time: The Primitive Christian Conception of Time and History (rev. ed.; London: SCM, 1962); S. J. de Vries, Yesterday, Today, and Tomorrow: Time and History in the Old Testament (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1975); T. Kronholm, “עֶלְם,” TDOT 11.434-51; H. D. Preuss, “עוֹלָם,” TDOT 10.530-545; M. Sæbø, “עוֹלָם,” TDOT 6.12-32; A. Tomasino, “‘olām,” NIDOTTE 3.345-50; idem, “‘et,” NIDOTTE 3.53-67; P. A. Verhoef, “gôm,” NIDOTTE 2.419-424; idem, “Time and Eternity” NIDOTTE 4.1252-55; G. von Rad, Old Testament Theology, vol. 2 (New York: Harper & Row, 1965).

T. Prokrifka

TORAH PSALMS. See PSALMS 1: BOOK OF.

TOWER. See ARCHITECTURE.

TWO WAYS. See WISDOM THEOLOGY

TYPOLOGICAL INTERPRETATION. See HERMENEUTICS.

VANITY. See ECCLESIASTES 1: BOOK OF.

VASHTI

Vashti was the queen of King *Ahasuerus (Xerxes), whom he deposed for her refusal to appear at his request before a banquet. Her deposition opened the door for the choice of a new queen, the Jewish *Esther (Esther 2:17), who would then be in a position to avert the genocide of her people.

1. Vashti, the Deposed Queen of King Ahasuerus
2. Amestris, the Wife of Xerxes
3. Vashti in Later Jewish Tradition
4. Vashti, a Heroine against Patriarchy?

1. Vashti, the Deposed Queen of King Ahasuerus.

According to Esther 1:4, the great Persian king Ahasuerus held a banquet at *Susa for four months. He then prepared a feast for a select group in his opulently decorated palace, with an abundance of drinking taking place. Vashti, the queen, also gave a feast for the *women in the palace. But when Ahasuerus, who wanted to show off the queen's beauty to his guests, commanded her appearance, she refused (Esther 1:11-12). J. Baldwin (60) comments, "Her impertinence in refusing to appear, so humiliating the king in front of all the leaders of the realm, was predictably dangerous on her part." D. J. A. Clines (11) draws the contrast between the king's "power over his empire and his impotence to bend his wife's will."

The king's seven counselors were alarmed that her example might incite all the wives to be similarly disobedient, and they counseled the king to ban Vashti from his presence (Esther 1:19) and issue a proclamation throughout the empire that every man should be the ruler of his own house (Esther 1:22). Several commentators note the irony that the dissemination of this decree serves to publicize Vashti's disobedience throughout the empire.

T. Laniak (43 n. 26) observes, "Interestingly, Vashti is referred to as 'Queen Vashti' six times (vv. 9, 11, 12, 15, 16, 17), once as 'the queen' (v. 18) and then, in the context of the edict to banish her, she is simply 'Vashti' (v. 19). When her title is removed, she exits the plot." C. Moore (14), commenting on Esther 1, observes, "But above it all looms the fascinating figure of Xerxes, the might king, mastered by wine, defied by his queen, and ill-advised by his friends. Xerxes stands desperately in need of a good consort."

2. Amestris, the Wife of Xerxes.

Many scholars consider the depiction of Vashti as Xerxes' queen to be one of several factors that point against the historicity of Esther (e.g., Moore, xlv). According to Herodotus (Hist. 7.61) Xerxes' queen was Amestris, a very vengeful, powerful and influential woman. She was the daughter of Otanes, one of the supporters of Darius's bid for power after the usurpation of the magos Gaumata (Smerdis). After the Greeks repulsed his invasion in 479 BC, Xerxes, while staying at Sardis, was attracted first to the wife of his brother Masistes, then to their daughter Artaynte. The king gave his niece a robe, which Amestris herself had woven. When Amestris discovered this affair, she was furious but bided her time until the king's birthday. At that time Amestris made a request that the king could not refuse, which allowed her to kill Masistes' entire family (Herodotus Hist. 9.108-113). Also, in old age Amestris sacrificed seven young men and seven girls to the god of the underworld as a substitute for herself (Herodotus Hist. 7:114).

Some scholars (Wright; Shea) have suggested that by assuming certain phonetic modifications, one can identify Vashti with Amestris. W. Shea has worked out a detailed synchronism to show how the events in Esther, which has a gap between the third year (Esther 1:3) and the seventh year (Esther 2:16), can be harmonized with Xerxes' absence in Greece from 480 to 479 BC.

As to the objection that Amestris wielded power when her son Artaxerxes I came to the throne in 464 BC, Shea (240) points out that we have no surviving evidence that "Amestris was Xerxes' queen between his 7th and 12th year." Shea further suggests that if Amestris/Vashti's brutality had occurred in Susa just after Xerxes' return from the west, it would have provided the king with a further reason to find another chief wife.

Hubbard's reexamination of the passages in Herodotus concludes that Her. 7.61 actually refers to a male, that Her. 7.114 offers nothing certain regarding Amestris (c. 480 BC), and that the novelistic genre of Her. 9.108-13 casts doubt on this passage's historical reliability. He rejects the identification of Vashti with Amestris, but allows the possibility of the identification of Esther with Amestris.

3. Vashti in Later Jewish Tradition.

One talmudic rabbi maintained that Vashti refused to come because she had been smitten with leprosy (b. Meg. 12b). According to the Talmud, the wicked Vashti was the granddaughter of Nebuchadnezzar (b. Meg. 10b). The rabbis thought that she was unclad, as if "wearing the royal crown" (Esther 1:11) meant that that was all she wore. "The king ordered these seven princes to bring Queen Vashti unclad. Since she used to make Israelite girls work unclad and made them beat wood and flax for her on the Sabbath day, therefore, it was decreed upon her to be brought unclad" (Grossfeld, 35). Since Vashti also prevented the rebuilding of the temple, she was executed unclad (Grossfeld, 128).

4. Vashti, a Heroine Against Patriarchy?

F. Bush (354) comments, "Vashti's refusal to be shown off like a common concubine . . . before the tipsy hoi polloi of the Citadel of Susa reveals a sense of decorum and self-respect that places her outside of the mocking characterization that the narrator has given the rest of the royal court. She is evaluated positively."

With the emergence of *feminist interpretation in the last generation, whatever Vashti's reason for not complying with the king's command, she has become a heroine to be admired for her refusal to yield to the unreasonable demands of patriarchy. According to A. Laffey (57), "In my own interpretation, and in contrast to Esther, Vashti is truly the heroine. She risks almost certain yet unknown punishment to do what: to disobey her ba'al, her master and lord, her husband; to assert her own identity and decision-making potential; to preserve her dignity and self-respect." Clines (32) believes that the book of Esther is satire: "The emperor himself, who lives in unparalleled wealth and exercises well-nigh universal dominion, is shown up to be, at bottom, an utterly unselfconscious male chauvinist who is astonished to be worsted in the battle of the sexes when on every other front he is masterfully supreme."

See also AHASUERUS; ESTHER 2: EXTRABIBLICAL BACKGROUND; ESTHER 6: PERSON.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. J. G. Baldwin, Esther (TOTC; Leicester: Inter-Varsity Press, 1984); A. Berlin, Esther (The JPS Bible Commentary; Philadelphia: Jewish Publication Society, 2001); idem, "The Book of Esther and Ancient Storytelling," JBL 120 (2001) 3-14; F. Bush, Ruth, Esther (WBC 9; Waco, TX: Word, 1996); D. J. A. Clines, The Esther Scroll: The Story of the Story (JSOTSup 30; Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1984); A. C. Florence, "The Woman Who Just Said 'No,'" Journal for Preachers 22 (1998) 37-40; M. V. Fox, Character and Ideology in the Book of Esther (SPOT; Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 1991); B. Grossfeld, The Two Targums of Esther (The Aramaic Bible 18; Collegeville, MN: Liturgical Press, 1991); R. L. Hubbard Jr., "Vashti, Amestris and Esther 1,9," ZAW 119 (2007) 259-71; A. L. Laffey, "The Influence of Feminism on Christianity," in Daughters of Abraham: Feminist Thought in Judaism, Christianity, and Islam, ed. Y. Y. Haddad and J. L. Esposito (Gainesville: University Press of Florida, 2001) 50-64; T. S. Laniak, Shame and Honor in the Book of Esther (SBLDS 165; Atlanta: Scholars Press); C. A. Moore, Esther (AB 7B; Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1971); E. Segal, The Babylonian Esther Midrash (3 vols.; Brown Judaic Studies 291; Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1994); W. H. Shea, "Esther and History," AUSS 14 (1976) 227-46; J. S. Wright, "The Historicity of the Book of Esther," in New Perspectives on the Old Testament, ed. J. B. Payne (Waco, TX: Word, 1970) 37-47. E. Yamauchi

VIOLENCE. See WARFARE IMAGERY.

VIRTUOUS WOMAN. See PROVERBS 1: BOOK OF; WOMEN.

VOCABULARY, HEBREW. See HEBREW LANGUAGE.

W

WALL. See ARCHITECTURAL IMAGERY.

WARFARE IMAGERY

Warfare imagery within the OT wisdom, poetry and writings draws upon both practical elements of ancient warfare, such as implements of weaponry and armor, and ideological aspects of warring, such as conceptions of enemies, victory and defeat. Some of these books contain narratives that relate battle stories reminiscent of those found in the Historical Books (e.g., Esther 9:1-17), but warfare most often appears in metaphors and symbols. The images used in these metaphors and symbols can be grouped into three major clusters: (1) implements of warfare; (2) warriors and enemies (human and divine); (3) experiences of warfare (individual and communal). For contemporary readers, especially those who consider these texts to be sacred Scripture, the warfare imagery within these clusters raises additional interpretive issues.

1. Warfare Imagery
2. Interpretive Issues

1. Warfare Imagery.

1.1. Implements of Warfare. References to specific implements of war (e.g., weapons, vehicles, equipment) constitute the most basic kind of warfare imagery in the biblical texts and can function in literal and metaphorical ways. For ancient Israel, as for the ancient Near East more broadly, the weapons mentioned fall into the two main categories of offensive and defensive. Furthermore, many weapons used by humans have metaphorical counterparts that can be used by God for either assistance or punishment.

1.1.1. Offensive Weapons. Both short- and long-range offensive weapons figure regularly in the OT wisdom, poetry and writings. A list of the major weapons appears in Job 41:26-29: sword, spear, dart, javelin, arrow and club (all named as ineffective against Leviathan). Especially in the psalms offensive weapons often denote those tools of war that are surpassed by the power of trusting in God or that God has broken in order to provide victory over enemies (Ps 44:6; 76:3; 144:11). More regularly, however, weapons such as swords (the most frequently mentioned short-range weapon [see Fretz, 893]) function as metaphors for all kinds of evil perpetrated by the wicked, especially hurtful words that have the power to wound like a blade (Job 5:15; Ps 37:14; 57:4; 64:3; Prov 12:18).

The most frequent long-range weapon that appears in both literal and metaphorical capacities is the bow. In the psalms the bow occurs variously as the weapon of a hunter and a warrior, and it is often unclear which image is operative in a given text (cf. Ps 37:14; 64:3-4; see Keel, 94). Arrows often are symbols related to the destructive power of the speech of the wicked and thus appear as metaphors for the tongue (Ps 120:4) and false speech (Ps 57:4; 64:3; Prov 25:18). Because of their nature as long-range weapons, the bow and arrow function especially well as symbols of quick, unexpected and even random *destruction. Perhaps for this reason, they are primary examples of divine weapons that Yahweh is envisioned as using against individual Israelites, the nation and its enemies (Lam 2:4; 3:13; cf. Job 20:24; Ps 18:14; 21:12; 64:7; 77:17). Additionally, the bow appears in ancient Near Eastern texts such as the SA.ZI.GA incantations as a sexual innuendo connoting masculinity and virility, with a broken or loose bow used to represent the loss of these traits. This comparative background perhaps shows the claims that Yahweh has broken the bow of enemies to be a case of double-entendre asserting their failed virility and establishing Yahweh's power (see Chapman).

1.1.2. Defensive Weapons. The imagery of defense and protection abounds in the OT poetic literature. While many texts contain general protection language, some utilize specific images of fortresses, towers and citadels. Drawing on the structures used to fortify ancient cities against sieges, these images are occasionally of fortifications that Yahweh is said to have placed around *Zion (Ps 48:3, 12-13; 122:7). On most occasions, however, they are metaphors for Yahweh or his name that represent divine protection from a variety of literal and symbolic enemies (Ps 61:3; 62:2; 91:1-2; Prov 18:10).

The shield, which was the primary piece of protective equipment for the ancient warrior, is one of the most frequently used metaphors in the psalms to represent Yahweh's protection from enemies (e.g., Ps 3:3; 33:20; 115:9-11; cf. Prov 30:5). Usually made of a frame of wood or metal covered with leather, shields came in two major kinds: a smaller, normally round, shield to defend against hand-to-hand weapons, and an upright shield extending from the feet to the chin used to block projectiles such as arrows. The use of shield imagery for Yahweh also connotes a sense of intimacy as Yahweh serves as a shield-bearer who marches into battle with the individual (cf. Ps 35:1-2; see Keel, 222; Brown). Thus, the image of a shield often occurs in contexts that contain other protective images such as "rock" (Ps 18:2), as well as images that communicate Yahweh's active involvement in the conflict (Ps 7:6-13; 33:18-22). By extension, some psalms apply the image of a shield to the human king, who then stands as the symbol of protection for the people (Ps 84:9; 89:18).

1.2. Warriors and Enemies.

1.2.1. Humans as Warriors and Enemies. The OT wisdom, poetry and writings make frequent references to the actions and characteristics of ancient warriors. The ideal warrior possesses the highest levels of wisdom, strength and courage and thus is able to deliver those who are oppressed (see Ps 45:1-5; Prov 24:5). In contrast to the Historical Books, virtually all of the human warriors in the texts under discussion here are conventional or ideal figures rather than particular historical individuals. Further, these books do not normally apply warrior imagery to average Israelites. Even in the psalms that are prayers for deliverance that employ the language of being in a battle (see 1.3.1 below), the warriors are typically the nation as a whole (Ps 44; 60:9-12; 91; 149:5-9). The royal psalms portray the king (see Kingship, Psalms of), who is not identified by name, as the ideal warrior, a portrayal that is similar to the depictions of warring kings in Egyptian iconography (cf. Ps 45:3-4; 72:1-10; 110:5-6; see Sherlock, 121; Keel, 291).

Similarly, human enemies in these books are rarely identified as specific individuals. Enemies of God, persons or the nation, designated with a variety of terms (e.g., "foe," "wicked"), are sometimes mythic powers of evil and *chaos but usually take the form of a private enemy in a personal situation, a corporate enemy such as a foreign nation, or a symbolic enemy such as disease or foolishness (Keel, 78). On many occasions the psalms depict these enemies taking general actions such as lying about or oppressing the worshiper or community (Ps 13:3-4; 25:19; 31:7-8; 142:6). At other times, however, the enemies take specifically warlike actions against God's people with literal and metaphorical weapons such as swords and bows (Ps 7:1-5; 37:14-15; 120:5-7).

To add to the rhetorical force of the enemy imagery, the psalms frequently use *animal metaphors, especially of lions, to depict various enemies (Ps 7:2; 17:12; 22:13; 91:13). These metaphors draw upon ancient Near Eastern pictures in which lions are often shown crushing human prey, and they represent the psalmist's enemies as those who lie in ambush and pounce unexpectedly (Keel, 85). The use of animal metaphors may function to dehumanize the enemies and thus more easily subject them to the impersonal destruction rendered in battle (see Hobbs, 191-92). On the other hand, the use of lion imagery in particular may serve to present the enemy with the highest degree of strength and power and thus may constitute a rhetorical move that serves to invoke the deity's help (see Strawn).

1.2.2. God as Warrior and Enemy. Depictions of Yahweh as a warrior constitute the most prevalent subset of warfare imagery in the OT wisdom, poetry and writings. The nature, variety and significance of this imagery have received much scholarly attention (see Schwally; Fredriksson; von Rad; Longman and Reid; Miller; Craigie; Sherlock; Lind). The most relevant texts to consider are those that go beyond simply describing Yahweh as giving victory or possessing weapons and assert that he is actually involved in the fighting in some way. Such imagery finds its roots in some of the earliest poetry connected with the exodus from Egypt, which envisions Yahweh as a warrior on Israel's behalf (e.g., Ex 15:3; cf. Ps 106:10-11; 135:10-12; see Miller). This general imagery is also connected with the practices that have come to be called "holy war," especially as reflected in Deuteronomy and Joshua (see von Rad; Schwally; Longman and Reid, 32-47). Although its exact nature and origins remain debated, "holy war" denotes a bundle of diverse practices that center on the idea of warfare as a sacred event, enacted by God alone through miracle or by human armies on behalf of God, and often involving the complete slaughter of enemy peoples as an act of devotion to the deity. Both the imagery of a god who fights as a warrior and the various conceptions of holy war are ancient ideas shared by Israel's neighbors throughout the ancient Near East (see Weippert). A ninth-century BC inscription from King Mesha of Moab (cf. 2 Kings 3:4-5), for example, describes the slaughter of Israelites at Nebo undertaken as an act of devotion to the Moabite god (see COS 2.23:138).

Within the OT wisdom, poetry and writings the primary manifestation of the divine warrior is Yahweh fighting against Israel's enemies. This imagery takes several forms (see von Rad, 11; Niditch, 1): (1) Yahweh fighting alone, sometimes by miracle without any physical means and other times by using weapons (Ps 7:12-13; 17:13-14; 35:1-3; 59:11-12; 64:7); (2) Yahweh using elements of nature such as fire, lightning and hail as weapons to fight Israel's battles (Ps 18:12-19; 68:8-10; 83:13-18; 97:3-5); (3) Yahweh leading a divine army of heavenly beings to fight Israel's battles (Ps 34:7; cf. 2 Kings 6:8-23), an image represented by the divine title yhwh šēbā'ōt ("LORD of Hosts"), which literally translates "LORD of armies" (e.g., Ps 24:10); (4) Yahweh serving explicitly or implicitly as the commander of Israel's army as it goes into war (Ps 18:34; 44:9; 60:10; 124:2-3).

The image of the divine warrior is, however, a two-sided one: Yahweh also appears as an enemy who fights against Israel (see Sherlock; Longman and Reid). Such imagery often relates particularly to the exile of 586 BC. The book of *Lamentations, for example, uses explicit military language to describe Yahweh's role in Jerusalem's destruction: "The LORD has become like an enemy; he has destroyed Israel . . . he has made the enemy rejoice over you" (Lam 2:5, 17 NRSV). Likewise, the communal *lament psalms give expression to this imagery following defeat in battle (Ps 60:1, 10; 80; 89), and the speeches of *Job personalize the imagery of Yahweh as enemy (Job 9:17-18; 16:12-14; 19:11-12; cf. Ps 38:1-8).

By using the imagery of Yahweh as a divine warrior, these texts recast the community's military victories as gifts rather than accomplishments achieved by its own might. Yet this imagery also proclaims that Yahweh's character may manifest itself in judgment against Israel. Thus, the imagery redefines the conflicts of individuals and the nation as larger conflicts in which Yahweh is involved, and some psalms can assert that Yahweh's destructive actions have the goal of bringing an end to war (Ps 46:9; 76:1-3).

1.3. Experiences of Warfare. The third cluster of warfare imagery draws upon diverse experiences of war known to individuals and communities, experiences that include different types of battle situations, the realities of triumph and defeat, and communal practices in and theological reflections upon conflict.

1.3.1. Battle Imagery. Both the psalms and the Wisdom literature use imagery of battles in literal depictions of historical conflicts and metaphorical representations of various kinds of personal, psychological and theological struggles. For example, the language of several psalms calls for God to "arise" (qūm [e.g., Ps 3:7; 7:6; 9:19; 68:1]), a term that commonly appears with military connotations throughout the OT (cf. Josh 7:13; Judg 4:14; see Sherlock, 128-29). Battle imagery depicting historical conflicts can describe the participation of the nation, the king or an individual. Psalm 149:6-7, for instance, offers a prayer for Israel's warriors in preparation for battle: "Let the high praises of God be in their throats and two-edged swords in their hands" (NRSV [cf. Ps 48:3-8; 76:1-6; 91:1-7]). Especially in the Wisdom literature, however, battle imagery functions metaphorically to describe struggles with hostile neighbors and wicked actions (Prov 1:10-19; 11:11-14; 12:6). Battle imagery also provides a ready comparison to assert the superiority of wisdom. Ecclesiastes 9:13-18, for example, offers the parable of a small city able to withstand the onslaught of a mighty king because of one wise individual (cf. Prov 21:22).

The imagery used in these texts draws upon various kinds of battles. Job 1 attributes the death of Job's servants and family to plundering raids by groups of Sabeans and Chaldeans. Other texts use the imagery of open-terrain battles in which rows of spearmen and archers engaged in hand-to-hand combat (Ps 35:1-3; 91:7). Most regularly, however, the texts use the imagery of siege warfare. Siege warfare was brutal; it involved the building of a siege wall and siege ramps around a city, the cutting off of food and water for the inhabitants, and the subsequent impaling and mutilation of captured citizens. Assyrian reliefs frequently depict siege warfare, which was a common practice in the ancient Near East (see Keel). The lament psalms in particular often use the imagery of a siege to describe the actions of national and personal enemies (Ps 22:12-22; 27:3-9; 74:1-8; 79:1-3), and Lamentations 3—4 employs the horrors of siege warfare to depict what Zion has suffered at the hands of Yahweh.

1.3.2. Triumph and Defeat. Individual, royal and communal psalms employ the language of triumph to celebrate both military victories over corporate enemies and personal deliverance from metaphorical enemies such as neighbors and illnesses (Ps 92:10-11; 118:10-18). The most characteristic images of triumph in these texts are references to seizing, subduing, striking or crushing enemies (e.g., Ps 47:3; 68:21), references paralleled in ancient Near Eastern texts and iconography from Assyria and Egypt that represent kings striking down enemies and placing them under their feet (Keel, 9).

The imagery of defeat also functions on both the national and personal level. This imagery especially employs the language of victimization, presenting individuals and the nation as victims, innocent or otherwise, of war-like actions (Ps 59; 74; 143:3). The most explicit examples of defeat imagery are in the communal lament psalms and the book of Lamentations, both of which emphasize the aspect of Israel *suffering at the hands of Yahweh (see 1.2.2 above), a notion echoed in other ancient Near Eastern texts in which a deity fights against his or her own people. More specifically, the major types of defeat envisioned in these texts include Yahweh refusing to go out with Israel's armies and thus ensuring their defeat (Ps 44:9; 60:10), Yahweh delivering individuals or the nation into the hands of an enemy as punishment (Ps 78:62-64; 79:1-5; Lam 1:5), and Yahweh himself striking Israel (Ps 89:38-45; Lam 2) (see Lind, 110).

Just as some "divine warrior" texts attribute Israel's victories to Yahweh, by involving Yahweh directly in every defeat, these poetic texts assert that Israel's negative experiences do not represent a failure or defeat of Yahweh himself. Against an ancient Near Eastern background that often interpreted a nation's military defeat as the conquering of its deity by a stronger deity, these texts daringly assert that Yahweh remains sovereign over everything that befalls his people (but see, e.g., Is 40:27). Even while Yahweh remains sovereign, however, the same communal lament psalms that describe Israel's suffering often emphasize that Yahweh suffers the effects of the nation's defeat through violence and ridicule, since the destruction has befallen his temple, his people and his name (cf. Ps 74:7, 18; 79:10; see Keel, 100; Fretheim).

1.3.3. Communal Practices and Reflections. The language of many of the communal and royal psalms fits well with the community's experiences during different stages of military conflict. These psalms find parallels in ancient Near Eastern texts that describe religious rituals such as the seeking of oracles from priests and sacrifices to various gods connected with the preparation, conduct and aftermath of war (Craigie, 117). For example, the calls for Yahweh to "arise" and the admonitions for warriors to carry the praises of God into battle (e.g., Ps 7:6; 149:6-7) may have served as liturgical preparations before a military campaign. Psalms that emphasize the dangers faced by warriors and pray for their protection (e.g., Ps 91) may have functioned liturgically during the course of military campaigns.

The conclusion and aftermath of battles especially seem to have occasioned liturgies that reflected upon the experiences of warfare. Probably because of the conviction that Yahweh participated in battle on Israel's behalf, the experience of success in war generated praise. Psalm 124, for instance, is a communal psalm of *thanksgiving that attributes national victory over enemies to Yahweh's presence with Israel, and Psalm 18 is a lengthy royal thanksgiving in which the king praises Yahweh for granting him victory and vengeance (cf. Ps 21). Conversely, several psalms represent national laments after the experience of failure in battle, compositions likely employed in communal rituals of repentance and supplication (Pss 44; 60; 80). The book of Lamentations, with its references to symbols of mourning such as dust and sackcloth (Lam 2:10), may likewise have functioned in rituals reflecting upon the destruction of Jerusalem.

The so-called *imprecatory psalms also give expression to and reflect upon the experiences of warfare, especially the suffering and humiliation associated with defeat at the hands of historical enemies. The major psalms of this genre (Pss 7; 35; 58; 59; 69; 83; 109; 137; 140) are prayers to God that call for divine violence against enemies and give expression to the human longing for revenge. Although the language and imagery of these psalms may raise moral and theological problems for modern readers (see 2.2-3 below), they serve a rhetorical function similar to that of the texts that attribute Israel's military defeats to Yahweh. By calling upon Yahweh to exact revenge, the imprecatory psalms effectively assert that Yahweh has not been conquered and remains sovereign. Additionally, the brutality and revenge in these psalms remain at the level of prayer and do not become actions carried out by the supplicants. Hence, they represent a theological response to war that expresses yet transfers the vengeance and violence to the divine prerogative.

The overall form and imagery of the book of Lamentations also represent an expression of and theological reflection upon the experiences of defeat and suffering in war. The book's poems share the characteristic of a personalized, weeping voice, at times the voice of the city of Zion personified as a widowed female (Lam 1:1, 16). This tone and content are similar to the ancient Near Eastern "city laments," Mesopotamian texts that depict and lament, often through the words of a weeping goddess, the destruction of major cities and their shrines (see Dobbs-Allsopp, 1-10) (see Lamentations 2: Ancient Near Eastern Background). Such city laments make the theological assertion that the city's defeat is the result of divine decision and thereby resist the conclusion that the city's god has been defeated. Thus, this theological response leaves Yahweh's sovereignty in place but gives sheer expression to the grief associated with destruction, a grief that even leads the poet to question whether Yahweh has gone overboard in a punishment that exceeded what was warranted (cf. Lam 4:6; see Fretheim).

2. Interpretive Issues.

The imagery clusters described above, especially the ways that they embed conceptions of warfare and violence within theological reflections upon God and humanity, raise some interpretive issues for contemporary readers, particularly those who see these texts as sacred, authoritative Scripture. Although a full analysis cannot be offered here, we may identify some lingering questions.

2.1. The Uniqueness of the Old Testament. The similarities between Israel's warring rhetoric and actions described in the OT and those of their ancient Near Eastern neighbors depicted in extrabiblical texts and reliefs may raise the question of the special status of the OT. As we noted earlier, military imagery in the OT consistently appears with similar theological aspects and claims to the imagery in ancient Near Eastern texts and art (see Weippert). Interpreters thus are left to wrestle with the question of whether and how Israel's warring activities were different from those of their neighbors, and how, if at all, the OT's similarity to its environment affects its special status for Jewish and Christian communities (see Craigie; Hobbs; Longman and Reid). For some, the OT's uniqueness is directly tied to its authority and thus is something to be established. For others, the very lack of uniqueness, which demonstrates that the OT writers used warfare imagery because of their own cultural context, aids in explaining the texts' violent portrayals of God and humans that may raise ethical difficulties.

2.2. The Ethics of Divine and Human Violence. Beyond the question of comparison, warfare imagery in which God demonstrates and sanctions the most violent types of activities raises some general ethical difficulties for modern interpreters. Biblical texts clearly attest the devastating effects of God's actions on women, children and the environment (e.g., Lam 2:19-21; 4:4; 5:11), and these depictions have been used to justify human violence (Fretheim, 366). Even though contemporary readers can place the OT's warfare imagery into its historical and comparative context, the canonized rhetoric of war can have destructive, even if subconscious, effects on peoples and cultures. Christian readers may also find it difficult to reconcile the OT images of God as warrior with some characterizations of God in the NT and may be tempted to dismiss the OT as less revelatory for Christian faith and practice. It is sometimes equally difficult, however, to reconcile the war imagery with some other traditions within the OT itself, traditions that emphasize peace and peacemaking (Sherlock, x) or express discomfort with and offer limitations on war (see Niditch).

Options abound for dealing with the *ethics of divine and human violence in the OT (see Collins). Perhaps one should “spiritualize” or allegorize the imagery into spiritual warfare against evil or sin (Stone). Perhaps interpreters should emphasize that the imagery establishes divine sovereignty and evokes human dependence by asserting that human armies achieve victory or suffer defeat only as allowed by God (Miller). Perhaps readers should see the imagery as a gracious sign that God condescends to participate in human, albeit sinful, historical experiences for the sake of redemption, even as one wishes that the chosen experiences were poetry or beauty rather than war (Craigie; cf. Hobbs). Maybe such imagery is necessary for communities such as ancient Israel that are marginal and incapable of fending off powerful forces to achieve liberation (Brueggemann; Sherlock).

Whatever the eventual outcome, any consideration of the warfare imagery should probably begin by emphasizing the diversity within the OT that in some way relativizes the emphasis on war and violence, a diversity that includes concern for foreigners and slaves in Deuteronomy and the notion of vicarious suffering in Isaiah. Even within the OT’s multiple war ideologies there is a significant tradition that stresses warfare through miracle only, and this may have given rise to an ideology of nonparticipation (Niditch; Lind). This type of diversity likely demands a variety of ethical approaches by readers in various contexts.

2.3. The Sexualization of Warfare Imagery.

Along with devastating effects on combatants, children and the environment, warfare imagery in biblical and nonbiblical texts particularly involves portrayals of *women and language of female sexuality (see Chapman). Victory is associated with masculine imagery, and defeat with feminine imagery. Assyrian inscriptions and reliefs, for example, consistently depict Assyrian kings with masculine titles and images but symbolize defeated peoples as vulnerable women and prostitutes (Chapman). The OT maintains this same connection between warfare imagery and gendered language by applying royal and masculine imagery to God and by using feminine metaphors (virgin, harlot, adulteress) to symbolize capital cities such as Samaria and Jerusalem (Kelle). Further, particularly in contexts of warfare, texts such as Lamentations use metaphors of physical and sexual violence against women, especially rape and dismemberment, to describe the destruction of cities (see Lam 1:9-10; Ezek 16; 23; Hos 2; Nah 3:5-7). Such imagery functions theologically in these texts to preserve Yahweh’s *honor even when his capital was destroyed, by fixing the blame not upon a failure of the deity’s power but rather upon the unfaithfulness of the personified woman/city (Chapman, 65).

At its most basic level, the OT’s use of such imagery is a cultural phenomenon. In Israel’s environment war itself was a gendered activity in which men primarily did the fighting. Even so, such gendered imagery can shape the way contemporary readers conceive of gender and power and has the potential to solidify gender biases and justify male domination. Interpreters thus are left to seek ways to appreciate the power of such imagery for biblical writers and ancient contexts while considering its broader implications. Perhaps an initial move of approaching such feminine metaphors through ancient rhetorical contexts and conventions can simultaneously illuminate the origins of the imagery, demonstrate how particular metaphors function within rhetorical discourses, and expose less apparent assumptions upon which such imagery rests (see Kelle). Various approaches to this initial task may unlock the transcendent power of the gendered metaphors without ignoring their inherent dangers (see Feminist Interpretation).

See also CHAOS AND DEATH; DESTRUCTION; IMPRISONMENT; GOD; SALVATION AND DELIVERANCE IMAGERY; THEOPHANY.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. W. P. Brown, Seeing the Psalms: A Theology of Metaphor (Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 2002); W. Brueggemann, Theology of the Old Testament: Testimony, Dispute, Advocacy (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1997); C. R. Chapman, The Gendered Language of Warfare in the Israelite-Assyrian Encounter (HSM 62; Winona Lake, IN: Eisenbrauns, 2004); J. J. Collins, “The Zeal of Phinehas: The Bible and the Legitimation of Violence,” JBL 122 (2003) 3-21; P. C. Craigie, The Problem of War in the Old Testament (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1978); F. W. Dobbs-Allsopp, Weep, O Daughter of Zion: A Study of the City-Lament Genre in the Hebrew Bible (BibOr 44; Rome: Pontifical Biblical Institute, 1993); H. Fredriksson, Jahwe als Krieger: Studien zum alttestamentlichen Gottesbild (Lund: Gleerup, 1945); T. E. Fretheim, “‘I Was Only a Little Angry’: Divine Violence in the Prophets,” Int 58 (2004) 365-75; M. J. Fretz, “Weapons and Implements of War,” ABD 6.893-95; T. R. Hobbs, A Time for War: A Study of Warfare in the Old Testament (OTS 3; Wilmington, DE: Michael Glazier, 1989); O. Keel, The Symbolism of the Biblical World: Ancient Near Eastern Iconography and the Book of Psalms (Winona Lake, IN: Eisenbrauns, 1997); B. E. Kelle, Hosea 2: Metaphor and Rhetoric in Historical Perspective (SBLAB 20; Atlanta: Society of Biblical Literature Press, 2005); M. C. Lind, Yahweh Is a Warrior: The Theology of Warfare in Ancient Israel (Scottsdale, PA: Herald, 1980); T. Longman III and D. G. Reid, God Is a Warrior (SOTBT; Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1995); P. D. Miller Jr., The Divine Warrior in Early Israel (HSM 5; Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1973); S. Niditch, War in the Hebrew Bible: A Study in the Ethics of Violence (New York: Oxford University Press, 1993); F. Schwally, Der heilige Krieg im alten Israel (Leipzig: Dietrich, 1901); C. Sherlock, The God Who Fights: The War Tradition in Holy Scripture (RSCT 6; Lewiston, NY: Edwin Mellen, 1993); L. G. Stone, “Ethical and Apologetic Tendencies in the Redaction of the Book of Joshua,” CBQ 53 (1991) 25-35; B. A. Strawn, What Is Stronger Than a Lion? Leonine Image and Metaphor in the Hebrew Bible and the Ancient Near East (OBO 212; Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 2005); G. von Rad, Holy War in Ancient Israel (Eugene, OR: Wipf & Stock, 2000); M. Weippert, “‘Heiligerkrieg’ in Israel und Assyrian,” ZAW 84 (1972) 460-93. B. E. Kelle

WASF

The wasf is a poetic form that is found in a number of places in the Bible, but most notably in the Song of Songs. Using the wasf form, the boy and girl both express their love by describing how the other's body affects them.

1. Description of the Wasf Genre
2. How to Read a Wasf
3. Specific Examples of the Wasf
4. Biblical Wasfs Outside Song of Songs
5. Extrabiblical Descriptions

1. Description of the Wasf Genre.

1.1. Introduction to the Term Wasf. Recounting the memoirs of J. G. Wetzstein, F. Delitzsch describes in his commentary on *Song of Songs the marriage rituals of the Nawâ people, a town in the Batanian plain, which he recorded in 1860. Part of the wedding ceremony is a memorized description of the bride. This detailed recitation is called in Arabic a wasf. Delitzsch (175) includes a sample of the genre:

Her nose is like the date of Irâk, the edge of the Indian sword;

Her face is like the full moon, and heart-breaking are her cheeks.

Her mouth is a little crystal ring, and her teeth are rows of pearls,
And her tongue scatters pearls; and, ah me, how beautiful her lips!

. . .

Her neck is like the neck of the roe which drinks out of the fountain of Kanawât.

Her breast like polished marble tablets, as ships bring them to Sidon.

Thereon like apples of the pomegranate two glittering piles of jewels.

Her arms are drawn swords, peeled cucumbers—oh that I had such!

And incomparably beautiful her hands in the rose-red of the Hinnâ-leaf;

Her smooth, fine fingers are like the writing reed not yet cut;

The glance of her nails like the Dura-seeds which have lain overnight in milk;

Her body is a mass of cotton wool which a master's hand has shaken into down,

And her legs marble pillars in the sacred house of the Omajads.

The similarity between this example of traditional poetry and some portions of the Bible are striking. Due to this generic affinity, since the mid-nineteenth century such poems in the Bible have been called wasfs. Other terms are also used for the genre, such as simply a “descriptive song” (Murphy, 418).

1.2. Song of Songs. There are four wasfs in Song of Songs, three describing the young lady (Song 4:1-7; 6:4-7; 7:1-10), and one her spectacular man (Song 5:10-16). Two of the wasfs in Song of Songs are full-body descriptions (one of the man, one of the woman), and the other two are partial descriptions that invoke the whole body. A wasf may be observed also in Ezekiel 16:10-13, where Yahweh describes the ornamentation of his beloved Israel in leather and silk, expecting passion in return. There the description proceeds from toe to head as in Song of Songs 7:1-10. As there, it is also sexually charged (Ezek 16:15-34).

Because modern-day Middle Eastern weddings use the wasf form, older scholarship tended to read Song of Songs as exemplary of traditional nuptials. But R. Murphy (419) nicely summarizes a later consensus: "There is no one life-setting for this kind of description; all that is necessary is love and admiration on the part of a lover." Since it is unclear how ancient the modern wedding elements really are, and since some ancient texts have been discovered with close affinity to Song of Songs—some as old as *Solomon—scholarship has tended to move away from reading Song of Songs as comprising material drawn from matrimony.

2. How to Read a Wasf.

The repetition of various portions of wasfs are labeled "beauty refrains" by M. Deckers (178)—refrains sung by one lover in praise of the other. Partly on the basis of these refrains, critics have attempted to prioritize the wasfs in Song of Songs, seeking to determine which came first, and which are derived from the others. This kind of analysis results in labeling some portions of wasfs "authentic" and considering others derivative (Angénieux, 587). This approach does not aid the interpreter in reading the material at hand. What follows below is a discussion of more helpful approaches to discern meaning in the wasf genre.

2.1. Statement of the Problem. If the wasf were easy to understand, it would not have attracted so much scholarly attention. But the genre has proven to be a conundrum. This is because the points of comparison made in the poems seem bizarre and absurd. In the biblical wasf each body part is sequentially compared with something from daily life that reminds the lover of the beloved. The features actually being compared are often difficult to identify, and at first glance the comparisons seem grotesque or comedic. For example, Song of Songs 7:4 compares the Shulamite's nose to the "tower of Lebanon." Immediately, the reader imagines a Pinocchio-like nose, making the girl a fitting consort for Cyrano de Bergerac. However, this is found in an erotic celebration of the lady, and one must seek to find other points of comparison (in this case, perhaps her nose, or her face, is likened to a military outpost, the point being that this damsel is formidable and not to be approached lightly).

Various methods have been employed to explicate the dense barrage of confounding imagery one encounters in Song of Songs. In the mid-twentieth century a literalistic hermeneutic was attempted, the results being rather unsatisfactory. Some interpreters have continued to seek meaning in the admittedly disturbing connotations and have drawn negative conclusions. A more refined interpretative scheme is reviewed below in counterpoint to the literalistic/negative one.

2.2. The Literalistic/Negative Method. One approach to the wasf is to read it with the sensibilities and poetic appreciation of the modern audience. In other words, modern readers find the associations funny or monstrous, and, therefore, so did the ancient audience. "That the girl's neck is like an armed fortress . . . is a plainly ludicrous image, and the author's contemporaries would scarcely have had any other impression of it" (Waterman, 38).

L. Waterman, for example, reads Song of Songs as motivated by hatred for Solomon among those in the northern tribes that suffered much under his poor administration. Thus, for example, in Song of Songs 4:2 "not a tooth is lacking" means no more than "you have good teeth," hardly a "remark for a suitor to make to a young woman who is his prospective bride" (Waterman, 37). "The first requirement of Song of Songs was the humiliation of Solomon, which was accomplished in the rebuff administered by a humble peasant girl from the North" (Waterman, 38-39). J. Whedbee (267) calls Song of Songs 3:7-11 "a parody of a royal processional . . . whose rhetoric is designed to satirize an ostentatious display of royal pomp."

M. Segal likewise takes a literalistic approach to the wasf: "Only as playful banter can be rationally explained the grotesque description by the lover to the damsel. . . . Pure fun is also the lover's offer to take the damsel to the high mountain tops of the Lebanon in order to frighten the little girl with the horrid lions in their dens and the tigers" (Segal, 480).

F. Black experiments with using the "grotesque" as a hermeneutical grid, and she remarks, "Three of the detailed body descriptions pertain to the woman, and these may be conflated to create a fuller picture of a creature who is ill-proportioned, odd-looking and impossible. A giant, her head is as massive as Mt. Carmel. Her hair is described as a flock of goats, and, alternately, as purple threads. Her neck, a mere tower built by human hands, should snap under Carmel's weight. And the tower which is her nose juts out awkwardly and unbalances" (Black 2000, 311).

In Black's reading of Song of Songs the wasf genre serves both to attract and to repulse, to throw the reader off balance and disorient. She demonstrates one way that a literalistic reading strategy leads to a negative reaction. The wasf's imagery has also been understood as casting aspersions or mockery. For example, A. Brenner (1992, 115) reads the final wasf of Song of Songs as "a parody of the wasf genre, a humorously critical and sometimes ambiguous appraisal of the dancing woman." Brenner argues that the wasf moves from foot to head (reverse order from others in Song of Songs), and she emends the text to compare the girl in Song of Songs 7:5 to the Ammonite capital, concluding that the association would have evoked ambivalent or negative feelings. She also notes the poem's immodesty. (Of course, the wasf of Ezekiel 16:10-13 also moves upwards and is surely not meant to disparage Israel's beauty, and the man's description is just as immodest.)

Scholars also take issue with the lone description of the man in Song of Songs 5:10-16. F. Landy calls this wasf "stiff and tense," and, except for the face, it is "coldly metallic and disjointed" (Landy 71, 80). However, the lady concludes the poem, "He is altogether desirable" (Song 5:16 RSV).

2.3. Toward a Better Hermeneutic. The opposite extreme from Waterman is represented by R. Soulen, who suggests that the image presented in the wasf has nothing to do with what the girl looks like and associates emotions rather than appearances: "Interpretation is most correct which sees the imagery of the wasf as a means of arousing emotions consonant with those experienced by the suitor as he beholds the fullness of his beloved's attributes" (189). Thus, the positive feelings that the poet experiences while looking at, for example, a mountain range, are consonant with the good sensations felt while gazing upon her head (Song 7:5).

The difficulty with this approach is that the associations in the wasf are then arbitrary. Instead of comparing eyes with doves and hair with a flock of goats (Song 4:1), the poet might just as well have compared hair with doves and eyes with goats (Murphy, 420). Often, the images in the wasf do in fact seem to be particularly associated with their referents: "The poet does lead us to expect some sensory correspondence between the images and their referents" (Fox 1983, 226).

A better approach is to recognize that the associations often are not about what the beloved looks like but rather treat senses and qualities other than sight. For example, C. Meyers (217-19) finds a group of militaristic and architectural images employed to describe Song of Songs; these images convey not how the woman appears to the eye but rather attributes such as power, danger, strength, might and aggression. Comparing lips to lilies might highlight the sense of smell (Falk 1982, 81).

Because the associations are not obvious, the reader is forced to slow down, read carefully and closely, savoring each bodily characteristic while searching for the often-odd point of comparison. Often in the wasf equivalences are not obvious and thus necessitate careful meditation. One is forced to relish the details of the beloved, thus engaging and entering into the experience of erotic love espoused in the lyric.

2.4. Gendered Descriptions. C. Exum observes differences between how the girl describes the boy and how he describes her. Her description of him (Song 5:10-16) "is more relational than his" (Exum, 21). "An important difference between the woman's description of the man and his descriptions of her is that she speaks of him as 'he,' whereas he addresses her as 'you.' She describes him to the women of Jerusalem, the audience within the poem, rather than addressing him directly" (Exum, 203).

It is only in the context of the company of Jerusalem's women that the girl "conjures" her man in the description. She describes him from memory in answer to a question—it is a way to deal with his absence. On the other hand, when the boy speaks, he is spontaneously moved when gazing upon her to cry out her glorious description—it is a way "to cope with her devastating presence" (Exum, 21). Exum (22) analyzes the phenomenon as follows:

A cultural notion of woman as other may have some bearing on the different status the woman and the man have with respect to the gaze. On the basis of what we can construct from the rest of the Bible, in ancient Israel the male body was considered the norm. It is not therefore an occasion for anxiety. The female body is the other, mysterious, and thus provokes a more complex response. What is often described as the more static nature of the woman's description of the man may be due to a reticence to describe the male body any more explicitly. Thus the man's descriptions are more visual, whereas hers are relational.

Exum's analysis is mitigated somewhat in the woman's self-description of lovesickness when in his presence (Song 2:4-6). Her description of the man is larger than life; he is "dazzling" or "radiant" in Song of Songs 5:10. She chooses "blood red" rather than "ruddy" in that verse, a bright, golden, spectacular and almost theophanic image (see Rev 1:13-16). In her mind, his body is anything but ordinary.

3. Specific Examples of the Wasf.

3.1. Song of Songs 4:1-5. As an example of the difficulty of interpreting the wasf genre, five verses are analyzed below, in a loose translation of Song of Songs 4:1-5 (Schwab 1997, 10).

You are beautiful, my love, you are beautiful!
 Your eyes are doves behind your veil.
 Your hair—a flock of goats, sauntering down the valley.
 Your teeth—a flock of sheep rising from their washing, each with its twin.
 Your lips—ruby red, and your mouth is delightful.
 Your open mouth—a succulent pomegranate behind your veil.
 Your neck—the tower of David, hung about with a thousand warriors' shields.
 Your two breasts—two fawns, twins of a gazelle, that graze among the lilies.

The reader is at once confronted with this odd equation: her eyes are doves. The first impulse of the modern reader is to imagine that her eyes look like doves—a literalistic interpretation. Doves are white, eyes are white. It has been suggested that birds and eyes in Egyptian hieroglyphs have a similar shape (see Soulen, 187).

However, the comparison probably includes elements other than how they look; in fact, their appearance may not be the equivalence at all. Perhaps a dove's flapping wings remind him of her eyelashes. If the dove is a symbol for innocence or purity, then the association invokes her sexual fidelity (Dillow, 29). The text is not simply describing her appearance but rather, more importantly, how the man sees her. It may be called "imputed beauty"—beauty in the eye of the beholder, seen not only when he gazes upon her but also in her reflection throughout all of creation.

The next image compares her hair to goats "sauntering down the valley." One may imagine a flock of jet-black goats, streaming down a hillside. They might appear as one large composite, a covering of thick hair all in motion, rippling and appearing to toss about in the wind. Such a sight causes the shepherd to think of his beloved.

"Your teeth—a flock of sheep rising from their washing, each with its twin." Again from the vantage point of the slope, another sight graces the shepherd's senses, causing him to see his beloved's smile reflected in the countryside. Below, down the hill, is a pond from which a flock of white sheep is drinking. Each animal is reflected in the water ("each with its twin"), creating the illusion of a double row of white curved into a smile (Falk 1993, 230).

Everywhere the man goes, and throughout his day, he is reminded of the beautiful face of the one he loves. Yet not all of the images in the wasf necessarily reflect how she appears. The next verses seem to invoke more the senses than sight. Her mouth is a "succulent pomegranate." This probably is a reference to its taste and juiciness. His enjoyment of her mouth is not simply in the looking; it involves the sense organs of tongue, lips and palate.

Her neck is compared with the tower of David, bristling with military defenses. Although the lady might be wearing a necklace, the leading metaphor is warlike—she is intimidating and dangerous, and is best approached with caution. This imagery is similar to Song of Songs 8:10: "I was a wall, and my breasts were like towers" (RSV). There, her breasts being like towers equals herself being a wall: she was impregnable, closed to all suitors, until the day she was spoken for (Song 8:8). This formidable lady's breasts were off-limits, as was her neck and the rest of her.

Perhaps the oddest image found in the wasf genre is this: “Your two breasts—two fawns, twins of a gazelle, that graze among the lilies.” Obviously, her breasts do not appear as gazelles. What, then, is the point of comparison? Surely not smell or taste. Maybe the association is their softness, or perhaps light brown color. Might their distinctive stotting motion bring her to mind when the shepherd observed gazelles gracefully bounding?

3.2. Song of Songs 7:1-5. Note that Song of Songs 4:1-5 traced the girl’s figure from the head downwards in a straight line. This is important to keep in mind when the Hebrew is obscure and the reader must guess what body part is being highlighted. For example, consider another five verses, Song of Songs 7:1-5 (Schwab 1997, 12):

O princess, your steps are elegant in your dancing shoes,
Your curved thighs are like hand crafted jewels.
Your “navel”—a rounded vessel full of wine.
Your pubes—a mound of wheat, encircled with lilies.
Your breasts—two fawns, twins of a gazelle.
Your neck—an ivory tower.
Your eyes—pools by the city gate.
Your nose—a pinnacle overlooking the frontier.
Your head—a glorious mountain.
Your hair—deepest purple, captivating the king in its locks.

This wasf (like Ezek 16:10-13) vectors from feet to head, the opposite direction from the other three wasfs in Song of Songs. Her sculpted legs are anatomically perfect, like the perfect work of an artist. Working upward, the translator is challenged by two terms. First, there is the so-called navel. The Hebrew word in question occurs once in the Bible, and although its meaning may be inferred from similar words found elsewhere, the primary method to determine its meaning is its immediate context here: a body part in a straight line, something between the thighs and the “belly” that is a moist vessel. The belly button is not in line and thus should be disqualified. It is probably her vulva; her intoxicating and pungent vaginal moisture is her “wine.”

Continuing in a straight line, we encounter the next item, often translated “belly,” “a mound of wheat, encircled with lilies.” But the Hebrew word behind it (beten) usually depicts internal organs, such as “womb.” The only “mound” that sports soft feathery ornamentation (“lilies”) is the pubes or mons veneris (“Mount of Venus”). It is interesting that the man is called a gazelle that “grazes among the lilies” (Song 6:3). Of course, her two breasts also do the same (Song 4:5), suggesting that the image of lilies has multiple referents. The gazelle also has multiple referents, depicting both his sexual enthusiasm for her and the aspect of her appearance that so arouses him.

4. Biblical Wasfs Outside Song of Songs.

Full-body descriptions of a man or woman are rarely found outside Song of Songs. Nebuchadnezzar’s dream (Dan 2) is one, and it includes elements similar to Song of Songs 5:10-16.

Another is Ezekiel 16:10-13:

I clothed you also with embroidered cloth and shod you with leather,
I swathed you in fine linen and covered you with silk.
And I decked you with ornaments, and put bracelets on your arms,
and a chain on your neck.
And I put a ring on your nose,
and earrings in your ears,
and a beautiful crown upon your head.
Thus you were decked with gold and silver; and your raiment was of fine linen, and silk, and embroidered cloth;
you ate fine flour and honey and oil.
You grew exceedingly beautiful, and came to regal estate. (RSV)

“Shod” with leather is a reference to her feet. From this, the wasf quickly ascends upwards to her face, where most of the description occurs (like Song 5:10-16). The point again is to highlight the beauty and desirability of the lady. In this description, however, rather than presenting the reader with objects of comparison, the writer puts forward her fine clothing. The symbolism is just as acutely present, however. This is so because unlike Song of Songs, the woman in Ezekiel is not an actual flesh-and-blood female but rather is a representation of the nation Israel. Her marriage covenant is the Mosaic covenant. The flour, honey and oil were Israel’s

Table 1: Chester Beatty I A, 31 and Song of Songs

Chester Beatty I A, 31	Song of Songs
One alone is (my) sister, having no peer	6:9	My dove, my perfect one, is only one
Behold her, like Sothis rising At the beginning of a good year: Shining, precious, white of skin	6:10	Who is this that looks forth like the dawn, fair as the moon, bright as the sun
Lovely of eyes when gazing	6:5	Turn away your eyes from me, for they disturb me
Long of neck	7:4	Your neck is like an ivory tower
Her hair true lapis lazuli	7:5	Your flowing locks are like purple
Full (her) derrière, narrow (her) waist, Her thighs carry on her beauties	7:1	Your rounded thighs are like jewels, the work of a master hand
Lovely of (walk) when she strides on the ground	7:1	How graceful are your feet in sandals
She has captured my heart in her embrace	4:9	You have ravished my heart with a glance of your eyes
She makes the heads of all (the) men Turn about when seeing her	6:13	Turn, turn, that we may look upon you
Her coming forth appears Like (that of) her (yonder)—the (Unique) One	6:10	Who is this that looks forth like the dawn homegrown products. The silver and gold that ornament her represent the economic prosperity of the nation. Thus, one must decode the imagery in a similar fashion as in any wasf of Song of Songs.

Other descriptions have been identified with the wasf genre, some of which are in biblical wisdom material. For example, D. Bernat (334) labels the descriptions of Behemoth and Leviathan in Job 40–41 as examples of the genre “enemy-wasf.” Behemoth’s body parts are systematically listed and sometimes compared with metal or wood. The sexual element is highlighted there, such as in Job 40:17, where the creature “delights in” his “tail” as if it were a cedar tree (Wolfers, 370–71). Leviathan also is described in mostly human-sounding terms, and sometimes parallels may be found between his poem and verses in Song of Songs. In company with these monstrous descriptions Bernat includes Goliath of 1 Samuel 17. Goliath’s description begins with his bronze helmet, continues down his bronze coat of chain mail, to the leggings of bronze. Then his great weapons are detailed, and finally his challenge and threat.

Bernat (341) also analyzes the description of the Woman of Virtue that concludes the book of *Proverbs (Prov 31:10–31) as an “anti-wasf” because it ignores her physical appearance completely. However, her description roughly corresponds with the male wasf in Song of Songs 5:8–6:1, which begins with finding (“if you find my beloved” and “a woman of virtue who can find?”). The woman is compared with jewels (Prov 31:10). Both Song of Songs’ man and Proverbs’ Woman of Virtue have laudable arms (Song 5:14; Prov 31:19–20), and both descriptions end by referencing speech (Song 5:16; Prov 31:26). The Proverbs 31 woman also mentions beauty (Prov 31:30), as in Song of Songs 6:1. So, the so-called anti-wasf actually bears some affinity with Song of Songs’ full-body wasf of the man. Her description is often couched in masculine terms, such as her loins in Proverbs 31:17 (which parallel his “tusk” of Song 5:14).

5. Extrabiblical Descriptions.

As we noted earlier (see 1.1 above), the name wasf is an Arabic word meaning “description”; when applied to the poetry of Song of Songs, the term links it with a culture outside the Bible. However unchanged over the years, the wedding practices observed by Wetzstein have uncertain provenance. But there are also examples of love literature from antiquity also comparable to Song of Songs.

The closest analogues to Song of Songs are found in Egyptian love lyrics. These predate Solomon by centuries; Song of Songs shares with them many motifs and imagery usage. One example from the Chester Beatty collection (group A, no. 31) is called "The Stroll," and it reads as follows (Fox 1985, 52):

One alone is (my) sister, having no peer:
 More gracious than all other women.
 Behold her, like Sothis rising
 At the beginning of a good year:
 Shining, precious, white of skin,
 Lovely of eyes when gazing.
 Sweet her lips (when) speaking:
 She has no excess of words.
 Long of neck, white of breast,
 Her hair true lapis lazuli.
 Her arms surpass gold,
 Her fingers are like lotuses.
 Full (her) derrière, narrow (her) waist,
 Her thighs carry on her beauties.
 Lovely of (walk) when she strides on the ground,
 she has captured my heart in her embrace.
 She makes the heads of all (the) men
 Turn about when seeing her.
 Fortunate is whoever embraces her—
 He is like the foremost of lovers.
 Her coming forth appears
 Like (that of) her (yonder)—the (Unique)
 One.

This sample includes a number of elements discoverable in biblical wasfs. J. White (149) notes that jewels (lapis lazuli) and metals (gold) have affinity with Song of Songs 5:11-15. Table 1 illustrates the similarity between this material and Song of Songs (modified RSV).

Despite the close similarity of poetic device and manner of expression, Fox (1983) notes differences between the Egyptian love lyrics and Song of Songs: Song of Songs is a literary unit, not a collection of individual lyrics not originally bound together; in it can be found actual dialogue between lovers rather than mere monologues; the wasf is more literalistic in the Egyptian songs rather than metaphorical as in Song of Songs. In Songs of Songs' wasfs, "A lover looks at his beloved and through the prism of her beauty sees an ever-present Arcady. In fact, the imagery shows us a world created by love, for it comes into being and is unified only through the lovers' vision of each other" (Fox 1983, 227). "Egyptian love poems are introspective, depicting people analyzing their own feelings, 'Oh, if only I were her hairbrush, then I could be close to her!' Song of Songs is not like that at all. The only navels that the young couple gaze upon are each other's" (Schwab 1997, 15). W. Watson (260) contrasts the Egyptian description of her skin color as "white" with Song of Songs 1:6, which has "very dark."

Other ancient love songs are further removed from Song of Songs. Sumerian, Akkadian and Ugaritic love poems mostly treat the exploits of the gods. Poems in which one human describes another in amorous terms are rare. One example of this is the Message of Ludingira to His Mother, "in which the beloved mother's anatomy is described in highly erotic language" (Westenholz, 2474). This text describes Ludingira's mother using four "signs" to recognize her: "My mother is brilliant in the heavens, a doe in the mountains, a morning star abroad in noon, precious carnelian, a topaz" (Cooper). This resembles Song of Songs 5:9—6:1, where the woman describes her man and her friends express the desire to search for him.

See also AMBIGUITY; ANIMAL IMAGERY; FEMINIST INTERPRETATION; FLORAL IMAGERY; LYRIC POETRY; MARRIAGE AND SEX; SONG OF SONGS 2: ANCIENT NEAR EASTERN BACKGROUND.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. J. Angénieux, "Les trois portraits du Cantiques: Étude de critique littéraire," ETL 42 (1966) 582-96; D. Bergant, "My Beloved Is Mine and I Am His (Song 2:16): The Song of Songs and Honor and Shame," Semeia 68 (1994) 23-40; D. Bernat, "Biblical Wasfs beyond the Song of Songs," JSOT 28 (2004) 327-49; F. Black, "What Is My Beloved? On Erotic Reading and the Song of Songs," in The Labour of Reading: Desire, Alienation, and Biblical Interpretation, ed. F. C. Black, R. Boer and E. Runions (SBLSS; Atlanta: Society of Biblical Literature, 1999) 35-52; idem, "Beauty or the Beast? The Grotesque Body in the Song of Songs," BibInt 8 (2000) 302-23; A. Brenner, "A Note on bat-rabbim (Song of Songs VII 5)," VT 42 (1992) 113-15; idem, "To See Is to Assume: Whose Love Is Celebrated in the Song of Songs?" BibInt 1 (1993a) 265-84; idem, "Women Poets and Authors," in A Feminist Companion to the Song of Songs, ed. A. Brenner (FCB 1; Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1993b) 58-66; G. B. Caird, The Language and Imagery of the Bible (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1980); D. J. A. Clines, "Why Is There a Song of Songs and What Does It Do to You If You Read It?" in Interested Parties: The Theology of Writers and Readers of the Hebrew

Bible, ed. D. J. A. Clines and P. R. Davies (JSOTSup 205; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1995) 94-121; J. Cooper, "New Cuneiform Parallels to the Song of Songs," JBL 90 (1971) 157-62; M. Deckers, "The Structure of the Song of Songs and the Centrality of nepes," in A Feminist Companion to the Song of Songs, ed. A. Brenner (FCB 1; Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1993) 172-96; F. Delitzsch, "Remarks on the Song by Dr. J. G. Wetzstein," in Commentary on the Song of Songs and Ecclesiastes (Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1877) 162-76; S. J. Dillow, Solomon on Sex (New York: Thomas Nelson, 1977); L. M. Eslinger, "The Case of an Immodest Lady Wrestler in Deuteronomy 25:11-12," VT 31 (1981) 269-81; C. Exum, Song of Songs (OTL; Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 2005); M. Falk, Love Lyrics from the Bible: A Translation and Literary Study of the Song of Songs (BLS 4; Sheffield: Almond, 1982); idem, "The Wasf," in A Feminist Companion to the Song of Songs, ed. A. Brenner (FCB 1; Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1993) 225-33; M. V. Fox, "Love, Passion, and Perception in Israelite and Egyptian Love Poetry," JBL 102 (1983) 219-228; idem, The Song of Songs and the Ancient Egyptian Love Lyrics (Madison: University of Wisconsin Press, 1985); F. Landy, Paradoxes of Paradise: Identity and Difference in the Song of Songs (BLS 7; Sheffield: Almond, 1983); T. Longman III, Song of Songs (NICOT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2001); A. Mariaselvam, The Song of Songs and Ancient Tamil Love Poems (AnBib 118; Rome: Editrice Pontificio Istituto Biblico, 1988); D. Merkin, "The Woman on the Balcony: On Reading the Song of Songs," Tikkun 9.3 (1994) 59-64, 89; C. Meyers, "Gender Imagery in the Song of Songs," HAR 10 (1987) 209-23; R. E. Murphy, "Form Critical Studies in the Song of Songs," Int 27 (1973) 413-22; M. H. Pope, Song of Songs (AB 7C; Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1977); M. Rozelaar, "An Unrecognized Part of the Human Anatomy," Judaism 37 (1988) 97-101; J. C. Rylaarsdam, "Song of Songs and Biblical Faith," BR 10 (1965) 7-18; G. Schwab, "Cultivating the Vineyard: Solomon's Counsel for Lovers," JBC 15.3 (1997) 8-20; idem, The Song of Songs' Cautionary Message Concerning Human Love (SBL 41; New York: Peter Lang, 2002); idem, "Song of Songs," in Expositor's Biblical Commentary (rev. ed.; Grand Rapids: Zondervan, forthcoming); M. H. Segal, "Song of Songs," VT 12 (1962) 470-90; R. N. Soulen, "Wasfs of the Song of Songs and Hermeneutic," JBL 86 (1967) 183-90; L. Waterman, The Song of Songs: Trans- lated and Interpreted as a Dramatic Poem (Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press, 1948); W. G. E. Watson, "Some Ancient Near Eastern Parallels to the Song of Songs," in Words Remembered, Texts Renewed: Essays in Honour of John F. A. Sawyer, ed. J. Davies, G. Harvey and W. G. E. Watson (JSOTSup 195; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1995) 253-71; E. R. Wendland, "Seeking the Path through a Forest of Symbols: A Figurative and Structural Survey of the Song of Songs," JOTT 7.2 (1995) 13-59; J. Westenholz, "Love Lyrics from the Ancient Near East," in Civilizations of the Ancient Near East, vol. 4, ed. J. Sasson (New York: Scribner, 1995) 2471-84; J. W. Whedbee, "Paradox and Parody in the Song of Solomon: Towards a Comic Reading of the Most Sublime Song," in The Bible and the Comic Vision (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1998) 263-77; J. B. White, A Study of the Language of Love in the Song of Songs and Ancient Egyptian Love Poetry (SBLDS 38; Missoula, MT: Scholars Press, 1975); C. J. Whitesell, "Behold, Thou Art Fair, My Beloved," Parabola 20 (1995) 92-99; D. Wolfers, Deep Things Out of Darkness: The Book of Job, Essays and a New English Translation (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1995). G. Schwab

WEAPONS. See PROTECTION IMAGERY; WARFARE IMAGERY.

WIDOWS, WIDOWHOOD. See RUTH 2: ANCIENT NEAR EASTERN BACKGROUND.

WISDOM, GREEK

Greek wisdom exerted a profound influence on Jewish thinking throughout Hellenistic times and into the Roman period. Ethics permeate OT wisdom literature, which considers human beings "creatures of one God, without regard to ethnic origin or cultic affiliation" (Collins 1997, 10). Generally included in this category are *Proverbs, *Ecclesiastes and *Job (sometimes also *Song of Solomon and certain "wisdom psalms" [e.g., Pss 1; 32; 34; 37; 49; 73; 78; 91; 112; 127; 128]). Although the biblical Wisdom literature is indebted more to ancient Near Eastern influence than to Greek philosophy, later works manifest a greater awareness of and dialogue with Greek ideas. The LXX translation (DNTB 1099-1107) of the biblical wisdom books already evidences some movement in this direction—a tendency carried further in Pseudo-Phocylides (DNTB 868-69), *Wisdom of Solomon (DNTB 1268-76) and the writings of Philo of Alexandria (DNTB 789-93).

1. Hellenistic Context
2. Terminology
3. Relation of Wisdom to God and Torah
4. Relation of Wisdom to Jewish Apocalyptic
5. Conclusion

1. Hellenistic Context.

1.1. Historical Factors. All wisdom writings require context for understanding. Though timeless in one sense (and thus difficult to place on a trajectory of “early” to “late” wisdom material), some Jewish wisdom writings show familiarity with Greek ideas and interacted with them. Jews settled widely throughout the ancient world, but Diaspora literary output was centered in Alexandria. The best explanation for this phenomenon is that Alexandrian Jews who could afford education in the gymnasia had access to it (until the privilege was severely restricted by Claudius in AD 41) and were thus better able to interact with Hellenistic ideas than were others such as Ben Sira of Jerusalem (Collins 1997, 149-50) (see Sirach, Book of).

Somewhat paradoxically, the Hebrew wisdom books exhibit a more universal outlook than do their Hellenistic counterparts, which are more ethnocentric (see Murphy 1990, 114). Perhaps for this reason, Jewish literature written in Greek has often been considered mission-oriented (e.g., Hengel, 1.168) and instrumental in producing a large class of God-fearers sympathetic to the Jewish faith (Feldman, 321-22). Others (e.g., Tcherikover; Goodman, 57) maintain that this literature was primarily meant for the edification of Hellenistic Jews. Most likely, the actual situation lay somewhere in between: Jews sought to articulate their faith in “educated” terms for the benefit of their fellow Jews as well as to present their faith in the most attractive light for their Greek counterparts.

1.2. Impact on the Septuagint. The impact of Hellenistic thinking on the LXX is widely recognized not only by the translators’ reformulation of Hebrew concepts into Greek and the utilization of the metrical conventions of Greek poetry (Thackeray) but also by their evident familiarity with the ideas of Plato, Aristotle and other Greek philosophers (Gerleman 1956, 15, 29-31). An example is seen in the positive attitude toward the bee in LXX Proverbs 6:8a-c (alluded to in Ps.-Phoc. 171-174; cf. Aristotle, Hist. an. 622B; 627A), which contrasts sharply with the Hebrew notion that the bee was evil and dangerous (Deut 1:44; Ps 118:12; Is 7:18). Differences of opinion exist as to whether LXX Proverbs inclines toward Greek ideas (Gerleman 1950; 1956; Hengel 1.162-63) or opposes them (Cook 1995; 2001). Possible evidence for anti-Hellenistic rhetoric includes LXX Proverbs 2:16, where the seductive woman is already understood metaphorically as “foreign wisdom” (Hengel, 1.155), which makes a person wander “far from the straight way” and become a stranger to “righteous judgment” (cf. Prov 7:5). Similar is the warning in Proverbs 9 against intercourse with the foolish woman. LXX Proverbs 9:18 has lengthy “pluses” (i.e., readings not found in the MT—many would call them “additions”) that warn against foreign water (twice), a foreign river and a foreign fountain. There may even be a pejorative allusion to the mythical river Styx, which the dead supposedly cross en route to Hades (see Cook 1995, 358). In any case, there does seem to be in these verses a negative evaluation of foreign (i.e., non-Israelite) wisdom. By contrast, true wisdom is personified as a sister in Proverbs 7:4 and as a virtuous woman in Proverbs 8:1—9:6 (see Personification).

Later Jewish wisdom literature continues the tendency begun with the LXX, drawing still more heavily on Greek philosophy and ethics. Pseudo-Phocylides, although making no overt reference to Judaism, stands closest to traditional Hebrew Wisdom literature. Philo’s closely reasoned philosophical works are the most Hellenistic of the extant Jewish writings. Situated between these extremes are the writings of Aristobulus (DNTB 118-21) and *Wisdom of Solomon.

2. Terminology.

The LXX translation of the OT wisdom books articulated Greek equivalents for the basic Hebrew wisdom terminology. Although the style of translation is generally freer for the wisdom books than for other OT books, the effort to convey the meaning of the original Hebrew text in clear, idiomatic Greek is apparent (see Clifford). Still, it remains an open question to what extent the LXX in general and the wisdom books in particular can be considered a reliable witness to its Hebrew parent text. Stylistic considerations and cultural sensitivity have sometimes led the translator(s) to replace synonymous *parallelisms with antitheses as well as to soften or even eliminate metaphorical or potentially offensive language (Gerleman 1956, 18-27), including some anthropomorphisms (Gerleman 1946, 58-59).

The basic Hebrew wisdom vocabulary exemplified in Proverbs 1:1-7 can be classified into three discrete categories (see Horne, 25) that the LXX translates with a fair degree of consistency. Cognitive terminology includes “wisdom” (sophia [Heb ḥokmā]), “instruction” (paideia [Heb mūsār]), “understanding” (phronēsis [Heb binā]), “shrewdness” (panourgia [Heb ʿormā]), “knowledge” (aisthēsis [Heb daʿat]), “skill” (kybernēsis [Heb taḥbūlōt]), “prudence” (ennoia [Heb mēzimmā]) and “fear of the Lord” (phobos theou [Heb yirʾat yḥwh]). Rhetorical terminology includes “saying” (paroimia or parabolē [Heb māsāl]), “figure” (skoteinos logos [Heb mēlišā]) and “riddle” (ainigma [Heb ḥidā]). Moral terminology includes “righteousness” (dikaioynē [Heb ṣedeq]), “justice” (krima [Heb mīšpāṭ]) and “equity” (orthos [Heb mēšārīm]). Some Greek terms such as “virtue” (aretē [Wis 4:1; 5:13; 8:7; Ps-Phoc. 67]) and “technical skill” (technē [Wis 13:10; 14:4; 17:7; Sir 38:34]) are restricted to later Jewish writings. Other important terms are absent or are used in a nontechnical sense (e.g., eidōs [“form”], eudaimonia [“tranquility”], apatheia [“indifference”], epochē [“suspension of belief”]).

3. Relation of Wisdom to God and Torah.

3.1. Wisdom in Jewish and Greek Conceptions. Wisdom in the Jewish conception comes from God and hence focuses on the capacity for moral discernment issuing in wise choices: “The fear of the LORD is the beginning of wisdom and there is good understanding to all who practice it. And piety toward God is the beginning of discernment, but the impious regard wisdom and instruction as worthless” (LXX Prov 1:7). Virtue (aretē) is central also in Greek philosophy, but generally this wisdom is understood more in terms of innate ability. The early Greek writers equated wisdom with expertise in a particular skill or vocation (e.g., Homer Iliad 15.411-412 [the term here is sophiē]). However, by the sixth century BC, sophia refers to a more theoretical knowledge, one’s learning, judgment and aretē (Wilckens). For the philosophers of this pre-Socratic period, wisdom involved an enquiry into the nature and origin of things. Heraclitus insisted that the only constant in our universe is change, that all things are in constant flux (cf. Plato Crat. 402A; see Kirk, Raven and Schofield, 195-97). Parmenides countered that what we call reality is an illusion and that the true reality is eternal, unchanging and unknowable (frgs. 6-8). Such a position was disputed by the pluralists, most notably Leucippus and Democritus, who described the universe in purely material terms as consisting of particles or atoms (for the relevant texts, see Kirk, Raven and Schofield, 413-27). Such a materialist view of things proved even less appealing to the Greeks than the ideas of Parmenides and only added to the climate of skepticism regarding the possibility of knowing anything with certainty, which in turn encouraged viewing ethical issues in more relative terms.

More pragmatic were the Sophists, who stressed both that virtue can be taught and the usefulness of developing rhetorical skill. Prominent among them was Protagoras, who articulated the maxim “Man is the measure of all things” (frg. 1, quoted in Sextus Math. 7.60), thus recognizing the limits of what can be known but without denying the value of the quest. The Sophists, however, were incisively criticized by Socrates and his student Plato. Virtue cannot be taught, according to Socrates, but rather must be discovered for oneself—wisdom being the greatest of all virtues. Plato (427-347 BC) systematized our knowledge of reality in terms of unchanging, ideal “forms” (eidoi) or ideas (esp. “the good”) in the intelligible world and their constantly changing counterparts in the visible world (“images” [eikones]). The human psychē (“soul”), as the seat of reason, already belongs partly to this transcendent, eternal realm of ideas (e.g., Plato Resp. 6.508-511). Therefore, knowledge of virtue is innate and not, as the Sophists had maintained, taught. Plato’s conception of the intelligible world reconciled the earlier views of Heraclitus and Parmenides and comported also to some extent with the Hebrew view of wisdom as originating with God prior to creation (Prov 8:22-25 [on which, see Hengel, 1.162-63]) and as knowable (Prov 8:17).

Aristotle (384-322 BC), on the other hand, began more concretely with the observable, denying the Platonic conception that forms exist apart from being or that the soul exists apart from the body, asserting rather that every substance is defined by certain essential properties (Aristotle De an. 2.2.414a). He differentiated being from becoming as well as the corresponding principles of rest and motion, identifying God as the eternal, “unmoved mover.” He also distinguished sophia, the most complete kind of knowledge, from philosophia, which is the human quest for understanding (Aristotle Metaph. 12.8.1073a; 1.2.982a-983a). He taught also that since virtue operates in accordance with reason, virtue can be defined by reason. The four cardinal virtues of self-control, prudence, justice and courage, so prized by the Greeks, were important also for Jewish writers, as is clear from Wisdom 8:7, which singles out precisely these. The context also makes clear, however, that these qualities come not from human reason but rather from divinely personified wisdom.

3.2. Reconciling Jewish and Greek Conceptions. Philo (c. 25 BC to AD 50), a well-educated Jew of Alexandria, used an allegorical method to show, without invalidating the literal sense (Philo Migr. 91-93), the harmony between traditional Jewish faith and Greek philosophy. Following Plato, he identified God as the utterly transcendent One and pure Being (ōn). At the same time, he insisted on God’s immanence in our world through the Logos, which he identified with divine wisdom (Philo Op. 16-25; Prov. 1; Det. 115-118). The Logos as impersonal being (ti) is both transcendent and immanent, God’s instrument in creation, and thus able to bridge the intelligible (i.e., real) and material worlds (Berchman, 28-31). With his notion of the Logos, Philo made his most important contribution (heavily influencing later Christian readings of the OT, as the writings of Clement of Alexandria and Origen show [see Chadwick]). Formulations similar to Philo’s conception of the Logos are used of Jesus mutatis mutandis by NT writers (Jn 1:1-18; Col 1:15-17). Like the sapiential books of the LXX, Philo emphasizes moral virtues as characteristic of the religious person (see Wahlen, 13-14). In harmony with his Platonist outlook, anything perceptible by the senses is considered inferior because it belongs to the physical realm rather than to the pure realm of ideas (Philo Opif. 31). So, although observance of the ritual laws is everywhere assumed, notions of impurity tend to be couched in moral terms in relation to the person’s conscience and intention (Philo Spec. 3:209; Deus 128). Bodily purifications are meaningless if the mind is not cleansed (Philo Det. 21; Cher. 95; Spec. 1:277).

3.3. Relation of Wisdom to Torah. The extent to which the Septuagintal wisdom literature identifies wisdom with Torah is disputed. Some find no clear equation between the two (e.g., Gerleman 1956, 42). More recently, J. Cook (1999) has argued vigorously for their identification, at least in LXX Proverbs. There is general agreement that the Greek text of Proverbs has a stronger religious coloring than does its Hebrew counterpart (Gerleman 1956, 38). Industriousness is often translated into moral terms (e.g., “good speech” replaces “manual labor” in LXX Prov 12:14, while LXX Prov 12:24, 27 contrast not the lazy with the diligent but rather the deceitful with the elect or the pure respectively). According to Proverbs 10:22, the rich owe their prosperity to “the blessing of the LORD,” but the LXX limits this blessing of wealth to the “righteous” (dikaïos), and in LXX Proverbs 10:15 poverty is associated with the “impious” or “ungodly” (asebēs [cf. Heb dal). Interestingly, most of the occurrences of asebēs in the LXX are in the wisdom books, over one-third in Proverbs alone, frequently as a translation for the “wicked” (Heb raša^c [e.g., Prov 10:6-7; 15:8-9; 21:27; 24:24]). There are also pluses in LXX Proverbs that exalt obedience and condemn the violation of ritual prescriptions (Prov 21:27; 29:27). It is a very small step from these admonitions to understanding the Jewish Torah as the epitomization of these religious ideals. According to LXX Proverbs 9:10, “To know the law is the indication of a sound mind” (cf. LXX Job 34:27). More vivid still is LXX Proverbs 28:4 (cf. Let. Aris. 139): “Those who forsake the law praise impiety, but those who love the law build a wall around themselves” (on which, see Cook 2001, 474-79).

Later Jewish writings (developing earlier hints [e.g., Deut 4:6; Ezra 7:14, 25]) advance this tendency toward identifying wisdom with Torah: “He who fears the Lord will act thus, and he who has the law will attain wisdom” (Sir 15:1 [cf. 4 Macc 1:16-17]). Bringing God and his ways still closer to humans is *Wisdom of Solomon (Crenshaw, 168-69), which describes wisdom as “a breath of the power of God, and a pure emanation of the glory of the Almighty” and as “a reflection of eternal light, a spotless mirror of the working of God, and an image of his goodness” (Wis 7:25-26). Though not explicitly identified with the law, wisdom is here closely associated with God’s “goodness” (agathotētos), and, like wisdom, the law is called an “imperishable light” (Wis 18:4). The latter reference, part of a lengthy section detailing God’s providential care of Israel during the exodus (Wis 11–19), is typical of references in Second Temple period wisdom literature to the distinctive history, traditions and cult of Israel (see also Wis 9:8; 10:1-21; cf. Sir 24). Wisdom reflection was gradually moving away from its universalist roots toward a more particularist and apologetic stance. It is not surprising, then, that we find barely disguised references to Egypt (Wis 16:16; 19:1) and Babylon (Wis 16:18) in polemic against the idolatry of the “impious.” At the same time, this polemic is not anti-Gentile per se but rather seeks to align itself with the attitude of enlightened Greeks who opposed extreme forms of idolatry (Collins 2005, 122).

4. Relation of Wisdom to Jewish Apocalyptic.

Wisdom literature, it would seem, should have little in common with the apocalyptic mindset. After all, the former stresses the immanence of wisdom as part of the natural order for the present life, while the latter stresses the transcendence of wisdom as accessible only through the revelation of “mysteries” and spotlights life in the eschaton. Although the proposal that wisdom gave birth to apocalypticism (von Rad, 277-78) is no longer seriously entertained (see Stone, 388-89), there are a number of ideas common to both genres, such as just *retribution, ethical dualism and the importance of wise teachers. Indeed, the earlier apocalypses, such as Daniel and I Enoch, have been classified as “mantic wisdom” (Müller). Distinguishing these from the wisdom books is their emphatic historical determinism, the hiding of wisdom in mysterious metaphors, and the reliance on supernatural revelation. Rabbinic Judaism tended more toward the traditional forms of Hebrew wisdom, while apocalyptic wisdom resonated more with early Christianity (Collins 1990, 354).

The hope of an *afterlife, more characteristic of apocalyptic writings, is present also to a certain extent in the wisdom books of the LXX. Job, for example, affirms, “For if a person should die, having finished the days of his life, he will live; I would endure until I shall be again” (LXX Job 14:14). Clearer still is the Septuagintal addition in Job 42:17: “Yet it is written of him [Job] that he will arise with those whom the Lord resurrects” (see Gerleman 1946, 60-63). Therefore, it comes as no surprise that later wisdom books express a similar hope (Wis 3:1-8; 5:15-16; Ps.-Phoc. 103-104 [on which, see Collins 1997, 165-66; van der Horst, 93-97]). At times, this results in nice, if not always coherent, distinctions between soul, spirit and the body: “The educated hellenistic Jew had to steer between two erroneous courses: a) the dualism of Platonistic philosophies which looked upon matter as evil and upon immortality as an intrinsic quality of the soul to be achieved by escape from the body; b) the pantheism of contemporary philosophy, especially Stoicism, which identified man and his destiny with the universe in some fashion” (Reese, 161-62). Some Jewish *sages were influenced by Platonic notions of an immortal soul, which explains occasional reference to the soul’s preexistence (Wis 8:19-20; Philo, Somn. 1.133-143; Gig. 6-9; Plant. 11-14 [see Wahlen, 52-53]).

5. Conclusion.

The expression of Jewish wisdom in Greek facilitated dialogue between Greeks and Hellenized Jews, particularly in Alexandria. The LXX provided the essential terminology and, in the wisdom books at least, already shows signs of Greek influence. Jewish religious values and concepts are increasingly expressed in Hellenistic terms—a tendency epitomized by the works of Philo. A persistent difference between Greek and Jewish perspectives is the foundational Hebrew insistence that “the fear of the LORD is the beginning of wisdom.” Also more specifically Jewish concerns exemplified by the Torah were given more prominence in wisdom instruction. A growing speculation about the afterlife also appears, shifting the genre closer toward Jewish apocalyptic. This fertile discussion of wisdom significantly advanced Jewish philosophical thought from its OT roots and provides the indispensable context for understanding the rise of Christianity, for it is within this context that its ideas were first forged.

See also ECCLESIASTES 2: ANCIENT NEAR EASTERN BACKGROUND; SIRACH, BOOK OF; WISDOM AND APOCALYPTIC; WISDOM OF SOLOMON.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. M. L. Barré, “Fear of God’ and the World View of Wisdom,” BTB 11 (1981) 41-43; F. W. Beare, “Greek Religion and Philosophy,” IDB 2.487-500; R. M. Berchman, From Philo to Origen: Middle Platonism in Transition (BJS 69; Chico, CA: Scholars Press, 1984); H. Chadwick, “Philo and the Beginnings of Christian Thought,” in The Cambridge History of Later Greek and Early Medieval Philosophy, ed. A. H. Armstrong (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1967) 133-92; R. Clifford, “Observations on the

Texts and Versions of Proverbs,” in Wisdom, You Are My Sister: Studies in Honor of Roland E. Murphy, O. Carm., on the Occasion of His Eightieth Birthday, ed. M. L. Barré (Washington, DC: Catholic Biblical Association of America, 1997) 47-61; J. J. Collins, “The Sage in the Apocalyptic and Pseudepigraphic Literature,” in The Sage in Israel and the Ancient Near East, ed. J. G. Gammie and L. G. Perdue (Winona Lake, IN: Eisenbrauns, 1990) 343-54; idem, Jewish Wisdom in the Hellenistic Age (OTL; Louisville: John Knox, 1997); idem, Encounters with Biblical Theology (Minneapolis: Fortress, 2005); J. Cook, “The Septuagint as a Jewish-Hellenistic Document,” in VIII Congress of the International Organization for Septuagint and Cognate Studies, Paris 1992, ed. L. Greenspoon and O. Munnich (SBLSCS 41; Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1995) 349-65; idem, “The Law of Moses in Septuagint Proverbs,” VT 49 (1999) 48-61; idem, “The Ideology of Septuagint Proverbs,” in X Congress of the International Organization for Septuagint and Cognate Studies, Oslo 1998, ed. B. Taylor (SBLSCS 51; Atlanta: Scholars Press, 2001) 463-79; J. L. Crenshaw, Old Testament Wisdom: An Introduction (Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 1998); L. H. Feldman, Jew and Gentile in the Ancient World (Princeton, NJ: Princeton University Press, 1993); G. Gerleman, Studies in the Septuagint: I. Book of Job (LUÅ 52/2; Lund: Gleerup, 1946); idem, “The Septuagint Proverbs as a Hellenistic Document” OTS 8 (1950) 15-27; idem, Studies in the Septuagint: III. Proverbs (LUÅ 52/3; Lund: Gleerup, 1956); M. Goodman, “Jewish Proselytizing in the First Century,” in The Jews among Pagans and Christians in the Roman Empire, ed. J. Lieu, J. North and T. Rajak (London: Routledge, 1992) 53-78; M. Hengel, Judaism and Hellenism: Studies in Their Encounter in Palestine during the Early Hellenistic Period, trans. J. Bowden (2 vols.; London: SCM, 1974); M. P. Horne, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes (SHBC; Macon, GA: Smyth & Helwys, 2003); G. S. Kirk, J. E. Raven and M. Schofield, The Presocratic Philosophers (2nd ed.; Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1983); M. Lichtheim, Ancient Egyptian Literature (3 vols.; Berkeley: University of California Press, 1975-1980); A. A. Long and D. N. Sedley, The Hellenistic Philosophers (2 vols.; Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1987); P. Merlan, “Greek Philosophy from Plato to Plotinus,” in The Cambridge History of Later Greek and Early Medieval Philosophy, ed. A. H. Armstrong (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1967) 12-132; H.-P. Müller, “Mantische Weisheit und Apokalyptik,” in Congress Volume: Uppsala 1971 (VTSup 22; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1972) 268-93; R. Murphy, “A Consideration of the Classification ‘Wisdom Psalms,’” in Studies in Ancient Israelite Wisdom: Selected, with a Prolegomenon, ed. J. L. Crenshaw (LBS; New York: KTAV, 1976) 456-67 (originally published in VTSup 9 [1962] 156-67); idem, The Tree of Life: An Exploration of Biblical Wisdom Literature (2nd ed.; ABRL; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1990); O. S. Rankin, Israel’s Wisdom Literature: Its Bearing on Theology and the History of Religion (Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1954); J. M. Reese, Hellenistic Influence on the Book of Wisdom and Its Consequences (AnBib 41; Rome: Biblical Institute Press, 1970); E. J. Schnabel, Law and Wisdom from Ben Sira to Paul (WUNT 2/16; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 1985); R. C. Solomon and K. M. Higgins, A Short History of Philosophy (New York: Oxford University Press, 1996); M. E. Stone, “Apocalyptic Literature,” in Jewish Writings of the Second Temple Period, ed. M. E. Stone (CRINT 2/2; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1984) 383-441; V. Tcherikover, “Jewish Apologetic Literature Reconsidered,” Eos 48 (1956) 169-93; H. St. J. Thackeray, “The Poetry of the Greek Book of Proverbs,” JTS 13 (1912) 46-66; P. W. van der Horst, Jews and Christians in Their Graeco-Roman Context: Selected Essays on Early Judaism, Samaritanism, Hellenism, and Christianity (WUNT 1/196; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2006); G. von Rad, Wisdom in Israel (London: SCM, 1972); C. Wahlen, Jesus and the Impurity of Spirits in the Synoptic Gospels (WUNT 2/185; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 2004); U. Wilckens, “σοφία, κτλ,” TDNT 7.465-76.

C. Wahlen

WISDOM AND APOCALYPTIC

Scholars have long debated the nature of the relationship between wisdom and apocalyptic in the world of the ancient Near East. Because it is likely that apocalyptic emerged at least in part from wisdom traditions, it shares certain convictions and perspectives with sapiential thought. Yet it is also indebted to other theological streams, such as biblical prophecy, and thus stands apart as a new and distinct phenomenon.

1. Preliminary Issues
2. The Problem of the Origins of Jewish Apocalyptic
3. Wisdom and Apocalyptic in Early Jewish Literature

4. Wisdom and Apocalyptic: Compatibility and Distinctions

1. Preliminary Issues.

1.1. Terminology. In considering the topic of apocalyptic, one of the central problems and causes of confusion is the imprecision that has often attended the use of the terms involved. As a corrective to this problem, the work of P. Hanson and J. Collins has provided scholars with some basic terminological distinctions. The word apocalypse refers to a literary “genre of revelatory literature with a narrative framework, in which a revelation is mediated by an otherworldly being to a human recipient, disclosing a transcendent reality which is both temporal, insofar as it envisages eschatological salvation, and spatial insofar as it involves another, supernatural world” (Collins 1979, 9). The expression apocalyptic eschatology indicates a religious outlook that stands in continuity with biblical eschatology but with the significant difference that divine intervention is largely transferred from the realm of ordinary history and human agency to a cosmic, cataclysmic end to the present world and the establishment of a new order (Hanson 1975, 11-12). Finally, the term apocalypticism refers to a “symbolic universe” where apocalyptic eschatology has escalated to the status of an ideology, usually as the sociological response to the communal feeling of alienation and/or persecution (Hanson 1976, 30). In this article these conventions will be followed, and the word apocalyptic will be used to refer to the patterns of thought characteristic of both apocalyptic eschatology and apocalypticism without necessarily specifying one to the exclusion of the other. Furthermore, it must be recognized that none of these three are homogeneous entities but rather are modern attempts to classify diverse but related literatures, worldviews and sociological phenomena from the Second Temple period.

1.2. Relating Wisdom and Apocalyptic. In order to assess the relationship between wisdom and apocalyptic, it is helpful to distinguish three modes in which they may be related. The first is the diachronic relationship between the two: what role, if any, does wisdom play in the emergence of apocalyptic? The second concerns the interaction of wisdom and apocalyptic thought in literary works and genres. The third mode is a synthetic assessment of the degree to which wisdom and apocalyptic thought are compatible and to which they are in conflict.

2. The Problem of the Origins of Jewish Apocalyptic.

2.1. Initial Theories. Apocalypses began appearing throughout the Near East during the Hellenistic period as a response to Greek oppression. They are attested in both Egypt and Persia, but the greatest concentration of extant apocalypses come from Jewish authors, whether in Palestine or in the Diaspora. In the case of Jewish apocalypses, the persecutions of the second century BC, probably exacerbated by nostalgia for Israel’s former monarchy, initiated a flourishing of apocalyptic thought that continued for several centuries. However, although certain historical circumstances may be shown to be instrumental causes of apocalyptic compositions, the rise of apocalyptic as a phenomenon has enough unique qualities that it is impossible to trace its origins solely as the organic outgrowth of any one tradition or circumstance. Rather, it must be viewed as both a new phenomenon and one that draws upon a confluence of other theologies and literary domains.

Throughout the first half of the twentieth century there were two main theories as to what provided the primary source for apocalyptic thought. First, a number of scholars held that apocalyptic was a derivative of Persian dualism and thus constituted a departure from the monotheism of the biblical prophets. The other major view, especially among British scholars such as H. H. Rowley and D. S. Russell, was that apocalyptic developed out of Israelite prophecy. This latter view was based on the understanding that eschatology was a central component of both biblical prophecy and the later apocalypses, not to mention the fact that several apocalypses refer to themselves as prophecies (e.g., Rev 1:3; 4 Ezra 1:1). This discussion about origins underwent something of a revolution in the 1960s and 1970s due to the publication of some significant works with the result that prophecy and wisdom became the two leading proposals.

2.2. Biblical Prophecy as the Primary Source (P. Hanson). In his seminal work, The Dawn of Apocalyptic, P. Hanson argued that there is no reason to seek the source of apocalypticism in a foreign religion such as Zoroastrianism, since it is explainable as a development from postexilic prophecy, as exemplified by Isaiah 56–66 and Zechariah 9–14, amid the sociological context of warring factions and widespread pessimism in postexilic Palestine. Although Hanson certainly does not presume that all the features of apocalyptic may be explained from postexilic prophecy, and although most scholars have seen Hanson's work as a helpful and needed corrective, he has been challenged by others for neglecting to note the features of apocalyptic thought that intersect with wisdom literature (see Wilson, 81–83).

2.3. Wisdom as the Only Source (G. von Rad). Although there were earlier scholars who advocated viewing sapiential thought as the primary source of apocalyptic, G. von Rad is both the most well known and the most extreme in his views. For von Rad, biblical prophecy could not have played any part in the emergence of apocalyptic because the two have mutually exclusive views of history. He argued that the message of the prophets operates within the framework of “election traditions” and redemptive history. Over against this, apocalyptic literature has lost this historical sensitivity by conceptually objectifying the whole historical process, resulting in a transcendental and eschatological dualism that dichotomizes history into two aeons, the present one and the one to come. This led von Rad (1962–1965, 2.301–8) to conclude that the heart of apocalyptic literature is the revelation of knowledge that is ahistorical and based on a “universal Jahwism.” From this vantage point, the sapiential worldview provides the essential matrix for the rise of apocalypticism, a position that finds additional support in the apocalyptic books of 1 Enoch and Daniel, wherein these two characters are portrayed as having sagelike qualities. Von Rad (1972, 279) explained the incorporation of dualistic and eschatological ideas as the growth and “branching out” of wisdom in the postexilic period.

2.4. Toward a Synthetic Approach. Though the vast majority of scholars have not adopted von Rad's position without serious qualifications, most have recognized that sapiential thought played an important role in the emergence of apocalyptic. There are three principal problems with von Rad's thesis. One is that he drew too sharp a distinction between prophecy and apocalyptic without recognizing the undeniable continuities between the two. Second, and related to the first, is that he did not adequately account for the fact that wisdom literature generally lacks the kind of eschatology found in apocalyptic. Third, he failed to distinguish properly between different types of wisdom. With regard to the third problem, subsequent studies have provided the appropriate nuance for understanding how wisdom serves as a background for apocalypticism.

In a landmark essay H.-P. Müller made the crucial observation that the kind of wisdom that is the source of apocalypticism is neither the “courtly-pedagogical” kind (e.g., Prov 20:26; cf. 1 Kings 3:4–28) nor the more democratic kind (e.g., Prov 3:27–35), both well known from Israelite traditions, but rather the mantic kind of wisdom that is characterized by divination and dream interpretation. Given the prevalence of mantic wisdom in Mesopotamia, it becomes immediately clear why its influence in Jewish literature only appears in the postexilic period. The strength of Müller's thesis is that mantic wisdom, unlike other types of wisdom, is better able to account for some of the central features of apocalyptic thought than is classical prophecy: the nature of its eschatology, its determinism, its emphasis on the authority of special enlightenment, and its method of encoding reality in symbolic images.

Further refining the framework of Müller's thesis, J. Collins has delineated five types of wisdom: (1) wisdom sayings (e.g., Prov 10–31); (2) theological wisdom (e.g., Prov 8; Job); (3) nature wisdom (e.g., Job 28; 38–41); (4) mantic wisdom; (5) revelatory wisdom. Collins (1997, 388) observes that whereas the biblical wisdom books fall primarily in the first three categories, apocalyptic comes from the fifth category and is influenced by the fourth. The significance of this taxonomy is that it highlights the fact that what qualifies as Near Eastern wisdom is broader than what is characteristic of classical biblical wisdom, and this fact must be taken into account in understanding how apocalyptic draws on wisdom elements.

The observation by Müller and Collins that the discussion of sapiential origins of apocalyptic must be broader than the central paradigm of wisdom in the OT has been mirrored by J. VanderKam in his analysis of the prophetic influence on apocalyptic. Although the OT is sharply critical of the type of divination found throughout Mesopotamia, there are some types of divination that are viewed favorably, such as the Urim and Thummim (cf. Num 27:21; 1 Sam 28:6; Ezra 2:63) and the ephod (1 Sam 23). Furthermore, there is a considerable conceptual and formal overlap between prophecy and divination. Formally, their relationship is evident from the fact that biblical writers both juxtapose the function of the two (cf. Deut 18; Isa 44; 47; 48) and the methods of the two (Jer 27; Ezek 13; Mic 3). Therefore, prophecy considered from a broader perspective than what is primarily exemplified by biblical prophecy shows some overlap with Near Eastern divination, and this helps to explain how postexilic strands of thought that developed out of biblical prophecy could accommodate some of the divinatory aspects of mantic wisdom. Conceptually, postexilic prophecy and divination emphasize divine revelation, are concerned with the future, and are interested in interpreting/decoding previous messages (VanderKam 2000b, 241-54).

While Collins has pointed to a definition of wisdom that is broader than what is normally considered to be OT Wisdom literature, VanderKam has pointed to a broader definition of prophecy that includes divinatory elements. Therefore, it is somewhat of a false dichotomy to maintain that apocalyptic is derived primarily from either prophecy or mantic wisdom. The overlap of the two worlds, particularly in the domains of divination and dream interpretation, seems to be the most likely candidate for the primary matrix from which apocalyptic thought emerged. It should be noted that the kind of fluidity found between wisdom, prophecy and apocalyptic is not unique in Second Temple Judaism. The distinctions between priestly, prophetic, didactic and scribal schools are much less clear in the Second Temple period than in the First Temple period (see Sages, Schools, Education).

While it seems evident that sapiential thought was a significant source of apocalyptic thought, it is much less clear whether apocalyptic communities developed out of sapiential communities. The lack of sociological data for certain groups within Second Temple Judaism makes the latter question very difficult to answer. J. Smith has argued that both wisdom and apocalyptic are scribal phenomena. If so, then apocalyptic communities likely would have emerged from within the sociological context of scribal schools.

In addition to the sapiential, prophetic and divinatory influences on the emergence of apocalyptic, several scholars have pointed out the number of similarities between Jewish apocalyptic literature and the Akkadian Prophecies (sometimes called the Akkadian Apocalypses), which denote five texts: Text A, the Uruk Prophecy, the Dynastic Prophecy, the Marduk Prophetic Speech and the Shulgi Prophetic Speech. Given the emphasis on predicting the future through the means of revelation or divination, these prophecies bear greater resemblance to historically oriented Jewish apocalypses (e.g., Dan 7—12; the “Apocalypse of Weeks” in 1 En. 85—90) than to those that focus more on heavenly journeys (e.g., T. Levi 2—5). Other similarities with Jewish apocalypses found in the Akkadian Prophecies are predictions by pseudonymous characters and the tendency to predict the future in cryptic language. Although there are eschatological elements in the Uruk Prophecy, the other four texts betray less of an eschatological focus than do the later Jewish apocalypses. This has led some scholars to question the possible influence of the Akkadian literature on the emergence of Jewish apocalyptic, but the number of key similarities indicates that, at the least, the streams of tradition and modes of thought that contributed to the rise of apocalyptic were varied and present throughout the ancient Near East.

3. Wisdom and Apocalyptic in Early Jewish Literature.

Because apocalypticism drew from wisdom thought and literature, there was a resultant intermingling of the two. The authors of Jewish apocalypses were heirs to Israel’s religious and literary heritage and thus easily drew upon sapiential concepts in the composition of their works. Conversely, the production of wisdom literature could not help but be influenced and sometimes even framed by apocalyptic thought. Therefore, as one moves through the Second Temple period, the nexus between genre and content begins to break down as apocalyptic and sapiential thought each begins to interpenetrate their corresponding genres (Nickelsburg 2005, 20). Although a comprehensive discussion of this phenomenon is not possible here, a few examples will serve to highlight the interaction between wisdom and apocalyptic in early Jewish literature.

3.1. 1 Enoch. During the Second Temple period apocalyptic thought began to crystallize predominantly around two figures: Enoch and Daniel. Correspondingly, the books of Daniel and 1 Enoch (the earliest extant Jewish apocalypses) provide the best examples of the incorporation of mantic wisdom into apocalyptic thought and literature. Because 1 Enoch likely has apocalyptic material extending back into the third century BC, it is now customary to view this work, rather than Daniel, as the starting point for the discussion of the rise of Jewish apocalyptic (see VanderKam 2000a, 266).

Although 1 Enoch is usually classified as an apocalypse, it seems to present itself as a collection of wisdom in the form of a testament (cf. 1 En. 98:9; 99:10; see Argall, 17). In fact, 1 Enoch is more accurately viewed as a composite of several generic forms, including, among others, testament, apocalypse, oracle and epistle. However, despite the variety of generic forms, it is clear that the book as a whole reflects the “apocalyptic construction of reality” (Nickelsburg 2001, 120). What is most striking in this respect is that the central figure within this apocalyptic reality, Enoch, is portrayed as a mantic *sage who receives his wisdom directly from heavenly revelation (Collins 1997, 347).

The precise interaction of wisdom and apocalyptic in 1 Enoch is complex and debated. This is especially true when a certain literary form is attested in both the prophetic and sapiential literature (e.g., the “woe” form in 1 En. 96:8). Nevertheless, there are some clear examples where wisdom instruction has been integrated into an apocalyptic passage. For example, throughout the Epistle of Enoch (1 En. 91–107) there are numerous uses of wisdom forms and vocabulary (e.g., 1 En. 91:3; 94:1), including a reference within the Apocalypse of Weeks (1 En. 93:3–10; 91:11–17) to the reception of sevenfold instruction by the righteous (1 En. 93:10). Beyond the incorporation of sapiential elements into specific apocalypses within 1 Enoch, the general apocalyptic outlook of the book is thoroughly interwoven with references to wisdom and its corresponding themes (e.g., 1 En. 5:8; 37:1; 81:1–82:4; 99:10; 105:1–2).

3.2. Daniel. Although the book of Daniel lacks sapiential literary forms (as in 1 Enoch), its content provides the clearest example of the incorporation of mantic wisdom into an apocalyptic text. In fact, according to Müller, the redactional history of Daniel parallels the transition from mantic wisdom to apocalypticism. The court narratives in Daniel 2–6, widely held to be the earliest portions of the book, present

Daniel as a mantic sage who is gifted at interpreting the king’s dreams, far exceeding the abilities of his Babylonian counterparts. His commitment to prayer, abstention from idol worship, and devotion to the *law (Dan 1) set his mantic wisdom in a distinctively Jewish context.

However, the characterization of Daniel as a mantic sage becomes transformed through the addition of Daniel 7–12. Now, rather than interpreting the dreams and visions of the foreign king, the sagely Daniel is himself the recipient of divine revelation in the form of apocalyptic visions. Similarly, the content of the king’s dreams provides thematic continuity with the apocalyptic section of the book (compare Dan 2 and Dan 7). The blending of mantic wisdom and apocalyptic in the book of Daniel is further demonstrated by the similar role played by revelation in the two halves of the book. In both sections revelation comes through the medium of encoded dreams/visions (compare Dan 2; 4 with Dan 7; 8) or through the ability to interpret divine writings (compare Dan 5 with Dan 9). It appears that the theme in Daniel 2–6, that revealed wisdom enables the sage to make future predictions, has been appropriated by the author(s) of Daniel 7–12 as the model for the apocalyptic predictions of the future found there. These predictions go well beyond the near future of one kingdom as in Daniel 2–6 and encompass all of history in an eschatological program.

3.3. 4QInstruction (1Q26, 4Q415–18, 423). Among the collection of wisdom texts found among the *Dead Sea Scrolls, one that is of particular interest is 4QInstruction (= Sapiential Work A), which is often dated to the last century BC because the fragments are written in the Herodian script. The work is characterized by instructional material and exhortations that recall the traditional Israelite wisdom found in *Proverbs and *Sirach. The themes of virtues and vices, wealth and poverty, and social and familial relationships recur throughout the document. Furthermore, there are similar formal structures, such as the tendency to address the author’s instructions to “the understanding son/pupil” (e.g., 4Q417 2 I, 18 [cf. Prov 1:8]).

However, 4QInstruction is especially important because it is perhaps the earliest witness to the expression of an apocalyptic worldview through a composition that is thoroughly sapiential in form and content. Near the beginning of the document the motivation for living righteously is set in the dual contexts of God's ordering of the world and of final judgment and cosmic upheaval (4Q416 1 1-18). Righteousness and iniquity are often addressed within the framework of apocalyptic eschatology (e.g., 4Q418 126 1-10). This blending of sapiential ethics and apocalyptic eschatology is captured by the frequent use throughout the work of the enigmatic phrase raz nihēyeh, which may be translated as "the mystery that is to be" (Aitken, 186). It seems to refer to the comprehensive scope of the divine plan/will in all its creational, ethical and eschatological aspects and demonstrates the way in which the genre of wisdom could contain traditional sapiential material that had been reconceptualized into an apocalyptic worldview.

3.4. Wisdom of Solomon. Wisdom of Solomon is typically placed within the category of wisdom literature. This designation suggests itself by the pseudepigraphical attribution to *Solomon, the numerous references to wisdom, the use of didactic exhortation, and its inclusion of proverbs with formal similarities to those found in the books of Proverbs and Sirach. Yet perhaps more than any other Second Temple work, Wisdom of Solomon blurs the generic categories of wisdom and apocalyptic.

In Wisdom of Solomon 1–5 the exhortation to a life of wisdom, virtue and faithfulness occurs in the context of cosmology and eschatology and is grounded in the final judgment of the wicked and the vindication of the righteous. Wisdom is understood as salvific, the fail-proof guide to immortality (Wis 1:4-5; cf. Wis 8:17; 9:18). The apocalyptic tenor of these first five chapters has led some commentators to designate this section of Wisdom of Solomon as "the book of eschatology." Furthermore, these chapters contain some striking parallels to 1 Enoch. The final judgment in Wisdom of Solomon 5 is similar to 1 Enoch 62–63, and the method of reasoning in Wisdom of Solomon 2–5 resembles that in 1 Enoch 102–104. Even throughout the rest of the book wisdom is portrayed in cosmic and universalistic terms. These connections have led many to conclude that the author has adopted the apocalyptic tradition and presented it through the lens of Hellenistic Jewish philosophy (Nickelsburg 2005, 28).

4. Wisdom and Apocalyptic: Compatibility and Distinctions.

From the perspective of the origins of apocalyptic and a survey of the apocalyptic literature it becomes clear that apocalyptic thought is best considered to be a particular kind of wisdom. This historical relationship implies that there is a certain amount of compatibility between the two.

Throughout the apocalypses revelation and hidden knowledge are characterized as wisdom, and the central figures themselves are portrayed more as sages than as prophets (e.g., Daniel and Enoch). The wisdom and apocalyptic worldviews thus share certain core convictions. Both see themselves as rooted in Israel's religious traditions and evidence an interest in both the Torah and the Prophets as authoritative. Both lay great emphasis on righteous living and the need for ethical exhortation. Both claim that revelation is ultimately from the God of Israel, and that Israel, as God's people, has certain covenantal obligations and privileges. Finally, both wisdom (especially Hellenistic wisdom) and apocalypticism share an interest in the structure of the universe as a medium of God's will and as inextricably linked to history, salvation and eschatology.

However, as the thought and literature of apocalyptic began to flourish, it developed characteristics and emphases that distinguished it from more traditional forms of Jewish wisdom. First, although especially similar to Hellenistic wisdom in some ways, Jewish apocalypticism lacked the philosophical orientation present in many of these texts. Rather, the apocalyptic texts tended to be oriented toward mythological/cosmic imagery. Second, in sapiential texts wisdom is generally available to all who pursue it and/or pray for it, but in apocalyptic texts wisdom is often encoded and mediated through dreams, visions or celestial patterns. Third, in wisdom literature revelation is often related to the Mosaic Torah, whereas in apocalyptic literature new revelation is presented, though it is viewed as compatible with the Mosaic Torah. Finally, as apocalypticism developed, it increasingly reflected both a spatial and a temporal dualism that generally was absent from sapiential thought. The spatial dualism concerns the dichotomy between heaven and earth, a barrier that only the specially gifted may traverse (e.g. 1 En. 17–19). Often what occurs in the heavenly realm has decisive implications for the earthly realm (e.g., Dan 10:10-21; Rev 6). The temporal dualism views all of history as divisible into two main epochs: the present age and the age to come (e.g., 1 En. 71:15; cf. Heb 1:1-2). The former is typically viewed as containing much evil and suffering, whereas the latter is characterized by the restoration of the good and the vindication of God's people. The transition point of these two ages is the direct and cataclysmic intervention of God.

The complexity of wisdom and apocalyptic in early Judaism resists their compartmentalization into two completely distinct phenomena. Rather, within the diverse spectrum of Second Temple Judaism the designations wisdom and apocalyptic reflect patterns of thought that, while not coextensive, have significant overlap.

See also WISDOM THEOLOGY; WISDOM AND PROPHECY.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. J. K. Aitken, "Apocalyptic, Revelation and Early Jewish Wisdom Literature," in New Heaven and New Earth: Prophecy and the Millennium; Essays in Honour of Anthony Gelston, ed. P. Harland and C. Hayward (VTSup 77; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1999) 181-93; R. A. Argall, 1 Enoch and Sirach: A Comparative Literary and Conceptual Analysis of the Themes of Revelation, Creation and Judgment (SBLEJL 8; Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1995); J. J. Collins, ed., Apocalyptic: Towards the Morphology of a Genre (SBLSS 14; Missoula, MT: Scholars Press, 1979); idem, Seers, Sybils and Sages in Hellenistic-Roman Judaism (JSJSup 54; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1997); idem, The Apocalyptic Imagination: An Introduction to Jewish Apocalyptic Literature (2nd ed.; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1998); J. G. Gammie, "Spatial and Ethical Dualism in Jewish Wisdom and Apocalyptic Literature," JBL 93 (1974) 356-85; P. Hanson, "Apocalypticism," IDBSup 29-34; idem, The Dawn of Apocalyptic: The Historical and Sociological Roots of Jewish Apocalyptic Eschatology (Philadelphia: Fortress, 1975); idem, "Jewish Apocalypticism against Its Near Eastern Environment," RB 78 (1971) 31-58; H.-P. Müller, "Mantische Weisheit und Apokalypitk," in Congress Volume: Uppsala, 1971 (VTSup 22; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1972) 268-93; H.-P. Müller and M. Krause, "כֹּהֵן," TDOT 4.364-85; G. W. E. Nickelsburg, 1 Enoch 1: A Commentary on the Book of 1 Enoch, Chapters 1-36; 81-108 (Hermeneia; Minneapolis: Fortress, 2001); idem, "Wisdom and Apocalypticism in Early Judaism: Some Points for Discussion," in Conflicted Boundaries in Wisdom and Apocalypticism, ed. B. G. Wright III and L. M. Wills (SBLSymS 35; Atlanta: Society of Biblical Literature, 2005) 17-37; C. Rowland, The Open Heaven: A Study of Apocalyptic in Judaism and Early Christianity (New York: Crossroad, 1982); D. S. Russell, The Method and Message of Jewish Apocalyptic, 200 BC-AD 100 (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1964); J. Z. Smith, "Wisdom and Apocalyptic," in Religious Syncretism in Antiquity: Essays in Conversation with Geo Widengren, ed. B. A. Pearson (SFCT 1; Missoula, MT: Scholars Press, 1975) 131-56; M. Stone, "Lists of Revealed Things in the Apocalyptic Literature," in Magnalia Dei: The Mighty Acts of God; Essays on the Bible and Archaeology in Memory of G. Ernest Wright, ed. F. M. Cross, W. E. Lemke and P. D. Miller (Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1976) 414-54; J. C. VanderKam, Enoch and the Growth of an Apocalyptic Tradition (CBQMS 16; Washington, DC: Catholic Biblical Association of America, 1984); idem, "Prophecy and Apocalypitics in the Ancient Near East," in From Revelation to Canon: Studies in the Hebrew Bible and Second Temple Literature (JSJSup 62; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 2000a), 255-75; idem, "The Prophetic-Sapiential Origins of Apocalyptic Thought," in From Revelation to Canon: Studies in the Hebrew Bible and Second Temple Literature (JSJSup 62; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 2000b) 241-54; G. von Rad, Old Testament Theology (2 vols.; New York: Harper, 1962-1965); idem, Wisdom in Israel (Nashville: Abingdon, 1972); R. R. Wilson, "From Prophecy to Apocalyptic: Reflections on the Shape of Israelite Religion," Semeia 21 (1981) 79-95. B. C. Gregory

WISDOM AND BIBLICAL THEOLOGY

The OT Wisdom literature is marked by several prominent emphases. For this reason, until recent times most OT theologies tended to neglect or discount wisdom because it did not seem to fit well into theological syntheses that were derived from the major tenets of salvation history. Since the latter part of the twentieth century, however, wisdom increasingly and rightfully has come to be recognized as having a vital place not only in OT theology, but also in the theology of the entire biblical *canon.

1. Emphases of Old Testament Wisdom
2. Neglect of Wisdom in Biblical Theology
3. Connections between Wisdom and Other Old Testament Texts
4. Place of Wisdom in Old Testament Theology
5. Place of Wisdom in Biblical Theology

1. Emphases of Old Testament Wisdom.

Because OT wisdom bears many similarities to the wisdom texts of other ancient Near Eastern civilizations, it has often been dismissed as secular. Nevertheless, a careful reading of the wisdom books evidences that wisdom functions within the same theistic worldview that permeates the rest of the OT. Although R. Murphy and L. Perdue likely overstate the case when they follow W. Zimmerli in describing wisdom theology as creation theology, it is undeniable that wisdom speaks of the world that has been shaped and is now being governed by the all-wise Creator (Clements 1995, 271). Proverbs 3:19 states that Yahweh by wisdom founded the earth. He has imbedded wisdom in the world, and humans are challenged to seek diligently for it (Prov 4:7).

Wisdom uses an inductive approach as it observes carefully the natural and human world. As it detects general patterns of cause and effect, it derives from them lessons that can be applied to other situations. C. Grizzard (214) notes that the wisdom sages “learned about God by studying God’s creation, including humanity. They found evidence of God’s power and purposes in the rhythms of nature and urged their followers to incorporate that order into their own lives even as they also acknowledged that there would always be matters they could not understand.” An example of this procedure of wisdom can be seen in Proverbs 6:6-11, in which the observation of the ant (Prov 6:6) yields a pattern of industrious work (Prov 6:7-8) that is taught as a warning to the sluggard (Prov 6:9-11).

The underlying sense of wisdom in the Hebrew Bible is skill in a variety of contexts. In the OT wisdom books wisdom is defined especially in the moral sense of skill in living. More specifically, wisdom is skill in living according to Yahweh’s moral order. The beginning of wisdom is the fear of Yahweh (Prov 9:10)—that is, deep respect and reverence for Yahweh that prompts one to follow his way (see Fear of the Lord). As B. Waltke (1979, 389) observes, biblical wisdom places its trust not merely in the order observable in Yahweh’s world, but rather in Yahweh himself, who ordered the world (Prov 3:5). OT wisdom, and in particular the book of *Proverbs, distinguishes between two divergent paths of behavior. On the one hand, wisdom reveres Yahweh’s word and character, and thus follows the path characterized by righteous behavior that results in life in all of its dimensions; on the other hand, *folly values autonomy rather than revering Yahweh’s word and character, so it chooses to follow the path characterized by wicked behavior that results in death in all of its manifestations (see Chaos and Death).

The linkage between a person’s acts and the resulting consequences has often been called *“retribution,” and its classic expression can be seen in Proverbs 26:28 (NASB): “He who digs a pit will fall into it, and he who rolls a stone, it will come back on him.” In the book of *Job this general cause-and-effect pattern is elevated into a rigid dogma of retribution theology in which Job’s experience of calamity is assessed by his three friends as proof positive of his personal sin. Job himself also assumes the validity of the retribution formula, but he cannot reconcile his confidence in his own innocence with the calamity that he is experiencing. What Job and his comforters learn from Yahweh is that there are aspects of experience that transcend human understanding, and that cannot be forced into the retribution formula. Indeed, Proverbs itself teaches this truth: “Man’s steps are ordained by the LORD. How then can man understand his way?” (Prov 20:24 NASB). This element of divine mystery prompted in OT wisdom the consideration of *theodicy, the attempt to understand why bad things happen to good people in the world governed by the sovereign God who is both all-powerful and completely good.

Contemporary education typically focuses on what the learner is to know or what the student is to do. By contrast, the predominant concern of OT wisdom is what the human is to be. Character formation is at the heart of true wisdom; as M. Fox (620) states, “Wisdom is a configuration of soul; it is moral character. And fostering moral character, it is no understatement to say, is at all times the greatest goal of education.”

2. Neglect of Wisdom in Biblical Theology.

Many of the distinctive emphases of OT wisdom have been viewed as though they are unique to the wisdom books, with the result that early OT theologies scarcely mention wisdom at all. R. Whybray (116) concludes from this omission that “Proverbs seems in fact to have been generally regarded as a rather commonplace and pedestrian moral handbook with little theological content.” This neglect of wisdom continued throughout the heyday of the biblical theology movement during the middle of the twentieth century, as the various major proposed centers of OT theology tended to marginalize the wisdom texts (for examples, see Ollenburger). For example, both W. Eichrodt's focus on covenant and G. von Rad's emphasis on salvation history had the effect of pushing wisdom to the periphery. Although subsequently von Rad did indeed write a seminal volume on wisdom in Israel, he viewed wisdom as Israel's response to God rather than as an integral part of the divine revelation.

It is undeniable that wisdom has a set of emphases different from those that are prominent in the OT *law, history and prophecy. K. Farmer (30) summarizes the data well:

The "mighty acts of God" in Israel's history (the exodus, the giving of the law at Sinai, the crossing of the Jordan, etc.) are neither celebrated nor remembered in Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, and Job. Unlike Israel's salvation history, which sees evidence of God's activity in extraordinary events, the wisdom writings are primarily concerned with the regularities of ordinary life. The covenant between God and Israel, which plays such an important part in the religion of Israel, is seldom if ever mentioned by the wisdom writers. The only statements they make about God's actions in the past concern the creation of the world, not the creation of Israel.

When biblical theology is defined in terms of the events of salvation history, as has been typical in most of the prominent OT theologies, then wisdom is necessarily relegated to the margins.

In some cases, rather than being treated with benign neglect, wisdom has suffered outright rejection by biblical theologians. For instance, H. Preuss fixes his attention on the similarities between biblical wisdom and the wisdom texts from Egypt and Mesopotamia. He concludes from these parallels that biblical wisdom has borrowed material that is essentially pagan, and consequently the wisdom corpus is totally alien to the faith of Israel. From a different direction, but with the same effect, many biblical scholars seem to evidence an implicit prejudice in favor of special revelation and against general revelation. As a result, the Law and Prophets, with their frequent "Thus saith the LORD" statements, are regarded more favorably than the divine truth mediated through human observation that predominates in the Wisdom literature. Wisdom, then, often comes to be regarded as secular and inferior and therefore is presumed to have little of significance to contribute to biblical theology.

3. Connections between Wisdom and Other Old Testament Texts.

It is evident that the wisdom books have distinctive emphases that are not found as frequently in other OT texts. Nevertheless, that should not obscure the fact that there are many significant parallels between wisdom and the other portions of the OT. In contrast to the ancient Near Eastern wisdom texts, biblical wisdom bears the marks of monotheistic Yahwism. When Yahweh speaks to Job from the whirlwind, he is the same deity who is revealed in the Law, the Prophets and *Psalms. Similarly, the God of wisdom is the sole creator of heaven and earth (see Prov 8:22-31), just as in the narratives in Genesis 1—2. Furthermore, the God presented in wisdom has the same attributes as the God who is described in the prophets, and to whom the psalmists address their praise and prayer.

Even a casual reading of the wisdom books reveals that the actions and attitudes that are condemned as folly and wickedness are the same kind as those that are prohibited in the law and denounced by the prophets. In the study of a specific passage, P. Overland (440) demonstrates that Proverbs 3:1-12 is rooted in the Shema of Deuteronomy 6:4-9 to such an extent that "the product was a sapiential rendition of classic covenantal piety." Throughout the prophetic texts the themes, literary features and images of wisdom are employed frequently, and the link between acts and consequences found in wisdom is so pronounced in prophecy that some scholars have regarded wisdom as the application of the prophetic theme of divine justice to the mundane experiences of everyday life (Clements 1976, 100-101). Assessing the substantial similarities between the Wisdom literature and the legal and prophetic literature, Waltke (2004, 67) concludes, "Moses, the prophets, and the sages were true spiritual yokefellows sharing the same Lord, cultus, faith, hope, anthropology, and epistemology, speaking with the same authority, and making similar religious and ethical demands on their hearers. In short, they drank from the same spiritual well."

The presumption that wisdom is secular runs aground on the fact that the Psalter, which embodies the *worship and piety of ancient Israel, makes ample use of wisdom features (see Cult, Worship: Wisdom). Nearly thirty psalms have been categorized by various scholars as wisdom psalms due to the parallels between their language and themes and those that are prominent in the wisdom books. What qualifies a psalm to be considered a wisdom psalm is still much in question, but at very least it must be acknowledged that about a dozen psalms have a sufficient concentration of wisdom language that they can be read side by side with the traditional wisdom of Proverbs (e.g., Pss 1; 37; 119) or the speculative wisdom of Job and *Ecclesiastes (e.g., Pss 39; 49; 73).

It should also be noted that theodicy, which is such a prominent theme in the Wisdom literature, finds expression in other parts of the OT as well. The prophets Jeremiah and Habakkuk cry out about evil that has afflicted those who are innocent, and Psalm 49 and Psalm 73 consider the obverse side of the issue, when those who are evil seem to enjoy undiluted good. The challenges to retribution theology that permeate Job and Ecclesiastes, then, find similar expression in the psalmic and prophetic traditions as well.

It is clear that OT wisdom tends to have emphases that are in large part different from the major concerns of the rest of the OT. At the same time, however, the substantial connections between the wisdom books and the other OT texts demonstrate an underlying unity of thought. OT theology, then, must recognize the differences without making wisdom foreign to the biblical corpus, and it also must highlight the similarities without subsuming wisdom under a central theme, such as covenant, salvation history or the acts of Yahweh, that is too specific to allow wisdom to speak with its own distinctive voice. D. Hubbard (16) points in the right direction as he considers the proper place for wisdom in OT theology: "Prophets, sages, psalmists, court historians—all had access to the same resources in the history, worship, and folk ethos of the people. They differed in emphasis but not in basic orientation. They all saw their God, Yahweh, as Lord of nature, history, and personal experience; but they chose different ways of making this lordship known." At many places wisdom reinforces themes expressed in the Law, the Prophets and Psalms, but even in its distinctive differences wisdom does not contradict the rest of the OT but rather it supplements what is taught elsewhere.

4. Place of Wisdom in Old Testament Theology.

In contrast to von Rad, who speaks of multiple theologies in the OT, it is better to step back to consider the broader worldview that encompasses the entire OT canon. Although the various OT texts clearly have their own distinctive emphases, they share a common understanding of reality. Wisdom has much to contribute to this perceptual framework that pervades the OT. Murphy (1978, 39-40) notes well, "The average Israelite shared to some extent in the sapiential understanding of reality (which was, without doubt, not alien to Yahwism for them). Such an understanding was not a mode of thinking cultivated exclusively by one class; it was shared at all levels of society that interpreted daily experience. It came to be crystallized in a recognizable body of 'wisdom literature,' but the mentality itself was much broader than the literary remains that have come down to us."

Every worldview provides answers to several basic questions. The answers that wisdom gives to the worldview questions correlate well with the answers given in the rest of the OT texts. In answering the question "What is real?" wisdom regards Yahweh as the creator of all of the universe and of all humans. Because he has created all humans, he is concerned for both the rich and the poor, the Jews and the Gentiles. Yahweh's interests, then, include but transcend the covenant nation of Israel to address humanity as a whole.

Wisdom does not speak directly to the worldview issue of what it means to be human, but implicitly it views humans as created in the image of God (cf. Gen 1:26-27). Being made in the image of God, humans are enjoined to imitate their Creator in their behavior. Humans are called to become like Yahweh so that they can live in fellowship with him and thus live up to the unique purpose for which he created them. The prominent wisdom motif of the path of wisdom fits well with the descriptions of godly individuals such as Enoch and Noah walking with God (Gen 5:22, 24; 6:9) and the divine call to Abram to walk before God and be blameless (Gen 17:1).

It is evident that the most prominent theological contribution of wisdom is in the area of *ethics, as it answers the worldview question “What has value?” All human behavior is evaluated by Yahweh (Prov 17:3). Because Yahweh is inherently holy, what he commands is right. The legal stipulations in the Pentateuch, and the prophetic challenges drawn from them, express the standard that God has established for humans. These divine legal demands are clear, but they do not cover all areas of human experience, and it is at this point that the Wisdom literature forms a supplement to the legal literature of the OT. D. Kidner (13) explains, “There are details of character small enough to escape the mesh of the law and the broadsides of the prophets, and yet decisive in personal dealings. Proverbs moves in this realm, asking what a person is like to live with, or to employ; how he manages his affairs, his time and himself.”

When wisdom sayings recommend human behaviors that correspond to what Yahweh does elsewhere in the OT, it is evident that wisdom views behavior that imitates God as good. C. Wright (41) observes that “many of the little details of behavior commended in the book [of Proverbs] do indeed reflect the character of God himself. There is emphasis on the virtues of faithfulness, kindness, work, compassion, social justice, especially for the poor and oppressed, generosity, impartiality, truthfulness and integrity. All of these reflect the character and concerns of the LORD God.” This ethical standard of imitatio Dei, which can be found in explicit form in Leviticus 19:2, “You shall be holy, for I, the LORD your God, am holy,” anticipates the more familiar NT standard of the imitation of Christ, which is really just a specification of imitatio Dei, because Christ is God incarnate.

The contrasting paths of wisdom (which equals *righteousness) and folly (which equals wickedness) produce an abundance of antithetical sayings in the wisdom texts. The Wisdom literature, then, teaches that what is wrong is what deviates from God’s righteous path. Folly is the failure or refusal to reverence Yahweh (Prov 1:7). Departing from the fear of Yahweh is to take the path of folly, which leads to destruction in all of its forms. Proverbs 3:5 contrasts trust in Yahweh (the path of wisdom) with leaning on one’s own understanding, an insistence upon human autonomy that is at the root of folly and wickedness (cf. Gen 3:6; Jer 17:9).

Although the wisdom books do not speak specifically of the history of the covenant nation of Israel, they do answer some aspects of the worldview question “Where is history going?” The OT speaks more broadly than just the election and history of Israel, because Genesis 1—11 traces God’s dealings with humanity as a single unity. Even when Yahweh calls Abram, he says that in Abram all the families of the earth would receive divine blessing (Gen 12:3). Perdue (343) is correct, then, when he says, “For the sages, divine activity and providence cannot be limited to Israel’s election and history. Election may be properly understood only within the larger theological parameters of divine creation and providential rule over cosmos and history.” OT wisdom presents Yahweh as sovereignly directing history to his own ends, which may well be inscrutable to humans (Job 42:2; Prov 16:9; 20:24; 21:1).

The final worldview question is “What can be known, and how can it be known?” Much of the OT features God speaking directly to humans in special revelation, so that, for example, the prophets frequently preface their oracles with the expression “Thus saith the LORD.” In the wisdom books, for the most part God communicates to humans through general revelation. Humans are challenged to observe Yahweh’s world and reflect upon his imbedded moral order in his creation so that they can derive lessons for life (e.g., Prov 6:6-11; 24:30-34). This proper approach of natural theology yields divine truth that supplements the truth that God elsewhere reveals through Moses and the prophets.

As wisdom answers the basic worldview questions, it reflects a theological understanding that corresponds with teaching found in the rest of the OT. Wisdom, then, though it has emphases that in many cases are different from the Law, the Prophets and Psalms, does not constitute a disparate worldview. Rather, its contributions complement and supplement what is taught elsewhere in the OT texts.

5. Place of Wisdom in Biblical Theology.

For Christian readers, it is evident that the OT narrates a story that is completed only in the NT. The creation that has been marred by sin early in the OT finds its restoration only at the end of the NT. The two Testaments fit together like a two-volume novel or a two-reel film, with the OT anticipating the NT, and the NT referring back to the OT. Therefore, it seems misguided to read the OT in isolation and to construe its meaning as though it were a complete story in itself.

It may well be that the various attempts by OT theologians to ascertain the center of the OT have failed at this very point. Just as an exclusive focus on covenant, salvation history or the mighty acts of Yahweh has obscured the contributions of wisdom to OT theology, so too viewing the OT in isolation from the NT could well lead to theological distortions. J. Barr correctly champions the agenda of biblical theology, and he rightfully urges that in this effort NT texts be seriously engaged rather than treated superficially.

The contributions of the OT wisdom books to this agenda of biblical theology have only been sketched to date, and much important work remains to be done by scholars. H. Blocher (25-26) has identified numerous links between the teaching ministry of Jesus and OT wisdom, as Jesus in his preaching and in his controversies with the scribes often employs wisdom language and techniques. In passages such as 1 Corinthians 1:18-31 and Colossians 2:1-8 Paul teaches that Christ is the wisdom of God, in contrast to the false human reasoning that permeated the Roman world of the first-century AD. These references suggest that there are likely many significant connections between wisdom and the NT that remain to be explicated and integrated by biblical theologians.

See also CREATION THEOLOGY; WISDOM THEOLOGY; WISDOM AND COVENANT; WISDOM AND PROPHECY.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. J. Barr, The Concept of Biblical Theology: An Old Testament Perspective (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1999); H. Blocher, "The Fear of the Lord as the 'Principle' of Wisdom," TynBul 28 (1977) 3-28; R. E. Clements, One Hundred Years of Old Testament Interpretation (Philadelphia: Westminster, 1976); idem, "Wisdom and Old Testament Theology," in Wisdom in Ancient Israel, ed. J. Day, R. P. Gordon and H. G. M. Williamson (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1995) 269-86; J. L. Crenshaw, Old Testament Wisdom: An Introduction (rev. ed.; Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 1998); W. Eichrodt, Theology of the Old Testament (2 vols.; OTL; Philadelphia: Westminster, 1961-1967 [1933-1939]); K. A. Farmer, "The Wisdom Books: Job, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes," in The Hebrew Bible Today: An Introduction to the Critical Issues, ed. S. L. McKenzie and M. P. Graham (Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 1998) 129-51; M. V. Fox, "Ideas of Wisdom in Proverbs 1-9," JBL 116 (1997) 613-33; J. Goldin-gay, "The 'Salvation History' Perspective and the 'Wisdom' Perspective within the Context of Biblical Theology," EvQ 51 (1979) 194-207; C. S. Grizzard, "The Scope of Theology in Wisdom Literature," in An Introduction to Wisdom Literature and the Psalms: Festschrift Marvin E. Tate, ed. H. W. Ballard Jr. and W. D. Tucker Jr. (Macon, GA: Mercer University Press, 2000) 195-214; D. A. Hubbard, "The Wisdom Movement and Israel's Covenant Faith," TynBul 17 (1966) 3-33; D. Kidner, Proverbs (TOTC 15; Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 1964); R. E. Murphy, "Wisdom—Theses and Hypotheses," in Israelite Wisdom: Theological and Literary Essays in Honor of Samuel Terrien, ed. J. G. Gammie et al. (Homage 3; Missoula, MT: Scholars Press, 1978) 35-42; idem, Proverbs (WBC 22; Nashville: Thomas Nelson, 1998); idem, "Can the Book of Proverbs Be a Player in 'Biblical Theology?'" BTB 31 (2001) 4-9; B. C. Ollenburger, ed., Old Testament Theology: Flowering and Future (rev. ed.; SBTs 1; Winona Lake, IN: Eisenbrauns, 2004); P. Overland, "Did the Sage Draw from the Shema? A Study of Proverbs 3:1-12," CBQ 62 (2000) 424-40; L. G. Perdue, Wisdom Literature: A Theological History (Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 2007); H. D. Preuss, Old Testament Theology (2 vols.; OTL; Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 1995-1996 [1991-1992]); C. H. H. Scobie, "The Place of Wisdom in Biblical Theology," BTB 14 (1984) 43-48; G. V. Smith, "Is There a Place for Job's Wisdom in Old Testament Theology?" TJ 13 (1992) 3-20; G. von Rad, Old Testament Theology (2 vols.; New York: Harper & Row, 1962-1965 [1957-1960]); idem, Wisdom in Israel (Nashville: Abingdon, 1972 [1970]); B. K. Waltke, "The Book of Proverbs and Old Testament Theology," BSac 136 (1979) 302-17; idem, The Book of Proverbs: Chapters 1-15 (NICOT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2004); R. N. Whybray, The Book of Proverbs: A Survey of Modern Study (HBI 1; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1995); C. J. H. Wright, Old Testament Ethics for the People of God (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 2004); W. Zimmerli, Old Testament Theology in Outline (Atlanta: John Knox, 1978 [1972]).

D. J. Estes

WISDOM AND COVENANT

It is often argued that the OT Wisdom literature rejects the key themes that are emphasized in the other books of the Hebrew Bible. Whereas the Pentateuch and the Prophets—and, for that matter, many of the other books found in the Writings—focus on the key themes of exodus and salvation history, temple and cultus, and the covenant between Yahweh and his people, none of these are prominent themes in the Wisdom literature. R. Murphy (36) has described the Wisdom literature as being “strangely silent” about God’s interventions in Israel’s history (exodus, covenant, cult, etc.). It is commonly suggested that the reason for this silence is that wisdom is a secular, humanistic discipline that is simply not interested in such religious matters. Clearly, covenant runs as a thread throughout the OT. Arguably present in the Creator’s relationship with Adam and Eve, it certainly is the backbone of all God’s dealings with his community in history—from Noah to Abraham to Moses and Israel to *David to Christ and beyond. If covenant is absent from the books of *Job, *Proverbs and *Ecclesiastes, it would indeed be a remarkable fact that sets these writings apart from the rest of the Bible, perhaps even indicating a competing ideology, as some have suggested.

We must remember, however, that the Wisdom literature communicates with the reader using contemplative techniques. The type of material that we read in the Wisdom literature is specifically designed to make us pause to give serious thought to the subject matter at hand. Wisdom communication is always subtle and skilful, and so a lack of conspicuous reference does not necessarily indicate the absence of a theme. Although the *sages are not preoccupied with explicit discussion of covenant as an overt theme (the word covenant occurs only twice in Job, once in Proverbs, not at all in Ecclesiastes), several features found in these books draw our attention to this type of relationship with God. These factors indicate that a proper understanding of covenant is essential if we are to attain the goal of wisdom: a life well lived.

1. The Fear of Yahweh
2. Proverbs and Deuteronomy
3. Shared Concerns of the Wisdom Literature and the Rest of the Old Testament
4. Covenant as Background to the Wisdom Literature
5. Conclusion

1. The Fear of Yahweh.

The first and major link between OT covenant theology and the Wisdom literature is found in the concept “the fear of the Lord.”* Israelite wisdom and the fear of Yahweh and are inseparably linked in the OT. We are told that the fear of the Lord is the beginning (Prov 1:7) and the end (Eccles 12:13) of wisdom, and all true Hebraic wisdom is saturated in this idea.

The importance of the fear of the Lord in the Wisdom literature is not difficult to spot. The prologue to the book of Proverbs (Prov 1:1-7) concludes with a summary statement for the reader to remember while reading the rest of the book: “Fear of Yahweh is the beginning of knowledge; wisdom and instruction fools despise.” This prologue to Proverbs emphasizes the vital importance of wisdom in the life of the reader, and the final verse of this packed exhortation stresses that there is no such thing as true wisdom apart from the fear of the Lord. The centrality of the fear of the Lord is further emphasized by the structural significance of this idea within the book. Proverbs divides into two major sections, with Proverbs 1—9 being dominated by lengthy instructions, whereas Proverbs 10—31 is shaped in the main by the pithy two-line sayings that we traditionally associate with proverbial wisdom. It is significant that “the fear of the Lord” brackets both of these major sections. Proverbs 9:10 reminds the reader, “The beginning of wisdom is fear of Yahweh; and knowledge of the Holy One is understanding,” whereas Proverbs 31:30 says that “a woman who fears Yahweh is to be praised.” This bracketing method informs the reader that the whole book should be read through the lens of the “fear of the Lord.” The image engendered by enveloping the major sections and the complete book with “fear of Yahweh” is one of true wisdom being inextricably linked to right relationship with the covenant God.

Similarly, the fear of God is integral to the framework of the book of Job. Job 1:1 relates that Job a man who “feared God and shunned evil,” and the key wisdom poem lying at the heart of the book reminds the reader in the thick of the debate that the essence of wisdom is remarkably simple: “To fear the Lord is wisdom; and to turn from evil is understanding” (Job 28:28). So the idea of the “fear of God” brackets the whole of the central debate about innocent *suffering. The message for the reader is the same as we see in Proverbs: there may be much in life that we struggle to understand, but in order to be “wise” we must fear God.

Equally, “the fear of God” provides thematic stepping stones through the complexities and contradictions of Ecclesiastes. Many aspects of life (e.g., labor, wealth, pleasure and even wisdom itself) are both endorsed and decried in the meandering deliberations of *Qohelet. The fear of God is not a prominent theme throughout the book, but it is never presented as having a negative flip side. All other aspects of life that come under Qohelet’s consideration may be both “good” and “bad.” However, the four occurrences of the fear of God in the book (Eccles 3:14; 5:7; 8:12-13; 12:13) are always without a down side. These orthodox statements in the midst of the complexity of Qohelet’s thought serve as beacons for the reader to chart a way through the text. Ecclesiastes’ epilogue concludes with a wonderful expression of the essential symmetry of the “fear of the Lord” in our quest for wisdom. Proverbs 1:7 tells us that the fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom, and Ecclesiastes 12:13 declares, “The end of the matter; all has been heard. Fear God and keep his commandments, for this is the whole duty of man.” The fear of Yahweh is essential to wisdom. It is wisdom’s beginning and end, and true wisdom is impossible to attain apart from this type of relationship with Yahweh. As we will see below, the idea of the fear of Yahweh is inexorably linked with the concept of covenant relationship between God and his people.

By way of aside, there is much discussion as to whether there is a difference between the “fear of Yahweh” and the “fear of God” or of “the Lord” (’adōnāy). Does one indicate covenantal relationship with Israel’s God, and the other a more general religious affiliation? R. Whybray (27) points out, “This God, whom [Qohelet] calls (ha-)Elohim but who is in fact identical with the Yahweh of the OT, is the sole creator of the world and holds the fate of every human being in his hands.” There can be little doubt that the original readers of the Wisdom books would have understood the “fear of Yahweh” and the “fear of God” as one and the same thing.

2. Proverbs and Deuteronomy.

How is it that the “fear of Yahweh” indicates the presence of covenant theology within the Wisdom books? There are two answers to this question: (1) Proverbs’ focus on the fear of Yahweh points us specifically to relationship with Israel’s covenant God as being key to true wisdom; (2) fear of Yahweh takes the reader deep into Israel’s covenant theology because of its intertextual links with the book of Deuteronomy.

To deal with the first (and most obvious) of these points very briefly, it is significant that Proverbs almost exclusively talks about the “fear of Yahweh,” the covenant God of Israel, rather than using the more generic terms for “god” or “the gods” that were shared by other nations. Wisdom had a very international flavor in the ancient Near East, and proverbial statements similar to ones found in Proverbs are found also in the ancient literature of many of the nations that were Israel’s neighbors. The fact that the authors and editors of Proverbs focus on the necessity to fear Yahweh if one is to be wise indicates that this is Israel’s own brand of wisdom. They did not simply adopt other ancient wisdom ideas but rather adapted them to conform to Israel’s own worldview. Therefore, they make it clear that true wisdom apart from relationship with Israel’s covenant God is a non sequitur—there can be no wisdom apart from covenant relationship. R. Van Leeuwen (33) points out the significance of the fear of Yahweh concept in terms of Israel’s covenant status:

With very few exceptions, Proverbs refers to God as ‘the LORD’ (Yahweh), the God who made covenant with Israel and led the people throughout history (cf. Gen 20:11; Eccl 12:13). Proverbs never uses אֱלֹהִים (’ēl, ‘god’) and uses אֱלֹהִים (’ēlōhim, the most common word for ‘god’ or ‘gods’) only three times: 2:5, parallel to ‘fear of the LORD’; 3:4; 25:2. The editors of Proverbs are very consistent in avoiding the suggestion that the God of the sages is any other than Israel’s covenant God, Yahweh (see Exod 3:15; 33:18-20; 34:6-7; John 1:14-18). Proverbs has profound similarities to ancient Near Eastern wisdom. Perhaps the consistent use of ‘Yahweh’ was meant to forestall the idea that the God of Proverbs was not Israel’s covenant God.

Second, it is Deuteronomy, a book structured according to the pattern of ancient Near Eastern covenantal treaties, that defines for us what it means to fear Yahweh. The “fear of Yahweh” concept is, of course, rooted in the biblical account of the Sinai covenant. When this covenant was forged between Yahweh and Israel, the people literally trembled with fear (Ex 20:18-21). However, we can see a movement in the biblical text whereby the reality of the Sinai experience comes to be used metaphorically to describe one's life response to God; it becomes a type of shorthand form of expressing total commitment to God. "The great phrase "the fear of the LORD" grounds human knowledge and wisdom (cf. 9:10) in humble service of Yahweh. . . . Although this phrase has its origin in the experience of God's numinous majesty (as at Sinai, Deut 4:9-10), it eventually has come to express the total claim of God upon humans and the total life-response of humans to God" (Van Leeuwen, 33).

It is Deuteronomy 10:12-13 that provides the "dictionary definition" of the fear of Yahweh as it functions throughout the rest of the Scriptures: "And now, Israel, what does the LORD your God require of you, but to fear the LORD your God, to walk in all his ways, to love him, to serve the LORD your God with all your heart and with all your soul, and to keep the commandments and statutes of the LORD, which I am commanding you today for your good?" These verses should be understood as an exegetical statement (see Christensen, 204). The main question ("What does the LORD your God require of you?") is answered by the initial central statement ("fear the LORD your God"), and each of the following statements explains what it actually means in reality to fear Yahweh ("walk in his ways, love him, serve him and keep his commandments"). In this definition a bridge is built between Israel's salvation history and their Wisdom literature. These are not separate entities, one focused on covenant and the other rejecting it; rather, they share the same concern: how does one live life well before the living God? Both sets of literature come to the conclusion that it is impossible to do so apart from real, and therefore inevitably covenant, relationship with God.

There are many other links between Deuteronomy and the OT Wisdom literature that show a common grounding in Israel's covenant-steeped worldview. Take, for example, the exhortation found in both sets of literature to "walk in the ways of Yahweh" (Deut 8:6; 11:22; cf. Prov 5:21; 11:20) or to choose between the ways of the Lord and the ways of the wicked, between life and death (Deut 30:15-20; cf. Prov 1—9, which is dominated by discussion of the two ways and the effect of choosing one over the other). Also, some commentators point out that the legal stipulations of Deuteronomy are expanded upon in the maxims of the Wisdom literature. The *law provides a bare minimum standard, a line that we must not cross. Proverbial wisdom, on the other hand, sets related goals that we should aspire to fulfill (Kline, 64-67).

Thus we can see that there is a very strong tie between the literature that focuses on covenant and salvation history (Exodus; Deuteronomy) and the OT Wisdom literature.

3. Shared Concerns of the Wisdom Literature and the Rest of the Old Testament.

It would be unwise to draw too sharp a distinction between the Wisdom literature and the rest of the OT, as some scholars are tempted to do. As well as the conceptual connection via the fear of Yahweh, the Wisdom literature shares many of the same concerns expressed in the OT books that are commonly considered to be "covenantal." A prime example of these common concerns is the importance of social justice and concern for the poor.

The Prophets often pointed out Israel's and Judah's breach of the covenant because of their failure to care for the weak and the voiceless in their societies (e.g., Is 1; Jer 7; Mal 3). Failure to care for widows, orphans and sojourners was one of the key factors that led to the fall of Israel and the exile of Judah. They broke covenant with Yahweh because they did not protect the weak in their society from exploitation. Similar concerns are endorsed in the Wisdom literature. Job, for example, defends himself by pointing out his care for widow, orphan and stranger (Job 31:16-23), thus setting the reader a high ethical example to follow. The observation of oppression is one of the most vexatious issues for Qohelet (Eccles 4:1-3; 5:8-9). Resolution of this problem can only be found in the book's summary statement that the whole duty of humankind is to "fear God and keep his commandments" (Eccles 12:13). Only in this way can society be transformed. Equally, the book of Proverbs says, "Blessed is he who is generous to the poor" (Prov 14:21), and "Whoever oppresses the poor insults his Maker" (Prov 14:31). Care for the vulnerable is just one of many possible examples that illustrate that the concerns of the Wisdom literature, though perhaps expressed in very different terms, often reflect the same themes found in the “classically covenantal” texts of the OT. Other examples include the prohibition of idolatry in the Torah and Prophets, which finds metaphorical expression in many texts in the Wisdom literature that speak against adultery, or the *creation theology of the Wisdom literature that strongly resonates with Genesis, or the common themes of family, vocation and ethics shared by both the Wisdom literature and the rest of the OT. The form of expression and some of the subject matter is indeed different in the Wisdom literature, but this does not mean that it speaks with an entirely different voice from the rest of the OT. As B. Waltke (64) points out, “The apparent lack of integration between Proverbs and the rest of the Old Testament . . . is more superficial than real.”

4. Covenant as Background to the Wisdom Literature.

As well as the many thematic similarities found in the Wisdom literature and the covenantal passages of the OT, we can also observe that the idea of covenant is vital if we are to understand what we read in Job, Proverbs and Ecclesiastes. Take Job, for example: what, exactly, is his problem? Clearly, he has suffered much, but then, the capricious gods of the ancient Near East could turn nasty at the drop of a hat. It is covenant relationship that lies at the heart of Job’s lament. Why does he take things so hard? Why does he not resort to the fatalism commonly found in ancient Near Eastern wisdom materials—“It was the will of the gods”? Job cries out because precisely he has a different expectation of his God. He speaks of the days when “the friendship of God was upon my tent; when the Almighty was yet with me” (Job 29:4-5). The close presence and benevolence of God are the very essence of covenant relationship. The gods are bound by nothing, but Job expected God to relate to him in a particular way. The essence of his complaint is based in the understanding that God had not kept his side of “the covenant deal.” If we remove covenant from Job, we cannot understand the central message of the book.

Similarly with Ecclesiastes, would Qohelet have experienced such a profound existential crisis if he did not have an expectation of justice and meaning in the ordering of daily reality? Why does Qohelet expect to find meaning and order “under the sun”? Because he has been led to this expectation by the history of Israel’s dealings with Yahweh. As M. Fox (51-70) points out, Qohelet believes in “righteousness”* and “justice,” and it is the observed lack of these characteristics in the surrounding reality of life that leads to his crisis of perspectives. Righteousness and justice are key aspects of the OT’s presentation of covenant and are characteristics to be expected of both parties to the covenant, both God and people. It is this lack of expected relationship between Creator and his creation that leads to Qohelet’s view that everything is meaningless. Once again, reading Ecclesiastes apart from covenant makes no sense.

Throughout all of the books of the Wisdom literature we can observe a very basic expectation of order or structure. We see this in the creation theology that is common to each of the three books (e.g., Job 37—39; Prov 8; Eccles 1). Due to this expression of an ordered reality, Proverbs is often misrepresented as presenting a mechanistic worldview: “If you do A, then you can expect B.” Both Job and Qohelet are disturbed by what they see to be a lack of order either in their lives or in the world round about them. This expectation of order is grounded in their belief in the existence of a divine-human contract.

In essence, Yahweh has promised to relate to his people in a certain way. Hence, the authors and editors of Proverbs are able to say, “If you follow a lifestyle that pleases God, you can expect positive consequences.” Equally, Job and Qohelet expect a certain stability and structure in the lives that they lead. Their crises arise in the discovery that life is often not like that. Their expectations are the logical consequence of their belief that there is a Creator God who orders all things, and that he is their God. “It is in the context of this conviction, that God is making the world work out, that wisdom’s practical teaching about life may be seen. Its content is similar to what we call ethics or what the salvation-history calls keeping the covenant, but its context . . . is very different” (Goldingay, 203). Wisdom material is very different in style and focus from the rest of the OT, but we should not let these differences lead us to the conclusion that covenant is absent. Covenantal ideas provide the backbone to the presuppositions of Israel’s wisdom worldview, and the three books of the Wisdom literature cannot be understood apart from covenant.

5. Conclusion.

Although the OT Wisdom literature is in many ways unique within the *canon of Scripture, it does not remove itself from the key theological concepts of that broader canon. The theme of covenant is not an explicit focus in Proverbs, Job and Ecclesiastes, but it does provide essential background for a proper understanding of these books. The authors/editors of these works are steeped in the Hebrew worldview, and the covenantal basis of that worldview shines through clearly in the Wisdom literature, even though its focus often is elsewhere.

See also FEAR OF THE LORD; GOD; WISDOM THEOLOGY; WISDOM AND PROPHECY.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. D. L. Christensen, Deuteronomy 1:1–21:9 (rev. ed.; WBC 6A; Nashville: Thomas Nelson, 2001); M. V. Fox, A Time to Tear Down and a Time to Build Up: A Rereading of Ecclesiastes (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1999); J. Goldingay, “The ‘Salvation History’ Perspective and the ‘Wisdom’ Perspective within the Context of Biblical Theology,” EvQ 51 (1979) 194-207; J. A. Grant, “Wisdom and Covenant: Revisiting Zimmerli,” EuroJTh 12.2 (2003) 103-13; D. A. Hubbard, “The Wisdom Movement and Israel’s Covenant Faith,” TynBul 17 (1966) 3-33; M. G. Kline, The Structure of Biblical Authority (Eugene, OR: Wipf & Stock, 1989); R. E. Murphy, “Wisdom—Theses and Hypotheses,” in Israelite Wisdom: Theological and Literary Essays in Honor of Samuel Terrien, ed. J. G. Gammie et al. (Missoula, MT: Scholars Press, 1978) 35-42; R. L. Schultz, “Unity or Diversity in Wisdom Theology? A Canonical and Covenantal Perspective,” TynBul 48 (1997) 271-306; R. C. Van Leeuwen, “The Book of Proverbs,” NIB 5.19-264; B. K. Waltke, The Book of Proverbs: Chapters 1-15 (NICOT; Grand Rapids, Eerdmans, 2004); R. N. Whybray, Ecclesiastes (NCBC; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1989).

J. A. Grant

WISDOM AND HISTORY

Introductions to biblical wisdom do not usually include a section on wisdom and history (Berry; Dell 2002, 107; Estes; a notable exception is Rendtorff 1977). It is often assumed that biblical Wisdom literature as a genre was not concerned with history per se but rather emphasized other elements of human existence, such as the training of leaders and children, or functioned as a corrective to Torah that at times challenged theological or ethical traditions (Berry, 6-9). The emphasis on the human condition in general and relationships between individuals is sometimes used to underline Israel’s dependence on extrabiblical wisdom literature, since there is apparently no space to see Yahweh’s saving acts in history in biblical Wisdom literature (Dell 2002, 107). In view of these issues, the first section of this article reviews the basic characteristics of OT history and historiography, and then follows a discussion of specific historical references found in biblical Wisdom literature. The question of how major themes of OT Wisdom literature interact with history and historiography is the subject of the next section. Particular attention is given to the motifs of “God is in control,” “A godly life is a happy life,” “building of God’s house” and “paradise regained.” Some scholars have argued for the inclusion of the books of Daniel and *Esther among the corpus of biblical Wisdom literature. Thus, the following section looks at these two books and highlights their perspective on history, as well as selected included historical references, and compares their perspective with the one of classical Wisdom literature already described. Finally, a conclusion summarizes the findings of this article and points to further research in this particular field.

1. The Nature of Old Testament History and Historiography
2. Historical References in Wisdom Literature
3. Important Themes in Wisdom Literature and Their Links to History
4. History in Borderline Books: Daniel and Esther
5. Conclusions

1. The Nature of Old Testament History and Historiography.

The past thirty years have witnessed an ongoing debate concerning the historicity and historiography of the texts of the Hebrew Bible. Scholars such as J. van Seters (1975; 1983; more synthesized, 1995), T. Thompson (1974; 1987; 1992), P. Davies (1992; 2002), N. Lemche (1985; 1988; 1996 [1998]) and others have challenged the notion of the basic historicity of the biblical texts. In fact, their challenge went beyond the mere question of historical references and reliability and focused upon the genre of history writing per se. This is not the place to rehash the heated debate between those scholars who ascribe minimal historical intention and historicity to the biblical texts and those who perceive the biblical authors as intentional (hi)story tellers, attributing an underlying historicity to the biblical text (see DOTP, Historical Criticism, 404-6; Kofoed). Biblical historiography is characterized by its specificity and is often marked by its theological, selective, interpretive, biographical and intentional nature (see DOTP, Historical Criticism, 401-20; Long 1994; 2002; Provan, Long and Longman, 3-97). One of the underlying issues in which modern scholarship often seems to misread biblical history writing involves the matter of successful communication. After all, every author, regardless of his or her intentions, convictions and presuppositions, wants to communicate effectively. In this sense, sociolinguistic pragmatics provides a helpful window, reminding us that language is generally used to communicate intentionally. Although this is not the ultimate proof of the historicity of biblical texts, it highlights a sense of the interaction reported in biblical narrative and the suggested contexts that resemble the realities of natural, everyday communicative action (Winther-Nielsen, 76-78).

Up to this point, most observations concerning the historicity of biblical historiographical writing presupposed narrative texts. In other words, the discussion concerning biblical historiography deals generally and often exclusively with narrative texts. Stories seem to be the arena of history, and much ink has been used to define the relationship between the two (Millard; Chisholm). As has been pointed out by J. Kofoed (190-247), this issue boils down to the question of the genre of history writing. Due to rigid genre distinctions, some scholars discount any nonnarrative texts as ahistorical and irrelevant for the historical endeavor, pointing to their underlying intentions, theology, ideology or focal point as arguments for their nonhistorical nature. A case in point for this phenomenon is seen in the poetics of biblical narrative, which have been studied over the past decades (Sternberg; Berlin) and have provided useful categories for describing the artistry of biblical narrative along the lines of poetic discourse. Three relevant elements of biblical narrative poetics involve the scenicness, the subtleness and the succinctness of the narratives of the Hebrew Bible (Provan, Long and Longman, 91-93). In other words, biblical narratives seem to share a particular “canon” of characteristics that echo components associated generally with poetry.

If so, would it be possible to posit the possibility of other genres (including wisdom) being relevant for the historiographical endeavor? Obviously, biblical Wisdom literature is set in a specific cultural, political and religious context and thus reflects and, to a certain degree, communicates these realities. Although this historiographical interest is not the main focus of biblical wisdom, it seems to be latently present, emphasizing particularly the life conditions and life choices of individuals. As with any ancient text, perspective, literary style, theology (or ideology) as well as authorial intention need to be taken into consideration if one is to responsibly understand ancient history writing (see Veenhof, 28-34). It was the art of story telling (narrative), of proclaiming Yahweh’s will for his covenant people or the nations (prophetic texts), of teaching important life lessons (wisdom), or of producing legal or ritual texts that was done by the biblical authors, and this art needs to be recognized. In this context it is particularly interesting to look at the neighbors of ancient Israelites and their perception of the interaction between the individual, the community (be it family, clan, tribe, or people) and *time.

In Egypt the preferred historiographical method was not the sort of interpretive history that had its beginnings in the Western tradition with Herodotus and Thucydides, but the past was seen as a repository of knowledge and wisdom (Kadish, 110) that did not emphasize long chronological lines but often employed biographical inscriptions or localized annals that were more often than not disconnected (Simpson, 191) and lacked the broad sequential perspective so typical of Western historiography. Mesopotamian history writing was distinct and often employed the genres of annals, synchronistic histories and king lists (Veenhof, 42-48). Fictional *autobiography has also been described as an important Mesopotamian genre that is not automatically devoid of historical value due to its fictional or intentionally imaginative nature (Longman 1991, 209-10). Interestingly, the didactic nature (or at least ending) of many of the Akkadian fictional autobiographies suggests a fascinating link to biblical Wisdom literature that also combines the individual perspective with the didactic concern of communicating valuable experiences to a new generation (Longman 1991, 127). Furthermore, as has been shown by A. Cohen in his study of dehistoricizing strategies in third-millennium BC cuneiform royal inscriptions and rituals, it was often the unlinking of a text from a particular historical context that gave it authority and even pointed to the divine realm, where the passage of time is a nonissue. All these considerations of literary strategies, genres and historiographic perspective are indeed helpful in our quest to locate the nexus between history and wisdom in the context of the OT. However, biblical wisdom is also different from other ancient Near Eastern literature inasmuch as it is part of the Bible, with its authority claim based on divine inspiration and revelation. If Scripture's own claim of divine origin is indeed true and valid (2 Tim 3:16), its authority is not exclusively based on historicity but rather points beyond to issues of hermeneutical presuppositions and personal faith commitments. The following section looks at some of the historical references that appear in biblical Wisdom literature.

2. Historical References in Wisdom Literature.

History requires three essential elements: time, space and (mostly) action. Whatever we do happens in time and space. In this section particular attention is given to the embedded historical references in biblical Wisdom literature, including place names, personal names and clear or possible historical allusions. The main focus of this section is on the classical biblical wisdom texts, including *Job, *Proverbs, *Ecclesiastes and *Song of Songs, as well as relevant wisdom psalms. The books of Esther and Daniel, which at times have been associated with wisdom literature (Talmon; Collins, 48-50, 69-70 [see also further bibliographical references there]), are treated separately in a subsequent section.

2.1. Space and Geography in Old Testament Wisdom Literature. Historical references generally involve references to places, people and particular historical events or situations. In reviewing the available data, one is surprised to see different patterns emerging when one considers the core of biblical wisdom texts. Whereas Job, Proverbs and Ecclesiastes include few references to specific places, the pictorial language of Song of Songs is full of geographical references. Some specific examples should suffice to illustrate this surprising trend, which suggests that biblical Wisdom literature does not seem to follow a "standard" pattern, particularly when it comes to the use of place references. Job 1:1 open the book with a reference to 'ereš 'ûš ("the land of Uz") a geographical reference that only occurs twice more in the Hebrew Bible (Jer 25:20-21; Lam 4:21) in regard to a location. Based on the biblical data, two possible locations can be inferred: a southern location in the vicinity of Edom (see Lam 4:21) and a northern site north-east of Palestine in the Hauran (see Hartley, 65-66). Other place references in the book of Job include Tema and Sheba (Job 6:19), which most probably refer to locations in Arabia and are associated with caravan routes (Liverani; Ricks, 1171; Yamauchi, 90-91). The last concrete geographical location mentioned in Job is Cush (Job 28:19), and this is associated with Hebrew piṭḏā, a semiprecious stone that has been identified as "topaz" (NIV, NKJV) or "peridot/chrysolite" (NLT), which refers to a silicate mineral found at various locations in the eastern and western desert of Egypt as well as the island of Zabargad in the Red Sea (Aston, Harrell and Shaw, 47). Apart from this limited number of specific geographical references, the book of Job includes quite a number of generic references, such as the city gate (Job 29:7 [of which city?]), the 'ārābā ("wilderness" [JPS, NASB, NIV], "wasteland" [NIV, NJB], "steppe" [NRSV; Rediverte Elberfelder Bibel]) and mēlēhā ("salt land" [JPS, NASB], "salt plains/flats" [NIV, NJB]) found in Job 39:6, as well as the Jordan River (Job 40:23).

Even fewer references to locations are found in Proverbs, which does not include any specific reference to any known place and only generic references to streets (Prov 1:20, 21), "public squares" (rēhōbōt [Prov 1:20; 5:16; 7:12; 22:13; 26:13]) and city gates (Prov 1:21; 8:3; 14:19; 22:22; 24:7; 31:23, 31). The situation is similar in Ecclesiastes, where Jerusalem is mentioned five times (Eccles 1:1, 12, 16; 2:7, 9), in contexts that seem to make reference to the personal experience of the author. In Ecclesiastes 2:8; 5:8 [MT 5:7] the technical term mēdinā ("province, satrapy") appears, a term that occurs often in post-exilic literature from the Persian period, though surprisingly it can also be found several times in the Ahab narrative in 1 Kings 20, which describes life during the ninth century BC.

The situation changes dramatically in Song of Songs. Places and geography seem to play a major role in the literary design and communication strategy of the book, and which may represent a conscious effort to reflect the importance of the spice trade in Iron Age Israel (Malena, 171-75). Places inside Palestine include En-Gedi (Song 1:14), the Sharon (Song 2:1), Mount Gilead (Song 4:1; 6:5), Tirzah (Song 6:4), Jerusalem (Song 1:5; 2:7; 3:5, 10; 5:8, 16; 6:4; 8:4), Mount Carmel (Song 7:5) and Baal Hamon (Song 8:11), whose exact location is not easily established (Schmitz). Outside Palestine proper, a significant number of locations are also referred to, often in the metaphorical language so characteristic of Song of Songs (Hess, 29-35). These geographical references include Kedar (Song 1:5), which in this context and due to the reference to the (black) tents of Kedar may point to nomadic tribes in Arabia (Knauf, ABD 4.9). Seven times a reference to Lebanon is found (Song 3:9, 4:8 [2x], 11, 15; 5:15; 7:5), often connected with the mountain range or specific characteristics associated with the mountain range (e.g., smells, wood, height, water). This particular geographical reference seems to play a very important role in the structural design of Song of Songs and highlights the broad dimension of the poet's love song (see Japhet; Müller).

The fact that the book includes so many references to locations outside the core land of Israel could be interpreted as a conscious literary strategy to go beyond the local realms. In other words, geography informs the literary and narrative perspective (see G. Klingbeil 2002b; Malina 2007). This love story is so big that the whole (known) world is just big enough to hold it (or compare it to). Other references outside of Israel include the crest of Amana, standing in parallelism to the top of Senir and the summit of Hermon (Song 4:8) and associated with the heights of the Lebanon. Further to the north, the city of Damascus is mentioned (Song 7:4). Transjordanian towns are also referred to several times. The location of Mahanaim (Song 6:13) is not entirely clear (Edelman [473] identifies Telul ed-Dhabab el Garbi as the biblical Mahanaim, while others identify the site as Penuel [Gaß, 447-48]), but Heshbon (Song 7:4) has been identified without a doubt. Similar to the other biblical Wisdom literature, Song of Songs also contains a significant number of nonspecific geographical indications, including references to "the city" (Song 3:2-3; 5:7 [possibly Jerusalem]), streets and squares (Song 3:2), a banqueting house (Song 2:4), the house of the mother (Song 8:2), the tower of David (Song 4:4), "the wilderness" (Song 8:5) and city walls and towers [of silver] (Song 8:9-10).

In view of all these geographical references, the interplay between the specific and the non-specific becomes immediately visible. One wonders why any author would mix both categories, particularly considering the overall purpose and intent of wisdom literature, which is to teach important ethical standards and reflect about profound life choices. One possible explanation of this intriguing phenomenon may be the conscious effort by the author(s) to make the observations, metaphors, comparisons or proverbs more abstract and thus more applicable to every place and situation. A similar observation has already been suggested for ritual appearing in narrative texts, where often (though not always) "specific" nonspecific location markers are employed in an effort to avoid shrine mentality without falling into the opposite danger of spiritualization of something very concrete (G. Klingbeil 2004, 509-11). In other words, this may be a conscious communication strategy by the author/editor that recognizes that human existence is located in space but is not limited to a particular space. Interestingly enough, in the case of Song of Songs it appears that the location references involving intra-Palestine, Transjordanian and Syrian places can be connected to the description of the extension of the kingdom of Israel during the time of united monarchy under *Solomon (cf. 1 Kings 4:21).

2.2. People in Old Testament Wisdom Literature. When it comes to people that are mentioned in the classical biblical Wisdom literature, a similar interplay between specific and generic persons can be noted. Job 1:1 introduces one of the protagonists of the book but does not supply the patronymic information so prevalent in the historical literature of the OT. What is supplied, however, is the place of habitation ("Uz"), a pattern that reoccurs in connection to Job's friends (Eliphaz the Temanite [Job 2:11], Bildad the Shuhite [Job 2:11], Zophar the Naamathite [Job 2:11]), although an exception to the rule should be noted when Elihu, the son of Barachel, the Buzite of the family of Ram (Job 32:2) is introduced. J. Hartley (429) considers the full patronymic formula an indication of Elihu's youth and lack of personal accomplishment. This is a possibility, but one should consider the literary conventions of the book. Would it be possible that by including full patronymic information (including tribal and clan information), the nameless author makes Elihu more real than the other three friends of Job? Many possible historical links for the pedigree of Elihu have been suggested (see Hartley, 428-29; Knauf, ABD 2.463), but it seems clear that by differentiating Elihu from all the other members of the cast, the author wants to emphasize his “rootedness” in history.

Besides the four friends and Job himself, no other clearly identifiable person appears in the book. However, numerous faceless people emerge onto the stage, suggesting again the pattern of a mix between the specific and the generic. The people of the east (Job 1:3) appear in a summary statement describing the incredible riches and blessings of Job prior to his afflictions as a fixed point for comparison. Representatives of distinct social strata appear in the speeches of both Job and his friends: day laborers (Job 7:1), slaves or servants (Job 7:2; 31:13), maidservants (Job 31:13), widows (Job 22:9; 24:3; 29:13; 31:16; 30:25; 31:19), “counselors” (yô’āšim [Job 12:17]), judges (Job 12:17) and kings (e.g., Job 3:14; 12:18; 15:24; 29:25). In the final narrative section Job’s brothers and sisters (Job 42:11) are mentioned, who seem to combine both the specific and the generic, given that the reader knows nothing about them except that they are related to Job. The final mention is reserved for three daughters of Job, who are specifically identified (Jemima, Keziah and Keren-Happuch [Job 42:14]), together with seven sons (unnamed [Job 42:13]) and a final reference to the last 140 years (historical time!) of Job’s life (Job 42:16).

One particular personage who appears in Job has not yet been described but requires further considerations. In Job 16:9-14 God is described as a divine warrior, employing military techniques involving siege techniques and archery (Hartley, 261). The metaphor of the divine warrior is well known in poetic and narrative literature of the OT (including Deuteronomy [Nelson], *Psalms [M. Klingbeil], Isaiah [Brettler] and Daniel [Anderson]) and may function as a link between Wisdom literature and historical and prophetic texts. In other words, the important concept of Yahweh fighting in time and space for his people Israel, which is linked to important events in the OT that are clearly understood by its authors to be historical (such as the exodus, the conquest, and the delivery of Jerusalem from the hands of the Neo-Assyrian assault), makes the appearance of this motif in Wisdom literature conspicuous and suggests a similar notion of historicity of these events as in other biblical books.

Proverbs contains a considerable number of references to different persons or groups. However, with the exception of the threefold reference to Solomon, son of *David, king of Israel (Prov 1:1; abbreviated version in Prov 10:1; 25:1) and the men of Hezekiah, the king of Judah (Prov 25:1), no clearly identifiable personality is referred to. To be sure, when Proverbs refers to Agur, it includes the patronymic reference “son of Jakeh” (Prov 30:1). Furthermore, this Agur is associated with Ithiel (Prov 30:1) and Ucal (Prov 30:1), but so far neither of these has been identified in a particular historical context. T. Longman (2006, 517-18) interprets the Hebrew noun hammaśśā’ as a gentilic reference to the Massaite, emending the Hebrew to hammaśśā’i, which may be an indication of a tribe in Arabia related to the Ishmaelites (Gen 25:14; 1 Chron 1:30). By an allegorization of the name and its patronymic addition, the midrash on Proverbs tried to retain Solomonic authorship (Visotzky, 117), while others have understood this name as a riddle whereby “Agur” means “I am a sojourner” and “Jakeh” represents an acronym for yhwh qādōšhū’ = “YHWH is holy” (Skehan, 27-45). However, the clear formulaic expression that appears over 1,500 times in the OT suggests a proper name of an unknown person who was considered to be the author or collector of the following sayings (Waltke, 465). Some scholars have interpreted the references to Ithiel and Ucal in Proverbs 30:1 not as personal names but rather as verbal forms, resulting in the translation “I am weary, O God, I am weary, O God, and I am exhausted” (Clifford, 259; also NLT, Rediverte Elberfelder Bibel). Although the syntax of this clause is slightly awkward, the pattern of the preposition lē + personal name is widely used in biblical Hebrew as an indication of an audience (e.g., Ex 14:5: lēmelek miṣrayim [“to the king of Egypt”]). Furthermore, the name “Ithiel” appears also in Nehemiah 11:7 in a list of Benjamite returnees who lived in Jerusalem. The final specific reference to a particular person in Proverbs is King Lemuel (Prov 31:1, 4 [along with his mother!]), who likewise has not been satisfactorily identified. It is interesting to note that in Proverbs 31:1 the appositive “king” does not include a definite article, and so the complete phrase should be translated as “The sayings of Lemuel, a king” (see Waltke, 501), which would further make him less specific.

Besides these limited references to specific individuals (who remain obscure to the modern reader anyway), Proverbs also includes numerous generic references, involving again all social strata and economic classes. The following list is incomplete but does provide a glance at the wide variety of people/groups mentioned: “prostitute” (ʾiṣṣā zônâ or simply zônâ [Prov 6:26; 7:10-18; 23:27; 29:3]), “adulteress” (zārôt = “strange [women]” [Prov 22:14] and ʾiṣṣā mēnā ʾāpet = “adulterous woman” [Prov 30:20]), maids serving at a table (Prov 9:3), kings and princes (e.g., Prov 14:28; 14:35; 19:10, 12), the poor (e.g., Prov 14:31; 19:4-5, 17; 22:2, 7, 16, 22), widow (Prov 15:25), the “laborer” (ʾāmēl [Prov 16:26]), the stranger (Prov 20:16) and orphans (Prov 23:10).

It could be argued that this impressive mix of people from all walks of life suggests the general applicability of the included proverbs, thus making biblical Wisdom literature a more democratic enterprise and combining royal, scribal and folk (or family) wisdom sayings. As already seen in the observations concerning places, the biblical author(s) of Proverbs combine some more specific references with generic references, which would have a twofold effect on the immediate audience: first, similar to modern brand names, it would raise the recognition value (“Ah, this comes from King Solomon or from King Agur or King Lemuel”); second, it would not be limiting itself to royal wisdom or any particular socioeconomic context.

Ecclesiastes seems to be designed along similar lines. The only possible recognizable figure in the book appears in the superscription (Eccles 1:1) and is described as qôhelet ben-dāwīd melek bîrûšālāim (“[the] preacher, the son of David, king in Jerusalem”). No exact name is given, although the canonical context (i.e., Proverbs and Song of Songs) as well as the wisdom tradition associated with Solomon (1 Kings 3–11 [see Brueggemann, 104-23]) would make Solomon the obvious choice for the identity of the preacher. Besides this hint at a particular (historical) person, the book contains quite a number of autobiographical references to the supposed author (e.g., Eccles 1:16-17; 2:1, 12; 4:13) that are always marked by the use of the first-person singular. Similar to Proverbs, other figures mentioned in Ecclesiastes are more of a generic type, such as the oppressed (Eccles 4:1), the poor (Eccles 4:13; 5:8; 6:8), whose reoccurring presence underlines the importance of this figure in biblical Wisdom literature (see Sticher, 304-15 discussing the importance and theology of the poor in wisdom psalms), princes (Eccles 10:15-16), the haughty one (Eccles 5:8) and “the laborer” (hāʾōbēd [Eccles 5:12]). Again the figures come from all walks of life, which may once more underline the generalizing intention of the author.

The situation in Song of Songs is slightly different. Solomon is mentioned several times (Song 1:1, 5; 3:7, 9, 11; 8:11, 12), often in a descriptive (or comparative) context that employs verbal third-person masculine singular forms. A more generic reference that has been interpreted as a reference to Solomon is the reference to “the king” (Song 1:4, 12). Other generic references in the book include the “daughters of Jerusalem” (Song 1:5; 2:7; 3:5, 10; 5:8, 16; 8:4) or the parallel expression “daughters of Zion” (Song 3:11), sixty warriors of Israel (Song 3:7) or the more undefined “warriors” (Song 4:4), lover (e.g., Song 4:1; 7:9, 10), watchmen (Song 5:7), maidens (Song 6:9), sixty queens and eighty concubines (Song 6:8, 9), the Shulammite (Song 6:13) and the prince’s daughter (Song 7:1). As can be easily seen when compared to the use of specific and nonspecific persons (or protagonists) in the earlier examples of biblical Wisdom literature, the use of persons in Song of Songs is indeed quite limited, most probably due to the particular purpose of the love poem. All protagonists mentioned in the text seem to be associated with the court, and there is no space, for example, for the poor or the widow and orphan who have been so prevalent in the Wisdom literature discussed earlier. Does that mean that the book was irrelevant to other socioeconomic groups outside the court? Definitely not, particularly when one considers the more abstract (or, rather, nonspecific) nature of the protagonists, which over the centuries caused so much discussion about the author and the historical Sitz im Leben of the book (see Tanner). Similar to modernity’s often absurd fascination with royal love stories, the choice of this nonspecific description may have been a way to increase interest and applicability of the main points of the poem. After all, love stories seem to run along similar lines throughout history.

2.3. Historical Allusions in Old Testament Wisdom Literature. As already observed in the discussion of the use of space and protagonists in biblical Wisdom literature, the historical allusions are generally nonspecific. At the same time, however, real life is described, but typically without providing specific time indications, which are quite common in the historical narrative literature of the OT. Job is described as a major stockman in Job 1:3. Seven thousand sheep, three thousand camels, five hundred yoke of oxen and five hundred donkeys represented considerable assets in the real world of the ancient Near East, and in cultic contexts seven thousand sheep indicated an immense collective offering for Yahweh that could be taken from booty (2 Chron 15:11) or given by leadership for particular celebrations (2 Chron 30:24). At the end of Job's ordeal, as part of his public restoration, Job receives twice as many sheep, camels, yoke of oxen and donkeys as he previously owned (Job 42:12). Although the data is tentative, it appears from the way the loss of his herds is communicated (Job 1:14-17) and based on the size of Job's herds that Job practiced transhumant herding, whereby shepherds led their animals on seasonal grazing expeditions (Borowski, 29-30). Other elements marking a regular life in the book of Job include the references to feasts, sacrifices and ritual (Job 1:4-5, 13; 42:8), the different raids by known tribal groups (Job 1:15, 17), weather phenomena such as lightning and tornados (Job 1:16, 18-19), disease (Job 2:7; 7:5), as well as the mourning rites (Job 1—2) that have been recognized as clearly matching other mourning rites in the OT (Thi Pham, 24-27).

Up to this point, all historical allusions in Job have been associated with the narrative prologue or epilogue. What about the actual wisdom texts sandwiched in between these narrative brackets? The natural world is ever present (Riede, 120-52), as seen in references to lion (Job 4:10-11; 38:39), moth (Job 4:19), wild donkey (Job 6:5; 11:12; 24:5; 39:5), ox (Job 6:5; 40:15), spider (Job 8:14), the "stupid" cattle (Job 18:3), dog (Job 18:11; 30:1), jackal (Job 30:29), owl (Job 30:29), raven (Job 38:41), mountain goat (Job 39:1), doe (Job 39:1), wild ox (Job 39:13), ostrich and stork (Job 39:13), horse (Job 39:18, 19-25), locust (Job 39:29), hawk (Job 39:26) and eagle (Job 39:27-30). Interestingly, this use of *animals for comparisons is known from other wisdom literature from the ancient Near East, particularly Sumerian proverbs (Alster 1997, esp. collection II). At a minimum, the author of Job was a keen observer of nature around him. It has been shown that animal comparison appears also repeatedly in the Historical Books (e.g., 1-2 Samuel [see Riede, 65-106]) together with other functions (see DOTHB, Agriculture and Animal Husbandry, 1-20), and their presence aims at providing fixed points of comparisons that resulted in making the text more real.

Famine (Job 5:20, 22; 30:3) and war (Job 5:20) appear as well as references to the mining business (Job 28:1-11) and "male shrine prostitutes" (qēddēšim [Job 36:14]), thus covering a wide spectrum of life experiences. Interestingly, the motif of the God who controls the weather repeatedly occurs in Job (Job 37:3-13; 38:22-30, 34-35) and squarely positions the book in the OT conflict between Yahweh and Baal (e.g., 1 Kings 17—18), which so is often played out in the history of Israel.

Similar to other ancient Near Eastern cultures, divine creation is one of the mainstays of Israel's worldview and appears readily in biblical Wisdom literature (Job 9:5-9; 14:15; 28:24-26; 33:4-6; 38; Prov 3:19-20; 8:22-31; 22:2; Eccles 11:5; 12:1 [see Crenshaw; Yee; Hermission]). References to creation appear in any text type or genre of the OT, and many studies have focused on this important theological motif (see Creation Theology). For the ancient Israelite, God's involvement in human history during the creation of the world (and thereafter as well) was a given (see Fanwar; Mulzac; Simkins) and stands in stark contrast to the disengagement of God from history in Western thought (Rae, 268). Outside of Wisdom literature, creation is often associated with covenant (Miller), which, however, does not appear to be the case here. What does creation have to do with history, one may wonder, especially living in an age where the origin of humanity is being explained by the theory of evolution? First, creation was not merely a theological dictum but rather was understood as a "real," historical event. In this sense, the scholarly emphasis on creation theology does not reflect the understanding of the ancient Israelite.

The OT talking about creation is phenomenological and does not always fit easily into modernity's scientific worldview. Second, by linking wisdom to creation, the biblical authors underline their concern for history. Wisdom develops in history and is also concerned with historical realities.

As already seen in the discussion of the historical allusions in Job, the author(s) of Proverbs anchor the sayings and proverbs in real life. Adultery, a sad reality in all historical periods, appears repeatedly (Prov 5:3-20; 6:24-35; 7:5-23) and is an important issue in the book. Parallel to the use of animals in Job, animals (both domesticated and wild) are repeatedly used in the comparative language of Proverbs (e.g., doe and deer [Prov 5:19], gazelle [Prov 6:5], bird [Prov 6:5], ant [Prov 6:6; 30:26], ox [Prov 7:22], deer [Prov 7:22], bear [Prov 17:12; 28:15], war horse [Prov 21:31], eagle [Prov 23:5], lamb and goat [Prov 27:26-27], lion [Prov 28:15; 30:30], rock badger [Prov 30:26], locust [Prov 30:27], lizard [Prov 30:28], cock [Prov 30:31]). All these animals are employed as particular examples of specific characteristics ("fast as," "roaring like," "busy as," etc.), and again careful observation of animal behavior in real life forms the basis of the comparison.

Other historical allusions involve references to different types of "sacrifices" (šēlāmim in Prov 7:14, and the more generic zebah in Prov 15:8; 21:27), which sometimes are set in contrast to heartfelt prayer and seem to echo (or prefigure, depending on how one dates biblical Wisdom literature) the prophetic critique of cult practice separated from a true change of heart and action in favor of the needy and oppressed. (1 Sam 15:22; Hos 6:6; Is 1:15-18; Jer 7 [see Zenger; Boecker; Callaway; Lange]). In this sense, Wisdom literature, with all its sayings, reflection and teachings, aims squarely at real life and critiques conditions that are not in harmony with the divine principles of right living. Another reference to the practical implications of right living is found in Proverbs 23:10, where the reader is commanded not to move ancient borders. Similarly, the lack of protection that the fatherless experience should not be used to enlarge one's own fields.

Proverbs 22:2 contains an important reference to divine creation (which is taken for granted) and emphasizes that both rich and poor are created by the same God and in this sense share a similar standing before God. Interestingly, the "tree of life" motif associated with creation appears in Proverbs 15:4, where its life-giving qualities are compared to soothing language ("gentle words" [NLT]). This is also connected to the "paradise regained" motif discussed below.

Ecclesiastes includes also quite a number of historical allusions, which are presented in a generic way. There are universal realities of life, such as the course of the sun, the wind and the journey of rivers, which are governed by eternal principles and do not change (Eccles 1:5-7). Seasons come and go, life cycles repeat themselves continuously (Eccles 3:1-8), including also the inevitable (historical) fact of death (Eccles 7:2; 9:2-6), and in the middle of it is God as the Creator and Sustainer (Eccles 3:11; 11:5; 12:1). Ecclesiastes is also full of things that happen in the real life. Building projects (Eccles 2:4-6), the purchasing of slaves (Eccles 2:7), the amassing of riches (Eccles 2:8), religious activity (Eccles 5:1-7) and warfare (Eccles 8:8) are among these historical allusions. Can one put a date or a place on these events? No, but their presence suggests the particular perspective of the author/editor of the volume, who seems to have come from the upper strata of society. The fact that the author ("preacher") writes in the first-person singular throughout most of the book suggests the communication of important information (including also historical hints). Although this is definitely not a conclusive argument for Solomonic authorship of the work (see Longman 1998, 2-9), in the overall design of the work it serves an important purpose, which, I think, is associated with a tendency to anchor the "wise" saying of *Qohelet in real life. This is a unique feature of Ecclesiastes that distinguishes the book from the rest of biblical Wisdom literature.

In contrast to the more numerous allusions to generic historical events in Job, Proverbs and Ecclesiastes, Song of Songs includes very few relevant references, which is most probably due to the particular nature of its content. As is already familiar from the other wisdom texts, there is description of the natural world, including animals (sheep [Song 1:8; 4:2], goats [Song 1:8; 4:1], mare [Song 1:9], gazelle [Song 2:7, 9, 17; 4:5; 7:3; 8:14], dove [Song 2:14; 5:2, 12; 6:9], fox [Song 2:15], stag [Song 2:9, 17; 8:14], lion [Song 4:8], leopard [Song 4:8], raven [Song 5:11]), plants and other beautifying products (Song 4:12-14) and precious stones (Song 5:13-16). In Song of Songs 8:6, reference is made to a seal, an important socioeconomic status marker that also was often an expression of the religious worldview and identity of its bearer (Hallo). The biblical author applies the characteristics and the way that this well-known everyday object was worn to the covenant relationship between the two lovers.

To summarize this section, it is clear that similar to the use of places and protagonists, one encounters the close interaction between specific and generic historical allusions whereby the generic (or nonspecific) allusions represent the vast majority. Often, “personal” histories are sought to be shaped by ethical statements that require choices by the individual. This character development is an important topic of biblical Wisdom literature (Brown) and focuses on “personal” history instead of the political history so dear to modern historiographical definitions and perspectives. The sum of these personal histories and choices will make up the “future” history of a people responsible to God because of the relationship between Creator and creation. In other words, the all-encompassing focus on creation that is so obvious in Wisdom literature goes beyond the theological realm and points to an understanding of history where Yahweh not only is the Creator (and thus in charge) but also requires obedience and ethical choices from his creation. In this sense, the emphasis is not so much on the collective choices and action that characterizes political and cultural history as on the individual (= social) history, a concept that can be seen also in other ancient Near Eastern cultures. One wonders why the natural world consistently appears in biblical Wisdom literature. Obviously, there is an important link to creation, but beyond this it seems to be a reflection of the close observation by the biblical authors that looked at the world around them as one that could teach valuable lessons for the human inhabitants of creation.

3. Important Themes in Wisdom Literature and Their Links to History.

In the following analysis several important themes of Wisdom literature and their importance for an appropriate understanding of biblical history and especially historiography are treated in summary fashion.

3.1. “God Is in Control” Motif. The motif of God’s control in human affairs represents a mainstay of biblical thinking. God not only is the Creator and originator of life but also is in control of human history and installs or deposes kings and princes (Dan 1:2; 2:21) and controls the lives of poor and rich, powerless and powerful (1 Sam 2:6-10). Although this particular concept has been connected to the so-called Deuteronomistic History (Collins, 160), it seems to be pervasive, including classical biblical wisdom literature. A good example is found in the prologue of Job, which provides a glimpse behind the veil separating heavenly and earthly realities (Job 1—2). As already mentioned, the creation focus in Wisdom literature seems to underscore this motif of God being in control. Sinners are consumed by the breath of God and perish at his anger (Job 4:9). God controls wisdom and “might” (gēbûrâ [Job 12:13]), an interesting combination because “might” occurs regularly in the biblical historical literature as a marker of military or political prowess (e.g., Ex 32:18; 1 Kings 15:23; 16:5, 27; 22:46). Due to his might, God can tear down, and it will not be rebuilt; he can shut out, and it will not be opened (Job 12:14). God is the giver of wealth and possessions and honor (Eccles 6:2) and gives and maintains life (Eccles 8:15). Above all, he is the judge of everyone, and he evaluates every deed (Job 21:22; Eccles 3:17; 11:9; 12:14)—truly a central characteristic of the motif of God’s control.

3.2. “A Godly Life Is a Happy Life” Motif. Biblical wisdom literature is full of practical advice that is to guarantee a happy life. The focus of this particular motif is not the big picture of kings, empires and multinational companies but rather the life of the individual. The accent on the personal over against the corporate or collective provides an interesting reflection of the thinking (or ideology) prevalent at the time of writing the biblical wisdom books. As with the motif of God being in control (see 3.1 above), the bigger picture is not completely out of focus. Kings, empires, peoples, the world and cosmic space appear and are interacted with, even though this appears not to be the main focus. As in other biblical texts, a delicate balance between the individual and the corporate perspective is being kept, since both perspectives occur together in many different genres (G. Klingbeil 2002a; Freund; Kaminsky), which seems to be a reflection of the basic anthropology of the Hebrew Bible (Janowski).

The emphasis of personal choices and personal piety and their direct bearing on one's life should also be connected to the important motif of "character development," which represents a major topic of wisdom literature (Brown). The development of the character is personal history and occurs in the reality of daily life. The emphasis on a personal history has already been mentioned in the discussion of ancient historiography and is quite distinct from modernity's infatuation with "objective historical data," which generally is mostly concerned with the history of the elite that affects the whole.

3.3. "Building of God's House" Motif. As has been pointed out by R. van Leeuwen, another important motif connecting biblical Wisdom literature to historical literature and thus suggesting an important link for the discussion of wisdom and history is the motif of the building of God's house (Prov 3:19-20), which in turn is linguistically and conceptually connected with God's work in creation (as already associated in Ps 78:69), the construction of the tabernacle (Ex 31:1-3; 35:30-31) and the building of Solomon's temple (1 Kings 4—6). More general house-description wisdom passages are found in Proverbs 9:1-6; 14:1; 24:3-4. It is particularly the building-of-God's-house motif that links Solomon with biblical wisdom, as can be seen in 1 Kings 4:29-30, 34; 5:12; 10:7. While many have questioned the direct link between Solomon and the origin and development of wisdom literature (e.g., Scott; Brueggemann, 116), others have argued for the existence of important wisdom schools (see Sages, Schools, Education) in the urban centers of the Late Bronze Age and the Iron Age as well as the existence of tribal or family wisdom traditions that may have fused in Israel in royal schools and, similar to other West Semitic wisdom texts, can be found in extrabiblical texts from the ninth and eighth centuries BC (Lemaire, 110-13), and a preexilic date for biblical Wisdom literature is not only possible but even more probable than its wholesale location in the postexilic or Persian period (Dell 2004). The absence of clear references to the exile in biblical Wisdom literature seems to also point in the direction of a preexilic date for the composition of the larger portion of biblical wisdom texts, considering the fact that exile represents an important motif in later historical literature (McConville). After all, why would such an all-encompassing issue not be mentioned in texts that seek to guide in practical life issues?

3.4. "Paradise Regained" Motif. As has been shown by V. Hurowitz, references to motifs associated with the paradise narrative of Genesis 2 are found quite regularly in biblical Wisdom literature, beyond the general references to creation per se already discussed above. Proverbs 3:18 compares the obtaining of wisdom to "a tree of life" (ʿes-hayyim), which corresponds to the phrase found in Genesis 2:9, minus the definite article connected to the noun hayyim ("life"). Given the fact that most critical scholars would include Genesis 2:9 in the Jahwist source (Westermann, 186-90), dated to the tenth or ninth century BC (Emerton, 126-28), the appearance of the motif, which does not appear elsewhere in the Hebrew Bible, seems to add more weight for a preexilic date of Proverbs. Proverbs 11:30 associates the "tree of life" motif with righteous acts, while Proverbs 13:12 compares a fulfilled hope with a tree of life. Finally, Proverbs 15:4 suggests that a gentle tongue is like a tree of life. Although the last three references clearly are metaphors used to communicate more effectively, the mere fact of the presence of this motif seems to provide a link to the important story of origins found in Genesis 1—3. As shown by Hurowitz (57-61), this is not the only link between Proverbs 3 and the story of paradise. "Prov 3:13-20 offers a solution to Man's eternal quest for return to Paradise and the Tree of Life. Wisdom will restore Human-kind to the Paradise from which he was driven" (Hurowitz, 61). Connecting this important theological concept (which in the OT went beyond the mere theological perspective and represented an important historical outlook) with the *personification of wisdom in Proverbs 8 and its role in creation, the motif of paradise regained represents a clear link to the narrative texts describing Israel's origins.

4. History in Borderline Books: Daniel and Esther.

Although Daniel and Esther contain ideas that are also present in biblical Wisdom literature, their overall design, content and particular formulaic expressions point to their rootedness in history. Given that a full-fledged discussion of the history and historicity of both biblical books cannot be attempted here, some relevant data will serve as convincing evidence to exclude these books from the general corpus of biblical Wisdom literature and to underline their intrinsic history perspective. The literature discussing the historicity of Daniel is immense. Scholars have clearly marked the Babylonian ambience of the book, in terminology and linguistics (e.g., Paul 2005a; 2005b; Avalos; Stefanovic) as well as in specific historical references. References to the Neo-Babylonian king Nebuchadnezzar II, the administrative realities of the Neo-Babylonian Empire, the subsequent Persian Empire, together with the historical narratives of Daniel 1–6 clearly underline the importance of history in the book. Crucial to this discussion is, obviously, the dating of the book of Daniel—that is, whether it should be dated to the sixth century BC (as its internal trappings suggest) or whether it should be read as a second-century BC anonymous document that was written after the events described or prefigured in the book had taken place (see Hasel; Ferch). Imitating historical narrative literature of the OT, Daniel contains many references to dates that use the synchronistic method (e.g., “in the third year of King Jehoiakim” [Dan 1:1]; “during the second year of his [Nebuchadnezzar’s] reign” [Dan 2:1]). Even the apocalyptic chapters are generally anchored in history and mention precise historical references (e.g., “early during the first year of King Belshazzar’s reign” [Dan 7:1]; “during the third year of King Belshazzar’s reign” [Dan 8:1]; “first year of the reign of Darius the Mede” [Dan 9:1]; “in the third year of King Cyrus of Persia” [Dan 10:1]). Clearly, history is not only important in terms of future prophetic predictions but also is part and parcel of the book’s inherent historiographical perspective, shared with most of the OT literature, that God is in control of history.

The situation is similar in the case of the book of Esther. The volume shares many trappings of historical narrative, including an internal dating scheme closely associated with the Persian king Xerxes (Weiland). Places and people are carefully named. The text also employs very rare terminology that appears also in Persian period Aramaic inscriptions (G. Klingbeil 1995) and that seems to be associated with a specialized high-speed postal system. To be sure, the protagonists of the narrative are not easily identified in the extrabiblical texts from the period (Firth), and the current scholarly consensus seems to favor categorizing the book as fiction or novel (see Novella, Story, Narrative). However, from a formal perspective, the text of Esther resembles more closely historical narrative texts than classical biblical Wisdom literature. And it is here that the circle closes and brings us back to the discussion of biblical historiography, so distinct from modern Western notions about historicity and historiography.

5. Conclusions.

The present journey into wisdom and history has been tricky but at the same time rewarding. Although biblical Wisdom literature does not share many of the formal characteristics of biblical historical narrative, it indeed contains numerous references to people, places and actions, the three key elements of historical writing. It seems as if most of these references are purposefully kept more general or indefinite in order to make the content more abstract and thus easily adaptable for general application, disassociated from a particular historical Sitz im Leben. This tendency has also been observed in earlier Mesopotamian literature and should not necessarily be construed as a particular (negative) stance toward history. Many shared motifs and themes link biblical Wisdom literature with historical narrative, foremost among them the important concept that God is the creator of the earth and of human beings and thus controls the destiny of humanity. Other motifs, such as the important ones of “God is in control,” the “building of God’s house” and “paradise regained,” have been shown to represent important elements of biblical Wisdom literature. It seems that more relevant links can be discovered between biblical Wisdom literature and historical narrative once our fairly biased and schematic understanding of the nature of historiography has been recognized.

See also HISTORICAL CRITICISM.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. B. Alster, Proverbs of Ancient Sumer, vol. 1 (Bethesda, MD: CDL Press, 1997); L. O. Anderson Jr., “The Michael Figure in the Book of Daniel” (Th.D. diss., Andrews University Theological Seminary, 1997); B. G. Aston, J. A. Harrell, and I. Shaw, “Stone,” in Ancient Egyptian Materials and Technology, ed. P. T. Nicholson and I. Shaw (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 2000) 5-77; H. Avalos, “Daniel 9:24-25 and Mesopotamian Temple Rededications,” JBL 117 (1998) 507-11; A. Berlin, Poetics

- and Interpretation of Biblical Narrative (BLS 9; Sheffield: Almond, 1983); D. K. Berry, An Introduction to Wisdom and Poetry of the Old Testament (Nashville: Broadman & Holman, 1995); H. J. Boecker, "Überlegungen zur Kulti-polemik der vorexilischen Propheten," in Die Botschaft und die Boten: Festschrift für Hans Walter Wolff zum 70. Geburtstag, ed. J. Jeremias and L. Perlitt (Neukirchen-Vluyn: Neukirchener Verlag, 1981) 169-80; O. Borowski, Daily Life in Biblical Times (SBLABS 5; Atlanta: Scholars Press, 2003); M. Z. Brettler, "Incompatible Metaphors for YHWH in Isaiah 40-66," JSOT 78 (1998) 97-120; W. P. Brown, Character in Crisis: A Fresh Approach to the Wisdom Literature of the Old Testament (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1996); W. Brueggemann, Solomon: Israel's Ironic Icon of Human Achievement (SPOT; Columbia: University of South Carolina Press, 2005); M. C. Callaway, "A Hammer That Breaks Rock in Pieces: Prophetic Critique in the Hebrew Bible," in Anti-Semitism and Early Christianity: Issues of Polemic and Faith, ed. C. A. Evans and D. A. Hagner (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1993) 21-38; R. B. Chisholm Jr., "History or Story? The Literary Dimension in Narrative Texts," in Giving the Sense: Understanding and Using Old Testament Texts, ed. D. M. Howard Jr. and M. A. Grisanti (Grand Rapids: Kregel, 2003) 54-73; R. J. Clifford, Proverbs (OTL; Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 1999); A. C. Cohen, "Dehistoricizing Strategies in Third-Millennium B.C.E. Royal Inscriptions and Rituals," in Proceedings of the XLV Rencontre Assyriologique Internationale, Pt. 1: Harvard University: Historiography in the Cuneiform World, ed. T. Abusch et al. (Bethesda, MD: CDL Press, 2001) 99-112; J. J. Collins, Daniel (Hermeneia; Minneapolis: Fortress, 1993); J. L. Crenshaw, "When Form and Content Clash: The Theology of Job 38:1-40:5," in Creation in the Biblical Traditions, ed. R. J. Clifford and J. J. Collins (CBQMS 24; Washington, DC: Catholic Biblical Association of America, 1992) 70-84; P. R. Davies, In Search of "Ancient Israel" (JSOTSup 148; Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1992); idem, Whose Bible Is It Anyway? (2nd ed.; London: T & T Clark International, 2002); K. J. Dell, "Wisdom," in The Biblical World, vol. 1, ed. J. Barton (London: Routledge, 2002) 107-28; idem, "How Much Wisdom Literature Has Its Roots in the Pre-Exilic Period," in In Search of Pre-Exilic Israel: Proceedings of the Oxford Old Testament Seminar, ed. J. Day (JSOTSup 406; London: T & T Clark International, 2004) 251-71; D. V. Edelman, "Mahnaim," ABD 4.472-73; J. A. Emerton, "The Date of the Yahwist," in In Search of Pre-Exilic Israel: Proceedings of the Oxford Old Testament Seminary, ed. J. Day (JSOTSup 406; London: T & T Clark International, 2004) 107-29; D. J. Estes, Handbook on the Wisdom Books and Psalms (Grand Rapids: Baker, 2005); W. M. Fanwar, "Creation in Isaiah" (Ph.D. diss., Andrews University Theological Seminary, 2001); A. Ferch, "The Book of Daniel and the 'Maccabean Thesis,'" AUSS 21 (1983) 129-41; D. G. Firth, "The Third Quest for the Historical Mordecai and the Genre of the Book of Esther," OTE 16 (2003) 233-43; R. A. Freund, "Individual vs. Collective Responsibility: From the Ancient Near East and the Bible to the Greco-Roman World," SJOT 11 (1997) 279-304; E. Gaß, Die Ortsnamen des Richterbuchs in historischer und redaktioneller Perspektive (ADPV 35; Wiesbaden: Harrassowitz, 2005); W. W. Hallo, "For Love Is Strong as Death," JANES 22 (1993) 45-50; J. E. Hartley, The Book of Job (NICOT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1988); G. F. Hasel, "Establishing a Date for the Book of Daniel," in Symposium on Daniel, ed. F. B. Holbrook (Daniel and Revelation Committee Series 2; Washington, DC: Biblical Research Institute, 1986) 84-164; H.-J. Hermission, "Observations on the Creation Theology in Wisdom," in Creation in the Old Testament, ed. B. W. Anderson (IRT 6; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1984) 118-34; R. S. Hess, Song of Songs (BCOTWP; Grand Rapids: Baker, 2005); V. A. Hurowitz, "Paradise Regained: Proverbs 3:13-20 Reconsidered," in Sefer Moshe: The Moshe Weinfeld Jubilee Volume. Studies in the Bible and the Ancient Near East, Qumran, and Post-Biblical Judaism, ed. C. Cohen, A. Hurvitz and S. M. Paul (Winoona Lake, IN: Eisenbrauns, 2004) 49-62; B. Janowski, "Der Mensch im alten Israel: Grundfragen alttestamentlicher Anthropologie," ZTK 102 (2005) 143-75; S. Japhet, "'Lebanon' in the Transition from Derash to Peshat: Sources, Etymology and Meaning (with Special Attention to the Song of Songs)," in Emanuel: Studies in Hebrew Bible, Septuagint and Dead Sea Scrolls in Honor of Emanuel Tov, ed. S. M. Paul et al. (VTSup 94; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 2003) 707-24; G. E. Kadish, "Historiography," OEA 2.108-11; J. S. Kaminsky, Corporate Responsibility in the Hebrew Bible (JSOTSup 196; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1995); G. A. Klingbeil, "כִּשְׁתִּי and Esther 8, 10.14: A Semantic Note," ZAW 107 (1995) 301-3; idem, "Entre individualismo y colectivismo: Hacia una perspectiva bíblica de la naturaleza de la

- iglesia,” in Pensar la iglesia hoy: Hacia una eclesiología adventista; Estudios teológicos presentados durante el IV Simposio Bíblico-Teológico Sudamericano en honor a Raoul Dederen, ed. G. A. Klingbeil et al. (Libertador San Martín: Editorial Universidad Adventista del Plata, 2002a) 3-22; idem, “Up, Down, In, Out, Through and Back’: Space and Movement in Old Testament Narrative, Ritual and Legal Texts and Their Application for the Study of Mark 1:1-3:12,” EstBib 60 (2002b) 283-309; idem, “Altars, Ritual and Theology—Preliminary Thoughts on the Importance of Cult and Ritual for a Theology of the Hebrew Scriptures,” VT 54 (2004) 495-515; M. G. Klingbeil, Yahweh Fighting from Heaven: God as Warrior and as God of Heaven in the Hebrew Psalter and Ancient Near Eastern Iconography (OBO 169; Fribourg: Universitätsverlag; Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1999); E. A. Knauf, “Elihu,” ABD 2.462; idem, “Kedar,” ABD 4.9-10; J. B. Kofoed, Text and History: Historiography and the Study of the Biblical Text (Winona Lake, IN: Eisenbrauns, 2005); A. Lange, “Gebotsobservanz statt Opferkult: Zur Kultpolemik in Jer 7,1-8,3,” in Gemeinde ohne Tempel/Community without Temple: Zur Substituierung und Transformation des Jerusalemer Tempels und seines Kults im Alten Testament, antiken Judentum und frühen Christentums, ed. B. Ego, A. Lange and P. Pilhofer (WUNT 118; Tübingen: Mohr Siebeck, 1999) 19-35; A. Lemaire, “Wisdom in Solomonian Historiography,” in Wisdom in Ancient Israel: Essays in Honour of J. A. Emerton, ed. J. Day, R. P. Gordon and H. G. M. Williamson (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1995) 106-18; N. P. Lemche, Early Israel: Anthropological and Historical Studies on the Israelite Society before the Monarchy (VTSup 37; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1985); idem, Ancient Israel: A New History of Israelite Society (BibSem 5; Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1988); idem, Die Vorgeschichte Israels: Von den Anfängen bis zum Ausgang des 13. Jahrhunderts v. Chr. (BE 1; Stuttgart: Kohlhammer, 1996); ET, Prelude to Israel’s Past: Background and Beginnings of Israelite History and Identity (Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 1998); M. Liverani, “Early Caravan Trade between South-Arabia and Mesopotamia,” Yemen 1 (1992) 111-15; V. P. Long, The Art of Biblical History (FCI 5; Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1994); idem, “How Reliable Are Biblical Reports? Repeating Lester Grabbe’s Comparative Experiment,” VT 52 (2002) 367-84; T. Longman III, Fictional Akkadian Autobiography: A Generic and Comparative Study (Winona Lake, IN: Eisenbrauns, 1991); idem, The Book of Ecclesiastes (NICOT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1998); idem, Proverbs (BCOTWP; Grand Rapids: Baker, 2006); S. Malena, “Spice Roots in the Song of Songs,” in Milk and Honey: Essays on Ancient Israel and the Bible in Appreciation of the Judaic Studies Program at the University of California, San Diego, ed. S. Malena and D. Miano (Winona Lake, IN: Eisenbrauns, 2007) 165-84; J. G. McConville, “Faces of Exile in Old Testament Historiography,” in After the Exile: Essays in Honour of Rex Mason, ed. J. Barton and D. J. Reimer (Macon, GA: Mercer University Press, 1996) 27-44; A. R. Millard, “Story, History, and Theology,” in Faith, Tradition and History, ed. A. R. Millard, J. K. Hoffmeier and D. W. Baker (Winona Lake, IN: Eisenbrauns, 1994) 37-64; P. D. Miller Jr., “Creation and Covenant,” in Biblical Theology: Problems and Perspectives; In Honor of J. Christiaan Beker, ed. S. J. Kraftchick, C. D. Meyers Jr. and B. C. Ollenburger (Nashville: Abingdon, 1995) 155-68; H.-P. Müller, “Der Libanon in altorientalischen Quellen und im Hohenlied,” ZDPV 117 (2001) 116-27; K. D. Mulzac, “‘Creation’ in the Book of Jeremiah,” in Creation, Life, and Hope: Essays in Honor of Jacques B. Doukhan, ed. J. Moskala (Berrien Springs, MI: Old Testament Department, Seventh-day Adventist Theological Seminary, Andrews University, 2000) 29-44; R. D. Nelson, “Divine Warrior Theology in Deuteronomy,” in A God So Near: Essays in Old Testament Theology in Honor of Patrick D. Miller, ed. B. A. Strawn and N. R. Bowen (Winona Lake, IN: Eisenbrauns, 2003) 241-59; S. M. Paul, “Dan 6:8: An Aramaic Reflex of Assyrian Legal Terminology,” in Divrei Shalom: Collected Studies of Shalom M. Paul on the Bible and the Ancient Near East 1967-2005, ed. S. M. Paul (CHANE 23; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 2005a) 139-44; idem, “Daniel 6:20: An Aramaic Calque on an Akkadian Expression,” in Divrei Shalom: Collected Studies of Shalom M. Paul on the Bible and the Ancient Near East 1967-2005, ed. S. M. Paul (CHANE 23; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 2005b) 329-31; I. Provan, V. P. Long and T. Longman III, A Biblical History of Israel (Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 2003); M. A. Rae, “Creation and Promise: Towards a Theology of History,” in ‘Behind’ the Text: History and Biblical Interpretation, ed. C. G. Bartholomew et al. (SHS 4; Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 2003) 267-99; R. Rendtorff, “Geschichtliches und weisheitliches Denken im Alten Testament,” in Beiträge zur alttestamentli- chen Theologie. Festschrift für Walter Zimmerli zum 70. Geburtstag, ed. H. Donner, R. Hanhart and R. Smend (Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 1977) 344-53; S. D. Ricks, "Sheba, Queen of," ABD 5.1170-71; P. Riede, Im Spiegel der Tiere: Studien zum Verhältnis von Mensch und Tier im Alten Israel (OBO 187; Fribourg: Universitätsverlag; Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 2002); P. C. Schmitz, "Baal-Hamon," ABD 1.551; R. B. Y. Scott, "Solomon and the Beginnings of Wisdom in Israel," in Wisdom in Israel and in the Ancient Near East: Presented to Professor Harold Henry Rowley in Celebration of His Sixty-fifth Birthday, 24 March 1955, ed. M. Noth and D. W. Thomas (VT-Sup 3; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1955) 262-79; R. A. Simkins, Creator and Creation: Nature in the World-view of Ancient Israel (Peabody, MA: Hendrickson, 1994); W. K. Simpson, "Egypt," in The Ancient Near East: A History, ed. W. W. Hallo and W. K. Simpson (New York: Harcourt Brace Jovanovich, 1971) 185-298; P. W. Skehan, Studies in Israelite Poetry and Wisdom (CBQMS 1; Washington, DC: Catholic Biblical Association of America, 1971) Z. Stefanovic, The Aramaic of Daniel in the Light of Old Aramaic (JSOTSup 129; Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1992); M. Sternberg, The Poetics of Biblical Narrative (ILBS; Bloomington: Indiana University Press, 1985); C. Sticher, Die Rettung der Guten durch Gott und die Selbstzerstörung der Bösen: Ein theologisches Denkmuster im Psalter (BBB 137; Berlin: Philo, 2002); S. Talmon, "'Wisdom' in the Book of Esther," VT 13 (1963) 419-55; J. P. Tanner, "The History of Interpretation of the Song of Songs," BSac 154 (1997) 23-46; X. H. Thi Pham, Mourning in the Ancient Near East and the Hebrew Bible (JSOTSup 302; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1999); T. L. Thompson, The Historicity of the Patriarchal Narratives (BZAW 133; Berlin: de Gruyter, 1974); idem, The Origin Tradition of Ancient Israel (JSOTSup 55; Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1987); idem, Early History of the Israelite People: From the Written and Archaeological Sources (SHANE 4; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1992); R. C. van Leeuwen, "Building God's House: An Exploration in Wisdom," in The Way of Wisdom: Essays in Honor of Bruce K. Waltke, ed. J. I. Packer and S. K. Soderlung (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 2000) 204-11; J. van Seters, Abraham in History and Tradition (New Haven: Yale University Press, 1975); idem, In Search of History (New Haven: Yale University Press, 1983); idem, "The Historiography of the Ancient Near East," in Civilizations of the Ancient Near East, ed. J. M. Sasson (4 vols.; New York: Scribner, 1995) 4.2433-43; K. R. Veenhof, Geschichte des Alten Orients bis zur Zeit Alexanders des Grossen (GAT 11; Göttingen: Vandenhoeck & Ruprecht, 2001); B. L. Visotzky, The Midrash on Proverbs (YJS 27; New Haven: Yale University Press, 1997); B. K. Waltke, The Book of Proverbs: Chapters 15-31 (NICOT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2005); F. S. Weiland, "Historicity, Genre, and Narrative Design in the Book of Esther," BSac 159 (2002) 151-65; C. Westermann, Genesis 1-11 (CC; Minneapolis: Fortress, 1994); N. Winther-Nielsen, "Fact, Fiction, and Language Use: Can Modern Pragmatics Improve on Halpern's Case for History in Judges?" in Windows into Old Testament History: Evidence, Argument, and the Crisis of "Biblical Israel", ed. V. P. Long, D. W. Baker and G. J. Wenham (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2002) 44-81; E. M. Yamauchi, Africa and the Bible (Grand Rapids: Baker, 2004); G. A. Yee, "The Theology of Creation in Proverbs 8:22-31," in Creation in the Biblical Traditions, ed. R. J. Clifford and J. J. Collins (CBQMS 24; Washington, DC: Catholic Biblical Association of America, 1992) 85-96; E. Zenger, "Ritual and Criticism of Ritual in the Old Testament," in Liturgy and Human Passage, ed. D. Power and L. Maldonado (Concilium 112; New York: Seabury Press, 1979) 39-49.

G. A. Klingbeil

WISDOM AND PROPHECY

Wisdom and prophecy are presented in the OT as two significant aspects of life in ancient Israel. They are depicted as both complementing one another and conflicting with one another, and are described positively only when they are founded on the *law of God. This article examines various aspects of the relationship between wisdom and prophecy.

1. Definitions
2. Wisdom and Prophecy
3. Literary Features of Wisdom and Prophecy
4. The Relationship Between Prophets and Sages
5. Conclusion

1. Definitions.

1.1. Wisdom. The broad semantic range of the Hebrew term hokmâ ("wisdom") presents some difficulties in the attempt to define wisdom precisely, let alone its relationship to prophecy (see Whybray, 181-83). The term itself refers to any form of skill: "all those skilled in some trait or profession possess wisdom of a sort: the craftsman, the potter, the builder, the farmer" (Grabbe, 162-63). Kings were given wisdom by God in order to rule (e.g., Deut 34:9; 1 Kings 3:12; 5:12; Is 11:2); others were given wisdom for specific tasks, such as the skill required by Bezalel to construct the tabernacle (Ex 31:1-5). Wisdom also appears in different guises: proverbial wisdom (as found in much of *Proverbs); mantic wisdom, involving divination and largely confined to foreign *sages; or speculative wisdom, such as that found in much of *Ecclesiastes. So although Daniel is declared to be wise, his wisdom rests, at least in part, on direct revelation from God (Dan 2; cf. Joseph in Gen 40—41). Thus Daniel's wisdom has more in common with prophecy than it does with the speculative wisdom of *Qohelet (see Wisdom and Apocalyptic).

Further complicating the tasks of defining wisdom and understanding's relationship with prophecy is the evolution of wisdom through history. R. Whybray (195) noted, "[That] wisdom ideas or theology underwent great changes during the OT period . . . is obvious. . . . There are tremendous theological differences between the older elements in Proverbs and the later ones, between Proverbs and Job, between Job and Ecclesiastes." Beyond this, the speculative wisdom of Ecclesiastes seems to have given way to a form of wisdom that found its basis in the law by the time of Ben Sira (see Sir 24:23), and the evolution did not stop here, for later wisdom texts suggest further development (see Aitken, 181-93).

These vagaries should not, however, obscure the fact that the bulk of the biblical treatment of wisdom and its interaction with prophecy is focused on the intellectual aspects of wisdom, as noted by L. Grabbe (179): "There is a special sense in which wisdom was applied to intellectual characteristics, especially those gained or developed by formal learning, education, and study." The task of these sages is well described by J. Crenshaw (1993, 6): "The sages . . . insisted on the intellect's capacity to assure the good life by word and deed. By using their intellectual gifts the sages hoped to steer their lives safely into harbor, avoiding hazards that brought catastrophes to fools." Moreover, outside of the Wisdom literature, references to the wise frequently focus on their role as royal advisors in Israel and beyond. Thus, when considering the relationship between wisdom and prophecy, the biblical text concentrates on the intellectual stream of wisdom frequently manifest in advisors who sought to influence the course of government.

1.2. Prophecy. The literary records of prophecy preserved in the OT are somewhat more uniform than the wider phenomenon of prophecy in ancient Israel appears to have been. The existence of bands of prophets pronouncing ecstatic utterances (e.g., 1 Sam 10:9-12) and indications of the existence of institutionalized prophets (e.g., 2 Kings 6:1; Amos 7:14) reflect aspects of prophecy that are largely unrepresented among the prophetic books. Precisely how these prophets operated is not entirely clear, and because of the very limited information on them and their activities, any informed discussion of prophecy and wisdom must confine itself to the form of prophecy recorded extensively in the biblical text itself.

Consequently, for the purposes of this article, the definition of a prophet by Grabbe (107) is sufficient: "The common denominator . . . is that the prophet is a mediator who claims to receive messages direct from a divinity, by various means, and communicates these messages to recipients." It thus follows that a prophecy is the message received and transmitted by the prophet.

2. Wisdom and Prophecy.

Wisdom and prophecy are depicted both favorably and unfavorably in the OT. False prophecy is prophecy not arising from the God of Israel; false wisdom is wisdom that is not founded in the fear of Yahweh (see Fear of the Lord). True prophecy reflects God's desire for his people and so reflects his will as revealed in the law. True wisdom is defined within the law as obedience to the law (see Deut 4:5-6). It is this link to the law that is the touchstone for both wisdom and prophecy, and against which they are each assessed by the biblical authors.

The fundamental difference between wisdom and prophecy lies in the nature of wisdom as a skill or the ability to live well, whereas prophecy conveys direct and specific information from God addressing a particular situation. As such, although the intellectual acumen that constitutes some examples of divinely given wisdom—that of *Solomon, for instance—may be said to come from God, there is no implicit guarantee that the results of the application of wisdom also carry divine authority (see Scott, 11).

Solomon is a prime example of this distinction, for in spite of the divine origin of his wisdom, he employed it to make strategic alliances through marriage and subsequently introduced idolatry into the very center of the kingdom. Unlike the prophets, whose words often are presented as direct quotations of God's words to them, the sages' insights are their own even if the intellectual capacity for reaching their conclusions was God-given.

Consequently, the authority of the sage differs fundamentally from that of the prophet: "[That] priest and prophet were regarded as speaking with divine authority is clear. It is less certain that the same can be said of the 'counsel' of the wise man and the elders" (Scott, 3). The criticism of this distinction by B. Gemser (208-19), arguing that "counsel" ('ešā) is presented as bearing equal authority to the word of the prophet (cf. Crenshaw 1971, 119), requires significant qualification. Gemser correctly notes that this counsel derives its authority from its relationship with the Torah; however, he fails to account adequately for either the evolution of wisdom through history or the frequent assertions within the OT text that the wisdom of the sages had become disconnected from the law and thus had lost its authority (cf., e.g., Is 5:21; 19:11-12; 47:10; see Shields, 7-19). Where wisdom derives from and expounds God's revealed instruction and calls for an obedience to those instructions founded in the fear of Yahweh (see Deut 4:6), it is favorably depicted in the OT. Wisdom that ignores God's word—that of Qohelet or of Job's counselors, for instance—is condemned.

3. Literary Features of Wisdom and Prophecy.

Scholars have recognized that the various types of literature present in the OT are frequently characterized by specific literary forms. The proverb, for example, is generally recognized as a feature of wisdom. It is therefore significant to note instances where forms typically associated with one genre occur in literature of another genre. The appearance of wisdom forms in prophecy or of prophetic forms in wisdom is often construed as revealing something of the relationship between wisdom and prophecy.

3.1. Prophetic Features in Wisdom Literature.

3.1.1. Proverbs. Both Agur and King *Lemuel label their sayings as maśśā' (Prov 30:1; 31:1; [traditionally, "oracle," but HALOT suggests "pronouncement," while others prefer "burden"]). As a description of speech, this term is elsewhere exclusively associated with prophecy (e.g., Is 13:1; 14:28; 15:1; 17:1; 19:1; 21:1, 11, 13; 22:1; 23:1; 30:6; Ezek 12:10; Nah 1:1; Hab 1:1; Zech 9:1; 12:1; Mal 1:1). In fact, so anomalous does its use in Proverbs appear to some scholars and translators that they understand the word to be a place name rather than as a claim that the words that follow are in any way akin to a prophetic pronouncement (see HALOT; cf. Gen 25:14; 1 Chron 1:30; Ps 120:5).

B. Waltke (81-82) claims, however, that the use of the term here affirms the inspired status of the utterances of the sages, and that the wisdom recorded in Proverbs is founded not merely on intellectual analysis of the natural and social world but rather on special divine revelation. The only other use of maśśā' in the Wisdom literature (Job 7:20) clearly does not include the notion of revelation, but the fact that Proverbs 30:1 also uses the term nē'um, which HALOT describes as "an almost completely fixed technical expression introducing prophetic oracles," strengthens Waltke's case.

However, there are grounds for caution before claiming too much based on the use of these terms alone. In spite of Agur's and Lemuel's use of this distinctively prophetic language to introduce their words, the form and content of those words remains distinct from the prophetic utterances elsewhere associated with these terms. Furthermore, these terms are not explicitly applied to all of Proverbs, let alone all the Wisdom literature, and if the use of these terms in Proverbs 30:1; 31:1 is intended to ascribe to the words of these sages prophetic authority, it is quite clear from the perspective of *Job and Ecclesiastes that this ascription cannot be extended to all wisdom, for both these works denounce human wisdom and contrast it with direct revelation from God.

3.1.2. Job. The book of Job, which records God's direct intervention and speech to Job and his counselors, has long been recognized as reflecting some degree of prophetic influence. For example, Crenshaw (1971, 108) argued that "the continuity between Job and prophecy cannot be denied" (cf. Snaith, 33).

Job represents an interesting blurring of wisdom and prophecy, but one that ultimately undermines the wisdom presented by the human sages, Job's "friends" (cf. Job 5:13; 12:17; 38:2).

Unlike Proverbs, which contains material that balances the tendency to read its wisdom as endorsing a purely retributive understanding of the world (e.g., Prov 10:2; 16:8, 19; 17:1; 19:1, 22; 22:1; 28:6), the book of Job does not resort to wisdom to counter the arguments of Job's acquaintances. Rather, the ultimate corrective to their wisdom comes in direct special revelation from God (see Job 38–42), a mode more akin to prophecy than wisdom. In thus resorting to special revelation rather than wisdom, together with the expression of wisdom's limitations (Job 28), the book highlights wisdom's inadequacies and the ultimate role that prophecy plays in understanding the world in which we live.

3.1.3. Ecclesiastes. One portion of the words of the epilogue to Ecclesiastes (Eccles 12:11-12a) is often understood to affirm the divine origin of the biblical Wisdom literature. The basis for this understanding is the apparent assertion that the words of the wise are given by the one shepherd, widely understood as a reference to God. This understanding is reflected in most modern English translations. For example, the ESV reads, "The words of the wise are like goads, and like nails firmly fixed are the collected sayings; they are given by one Shepherd. My son, beware of anything beyond these." G. Ogden (210) endorses this interpretation of the passage, stating that the epilogist, in writing these words, is "claiming that the observation-reflection method typical of the sage . . . qualifies as a method by which the divine will and purpose may be ascertained. This then gives the sage's words an authority as revelation, as scripture."

There are, however, a number of significant problems with this understanding of the epilogue to Qohelet's words (see Shields, 69-92). The identification of the "one shepherd" as God is dubious. When God is described as a shepherd elsewhere, the identification is always explicit and unambiguous, and since others are described as shepherds of the people (e.g., Ezek 34:23, which uses the phrase rō'eh eḥād ["one shepherd"] found in Eccles 12:11), if the shepherd here is to be understood metaphorically, then it is not immediately clear how that identification ought to be made. Further, these words claim far more than most would be happy to affirm, for they do not restrict the assertion made regarding the words of the sages to the words of Qohelet, nor even to the canonical Wisdom literature, but simply to all the words of the wise, without qualification. Yet few would claim that all words from all sages have a divine origin.

Instead, it is better to read these words of the epilogue as a warning against the wisdom of the sages rather than an endorsement of it. As such, they can be translated thus: "The words of the wise are like goads, and like cattle-prods are [the words of] the masters of collections, those which are used by a lone shepherd. In addition to these things, my son, beware of making many texts. . . ." As a lone shepherd must employ painful goads to direct his flock, so the wise use their words to manipulate and coerce their students. Furthermore, warns the epilogue, beware of being consumed by the literary activities typical of the sages, for such tasks are pointless.

If these words do not affirm the divine origin of the wisdom of the sages, then there is little to indicate any prophetic influence in the book of Ecclesiastes. Qohelet reaches his conclusions without ever appealing to special divine revelation; indeed, it may well be that he actively repudiates any notion that such information can ever be reliably discerned and distances himself from any who would claim to have access to such information (see 4.2 below).

3.2. Wisdom in the Prophets. The prophetic books of the OT occasionally employ wisdom language and forms, as R. Scott (4) notes: "Isaiah and Jeremiah scorn the wise men of their time, yet they themselves adopt some of the language, forms, and ideas of the wisdom teachers." J. Lindblom (201-2) identifies a number of instances of wisdom forms used in prophetic literature (e.g., Is 5; 10:15; 28; Hos 7:4-5; Amos 3:3-6; 6:12), together with prophetic use of aphorisms (e.g., Jer 31:29; Ezek 18:2 [although both in reference to aphorisms that will no longer be used]; also Is 65:8; Jer 8:4; 13:12; 15:12; 23:28; 49:24; Ezek 11:3; 16:44). He further identifies rhetorical questions with a specific didactic intent that resemble wisdom utterances (e.g., Is 10:15; Jer 23:28; Ezek 15:2-8; Amos 3:3-8; 6:12; 9:7; Mal 1:6; 2:14-15, 17; 3:7-8, 13-14).

The appearance of such wisdom forms within the prophetic books has prompted a number of explanations from scholars. In the mid-twentieth century some such as J. Fichtner suggested that they indicated that these prophets were once numbered among the sages. Others suggest that the broad distribution of wisdom material throughout the OT can be attributed to the activities of scribal sages who were responsible for the compilation and transmission of the texts preserved as the OT, and that the wisdom forms embedded in the text can be traced, at least in some instances, to their hands. For example, R. Van Leeuwen (1993, 49) suggests that “the end-redaction of the Tanakh as a whole was the work of scribal sages who were forerunners of Ben Sira.”

Both of these explanations are founded on uncertain presuppositions. No prophet ever claims to have been previously counted among the sages, and so to suggest that several of them were is based entirely on a speculative assessment of the significance of wisdom forms among their words (see Lindblom, 197; Van Leeuwen 1990, 297-98).

Similarly, the suggestion that wisdom language and forms can be attributed to later editorial work by scribes imposing their own agenda upon the text, though impossible to exclude in every instance, is founded on no manuscript evidence and supposes that the use of wisdom language either would have been inappropriate for the prophet or does not cohere with the work’s message. Yet, if some wisdom originated in the home and so was shared in by most of the population—as seems likely, given the subject matter—then it would hardly be surprising that wisdom forms and language should be found throughout the OT. Furthermore, if the observation by M. Sato (142) that “to propheticize non-prophetic genres of speech, is in itself a characteristic of prophetic-inspiratory dynamism” is correct, then the presence of wisdom forms and language in the prophetic books ought to be even less in need of special explanation.

Identification of wisdom language in the prophets is also complicated somewhat by wisdom’s frequent use of examples from everyday life. In spite of the tendency of some scholars to see in such illustrations dependence of the prophet upon the wise, such connections are almost always unwarranted by the evidence, for to make such a claim ascribes to the sages a monopoly on using common language for their ends. As Crenshaw (1969, 134) says, “The mere use of wisdom phraseology by a prophet does not make him a sage, for his meaning may be completely alien to wisdom thinking” (see also Murphy, 104; Reventlow, 381-82).

3.2.1. Isaiah. Isaiah contains a number of passages that employ wisdom language and forms (e.g., Is 5:21; 29:13-16). The prominence of wisdom themes in Isaiah led Fichtner to argue that Isaiah once a sage who had turned against the wise upon recognition that their wisdom had departed from its roots in the law (cf. Is 6:9-10). Few scholars go so far as Fichtner, recognizing the degree of speculation involved in so identifying Isaiah with the wise, but a number of scholars (e.g., Whedbee; Jensen) do nonetheless acknowledge the significance of wisdom language for Isaiah, particularly when addressing those who claim to be wise (cf. Is 10:13; 19:11-12; 44:25; 47:10).

J. Whedbee helpfully suggested some means to limit speculation as to the extent of Isaiah’s dependence upon wisdom by proposing that the identification of influence ought to be restricted to those sections where there is a conjunction between wisdom form and content, pointing to the parables of Isaiah 1:2-3; 5:1-7; 28:23-28, the proverbial material in Isaiah 10:15; 29:15-16, and the “summary appraisals” in Isaiah 14:26; 28:29.

Van Leeuwen (1990, 299) argues that Isaiah’s criticism of the sages reflects that of Proverbs itself: “That Isaiah used the wisdom of Proverbs to attack courtly wisdom probably means that the sages were not true to their own wisdom, or that there were conflicting factions in the court, some of which, at certain times in his lengthy career, Isaiah attacked. Unfortunately, the limited data leave uncertainty in these matters” (cf. Collins, 10). This note of caution is certainly warranted, for even the claim that Isaiah used the wisdom of Proverbs is speculative.

The presence of such material in Isaiah, however, has not convinced more careful scholars that Isaiah has been significantly influenced by the wisdom movement (see Whybray; Crenshaw). In light of the apparent ubiquity of wisdom in some form at all levels of society, it seems likely that Isaiah at least shared some degree of familiarity with wisdom and so could employ wisdom forms and language to his own ends without having to have ever himself been a sage.

3.2.2. Jeremiah and Ezekiel. Jeremiah and Ezekiel share with Isaiah their general disdain for the sages while occasionally adopting wisdom forms and language. The book of Jeremiah, in particular, recounts details of the prophet’s conflict with royal advisors when seeking to guide foreign-policy response to Nebuchadnezzar (although see Jeremiah’s letter to the exiles in Jer 29, at which point Zedekiah would appear to have been in agreement with his advice [see McKane 1995, 150]).

Both Jeremiah and Ezekiel employ aphorisms, perhaps most famously Ezekiel 18:2 (cf. Jer 31:29-30): “Fathers have eaten sour grapes, but the teeth of the sons have been dulled.” This aphorism bears all the hallmarks of a wisdom saying, but it is quoted by the prophets to refute its teaching, for they wish to make the opposite point. Jeremiah goes so far as to offer an amended version of the proverb: “Every person who eats the sour grapes, his teeth will be dulled” (Jer 31:30). Thus, although both Jeremiah and Ezekiel employ wisdom language, they self-consciously do so in order to undermine the sages. We will examine this conflict in more detail later (see 4.1 below).

3.2.3. Hosea. The extent of Hosea’s acquaintance with wisdom is not entirely clear. Hosea does draw on the natural world for some metaphors (cf. Hos 9:10, 13, 16; 10:1; 14:6; 4:16; 8:7; 10:4; see Macintosh, 129), as the sages also frequently did, but this alone is not sufficient basis for claiming any significant interaction with the sages on Hosea’s part. Likewise, although his use of aphorisms does suggest at least some passing familiarity with wisdom, given the likely ubiquity of wisdom in some of its forms, this cannot be construed as indicative of any special connection to more formal wisdom or the sages who promoted it (Macintosh, 125).

Nonetheless, the final verse of Hosea does stand out for its appeal to wisdom: “Whoever is wise, let him discern these things. Whoever is discerning, let him know them. For the ways of Yahweh are straight, and the righteous walk in them, but those who are disloyal stumble in them” (Hos 14:9). Van Leeuwen (1993, 36-39) sees this final verse as evidence of the activity of a scribal redactor shaping the Book of the Twelve to function as a *theodicy and overlaying the prophetic material with a decidedly wisdom agenda. However, the appeal made in this verse is not wholly foreign to Hosea, who has referred to those without wisdom (Hos 13:13) and to those without understanding (Hos 4:14). As such, this closing appeal, although clearly couched in wisdom terms, reflects the prophet’s own concerns and need not be read as evidence of later redaction.

3.2.4. Amos. Numerous features of Amos have prompted scholars to identify links with wisdom of one form or another: his use of sayings introduced by sequential cardinal numbers (Amos 1—2 [see Lindblom, 202; although, the connection of these with wisdom has been refuted by Soggin, 120-21]), theological emphases, special vocabulary and rhetorical devices (such as the “woe” sayings). Although these have prompted some to speculate about Amos’s links to the sages, these do not make a compelling case for any close association, as J. Soggin (120) has noted: “[A] biblical author . . . writes in his own style, and uses particular devices for expressing himself. In our case, these could incidentally have been borrowed from wisdom. But such a stylistic analogy does not turn a writing into a text dependent upon wisdom” (cf. Crenshaw 1969, 134; Whybray, 188).

3.2.5. Jonah, Habakkuk, Malachi. Any unequivocal connection with wisdom in the remaining Minor Prophets is difficult to establish. Some have suggested that Jonah and Habakkuk are in some way connected with wisdom because both are understood to address the problem of theodicy on some level (see Crenshaw 1998, 29; Gowan). Furthermore, some scholars suggest that Jonah is a māšāl (“proverb”) [although, the Hebrew term describes a more diverse range of literary forms than does the English “proverb,” including “parable”]) and as such is of a form more at home among the sages than the prophets (Landes; Crenshaw 1998, 29). The appearance of *disputations, particularly in Malachi, has prompted some to suggest wisdom influence also in that book. Yet the appeals to such features overlook the significant differences between the prophetic use of disputation and those found elsewhere (see Crenshaw 1969, 134). In the end, it is difficult to claim any more than a conscious borrowing of wisdom language and forms by the prophets, who turned these facets of wisdom to their own ends and employed them in the service of their own prophetic, not sagacious, message.

4. The Relationship Between Prophets and Sages.

Any discussion of the nature of the relationship between sages and prophets turns not only on the definition of wisdom and prophecy but also on the identity of the sages and prophets themselves. Whybray, for example, has argued that there never was, in ancient Israel, a class of specialists known as “the wise,” and so the notion of conflict between prophets and the wise “falls to the ground” (Whybray, 193). Most scholars, however, think that Whybray goes too far in totally rejecting the existence of an identifiable class of wisdom professionals (e.g., Blenkinsopp, 11; Shields, 43-45).

There is evidence that both prophets and sages occupied positions in the *royal courts of Israel and other nations, testifying to their “specialist” status (e.g., 2 Sam 24:11; cf. 2 Sam 16:23). Aside from official court positions, there are also reports of prophets seeking to influence the decisions made by the king. As such, they would have found themselves competing with royal counselors whose advice would have been founded more on principles of wisdom than immediate divine revelation (see 2 Chron 25:14-24; and perhaps the ultimate example is 1 Kings 11:29-39, where the prophet Ahijah opposes Solomon himself).

In light of the competing interest of prophets and sages in the royal court, it is unsurprising to find indications throughout the OT of enmity between the two groups. W. McKane (1965, 48), for one, concluded that “there was constant tension between [prophets and sages] since the wise men did not permit themselves the luxury of religious or ethical assumptions, their task being to advise the king on matters of statecraft.”

4.1. Prophets’ Attitudes Toward the Sages. The prophets whose words have been recorded in the OT clearly did not have high regard for the sages. Van Leeuwen (1990, 306) notes that “the sages (hkmym) explicitly mentioned in the prophetic texts are almost always opponents of the prophets. Such wise men, as domestic or foreign royal courtiers, stand opposed to the prophets with regard to justice and political guidance. These sages are not false per se but only as they forget the human limits of wisdom (according to the criteria from Proverbs) and defy the word of Yahweh’s messengers” (cf. Scott, 3; McKane 1995, 142; 1965, 65-91; Dunn, 7).

Although it has been common to identify this conflict as arising out of the distinction between “sacred” prophecy and “secular” wisdom (e.g., McKane 1965), the reality appears somewhat more nuanced than is reflected in this disjunction. Wisdom cannot be depicted in monolithic terms, and the criticisms leveled against the sages by the prophets reflect warnings already present within the book of Proverbs (see Van Leeuwen 1990, 300). As such, the prophets are critical of those who deviate from the law, including priests and other prophets, not merely those who employed a form of wisdom that neglected God’s revealed will. So their condemnation is not reserved merely for the royal advisors but rather is directed at all in leadership roles who would flout God’s law.

4.1.1. Isaiah. Isaiah’s antagonism toward the wise is readily apparent in many passages (e.g., Is 5:21; 19:11-12; 29:14; 40:20; 44:25; 47:10). Of these, Isaiah 19:11-12 is particularly significant because of the explicit link that it makes between wisdom and the counselors who functioned in the royal court: “The princes of Zoan are nothing but fools; the wisest advisors [y’s] of Pharaoh give stupid advice [‘ēšā]. How can you say to Pharaoh, ‘I am one of the sages, a son of kings of old’? So where are your sages who can tell you and who know what General Yahweh has planned [y’s] against Egypt?” Isaiah notes that the diplomatic plans (‘ēšā [cf. Is 30:1-5; 31:1-3]) of the royal counselors consistently elevated human wisdom over Yahweh’s plan, and so their plans would be thwarted (cf. Prov 19:21; 21:30-31; see Van Leeuwen 1990, 302). For Isaiah, true wisdom lies with God alone, and those who are truly wise derive their wisdom from him. This is apparent in the descriptions of the ideal coming ruler (Is 9:6; 11:1-9; cf. Is 33:6).

4.1.2. Jeremiah. One characteristic of Jeremiah is the frequent opposition that he faces as he seeks to fulfill his commission to speak God’s word to God’s people. This opposition sometimes comes from the wise or those described as advisors (see Jer 18:18-23 [particularly note v. 23, which refers to the plans of his opponents using the plural of ‘ēšā]), although Jeremiah faced opposition from all quarters, including from other prophets. Jeremiah in turn announced God’s opposition to the sages and advisors of his day, as can be seen in numerous passages (e.g., Jer 4:22; 8:8-9; 18:18; 49:7; 50:35; 51:57). As with Isaiah, the only wisdom viewed positively by Jeremiah was God’s own wisdom (see Jer 10:12; 51:15).

4.1.3. Ezekiel. Ezekiel has less to say about sages or advisors than does either Isaiah or Jeremiah, but all that he says is negative. The most exalted wisdom language is reserved for the ruler of Tyre (Ezek 28), who stands in opposition to God and whose wisdom and other virtues are thus ultimately abhorrent. Aside from this, Ezekiel only makes brief mention of those who give evil advice: “The Spirit lifted me and brought me to the eastern gate of the House of Yahweh, which faces eastward. There were twenty-five men at the entrance to the gate, and among them were Ya’azaniah son of Azzur and Pelatihu son of Benaiah, leaders of the people. Then he said to me, ‘Son of man, these are the men who plot iniquity and who advise [y^cs] evil advice [‘ēṣā] in this city’” (Ezek 11:1-2 [cf. Ezek 7:26]).

4.1.4. Summary. The prophets unequivocally condemn the sages and their wisdom for their departure from true wisdom, which was founded in obedience to God’s law—a feature of wisdom reflected in Proverbs but absent from the sages, whom the prophets opposed. This condemnation, however, does not extend to all wisdom, for they recognized that true wisdom comes from God and is expressed in obedience to him. Furthermore, although the prophetic condemnation of the sages is unrelenting, it is not exclusively directed at the sages, for the prophets are also critical of priests and even other prophets.

4.2. Sages’ Attitudes toward the Prophets. There appears to be little direct information regarding the attitude of the sages toward the prophets in the OT (see Scott, 3). Proverbs 29:18 could be a reference to the prophets, as it contains one of the few words frequently associated with prophecy (hāzôn [“vision”]) to be found in the Wisdom literature: “When there is no vision, the people are unchecked, but the one who keeps the law, he is happy.” The parallelism of the aphorism links vision (hāzôn) with keeping the law (tôrâ) and reveals approval for both vision and obedience to the law. Proverbs 30:1; 31:1 (see 3.1.1 above) also use language more commonly associated with prophecy (and found nowhere else in the Wisdom literature of the OT). These passages, however, reveal little of the sages’ attitude toward prophets or prophecy, except perhaps to indicate that some sages sought to attribute to their words an authority on par with those of the prophets.

In light of the scathing assessment of wisdom and the wise recorded in the prophets outlined above (and, indeed, throughout the remainder of the OT [see Shields, 7-20]), it might be expected that the Wisdom writings may reflect some enmity directed back toward the prophets. There is no sign of this in Proverbs, but there may be some echoes of such enmity among the words of Qohelet recorded in Ecclesiastes.

Aside from reaching conclusions that placed Qohelet in direct contradiction to the prophets (e.g., Eccles 1:10; cf. Eccles 3:14-15, where he claims that there is nothing new, whereas the prophets consistently taught that God was about to do something new [cf. Is 42:9; 43:19]), some of his words may represent a direct attack on the prophets and other religious officials in ancient Israel. In Ecclesiastes 8:5-7 Qohelet says: “[Regarding the] appropriate time and a just outcome, a wise heart knows that for every matter there is an appropriate time and a just outcome, . . . that no one knows what will happen; and that when something will happen no one can tell.” Here and elsewhere (cf. Eccles 3:22; 6:10-12) Qohelet affirms that no one knows what will take place in the future, whereas the prophets consistently announce the impending arrival of God’s judgment or other events.

In Ecclesiastes 5:1-7 Qohelet condemns those who utter many words in God’s house. Although the reference is somewhat ambiguous, it could be that those who spoke many words in God’s house were either priests or prophets. Given that Qohelet also makes reference twice in this passage to dreams, and that dreams in the OT are frequently modes of divine revelation (e.g., Gen 20:3; Num 12:6; 1 Sam 28:6), it is quite possible that he directs his words at the prophets who expounded their visions in the precincts of the temple.

Finally, Qohelet may have sought to belittle prophecy by seeking to imply wisdom’s superiority, at least in some ways. For example, prophets were known to announce the destruction of entire cities (e.g., Jer 26 [see McKane 1995, 144-45]; Mic 3:12). Qohelet, on the other hand, presents a parabolic tale of a small, relatively defenseless town faced with destruction that could have been saved had the rulers of that town listened to a poor sage (Eccles 9:14-15). Although prophets may have announced destruction, a sage could offer salvation in the face of overwhelming odds.

5. Conclusion.

True prophecy and wisdom are rooted in exposition and application of God’s law to God’s people. Prophecy proclaimed divine application, whereas wisdom appealed to the human intellect shaped and guided by the fear of Yahweh. In this form both shared the same authority and goal. Furthermore, wisdom’s reach extended through all levels of society, such that prophets could readily employ the stylistic characteristics of wisdom when expounding their message. Yet the sages in Israel consistently departed from this ideal and found themselves in conflict with the prophets, who pronounced God's condemnation of the wise.

See also LAW; WISDOM AND APOCALYPTIC; WISDOM THEOLOGY.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. J. K. Aitken, "Apocalyptic, Revelation and Early Jewish Wisdom Literature," in New Heaven and New Earth: Prophecy and the Millennium; Essays in Honor of Anthony Gelston, ed. P. J. Harland and C. T. R. Hayward (VTSup 77; Leiden: E. J. Brill) 181-93; J. Blenkinsopp, Sage, Priest, Prophet: Religious and Intellectual Leadership in Ancient Israel, ed. D. A. Knight (LAI; Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 1995); J. J. Collins, "Proverbial Wisdom and the Yahwist Vision," Semeia 17 (1980) 1-17; J. L. Crenshaw, "Method in Determining Wisdom Influence in 'Historical' Literature," JBL 88 (1969) 129-42; idem, Prophetic Conflict: Its Effect on Israelite Religion (BZAW 124; New York: de Gruyter, 1971); idem, "The Concept of God in Old Testament Wisdom," in In Search of Wisdom: Essays in Memory of John G. Gammie, ed. L. G. Perdue et al. (Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 1993) 1-18; idem, Old Testament Wisdom: An Introduction (rev. ed.; Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 1998); J. D. G. Dunn, "Biblical Concepts of Revelation," in Divine Revelation, ed. P. Avis (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1997) 1-22; J. Fichtner, "Isaiah among the Wise," in Studies in Ancient Israelite Wisdom, ed. J. L. Crenshaw (New York: KTAV, 1976) 429-38; B. Gemser, "The Spiritual Structure of Biblical Aphoristic Wisdom: A Review of Recent Standpoints and Theories," in Studies in Ancient Israelite Wisdom, ed. J. L. Crenshaw (New York: KTAV, 1976) 208-19; D. Gowan, "Habakkuk and Wisdom," Perspective 9 (1968) 157-66; L. L. Grabbe, Priests, Prophets, Diviners, Sages: A Socio-Historical Study of Religious Specialists in Ancient Israel (Valley Forge, PA: Trinity Press International, 1995); J. Jenson, The Use of Tôrâ by Isaiah: His Debate with the Wisdom Tradition (CBQ Monograph Series, vol. 3; Washington, DC: Catholic Biblical Association of America, 1973); G. M. Landes, "Jonah: A Māšāl?" in Israelite Wisdom: Theological and Literary Essays in Honor of Samuel Terrien, ed. J. G. Gammie et al. (Missoula, MT: Scholars Press for Union Theological Seminary, 1978) 137-58; J. Lindblom, "Wisdom in the Old Testament Prophets," in Wisdom in Israel and in the Ancient Near East: Presented to Professor Harold Henry Rowley in Celebration of His Sixty-Fifth Birthday, 24 March 1955, ed. M. Noth and D. W. Thomas (VTSup 3; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1955) 192-204; A. A. Macintosh, "Hosea and the Wisdom Tradition: Dependence and Independence," in Wisdom in Ancient Israel, ed. J. Day, R. P. Gordon and H. G. M. Williamson (Cambridge University Press, 1995) 124-41; W. McKane, Prophets and Wise Men (SBT 44; London: SCM, 1965); idem, "Jeremiah and the Wise," in Wisdom in Ancient Israel, ed. J. Day, R. P. Gordon and H. G. M. Williamson (Cambridge University Press, 1995) 142-51; R. E. Murphy, "Assumptions and Problems in Old Testament Wisdom Research" CBQ 29 (1967) 407-18; G. Ogden, Qoheleth (RNBC; Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1987); H. G. Reventlow, "Participial Formulations: Lawsuit, Not Wisdom—A Study in Prophetic Language," in Texts, Temples, and Traditions: A Tribute to Menahem Haran, ed. M. V. Fox et al. (Winona Lake, IN: Eisenbrauns, 1996) 375-82; M. Sato, "Wisdom Statements in the Sphere of Prophecy," in Gospel behind the Gospels: Current Studies on Q, ed. R. A. Piper (NovTSup 75; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1995); R. B. Y. Scott, "Priesthood, Prophecy, Wisdom, and the Knowledge of God," JBL 80 (1961) 1-15; M. A. Shields, The End of Wisdom: A Reappraisal of the Historical and Canonical Function of Ecclesiastes (Winona Lake, IN: Eisenbrauns, 2006); N. H. Snaith, The Book of Job: Its Origin and Purpose (London: SCM, 1968); J. A. Soggin, "Amos and Wisdom," in Wisdom in Ancient Israel, ed. J. Day et al. (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1995) 119-23; R. C. Van Leeuwen, "The Sage in the Prophetic Literature" in The Sage in Israel and the Ancient Near East, ed. J. G. Gammie and L. G. Perdue (Winona Lake, IN: Eisenbrauns, 1990) 295-306; idem, "Scribal Wisdom and Theodicy in the Book of the Twelve," in In Search of Wisdom: Essays in Memory of John G. Gammie, ed. L. G. Perdue et al. (Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 1993) 31-49; B. K. Waltke, The Book of Proverbs: Chapters 1-15 (NICOT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2004); J. W. Whedbee, Isaiah and Wisdom (Nashville: Abingdon, 1971); R. N. Whybray, "Prophecy and Wisdom," in Israel's Prophetic Tradition: Essays in Honor of Peter R. Ackroyd, ed. R. Coggins, A. Phillips and M. Knibb (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1982) 181-99.

M. A. Shields

WISDOM OF SOLOMON

Wisdom of Solomon (Vulgate: Book of Wisdom) is an anonymous work written in Greek likely sometime between 100 BC and AD 50, most likely during a period of persecution. It is grouped among the Apocrypha for Protestants and Jews but is considered deuterocanonical for the Roman Catholic and Orthodox traditions. On the whole, the book may be thought of as a paean to following wisdom and a powerful theological treatise on God's faithfulness to his people, both past (especially concerning the exodus generation) and present. The corollary to this is the author's warnings against the dangers of religious syncretism, a case made, somewhat ironically, by employing concepts and modes of expression that were already the fruit of the influence of Greek thought on Judaism during these politically and religiously tumultuous times. The book stands as a testimony of the confluence of Judaism and Hellenism and the degree to which the Jewish faith was able to adapt to changing and pressing circumstances. It is also a wonderful demonstration of the developments in biblical interpretation during the Second Temple period, as many of the author's comments on the OT reflect interpretive practices of the time.

1. Date and Authorship
2. Language and Style
3. Unity and Structure
4. Theology
5. Pseudo-Solomon as Biblical Interpreter
6. Conclusion

1. Date and Authorship.

As with much ancient literature, it is very difficult to pin down with any degree of certainty when Wisdom of Solomon was written and by whom. A date somewhere between 100 BC and AD 50 is a broadly accepted opinion. Arguments from silence must be used with caution, but still it is important to point out that the cataclysmic event of the destruction of the Jerusalem temple in AD 70 is neither mentioned nor alluded to in the book. In fact, in Wisdom 3:14; 9:8 its existence is assumed. Hence, a date prior to AD 70 is favorable (for a summary of arguments, see Lillie 149-79). More precisely, a date during the reign of the Roman emperor Gaius Caligula (AD 37-41) commends itself (Winston, 20-25), since the book evinces a clear undercurrent of strong persecution (see Wis 2:12—5:14), which is consistent with Caligula's reign of terror. Also, the author's vocabulary consists of a significant number of words and usages, some associated with Middle Platonic philosophy, that are unattested elsewhere before the first century AD (Winston, 22-23). All of these factors point to a date of composition in the first half of the first century AD. In addition, the author's diatribe against Egypt, which preoccupies him in Wisdom 10—19, may suggest an Egyptian, perhaps Alexandrian, setting.

Although the original work can reasonably be dated to the early first century AD, the oldest manuscripts are the fourth-century AD Codex Vaticanus and Codex Sinaiticus. Although a fourth century AD date leaves a gap of about three hundred years between the original and the oldest copies, scholars are confident we have a solid and reliable text.

It is not known who wrote Wisdom of Solomon, but the author clearly wishes to identify himself with *Solomon. For example, the author's quest for wisdom in Wisdom 7:1-14 is reminiscent of Solomon's plea in 1 Kings 3:6-9. Also, the author's reference to God's command to build the temple (Wis 9:7-8) can only refer to the Solomon of Scripture. It is a well-attested Second Temple literary device to attribute one's work to a famous figure from the past or some heavenly being. This is not an act of deception but rather a recognized rhetorical vehicle for communicating an important message. Since the author of this work adopts a Solomonic persona, he is conventionally referred to as "Pseudo-Solomon" (Ps-Solomon).

2. Language and Style.

Church fathers and medieval rabbis considered the book to have been composed originally in Hebrew, since it was so closely associated with Solomon. This view has had some proponents in modern scholarship but has been limited to the more "Solomonic" portions of the book, chapters 1—9 or chapters 1—6 (Reider, 22-23). The more dominant view of the twentieth (and into the twenty-first) century, however, which has gained widespread, if not universal, acceptance is that the book was written originally in Greek by an Alexandrian Jew (see Grimm). Arguments for a Hebrew original are based on alleged evidence of Greek mistranslation of Hebrew words and phrases, presence of poetic *parallelism, Hebraic expressions, simple connection of clauses conjunctions, and other elements (Reider, 24-25; Winston, 14-15). These factors, however, do not support an argument for a Hebrew original. Rather, the Greek style of the book simply reflects the mixing of cultures and languages during the time in which Wisdom of Solomon was written, not to mention the influence of the LXX.

Moreover, there are numerous positive indications that Greek is the language of composition. D. Winston puts it succinctly. Agreeing with the judgment of C. Grimm, Winston (15) writes, "Thus the author of Wisd is quite capable of constructing sentences in true periodic style (12:27; 13:11-15), and his fondness for compound words is almost Aeschylean. His manner at times has the light touch of Greek lyric poetry (17:17-19; 2:6-9; 5:9-13), and occasionally his words fall into an iambic or hexameter rhythm."

Ps-Solomon's use of noted Greek style also includes such things as chiasmus, sorites (an argument chain in which each successive statement is connected to the one before it, reaching a climax in the final statement), litotes (expressing an affirmative by negating its opposite), hyperbaton (marked departure from standard syntax for emphasis or poetic effect) and anaphora (repetition at the beginning of successive lines). It should be noted that such features (and others; [see Winston, 15-16]) are not the exclusive property of high Greek style (e.g., the use of sorites in m. 'Abot 1:1; Rom 5:1-5 [see Fischel]). But when one considers in addition to these literary factors the presence of Greek philosophical terminology (see the comprehensive list in Winston, 16), there is little doubt that one is reading a work of Greek composition written by someone well acquainted with Greek thought and literary style. The Semitic markers of the book simply reflect the degree to which Hellenistic Greek was influenced by the LXX, as well as the fact that our author was a Jew well versed in his Greek Scripture.

3. Unity and Structure.

The tendency in nineteenth-century scholarship, reflecting general trends in the study of ancient literature, was to argue for multiple authorship of the book. A prominent reason for such a position is the apparent shift in topic and style from chapter 9 to chapter 10—that is, from the more proverbial chapters 1–9, with their focus on immortality, to chapters 10–19, with their historical retrospective and focus on idolatry. Unity of authorship, however, has been the dominant view of most twentieth-century scholars (see summaries in Lillie, 53-81; Reider, 15-22; Winston, 12-14). An important contribution to the discussion is that of J. Reese (122-52), who argues for the book's unity on the basis of words and phrases that appear in both chapters 10–19 and chapters 1–9, what he calls "flashbacks" (see also Ziener 95-96; Enns 160-68). These flashbacks not only suggest unity of authorship but also indicate the artful and sophisticated manner in which Ps-Solomon communicates his overarching theological message (see 4 below).

Concerning the structure of the book there is less agreement. The discussion essentially centers on whether the book should be considered a two- or three-part work, and where the final division of the book should be made. Advocates of a three-part scheme include P. Heinisch (Wis 1:1–5:23; 6:1–9:18; 10:1–19:22 [Heinisch, xiv; see also van Broekhoven, 87]) and D. Winston (Wis 1:1–6:21; 6:22–10:21; 11–19 [Winston, 9-12]). B. Metzger is one of many who have argued for a two-part division (Wis 1:1–9:18; 10:1–19:22 [Metzger, 68-73]). A. Wright (164-84) likewise has a two-part scheme but makes the division at Wisdom 11:2 rather than Wisdom 10:1. Whether or not one subdivides chapters 1–9, a clear break seems to present itself quite naturally at Wisdom 10:1, since it is here that Ps-Solomon begins his retelling of Israel's history, first from Adam to Joseph (Wis 10:1-14), and then the exodus and wilderness episodes (Wis 10:15–19:22). Although every scheme has its own inherent logic, Metzger's division seems the most straightforward.

4. Theology.

Recognizing a two-part division at Wisdom 10:1 helps highlight Ps-Solomon's overall theological message: as God saved his people in the past (Wis 10–19), he is now also saving his people today—that is, Ps-Solomon's readers who are enduring persecution (Wis 1–9). This theological theme is summarized in the last verse of the book: "For in every way, O Lord, you have exalted and glorified your people. At every time and in every place you have not neglected to help them" (Wis 19:22). To put it another way, Ps-Solomon encourages his readers in chapters 1–9 by way of recontextualizing the exodus.

What binds together the theological message of the book is the exodus theme. The author twice in the first part of the book refers to death as an “exodus” (Gk exodos [Wis 3:2; 7:6]). (The exodos in Wis 3:2 refers to the faithful who die at the hands of tormentors. In Wis 7:6 the word is used to describe the death of all people. See a similar use of the word to describe Jesus’ impending death [NIV: “departure”] in Luke 9:31.) When we turn to chapters 10–19, Ps-Solomon begins to recount Wisdom’s acts of deliverance throughout Israel’s history, focusing in particular on Israel’s exodus from Egypt and subsequent wilderness wandering. Since Ps-Solomon seems to be concerned to give encouragement to a people facing the very real possibility of death (Wis 3:1-9), one begins to see a possible motive behind not only his reference to death as an “exodus” in the opening chapters but also his choice of Israel’s exodus experience as a central topic of conversation in chapters 10–19. Israel’s historical exodus, its passage from “death to life,” as it were, is presented by Ps-Solomon as the prime biblical portrait of what Wisdom is doing now in the lives of these persecuted Alexandrian Jews to whom he is writing: it is their own passage from death to life, their own exodus.

Related to this is the author’s use of the Greek literary genre logos protreptikos, or exhortatory discourse. This hortatory emphasis is found throughout the book, not only explicitly in the repeated appeal to the reader to follow Wisdom but also in chapters 10–19, where Wisdom’s protection of God’s people is contrasted to the fate of the ungodly, Egypt and Canaan. The lessons from God’s dealings with Israel in the past are applied to Ps-Solomon’s readers. God deals with the ungodly and the godly now as he has in the past. The readers are invited to consider the faithfulness and justice of God then as a paradigm for his dealings with themselves.

In addition to this grand theological theme there are a number of other specific theological matters worth mentioning, especially since some elements bear witness to developments in Judaism vis-à-vis its intersection with Greek culture. Perhaps the most important of these is Ps-Solomon’s view of immortality, which receives a focus essentially missing on the OT. For Ps-Solomon, the soul seems to have some sort of preexistence (e.g., Wis 8:19-20), although Winston (25-28) argues at length that this view should be equated not with the Platonic doctrine but rather with that of Middle Platonism, which had already adjusted Plato’s pessimistic view of the soul’s fall in embodiment. The soul’s immortality is hinted at in Wisdom 1:15 and is more explicit in Wisdom 2:23; 3:1-9; 15:1-3. It is the immortal soul, not the physical body, that makes its exodus journey from this life to the next. God’s faithfulness to his people is seen not in helping them avoid death but rather in having them pass through triumphantly to the other side.

Another important theological element is the relationship between wisdom and *law. In biblical Wisdom literature the concept of wisdom is more restrictive than we see in Second Temple literature. Whereas, for example, in Sirach 24:19-29 we see the close identification of Wisdom’s instruction and law, such an identification receives a passing reference in the OT (Deut 4:6). In a Hellenistic culture, however, where sophia and the logos were such important concepts, Jewish notions of wisdom were rethought to reflect these developments while at the same time demonstrating their superiority. Specifically, Israel’s law was described as rational and philosophical; that is, Torah is Israel’s book of philosophy and therefore is worthy of assent and devotion. Such an understanding of law probably was motivated by Jewish apologetic interests, where the narrow scope of Israelite faith could now become a player of more universal appeal in the marketplace of ideas.

As the relationship between law and wisdom is expanded in Wisdom of Solomon, so is the relationship between wisdom and redemptive history. To put it another way, Scripture, specifically Torah, has become the depository of wisdom. During the Second Temple period the role of wisdom, as G. Sheppard (6) puts it, has moved from “mundane advice to Wisdom’s recital of her participation in Israel’s traditions.” In the biblical wisdom books we find scarcely a single, clear scriptural allusion. Starting with Ben Sira’s “praise of famous men” in Sirach 44–50 (first half of the second century BC) and Wisdom of Solomon, however, we see books of wisdom that are steeped through and through with references to biblical figures and events. This fact does not make these two books any less a part of the wisdom genre; rather, it is the nature of “wisdom” that has shifted. Whereas the *sages of the Hebrew Bible were concerned with observing patterns in the created order as the basis for godly conduct—"exegeting the world," so to speak—Ben Sira and Ps-Solomon were concerned with observing the nature of God's activity by exegeting the Book; the sage's repertory of knowledge now includes Scripture. Wisdom of Solomon, therefore, with all its attention to Israel's ancient stories (see 5 below), is not a commentary on Scripture but rather is a search for wisdom, for God's overarching, eternal plan, on the basis of Scripture. God's eternal wisdom is to be learned from the Bible, for it is Scripture that is the depository of wisdom. Past events demonstrate the degree to which God's wisdom is connected to the trails of his people. And the heroes of Israel's past are appealed to as models of wise living. This may explain why the individuals in Wisdom 10:1-21 are anonymous: certainly their identities would be immediately known, but by refraining from addressing them by name, Ps-Solomon allows their characters to become democratized exemplars, either for wisdom or for foolishness, for the readers.

5. Pseudo-Solomon as Biblical Interpreter.

An area in which the study of Wisdom of Solomon will bear much fruit is Second Temple hermeneutics. Ps-Solomon's retelling of Israel's history in chapters 10-19 is characterized by a demonstrable familiarity with Jewish interpretive traditions of the time. More specifically, in his rehearsal of Israel's history from Adam to Joseph in Wisdom 10:1-14 (Enns, 17-34) and then his retelling of the exodus story in Wisdom 10:15-21; 19:1-9 (Enns, 43-134), Ps-Solomon's comments on these biblical episodes clearly move beyond the biblical data and incorporate interpretive traditions documented in some form in Jewish literature at various periods of time during the Second Temple period and beyond. This state of affairs suggests that when Wisdom of Solomon was written, there already existed an extensive and well-developed set of interpretive traditions concerning the Pentateuch in particular to which authors such as Ps-Solomon had access and which guided his exposition of Scripture. Fragments and reflections of such exegetical activity can be seen in other Second Temple works, particularly "retellings" or "expansions" of biblical narratives found in books such as Judith, Sirach*, Jubilees, Book of Biblical Antiquities and others. Ps-Solomon seems to have been thoroughly versed in these ancient exegetical traditions.

Moreover, some of Ps-Solomon's comments are in fact among our earliest witnesses to interpretive traditions that are only documented more fully in later rabbinic works. The relevance that midrashic compilations might have for understanding Second Temple texts should not be ignored simply because the dates of these compilations are later than the first century AD. The brevity of Ps-Solomon's references to these traditions militates against any notion of his comments serving as the basis for the rabbinic versions; no line of direct dependence can be drawn. Rather, where we find later rabbinic texts to offer interpretations fuller than, yet similar to, those offered by Ps-Solomon, it is likely that both texts are independent witnesses to interpretive traditions that originated with neither. Moreover, the brevity of these allusions in Wisdom of Solomon indicates how firmly set they were by his time, long before the later rabbinic versions.

The nature of biblical interpretation for Ps-Solomon and his time can be illustrated in the following examples.

(1) In Wisdom 10:5 we read, "And she [Wisdom], when the nations in wicked agreement had been confounded, recognized the righteous man [Abraham] and kept him blameless before God." Here, the tower of Babel incident (confounding of the wicked) is closely connected to an incident in the life of Abraham (Enns, 18-24). In fact, the two are coterminous, even though, according to the narrative in Genesis, Abraham comes on the scene well after the events of the tower are recounted, and with no apparent indication that the two are in any way related. Ps-Solomon's brief allusion to such a scenario is told in much more detail by Pseudo-Philo in Book of Biblical Antiquities 6-7 (possibly first century AD), where Abraham is made a contemporary of the tower episode. As the story goes, Abraham and others resist the effort to build the tower (thus being kept "blameless"), are punished by imprisonment and threat of a fiery punishment, but are freed from their cells by an earthquake. It is very unlikely indeed that Pseudo-Philo's elaborate account is dependent on Ps-Solomon's brief allusion. In fact, the latter's brief allusion assumes a general knowledge of a story at least similar to the one we see in the roughly contemporary Book of Biblical Antiquities. It is very unlikely, therefore, that there is any dependence of one text on the other; rather, both texts bear witness to an interpretive tradition that existed independent of these sources and was already well known by the time either text was produced.

(2) In Wisdom 10:17a Ps-Solomon reproduces an exegetical tradition that is fairly well attested in later sources (Enns, 53-55). This tradition concerns Exodus 12:35-36 (also Ex 3:21-22; 11:2-3), where the Israelites are said to plunder (Heb nšl; Gk skyleuō) the Egyptians, and maintains that the plundering was justified, a payment for years of unpaid servitude. As Ps-Solomon puts it, "She rewarded holy ones for their labors." This interpretive tradition is quite early, appearing in texts that likely predate Wisdom of Solomon: Jubilees 48:18, Philo's Life of Moses 1.141, and Ezekiel the Tragedian's Exagoge 162-166. It seems that a number of ancient interpreters found the Exodus passage problematic (perhaps in the face of anti-Semitic polemics, where the Israelites were labeled thieves [see Winston, 220]) and sought to justify Israel's actions by claiming that it was "payment for services rendered." Ps-Solomon's passing comment in Wisdom 10:17a is another, and fairly straightforward, witness to this exegetical tradition. As with the previous example, this comment is brief and offered without explanation, suggesting again that it was well known by the time Ps-Solomon wrote.

(3) Ps-Solomon's comment in Wisdom 10:19b-20a is an unmistakable witness to a popular exegetical tradition. He says that the Red Sea "cast them [the Egyptians] up from the bottomless depth. Therefore the righteous plundered the ungodly." To say that the Egyptians were "cast up" from the sea is intended, at least in part, to explain how the Egyptians could be plainly seen on the shore by the Israelites (Ex 14:30) when elsewhere they are said to have "sunk like a stone" in the water (Ex 15:5). For the Egyptians to be seen on the shore in Exodus 14:30, early interpreters reasoned that the sea must have cast them up again after they had drowned (see also b. Pesah. 118b; b. Arak. 15a; Mek. Shirah 9:7-15; Midr. Ps. 22:39-42). Many commentators on Wisdom of Solomon mention Targum Pseudo-Jonathan to Exodus 15:12 in this context, which tells of the sea and the land each refusing to accept the Egyptian dead lest God's wrath be upon them (see Reider, 139; Clarke, 72; Winston, 221; Grimm, 203; Goodrick, 327; Larcher, 2.644-45; Deane, 167). Only after God swore to the land that there would be no repercussions did it accept the sea's dead and swallow them. This interpretation is meant to reconcile Exodus 15:12, which states that the earth swallowed them up, with Exodus 14:28; 15:1, 4, 5, 10, where the Egyptians were consigned to a watery grave. The order of events according to this tradition seems to be: (1) the sea swallowed the Egyptians (Ex 14:28; 15:1, 4, 5, 10); (2) the sea, not wanting to incur God's wrath, cast them up onto the shore for all to see (the result of which is described in Ex 14:30); (3) after being reassured that it would not be punished, the earth swallowed them up (Ex 15:12). Although Ps-Solomon certainly does have the Egyptian dead cast up onto the shore, visible for all to see, his explanation of the motive is different. The reason given for why they were cast up is not so that the Egyptians might be seen by the Israelites or to obviate God's punishment but rather so that the Egyptians might be plundered ("therefore the righteous plundered the ungodly"). The same motive is mentioned in Mekhilta Beshallah 7.94-108 (see also Josephus, Ant. 2.349). The Mekhilta comments on Exodus 14:30 and gives four reasons why Israel is said to see the Egyptians dead on the shore: (1) to prove to the Israelites that the Egyptians did not escape (see also Philo, Mos. 2.255; Memar Marqah 2:7); (2) to prove to the Egyptians that the Israelites had not drowned; (3) to enable the Israelites to take the spoil; (4) to enable the Israelites to reprove the enemy. Ps-Solomon's comment certainly seems in line with the third reason given by the Mekhilta (the other three reasons are not reflected at all in Wis 10:19b-20a).

These examples illustrate the degree to which Ps-Solomon's explanations of OT texts are very much in keeping with how others were addressing those very same issues. Having said this, however, we probably should not understand his comments as deliberate attempts to handle the OT creatively for the sake of it. We must bear in mind the context of persecution into which he wrote. Ps-Solomon was an Alexandrian Jew whose mind was particularly concerned to address the oppression of his people. Biblical exposition was, for him, no mere academic exercise. Yet, in his comments on Scripture he relates not simply Scripture to his readers but rather "Scripture plus." In light of such dire circumstances, it seems somewhat far-fetched to think that Ps-Solomon incorporated these interpretive traditions merely to add some flourish or spice to his otherwise drab comments. Wisdom of Solomon was a literary product of some urgency, the purpose of which was to help the people, not to set them on an exegetical adventure. Ps-Solomon was concerned with nothing less than providing scriptural proof that God does indeed deliver his people: he has done it in the past, and he is sure to do it now. It is hard to escape the conclusion that for Ps-Solomon, the interpretive traditions that find their way into his exposition of Scripture actually represent the ways in which he and his readers understood the passages in question. He is, therefore, not so much an interpreter of Scripture; it is not he who is grappling directly with the exegetical particulars of the biblical text. This has already been done for him. Rather, his literary product is an ancient testimony to the state of biblical interpretation in his time and to the degree to which those interpretive traditions informed popular understanding of Scripture. By his time, these interpretive traditions had already become so intimately associated with the Bible that an Alexandrian Jew under dire circumstances was able to retell them succinctly and with conviction as nothing less than the Bible itself and, moreover, to expect to be understood by readers who certainly had other things on their minds than innovative interpretations of biblical narratives.

6. Conclusion.

Wisdom of Solomon is a vibrant example of the development of Jewish thought during the final decades of the Second Temple period. We see the confluence of Judaism on Hellenism in the book's theological and rhetorical dimensions. Ps-Solomon's comments on Scripture evince his deep connection with interpretive traditions well ensconced by his time and that will prove to be influential for the centuries to follow. It is a decidedly pastoral/theological work that seeks to bring comfort to a beleaguered people through the inevitable merging of an ancient faith and contemporary circumstances.

See also SIRACH, BOOK OF; WISDOM, GREEK; WISDOM THEOLOGY.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. E. G. Clarke, The Wisdom of Solomon (CBC; Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1973); W. J. Deane, The Book of Wisdom (Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1881); P. Enns, Exodus Retold: Ancient Exegesis of the Departure from

Egypt in Wis 10:15-21 and 19:1-9 (HSM 57; Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1997); H. A. Fischel, "The Uses of Sorites in the Tannaitic Period," HUCA 44 (1973) 119-51; J. Geyer, The Wisdom of Solomon (London: SCM, 1963); A. T. S. Goodrick, The Book of Wisdom (OCBC; New York: Macmillan, 1913); C. L. W. Grimm, Kurzgefasstes exegetisches Handbuch zu den Apokryphen des Alten Testaments (Leipzig: S. Hirzel, 1860); P. Heinisch, Das Buch der Weisheit (EHAT 24; Münster: Aschendorff, 1912); W. H. Horbury, "The Christian Use and the Jewish Origins of the Wisdom of Solomon," in Wisdom in Ancient Israel: Essays in Honor of J. A. Emerton, ed. J. Day, R. P. Gordon and H. G. M. Williamson (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1996) 182-96; M. Kolarcik, The Ambiguity of Death in the Book of Wisdom 1-6: A Study of Literary Structure and Interpretation (AnBib 127; Rome: Biblical Institute Press, 1991); C. Larcher, Le Livre de la Sagesse, ou, La Sagesse de Salomon (3 vols.; EBib 1, 3, 5; Paris: Gabalda, 1983-1985); B. J. Lillie, "A History of the Scholarship on the Wisdom of Solomon from the Nineteenth Century to Our Time," (Ph.D. diss., Hebrew Union College, 1982); B. M. Metzger, An Introduction to the Apocrypha (New York: Oxford University Press, 1957); H. L. Newman, "The Influence of the Book of Wisdom on Early Christian Writings," Crozer Quarterly 8 (1931) 361-72; J. M. Reese, Hellenistic Influence on the Book of Wisdom and Its Consequences (AnBib 41; Rome: Biblical Institute Press, 1970); J. Reider, The Book of Wisdom (New York: Harper & Row, 1957); J. Schaberg, "Major Midrashic Traditions in Wisdom 1,1-6,25," JSJ 13 (1982) 75-101; G. T. Sheppard, Wisdom as a Hermeneutical Construct: A Study in the Sapientializing of the Old Testament (BZAW 151; Berlin: de Gruyter, 1980); P. W. Skehan, "The Literary Relationship of the Book of Wisdom to Earlier Wisdom Writings," in Studies in Israelite Poetry and Wisdom (CBQMS 1; Washington, DC: Catholic Biblical Association of America, 1971) 172-236; H. van Broekhoven, "Wisdom and World: The Functions of Wisdom Imagery in Sirach, Pseudo-Solomon and Colossians" (Ph.D. diss., Boston University, 1988); W. Vogels, "The God Who Creates Is the God Who Saves: The Book of Wisdom's Reversal of the Biblical Pattern," EgT 22 (1991) 315-35; D. Winston, The Wisdom of Solomon (AB 43; Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1979); A. G. Wright, "The Structure of the Book of Wisdom," Bib 48 (1967) 165-84; G. Ziener, Die theologische Begriff- ssprache im Buche der Weisheit (BBB 11; Bonn: Peter Hanstein, 1956). P. Enns

WISDOM POEM

The wisdom poem is in many ways a self-explanatory genre category and as such may initially appear unworthy of individual consideration. As the name suggests, a wisdom poem is a poem (or *hymn) that is rooted in the theology, form and content of Israel's wisdom tradition. What more need be said? And yet the wisdom poem is far from common even within the Wisdom writings, its content and style are not easily defined, and there is much debate among commentators as to which passages may legitimately be described as "wisdom poems." Add to these peculiarities the fact that wisdom poems tend to appear at structurally significant points within their canonical books, and we can reasonably suggest that first impressions have been misleading, and that the wisdom poems are more worthy of consideration than their simple definition would indicate.

1. Wisdom
2. Genre of the Wisdom Poem
3. Content of the Wisdom Poem
4. Creation and Function of the Wisdom Poem
5. Wisdom Psalms
6. Conclusion

1. Wisdom.

Defining what constitutes "wisdom" is an issue addressed elsewhere in this volume (see Wisdom Theology), yet in order to understand the wisdom poem, we must make a passing glance at the nature of OT wisdom itself. A cursory overview of the secondary literature will bring up as many definitions of wisdom as there are commentators, yet there are certain recurring themes that inform our understanding of both wisdom as a whole and the wisdom poem in particular. Wisdom has been described as "the art of steering" (Zimmerli, 149). It is all about learning how to live well. "Wisdom in the OT is about how to negotiate life successfully in God's good but fallen world" (Bartholomew, 8). As part of this plan to teach the reader how to live life well, the wisdom authors and editors frequently highlight certain key themes. Chief among these leitmotifs are the consideration of the nature of wisdom itself, creation theology, the meaning of life, *suffering and the sovereignty of God. We encounter such discussions frequently in the books of the Wisdom literature, and these themes speak to any definition of the wisdom poem because it appears that wisdom poems often focus on or make use of these points, especially wisdom and creation.

2. Genre of the Wisdom Poem.

A. Hill (262) observes, "The wisdom hymn in the Old Testament is an adaptation of the poetic hymn form for the purpose of showcasing one or more of the motifs basic to wisdom teaching." Poetry is the medium of Hebrew wisdom. *Job and *Proverbs are almost entirely written in poetic form (the exceptions to this rule being the narrative prologue and epilogue to Job, along with the prose titles and introductions found in Job and Proverbs). The "autobiographical" style of *Qohelet means that *Ecclesiastes is partly written using proverbial (thus poetic) style and partly written in a type of stylized prose. Therefore, there is a very real sense in which the vast majority of OT wisdom material is "poetic," so why could not each passage be described as a "wisdom poem"?

The wisdom poem is actually a genre category within a broader literary framework. The framework is "poetry," and despite the apparently common implications of its name, the "wisdom poem" is in fact a relatively rare occurrence within this broader form. This, of course, prompts a question: how do we distinguish the "wisdom poem" from the rest of the poetry that so dominates the Wisdom literature?

Wisdom poems, it seems, are best defined by their content and rhetorical function within a book or pericope rather than according to form categories (see Form Criticism; Rhetorical Criticism). Some authors see wisdom poems as a specific subset of the poetic "hymn" genre. The hymn in the OT is generally a song of praise directed toward Yahweh because of his character and/or his great works. Commonly it includes an introduction (which announces that praise is to be given and to whom it is addressed), the body (which lists the reasons for praise) and a concluding exhortation to praise. If we apply these characteristics strictly, it is likely that only one of the OT's wisdom poems could be described as a hymn (the praise of the "valiant woman" in Prov 31:10-31). However, although some wisdom poems bear some of the characteristics of the hymn, it seems wiser to suggest that these poems, much like the royal psalms (see Kingship Psalms), actually transcend strict genre categories and are better defined by their content and function rather than by their form. Defining wisdom poems as hymns unduly restricts the category and excludes certain passages that may otherwise naturally be considered wisdom poems.

3. Content of the Wisdom Poem.

Given that genre categories are of limited use in this case, we are forced to examine the content of texts in order to establish the definition of a wisdom poem. In order to do so, the best starting point seems to be the examination of those texts that are generally acknowledged to be wisdom poems. Almost universally within the secondary literature Job 28 and Proverbs 8 are taken to be wisdom poems. So, in defining the wisdom poem, it may be fruitful to examine the characteristics that these texts share.

Job 28 comes at the end of the book's speech cycle. Three cycles of debate begin in Job 3 and continue through to the end of Job 27. The debate is becoming increasingly heated, and by this point in the narrative it is certainly producing more heat than light. From the reader's perspective, both sides of the debate (Job, on the one hand, and his friends on the other) seem to be scoring points, and this can cause great confusion. The essence of the debate revolves around two repeated issues: (1) whether or not Job's *suffering is "innocent" suffering (the book's prologue assures the reader that it is); (2) whose wisdom, Job's or his friends', is true wisdom. Arguably, it is this second point that is most open to debate, and this is the very issue that is addressed in Job 28. This conclusion to the debate focuses, appropriately, on the inaccessibility of wisdom itself. In the three major sections of the poem the author focuses on humankind's determined quest for items of great value (gold, precious stones, etc. [Job 28:1-11]), the hiddenness of wisdom within the created order (Job 28:12-22) and, finally, the fact that true wisdom is to be found in God alone (Job 28:23-28). How this impacts the narrative depends largely upon who we understand the "speaker" of this poem to be. There is much debate about whether these words should be read as the words of Job himself or as an interlude from the book's narrator. If the former, then Job 28 probably should be seen as an affirmation of Job's wisdom over that of the friends, with the conclusion in Job 28:28 echoing the description of Job in 1:1. If, however, the narrator speaks, then the reader is reminded that the wisdom of both sides to the debate is finite and limited because it is human; true wisdom is to be found in God alone, and the only proper human response is to fear God and to reject evil. Regardless of the identity of the speaker in this passage, Job 28 has a key rhetorical function within the book, and we will return to this question below.

Proverbs 8 bears a number of similarities to Job 28: clearly, the subject matter of this poem is wisdom itself, the poem is profoundly grounded in creation language and theology (Prov 8:22-31), and, again, the passage is of some significance in terms of its canonical placement within the book of Proverbs as a whole (Prov 8—9 concluding the introductory section with a strong focus on the essential need to choose wisdom). In Proverbs 8 wisdom is personified (see Personification), speaking with a human voice, addressing and calling the reader to follow a right worldview and lifestyle. As in Job 28, the great value of wisdom is emphasized (Prov 8:10-11, 18-19), as are the dual themes of the *fear of the Lord and the hatred of evil (Prov 8:13). So these two wisdom poems show a number of similarities in both language and content.

How, then, do the characteristics shared by Job 28 and Proverbs 8 inform our definition of the wisdom poem in general?

4. Creation and Function of the Wisdom Poem.

In order to define the wisdom poem more clearly, we need to consider how Job 28 and Proverbs 8 are differentiated from the passages that surround them. In terms of its canonical placement, Job 28 concludes the speech cycles and precedes Job's final complaint in Job 29—31. Yet it is clearly separate from each of these broader canonical sections. The tone of Job 28 is markedly different from the preceding (heated and repetitive) *disputation of the speech cycles and from the historical lament and ethical statement that follow. The wisdom poem is a lacuna, a pause, in the intensifying narrative. Its subject matter is central to the big picture of the book but not immediately linked to the surrounding passages. Rhetorically speaking, Job 28 gives the reader pause for thought: the confusion of the speech cycles is brought to a close with a meditation on the nature of wisdom that also serves as an important reminder prior to the resumption of debate in Job's final complaint and the Elihu speeches. So we see the consideration of wisdom, *creation theology and language, and rhetorical significance in Job 28.

Similarly, with regard to Proverbs 8, it is important to consider what sets this passage apart from the surrounding instructions of Proverbs 1–9. Once again the tone is different from the surrounding passages: the familial exhortation of the surrounding passages gives way to first-person speech, the subject matter is wisdom itself, and creation theology is used to paint this vivid representation of Hebrew wisdom.

So we see that, alongside the consideration of wisdom as the subject matter, difference in tone, the use of creation imagery, and rhetorical function are central to the identification of these passages as wisdom poems. These additional characteristics help to inform our understanding of the wisdom poem.

Job 3, for example, fulfills these characteristics. Often described as a “soliloquy,” this poem gives insight into the full extent of Job's pain and his internal response. The subject matter of the poem is not wisdom itself but rather Job's deep longing for death in response to the pain of his fate, which sets it somewhat apart from the other wisdom poems that we have looked at, yet the other characteristics seem to be in place. The poem is rhetorically significant because it begins the poetic debate that follows the prose prologue. The tone of the poem is markedly different from the debate language that follows in the speech cycles, and the poem is dominated by creation (or, in this case, “decreation”) language and imagery (Job 3:3-10). So should the fact that this poem does not focus its attention on wisdom per se exclude it from the category “wisdom poems”? I suggest that subject matter of wisdom poems should not be restricted to the topic of wisdom itself where other identifying features are present. As suggested above, the purpose of the wisdom poem is to showcase “one or more of the motifs basic to wisdom teaching.” Clearly, Job 3 in its consideration of the meaning and purpose of life and existence does just that, thus bracketing the lengthy section of speech cycles that so dominates the book of Job with two wisdom poems. The opening bracket questions the nature of life, and the closing one the nature of wisdom.

Similarly, Ecclesiastes 1:2-11 probably should be considered a wisdom poem. It too sets the tone for much of the ensuing autobiographical debate while remaining distinct from that narrative. It speaks with the language of creation theology (Eccles 1:4-7), and its introductory status provides a hermeneutical lens through which to read the succeeding sections of the book. Other likely candidates for the category of wisdom poem include Proverbs 31 and the song in praise of the “valiant woman”—a poem that brings the whole idea of walking in the ways of wisdom to life; Qohelet's contemplation of time in Ecclesiastes 3:1-8; the climax of the Elihu speeches in Job 37; and possibly a few other passages as well (e.g., the alphabetized poems of Prov 2:1-22; Job 9:2-24) (see Acrostic).

However, the wisdom poem is far from common as a genre category even within the Wisdom literature, and as readers, we should look in particular to the function of these poems within the broader book. They are designed to give the reader pause for thought. In modern terminology, the wisdom poem is a “time out” that encourages us to take stock regarding the key issues of life from a wisdom perspective.

5. Wisdom Psalms.

We should also give brief consideration to one other category of wisdom poem: the wisdom psalm. It is broadly acknowledged that, as with the wisdom poems, the number of wisdom psalms is actually quite few. There is no universal agreement as to the extent of this category, but the most frequently cited examples include Psalms 1; 25; 34; 37; 49; 73; 111; 112; 128. Basically, the wisdom psalms are those poems that focus on the key ideas of wisdom theology and adopt the language of wisdom (e.g., creation, the two ways). R. Whybray (158) suggests, “It would be justifiable to call a psalm a ‘wisdom psalm’ only if its resemblance to some part of the Old Testament wisdom books—Proverbs, Job or Ecclesiastes—were so close as to be undeniable.” So the wisdom psalms echo the style and content of the wisdom poems, but they form individual compositions rather than part of a broader narrative. It is interesting to note that in recent years scholars have frequently pointed out that the wisdom psalms play a significant role in shaping the readers understanding of the book of Psalms as a whole, giving it a more instructional rather than ceremonial final form (see Editorial Criticism). Just as the wisdom poems influence our reading of their respective books, so the wisdom psalms shape our overall understanding of the Psalter (McCann, 650).

6. Conclusion.

The wisdom poem is a genre category that is much more significant than the frequency of its occurrence would suggest. Wisdom poems focus on the key themes of wisdom theology, often adopting creation imagery to do so, and they are frequently used by authors/editors to shape our reading of the book in which they occur. Equally, the wisdom psalms are key to the contextual reading of the psalms in the Psalter.

See also FORM CRITICISM; HYMNS.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. C. G. Bartholomew, Reading Proverbs with Integrity (Cambridge: Grove Books, 2001); R. J. Clifford, The Wisdom Literature (IBT; Nashville: Abingdon, 1998); J. H. Eaton, Job (OTG; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1996); A. E. Hill, "Non-Proverbial Wisdom," in Cracking Old Testament Codes: A Guide to Interpreting the Literary Genres of the Old Testament (Nashville: Broadman & Holman, 1995) 255-80; J. C. McCann, "The Book of Psalms," NIB 4.639-1280; R. E. Murphy, Wisdom Literature: Job, Proverbs, Ruth, Canticles, Ecclesiastes and Esther (FOTL 13; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1981); G. T. Sheppard, Wisdom as a Hermeneutical Construct: A Study in Sapientializing of the Old Testament (BZAW 151; Berlin: de Gruyter, 1980); R. C. Van Leeuwen, "The Book of Proverbs," NIB 5.17-264; B. K. Waltke, The Book of Proverbs: Chapters 1-15 (NICOT; Grand Rapids, Eerdmans, 2004); R. N. Whybray, "The Wisdom Psalms," in Wisdom in Ancient Israel: Essays in Honour of J. A. Emerton, ed. J. Day, R. P. Gordon and H. G. M. Williamson (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1995) 152-60; G. H. Wilson, "The Shape of the Book of Psalms," Int 46 (1992) 129-41; W. Zimmerli, "The Place and Limit of Wisdom in the Framework of Old Testament Theology," SJT 17 (1964) 146-58. J. A. Grant

WISDOM PSALMS. See PSALMS 1: BOOK OF; WISDOM POEM.

WISDOM SOURCES

Wisdom includes both the forms of the literature that customarily are identified as Wisdom literature and the content of that literature. The question of sources is a sociological, literary and historical one. Sociologically, the sources of Wisdom literature have been argued as originating in tribal, village and family life, on the one hand, and in courts, royalty and scribal circles, on the other hand. As literary sources, the search for existing antecedents has led to Mesopotamian, Egyptian, Greek and, more recently, West Semitic and Hittite parallels. Related to this is the historical question of the origins of literary forms and content. Behind both lies the question of the forms and their content. Finally, and related directly to the identification of the sources of the content of Wisdom literature, is the question of what is distinctive in Israelite Wisdom literature; that is, what appears in OT Wisdom literature that is not found elsewhere in sources outside the Bible.

1. Social Sources
2. Egyptian and Mesopotamian Sources
3. West Semitic Sources
4. Theological Sources

1. Social Sources.

Wisdom forms include proverbs, riddles, allegories, teaching or didactic narratives, dialogues, hymns and noun lists. All but the last appear in the OT. All may have potential origins in the two traditional places of societal origin: either the oral culture of the village and the family or the written world of the scribal schools and the court. Because the oral culture more easily remembers wisdom material that is pithy and brief, individual proverbs and riddles may have their origins in the villages and their family life. Such wisdom was aimed at informing people of the single goal of the mastering of life. In this respect, the proverbs of Proverbs 10:1—22:16 and Proverbs 25—29 might provide examples of agrarian wisdom (Whybray). Longer wisdom materials may reflect a larger amount of work devoted to their composition, and this naturally points toward a scribal context for their production.

However, these observations are generalizations. If literacy was more widespread than is sometimes supposed, then longer compositions could easily originate in any part of the society. The presence of an abecedary in the eleventh century BC village of Izbet Sartah suggests that education in reading and writing took place in such villages (see Scribes). This village, identified by some with Ebenezer of 1 Samuel 4, shares a similar culture with the hill country villages that are generally recognized as Israelite. Therefore, the abecedary was likely used by an Israelite villager who was writing and reading the alphabet. If this could happen in one village in Israel, it could happen in every village. There is nothing to suggest the absence of reading and writing from very early in the nation's history. In Judges 8:14 a young citizen of Succoth, east of the Jordan, is able to write the names of the leaders of his town. A tenth-century BC abecedary was discovered at Tel Zayit, southwest of Jerusalem (Hess 2006). The extrabiblical inscriptions, in addition to those already mentioned, support the presence of some ability to read and write in ancient Israel. In every century, from the twelfth century BC onward, the presence of writing in rural and urban environments and in every major region of Israel attests to the widespread use of this medium of communication. Before the fall of Jerusalem in 586 BC the soldier who authored Lachish ostrakon 3 boasts that he reads every letter that comes to him and never receives assistance. If writing was widespread, though not necessarily a skill possessed by a majority of the citizens of Israel, then the production of longer pieces of literary and wisdom works would be possible from any area of society. Of course, such works would have been written on papyrus or animal skin and have not survived.

Court wisdom expressed the power of the elite of the society. It reflected an international context, which by the postexilic period would become available to the general public (Clements). Scribal and royal sources for Wisdom literature are well attested in the Bible. Most often major pieces of literature are associated with *Solomon, directly so for the collection of proverbs (Prov 1:1), where its connection with Solomon is reaffirmed in Proverbs 10:1; 25:1. The attestation is made indirectly for Ecclesiastes 1:1 and Song of Songs 1:1. To the teacher is attributed the composition of many proverbs (Eccles 12:9), which is reminiscent of the ascription to Solomon of a thousand proverbs and even more songs. The biblical connection of Solomon is best known from early in his reign, where he received wisdom as a divine gift, according to 1 Kings (1 Kings 3:9-14). That book goes on to describe his wise decision in the case of the two prostitutes and the disputed child (1 Kings 3:16-27). 1 Kings 3:28 describes how all Israel heard this and held the king in awe. The Queen of Sheba came from a great distance and praised the king for greater wisdom than she had previously heard (1 Kings 10:1-9; 2 Chron 9:1-9).

Royal origins outside of Solomon's court are also suggested, especially in the book of *Proverbs, an explicitly composite book. Thus Proverbs 25:1 attests to the work of scribes in Hezekiah's court c. 700 BC. They were responsible for collecting Solomonic proverbs in this section, Proverbs 25—29. Although it may be argued that royal proverbs exist in other tribal cultures where they have originated outside the court in the popular culture (Golka), an origin in the king's court is suggested in this introductory verse and is not difficult to imagine. Proverbs 31 begins with the sayings of a King *Lemuel that his mother taught him (Prov 31:1-9). If this is the correct interpretation of the heading, it implies not only a royal source but also one that apparently is not Israelite (or otherwise known). Professional *sages were known from Babylon (Dan 2:12 and passim), Edom (Obad 1:8) and other nations (Jer 10:7). Late in the monarchy Jeremiah knows of Judean sages and lists them with priests and prophets in his indictment (Jer 18:18). By the second century BC Ben Sira (Sir 38:24—39:11) is able to identify the role of the sage as an occupation among the upper classes.

Related to questions of the social sources of wisdom is the role of the family, possibly the royal family but just as likely nonroyal families. Although it is true that references to father-son relationships in the Wisdom literature may correspond to teacher-student relationships in scribal schools, there is little evidence for such schools in preexilic literature (Weeks). Rather, the combination of references to father and mother at the beginning of Proverbs (Prov 1:8) and elsewhere, as well as allusions to a grandfather (Prov 4:1-9), suggest that the primary source of wisdom instruction was envisioned as in the home (Estes; Walke and Diewert, 308-9). This source as an origin is attested for covenant instruction in general (Deut 6:4-9), although the role of priests seems to play an important part for this sort of teaching in some circles (Lev 10:11).

2. Egyptian and Mesopotamian Sources.

Much of the biblical Wisdom literature has contemporary and earlier parallels in the major civilizations of the ancient Near East. Proverbs are universal. Collections occur in nearby major civilizations with written records. Much of this wisdom is shared between nations. In particular, many have observed the similarity in content between the Egyptian Instruction of Amen-em-opet and Proverbs 22:17–24:22. Although other collections exist from Egyptian sources, this collection is often regarded as a high point in the Egyptian wisdom literature. The extant manuscripts date from a later period, but the text is assigned to the Ramesside period, the thirteenth and twelfth centuries BC. This would predate any of the biblical material that would itself be dated during the Israelite monarchy, but certainty is unlikely. The introduction of the collection describes the purpose to be to establish right relationships, to advise regarding conduct with authorities, to know how to answer and to find prosperity. This is reminiscent of the opening paragraphs of the biblical collection. There too the emphasis is on understanding how to get along in the world and to have success. Nevertheless, the closest parallels remain with Proverbs 22–24. The first three lines of the Egyptian text's first chapter of proverbs have been translated thus (J. Wilson, ANET, 421):

Give thy ears, hear what is said,
Give thy heart to understand them.
To put them in thy heart is worth while.

This may be compared with Proverbs
22:17-18a (NIV):

Pay attention and listen to the sayings of the wise;
apply your heart to what I teach,
for it is pleasing when you keep them in your heart.

Other parts of the book do not have such close connections, although parallels with individual proverbs may exist.

On a larger level of formal sources, K. Kitchen (1977; 1998; 2003, 135-36) attempts to relate the form through the comparison of dozens of examples of proverbial instructional literature. He counts some forty such known works, of which more than half are Egyptian. A formal study reveals distinctions between Egyptian collections of the second and first millennia BC. The second-millennium BC forms begin with a short prologue. The style either is exhortational or states an aim (except for the Instruction of Ptahhotep). The dominant form of expression is *parallelism. In the first-millennium BC proverbial collections the Egyptian form changes. Long prologues, rather than short ones, introduce the texts. Rather than exhortations, the presentation is biographical. In place of parallelism the dominant forms are single-line epigrams and short essays. The biblical collection of Proverbs 1–24 begins with a long prologue full of exhortations. Its dominant, indeed virtually only, form is parallelism. Thus it resembles the first-millennium BC instructions in terms of its long prologue. However, its exhortative style and parallel forms make it look like a second-millennium BC composition. Kitchen suggests that this mixture indicates a transitional form, between the second and first millennia BC. He notes that there is no evidence of a prologue ever having been added to an existing composition. Thus the hybrid form agrees with its origins in the period between the millennia. On the other hand, Proverbs 25–29 uses parallelism less and thus appears more like the first-millennium BC instruction texts. Further, Proverbs 1:1 ascribes authorship or at least editorial activity to Solomon. Other wisdom collections of the ancient Near East also contain the names of their authors (Kitchen 1998). The formal sources of the book of Proverbs may thus lie as early as the beginning of the first millennium BC.

The book of *Job partakes of *disputation literature and of literary material related to pious sufferers. The earlier Sumerian texts include the Man and His God composition (COS 1.179:573-75), in which a righteous sufferer remains faithful to his god until he is ultimately restored to his former life. Sumerian disputation literature includes The Disputation between Bird and Fish (COS 1.182:581-84), perhaps the best representation of this form of literature. It is presented here and elsewhere in the context of a fable.

The earliest Akkadian example of the study of God's ways in the midst of a troubled world is the Dialogue between a Man and His God (COS 1.151:485). It considers illness as the context for *suffering. Like the Man and His God composition, it concludes with a restoration. The poem that begins "I Will Praise the Lord of Wisdom" (COS 1.153:486-92) explores the questions of *theodicy in a more detailed manner. The Babylonian Theodicy (COS 1.154:492-95) represents the Akkadian exploration of this theme in the form of a dialogue, closest to the book of Job. The friend of the sufferer counsels the inexplicable nature of the divine. However, the sufferer concludes with a prayer for the divine Shamash to act as a shepherd. Thus the friend's words are more sympathetic to the sufferer than those of Job's friends. However, unlike with Job, the suffering is not ended. Indeed, the deities come in for their share of blame for the state of the sufferer and for favoring the rich among humanity. Note the final counsels of the friend and the sufferer (R. Biggs, ANET, 604):

Friend

"Narru, king of the gods, who created mankind,
And majestic Zulummar, who pinched off the clay for them,
And goddess Mami, the queen who fashioned them,
Gave twisted speech to the human race.
With lies, and not truth, they endowed them forever.
Solemnly they speak favorably of a rich man, 'He is a king,' they say, 'riches should be his,'
But they treat a poor man like a thief,
They have only bad to say of him and plot his murder,
Making him suffer every evil like a criminal, because he has no . . .
Terrifyingly they bring him to his end, and extinguish him like glowing coals."

Sufferer

"You are kind, my friend; behold my trouble,
Help me; look on my distress; know it.
I, though humble, wise, and a suppliant,
Have not seen help or aid even for a moment.
I have gone about the square of my city unobtrusively,
My voice was not raised, my speech was kept low.
I did not raise my head, but looked at the ground,
I did not worship even as a slave in the company of my associates.
May the god who has abandoned me give help,
May the goddess who has [forsaken me] show mercy,
The shepherd, the sun of the people, pastures (his flock) as a god should."

The Dialogue of Pessimism (COS 1.155:495-96) is also a discussion, in this case between a master and his slave. A similar structure governs each of the ten sections, in which the master proposes one course of action and then argues the merits of the contrary activity. The ten sections themselves may be organized in five groups of two each, so that there are opposing themes. Neither the early forms of Old Babylonian origins nor the later Neo-Assyrian texts achieved the lengthy discussion and dramatic presentation of the book of Job. Nevertheless, the Mesopotamian antecedents and sources provide essential background for basic questions and dialogic discussion of the biblical book.

The sources behind the book of *Ecclesiastes have been a matter of much discussion. S. de Jong suggests that this work should be situated later in the Hellenistic world of Judaism. It criticized the ambitious spirit of Hellenistic life and encouraged traditional Israelite values of modesty and practical wisdom. On the basis of Hellenistic usages of various vocabulary (Rudman) and the presence of a few phrases that are manifest translations from Greek to Hebrew (Buhlmann), some suggest a Hellenistic date with Greek philosophical sources. C. Seow (1996; 1997) argues for a Persian period origin on the basis of Aramaisms and the avoidance of Greek expressions. Others, however, find earlier sources in the ancient Near Eastern world. In particular, T. Longman (1998, 18-20) suggests the genre of the royal testament. In Egypt pharaohs or their viziers collected insights for aspiring young rulers whom they hoped to steer along paths of wisdom. Such instructions could also be expressed in the form of a sage who reviews his search for meaning in life. There is a well-attested genre in the ancient Near East, royal fictional *autobiography. A good example of royal autobiography in the West Semitic world is the fifteenth-century BC story of Idrimi of Alalakh. His story of gaining back his throne is recorded on his statue uncovered at the ancient site. Even closer are the Cuthean Legend of Naram-Sin, the Sin of Sargon, and the Adad-guppi autobiography. Like the book of Ecclesiastes, these conclude with instruction (Longman 1991, 97-129).

However, Ecclesiastes reads less like a biography and more like a series of personal reflection tions on the meaning and significance of life. In the view of most who study the book, it represents a more pessimistic view of life and the ability to find meaning and success than does the book of Proverbs. Its form as a collection of pithy observations on these fundamental questions brings it closer to proverbial collections than to customary biographical narratives. The Dialogue of Pessimism compares to Ecclesiastes in its pessimism and its concluding counsel of despair (Lambert 1960, 149):

“Who is so tall as to ascend to the heavens?
Who is so broad as to compass the under world?”
“No, slave, I will kill you and send you first.”
“And my master would certainly not outlive me by even three days.”

The Dialogue of Pessimism, however, is a dialogue, whereas Ecclesiastes is not. A closer example may be the Egyptian Instruction of Any (COS 1.46:110-15), a text that likely dates from the New Kingdom, centuries before the Israelite monarchy. Unlike Ecclesiastes, it is written by someone who claims to be a minor official rather than a king. Further, the general presentation of the instruction text is positive with advice from a father to a son. However, at the conclusion the son does not simply accept the advice of the father, as the traditional presentation of such advice would suggest. There are two interpretations of what the son does. One suggests that he humbly confesses his inability to measure up to the demands of his father. Following this approach, the son would affirm the father's expression of traditional wisdom. Another perspective understands the son to take a negative view of following the advice. In effect, he rejects his father's teaching. Although the father has the last word with a set of observations where he criticizes his son, the son's negative view of traditional wisdom would allow for a comparison with the overall negative view of Ecclesiastes.

*Song of Songs represents erotic love poetry. Its role as wisdom literature is suggested by its connection to Solomon in the opening title (Song 1:1). Its origins lie with love poetry. In many cases there are parallels with Egyptian love poetry, although this genre is found among Mesopotamian texts as well (see Wasf). However, the Egyptian material bears a closer resemblance in its subtlety of expression and in its use of related metaphors. Nevertheless, many of the parallels are not limited to Song of Songs and Egyptian literature but rather are part of the universal nature of love poetry. J. White (162) observes,

Not only does the Song's rustic imagery betray a close association with the ways of expressing love in Egypt, but the commonality of love-language denotes archetypal vehicles through which human, sexual love was celebrated in the ancient world. Thus, it is not surprising that specific topoi be common to both Hebrew and Egyptian love literature. The fragrances, sight of the love partners, embracing and kissing, friends and enemies of the lovers, and even specific parallels (scent of garments, the mother figure, love under the trees, gazelles, etc.) denote the Song's participation in the world of human love expression.

Thus there is a common origin to love poetry, biblical or otherwise. What is distinctive about Song of Songs is its length, much greater than other extant love poems. However, the same is true of the book of Job in comparison with other disputation literature. In itself, such length does not prove a composite origin, deriving from discrete poems that were joined together. After all, the genre of love poetry certainly produced many more oral compositions than the written ones that are extant. Indeed, this is the only example of erotic love poetry in the West Semitic world from the biblical era. This raises the question of West Semitic literature as a wisdom source.

3. West Semitic Sources.

Although the sources of wisdom literature have traditionally been located in the great civilizations along the Nile, Tigris and Euphrates Rivers, sources within the West Semitic world have demonstrated the existence of wisdom literature and literary forms.

Perhaps the best-known pre-Hellenistic wisdom source outside the Bible is Ahiqar. This collection of Aramaic proverbs combines both narrative and proverbs into a single composition in all extant copies. The earliest version occurs at Elephantine at the site of a Jewish mercenary colony in Upper Egypt in the late fifth century BC. Since the narrative mentions the king Esarhaddon from the early seventh century BC, the text as it occurs in existing versions must date after that time. Although some argue that proverbs predate this period, this is disputed, and it remains likely that in large measure Ahiqar dates later than the biblical collection in the book of Proverbs. Furthermore, there is extant evidence of written proverbs in Palestine before the arrival of Israel. Thus Labaya, leader of Shechem, writes to the pharaoh an Amarna letter from the mid-fourteenth century BC and uses what appears to be a proverb about ants as a means to justify his retaliatory measures against his enemies (Hess 1993, 95-96): "When an ant is swatted, does it not fight back, and bite the hand of the man who swats it?" Ants are sources for proverbial wisdom in Proverbs 6:6; 30:25.

A Sufferer's Salvation (COS 1.152:486) represents an exploration of theodicy from Ugarit. It describes a sufferer who experienced some form of illness that no omen, divination or sage's wisdom could resolve. However, the deity Marduk enabled the author to recover. This is described as the return of life from the dead. Praise of Marduk as personal god and goddess follows. However, Marduk is credited with both punishment and salvation. In a series of comparisons reminiscent of Ecclesiastes 3 the writer outlines how "he struck me and showed me mercy," "he scattered me and gathered me," and so on. Thus the deity is as responsible for the bad as for the good. Although the text does consider theodicy, its content and the effect of its style are closer to a psalm of praise for the salvation of the psalmist from illness and death.

Of even greater interest from the West Semitic world, and in copies only from the Late Bronze Age (c. 1550-1200 BC), is the wisdom instruction given to Šūpē-amēli. The texts of this form occur only in the West Semitic and nearby Hittite world and are found there in three locations: Emar, Ugarit and the Hittite capital of Hattusas. M. Dietrich (1991; 1993) presents an edition incorporating these three texts. It predates the biblical Wisdom literature that it most closely parallels, Proverbs and Ecclesiastes. Šūpē-amēli takes the form of a conversation between a father and his son. Like the wisdom of Proverbs, the father's exhortations, which dominate the collection, encourage success in life. Many specific proverbs have direct parallels with those in the biblical collections as well as in other wisdom collections from the ancient Near East. Consider the following chosen from throughout the collection (Dietrich 1993, 58-61):

My son, with evil doers do not plunder an equal for your own gain!
 . . . with a bully you should not wish to fight
 . . . abandon bitterness of expression, do not admit (it) either!
 . . . Give no-one advice for a price . . .

The response of the son provides a viewpoint different from that of the father. Note the opening statements (Dietrich 1993, 61):

The word of my father, the counsellor have I silently heard, now I shall say a word to you!
 We are doves, birds that squawk—the most restless of powerful oxen, fierce sky-oxen—, Mules are we!
 My father, you have built a house: You have made the gate high, 60 ells is the breadth of the storehouse—what have you taken with you?

The impression is completely different. The pessimism expressed by the son is reminiscent of the spirit that many find in the main body of Ecclesiastes (Hurowitz 2007). Just as the positive exhortations of the father are followed by the dubious pessimism of the son that questions the father's values, so the rules for success in the longer collection of the book of Proverbs are followed by the shorter challenge to this wisdom in the book of Ecclesiastes. Unlike most of the other West Semitic wisdom literature outside the Bible, wisdom is criticized here. The forms resemble Proverbs 22:17—24:22; 28—31. The dialogue is between the father and the son. Like the view of the book of Proverbs, the father encourages success in life. Like Ecclesiastes, the son challenges materialistic values. Thus this book provides a unique antecedent to Ecclesiastes (and Ps 49) as well as Proverbs. It was widespread in the West Semitic world several centuries before Solomon's traditional dates. This remarkable example of West Semitic wisdom literature not only predates the biblical material but also demonstrates how forms of critique of the popular wisdom tradition appeared already in written form a thousand years before the Hellenistic era. Thus the origins of a type of literature such as Ecclesiastes may be identified as native to the West Semitic world in the same manner as the origins of Proverbs.

4. Theological Sources.

The wisdom literature of the Bible participates in forms and in some specific content with the wisdom literature of the West Semitic world and of the greater ancient Near East. However, the canonical text of the OT provides a distinctive source for important theological distinctives that do not occur elsewhere. This is not to suggest that the mere presence of a deity in the Wisdom literature is somehow unique. Rather, the presence of the divine can be found in many wisdom sources. No culture of which the biblical literature shares common aspects was without a significant religious element. Indeed, the presence of one or more deities is customarily acknowledged and referenced in the Wisdom literature. There is little evidence for truly secular wisdom literature in the ancient Near East. Nevertheless, there remain distinctive elements.

The most distinctive element in the biblical Wisdom literature that does not occur elsewhere is the emphasis on the fear of Yahweh (yir'at yhw) (see Fear of the Lord). Although other ancient Near Eastern (including West Semitic) sources do stress the importance of reverence and honor before the divine, nowhere else does this theme occupy such a prominent position so consistently and in so large a body of wisdom literature. Of the twenty-one times that the expression occurs, twenty times it does so in poetry (2 Chron 19:9 being the sole exception). Elsewhere it occurs three times in Isaiah (Is 11:2, 3; 33:6) three times in *Psalms (Ps 19:9; 34:11; 111:10), and fourteen times, all the remaining occurrences, in Proverbs. All the appearances in Isaiah are explicitly associated with wisdom and understanding. All the occurrences in Psalms are in wisdom psalms. Indeed, at Psalm 111:10 there appears the expression "The fear of the LORD is the beginning of wisdom." This is similar to Proverbs 1:7, where "The fear of the LORD is the beginning of knowledge." This is a key theme for the entire book, positioned at the beginning to suggest its importance. Proverbs 9:10 says something similar: "The fear of the LORD is the beginning of wisdom." Elsewhere in the book it is associated with long life (Prov 10:27), a secure fortress (Prov 14:26), a fountain of life (Prov 14:27), learning wisdom (Prov 15:33), avoiding evil (Prov 16:6), life and rest (Prov 19:23) and wealth and honor (Prov 22:4). The repeated occurrences of this theme of fear toward God tie the book together as a distinctive whole. They also may explain why the writer can be so optimistic. The author believes that the placement of all wisdom into the context of the fear of Yahweh will truly bring about prosperity and success. This is different from other forms of ancient Near Eastern wisdom literature. Although the fear of the gods is counseled elsewhere, it does not provide the security for the disciple nor does it function as a summarizing theme for the whole piece. The admonition appears also in the heart of the book of Job. In Job 28, Job's great poem on the search for and value of wisdom, we read, "The fear of the LORD [yir'at 'adōnay], that is wisdom; and to shun evil is understanding" (Job 28:28). In Job too this theme stands at the center of the book and provides a key to wisdom. This is true despite the role of Job as protest literature against the traditional wisdom theology. The command to fear God occurs at the end of the book of Ecclesiastes (Eccles 12:13) as well. Ecclesiastes is also a form of protest literature that more radically questions the entire pursuit of wisdom.

Not only does the fear of the Lord provide a uniquely important theme for the integration of biblical wisdom but also it points to the ultimate source of wisdom as lying within the context of biblical revelation. Wisdom psalms may have parallels with other poetry outside the Bible. However, a closely related form of psalm is that of the Torah psalm. This approach, which praises the source of wisdom and success in the study and obedience of God's revelation and covenant, has no known antecedent in the world of wisdom. Here the source of wisdom lay not in any human understanding or production; rather, Torah psalms such as Psalm 1 and Psalm 119 point to the origins of true wisdom in the Torah, seen as God's revelation to Israel. It is this covenant document that forms the basis for a unique relationship with God that no other wisdom source can reach. It is for this reason, as well, that the Israelite Wisdom literature ignores the arts of divination and omen-reading that occupy so many texts among Israel's neighbors. The will of Yahweh is not divined, nor are omens the source of divine guidance. Instead, the unique covenant that God makes with each citizen of Israel provides a true means of direct access to the divine will.

This means of access is available to all. For this reason, as Israel's history moves forward into the Hellenistic and Roman periods, wisdom collections such as *Wisdom of Solomon, *Sirach and Baruch stress the revelation of God's word more and more powerfully. This alone provides a true source of wisdom for the faithful believer. In the form of reason and word, the source of wisdom becomes a hypostatic *personification in Philo's thought and associated with the Son of God as the logos in the Gospel of John. Countering secret revelation and wisdom from hidden sources, the connection between wisdom and Jesus Christ reaches a high point in Colossians, where he is the image of the invisible God (Col 1:15). Thus the fear of the Lord as access to Torah wisdom becomes in Christianity the true source of wisdom only as it is received through the mediation of the Son of God and his new revelation.

See also ECCLESIASTES 2: ANCIENT NEAR EASTERN BACKGROUND; JOB 2: ANCIENT NEAR EASTERN BACKGROUND; MAAT; PROVERBS 2: ANCIENT NEAR EASTERN BACKGROUND; SONG OF SONGS 2: ANCIENT NEAR EASTERN BACKGROUND; WASF; WISDOM, GREEK.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. A. Buhlmann, "The Difficulty of Thinking in Greek and Speaking in Hebrew (Qoheleth 3.18; 4.13-16; 5.8)," JSOT 90 (2000) 101-8; R. E. Clements, Wisdom for a Changing World: Wisdom in the Old Testament (Berkeley Lectures 2; Berkeley, CA: BIBAL Press, 1990); J. L. Crenshaw, Old Testament Wisdom: An Introduction (rev. ed.; Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 1998); S. de Jong, "Qohelet and the Ambitious Spirit of the Ptolemaic Period," JSOT 61 (1994) 85-96; M. Dietrich, "Der Dialog zwischen Šūpē-amēli und seinem 'Vater': Die Tradition babylonischer Weisheitssprüche im Westen," UF 23 (1991) 33-74; idem, "Babylonian Literary Texts from Western Libraries," in Verses in Ancient Near Eastern Prose, ed. J. C. de Moor and W. G. E. Watson (AOAT 42; Kevelaer: Butzon & Bercker; Neukirchen-Vluyn: Neukirchener Verlag, 1993) 41-67; D. J. Estes, Hear, My Son: Teaching and Learning in Proverbs 1-9 (NSBT; Downers Grove: InterVarsity Press, 1997); F. W. Golka, The Leopard's Spots: Biblical and African Wisdom in Proverbs (Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1993); R. S. Hess, "Smitten Ant Bites Back: Rhetorical Forms in the Amarna Correspondence from Shechem," in Verses in Ancient Near Eastern Prose, ed. J. C.

de Moor and W. G. E. Watson (AOAT 42; Kevelaer: Butzon & Bercker; Neukirchen-Vluyn: Neukirchener Verlag, 1993) 95-111; idem, "Literacy in Iron Age Israel," in Windows into Old Testament History: Evidence, Argument, and the Crisis of "Biblical Israel", ed. V. P. Long, D. W. Baker and G. J. Wenham (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2002) 82-102; V. A. Hurowitz, "The Wisdom of Šūpē-amēli—A Deathbed Debate between a Father and Son," in Wisdom Literature in Mesopotamia and Israel, ed. R. J. Clifford (SBL Symposium Series Number 36; Atlanta: Society of Biblical Literature, 2007) 37-51; T. R. Kämmerer, Šimā milka: Induktion und Reception der mittelbabylonischen Dichtung von Ugarit, Emar und Tell el-'Amar-na (AOAT 251; Münster: Ugarit-Verlag, 1998); K. A. Kitchen, "Proverbs and Wisdom Books of the Ancient Near East: The Factual History of a Literary Form," TynBul 28 (1977) 69-114; idem, "Biblical Instructional Wisdom: The Decisive Voice of the Ancient Near East," in Boundaries of the Ancient Near Eastern World: A Tribute to Cyrus H. Gordon, ed. M. Lubetski, C. Gottlieb and S. Keller (JSOTSup 273; Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1998) 346-63; idem, On the Reliability of the Old Testament (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2003); W. G. Lambert, Babylonian Wisdom Literature (Oxford: Oxford University Press, 1960); T. Longman III, Fictional Akkadian Autobiography: A Generic and Comparative Study (Winona Lake, IN: Eisenbrauns, 1991); idem, The Book of Ecclesiastes (NICOT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1998); D. Rudman, "A Note on the Dating of Ecclesiastes," CBQ 61 (1999) 47-52; C. L. Seow, "Linguistic Evidence and the Dating of Qoheleth," JBL 115 (1996) 643-66; idem, Ecclesiastes (AB 18C; New York: Doubleday, 1997); B. K. Waltke and D. Dieckert, "Wisdom Literature," in The Face of Old Testament Studies: A Survey of Contemporary Approaches, ed. D. W. Baker and B. T. Arnold (Grand Rapids: Baker, 1999) 295-328; S. Weeks, Early Israelite Wisdom (OTM; Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1994); J. B. White, A Study of the Language of Love in the Song of Songs and Ancient Egyptian Poetry (SBLDS 38; Missoula, MT: Scholars Press, 1978); R. N. Whybray, "Yahweh-Sayings and Their Contexts in Proverbs 10,1-22,16," in La sagesse de l'ancien Testament, ed. M. Gilbert (BETL 51; Gembloux: Duculot; Leuven: Leuven University Press, 1979) 153-65. R. S. Hess

WISDOM THEOLOGY

The distinctiveness of the biblical Wisdom literature, with its interest in individual experience and behavior rather than in Israel as a nation with its history, cult and covenant relationship with Yahweh, has been found problematic by scholars concerned with OT theology. As a result, some have more or less ignored these books, and a few have questioned whether they have any contribution to make to OT theology. However, during the last few decades there has been growing interest in the Wisdom literature and the recognition that the distinctive theological emphases found in it make an important contribution to theology, providing a valuable complement to what is found in the rest of the OT.

After a brief consideration of the nature of wisdom as it appears in the Wisdom literature, this article surveys some of the major theological themes found in the books of *Job, *Proverbs and *Ecclesiastes and the debates that have taken place about them.

1. The Nature of Wisdom
2. The Problem of Wisdom Theology
3. A Creation Theology
4. The Personification of Wisdom
5. The Fear of the Lord
6. The Two Ways
7. The Act-Consequence Nexus
8. God
9. Humans

1. The Nature of Wisdom.

In the OT in general “wisdom” refers to particular skills, both physical and intellectual. People who possess these skills are described as “wise.” So, in the account of the construction of the tabernacle God says to Moses, “I have given wisdom to all the wise of heart, so that they may make all that I have commanded you” (Ex 31:6). These skills include artistic design, metalwork, work with precious stones and woodwork (Ex 31:3-5). They also encompass spinning, embroidery and weaving (Ex 35:35). Elsewhere it is used of cunning or craftiness (2 Sam 13:3), political pragmatism (1 Kings 2:6), professional mourning (Jer 9:17), sailors and shipbuilders (Ezek 27:8-9).

Within the Wisdom literature the meaning of “wisdom” becomes somewhat narrower. Speaking of the book of Proverbs in particular, R. Whybray (1994, 4) observes, “Elsewhere in the Old Testament hokmâ means something like “skill”: practical knowledge in any sphere, from that of the artisan to that of the politician. But in Proverbs hokmâ is always life-skill: the ability of the individual to conduct his life in the best possible way and to the best possible effect.”

Alongside this narrowing of meaning there is another one. In the Wisdom literature “wisdom” is often coupled with other words meaning “understanding” (bînâ, těbûnâ) or “knowledge” (da‘at). This gives it a more “intellectual” slant. As a result, wisdom is seen as “an intellectual quality that provides the key to happiness and success, to ‘life’ in its widest sense” (Whybray 1974, 8). This is a narrowing of meaning, not a change in meaning, as is shown by the idiomatic phrase “wise of heart,” noted above, in texts outside the Wisdom literature. In Hebrew the heart is primarily the center of reasoning and the will rather than, as in English, of the emotions.

2. The Problem of Wisdom Theology.

The writers of OT theologies have found it difficult to incorporate the Wisdom literature into their theologies. One reason for this is given by G. Wright (103): “In any attempt to outline a discussion of Biblical faith it is the wisdom literature which offers the chief difficulty because it does not fit into the type of faith exhibited in the historical and prophetic literatures.” This assumes that Hebrew theology ought to center on Yahweh’s acts in history and the interpretation of and response to these acts. One of the characteristics of the Wisdom literature in the Hebrew *canon is the lack of reference to Israel’s historical traditions, including the fundamental ones of the exodus from Egypt and the establishment of the covenant at Sinai. In addition, whereas theology based on historical traditions naturally leads to an emphasis on Yahweh’s relationship with the nation, the emphasis in the Wisdom literature is on the individual. Wright (104) concluded that the material in the book of Proverbs in particular “remains near the pagan source of wisdom in which society and the Divine work in history played no real role.” This highlights a common assumption that wisdom in Israel was not “homegrown” but rather was appropriated from the international pool of wisdom in the ancient Near East to which the literatures of Egypt and Mesopotamia bear witness. As a result, W. Eichrodt (81) held that wisdom in Israel “has a strongly secular flavour, and is only loosely connected with religious faith.” This wisdom was mainly concerned with the skill in practical matters that is the basis for success in daily life. It was only gradually integrated into Hebrew Yahwism.

A few scholars have questioned whether that integration ever really happened. Most notably, H. Preuss argued that the teaching of Proverbs 10–29 is entirely in accord with that of international wisdom and, despite appearances, is alien to the faith of Israel. Although the name “Yahweh” is used and there are admonitions to fear and trust Yahweh, the characterization of Yahweh as the guarantor of the moral order and the assumption of the principle of *retribution put him on a level with the gods mentioned in other ancient Near Eastern wisdom literature. Preuss’s argument has not convinced many. As Whybray (1995, 127) has said, “His extreme position leaves it unclear how the retention of Proverbs as Jewish scripture is to be accounted for and why its authors gave their god the name of the God of Israel.”

R. Murphy has argued that the perceived problem of integrating wisdom with Yahwism is the result of a methodological error. It arises because it is assumed that God’s revelation in history is to be given priority. Murphy (1996, 124) remarks, “This view is biased. Rather, one should look directly at the wisdom experience (which is also historical!) that the worshiper of the Lord actually had. What is the religious dimension of this wisdom experience? It is an appropriation of the lessons that one can draw from day-to-day living, from the realm of personal intercourse and the surprises of creation. The dialogue between the Israelite and the environment was also a dialogue with the God who was worshiped in Israel as creator and redeemer.”

Here Murphy is arguing that, unlike most of the rest of the OT, the theology of the Wisdom literature is centered on creation rather than redemption. Instead of taking only one perspective as determinative for Israelite thought, both ought to be taken into account as aspects of a single worldview.

3. A Creation Theology.

3.1. Introduction. In a seminal article published in English in 1964, W. Zimmerli (148) argued, “Wisdom thinks resolutely within the framework of a theology of creation” (see Creation Theology). He noted that in the Wisdom literature there is no appeal to God’s relationship with Israel through their history or through the covenant. God is spoken of as “Maker” (Job 4:17; 32:22; 35:10; Prov 14:31; 17:5; 22:2) or “Creator” (Eccles 12:1) but never as the “God of Israel.” The teaching of the *sages, whether expressed as a statement (Aussagewort) or an admonition (Mahnwort), is presented as “counsel,” not as commandments of the lawgiver of the covenant. It is based on observation and understanding of the created order. “Wisdom shows man as a being who goes out, who apprehends through his knowledge, who establishes, who orders his world” (Zimmerli, 150).

The theme of creation does have a significant place in each of the wisdom books. There are many allusions to creation in Job, and the theme comes to the foreground in Yahweh’s speeches (Job 38–41). Proverbs twice refers to the creation of the world (Prov 3:19–20; 8:22–31) and makes several mentions of Yahweh as the creator of humans (Prov 14:31; 16:4; 17:5; 20:12; 22:2; 29:13). Ecclesiastes opens with a cosmology that is the grounding of the teaching of *Qohelet (Eccles 1:3–15). The frequent references to God “giving” things (Eccles 1:13; 2:26 [2x]; 3:10, 11; 5:18–19; 6:2; 8:15; 9:9; 12:7) are a constant reminder of God as the Creator and Sustainer of the world and of humans in it—hence the concluding exhortation, “Remember your Creator in the days of your youth” (Eccles 12:1).

3.2. A Classification of Approaches. Various scholars have developed this understanding of wisdom theology in different ways. L. Perdue (34–48) discerns four main lines of approach.

3.2.1. Anthropology. Some scholars understand the Wisdom literature as being concerned primarily with human nature and behavior. One of the most thoroughgoing expressions of this approach is W. Brueggeman’s study In Man We Trust. He argues that in the Wisdom literature the goal and meaning of existence is a this-worldly life of joy and wholeness. It values the human ability to discern what is good and true in a world that is the good and ordered creation of God and so legitimates social knowledge as the ground for *ethics.

3.2.2. Cosmology. Other scholars emphasize the idea of an ordered cosmos as the focus of the Wisdom literature. H.-J. Hermission has developed this kind of approach. A study of the wisdom saying (Hermission 1968) led him to conclude that wisdom thought was concerned with recognizing, transmitting and creating an order of life. In a later article Hermission made a more comprehensive statement of wisdom theology, arguing, "Wisdom searches for the knowledge of order, or, for those to whom this seems too rigid, for a certain regularity within the diversity of the phenomena of the world. This world, however, is unitary" (Hermission 1978, 44). By the "unitary" nature of the world he means that wisdom does not distinguish in principle between "nature wisdom" and "culture wisdom." Hermission (1978, 44) argues that Proverbs 8 depicts wisdom as "present in the created world as regularity, purposiveness, and therefore also as beauty. Thus Proverbs 8 talks about creation when it talks about wisdom: about creation with respect to its intelligible orders, to which man is to adapt himself." In his view this theology underlies the sentences in Proverbs 10—29, though coming to the surface only in the few that mention God as "Maker." The speeches of God in Job 38—41 present this order with a different slant: "For the good order which the creator gave to the world is not limited by man's not understanding it. What is hidden from him are the origins, the interrelations, the background; but there remains his amazement at that which lies before him as a result of the wise creator's activity" (Hermission 1978, 52). Ecclesiastes shows that "not all wisdom managed to resolve the perplexity over the good order and incomprehensibility of the world and the aloofness of the creator God" (Hermission 1978, 54).

3.2.3. Theodicy. J. Crenshaw has been a strong advocate of the view that theodicy* is the major theme of the Wisdom literature. He accepts that creation is central to wisdom thought but argues that the distinctiveness of the wisdom approach to it is that the sages took seriously the experience of chaos* and its continuing threat in all areas of life. It was the need to deal with the question of God the Creator's relationship to chaos as it appeared in nature, society and moral life that prompted them to defend divine justice by presenting their understanding of creation (Crenshaw 1976). They developed their creation theology in order to articulate a doctrine of theodicy (Crenshaw 1977).

3.2.4. Anthropology and Cosmology. Some scholars have seen a creative tension between anthropology and cosmology in the Wisdom literature. Murphy (1996, 111-49), for example, speaks of two ways in which creation is viewed in the Wisdom literature: as "origins" or "beginnings" and as the world in which humans live, react to and learn from. Creation as origins is most clearly presented in Proverbs 8:22-31 and Job 38—41. The concern of such passages is not origins in itself but rather to locate wisdom at the beginning of the creation of the world and therefore as the means of understanding the nature of the world. Murphy, however, disagrees with those scholars who see the prime concern of wisdom as a search for a cosmic order "out there." The sages were aware of and looked for regularities in nature and human activity, but Murphy does not think that they conceptualized this as an all-embracing "order." He argues that in the thinking of the sages there was no separation of world from the Creator, as if the cosmos was a machine wound up at creation and left to run on its own. Rather, the Lord was understood to be active in the world at all levels. Murphy quotes with approval these words of G. von Rad: "The experiences of the world were for her [Israel] always divine experiences as well, and the experiences of God were for her experiences of the world" (von Rad, 62). This meant that God could be met within, and be revealed in, experience of the world. This view is articulated in the personification Woman Wisdom. She is more than a personification of the order of creation because her call is the voice of the Lord: "Ultimately the revelation of creation is the revelation of God. God speaks through wisdom/creation, which is turned to human beings and speaks in the accents of God. Such is the thrust of Prov. 8" (Murphy 1996, 139).

3.3. Conclusion. Each of the first three approaches discussed above highlights an important aspect of wisdom theology. On the surface, much of the Wisdom literature is anthropocentric, concerned with human beings and their behavior. However, underlying this is the assumption of a cosmic order of some kind that seems to be an essential element in the worldview of the wise. Theodicy is an important theme in Job and Ecclesiastes. The justice of God seems to be basic to wisdom theology, the basis for the belief in a moral order. It is more likely that theodicy arose as a subsidiary issue in wisdom theology in response to experience that raised questions about this justice than that it was the basis of wisdom theology. The fourth approach, which sees an ongoing tension between the anthropological and cosmological themes as constitutive of wisdom theology, seems to describe best what we find in the Wisdom literature. It provides a corrective to possible extremes. An excessive stress on the human-centeredness of wisdom teaching has led some scholars to see it as essentially “secular,” with little place for God. This is hard to sustain in the light of the evidence that wisdom in the ancient Near East in general was always grounded in religious beliefs (Weeks, 66-69). It also does not do justice to the theme of “the fear of the Lord” in the Wisdom literature (see 5 below).

An overemphasis on wisdom as the search for an overarching cosmic order can lead to a presentation of it that is rather like some Greek philosophy and at odds with the practical teaching based on the observation and experience of everyday life that constitutes much of the biblical Wisdom literature. It can also lead to a mechanical understanding of the relationship between deeds and their consequences, especially in Proverbs, which is not supported by a careful study of the book (see 7 below).

4. The Personification of Wisdom.

In Proverbs 1:20-33; 8:1-36; 9:1-6 wisdom is personified as a woman. There has been a great deal of debate about the origin and significance of this personification.

4.1. The Origin of the Personification. *Maat, the Egyptian goddess of truth and justice, is quite often suggested as the prototype for personified Wisdom. M. Fox (1995) has presented a strong critique of this suggestion. Among the points that he makes are the fact that there is no recorded speech by Maat, and that she never became a popular or well-known goddess in Egypt, let alone outside. Whybray (1965, 83-87) has shown the weakness of the evidence put forward to support the claim that behind the personification of Wisdom stands a Canaanite goddess of wisdom. He points out that there is no known Canaanite goddess of wisdom. To this can be added the observation that personified Wisdom shows none of the characteristics of the known Canaanite goddesses (Fox 2000, 335). B. Lang’s suggestion that the origin of the figure of personified Wisdom is an Israelite goddess is a hypothesis that rests on virtually no evidence. Some similarities have been noted between the speeches of Wisdom and hymns praising the goddess Isis. However, Isis worship began to spread widely in the Near East only in the late third century BC, and the hymns are not attested before the first century BC.

The origin of the personification might be much more straightforward than any of these hypotheses suggest. Personification is quite a common literary technique, especially in poetry. It is very probable that the feminine gender of the noun “wisdom” in Hebrew (hokmā) led to the personification of Wisdom as a woman. This would have been helped by the reality of “wise women” in Israel and the fact that in Israelite society *women fulfilled various roles that could appropriately be assigned to Wisdom (Camp, 90-109). As a literary construct, Wisdom is able to combine different roles that might never be expected to be found together in any one human person.

4.2. The Role and Significance of Personified Wisdom. More important than the origin of the figure of personified Wisdom is her role in Proverbs 1–9 and the theological significance of that role. Proverbs 8:22-36 is the key passage for understanding her role. There are two notable exegetical issues in this passage. The first is whether the verb qnh in the opening clause of Proverbs 8:22 should be understood in the sense “bought” (ESV mg.), “acquired/possessed” (NASB) or “created” (NRSV). The second is whether the word ʾāmôn in the first clause of Proverbs 8:30 means “master worker” (NRSV) or “little child” (NRSV mg.) or possibly “counselor.” Even if these two issues remain unresolved, certain things are clear about Wisdom in this passage. She has a divine origin (the natural way to read Prov 8:24-25 is that the Lord was the one by whom she was “brought forth”) before the creation of the earth (Prov 8:22-26). She was present at the creation of the earth, even if her role is unclear (Prov 8:27-30a). In Proverbs 8:30 she is depicted as having an intimate, joyful relationship with God, and in Proverbs 8:31 she expresses her delight and interest in the world and its human inhabitants. In Proverbs 8:32-36 she calls on humans to listen to her and to heed her instruction because it will give them “life.”

The claims that Wisdom makes in Proverbs 8:32-36 are far reaching. Von Rad (1963) says of Proverbs 8:35, “Who, apart from Yahweh, can say to man, ‘Whoever finds me, finds life?’” This may suggest that here Wisdom is a hypostasis, a divine attribute envisaged as a separate divine being. However, the preceding verses make clear that, unlike Yahweh, Wisdom has an origin, like the world. There are no clear grounds in the text for regarding the figure of Wisdom as anything more than a vivid poetic personification. But of what is she a personification? What is said of her presence before and at the creation of the world, taken together with Proverbs 3:19-20, makes it clear that it was through Wisdom that God created an ordered world. This might be taken to imply that Wisdom is a personification of the order inherent in the created world, a personification not of an attribute of God but rather of an attribute of the world (von Rad, 156). This, however, seems an inadequate interpretation of some of what is said of Wisdom: her origin before the creation of the world, her intimacy with God, the way in which she seems to be a mediator between God and God's creation, and the claims she makes for herself. These suggest that "Wisdom is somehow identified with the Lord" (Murphy 1996, 138). In fact, it is unnecessary to choose between Wisdom as a personification of an attribute of God and of an attribute of the world. If she is a personification of the Creator's wisdom, then it is that wisdom which is seen in the regularities that are experienced and observed in the created world. Wisdom both transcends creation and is immanent in it.

4.3. Wisdom and Revelation. Whereas the prophet asserts, "Thus says Yahweh," and the Torah is rooted in the revelation of Yahweh at Sinai, the sages do not make an explicit claim to be imparting divinely revealed truth. What, then, is the relationship between wisdom and revelation? On the one hand, wisdom is acquired by observation and experience (Prov 24:30-34). It can be passed on by instruction (Prov 4:1-6). Even mistakes can lead to an increase in wisdom if one is willing to receive correction (Prov 10:17). On the other hand, wisdom is presented as a gift from God. To begin with, even the ability to observe and experience the world comes from Yahweh (Prov 20:12). More than that, "Yahweh gives wisdom; from his mouth come knowledge and understanding" (Prov 2:6). That is why "The fear of Yahweh is the beginning of wisdom, and the knowledge of the Holy One is insight" (Prov 9:10). Human effort alone can lead to increased knowledge but is not enough to possess wisdom. However, the person who observes and experiences the world receives instruction and correction, while the person who truly fears Yahweh will receive true wisdom from him. There is no contradiction here between human effort in acquiring wisdom and receiving it as a divine gift.

5. The Fear of the Lord.

Each of the wisdom books asserts the importance of fearing the Lord (Yahweh) or *God (Prov 1:7; 9:10; 31:30; Job 28:28; Eccles 12:13). Fear of (the) god(s) was a concept widespread in the ancient Near East and is quite common in its wisdom literature, and, as M. Barré has shown, it refers to worship of (the) god(s) in the full sense, not just to moral behavior. References to "the fear of the Lord" are strategically placed in Proverbs, providing an *inclusio for Proverbs 1—9 (Prov 1:7; 9:10) and for the whole book (Prov 31:30). This shows the importance of the concept in the book. It is significant that the personal name of the God of Israel is invoked, showing that the sages considered themselves to be working within context of Israelite Yahwism. Proverbs 2:5; 9:10 suggest a relational meaning for "the fear of the Lord," since "knowledge of God" is understood in relational terms in the OT. Proverbs 15:33; 22:4 put "humility" in parallel with "the fear of the Lord," indicating an attitude of reverence toward God. In Proverbs 8:13 the fear of the Lord is equated with the hatred of evil, with moral living. The designation of the capable wife as "a woman who fears the LORD" (Prov 31:30) shows that the fear of the Lord has to do with everyday human life and behavior, not just religious observances.

The fear of the Lord is said to be "the beginning of knowledge/wisdom" (Prov 1:7; 9:10). There has been debate about how best to translate the Hebrew word rē'īt in Proverbs 1:7: "beginning," "best part," "principle," "sum." The parallel word in Proverbs 9:10, ṭēhillat, unambiguously means "beginning," and that makes good sense in Proverbs 1:7. "Beginning" in this context does not mean a starting point that is to be left behind; rather, "What the alphabet is to reading, notes to the reading of music, and numerals to mathematics, the fear of the Lord is to attaining the revealed knowledge of this book" (Waltke, 181).

In Job 28:28 "the fear of the Lord [ʾādōnay]" is equated with wisdom. Elsewhere in Job the phrase is "the fear of God/the Almighty" (Job is not an Israelite), and it is used in contexts that put the emphasis on shunning evil, on moral behavior (Job 1:1, 8; 2:3; 4:6; 6:14). Ecclesiastes concludes, "Fear God and keep his commandments; for that is the whole duty of everyone” (Eccles 12:13). This is a call to honor and *worship God. The context of references to fearing God earlier in the book (Eccles 3:14; 5:7; 7:15-18; 8:12-13) gives it the sense of awe, even terror, before a powerful and inscrutable God.

6. The Two Ways.

The emphasis on the fear of the Lord as the beginning of wisdom assumes that other beginnings might present themselves as real possibilities. For this reason, the ideas of the two ways has an important place in the theology of wisdom.

N. Habel has argued that “the way” is a “nuclear symbol” in Proverbs 1—9, with a “satellite system of images”: the two hearts, the two companions and the two houses. In Proverbs 4:1-19 the “way of wisdom” is paralleled with “the paths of uprightness” (Prov 4:11) and is contrasted with “the path of the wicked” and “the way of evil men” (Prov 4:14). The effects of a “perverted heart” (Prov 6:12-15) can be avoided by taking to heart wise teaching (Prov 6:20-22). The two companions are Wisdom and “the strange woman,” each of which has her respective house. This symbolism of the way is also used in Proverbs 10—29. The word derek occurs seventy-five times in Proverbs. The contrast between the two ways underlies the frequent antitheses between the wise and the foolish and between the righteous and the wicked.

The use of the symbolism of the two ways, and its satellite images, might seem to give the teaching of Proverbs a rather simplistic appearance. It results in the presentation of strong black-and-white statements without allowance for shades of gray. It is important to recognize that this is a limitation of the symbolism used, and that the statements are not intended to define hard-and-fast categories. The didactic intention of the symbolism is to set out clearly the differences between wise/foolish and righteous/wicked behavior and the consequences of each. Once these basics have been grasped, one is better placed to deal with the complexities of life.

7. The Act-Consequence Nexus.

7.1. Introduction. In 1955 K. Koch published an influential paper in which he argued that there is in the book of Proverbs, and elsewhere in the OT, the assumption of an act-consequence nexus. It is assumed that wicked actions will result in disastrous consequences, and that good actions will result in blessing. In support of this he quoted a number of proverbs (e.g., Prov 26:27; 28:10, 18). Koch argued that what is being presented in such proverbs is the inevitable outcome of the actions themselves and not the result of God stepping into administer punishments and rewards. His main reason for saying this is that, in his view, there is no hint of any “judicial process” whereby God weighs up the actions according to an established norm and administers the appropriate punishment or reward. He concluded that the Hebrew sages held the conviction that Yahweh does not intervene directly but rather maintains the act-consequence nexus and, where necessary, ensures that it is “completed.”

Some scholars have disagreed with Koch’s conclusion, arguing that the distinction between an impersonal “nexus” and the personal action of Yahweh would not have made sense in ancient Hebrew thought, which regarded the activity of Yahweh as all-pervasive in human affairs (Murphy 1998, 264-69). Others have questioned whether the sages behind Proverbs really did assume that there is a more-or-less mechanical act-consequence nexus at work (Van Leeuwen).

7.2. The Complexity of Life. Those who question the mechanical act-consequence nexus point to evidence in Proverbs that life is more complex than it at first seems. There are examples of proverbs that contradict one another. The classic example is Proverbs 26:4-5: “Do not answer a fool according to his folly, or you will be like him yourself. Answer a fool according to his folly, or he will be wise in his own eyes.” The fact that the sages created or collected such “contradictory” proverbs shows that they were well aware of the complexities of real life. Also, the fact that the compiler of the book sometimes deliberately put them together suggests that the reader is being warned against any mechanical application of proverbs.

There is one distinct form of proverb that occurs several times in the book of Proverbs that clearly recognizes the complexity of life and, in particular, that a simple act-consequence nexus does not always hold up. These are the “better than” sayings. A few of them simply say that “A is better than B” (Prov 16:16). Most are more complex than this, having the form “A with B is better than C with D” (Prov 16:8, 19). These proverbs clearly imply that the righteous do not always prosper and the wicked sometimes do. There are a significant number of other proverbs that assert or imply that sometimes the wicked prosper and the innocent suffer (Prov 11:16; 13:23; 18:23).

A small group of proverbs about what is not fitting/becoming also imply a recognition that the act-consequence nexus does not always work out; otherwise there would be no need to brand these situations as “not fitting” (Prov 17:7; 19:10). Even more extreme is a “number proverb,” which recognizes that sometimes things go seriously wrong (Prov 30:21-23).

Given this evidence that the sages realized the limitations of the act-consequence nexus, why is it that so many of the proverbs do seem to presuppose it? Two kinds of consideration have a bearing on this. First, the fact is that the act-consequence nexus is often a good approximation of what actually happens. If this were not the case, proverbs would not have the place that they do in most cultures. Second, the very form of a proverb as a short, pithy statement makes it a black-and-white declaration.

7.3. The Role of Yahweh. There is plenty of evidence in the book of Proverbs that the sages did not regard the act-consequence nexus as rooted in an impersonal “order”; rather, it is rooted in the character and will of Yahweh. Evidence of this is seen in the “abomination” sayings. Most of these contrast something that is an “abomination to Yahweh” with what “delights” him (Prov 11:20). This rooting of the nexus in the character and will of Yahweh is why “The fear of Yahweh is instruction in wisdom” (Prov 15:33). It is also why there are limits to the human understanding of how the nexus works out in real life: “Many are the plans in a person’s mind, but it is the purpose of Yahweh that will stand” (Prov 19:21). That purpose is not always readily accessible to humans (Prov 25:2), not even to the sages (Prov 20:24). That is why, in the end, the sages accept that “No wisdom, no understanding, no counsel can avail against Yahweh” (Prov 21:30).

In the book of Proverbs, as elsewhere in the Hebrew Bible, there is an unresolved tension between human freedom and responsibility and divine sovereignty. The earnestness, and at times urgency, with which the sages urge people to follow the paths of wisdom, *righteousness, honesty and diligence rather than give way to *folly, wickedness, lying and laziness only makes sense if the destiny of humans rests to some extent in their own hands. Yet, as we have seen, there is also the recognition that the over-arching sovereignty of God puts limits upon human understanding and actions. Perhaps the point of balance is expressed in this proverb: “Commit your work to Yahweh, and your plans will be established” (Prov 16:3).

7.4. Conclusion Regarding Proverbs. In the light of this discussion of the evidence in Proverbs 10–29, it seems reasonable to conclude that the sages were well aware that the act-consequence nexus was only a “rule of thumb” with regard to developing skills for living, with many exceptions. They saw it as pragmatically useful as a teaching “model” at the early stages of learning such skills. Moreover, it was theologically justified because it was rooted in the character and purposes of Yahweh. This provided some explanation of why it was only a “rule of thumb.” Human beings should not expect to understand Yahweh’s purposes fully. However, it also provided grounds for the expectation that “in the end,” whenever that might be, the righteous would be vindicated and the wicked punished, for Yahweh is the upholder of righteousness (Prov 11:21; 24:19-20).

7.5. Job. The book of Job is a protest against a dogmatized misunderstanding of the act-consequence nexus. Job’s friends are examples of those who ignore the recognition, seen in Proverbs, of its limitations and simply read off a person’s spiritual state from that person’s circumstances. Whereas in Proverbs the reasoning is from cause to effect (a certain situation or action is likely to lead to a particular outcome), they reason from effect to cause. Since Job is in a desperate state, he must have committed some great sin. Job accepts the act-consequence nexus in principle, but he knows that he is innocent of any great sin. He therefore concludes that God is making a mockery of righteousness (Job 9:22-24).

The message of the first divine speech is that God has created an ordered world, but since Job was not present at creation, he has only a limited insight into its order that only the Creator fully understands (Job 38:4-7). In the second speech God presents Job with the forces of evil and chaos, symbolized by Leviathan and Behemoth. No mortal, only God, can control them (Job 41:10-11). Since Job cannot understand or control these forces, he is in no position to question God's rule over the world (Job 40:6-8). The message of these speeches does not deny the act-consequence nexus. It does, however, assert that full knowledge of how it works belongs only to God, and that humans cannot fully understand it.

7.6. Ecclesiastes. Qohelet, the spokesman in Ecclesiastes, is distressed by the fact that his experience runs counter to the act-consequence nexus (Eccles 8:14). He believes in an ordered world (Eccles 1:5-7) in which there is a right time for everything (Eccles 3:3-8). There is a sovereign God, who has a plan for everything, but the problem is that God does not reveal this plan to humans (Eccles 3:9-18; 6:10-12; 7:13-14; 8:16-9:1). Humans therefore are left uncertain about what to do and when to do it. All they can be sure of is death, which comes to both the righteous and the wicked equally (Eccles 9:2-3). Faced with the injustices in life, Qohelet speaks of the judgment of God (Eccles 3:17; 9:1; 11:9); however, since he has no certainty about the afterlife* (Eccles 3:18-21; 9:3-6), it is not clear what this means. The person who compiled Qohelet's teaching points to a final judgment by God (Eccles 12:13-14) (see Longman, 37-39).

8. God.

8.1. Monotheism. Nearly all the more than ninety references to God* in Proverbs use the personal name "Yahweh," by which God was known as the one in covenant relationship with Israel. Two of the three occasions when the general term God is used without clear reference to Yahweh are in a section attributed to a non-Israelite (Prov 30:5, 9). In the prologue and the epilogue of Job the narrator uses the name "Yahweh." It occurs only once in the dialogues (Job 12:9, which may echo Is 41:20), where the speakers, who are not Hebrews, otherwise speak of "God" or "the Almighty." In Ecclesiastes the deity is always referred to as "God," which contributes to the sense of God being distant that the book conveys. In all three books, whatever terms they use, there is an implicit monotheism. No gods other than Yahweh are ever mentioned or alluded to.

8.2. God as Creator. This theme was covered earlier in the discussion of creation theology (see 3 above).

8.3. God's Transcendence. The understanding of God as the sole Creator leads naturally to the idea of God's transcendence. This is expressed in a number of ways in the Wisdom literature. In the prologue of Job God is located in a transcendent heaven, and Ecclesiastes 5:2 stresses, "God is in heaven, and you upon earth." Anthropomorphisms are rare. In neither Proverbs nor Ecclesiastes does God address humans directly. In Proverbs 1-9 it is personified Wisdom who speaks to people on Yahweh's behalf. When God comes to speak to Job, it is not in an ordinary conversation but rather in challenging speeches delivered from a whirlwind.

Job 26 speaks of God's omniscience and omnipotence as the Creator, and this is expressed at more length in the divine speeches. There are proverbs that assert that God knows everything that happens (Prov 5:21; 15:3), even knowing a person's innermost thoughts (Prov 15:11; 24:11-12) and motives (Prov 16:2). Ecclesiastes warns that because God is in heaven, God is aware of every word that is spoken (Eccles 5:1-6). In Ecclesiastes God is the omnipotent Creator, who has a plan for everything, but the problem is that God does not disclose this plan to humans (Eccles 3:9-18; 6:10-12; 7:13-14; 8:16-9:1). The ultimate incomprehensibility of God's ways is recognized in Job 26:14 and Proverbs 20:24; 25:2.

8.4. God's Immanence. In the OT in general there is a tension in the understanding of God. On the one hand, God is transcendent, wholly other than humans, and God's ways and thoughts are beyond human understanding (Is 55:8-9); on the other hand, God enters into a covenant relationship with Israel, can be met with in worship, and seeks a love relationship with people. In Ecclesiastes the transcendence and otherness of God are stressed to such an extent that it might seem to imply that God does not relate to humans in any way. Ecclesiastes does, though, sometimes speak of God relating to humans, most often by speaking of what God "gives" to humans. God gives to them the gift of life (Eccles 5:18; 8:15; 9:9), though eventually he takes it back again (Eccles 12:7). Those who please God are given wisdom, knowledge and joy, while sinners are given "the work of gathering and heaping, only to give to one who pleases God" (Eccles 2:26). To some, God gives wealth and possessions and the power to enjoy them (Eccles 5:19), while others are given these but are not enabled to enjoy them (Eccles 6:2). The references to God as the giver of these gifts certainly emphasize God's sovereignty and human dependence on God. However, the majority of the references to God as giver are in passages that contain an admonition to enjoy life. This may indicate that God has a personal, and positive, interest in human welfare.

The transcendence of God is to the fore in the dialogues of Job because of Job's sense of alienation from God as a result of his *suffering. However, at the end of them Job finds a deeper, personal relationship with God (Job 42:5). The God who is transcendent in heaven in the prologue appears in the epilogue speaking to and blessing humans on earth.

There are a number of proverbs that depict Yahweh as a God who relates personally to individuals and is concerned about and active in the world. It is a characteristic of Yahweh in the Law (Ex 22:22-24; Deut 10:17-18) and the Prophets (Is 1:23; Ezek 22:7; Mal 3:5) that he is the defender of the widow, the orphan and the alien sojourner. In Proverbs Yahweh is said to be the defender of "the poor" in general (Prov 19:17; 22:22-23), with the widow (Prov 15:25) and the orphan (Prov 23:10-11) being mentioned specifically. Yahweh's wider concern for social justice is expressed in some sentences. One issue that is referred to several times is that of accurate measures (Prov 11:1; 16:11; 20:10, 23). Again, there is a parallel with the Law (Lev 19:36; Deut 25:13-16) and the Prophets (Amos 8:5). Yahweh is said to have a special relationship with those who are *"righteous." L. Boström (213-25) argues that in Proverbs the term righteous (which occurs about sixty times) always denotes both correct behavior (as taught by the sages) and obedience to Yahweh; the "righteous" are those who live rightly because they are obedient both to Yahweh and to the teaching of the sages. The righteous person is described in a number of ways, the most prominent being one "who fears Yahweh." There are a number of sayings that depict Yahweh as the protector of the righteous (Prov 2:5-8; 18:10; 29:25) and as the one who grants them success and well-being (Prov 3:5-10, 33-34; 10:3; 16:20; 28:25). Yahweh's relationship with the righteous is expressed in terms of friendship (Prov 3:32) and love (Prov 3:11-12; 15:9).

9. Humans.

9.1. Creation and Fall. The recognition of God as Creator entails that humans are understood as created beings that are answerable to their Creator. In all the wisdom books God is the sovereign Judge (Job 23:1-7; Prov 2:6-8; Eccles 3:17). The fact that there is wickedness and folly among humans implies their fallenness. Ecclesiastes refers to the creation of humans from the dust (Eccles 3:20; 12:7) and says that although God created them "upright," they now devise "many schemes" (Eccles 7:29). As a result, no humans are free from sin (Eccles 7:20).

9.2. Human Constitution. In the OT the human being is conceptualized as a psychosomatic unity resulting from the "dust of the earth" being animated by "the breath of life" given by God (Gen 2:7). This view is expressed in Ecclesiastes 3:20-21; 12:7. It also lies behind Job 34:14-15. A variety of Hebrew words are used to refer to different aspects of the human psyche. All of them have a range of meaning, and none can be represented in its range of meaning by just one English word.

In the verses quoted above the word rûah ("spirit") is used for the animating "life force" (in Job 34:14 it is used in parallel with něšāmā ["breath"], the word used in Gen 2:7). The same word can be used of a person's entire disposition (Job 7:11; Prov 16:18-19; Eccles 7:8-9) and thus is not to be related to physical life alone.

The word nepeš has traditionally been translated as "soul," but this is misleading in view of the common English meaning of "soul" as the immortal spiritual component of human beings. It can be used to refer to the animating force (Job 12:10), but generally it refers more widely "to the passionate drives and appetites of all breathing creatures, including their hunger for food and sex" (Waltke, 90) (see Prov 6:30; 12:10; 27:7; Eccles 6:7). It often stands for the whole self (see Job 16:4: "if your soul were in my soul's place," meaning "if you were in my place").

The traditional translation of lēb as "heart" can also be misleading because in English this word is usually associated primarily with the emotions. In the Wisdom literature the "heart" is the center and wellspring of the inner life, which is why it must be carefully guarded (Prov 4:23). The nature of the lēb—for example, whether it is wise (Prov 14:33) or perverse (Prov 17:20)—governs a person's actions. In modern English versions of the Bible lēb is often translated as "mind" or by words relating to mental activity because, in the Wisdom literature in particular, it is primarily the center of thinking, memorizing, deciding and willing (Job 1:8; 8:10; Prov 2:2; 16:10; Eccles 8:16; 9:1).

9.3. Human Responsibilities. It is an underlying assumption of the Wisdom literature that humans have the rational ability and the responsibility to reflect on experience and the observation of the world so as to come to understand the order that there is and to live wisely in the light of this. Even in Ecclesiastes, where the limitations of the human ability to understand are stressed, human wisdom is seen to have some practical value (Eccles 2:13-14; 7:11-12; 9:16-18; 10:12), so that wisdom is to be preferred over folly (Eccles 2:13; 7:5-7; 10:1-3). As noted earlier (see 5 above), a prime duty of human beings in the Wisdom literature is to fear Yahweh/God. In Proverbs those who fear Yahweh are correlated with those who are righteous and are contrasted with the wicked (Prov 10:27-28). Ecclesiastes 8:12-13 contrasts those who fear God with sinners, who do evil, and Ecclesiastes 12:13 correlates the fear of God with keeping God's commandments. In Ecclesiastes the fear of God seems more like terror than reverence, but it is balanced by a repeated call to enjoy life (Eccles 2:24-26; 3:12-13; 3:22; 5:18-20; 8:15; 9:7-10; 11:8-10). There is debate as to whether these passages amount to a positive affirmation of life (Whybray 1982) or an attitude of resignation (Murphy 1996, 54-55).

9.4. Human Destiny. As far as Ecclesiastes is concerned, what blights life is that death comes to all as the great leveler, and all that lies beyond death is the realm of the dead, which seems in fact to be an absolute end (Eccles 3:18-20; 9:1-6). The destiny spoken of in Proverbs is Sheol or "the grave." It is the destiny of everyone (Prov 23:14), the innocent (Prov 1:12) as well as the wicked (Prov 9:18). Elsewhere in the OT Sheol is a realm of shadowy existence. Although most scholars conclude that there is no concept of life beyond death in Proverbs, a few see intimations of it in some proverbs (Prov 11:21; 12:28; 14:32; 15:24; 23:17-18; 24:19-20). In Job 14 Job laments that although a tree stump can sprout again, death is the end for humans. There are major textual difficulties in the famous and much debated passage Job 19:23-29. The debate rages over whether Job expects vindication before or after death, and if after it, whether resurrection is in mind. It seems best to conclude that he expects somehow to be conscious of his vindication even if its does come after death (see Afterlife).

See also AFTERLIFE; CREATION THEOLOGY;

FEAR OF THE LORD; GOD; RETRIBUTION; RIGHTEOUSNESS; SUFFERING; THEODICY; WISDOM AND APOCALYPTIC; WISDOM AND BIBLICAL THEOLOGY; WISDOM AND COVENANT; WOMAN WISDOM AND WOMAN FOLLY.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. M. L. Barré, "Fear of God and the World View of Wisdom," BTB 11 (1981) 41-43; L. Boström, The God of the Sages: The Portrayal of God in the Book of Proverbs (ConBOT 29; Stockholm: Almqvist & Wiksell, 1990); W. Brueggemann, In Man We Trust: The Neglected Side of Biblical Faith (Atlanta: John Knox, 1972); C. Camp, Wisdom and the Feminine in the Book of Proverbs (BLS 11; Sheffield: Almond, 1985); J. L. Crenshaw, "In Search of Divine Presence," RevExp 74 (1977) 353-69; idem, "Prolegomenon" in Studies in Ancient Israelite Wisdom, ed. J. L. Crenshaw (New York: KTAV, 1976) 1-45; W. Eichrodt, Theology of the Old Testament, vol. 2 (London: SCM, 1967); M. V. Fox, "World Order and Ma'at: A Crooked Parallel," JANES 23 (1995) 37-48; idem, Proverbs 1-9 (AB 18A; New York, NY: Doubleday, 2000); N. C. Habel, "The Symbolism of Wisdom in Proverbs 1-9," Int 26 (1972) 131-57; H.-J. Hermission, Studien zur Israelitischen Spruchweisheit (WMANT 28; Neukirchen-Vluyn: Neukirchener Verlag, 1968); idem, "Observations on the Creation Theology in Wisdom," in Israelite Wisdom: Theological and Literary Essays in Honor of Samuel Terrien, ed. J. G. Gammie et al. (Missoula, MT: Scholars Press, 1978); 43-57; K. Koch, "Gibt es ein Vergeltungsdogma im Alten Testament?" ZTK 52 (1955) 1-42; ET, "Is There a Doctrine of Retribution in the Old Testament?" in Theodicy in the Old Testament, ed. J. L. Crenshaw (London: SPCK, 1983) 57-87; B. Lang, Wisdom and the Book of Proverbs: An Israelite Goddess Redefined (New York: Pilgrim Press, 1986); T. Longman III, the Book of Ecclesiastes (NICOT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1998); R. E. Murphy, The Tree of Life: An Exploration of Biblical Wisdom Literature (2nd ed.; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1996); idem, Proverbs (WBC 22; Nashville: Thomas Nelson, 1998); L. G. Perdue, Wisdom and Creation: The Theology of the Wisdom Literature (Nashville: Abingdon, 1994); H. D. Preuss, "Das Gottesbild der älteren Weisheit Israels," in Studies in the Religion of Ancient Israel (VTSup 23; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1972) 117-45; R. C. Van Leeuwen, "Wealth and Poverty: System and Contradiction in Proverbs," HS 33 (1992) 25-36; G. von Rad, Wisdom in Israel (London: SCM, 1972); B. K. Waltke, The Book of Proverbs: Chap- ters 1-15 (NICOT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2004); S. Weeks, Early Israelite Wisdom (Oxford: Clarendon Press, 1994); R. N. Whybray, Wisdom in Proverbs (London: SCM, 1965); idem, The Intellectual Tradition in the Old Testament (BZAW 135; Berlin: de Gruyter, 1974); idem, "Qoheleth, Preacher of Joy," JSOT 23 (1982) 87-98; idem, Proverbs (NCB; London: Marshall Pickering, 1994); idem, The Book of Proverbs: A Survey of Modern Study (HBI 1; Leiden: E. J. Brill, 1995); G. E. Wright, The God Who Acts: Biblical Theology as Recital (London: SCM, 1952); W. Zimmerli, "The Place and Limit of Wisdom in the Framework of Old Testament Theology," SJT 17 (1964) 146-58. E. C. Lucas

WOMAN FOLLY. See WOMAN WISDOM AND WOMAN FOLLY.

WOMAN WISDOM AND WOMAN FOLLY

One of the most striking features of the book of *Proverbs is the role played by Woman Wisdom and her rival Woman Folly. They both appear Proverbs 1—9 but not in Proverbs 10—31. Indeed, Woman Folly only appears in Proverbs 9 as a counterpart to Woman Wisdom. Many questions surround the role that these figures play in the text, and mystery cloaks their origins. Interest in them is heightened by their later description in select books of the intertestamental period, in the NT, and by theologians of the early church. Furthermore, Woman Wisdom has resurfaced in recent times as an important concept in feminist theology.

1. Development of the Metaphor in Proverbs
2. Origins
3. New Testament Appropriation
4. Other Post-Proverbs Developments

1. Development of the Metaphor in Proverbs.

1.1. The Main Texts. Any discussion of Woman Wisdom and Woman Folly begins with the book of Proverbs. They make their first appearance in the discourses of the opening nine chapters of the book.

Woman Wisdom appears first in Proverbs 1:20-33, where she delivers a burning denunciation of those who reject her call but at the end of her speech promises safety to those who respond positively. P. Tribble (509) comments that right from the start, we recognize her as "a poet, who preaches, counsels, teaches, and prophesies." We also hear her voice in Proverbs 8 as well as climactically in Proverbs 9:1-6. The majority of the rest of the discourses of Proverbs 1—9 contain the instructions of a father to his son. In a number of these the father describes Woman Wisdom to his son and urges him to develop an intimate relationship with her (e.g., Prov 4:1-9). Sometimes it is difficult to determine whether the father speaks of wisdom as a concept or as personified in Woman Wisdom (e.g., Prov 3:19-20).

Woman Folly only appears in Proverbs 9:13-18. However, though she speaks only this one time, we will see that she plays a pivotal role in the presentation of the theology of the book of Proverbs.

1.2. The Ultimate Choice (Prov 9:1-6, 13-18).

Even before exploring the identity of these women further, we do well to recognize the climactic role that they play in the development of the final form of Proverbs. Proverbs 9 is situated at a key juncture in the book, bringing to a close the discourses and immediately preceding the proverbs per se (Prov 10—31). The significance of this chapter is underlined by the fact that the young men are required to make a choice. The young men (and in other discourses, the son) are the implied readers of the book. To read properly, the later interpreter must assume the place of the implied reader. Thus, readers of the book are implicitly called on to make a choice: will they dine with Woman Wisdom or with Woman Folly?

Both women call down from their homes on high to the young men going by on the path in order to invite them to a meal. Woman Wisdom sends out her maidens, who say, "Whoever is simpleminded, turn aside here. . . . Come, eat my food, and drink the wine I mixed. Abandon simplemindedness and live. March on the path of understanding" (Prov 9:4-6). On the other hand, Woman Folly calls out, "Whoever is simpleminded, turn aside here. . . . Stolen water is sweet, and food eaten in secret is pleasant" (Prov 9:16-17). Both women address the same group: the simpleminded. And both issue an invitation to a meal. The reader, who identifies with the addressees, must decide between these two women.

1.3. The Identity of the Women.

1.3.1. Woman Wisdom (Prov 8). Woman Wisdom appears in both Proverbs 1 and Proverbs 9, but the reader gets the fullest description of her in Proverbs 8. The chapter begins with a narrator's (perhaps we are to think of the father) introduction. He calls to get the attention of the men whom she will address. He draws attention to her as she speaks from the high places on the path, at the crossroads, by the gate. The first thing to notice about these locations is that they are crowded public places. What Woman Wisdom offers is not esoteric; it is open for all to hear.

Woman Wisdom herself begins to speak in Proverbs 8:4. She urges the young men to pay attention to what she says. She characterizes her speech as prudent, true, righteous, straightforward, noble and virtuous. It is far from perverse, wicked or twisted (Prov 8:5-9). For this reason, it is of inestimable value (Prov 8:10-11).

She has much to offer those who listen to her, particularly rulers (Prov 8:15-16). She is the very epitome of wisdom as spelled out in the motto of the book (Prov 1:7), for she fears God and shuns evil (Prov 8:13) (see Fear of the Lord).

Perhaps the most debated part of this chapter, if not the book of Proverbs, is the unit Proverbs 8:22-31, which associates Woman Wisdom with God's act of creation. However, the issues are not all present at first reading but rather are heightened by the development of this chapter in the NT (see 3-4 below). Proverbs 8 presents Wisdom as the firstborn of creation. Wisdom witnessed and perhaps participated in the creation of the cosmos. The intent of this section is to remind readers that if they want to know how the world works, they had better know Wisdom, who was there from the very beginning. Her connection with God at the time of creation is also the apex of her argument for why the young men should accept her invitation to join with her. After all, she is with God from the beginning, the "artisan" (ʿāmôn) at his side, laughing before him and dancing before humans (Prov 8:30-31).

The chapter ends with a final exhortation to choose wisdom. Those who do so will get a great reward, and those who do not will be punished.

Who, then, is this woman? Clearly, Woman Wisdom is a *personification of God's wisdom. However, T. Longman goes further and suggests that Woman Wisdom is none other than Yahweh himself. The clue to this interpretation is the location of her house on the highest point of the city. In the ancient Near East and ancient Israel only one house occupies the highest point, and that house is the temple. Thus, the invitation to become intimate with Woman Wisdom is an in-itation to become intimate with God.

One might hesitate to adopt this view based on the fact that Wisdom is said to be the first thing created by God. How could God give birth to God? The problem, though, arises only if one forgets that this is a poetic personification, and like all metaphorical language, of which this is a type, it should not be pressed in literalistic detail. The question, after all, would still arise if the reader simply settled for the idea that Wisdom is a personification of God's wisdom. What would it mean to say that God created his wisdom? Was he not wise beforehand?

1.3.2. Woman Folly. The identification of Woman Wisdom also raises the question of the identification of Woman Folly. After all, in her single appearance in the book, she too is said to speak "on a seat at the heights of the city" (Prov 9:14b). For that reason, this personification likewise must represent the divine realm, but in this case the realm of false gods and goddesses. In other words, Woman Folly stands for Baal, Asherah, Ishtar, Marduk, Anat—all the deities that the Israelites were tempted to worship.

1.4. The Consequences. The text is clear as to the consequences of the choice. The choice is between wisdom and *folly, now recognized as the worship of Yahweh versus the worship of false gods. Wisdom and folly in this way become more than mere skill of living, more than navigating life; they are theological principles, and this idea permeates the whole book. This affects the interpretation of wisdom and folly throughout the book, including its second part.

For an example, we take the first proverb of the second part of the book, Proverbs 10:1, which states, "A wise son makes a father glad, and a foolish son is the sorrow of his mother." In light of the development of the metaphor of Woman Wisdom and Woman Folly in Proverbs 1—9, this verse should be understood as saying that a son who makes his parents glad is wise, which means that he is acting like one who worships Yahweh. On the other hand, a son who makes his parents sad is a fool; that is, he is acting like an idolater. Thus, the call to the young men (the reader) is to offer worship to God through a lifestyle that wisely considers the proper act at the proper time.

When the text is understood in this way, the reader recognizes why the one who accepts the invitation of Woman Wisdom "will live" (Prov 9:6), while the one who accepts the invitation of Woman Folly will die. After all, the simpleminded who go to her “do not know that the departed are there, that those invited by her are in the depths of Sheol” (Prov 9:18).

1.5. The Wise Woman and the Foolish Woman.

The book of Proverbs also describes and evaluates human women. In typical wisdom form, it does so by describing the wise woman and the foolish woman. The following are some examples.

“Wise women build their house, but dupes demolish it with their own hands” (Prov 14:1). What is interesting in terms of our present focus of study is that these women reflect the characteristics of Woman Wisdom and Woman Folly. A close reading of Proverbs 31:10-31 illustrates this, since the noble woman there is described as industrious and not lazy, generous, wise in speech, strong in confidence.

The effects of becoming intimate with a human noble or wicked woman is the same as aligning oneself with Woman Wisdom or Woman Folly: “A noble woman is a crown for her husband, but like rot in his bones is a disgraceful woman” (Prov 12:3); “The mouth of strange women is a deep pit; the recipients of Yahweh’s wrath fall into it” (Prov 22:14). Thus human women reflect the characteristics of Woman Wisdom or Woman Folly. Young men are advised to form an intimate relationship with a woman who is wise and to avoid all foolish women.

2. Origins.

2.1. Ancient Near Eastern Background. What is the origin of Woman Wisdom? What gave the poet the idea to personify God’s wisdom in the form of a woman? It is not surprising that some scholars believe that the inspiration came from outside of Israel. Since Wisdom is female, scholarly attention has been directed toward goddesses from the nations that surround Israel. Isis, Asherah (Smith, 133-37) and even an unattested Canaanite deity named Wisdom (Lang) have been proposed as candidates, but the most promising comparison has been made with the Egyptian goddess Maat (Kayatz).

There are two main reasons for this. First, Maat* is an Egyptian deity (Assmann), and Egyptian wisdom literature has been thought to influence the book of Proverbs in a special way (see Proverbs 2: Ancient Near Eastern Background). Second, maat functions much like wisdom in Proverbs. Maat is a concept that is important not only to the Egyptian Instructions but also in Egyptian thought generally. Maat refers to the order and harmony of creation; its associated ideas are truth and justice. A rupture in harmony, truth and justice of the creation is an assault against maat. Maat is often presented and seems to be seen as an impersonal concept, but is also represented at times as a goddess.

Maat is the Egyptian concept most similar to the Israelite idea of wisdom. It is the order of the universe; it is what the sages seek. Indeed, the fact that maat is pictured as a goddess shows a close connection between religion and wisdom in Egypt. Maat, even when not deified, is understood to be established and upheld by the gods.

Nonetheless, even though there are similarities, it is unlikely that we should equate maat and Woman Wisdom. For one thing, maat, though at times mentioned as a goddess, never is given personality in Egyptian literature. Maat never speaks, for instance, and is more like an abstract quality. And if the goddess Maat does not offer a certain background for the personification of wisdom in Israel, neither do any of the other deities that have been suggested.

2.2. Etymology. So what encouraged or suggested the idea of the personification of wisdom? It may not be irrelevant that the Hebrew word for wisdom (hokmā) is itself feminine. Further, though, the gender of relational metaphors of God are often related to whether a role was more commonly associated with males or females in ancient Israelite society. Thus, ruling and warring are associated with the male king and warrior, while nurture and compassion go with the female metaphor of wife. Of course, we have examples of both male and female wisdom figures in the OT (for female, see the wise woman of Tekoa in 2 Sam 14), but perhaps women were more naturally associated with the role of counselor or adviser (for extensive ancient Near Eastern and anthropological arguments, see Fontaine).

In the final analysis, the reason for the creation of the figure of Woman Wisdom is hidden from us. After all, we have no independent access to the thinking of the poet(s) whose imagination produced her.

3. New Testament Appropriation.

It is widely recognized that the NT authors viewed Jesus Christ as the epitome of the wisdom of God (Witherington). The Gospels, for instance, say that Jesus was wiser even than Solomon (Lk 11:31). In Colossians 2:3 Paul proclaims that in Christ “lie hidden all treasures of wisdom and knowledge.” And in 1 Corinthians 1:30 he states that “God made Christ to be wisdom itself.”

Given this background, it is not surprising to realize that the NT authors occasionally associate Jesus with Woman Wisdom. In Matthew 11, for instance, we read that Jesus’ opponents complained about his exuberant lifestyle while at the same time criticizing John the Baptist’s austerity. Jesus replied, “For John came neither eating nor drinking, and they say, ‘He has a demon.’ The Son of Man came eating and drinking, and they say, ‘Here is a glutton and a drunkard, a friend of tax collectors and “sinners.”’ But wisdom is proved right by her actions” (Mt 11:18-19 NIV). Notice how Jesus styles his actions as the actions of Woman Wisdom. Indeed, in the last sentence of Matthew 11:19 “wisdom” would appropriately be capitalized.

In the overview of Proverbs 8 we noted that it was by Wisdom that rulers ruled. Furthermore, we saw that Wisdom was the firstborn of creation. Colossians 1:15-17 echoes both these themes in relationship to Jesus: “He is the image of the invisible God, the firstborn over all creation. For by him all things were created: things in heaven and on earth, visible and invisible, whether thrones or powers or rulers or authorities; all things were created by him and for him. He is before all things, and in him all things hold together” (NIV). Although this is not a citation of Proverbs 8, anyone reading Paul who knew the OT would recognize that Jesus occupies the place of Wisdom. Paul was inviting a comparison: Wisdom was firstborn in Proverbs 8; Jesus is firstborn in Colossians. Wisdom is the agent of divine creation in Proverbs; Christ is the agent in Colossians.

In addition, the renowned opening to John’s Gospel also resonates with concepts from Proverbs 8. The Word of God (the Logos), who is God himself (Jn 1:1), was “with God in the beginning. Through him all things were made” (Jn 1:2-3). Jesus is the Word, and the association with language reminds the attentive reader of Woman Wisdom in Proverbs 8.

Finally, the author of Revelation also provides a subtle connection between Jesus and Proverbs 8. In the introduction to the letter to the church at Laodicea we read, “The words of the Amen, the faithful and true witness, the beginning of God’s creation” (Rev 3:14 RSV). The phrase “the beginning of God’s creation” (hē archē tēs ktiseōs tou theou) is reminiscent of Proverbs 8:22-30 (cf. LXX Prov 8:22-23). In particular, the phrase may represent the meaning of that difficult word in Proverbs 8:30, ’amôn, as the “architect” of creation. The allusion is subtle but clear: Jesus stands in the place of Woman Wisdom.

4. Other Post-Proverbs Developments.

4.1. Sirach and Wisdom of Solomon. The NT was not the only or the earliest post-Hebrew Bible writing to further develop the metaphor of Woman Wisdom. She plays an important role in two major intertestamental books: *Sirach and *Wisdom of Solomon.

Sirach is known from a Greek translation (c. 130 BC), which is based on an earlier Hebrew composition (c. 180 BC). It is a prominent member of the Apocrypha. Sirach 1 introduces the figure of Woman Wisdom: “Wisdom was created before all other things, and prudent understanding from eternity. . . . It is he who created her; he saw her and took her measure; he poured her out upon all his works, upon all the living according to his gift; he lavished her upon those who love him” (Sir 1:4, 9-10 NRSV).

One of the most interesting developments of the Woman Wisdom figure in Sirach is the explicit connection drawn between her and the *law of Moses. Most scholars believe that in the book of Proverbs wisdom and law are two separate categories, but in Sirach 24 the two are equated: “Then the Creator of all things gave me [Woman Wisdom] a command, and my Creator chose the place for my tent. He said, ‘Make your dwelling in Jacob, and in Israel receive your inheritance’” (Sir 24:8 NRSV); “Whoever obeys me [Woman Wisdom] will not be put to shame, and those who work with me will not sin.’ All this is the book of the covenant of the Most High God, the law that Moses commanded us, as an inheritance for the congregations of Jacob” (Sir 24:22-23 NRSV [see also Sir 15:1; 19:20; 33:2]). In this way, Sirach further develops the metaphor of Woman Wisdom in the direction of Jewish particularism (Snaith).

In Wisdom of Solomon (see Enns), another prominent book of the Apocrypha, dated between 50 BC and AD 100, the figure of Woman Wisdom is used to assimilate Jewish and Hellenistic wisdom, in particular a Stoic and Neoplatonic mindset: "She [Wisdom] is an exhalation from the power of God, a pure effluence from the glory of the Almighty; therefore nothing tainted insinuates itself into her. She is an effulgence of everlasting light, and unblemished mirror of the active power of God, and an image of his goodness" (Wis 7:25-26 [translation in Winston, 184-87]).

4.2. Arius. Arius (AD 260-336) was a popular preacher and theologian in the early church. He and his followers exploited the connection between Woman Wisdom (particularly from the Greek text of Proverbs 8) and Jesus as developed in the NT to argue that since Wisdom was created, Jesus was a created being and therefore not God.

Athanasius (c. AD 296-373) led the charge against Arius. The controversy allowed the church to further reflect and define its understanding of the nature of Christ and the Trinity. The controversy led to the production of the Nicene Creed, which asserts the following about Jesus, making it clear that the implications that Arius drew from Proverbs 8 were wrong-minded: "We believe . . . in one Lord Jesus Christ, the only begotten Son of God, born of the Father before all ages, light of light, true God of true God, begotten not made, consubstantial with the Father, by whom all things were made."

Although the Catholic, Protestant and Orthodox churches followed Athanasius in this regard, the teaching of Arius is not dead. It is found among groups such as the Mormons and Jehovah's Witnesses, who deny that Jesus is fully God as well as fully man. In their understanding, Jesus is a created being, and again Proverbs 8 is a proof text for their belief.

4.3. Modern Feminist Interpretation. Some proponents of modern *feminist interpretation (e.g., Johnson; Schüssler Fiorenza) have used Proverbs 8 to forward their agenda to depatriarchalize the Christian religion. The NT presents a masculine savior, but these interpreters use Proverbs 8 and its connections in the NT to provide the basis for the worship of Sophia (sophia is the Greek equivalent of hokmâ, the Hebrew word for "wisdom"), a female picture of God. Such a view, like that of Arius, treats the description of Woman Wisdom as literal rather than metaphorical. It takes the metaphor too far and in a way that contradicts other Scripture (Jobes).

See also. FEMINIST INTERPRETATION; MAAT; PERSONIFICATION; PROVERBS 1: BOOK OF; WIS-DOM THEOLOGY.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. J. Assmann, Ma'at: Gerechtigkeit und Unsterblichkeit im alten Ägypten (Munich: Beck, 1990); C. V. Camp, Wisdom and the Feminine in the Book of Proverbs (BLS 11; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1985); P. Enns, Exodus Retold: Ancient Exegesis of the Departure from Egypt in Wis 10:15-21 and 19:1-9 (HSM 57; Atlanta: Scholars Press, 1997); C. R. Fontaine, Smooth Words: Women, Proverbs and Performance in Biblical Wisdom (JSOTSup 356; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 2002); K. Jobes, "Sophia Christology: The Way of Wisdom?" in The Way of Wisdom: Essays in Honor of Bruce K. Waltke (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 2000) 226-50; E. A. Johnson, "Wisdom Was Made Flesh," in Reconstructing the Christ Symbol: Essays in Feminist Christology, ed. M. Stevens (New York: Paulist Press, 1993) 99-102; C. Kayatz, Studien zu Proverbien 1-9: Eine form- und motivgeschichtliche Untersuchung unter Einbeziehung ägyptischen Vergleichsmaterials (WMANT 22; Neukirchen-Vluyn, 1966); B. Lang, Wisdom and the Book of Proverbs: A Hebrew Goddess Redefined (New York: Pilgrim Press, 1986); T. Longman III, Proverbs (BCOTWP; Grand Rapids: Baker, 2006); M. S. Smith, The Early History of God (2nd ed.; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2002); J. G. Snaith, "Ecclesiasticus: A Tract for Our Time," in Wisdom in Ancient Israel, ed. J. Day, R. P. Gordon and H. G. M. Williamson (Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1995) 170-81; R. E. Murphy, "Wisdom's Song: Proverbs 1:20-33," CBQ 48 (1986) 456-60; E. Schüssler Fiorenza, "Wisdom Mythology and the Christological Hymns of the New Testament," in Aspects of Wisdom in Judaism and Early Christianity, ed. R. L. Wilken (Notre Dame, IN: University of Notre Dame Press, 1975); P. Tribble, "Wisdom Builds a Poem: The Architecture of Proverbs 1:20-33," JBL 94 (1975) 509-18; D. Winston, The Wisdom of Solomon (AB 43; Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1979); B. Witherington III, Jesus the Sage: The Pilgrimage of Wisdom (Minneapolis: Fortress, 1994).

T. Longman III

WOMEN

Women in the literature covered by this Dictionary mirror the extremes of the genres. Portrayed in hyperbole, they range from *Woman Wisdom to Woman Folly, the seductress to the virtuous wife, the adulteress to the mother. They include the lazy gossip and the woman so industrious that "her lamp does not go out by night" (Prov 31:18). Sometimes they come in groups, like the Daughters of Jerusalem. As independent women, they also portray aspects of stereotypical norms: *Naomi as the widow; *Ruth as the dutiful, loving daughter-in-law and humble proselyte; *Esther as the savior queen. Some break stereotypes, for the lovely shepherd maiden in *Song of Songs actively pursues her beloved and is his equal in love's emotional and physical aspects. This literature presents its women as no more or less virtuous than are its men. Instead, these women come through as real people living in a believable marketplace, as real human beings moving through stages of life that provoke public comment and observation.

1. Women in Ecclesiastes
2. Women in Job
3. Women in Lamentations
4. Women in Song of Songs
5. Women in Psalms
6. Women in Proverbs
7. Women in Ruth
8. Women in Esther
9. Conclusion

1. Women in Ecclesiastes.

Complex and at times grim, the book of *Ecclesiastes nevertheless offers insights not only on seasons in life (Eccles 3:1-8) but also on temperaments in life; it balances aspects of the book of *Proverbs. Whereas in Proverbs wisdom is personified as a woman who is accessible, just and loving (Prov 8:1-8), in Ecclesiastes wisdom is remote (Eccles 7:23-24) (Fontaine 1992a, 153). Whereas in Proverbs the search for wisdom leads to an ordered life marked by prosperity and longevity, the search for wisdom by the writer of Ecclesiastes leads him—at least for a season—to hate his life (Eccles 2:17).

The writer calls himself *Qohelet, the teacher, son of *David, king in Jerusalem (Eccles 1:1). Qohelet evaluates all aspects of life, including women, from a distance. He views women dispassionately and somewhat selfishly. His observations, however, lead to the conclusion that women—or at least companionship—help out in life. Ecclesiastes 4:11 may refer to the *marriage relationship because a wife can provide aid, warmth at night and protection, but the next verse, Ecclesiastes 4:12, stating that a threefold cord is not easily broken, probably speaks of friendship rather than marriage because the context of the passage (Eccles 4:9-12) stresses mutual help. The passage advocates a plurality of work, mutual help and jointly fending off shared enemies rather than an attitude of individualism and going it alone (Murphy 1992, 42). Lives entwined in mutual help produce a strong and enduring community (Provan, 106).

In addition to a kind of objectivity and to advocating an arm's-length approach, Qohelet sees life in terms of contradictions and philosophizes about life's alternatives and twists and turns. His advice is to enjoy life to the fullest, and that includes enjoying women! A possible reference to sexual intercourse is "a time to scatter stones and a time to gather them" (Eccles 3:5), according to some readings, including the Midrash Rabbah (Murphy 1992, 33). If indeed sexual intercourse is the meaning, then it fits with the sense of the verse, which condones both a time to embrace and a time to refrain from embracing (Eccles 3:5). Yet the meaning also may be blurred to a literal meaning, simply considering the prevalence of stony fields in Israel.

The writer values women in terms of what they can do for him in traditional roles: women provide sustenance, entertainment and sexual pleasure. In short, they are necessary for his enjoyment of life (Fontaine 1992a, 154). Women also engage in other activities, he notes. Ecclesiastes 12:4 refers to women as "the daughters of song." In keeping with the Israelite tradition of women singing, these "daughters of song" may have performed funeral dirges (cf. Jer 9:20) (Carter 2002, 305). Another tradition views "daughters of song" as the birdlike sound of a human voice (Murphy 1992, 119) or a poetic description of birds (Longman 1998, 271).

In step with his time, the writer of Ecclesiastes includes some derogatory sayings about women. In Ecclesiastes a woman is a snare, and such a woman is more bitter than death; her heart is a trap, and her hands are chains (Eccles 7:26a). But the writer offers a way out of entrapment. In contrast to the ensnared sinner, the man who pleases God will escape her (Eccles 7:26b). With the use of the definite article, "the woman" specifies for Qohelet a particular woman, probably akin to the seductive adulteress or strange or foolish woman of Proverbs and the antithesis of wisdom (Prov 2:16-19; 5:3-6; 7:6-27; 9:13-18) (Brown, 83). Fearing this woman, Qohelet says that pleasing God amounts to escaping her; disturbingly, in contrast to Proverbs, this woman looms larger than does Woman Wisdom for the teacher (Brown, 84).

Sadly, in all his searchings the writer of Ecclesiastes has not found one woman to meet his standards, and only one man in a thousand is upright. However, he fails to specify his grading scale (Eccles 7:28). His observation is merely that—an observation that satisfies him but may leave his readers unsatisfied. His statement may show his true colors: he is a misogynist, and his views are inconsistent with the rest of Scripture (Longman 1998, 206-7). The NIV translation clarifies this verse by adding the adjective “upright” before both “man” and “woman.” Indeed, upright women abound in the biblical text: Ruth, Sarah, Esther, Miriam, Huldah and Deborah, to name some of them. A gentler verdict on Qohelet sees him as sadly surveying the multitudes of men and women whom he has known and finding that all, in both genders, lack virtue. Yet if the writer is *Solomon, then this statement also could mean that his lifelong pursuit of women produced a negative effect on his reputation and life (Schwab, 23).

However, the writer of Ecclesiastes also admonishes his readers with more positive sayings. He encourages joyful expression in dress and grooming: “Always be clothed in white, and always anoint your head with oil” (Eccles 9:8). He advises a man to enjoy the life that he’s given with his wife, even though the days are meaningless (Eccles 9:9). With this statement, the writer emerges as a person of his times, for he presents women via extremes. He rattles off a conventional view of woman as snare and seductress and then rousingly advocates celebrating life with one’s mate and family.

2. Women in Job.

The book of *Job contains women in secondary roles. The number of women depends on whether Job had one wife or two, and how many sisters he had (Job 42:11). What is known is that he had six daughters; of these, three were killed with their brothers in a freak wind accident (Job 1:18), and three were born after God restored Job’s fortunes (Job 42:13-15). According to Jewish tradition, the wife who gave him his second set of children (Job 42) is Dinah, the daughter of Jacob (EncJud 10.124).

When misfortune strikes Job, his (first and only?) wife speaks these words: “Are you still holding on to your integrity? Curse God and die” (Job 2:9). Interpretations of her words run the spectrum from Augustine’s view of her as an “adjutant of the devil” to the idea that perhaps her words offered Job a way out of his suffering (Deen, 333). Perhaps she berates her husband for his integrity (Blessing, 278). Job replies by saying that she speaks like a foolish woman, and he encourages her to see their predicament as he does: it is part of life. As a couple, their response should be to accept the bad from the hand of the Lord as well as the good (Job 2:10). Although she too lost everything along with Job, the text from here on muzzles her; Job’s grief and misfortunes, not hers, receive textual consideration and analysis. Her next mention is in Job 19:17, where Job comments that his breath offends her.

The three daughters born as part of Job’s restoration are named (unlike their deceased siblings and Job’s sisters, wife or wives). The daughters are called Jemimah (dove), Keziah (cinnamon or the perfume of a flower) and Keren-Happuch (container of antimony, an expensive black coloring used in eye makeup) (Gardner, 399). In addition to providing the names of these new daughters, the text awards them this accolade: “Nowhere in all the land were there found women as beautiful as Job’s daughters” (Job 42:15). The daughters also receive an inheritance along with their brothers (Job 42:15).

Perhaps in giving them an inheritance, Job exemplifies that he learned a bit about the wonderful grace of God. His fortunes are restored and doubled (Job 42:10) because of God’s gracious action (Flesher 2002a, 287). Job passes on this gracious bounty by including his daughters.

3. Women in Lamentations.

The “Daughter of Zion” in the book of *Lamentations, a metaphor throughout Lamentations 1, is depicted in horrific terms. She is Yahweh’s daughter (Flesher 2002b, 392). Now like a widow, the Daughter of Zion, bears the worst of fates. Once a great queen among the nations, now she has become a slave (Lam 1:1). Once full of sons, she now is deserted, and her fate is exile. Her foes now master her, her glory is departed, and the world mocks her. Shamefully exposed with filthiness clinging to her skirts, she cowers, despised and naked, and none comfort her (Lam 1:8-9). In Lamentations 1:12 the poetry goes to first person, and Jerusalem laments her suffering herself. Jerusalem blames God for making her desolate, for handing her over to those whom she cannot withstand and sapping her strength (Lam 1:12-14). However, she repents, acknowledging the righteousness of the Lord and her rebellion against his command (Lam 1:18).

*Zion has become like Babylon in Isaiah 47:1-15 (Dearman, 430). Jerusalem has been forsaken by her lovers—a sexual metaphor common in the prophets (Ezek 16:36) that can indicate either the other gods that she pursued or her unfaithful neighbors (Dearman, 443). The image of the widow is used throughout prophetic literature to shame Israel into repentance (Flesher 2002b, 392). A biblical principle, however, is that God's purpose in rendering shame or punishment is restoration and repentance.

The speaker in Lamentations holds God accountable for his severe parental discipline brought to bear on his weak virgin daughter. The literary tendency of Lamentations to contrast female metaphors seems to petition God to redeem and restore (Flesher 2002b, 393). Actually, Jerusalem must be restored because of the character of God; Jerusalem belongs unequivocally to God, and that is the legal ground for her cry for ultimate restoration (Lam 5:21).

4. Women in Song of Songs.

The presence of Song of Songs in the Bible presents a surprise, for the set of poems comprising this short book runs against the emphasis on restraint in female sexuality elsewhere in the biblical text. Instead, the woman often pursues the man whom she loves, often instigates lovemaking, and is by far the more talkative of the pair. For centuries Song of Songs was interpreted as “an earthly symbol with a heavenly meaning, an allegory throughout” (Stuart, 4). The allegorical interpretation by the Jews was that the book represented God's love for Israel, and by the Christians that it represented Christ's love for the church. Recently, however, these allegorical interpretations have increasingly fallen on hard times, and Song of Songs is read more literally as a set of poems that explore frankly and forthrightly the love between a man and a woman (see Song of Songs 3: History of Interpretation).

The modern tendency and preference to interpret Song of Songs poetry straightforwardly and literally were seen as early as Theodore of Mopuestia (AD 350-428) and later by S. Castellio and J. Calvin (Longman 2001, 38). Writing in the nineteenth century, F. Delitzsch considered the lovely Shulammitte to be a real person, virtuous, and possessing “a beautiful soul in a body formed as it were from the dust of the flowers” (Delitzsch, 3, 5 [see Longman 2001, 40-41]). M. Pope, a twentieth-century commentator, noted the growing tendency of scholars to reject an allegorical interpretation of Song of Songs and to read the poetry as applying “to human physical love” (Pope, 17).

Truly, Song of Songs celebrates human sexuality. It bypasses cultural norms by insisting on the right of the woman to love another of her own choosing; the man likewise enjoys that right (Weems, 156).

The positive dimensions of love portrayed in Song of Songs give clues to the Bible's view of molding a strong bond between a woman and a man (Hill and Walton, 381). The Shulammitte maiden models for her shepherd-lover, and he for her, a genuine love that shows its sincerity and fidelity by strength of character and by passion. Their love for each other exudes faithfulness, integrity, spontaneity, loyalty and commitment (Song 4:12-16; 7:11-13; 8:10-12).

The Shulammitte is the only unmediated female voice in Scripture (Weems, 156). Her feelings, thoughts and desires are conveyed in monologues and not, like the thoughts of Ruth and Esther, via a narrator's voice. Consequently, the young woman's presence dominates the book.

The poems describe love via poetic images and comparisons. The out of doors captivates the lovers, and sensory delights augment their love. The senses of smell, touch, sight, taste and hearing help the lovers to describe one another. The shepherd-lover describes his darling as overwhelming him with her eyes. Her hair is like a flock of goats; her teeth like sheep coming up from a washing; her temples behind her veil like halves of a pomegranate. Truly, his beloved is lovelier than sixty queens and eighty concubines (Song 6:4-8). The Shulammitte exults in her power and influence over her lover. Clearly, this shepherd maiden is a sensual woman in touch with her sexuality (Weems, 158).

The voices in Song of Songs offer multiple interpretations and demarcations for biblical editors. For example, the TEV has it that there are six songs (Song 1:2—2:7; 2:8—3:5; 3:6—5:1; 5:2—6:3; 6:4—8:4; 8:5-14). The NIV calls the woman “the beloved,” and the man “the lover”; a group called “friends” also speak in Song of Songs 1:4b, 8; 5:1b, 9; 6:1, 10, 13; and 8:5, 8-9.

The Shulammite, however, refers to them as “daughters of Jerusalem” (Song 2:7; 3:5; 8:4). She wisely tells them not to rush into love but rather wait for the right moment—a moment that she enjoys finding again and again (Longman 2001, 131).

5. Women in Psalms.

It is entirely possible that women, although excluded from the priesthood in Israel, participated in the worship of Israel as musicians and as part of the singing community (Num 10:35-36; 2 Sam 6:12-15; Ps 68:24-27) (Kroeger, 297). Likewise, it is possible that they were employed as performers in the temple as liturgical musicians and singers (Carter, 305). Women initiated or joined in the praise of the Lord as victor, as creator, and as one who is a father to the fatherless and a defender of widows (Ps 68:5).

The book of *Psalms underlines the faith and influence of women. In Psalm 35:14 the psalmist speaks of a child's love of the mother, mourning her death. The psalmist describes himself in these terms of honor: he is the Lord's servant and the son of the Lord's maidservant (Ps 116:16).

In Psalm 45, a song of praise for a king on his wedding day, women figure in the wedding party. Daughters of kings and honored women accompany the bride (Ps 45:9). The royal bride receives some advice from the psalmist: she should forget her people and be encouraged because her beauty enthalls the king (Ps 45:10). Her wedding night will be successful because sons will become princes throughout the land (Ps 45:16).

Individual women and their concerns receive mention in the psalms. Fear of God makes people tremble like a woman in labor (Ps 48:6). Daughters are renowned for their beauty. The daughters of covenant Israel will be like pillars carved to adorn a palace (Ps 144:12). The Lord honors the barren woman with a home of her own and makes her the happy mother of children; this public miracle leads the community to praise the Lord, a fitting conclusion for the psalm (Ps 113:9).

The birth process, a rich motif in the psalms, has both physical and spiritual dimensions. Psalm 22:9-10 declares that the Lord brought the psalmist from the womb; simultaneously with nursing at his mother's breast, the psalmist learned to trust in the Lord. “From my mother's womb you have been my God,” (Ps 22:10) he acknowledges.

6. Women in Proverbs.

Proverbs presents a multitude of character stereotypes. Drawn in exaggeration, they show the extremes of habits, patterns in life and choices in life (Branch 2005, 57). Proverbs equally presents men and women in good and bad lights. Male characters include the father, husband, king, son, drunkard, sluggard, stubborn man and violent man. Female characters include the mother, noble wife, queen, gossip, adulteress, strange or foreign woman, Woman Folly and *Woman Wisdom.

The roles of father and mother are equal in Proverbs; the mother as well as the father is honored and is a source of teaching and instruction (Prov 1:8). A concept in Proverbs is that correct teaching from parents can save a young and simple man from the adulteress, from the loose and foreign woman with her seductive words (Prov 2:16) (Whybray, 22; Branch 2005, 64).

Scholars debate the identity of this seductress (Prov 2:16-22; 5:1-14, 15-23; 6:20-29, 30-35; 7:1-23, 24-27). Is she a foreign and secular harlot, a foreign devotee to a foreign god, a foreign goddess, a social outsider, a native prostitute or another man's wife (see Fox, 134)? The scholarly consensus is that she probably is an adulteress, a woman far away from her husband or whose husband is away (Miller, 317; Branch 2005, 64).

Questions likewise surround the character Woman Wisdom (Prov 1:20-33; 3:13-20; 4:5-9; 7:4; 8:1-36; 9:1-6). Is she a goddess? Does she express the feminine side of royalty and divinity? She may have a parallel with the Egyptian concept of justice (maat*), but she also appears to be distinctly Hebraic and a new, unique contribution to Wisdom literature (see Murphy 1998, 279). On the human side, she may represent a synopsis of the positive roles played by wives and mothers in Israelite society (Fontaine 1992b, 146). She confidently addresses men and women in a busy part of the city, a place of power (Branch 2005, 59). On the divine side, Hildegard of Bingen linked Woman Wisdom to beauty and a high regard for the aesthetic life; she saw Woman Wisdom as combining both a menacing strength and a soft goodness (Fierro, 26).

Woman Wisdom's opposite is Woman Folly, a loud, brash woman, sloppy in bearing yet brazenly attractive (Prov 9:13-17); she displays an open dislike for Woman Wisdom (Branch 2005, 58). Her lifestyle and her home entice the simple to the realm of the dead. Choosing her lifestyle leads slowly not only to sexual seduction but also to seduction by an alien religion (Perdue, 148). Woman Folly presents an open threat to family, society and God's covenant.

Continuing in a negative light, the seductress, adulteress and the strange or foreign woman present a composite of male fears about female temptation: the ways of these women lead to death—actually to Sheol (Prov 2:16-19; 5:3-6; 7:6-27; 9:13-18). Casting wide her net of charms, the adulteress captures a simple youth and leads him to death like a bird in a snare (Prov 7:23); she entices a silly, deceived adult man, and his life ends in shame (Prov 6:32-33) (Branch 2005, 65). The adulterer brings not only ruin on himself but also the physical blows and fury of the betrayed husband who refuses to be compensated with a bribe (Murphy 1998, 39).

However, even with these negatives, women receive much strong, positive affirmation in Proverbs. A man is commanded to rejoice with the wife of his youth (Prov 5:18). A good wife is considered to be a gift from God, and he who finds a wife finds what is good and receives favor from the Lord (Prov 18:22).

Proverbs ends with an *acrostic poem about the ideal wife or woman of worth. She may reflect the socioeconomic realities of women living in the Persian period (Yoder, 428). This paragon of virtue and industry gets up before dawn, supervises her household, makes quilts for her bed, gives to the poor, buys a field on her own initiative, and raises grateful children. Her husband, after years of marriage, is still in love with her. The poem, written from the perspective of an observer who probably is male, notes the economic initiative and business acumen of the woman (Schüssler Fiorenza, 109).

But the poem also gives a glimpse into a successful, working marriage (Branch 2003, 20). The speaker of the poem is not the woman, for a woman of such high caliber would not praise herself. Instead, the speaker seems to be one who has observed the marriage over a long period of time. This marriage is a marriage of different individuals, each permitting the other to excel according to his or her abilities. The partners then bring back to their marriage and family the results of their industry. They share the joys of their daily endeavors. The picture presented in the acrostic poem is one of life, happiness, confidence in the future, industry and respect. The poem gives many clues about what the partners contribute to the marriage. The husband publicly praises his wife, and he does so again and again (Prov 31:28-29). The wife's industry makes the husband's life one in which he can excel as a magistrate at the city gate (Prov 31:19, 23). Their marriage shows a partnership of diverse equals, one in which the wife invests in real estate without seeking her husband's input, sanction or approval (Prov 31:16). The partners exhibit integrity and trustworthiness, but the wife is singled out as the depository of her husband's whole confidence and trust (Prov 31:11). His praise seems to make her thrive and she decides to do even more (Branch 2003, 22). She directs her handmaidens early in the day and provides a good breakfast for all her employees. This woman enjoys work, and the whole family profits by her industry. She sews her bed linens and clothes in the richest of all colors, purple (Prov 31:22).

This truly remarkable woman must be honored publicly, and Proverbs ends with giving her a place at the city gate, perhaps alongside her husband (Prov 31:23, 31). This woman behaves in such a way that all know that she is a woman who fears Yahweh. The poem, which ends the book of Proverbs, shows that such excellence of character can come only from a firm religious faith (Whybray, 187). An *inclusio, the *fear of the Lord, brackets the book (Prov 1:7; 31:30).

Why does the book of Proverbs end with a poem emphasizing a woman and pointing toward the qualities of an ideal wife? The authors and compilers of the book do not say. Perhaps it is because a goal of Wisdom literature is a life well lived, and part of having a well-lived life is having a happy marriage. The book begins with advice from a father and mother to their son (Prov 1:8) and ends with perhaps their benediction on this son: their wish for him to find an exemplary wife who will bless him all her days (Prov 31:12), provide him delightful children (Prov 31:28), and join him in fearing the Lord (Prov 1:7; 31:30). In living a life hallmarked by wise choices, the woman of Proverbs 31 becomes herself a model of Woman Wisdom. Significantly, both Woman Wisdom and a noble wife are sought and found (Prov 8:35; 18:22).

The noble wife and Woman Wisdom merge on several levels. Each is practical; each is a faithful guide and lifelong companion. Although the origin of Woman Wisdom is God (Prov 8:22-30), her home is this world (McCreesh, 46). Although Woman Wisdom may be abstract, the noble wife of Proverbs 31 is a believable, confident, real woman contributing to the needs of her community and thoroughly enjoying the life she lives. The noble wife serves as a concrete example of Woman Wisdom.

7. Women in Ruth.

The women in the book of Ruth are Naomi; her two daughters-in-law, Orpah and Ruth; and the anonymous women of Bethlehem.

The women of Bethlehem greet with consternation the return of Naomi, accompanied by her daughter-in-law Ruth, a Moabitess (Ruth 1:19). Months later, the women of Bethlehem again figure importantly in the story after Ruth and *Boaz marry and their son is born. The women prophesy and bless Naomi. They point out that Naomi now has a *kinsman-redeemer. They pray that the baby will become famous throughout Israel. They prophesy that the baby will renew Naomi's life and sustain her in her old age. They point out to Naomi that Ruth is better for her than seven sons (Ruth 4:14-15).

The book develops the character of Naomi via her hardships. She faces famine, the journey to Moab, the deaths of her husband and two sons, the travel (probably by foot) back to Bethlehem, and a bitter life as a poor widow surviving on the subsistence gleanings of her daughter-in-law Ruth. Naomi's name means "pleasant." When the women of Bethlehem greet her, however, Naomi tells them not to call her "pleasant" but rather "bitter." She adds her own reason, blaming God: "The Almighty has made my life very bitter. I went away full, but the LORD has brought me back empty. . . . The Almighty has brought misfortune upon me" (Ruth 1:20-21). The book chronicles both Naomi's grief and her recovery.

The book also chronicles the story of Ruth, a Moabite proselyte who leaves her homeland because she loves her mother-in-law. Ruth wins the hearts of all who see her. People notice her faithfulness to her mother-in-law, whom all in Bethlehem seem to know as a loveable but crotchety widow. Likewise, Ruth's chastity as a widow (Ruth 2:11, 23) earns her their esteem (Ruth 2:23; 3:10).

Modest, meek, courteous, loyal, responsible and gentle (Deen, 82), Ruth nonetheless knows her own mind and sets goals. She knows that she must have a husband to ensure her standing in the community and to provide safety for herself and her mother-in-law. Ruth displays her decisiveness in words twice in the book. First, she firmly refuses to leave her mother-in-law and let her journey unaccompanied from Moab to Bethlehem (Ruth 1:16-18). Second, she proposes to Boaz. In the intimate scene at the threshing floor, she describes herself an 'āmâ, a servant—yes, but a servant who can be taken as a wife (Roop, 61), and she commands Boaz to spread his garment over her, clearly a proposal for marriage (Ruth 3:9)!

Earlier, Ruth had displayed her flirtatious side. While gleaning in a field that turns out to belong to Boaz, she catches his eye. Singling her out as the new person in town, he praises her publicly, thereby providing her protection (Ruth 2:9). When he prays that she be "richly rewarded by the LORD, under whose wings you have taken refuge" (Ruth 2:12), she replies, "May I continue to find favor in your eyes, my lord" (Ruth 2:13 [italics added]).

Boaz, ironically, becomes the vehicle for answering his own prayer. He is the kinsman-redeemer. Through a levirate marriage he marries Ruth and takes control of the property of Elimelech, Kilion and Mahlon (Ruth 4:9), thereby providing for her and her mother-in-law (Weisberg, 426).

8. Women in Esther.

The book of Esther contains three named women: *Vashti, queen of Persia; Esther, her successor; and Zeresh, wife of the villainous Haman. Anonymous female characters include a group of young women candidates for queen, and a general category of maidservants of Esther the queen. Only the named women speak.

According to haggadah lore, Vashti, daughter of Belshazzar and granddaughter of Nebuchadnezzar, loved her acclaimed position as the most beautiful woman in the world (Rappoport, 247-48). The story opens with a prolonged banquet that King *Ahasuerus (Xerxes) held for his governing nobles. In a state of drunkenness, he tells his governors of Vashti's excellent beauty. His drinking partners ask to see her. But more than that, they ask to see her naked. Xerxes approves, ordering her to appear wearing only her crown (cf. Esther 1:11). Vashti, according to Jewish interpretation, was no prude and was vain to the core. But while preparing to answer the king's summons, she discovered that she was leprous on her forehead and body. Her leprosy could not be disguised by cosmetics. So she hid behind a false modesty in her response to her husband; she belittled him publicly. She sent him a flippant, surly note proclaiming him a fool, liar, madman and boaster (Rappoport, 248). Because of her impudence, she was condemned to death. In haggadah Vashti joins Jezebel and Athaliah, two other biblical queens (2 Kings 9:30-37; 11), and Semiramis, wife of Nimrod and queen of Babylon, as one of four women who achieved power in the world (Enc-Jud 3.814).

The biblical text quickly shifts from Vashti to the drama of choosing her successor. By edict of the king, Persia's virgins are rounded up and taken to the palace for instruction in grooming and court etiquette. Esther, a Jewish maiden, wins the favor of Hegai, the one in charge of the harem, and he assigns her extra beauty treatments, special food and personal maids (Esther 2:8-9). It would seem that Hegai also controlled the time when Esther went to the king to spend the night (Esther 2:15). Indeed, Xerxes chooses Esther as his queen. Significantly, the text says that she wins the favor of all who saw her (Esther 2:9, 15, 17).

But the king's chief advisor is Haman, an Agagite, a designation that probably shows him to be a descendant of Agag the Amalekite; the Amalekites are hereditary enemies of the Jews (1 Sam 15:6-32). Haman hates the Jews and seeks to destroy them. The king gives him a free hand. Time and date are set for their extermination. *Mordecai, a relative of Esther, realizes that she will not escape the destruction just because she is in the king's palace. He persuades her to go to the king for the lives of her people (Esther 4:12-16). Esther agrees. With the words "If I perish, I perish" (Esther 4:16), Esther emerges as a woman and assumes her destiny. She decides to speak out, even if it means her death. Her decision combines courage, humility and piety; she seeks God via fasting and solicits like support from her community (Bechtel, 50).

Esther seems to think through the ways open to her. She sets a course and keeps to it. The course involves calculation and manipulation. She knows the king, and she uses this knowledge to her and her people's advantage. She fights for the lives of her people and for herself.

Courageous, and using her beauty and her status as wife of the king to her advantage, she comes to the king, defying the decree that those who enter his presence uninvited be killed (Esther 4:11). Dressed in her royal robes and risking her life, she enters the throne room, but he extends his scepter to her, thereby sparing her life (Esther 5:1-2). She requests his attendance, and Haman's, at a banquet that she will give that day. The king and Haman come to her private banquet.

Mysterious and gracious, she refuses to tell the king her request until the following day at another intimate banquet. Meanwhile, Haman erects gallows to hang Mordecai. But the king endures a sleepless night and works at his books. He finds that Mordecai has not been rewarded for earlier saving his life (Esther 2:21-23; 6:1-4). The king commands that Haman honor Mordecai by leading him mounted on a horse throughout *Susa and proclaiming that this is how the king honors one who serves him (Esther 6:11). Humiliated, Haman goes home, where his wife, Zeresh, and friends predict that Haman's downfall is in front of the rise of the Jew Mordecai is immanent (Esther 6:13). Zeresh's words ring prophetically true.

Guards escort Haman to the queen's second banquet. There, Esther reveals that she and her people have been targeted for extermination by the evil Haman (Esther 7:1-6). The king leaves in a rage. He returns to find Haman, as he begs Esther for his life, throwing himself on the couch where she reclines (Esther 7:8). The king interprets this as an attempt to ravish the queen in his presence. Haman is taken out and hanged on the gallows that he built for Mordecai.

But the lethal legal difficulty—the king's irrevocable extermination edict—remains. Mordecai and Esther advise the king to send new documents, with the king's signature, allowing the Jews to defend themselves. They do, and many of their enemies are killed.

Esther's life and position enable a reversal of her people's status in Persia. Oppressed, they nonetheless stand up to their adversaries and earn the respect of their former persecutors. Both Esther and her people now are powerful and respected. Esther became a hero for the Diaspora Jews in her lifetime and subsequently. Esther's influence combines both strength of character and faith. She serves as a model for persecuted Jews and Christians throughout the centuries.

9. Conclusion.

Women in Wisdom literature provide a fascinating array of lifestyles pertinent to both genders. From queen to commoner, wise woman to foolish slut, faithful wife to insensitive gossip, young woman in love to widow in grief, covenant believer to alien apostate, women are presented in a full range of personalities and functions. Often using hyperbole to make a point, Wisdom literature teaches the consequences of life's choices via exaggeration. Wisdom literature in particular seeks to influence youths to choose wisely and adults to continue along a wise path. Truly, the young woman in Song of Songs points to the ongoing delights of love (and wisdom) when she urges her lover to come away "and be like a gazelle, or like a young stag on the spice-laden mountains" (Song 8:14).

See also ESTHER 1: BOOK OF; ESTHER 6: PERSON; FEMINIST INTERPRETATION; HONOR AND SHAME; KINSMAN-REDEEMER AND LEVIRATE; MARRIAGE AND SEX; NAOMI; RUTH 1: BOOK OF; RUTH 4: PERSON; SONG OF SONGS 1: BOOK OF; VASHTI; WASF; WOMAN WISDOM AND WOMAN FOLLY.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. C. M. Bechtel, Esther (IBC; Louisville: John Knox, 2002); K. A. Blessing, "Job," in The IVP Women's Bible Commentary, ed. C. C. Kroeger and M. J. Evans (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 2002) 273-87; R. G. Branch, "Spreuke 31:10-31: 'n Bybelse model vir die huwelik," Die Kerkblad 106 (2003) 20-22; idem, "Teaching the Old Testament Book of Proverbs via a Play," Christian Higher Education 4 (2005) 57-69; W. P. Brown, Ecclesiastes (IBC; Louisville: John Knox, 2000); P. Carter, "Women as Psalmists," in The IVP Women's Bible Commentary, ed. C. C. Kroeger and M. J. Evans (Downers Grove, IL: InterVarsity Press, 2002) 305-6; J. A. Dearman, Jeremiah, Lamentations (NIVAC; Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 2002); E. Deen, All the Women of the Bible (New York: Harper & Row, 1955); F. Delitzsch, Proverbs, Ecclesiastes, Song of Solomon (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1975); N. Fierro, Hildegard of Bingen and Her Vision of the Feminine (Kansas City, MO: Sheed & Ward, 1994); L. S. Flesher, "Job," in The Women's Bible Commentary, ed. C. A. Newsom and S. H. Ringe (Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 2002a) 273-88; idem, "Lamentations," in The Women's Bible Commentary, ed. C. A. Newsom and

S. H. Ringe (Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 2002b) 392-95; C. R. Fontaine, "Ecclesiastes," in The Women's Bible Commentary, ed. C. A. Newsom and S. H. Ringe (Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 1992a) 153-55; idem, "Proverbs," in The Women's Bible Commentary, ed. C. A. Newsom and S. H. Ringe (Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 1992b) 145-52; M. V. Fox, Proverbs 1-9 (AB 18A; New York: Doubleday, 2000); P. D. Gardner, ed., New International Encyclopedia of Bible Characters: The Complete Who's Who in the Bible (Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 1995); A. J. Hill and J. H. Walton, A Survey of the Old Testament (2nd ed.; Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 2000); C. C. Kroeger, "The Relevance of Psalms for the Everyday Lives of Women," in The Women's Bible Commentary, ed. C. A. Newsom and S. H. Ringe (Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 2002) 297-99; T. Longman III, The Book of Ecclesiastes (NICOT; Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1998); idem, Song of Songs (NICOT; Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 2001); T. P. McCreesh, "Wisdom as Wife: Proverbs 31:10-31," RB 92 (1985) 25-46; J. W. Miller, The Believers Church Bible Commentary: Proverbs (Scottsdale, PA: Herald Press, 2004); R. E. Murphy, Ecclesiastes (WBC 23A; Dallas: Word, 1992); idem, Proverbs (WBC 22; Nashville: Thomas Nelson, 1998); L. G. Perdue, Proverbs (IBC; Louisville: John Knox, 2000); M. H. Pope, Song of Songs (AB 7C; Garden City, NY: Doubleday, 1977); I. Provan, Ecclesiastes, Song of Songs (NIVAC; Grand Rapids: Zondervan, 2001); A. S. Rappoport, Ancient Israel: Myths and Legends, vol. 3 (London: Senate, 1995); E. F. Roop, Ruth, Jonah, Esther (Believers Church Bible Commentary; Scottdale, PA: Herald Press, 2002); E. Schüssler Fiorenza, In Memory of Her: A Feminist Theological Reconstruction of Christian Origins (New York: Crossroad, 2000); G. Schwab, "Woman as the Object of Qohelet's Search," AUSS 39 (2001) 73-84; A. M. Stuart, The Song of Songs: An Exposition of the Song of Solomon (Philadelphia: William S. Rentoul, 1869); R. J. Weems, "Song of Songs," in The Women's Bible Commentary, ed. C. A. Newsom and S. H. Ringe (Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 1992) 156-60; D. E. Weisberg, "The Widow of Our Discontent: Levirate Marriage in the Bible and Ancient Israel," JSOT 28 (2004) 403-29; S. A. White, "Esther," in The Women's Bible Commentary, ed. C. A. Newsom and S. H. Ringe (Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 1992) 124-29; R. N. Whybray, The Book of Proverbs (CBC; Cambridge: Cambridge University Press, 1972); C. R. Yoder, "The Woman of Substance: A Socioeconomic Reading of Proverbs 31:10-31," JBL 122 (2003) 427-47.

R. G. Branch

WORDPLAY

Wordplays are playful but significant uses of one and the same word or phrase with different meanings or of different words or phrases with the same meanings. Such imaginative, exciting and surprising uses of words or phrases can operate on the level of sentences, paragraphs or whole poems. The term wordplay, used here as elsewhere interchangeably with the designation pun, is a general one for several related but distinct literary devices.

1. Definitions and Terminology
2. Forms of Wordplay
3. How Puns Work: Technical Aspects and Examples
4. Functions

1. Definitions and Terminology.

Wordplays can be distinguished from sound plays (see Sound Patterns), which play on how words sound rather than on how they are written. There is, however, considerable overlap between the two, as words that sound similar often look similar. Wordplays come under the general category of *ambiguity, which is, among other factors, caused by polysemy or homonymy. The term polysemy identifies words that have two or more related senses, while the term homonymy identifies words that have two or more unrelated senses.

Occurrences of words with unconnected senses usually are treated as occurrences of different words, but sometimes it is difficult to decide between polysemy and homonymy. In many contexts ambiguity is a problematic textual feature. Where it is unintentional, a vague or equivocal expression occurring when precision and particularity of reference are needed leads to misunderstanding. Where intentional, an oblique or evasive expression can be misleading and even deceptive. However, ambiguity is also a deliberate poetic device, usually marked as such in the context. The use of a single word or expression to signify two or more distinct references, or to express two or more diverse attitudes or feelings, makes it possible to say much with few words (Empson; Abrams, 10-11). Polysemy can hint at the complexity and multivalence of apparently simple ideas, and homonymy can signal connections between apparently unrelated ideas.

Wordplays, one of the main manifestations of ambiguity, can surprise, amuse, delight, invite curiosity and prompt active reader involvement while communicating serious, complex and significant information, and they can do so in few words. The terms denotation and connotation describe how polysemy works. The denotation of a word is its primary meaning or the entity to which it most commonly refers. Its connotation is the range of secondary or associated meanings and feelings that it usually suggests or implies. "The connotation of a word is only a potential range of secondary significations; which part of these connotations are evoked depends on the way the word is used in a particular context" (Abrams, 46). The potential of words and expressions to have various connotations is exploited in polysemous wordplays.

The term that was used to designate Wordplays in classical rhetoric is paronomasia, which then was used to describe words that were in some way marked as ambiguous and therefore invited the search for meanings beyond their denotation or most obvious connotations. In many modern studies of Hebrew poetry the term paronomasia is used more loosely to describe a combination of words that are similar in sound. A popular form of paronomasia is alliteration, the repetition of the same sound, usually initial consonants of words or of stressed syllables, in any sequence of neighboring words and even sentences. Paronomasia in this modern sense is used mainly for aesthetic effect, sometimes to combine otherwise unrelated statements into loose contexts.

2. Forms of Wordplay.

At the most basic level, there are two kinds of wordplays, homonymic puns and polysemantic puns.

2.1. Homonymic Pun. The homonymic pun uses different words that are pronounced and/or spelled in identical or similar fashion. The homonymic wordplay often is contrived and far-fetched. The connection between the expressions that are brought into play is obtrusive and generally light-hearted because it appears accidental, a matter of sheer chance (Leech, 209). The extreme example of the homonymic pun "jumps out of its setting, yapping, and bites the Master on the ankles” (Empson, 108). Examples range from the funny to the ridiculous, but they can serve useful purposes. The preposterous and ridiculous nature of such wordplays makes them stand out and hard to forget.

2.2. Polysemantic Pun. The polysemantic pun is more subtle and subdued. “Because of the resemblance between the senses, their collision is less violent” (Leech, 212). Expressing two meanings through the same occurrence, it “gives two meanings for the price of one, and so adds to the poem’s density and richness of significance” (Leech, 212). Polysemantic wordplays carry a family resemblance to metaphors and metonymies. Often correspondences are conventional. Puns do not arbitrarily create such correspondences but rather express associations that are already manifest to the poet, who wants the audience to discover them as well. The correspondence is not contrived but rather is derived and/or discerned.

3. How Puns Work: Technical Aspects and Examples.

Because they exploit ambiguity, puns are not always obvious. Many technical treatments of puns (e.g., Empson; Leech; Su) suggest that wordplays are always marked as such. The three main markers usually listed are (1) the presence of a double context, with each offering support for one meaning or a single context that can support more than one meaning; (2) the homonymous or polysemous nature of words or expressions; (3) the presence of a “trigger” that “calls the hearer’s or reader’s attention to the double meaning” (Su). However, the first and second constitute “marks” of wordplay, while only the third refers to “markers” of wordplay. The first and the second do not enforce or reinforce implicit similarities; they only make double meanings possible and likely. The conditions for punning are latent but are not enforced. To demonstrate this, we will look at some examples that display combinations of the three.

3.1. Unmarked Puns. Proverbs 5:3 offers a double context and polysemy. It employs two traditional techniques of punning, equivocal and double entendre. The term equivocal describes “the use of a single word or phrase which has two disparate meanings, in a context which makes both meanings equally relevant” (Leech, 213; Abrams, 253). (Sometimes the term is erroneously used interchangeably with “pun” or “wordplay.”) Double entendre is a French term meaning “double meaning,” and it refers to a wordplay in which a word or phrase has a second, usually sexual, meaning. Proverbs 5:3: “For the lips of a strange woman drip honey, and her palate [hikkâ] is smoother than oil,” is a good example. On the face of it, the words seem to refer to the “strange” woman’s seductive speech (cf. NRSV: “For the lips of a loose woman drip honey, and her speech [for hikkâ] is smoother than oil”). Yet an Akkadian text suggests that “lips” here plays on the lips of the mouth and the lips of the pudenda: “May my lips be lallaru-honey, may my hands be all charm, may the lips of my pudenda be lips of honey” (Watson, 247). In Song of Songs 2:3; 5:16; 7:10 the palate (hēk) refers to the inner mouth, the place of intimacy and the most erotic of kisses. Thus the wordplay in Proverbs 5:3 may evoke the vagina, a more intimate place even than the pudenda, with dripping honey and oil suggesting bodily fluids produced during sexual intercourse.

Especially the more daring puns, such as double entendre, are often not marked as such, as in Proverbs 5:3. Puns like this, which function in the context of cultural taboos that inhibit sexually explicit language in public discourse, leave the initiative to detect the wordplay to the reader or listener, who can choose to take this road or not. If charged with impropriety, the poet may protest innocence. Responsibility lies with the reader, not the poet. It is to be expected that there are many “daring” wordplays in the OT that were left unmarked for similar reasons. This would include puns that imply a critique of authorities, opponents and enemies. Detecting such puns remains difficult, but growing knowledge about the cultural background of the ancient Near East will facilitate the discovery of more puns (see, e.g., the essays in Noegel on Egyptian, Mesopotamian, Ugaritic, Syriac and Arabic puns). Knowledge of traditional punning techniques makes the detection of unmarked puns possible, but most of these techniques do not impose the recognition of such puns.

Another unmarked pun is the following wordplay, a so-called amphibology. In puns of this kind the meaning of an entire phrase is doubled through polysemy. In Job 15:13 the phrase tāšib ʿel-ʿēl rūhekā means “you turn your fury against God,” but it can also mean “you return your breath to God” (Alonso Schökel, 29).

Since the idiom signals “you will die,” the amphibology turns the phrase simultaneously into a factual statement and into a warning or threat. Amphibologies are thought to be rare (Greenstein), but it is likely that many examples simply have not yet been identified (e.g., Prov 10:6b par. 10:11b; 10:29; 13:2).

3.2. Marked Puns. Usually, however, wordplays are a foregrounded feature of language and marked as ambiguous. Typical techniques, sometimes called “triggers,” aid the detection and interpretation of wordplays in the OT. Most work on the basis that an expression does not seem to fit the context in which it occurs. Its denotation or initially most natural connotation does not fit. The resultant mismatch creates ambiguity and provokes the search for a different meaning for the expression—the point of the pun. The most important are listed here.

3.2.1. Punning Repetition (“Antanacsis” in Classical Rhetoric). A double meaning can be brought to one’s attention via a repetition of the same sequence, first in one sense and then in another (Leech, 210). An example is Proverbs 19:16a: šōmēr mišwā šōmēr napšō (“he who keeps [= observes] the command will keep [= preserve] his life”). The direct connection between deed and consequence is suggested by the identity of the language used to express their correlation. A special case in point, frequent in Hebrew poetry, is the poetic device of verb gapping, as in Proverbs 7:2a: “Keep [šēmōr] my commands and live, [ellipsis] my teaching as the apple of your eye.” There is a play on the verb šmr. Although the verb is gapped in the second half-line, it needs to be understood there, and with the simile “as the apple of your eye” it can only mean “guard” rather than “keep” in the sense of “observe,” as in the first half-line.

3.2.2. Zeugma (“Yoking”) and Syllepsis (“Taking Together”). These two types of pun, where two identical or very similar constructions are collapsed together so that one of the crucial items of the construction needs to be mentioned only once, occurs frequently. The difference between zeugma and syllepsis is that in the former the gapped element carries the same meaning in both constructions, whereas in the latter the likeness between the two similar constructions is superficial, so that the gapped item is understood in disparate senses in the two constructions. (In the literature, the meaning of these designations is sometimes reversed.) The most common form of this ellipted form of punning through repetition is verb gapping, but other elements of the sentence can also be gapped. Hebrew even has backward gapping of the verb, usually when the verb is in final position of the two halves of the poetic line (Miller). A rather unusual instance where a play on antonyms is combined with syllepsis is Proverbs 23:17: “Do not let your heart be envious [ʿal-yēqannēʾ libbēkā] of sinners, but [ellipsis] the fear of the LORD.” The verse is often seen as corrupt, but more likely it uses a compound pun. Having been gapped in the second half-line, yēqannēʾ (libbēkā) serves double duty for both halves of the verse. The reader has to supply it, but with a different meaning (“become excited about”) and without the negative particle (ʿal). The opposition between the antithetical statements and the *parallelism between the half-lines suggests that the same verb needs to be supplied, without the negation. But the contrasting direct objects in the parallelism (nondesirable in the first half-line, desirable in the second) suggest that the verb has another meaning in the second half-line. This is a complex pun that demands much cooperation from the reader.

3.2.3. Asyntactic Pun. Here the denotation (the most frequent meaning) of a word or its expected syntactic relations or the part of speech as which a word is most frequently used does not fit into the syntactic context in which it is used. An elaborate example occurs in Proverbs 29:6a: bēpešaʿ ʾiṣ rāʿ mōqēš (“in an evil man’s transgression is a snare”). This half-verse is a variant repetition of Proverbs 12:13a: bēpešaʿ šēpātayim mōqēš rāʿ (“in the transgression of lips is an evil snare”). The sequence of the words mōqēš and rāʿ has been reversed. This initially creates an element of confusion and surprise, since readers who know Proverbs 12:13a would expect that here too the combination of mōqēš and rāʿ means “evil snare.” However, the sequence rāʿ mōqēš is syntactic and does not mean the same thing as the sequence mōqēš rāʿ. Only further reflection will enable readers to discern that the adjective rāʿ (“evil”), which qualified the word mōqēš (“snare”) in Proverbs 12:13a, has been transferred to qualify ʾiṣ (“man”) in Proverbs 29:6a. The word order reversal creates anasyntactic pun that draws attention to the similarity between the two variants and prompts readers to reflect carefully on the precise meaning of the two verses and their relationship to one another.

3.2.4. Etymological Pun. Some wordplays bring together an etymological, now obsolete meaning with a current meaning of the same word. Name etymologies, of proper and common names, are also popular. For example, in Job 13:24, Job (ʿiyyōb [last mentioned in Job 12:1]) may be interpreting his name in the light of his experience when he accuses God of regarding him as an enemy (ʿōyēb) (Greenstein) (see Job 4: Person). In classical rhetoric such puns have sometimes been called nomen omen—the name signifies the destiny (Alonso Schökel, 30). In the so-called figura etymologica (sometimes also called “turn”), words formed from the same Hebrew root are repeated in close sequence, usually to intensify what is being said. Often a verb is supplied with a direct object formed from the same Hebrew root (Esther 2:3). Examples include Proverbs 7:14; Psalm 35:1, the latter expressing “poetic justice.”

3.2.5. Juxtaposition of Polysemous Words with Overlapping Connotations. A special but frequent type of pun that is not captured by many of the customary definitions of wordplay involves cases where different polysemous words, some of whose connotations overlap, occur close together. Here the context of each decides which connotations are evoked, and how these relate to each other. In Proverbs, for example, there are numerous instances of such wordplays with the two verbs nsr and šmr. Both can have three related meanings that can be expressed with the English verb keep: (1) in the sense of “guard, protect”; (2) in the sense of “comply with, observe”; (3) in the sense of “preserve, save.” The first two of these senses are exploited in Proverbs 3:21, 26; 6:20, 24. The first and third of these senses are employed in Proverbs 13:3 in an example of multiple wordplay: nōšēr piw šōmēr napšō (“he who guards his mouth protects/saves his throat/life”). The polysemous npš literally refers to the “throat” (denotation) but metaphorically is used for “life” (connotation). Puns like this slow down the reading process and prompt deeper reflection.

4. Functions.

The functions of puns operate on macrolevels as well as microlevels.

4.1. Macrolevel Functions. On the macrolevel there are at least three main functions. First, puns demand attentiveness. Genre expectations

(e.g., the high frequency of puns in certain kinds of discourse, such as poetry) and the presence of puns near the beginning of a discourse raise the anticipation of more puns. Even when readers settle into a more cursory reading routine, a wordplay creates ambiguity and makes reading more difficult. The problem in the text stirs readers out of complacency. Puns slow down the reading process and prompt deeper reflection in order to process the reading (pardon the pun). Second, puns can change readers’ perception of the world—a related but distinct function on the macrolevel. This can happen in two ways characteristic of the major types of punning. The homonymic pun makes readers aware of new connections between ideas that were not previously recognized as connected. The polysemantic pun makes readers aware of the multivalence and complexity of ideas that had previously been thought to be simple and/or one-dimensional. Third, wordplays can surprise, amuse, delight, invite curiosity and prompt interest and active reader involvement while communicating serious, complex and significant information, and they can do so in few words. Punning encourages readers to view apparently ordinary things, concepts and ideas in more imaginative ways. Through these three related but distinct macrolevel functions, sustained punning infuses a sense of surprise and discovery, of fun and curiosity. It alerts readers to deeper connections. It makes them engaged and involved readers.

4.2. Microlevel Functions. On the microlevel there are as many functions as there are wordplays. I will mention five. First, many wordplays are simply funny. The humorous function of puns divides into at least three subcategories. (1) Humor can be a worthwhile aim in its own right. (2) Humor can range from light-hearted playfulness that delights and encourages to having fun at the expense of others. If the contrast between the two meanings of a pun is more striking than their similarity, its purpose probably is ironical (Leech, 213). The spectrum ranges from irony to sarcasm, ridicule and mocking. (3) Because witty puns amuse, they entertain and sustain interest, encouraging readers to read on and pay attention. Second, wordplays can function like metaphors, especially if the similarity between the senses of the wordplay is striking. Sometimes such puns can breathe fresh life into dormant metaphors (sometimes falsely called “dead” metaphors). Third, wordplays can allude to wider contexts (including intertextual ones), infusing the text with connotations above and beyond the surface level meaning expressed by the individual words, their grammar and syntax (Hurowitz). Fourth, word plays can have aesthetic functions, making the text cohere on the visual level as well as the auditory level. On the visual level, puns can link different parts of a text. Written text also benefits from sounding pleasant, since reading is often done aloud, whether in company or alone. Readers do not only see their texts; they hear them as well. Fifth, word plays can add emphasis.

If texts are “language games,” then word plays are like particularly smart moves in a game of chess. The various pieces (= words) can make certain conventionally predictable moves on the board (= in the text), and the freedom with which these moves can be made changes depending on the progress of actual play and the context in which the pun appears. The basic rules of text production are fixed, but puns apply them in ever-new ways. There are so many different combinations of moves that words are allowed to make, and there are so many different contexts in which these rules can be actualized in every new text, that it is impossible to describe them all. Word plays convert texts into particularly exciting communicative games, with surprising moves at every turn. They invite readers to play an active part in creating meaning. Word plays are very frequent in the wisdom, poetry and writings of the OT, as in ancient Near Eastern literature generally (Noegel). Yet many word plays go unrecognized. Two obvious examples are asyntactic puns and amphibologies, discussed above. Further systematic study is necessary to develop a fuller understanding of the texts in which the many different kinds of word plays appear.

See also SOUND PATTERNS.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. M. H. Abrams, A Glossary of Literary Terms (7th ed.; Boston: Heinle & Heinle, 1999); L. Alonso Schökel, A Manual of Hebrew Poetics (SubBi 11; Rome: Editrice Pontificio Istituto Biblico, 1988); I. M. Casanowicz, Paronomasia in the Old Testament (Boston: Cushing, 1894); W. Empson, Seven Types of Ambiguity (2nd ed.; London: Chatto & Windus, 1947); E. L. Greenstein, “Wordplay, Hebrew,” ABD 5.968-71; V. A. Hurowitz, “Alliterative Allusions, Rebus Writing, and Paronomastic Punishment: Some Aspects of Word Play in Akkadian Literature,” in Puns and Pundits: Word Play in the Hebrew Bible and Ancient Near Eastern Literature (Bethesda, MD: CDL Press, 2000) 63-87; G. N. Leech, A Linguistic Guide to English Poetry (English Language Series; Harlow: Longman, 1973); C. L. Miller, “The Relation of Coordination to Verb Gapping in Biblical Poetry,” JSOT 32 (2007) 41-60; S. B. Noegel, Puns and Pundits: Word Play in the Hebrew Bible and Ancient Near Eastern Literature (Bethesda, MD: CDL Press, 2000); G. A. Rendsburg, “Wordplay in Biblical Hebrew: An Eclectic Collection,” in Puns and Pundits: Word Play in the Hebrew Bible and Ancient Near Eastern Literature (Bethesda, MD: CDL Press, 2000) 137-62; J. M. Sasson, “Wordplay in the OT,” IDBSup 968-70; S. P. Su, Lexical Ambiguity in Poetry (Studies in Language and Linguistics; London: Longman, 1994); W. G. E. Watson, Classical Hebrew Poetry: A Guide to Its Techniques (2nd ed; JSOTSup, 26; Sheffield: JSOT Press, 1986).

K. Heim

WORSHIP

Although the OT never defines worship, it does provide clues about its understanding of the topic. Its narratives tell of people engaged in various acts of worship, highlight aspects of worship that were directly or indirectly instituted by God, and enumerate cultic actions with which God was pleased or which he rejected. Its psalms were written and used for individual and corporate worship of Yahweh by people subject to different moods or needs during various seasons of life. The rich vocabulary of worship used in its pages indicates that the essence of biblical worship is a proper response to God's person and actions that leads a person to fall or bow down before him in humble submission, express fear or reverence, and serve him in the cult and all of life. This article overviews the biblical vocabulary for worship, and then examines the theology of worship as developed in the OT writings covered in this dictionary.

1. Vocabulary of Worship
2. The Psalms and Worship
3. Wisdom and Worship
4. The Writings and Worship

1. Vocabulary of Worship.

Many discussions of worship trace the etymology of the English term to a word meaning “worthship” or “being worthy.” The OT authors would agree that Yahweh is worthy of worship, but they never use such terminology. (Even though many English versions of 2 Sam 22:4 and Ps 18:3 say that Yahweh is “worthy of praise,” “worthy” is not found in the Hebrew. The word is similarly missing where the NIV says that God is “worthy” in 1 Chron 16:25; Ps 48:1; 96:4; 145:3.) To find this terminology used for God the Father or Son, one must look to the NT, where it is found in only four places (Heb 3:3; Rev 4:11; 5:9, 12). To discuss worship in the sense of God’s worthiness can therefore be misleading. Thus it is essential to examine the terminology used by biblical authors in order to understand their thoughts about the worship of God.

1.1. Bow Down. The most common Hebrew word for worship in the OT is hāwâ, which carries the basic meaning “bow down” or “prostrate oneself.” As it is frequently concerned with one’s inward religious attitudes and actions, it can rightly be translated “worship” or even “pray.” Found some 170 times in the OT, it is almost universally translated by proskyneō in the LXX. While hāwâ could be used for a secular greeting in which one person bows to the ground before another out of respect or to acknowledge submission, it is more frequently used for bowing before God or idols as a sign of surrender and submission. The Bible usually mentions people bowing to Yahweh in response to his appearance or to something that he has done. Since Yahweh is the only proper object of worship, Israel is routinely instructed not to bow down before any other gods. Frequently, hāwâ is paired with one of the other words for worship that will be discussed below.

The Hebrew word sāgad and its Aramaic cognate sēgîd are similar in meaning to hāwâ, being used of those who bow down in submission to another. The Hebrew form of the word is found only in Isaiah 44; 46, where it is used in conjunction with people falling down before idols. In the book of Daniel the Aramaic term is used when all the people in Nebuchadnezzar’s kingdom were commanded to fall down and worship the golden image of the king (Dan 3:5-7, 10-12, 14-18). When Shadrach, Meshach and Abednego refused to fall down and worship the image, they were thrown into the blazing furnace. After they were rescued from the furnace, Nebuchadnezzar praised their God for rescuing them, since they refused to worship any god except their own (Dan 3:28).

1.2. Fear. Like hāwâ, the semantic range of yārē is quite broad, ranging from a fear of everyday threats, such as animals, enemies, punishment, sickness and death, to a fear of the unknown and fear of God. The fear of God/Yahweh is a concept that ranges in meaning from being afraid of God’s power as judge to reverential awe due to his power to deliver (see Fear of the Lord). Thus those who are outside the covenant are terror-stricken when they realize that Yahweh personally leads his people and fights for them (Ex 15:13-16), while those in covenant relationship with Yahweh experience the fear of God as a proper reverence based upon the recognition that he is the rightful judge, the one whom they can trust for deliverance. In many contexts the word yārē approximates worship and emphasizes the need for a proper relationship with God. Its frequent use in conjunction with hāwâ and abad (see below), places it firmly within a worship context, particularly as Israel is regularly given the choice of fearing and bowing down to or fearing and serving either Yahweh or other gods. In the Wisdom literature particularly, fearing God parallels knowing him experientially (Prov 9:10). It thus becomes virtually synonymous with righteous living or religious piety. Occurring some 435 times in verbal, adjectival and nominal forms, the word is usually translated by phobeō in the LXX.

1.3. Service. A third major verb expressing worship is abad, which is found some 290 times in the OT. Noun forms include ‘ebed in reference to a servant, slave or worker (800x), ‘abôdâ in reference to work, service or bondage (145x), and several other forms. In the LXX the word is variously translated by words related to douleuō when referring to slavery, ergazomai when referring to work, and words from the latreuō group when referring to the cultic service of the priests. Like the terms already discussed, abad has a broad range of meaning. It is frequently used for someone who serves another human being, such as a slave serving a master, a worker serving an employer (Gen 29:15), a courtier or subject serving a king (1 Sam 11:1), or one nation serving another (1 Chron 18:2, 6, 13). When used in conjunction with the spiritual realm, the term can indicate service of gods, idols or even heavenly bodies and other created things. Israel was specifically called out of Egypt so that they could “serve” Yahweh (Ex 3:12; 4:23; 7:16; 8:1; 10:26), and frequently they were given the choice of serving Yahweh or other gods (Josh 24:14-24)—that is, acknowledging one or the other as lord.

As ʿebed basically points to someone's relationship with a lord, those who serve God acknowledge him as lord and live their entire life in obedience to him. In contrast to a human master who may treat a servant harshly, God is always a good lord (Westermann, TLOT 2.826). Whereas serving God can simply indicate relationship with him, it often points to the performance of cultic rituals (such as offering sacrifices, engaging in other religious rites, or taking part in the appointed festivals) and other types of service for God. Thus the Aaronic priests served by offering sacrifices in the tabernacle and later the temple, other clans of the Levites served by bearing burdens and taking care of the items of furniture found at the tabernacle or by writing and performing music, and the people as a whole served by uniting to celebrate the Passover. The Levites took part in the Lord's worship by literally "serving in the service of the tabernacle" (Num 3:7-8).

Another Hebrew word used for service is šārat, which is used ninety-seven times in the Hebrew Bible (always in Piel); twenty of these times it is a participle acting as the noun "minister." In ritual settings it is regularly translated with leitourgeō in the LXX. Whereas ʿabad can be used in reference to menial labor, šārat refers only to a higher level of service. It can be used to indicate personal service to an important person (e.g., Joseph serving Potiphar [Gen 39:4]; Elisha serving Elijah [1 Kings 19:21]), but usually it is used of cultic worship performed by a priest or Levite at the tabernacle or someone else who has a special relationship with God (including angels [Ps 103:21]). While it would naturally be used to refer to the ministry of sacrifice, šārat could also be used of people engaged in the ministry of song and praise (cf. 1 Chron 6:32; 16:4, 37).

2. The Psalms and Worship.

The great biblical repository of the praises of ancient Israel is the book of *Psalms. In Hebrew the book is called tēhillim—"songs of praise," or simply "praises." Even though not every psalm is a song of praise, the book as a whole is designed to lead God's people into praise and worship. Although the psalms show that Israel was prepared to encounter God during any season in life to express praise, trust or delight, to confess sins, and to pour out laments as they faced various problems, it is clear that their final goal was to praise the God who had called them into existence as his people. This is seen both in the way individual psalms are written and the entire Psalter is shaped, with more laments toward the beginning and more psalms of praise toward the end (see Westermann 1981, 250-58).

Since its final compilation took place after the rebuilding of the temple, the Psalter is often referred to as the hymnbook of the second temple. This designation is accurate insofar as the psalms were used in temple worship. Even so, it could be misleading, as many psalms were written at a much earlier period and are suitable for use in different ages and various settings as God's people encounter him. Since their contents rarely tie them to specific historical references or to specific temple rituals, they remain useful for multiple situations. The psalms are thus equally at home in temple, synagogue, church and home.

The psalms are connected to temple worship by the headings attached to some psalms and by their content (see Psalms 4: Titles). Debate continues as to their origin and reliability, but the headings clearly give information about the use of the psalms in the cult, even though some terms are obscure to modern readers (see Cult, Worship: Psalms). Some headings point to specific worship occasions when a psalm would be used (Ps 30; 92; 120—134). Although titles in the MT only assign Psalm 92 for use on a particular day (the sabbath), many titles in the LXX assign psalms to the different days of the week. The Songs of Ascent are generally considered to have been used by pilgrims on their way to Jerusalem for one of the feasts or while climbing the temple mount to worship. The title of Psalm 100, "A psalm of thanksgiving," possibly indicates that the psalm was to be used by a person sacrificing a thank offering. Similarly, the titles of Psalm 38 and Psalm 70 may indicate that they were used in conjunction with a memorial offering (cf. Lev 2:2; 24:7) or simply that they were used by those who wanted God to remember their difficulties.

A total of fifty-five psalms appear to refer to an individual involved in leading worship—the "director of music"—whatever his exact function may have been. Fifty-seven titles identify a mizmôr ("psalm"). Twelve psalms are classified as šîr or šîrâ ("song" [Ps 18; 30; 48; 65; 66; 67; 68; 76; 83; 87; 88; 108]), one as a šîr yēdîdôt ("song of love"), quite possibly a wedding song for a king (Ps 45). Another psalm is called a tēhillâ ("song of praise" [Ps 145]), and several more are identified as tēpillâ ("prayers" [Ps 17; 86; 90; 102; 142]). One is said to have been sung (Ps 7). Other headings refer either to instruments used to accompany a psalm (Ps 4; 5 [?]; 6; 54; 55; 61; 67; 76) or to the melody used when a psalm was sung (Ps 9; 22; 45; 56; 57; 58; 59; 60; 69; 75; 80; 88 [?]). At least one title may denote that the singers are women (Ps 46). A number of terms that are of uncertain meaning but presumed to relate to music include šēmînû ("according to the eighth"—octave? eight-stringed instrument? [Ps 6]), gîttî (Ps 8; 81; 84) and māhālat lē'annôt (Ps 88).

In addition to the information found in titles, the contents of many psalms indicate they were intended for temple worship. Some specifically mention the singer's desire to worship at the temple, the altar, God's house or his courts (Ps 5:7; 23:6; 26:6, 8; 27:4-6; 42:4; 65:4; 138:2), or they recall the gates through which the worshiper enters the temple to worship (Ps 24:7, 9; 100:4; 118:19-20). Others identify the temple as the place where Yahweh dwells (Ps 11:4; 18:6; 74:7; 132:5). Frequently the psalmist states his desire to worship (Ps 42:1-2; 63:1-8; 84:1-2) or calls others to worship God (Ps 95:1-2, 6; 96:1-3, 100:1-4). Specific worship acts are mentioned, including offerings and sacrifices of various kinds (Ps 50:5, 8-14, 23; 54:6; 56:12; 66:13-15; 116:17; 118:27) and the payment of vows (Ps 22:25; 65:1; 116:18). Following S. Mowinckel, who speculated from the existence of a Babylonian New Year's festival that Israel celebrated the enthronement of Yahweh as king every year during the Feast of Tabernacles, a number of scholars have attempted to show that the psalms were connected with this or some other feast. It is likely that psalms were recited during the Feast of Tabernacles and other feasts, but it is no more likely that the psalms were specially connected to one festival than it is for Christian hymns to be associated with only one holiday (Goldingay, 54).

The contents of the psalms enumerated many reasons for God to be worshiped. He is the Creator and Sustainer of people and of the rest of the physical world (Ps 8:3-5; 24:1-2; 33:6-9, 15; 104:2-30; 136:4-9). He acted on Israel's behalf for deliverance in history, both from their enemies (Ps 18; 77:11-20; 78; 106; 136:10-24) and from their own sin (Ps 32:1-7; 38; 51; 106). Deliverance is the major motive given by psalmists for offering sacrifices, which usually are presented in the form of a thank offering (Courtman, 40-44). Yahweh was also recognized as Israel's king (Ps 10:16; 24:8-10; 29:10; 47; 95:3; 97:1-6; 99:1-5) and as the one who established the rule of the Davidic dynasty (Ps 2; 18:50; 78:68-72; 89:3-4, 19-37; 132).

In the psalms worship is an activity to be engaged in by individuals and groups of people who enjoy covenant relationship with God (Ps 50:5). No matter whether times were good or bad, God's people can and should focus upon God and arrange their lives around him. No topics were off limits as they approached Yahweh. When they doubted, they said so. When they sinned, they confessed. When they suffered, they pleaded for deliverance. When things were going well or deliverance was granted, they thanked God and praised him for his abundant blessings. And through it all they encouraged one another, the rest of humanity, indeed, the whole of creation, to praise the Lord. Worship is therefore not limited to the covenant community. All the people of the earth are either charged or said to worship Yahweh (Ps 22:27; 66:4; 86:9; 96:9; 98:4-6). The "heavenly hosts" (Ps 103:21; 148:2) and the "sons of God" (Ps 29:1-2) are entreated to worship Yahweh (see Divine Council). Both of these terms evidently refer to angelic beings falling down before God. But the community of those who bow before Yahweh is not limited to benign spirits. After proclaiming the worthlessness of idols and the shame that comes upon those who bow before images, Psalm 97:7 issues the command "Worship him, all you gods!" Even the foreign gods are to prostrate themselves before Yahweh. Indeed, all of creation is charged to worship Yahweh as the one who created all and who reigns over all (Ps 69:34; 98:7-9; 148). Since Yahweh is the only proper object of worship, the psalms exhort Israel not to bow down to foreign gods but rather to listen to the Lord (Ps 81:10; 115:2-8).

From the time of H. Gunkel, scholars have discerned a number of different types of psalms in the Bible. Not all scholars use exactly the same categories, but the following represent the genres that have been discussed: (1) *hymns (psalms of praise), (2) psalms of *lament, (3) psalms of *thanksgiving, (4) psalms of *confidence (or trust), (5) psalms of *remembrance, (6) *wisdom psalms, (7) royal (*kingship) psalms. Although earlier studies attempted to identify fixed forms for these types, it is clear that psalm genres are actually fairly fluid. Few psalms exhibit all the distinctives of their supposed type, and quite a number display characteristics belonging to several genres, making them difficult to categorize. Although not free from problems, form-critical studies of the psalms are valuable because they demonstrate that individual psalms often were shaped by their use in the cult (see Form Criticism). Identifying the way psalms were used in the worship of ancient Israel provides models for their use today. Since lament is the most common genre of the psalms, it is clear that worship involves more than celebration and praise; God's people can engage him through all of life's joys and pains.

3. Wisdom and Worship.

Although it was once argued that Israelite wisdom resembles other ancient Near Eastern wisdom by being purely secular literature devoid of religious content, the biblical texts urge the contrary conclusion. Biblical wisdom is inherently religious, the key phrase being "The fear of the LORD is the beginning of wisdom, and knowledge of the Holy One is understanding" (Prov 9:10; cf. Job 28:28; Ps 111:10; Prov 1:7; Eccles 12:13). As mentioned previously, fear is one of the major OT terms in regard to worship. And even though wisdom writers say little about cultic activities, they are concerned with one's knowledge of and worship of God, actions that make themselves known in the everyday affairs of life (Prov 8:13; 14:27; 15:16, 33; 19:23; 22:4; 28:5; 31:30). From the perspective of the *sages, wisdom cannot exist where practical piety does not exist. The title character of *Job serves as a prime example of a man who "feared God and shunned evil," living a "blameless and upright" life (Job 1:1, 8; 2:3). Job's fear of God is lived out as he acts as a priest for his family, purifying his children and offering burnt sacrifices for them in case they had sinned (Job 1:5). His piety led to prayer for his own physical condition (Job 6:8-9), confession of his sins (Job 42:3, 6) and intercession for others (Job 42:8-9). After his children are killed and his property destroyed or stolen, Job falls down and worships, expressing trust in Yahweh and blessing his name (Job 1:20-21). The book specifically informs its readers that Job's sacrifice and prayer for his friends were accepted by the Lord (Job 42:9).

In Proverbs 8 *Woman Wisdom is expressly connected with Yahweh, who possessed and used wisdom from before creation. After expressing joy at God's work in creation, she invites young men to listen to her in order to find life, promising that all who find her will obtain the Lord's favor. Woman Wisdom's function is to attract people to Yahweh, to bring them into relationship with him. In Proverbs 9 the contrast between this *personification of wisdom and Woman Folly alerts readers of their need to choose between the worship of Yahweh and the worship of other gods. Woman Wisdom builds her bayit (her house or, possibly, temple) with seven pillars (cf. 1 Kings 7:17, which describes Solomon's temple as having seven pillars) at the high point of the city. Similarly, Woman Folly sits at the doorway of her bayit, which is also at the high place of the city. From their vantage point they call out to the naive and those lacking understanding to turn to them and receive what they have to give, whether positive life-giving gifts or negative death-dealing gifts. Since hill-tops often served as sites for temples or cult shrines in ancient Palestine, the situation of these women's houses provides a strong clue that worship is in view. The implication may be that those who follow Woman Wisdom are devoted to the worship of Yahweh, while those who follow Woman Folly pursue other deities. Readers are exhorted to choose the way of life by worshipping Yahweh or death by rejecting him.

The sages echo standard biblical teaching that God is not pleased with cultic actions divorced from piety, and that the condition of one's heart is more important than simply engaging in religious activities. This usually is discussed from a negative standpoint. *Qohelet warns his readers to watch their steps when going to God's house, being careful to listen (i.e., obey) rather than offering the sacrifice of fools who do not even realize that their actions are evil (Eccles 5:1). He further cautions readers not to say too much in prayer or make hasty vows, as that is seen as foolishness if not sin (Eccles 5:2-6). The book of *Proverbs informs us that when carried out with wrong motives, any religious act can be considered an “abomination,” a word carrying clear cultic significance. Thus, both the sacrifice of the wicked and the prayers of those who reject God’s instruction (tôrâ) are viewed as abominations (Prov 15:8; 21:27; 28:9). By contrast, Yahweh delights in the prayers of the upright (Prov 15:8, 29). An example of someone who treats sacrifice with contempt is the rebellious woman in Proverbs 7. She seduces an undiscerning youth by boasting that she had presented peace offerings and paid her vows (Prov 7:6-23). Since the meat from a peace offering was to be eaten by the one making the sacrifice, the woman is inviting the youth to share a feast with her. By accepting her offer to partake in this religious meal, the youth joins her rejection of true worship and is himself led off to slaughter; the bed, linens and spices that were introduced as a sexual enticement end up taking on the odor of death (Clifford, 89) and leading to Sheol, the place where a person can neither praise nor worship God (Ps 6:5; 115:17) and where wisdom cannot be known (Eccles 9:10). An improper attitude is denounced with regard to those who make a vow rashly and only in retrospect investigate the propriety of it (Prov 20:25). Similarly, treating a vow made to God so lightly as to never get around to paying it is reckoned as foolishness (Eccles 5:4-5).

4. The Writings and Worship.

As we have seen, Psalms provides the language to be used in public and private worship, and the wisdom books usually view worship in terms of practical piety. Considered in a broad sense, the Writings—particularly Chronicles, Ezra, Nehemiah—often center worship in the temple cult as developed by *David and *Solomon. The narrower delineation that this dictionary gives to the Writings, however, leaves us with books that add little to our theology of worship, as their authors were concerned with other issues.

Through its delineation of God’s providential care for normal people, the book of *Ruth shows how a foreigner can become one with God’s people (Ruth 1:16) and be recognized as an equal with Rachel, Leah and Tamar (Ruth 4:11-12). Even so, although the characters refer to Yahweh in prayer, greetings and blessings, no explicit acts of worship are detailed. The only worship act that may be discernable in the book of *Esther is fasting, as elsewhere in the Bible this act usually accompanies prayer to God (Esther 4:3, 16; 9:31). The only other link to Jewish worship is found in the book’s introduction of the Feast of *Purim, which was added to the other festivals at this point in Israel’s history (Esther 9:20-32).

Read as poetry about the love between man and woman, *Song of Songs says nothing about the worship of God, whose name is never mentioned in the book. The only possible way to derive teaching about worship from this poem is to treat it as an allegory about the love between Yahweh and Israel or between Christ and the church—an approach that finds few followers today. Those who use the allegorical approach are left to speculate whether worship or some other aspect of the relationship between God and his people is in view.

Bemoaning the destruction of Jerusalem and Judah’s loss of sovereignty as a people, the book of *Lamentations responds to the end of the worship of Yahweh in the land. Foreigners who had been forbidden a part in the assembly have entered the sanctuary and carried off its treasure (Lam 1:10). Pilgrims no longer come to Jerusalem for the appointed feasts (Lam 1:4). The Lord has himself destroyed the temple, allowing foreigners to shout there as Israel had on feast days (Lam 2:6-7). Priests and prophets have been murdered in the sanctuary, in at least some cases because of their own sin (Lam 2:20; 4:13). At a time when the cultic worship that they had known was no more, Lamentations gives the Jews a means in which to cry out to Yahweh for help and express hope that he would yet have compassion on them (Lam 3:21-26, 31-32). It encourages its readers to examine their ways, confess their sin and rebellion, and return to the Lord (Lam 3:40-42). In this way, it witnesses that worship should not be simply equated with praise and joy. There are times for God’s people to approach him in a somber mood, singing songs in a minor key as they acknowledge their sin or face desperate economic or political situations.

See also CULT, WORSHIP; PSALMS; CULT, WORSHIP; WISDOM; DIVINE PRESENCE; FORM CRITICISM; MEGILLOT AND FESTIVALS; MUSIC, SONG.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. R. J. Clifford, Proverbs (OTL; Louisville: Westminster John Knox, 1999); N. B. Courtman, “Sacrifice in the Psalms,” in Sacrifice in the Bible, ed. R. T. Beckwith and M. J. Selman (Grand Rapids: Baker; Carlisle: Paternoster, 1995) 41-58; E. M. Curtis, “Ancient Psalms and

- Modern Worship,” BSac 154 (1997) 285-96; J. Goldingay, Psalms, 1: Psalms 1-41 (BCOTWP; Grand Rapids: Baker Academic, 2006); H. Gunkel, with J. Begrich, Introduction to Psalms: The Genres of the Religious Lyric of Israel (Macon, GA: Mercer University Press, 1998); H.-J. Kraus, Worship in Israel: A Cultic History of the Old Testament, (Richmond: John Knox, 1966); P. D. Miller, “Enthroned on the Praises of Israel: The Praise of God in Old Testament Theology,” Int 39 (1985) 5-19; S. Mowinckel, The Psalms in Israel’s Worship (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 2004); R. E. Murphy, “The Psalms and Worship,” Ex auditu 8 (1992): 23-31; W. Riley, King and Cultus in Chronicles: Worship and the Reinterpretation of History (JSOTSup 160; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1993); A. P. Ross, Recalling the Hope of Glory: Biblical Worship from the Garden to the New Creation (Grand Rapids: Kregel, 2006); H. H. Rowley, Worship in Ancient Israel (London: SPCK; Philadelphia: Fortress, 1967); C. Westermann, Praise and Lament in the Psalms (Atlanta: John Knox, 1981); idem, “עֶבֶד ‘ebed. Servant,” TLOT 2.819-32. W. McConnell

X, Y, Z

XERXES. See AHASUERUS; ESTHER 2: EXTRABIBLICAL BACKGROUND; VASHTI.

ZION

Zion, a place name often synonymous with Jerusalem, is located on the south side of Jerusalem and typically is associated with the Temple Mount. Zion often represents the location of the sanctuary situated on an elevated location in southern Jerusalem. The term occurs thirty-eight times in *Psalms and once in *Song of Songs; otherwise, the word is noticeably absent from the wisdom writings of *Job, *Proverbs and *Ecclesiastes. In prophetic poetry, Isaiah employs the term frequently (47x), and, combined with a number of occurrences in Jeremiah and *Lamentations (32x), it clearly denotes the preferred status of Zion and the theological significance of the designation to the southern kingdom. The construct chain har šīyyôn (“mountain of Zion”) refers to the Temple Mount itself, where God dwells, while the singular phrase bat šīyyôn (“daughter of Zion”) figuratively denotes God’s people, as the inhabitants of the holy city. The plural form bēnôt šīyyôn (“daughters of Zion”) is another designation for the virgins or women of Israel who compose a wedding procession following King *Solomon in anticipation of a royal wedding.

1. Etymology and Location
2. Inviolability of Zion
3. Zion as a Political Entity in the Psalter
4. The Symbolic Significance of Zion in the Psalms
5. Zion in the Songs of Ascent (Pss 120—134)
6. Zion in Psalms of Exile and Restoration
7. Zion in Lamentations

1. Etymology and Location.

The etymology of the name is uncertain. “Zion” may derive from the Hebrew root šīyyôn (“castle”), from Arabic šanâ (“protect” or “citadel”) or from the root šīyyâ (“dry land”) (HALOT, 1022). The earlier formulation of the term in the biblical text identifies Zion in terms of a stronghold or fortress (2 Sam 5:7) and connects it with the Jebusite fortress southeast of Jerusalem, below Ophel, probably reinforcing the notion of a place of protection.

2. Inviolability of Zion.

In the Psalter the designation Zion often occurs in parallelism with Jerusalem, reinforcing the notion that the Israelites understood the two as synonymous. However, L. Hoppe (24) notes distinctions between the two designations: “Jerusalem refers to the royal city of the Davidic monarchy, which includes the Temple. Zion specifically refers to the mountain of God’s temple. The two terms encompass the city’s role as the political and religious center of Judah.” In some poetic texts Zion refers to the entire city of Jerusalem, and in several instances to those who inhabit Jerusalem. First and foremost, then, Zion denotes the location of Yahweh’s dwelling place and immediate presence, symbolizing a place of security or safety (Ps 46:4-5; 76:2-3). Consequently, the inviolability of Zion serves as a hallmark feature of the Zion tradition (Hayes, 419-20).

The concept of Zion’s inviolability claims that as the location of Yahweh’s presence, Zion is exempt from domination or conquest by foreign leaders (Ps 46:5-6). The belief in Zion’s inviolability affected the military and political decisions rendered before the exile. Yahweh will not allow his holy city to fall into the hands of Israel’s adversaries (Ps 46:8-11; 48:4-8; 76:4-9). When enemies recognize Yahweh as the defender of Zion, they retreat (Ps 48:4-8). Psalm 76, a poem that describes the victories of Zion's king, depicts Zion's impenetrability in terms of Yahweh's destruction of battle equipment, followed by his subjugation of nations threatening Jerusalem (Ps 76:2-3). In Psalm 76:3 the poet declares that Yahweh destroyed the "weapons of war," metaphorically conveying the totality of God's victory over Zion's enemies. Many of the community lament psalms (Pss 50; 75—78; 80—83) that address national defeat depict Zion in its military context, expressing confidence in the Lord's victory over the adversaries that have persecuted and oppressed the nation. All opposing forces are rendered impotent against the city defended by Yahweh, establishing God's reputation among the potentates of enemy nations as "one to be feared."

3. Zion as a Political Entity in the Psalter.

Psalm 2 depicts the threat of foreign nations gathered against Yahweh's divinely appointed king. Yahweh anoints his earthly king and enthrones him in Zion (Ps 2:6), Yahweh's "holy mountain," and accomplishes victory by means of an earthly king. Zion ultimately denotes the "dwelling place" of Yahweh, but it may also indirectly signify the throne of an individual through whom Yahweh effects his will. The poet of Psalm 20 characterizes Zion as the source for help and support by means of an earthly king (Ps 20:2-3, 6). Yahweh's anointed serves then as a conduit through which flows Yahweh's help. In addition, the psalmist describes Yahweh as a refuge for the oppressed who "reigns on Zion," avenging the blood of society's marginalized and executing righteousness for the weak and vulnerable (Ps 9:9-12; 10:14).

4. The Symbolic Significance of Zion in the Psalms.

Although Zion's altitude does not exceed other locations surrounding Jerusalem, the concept corresponds with the ancient Canaanite belief that the mountains were the home of the gods. Mount Zion is associated with Mount Zaphon (Ps 48:2 NIV), the mythical mountain upon which the Canaanite deity Baal dwells. The correspondence denotes Yahweh's cosmic and earthly conquest over chaos, just as the enthronement of Baal symbolized his cosmic victory over Mot in Ugaritic texts. The transformational significance of equating Mount Zion with Mount Zaphon asserts Yahweh's superiority over all other gods and places him in the position of authority in the ancient Near East. In addition, the Gihon spring running through God's city (Ps 46:4) reflects another mythical motif common in Canaanite iconography, since Genesis 2:13 identifies Gihon as one of four rivers that feed into Eden. Thus Israel integrated and adapted the ancient Canaanite imagery in its conceptual formulations and expressions, applying the ideology to cultic language describing Zion in illustrious terms but without appropriating the theological significance.

Furthermore, the idea that the ark of the covenant represented the throne of Yahweh originates from the Canaanite concept of El seated on a throne surrounded by cherubim, typical imagery in the ancient Near East. Psalm 99:1-2 reflects the link between the Israelite cult and Yahweh's kingship, describing Yahweh as "sitting among the cherubim" in Zion. The psalmist describes the royal role of Yahweh, who dwells in Zion, as one of creator and defender (Ps 65:1, 6-7). Psalm 78:54 reaffirms the central claim that Yahweh established the borders of the "holy land," while Psalm 78:60 asserts Yahweh's election of Judah as the place where he erected "his sanctuary," comparing his creation of Zion with the creation of the world (see Creation Theology). Psalm 50:2 expands the concept of Zion, which further symbolizes the ideal of creation "perfect in beauty" and from which Yahweh's presence shines forth (see Divine Presence). Ultimately, Zion becomes the place from which Yahweh's blessings and judgments flow, and as such, Zion is depicted as the center, or "navel of the earth."

B. Ollenburger (15) maintains that the development of Zion as a symbol derives from early associations of the place with the kingship of Yahweh and the ark of the covenant rather than deriving from a Davidic royal ideology, and that *David became associated with Zion later in Israelite history. Consequently, the development of the Zion tradition emanates from earlier Israelite conceptions concerning the ark at Shiloh and its subsequent transfer to Zion. Ollenburger bases this argument on multiple linkages between the themes of the "enthronement psalms" (Pss 47; 93—99) and Yahweh's presence in the holy city.

In addition, Ollenburger (41) examines phraseology such as "Yahweh of Hosts" and "God of Jacob" as formulations connected to the ark tradition, observing that the employment of these designations by David in Jerusalem seems unlikely, so their usage affirms the preeminent and central role of the ark related to Zion. Ollenburger (64) contends that the “symbol of Zion was employed in utter detachment from the earthly king,” and that Psalms 46; 48; 76 do not mention the monarchy or David. Clearly, the Zion psalms mention a human king infrequently in order to emphasize the kingship of Yahweh. Moreover, whereas the psalmist refers to Zion as the “city of God” in Psalms 46:4; 48:1, the book of 2 Samuel identifies Zion as the “city of David” immediately after the ark is established in its permanent central sanctuary in Jerusalem (see Ollenburger, 63).

S. Gillingham (316-17, 323) appeals to a variety of Zion markers in her identification of psalms that advance the Zion tradition. Among these markers, monikers such as “the mountain of the Lord,” “my holy mountain,” “holy place,” “dwelling place,” “sanctuary” and “city of God” represent characteristic features consistent with references to Zion, even if the enveloping poem does not explicitly refer to Zion. Linguistic criteria alone cannot determine whether certain psalms that omit the designation “Zion” advance the impetus of a well-developed Zion tradition, although in some cases conceptual ideas informing the connections between Jerusalem, the temple and Zion create an integrated network of semiotic ideas present in Israel’s early history.

Furthermore, Psalm 65 relates Yahweh’s redemptive activity with his presence in Zion. The community seeks to praise Yahweh because he “forgave our transgressions” and prospered Zion (Ps 65:3). In addition, Psalm 102:13 expresses confidence that Yahweh will “show favor” and “have compassion” on Zion through the reconstruction of the devastated city. He sends forth his support and help from Zion (Ps 20:2) through the “mighty salvation of his right hand” (Ps 20:6). The poet laments in Psalm 14:7 (cf. Ps 53:6), beseeching Yahweh to “restore the fortunes of his people.” In anticipation of Yahweh’s rescue, the psalmist gives voice to his hopes for Israel in Psalm 69:35, confident that Yahweh “will save Zion” and “rebuild the cities of Judah,” so the displaced people may return and settle there. The poet understands that only Yahweh can prosper Zion and build up its walls of protection (Ps 51:18). The restoration of Zion allows Yahweh to dwell there once more (Ps 102:16) and exalts Yahweh as deliverer and protector, bringing glory to his name (Ps 102:21).

Zion typically represents the dwelling place of God among his elect people, but in Psalm 87 the poet acknowledges *worship of Yahweh on Zion in cosmological terms, envisioning the procession of foreign nations to Zion to worship Yahweh. All the nations of the world will find refuge and strength in God’s sanctuary if they are obedient to him. The exclusionary view of Yahweh as Israel’s God finds expanded expression in this unusual psalm, eschatological in nature, which claims that people from all over the world can identify Zion as their place of origin. The worldwide dimensions of Yahweh’s rule and authority ensure his mercy and compassion on all of his creatures. The universal scope of the psalm is atypical of the collection, though the concept finds development in Isaianic prophecies (Is 2:2-4; 49:6; 54:1; 55:5, 11). Concomitantly, Gillingham (328) would like to claim that Psalms 93–100, which herald the kingship of Yahweh (see Kingship Psalms), send a message of reassurance to a disheartened postexilic community that Zion will be the place of reunification with God. D. Howard disagrees, arguing persuasively for an overall preexilic provenance for the collection, based on linguistic, conceptual, thematic and historical criteria.

Gillingham (311) argues that the redactional activity by temple personnel is apparent in the “didactic concerns” of the editors to educate an illiterate population and explains the eschatological tone of poems as an intentional means of associating the return of God to Zion with the cosmological scope of his reign. K. Seybold and others affirm the northern provenance of many psalms, suggesting a lack of connection to the temple cult. Gillingham (312) acknowledges that the Zion tradition does not permeate and govern all of the psalms, but she believes that the emphasis on Zion superintends the final editing of the Psalter.

Zion is the place where heaven and earth meet. Consequently, Zion serves as the place where Yahweh encounters his people. Hoppe (29) observes the contrast between Exodus 19, which depicts Yahweh as unapproachable on Mount Sinai, and the accessibility of Yahweh at Zion, where his presence dwells among his people. Israel made regular pilgrimages to the religious shrine of Zion to worship Yahweh (Ps 84:7), bringing gifts of thanksgiving or offerings to accompany specific requests. Three times a year the male population was required to make a pilgrimage to Jerusalem, but the journey was seen as a source of rejoicing rather than a burdensome obligation.

5. Zion in the Songs of Ascent (Pss 120—134).

P. Satterthwaite (106) observes that the “restoration of Zion and Yahweh’s purposes for her” unify the Songs of Ascent, each psalm casting a distinctive light on the significance of Zion for the faith community. Although not every psalm in the collection uses the designation Zion, the underlying themes of the poems clearly underscore the emphasis on Zion, first as the place to encounter Yahweh in worship, and second as the eschatological expectation as the location of the ideal kingdom. Zion is a center of peace, and the absence of warfare language minimizes Zion’s political significance in the ancient Near East. The Songs of Ascent reinforce Zion as the place from where Yahweh’s blessings emanate, thus associating prosperity centralized in Zion with the pilgrimage to Jerusalem.

In the Songs of Ascent Zion continues to serve as the focus of Yahweh’s protection and provision for his people despite the community’s fears that Yahweh has abandoned them. In the face of national dispersion and disaster the psalmist envisions Zion as the official place of worship for a unified Israel. The people will enjoy blessing corporately and individually if they seek God’s presence in his sanctuary. The poet builds the anticipation of a discouraged nation, directing their hopes toward a future fulfillment of Yahweh’s promises and undergirding his original commitment to them.

Psalm 122 appeals to Yahweh to remember Jerusalem as a place of safety, placing the hopes of Yahweh’s people in the restoration of Zion as their haven of refuge. At this point in Israel’s early history Jerusalem and Zion have become inextricably linked as one entity. Gillingham (320) suggests that the intermittent mentions of Zion in the Songs of Ascent have been strategically located in the middle of each of three separate collections (Pss 120—124; 125—129; 130—134) as a governing device that enables the reader to apprehend the central theme of Zion’s restoration.

Psalm 125:1 depicts Mount Zion as immovable and established in eternity, associating the omnipotence and eternality of Yahweh’s kingship with the imagery. The emphasis in Psalm 125:1-2 centers on Yahweh’s power to protect his people rather than his military might. Similarly, the overall tone of the Songs of Ascent contrasts with that of other “Zion psalms” (Pss 2; 46; 48; 96; 97; 99), the former reinforcing Zion as a place of restoration and security, the latter underscoring Yahweh’s rule over the nations (Satterthwaite, 121). In particular, Psalms 2; 46; 48 describe the threat of foreign attacks against Zion and Yahweh’s swift response of victory (Satterthwaite, 122).

Psalm 126:1 recollects the return of the captives to Zion, both as a physical location and as a metaphorical state of security and prosperity. The joy that pervades the community permeates the hymn, which praises Yahweh and seeks his continued provision. The song poignantly expresses the mourning of God’s people and their subsequent return to the land as a fulfillment of their hope in Yahweh’s deliverance and the tangible realization of their return as a manifestation of their special relationship to God as his covenant people.

Psalm 128 envisions Zion as the source of Yahweh’s blessings and as the center from which Yahweh’s prosperity originates. The pilgrimage to Zion serves to praise Yahweh for his intervention on Israel’s behalf while concomitantly guaranteeing the continued fecundity of the land and the proliferation of descendants. The blessing of eternal life through the filial dynasty emanates from Zion, which is characterized as the place where the “dew of Mount Hermon” falls (Ps 133:3).

Psalms 132—134 solidify the connection between the ark tradition and the Davidic dynasty. Psalm 132 depicts the first procession of the ark and the ushering in of Yahweh’s presence in Zion, led by David. The poet recollects that initial procession as the catalyst for national hope (Ps 132:9) and the restoration of a Davidic descendant on the throne (Ps 132:10). The second half of Psalm 132 articulates the divine response, reasserting Yahweh’s faithfulness to his promises to Zion and David while concomitantly affirming Yahweh’s election of Zion and the Davidic lineage. The psalm represents a further theological development, inextricably linking Davidic rule with Zion as Yahweh’s resting place (cf. Ps 78:68; 1 Sam 7). Whereas Psalm 89 articulates God’s promise to the perpetual reign of David’s posterity, Psalm 132 associates Davidic reign with obedience to the Torah (Ps 132:12).

6. Zion in Psalms of Exile and Restoration.

Several psalms derive from the exile or the post-exilic period and express the disappointments and despair troubling God's people following the captivity. Since Judah associated Zion with security and protection, the destruction of the city and the desecration of the temple evoked a sense of abandonment and fear. One exilic poem, Psalm 74, begins by rousing Yahweh to remember his people as the "tribe of his inheritance" and to recollect Zion as his dwelling place. The nation was disillusioned after the Babylonian invasion of Judah and perceived the defeat of Jerusalem and Zion as representing the departure of Yahweh from among his people and his rejection of them. The poet describes in detail the pillaging and violence exacted in the sanctuary and then appeals to God as creator and great victor over the evil forces of chaos, employing the motif of the divine warrior. On the basis of Yahweh's previous intervention on their behalf, the community beseeches Yahweh to aid them by eliminating their oppressors and restoring Zion (Ps 79).

The despair of Yahweh's people in the foreign land of Babylon receives its clearest expression in Psalm 137, which describes the deepest grief and longings of the exiles, who were taunted by their captors to sing "songs of Zion" that exalted Yahweh and his compassion toward his people and that highlighted the superiority of God and his election of Israel. The departure of God's presence and the separation of the captives from their homeland are juxtaposed with the call for vengeance upon the adversaries that decimated Jerusalem and defiled the temple.

Psalm 147 celebrates the rebuilding of Jerusalem and the return of its inhabitants. Depicted in terms of healing and forgiveness, the remnant of Israel expresses a renewed sense of God's providence through the regathering of their people in their homeland. The poet draws on a phrase from Isaiah 40 to acknowledge that Yahweh has not abandoned his elect, and that he will allow none of them to evade his grasp. The supply of rain for Jerusalem is significant because the city has no regular water source for irrigation and relies solely on the elements for the production of crops. Following their release by Persia, the community reaffirms their trust in Yahweh and praises his deliverance. God is strengthening the protective bars of the gates of Zion (Ps 147:13), figuratively denoting the restoration of security to the precincts of Judah and especially of Jerusalem. Peace attends the city and the return of Yahweh's presence among its citizens. The concluding poems of the Psalter rejoice in Yahweh's eternal reign in Zion (Ps 146:10; 149:2).

7. Zion in Lamentations.

The book of Lamentations, an extended funeral dirge, mourns the capture and devastation of Jerusalem, the temple and the surrounding areas of Judah. Zion appears twice as the location of cultic worship and practice (Lam 1:4; 2:6). Zion no longer serves as the central gathering location for national cultic celebrations and sacrifices following the destruction of Solomon's temple and the subsequent departure of Yahweh's "glory" from his dwelling place (Lam 1:6; 2:1).

In a few instances the writer addresses Jerusalem affectionately as a mourning "daughter" (Lam 2:15, 18) who has suffered the loss of her children (Lam 1:15-17) and currently experiences punishment for her disobedience (Lam 4:22). The "elders" of the city sit silently (Lam 2:10). In addition, the "daughter of Zion" specifically refers to the city of Jerusalem, the walls that have been compromised (Lam 2:8; 4:11; cf. Lam 2:18), leaving the political and religious capital vulnerable. The violation of women in and around Zion reflects the danger to those citizens left behind (Lam 5:11). The single mention of "Mount Zion" (Lam 5:18) as a desolate haunt for wild animals reinforces the notion of abandonment.

Lamentations 3, sung from a male perspective, does not refer to Zion, while Lamentations 4 contains the only mention of "sons of Zion" (Lam 4:2), a metaphor depicting the desperate circumstances of Yahweh's people as starving "children" born during Jerusalem's invasion. The hopeful conclusion of the book anticipates the deliverance of the "daughter of Zion" from captivity and envisions her eventual restoration (Lam 4:22). Nevertheless, the writer admonishes the people to remember that the exile represents God's judgment for Israel's sin.

See also ARCHITECTURAL IMAGERY; CONFIDENCE, PSALMS OF; DIVINE PRESENCE; MOUNTAIN

IMAGERY; PROTECTION IMAGERY; WARFARE IMAGERY.

BIBLIOGRAPHY. S. Gillingham, "The Zion Tradition and the Editing of the Hebrew Psalter," in Temple and Worship in Biblical Israel, ed. J. Day (LHBOTS 422; London: T & T Clark, 2005) 308-40; J. H. Hayes, "The Tradition of Zion's Inviolability," JBL 82 (1963) 419-26; L. J. Hoppe, The Holy City: Jerusalem in the Theology of the Old Testament (Collegeville, MN: Liturgical Press, 2000); D. M. Howard Jr., The Structure of Psalms 93-100 (BJSUCSD 5; Winona Lake, IN: Eisenbrauns, 1997); A. G. Hunter, "Yahweh Comes Home to Zion: The Psalms of Ascent," in Psalms (OTR; London: Routledge, 1999) 173-258; W. H. Mare, "Zion," ABD 6.1096-97; D. C. Mitchell, The Message of the Psalter: An Eschatological Programme in the Book of Psalms (JSOTSup 252; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1999); B. C. Ollenburger, Zion: The City of the Great King (JSOTSup 41; Sheffield: Sheffield Academic Press, 1987); T. Renna, "Zion and Jerusalem in the Psalms," in Augustine: Biblical Exegete, ed. F. Van Fleteren and J. C. Schnaubelt (Collectanea Augustiniana; New York: Peter Lang, 2001) 279-98; J. J. Roberts, "Zion in the Theology of the Davidic-Solomonic Empire," in Studies in the Period of David and Solomon: Papers Read at the International Symposium for Biblical Studies, Tokyo, 5-7 December, 1979, ed. T. Ishida (Winona Lake, IN: Eisenbrauns, 1982) 93-108; P. E. Satterthwaite, "Zion in the Songs of Ascent," in Zion: City of Our God, ed. R. Hess and G. Wenham (Grand Rapids: Eerdmans, 1999) 129-69; K. Seybold, Introducing the Psalms (Edinburgh: T & T Clark, 1990).

S. L. Klouda

Scripture Index

Old Testament	7:9, 195	31:40, 159	260, 261, 262,	33:3, 328	25:47-49, 379	35:19, 379
	7:11, 47, 321	31:42, 201	506	33:12—34:26,	25:47-50, 680,	36, 209
	7:16, 195	31:53, 201	15:1, 618, 889	459, 462	685	36:1-12, 381
Genesis	7:22, 432	32:22-32, 315	15:1-18, 619	34, 581	26, 461, 535
1, 47, 48, 53, 54,	8:2, 47, 321	33:3, 479	15:2, 762	34:6-7, 408, 434,	26:12, 762	Deuteronomy
69, 70, 194,	8:21, 382	33:13, 12	15:3, 831	817	26:14-39, 316	1:1, 241
248, 304, 602	9:4, 431	33:19, 344	15:4, 889	34:24, 74	26:19, 159	1:1—21:9, 863
1—2, 274, 855	10:9, 534	35:19, 679	15:5, 889	34:26, 113	26:19-20, 681	1:2-5, 241
1—3, 62, 816,	10:23, 371, 428	36, 363	15:10, 889	35:30-31, 872	26:38, 100	1:6, 241
872	10:25, 676, 680	36:10-11, 371	15:11, 115	35:35, 902	26:40-41, 408	1:25, 195
1—11, 857, 876	11:4, 196	36:28, 371	15:12, 889	40:15, 466		1:34, 195
1:1, 464, 502, 796	11:10-26, 676,	37—50, 206, 678	15:13, 382	Leviticus	Numbers	1:35, 195
1:1—2:3, 69, 228	680, 693	38, 213, 240, 379,	15:13-16, 930	1:3, 14	3:1, 676	1:44, 843
1:2, 48, 51, 771	11:18-19, 676	519, 693, 698	15:14-15, 166	1:10, 14	3:7-8, 931	2:25, 201
1:4, 194	12, 698	38:8, 680	15:17, 328	1:14, 14	5:8, 379	3, 859
1:6-7, 502	12:1, 680	38:11, 21	15:21, 618	2:2, 620, 931	5:11-31, 76	3:25, 195
1:6-8, 321	12:2-3, 701	39, 544	17:7, 714	2:9, 620	5:12-15, 509	4, 115
1:7-8, 43	12:3, 734, 857	39—41, 320	17:8-16, 165, 463	2:16, 620	6:4-5, 712	4:5-6, 877
1:10, 194	12:4, 196	39:4, 931	17:14, 463, 477	5:4, 424	6:22-26, 458, 460	4:6, 845, 878, 887
1:12, 194	12:10, 680	40—41, 877	18:21, 201	5:12, 620	6:22-27, 796	4:6-7, 725
1:18, 194	14, 372, 469	40:15, 321	19, 218, 938	7:11-18, 73	6:24-26, 526, 528	4:9-10, 861
1:20, 431	14:18, 122	41:37-45, 624	19—20, 460	7:12, 73	6:25, 117	4:10, 541
1:21, 46, 194	14:18-19, 407	42:7, 159	19:1, 460	8, 139	10:4, 428	4:12, 712
1:25, 194	15, 258	43:32, 159	19:6, 22	8:12, 139	10:9-10, 616	4:15, 712
1:26, 196, 814	16, 209	48:7, 679	19:7-8, 460	8:15, 527	10:35, 72	4:19, 117
1:26-27, 194, 312,	17:1, 856	49, 506	19:8, 196	10:35-36, 72, 920	4:19-20, 114, 115	4:35, 115
856	17:23, 196	49:8-10, 693	20, 231	10:11, 895	10:36, 72	4:39, 115
1:28, 457	18, 196	49:8-12, 467	20—24, 228	11:7, 17	12:3, 614	4:41-43, 389
1:31, 69, 194	18:17, 196	49:11, 510	20:3, 199	11:44, 197	12:6, 883	5, 231
2, 68, 195, 872	18:19, 196	49:25, 44	20:5-6, 434	12:1-4, 732	12:8, 712	5:21, 22
2—3, 68, 194,	19:1, 732	50:20, 256	20:17, 199	12:3, 616	14:18, 408	5:29, 201
195, 211, 456,	19:19, 248	Exodus	20:18-21, 861	14:2-7, 617	15:34, 320	5:31, 421, 541
768	19:30-38, 680	1, 261	20:22—23:33,	15:19-30, 214	15:39, 141, 637	6:1, 421
2:4, 676	19:37, 330	2:24-25, 646	196	16:8, 617	16, 26, 234	6:4-6, 725
2:6-15, 113	20:3, 883	3:1—4:17, 396	20:26, 620	16:18, 527	16:30-33, 100	6:4-9, 855, 895
2:7, 431, 910	20:11, 860	3:11, 166	21:12-14, 389	18:16, 454	16:32, 26	6:5, 194
2:9, 433, 872	21, 685	3:12, 930	21:13, 321	19:2, 857	21—25, 700	6:20-24, 231
2:13, 937	21:4, 196	3:21-22, 889	21:13-14, 525	19:9-10, 680, 691,	22, 716	7, 490
2:15, 196	22:17, 23	4:10, 166	21:17, 316, 422	702	22—24, 315	7:1-4, 190
2:18, 457	23, 730	4:13, 166	22:16-17, 424	19:18, 194, 199	22:1-6, 490	7:3-4, 680
2:18-25, 456	23:7, 479	4:23, 930	22:22-24, 910	19:36, 197, 910	22:22, 714, 715	7:11, 421
2:24, 451, 452,	24:27, 680	5:22—6:8, 396	23, 581	20:9, 316	22:32, 714, 715	8:6, 861
454, 680	24:28, 213	6:1, 428	23:14-19, 459	20:24-26, 49	23, 261	9:26, 617
3, 141, 195, 202,	24:60, 23	6:7, 701	23:16, 74, 461	22:13, 21	23—24, 506	9:26-27, 183
254, 433, 813	25:14, 264, 428,	6:12, 166	23:20-33, 114	22:26—23:44,	23:7, 158	10:12-13, 725,
3:1, 68	429, 867, 878	6:30, 166	24, 113	462	24:17, 467	861
3:6, 857	25:23, 315	7:9-12, 46	24:7, 196	23, 139, 581	25:1, 455, 490	10:17, 115
3:14-19, 680	26:1, 680	7:16, 930	24:10, 114	23:9-22, 459	25:8, 455	10:17-18, 910
3:15, 820	26:5, 196	8:1, 930	25:6, 466	23:15-21, 680	26:9-11, 234	11:1, 421
3:16, 680	26:24, 815	9:20, 365	28:41, 466	23:22, 691	26:33, 381	11:19, 541
3:18, 68, 69	27, 315	9:30, 201	29:7, 466	23:23-44, 74	27, 209	11:22, 861
3:19, 432	27:12, 159	11:2-3, 889	30:23, 221	23:24, 616	27:1-11, 381, 692	12:3, 213
3:22, 195	27:29, 479	12, 458	30:30, 466	23:39, 461	27:21, 850	12:12, 684
5, 676, 680	28, 228	12:21-51, 459	31:1-3, 872	23:42-43, 462	28:16-25, 459	12:18, 684
5:1-32, 693	28:20, 159	12:35-36, 889	31:1-5, 877	24:7, 620, 931	28:19-25, 459	13, 194
5:21-24, 676, 680	29—31, 206	12:36, 166	31:3-5, 902	24:12, 320	28:26, 459	14:1, 410
5:22, 679, 856	29:15, 930	13, 459	31:6, 902	25, 379, 380	28:26-31, 460	14:11, 18
5:24, 102, 679,	29:33, 206	14, 459	31:14, 317	25:3-4, 618	29, 461, 462	14:22—16:17,
726, 856	30:3, 426	14—15, 51	32:1—34:35, 396	25:23, 692	29:12-16, 462	459, 463
6:2, 113	30:3-4, 691	14:5, 867	32:6, 455	25:23-28, 425	29:35, 462	15:4-6, 421
6:4, 113	30:6, 206	14:28, 889	32:10, 328	25:25, 454	29:35—30:1, 463	16:9-12, 459
6:9, 856	30:14-16, 222	14:30, 889	32:12, 328, 395	25:25-28, 379,	30:16, 21	16:13, 731
6:22, 195	31:13, 683	15, 50, 230, 231,	32:18, 871	380, 680, 685	35:9-34, 321, 389	16:18, 389
7:2, 159	31:27, 618		32:32-33, 6	25:29-31, 379	35:10-34, 525
7:5, 195

16:20, 684	31:30, 619	21:19-24, 240	683, 690, 691, 702	3:16, 683	2:1, 385	5:17-25, 674
17:3, 114	32, 115, 218, 260, 261	21:25, 490, 681	2:2-3, 684, 686	3:16-18, 684, 686	2:1-10, 385	6, 73, 579, 620
17:7, 159	32—33, 506	Ruth	2:3, 681, 702	3:17, 33	2:6, 649	6:10-12, 616
17:8-13, 75, 389	32:1-44, 619	1, 217, 454, 490, 491, 492, 678, 694, 700	2:4, 258, 454, 682, 683	3:18, 679, 683, 824	2:6-10, 871	6:12-15, 920
17:14-20, 377, 378	32:8, 116	1—3, 699	2:4-16, 684, 686	4, 212, 381, 382, 401, 425, 454, 673, 682, 684, 692, 693, 697, 698, 699	2:10, 681	6:15, 73
18, 850	32:8-9, 113, 114, 115	1:1, 32, 490, 673, 677, 679, 680, 681, 687, 694, 700, 822	2:5, 33	4:1, 381, 682, 800	3:1-3, 685	7, 326, 452, 468, 470, 685
19:1-3, 321	32:10-12, 525	1:1-2, 494, 678, 686	2:6, 673, 680	4:1-2, 380, 682	4, 895	7:5-16, 127
19:1-13, 389	32:12, 115	1:1-3, 494	2:7, 800	4:1-6, 425	6:9, 681	7:9, 734
19:4-7, 379	32:13, 159	1:1-5, 676	2:8, 33	4:1-10, 684	9:1, 477	7:10, 326
19:14, 382, 422	32:17, 114, 115	1:1-6, 54, 96, 800	2:9, 922	4:1-12, 380, 677, 686, 730	9:21, 165	7:11, 734
20, 194	32:33, 46	1:1-12, 96, 800	2:10, 33	4:1-17, 686	10:1, 467	7:13, 734
21:1-8, 75	32:35, 117, 318	1:1-13, 683	2:10-11, 695	4:3, 380, 381, 425, 426, 692	10:1-2, 687	7:14, 326, 468
21:10-14, 684	32:39, 115	1:1-18, 703	2:11, 680, 683, 789, 922	4:3-4, 96, 800	10:5, 616	7:14-17, 326
21:18-21, 684	32:43, 113, 114	1:1-18, 703	2:11-12, 258, 494	4:3-6, 680	10:9-12, 877	7:15-16, 469
22:5, 633	33:1, 328	1:1-18, 703	2:12, 18, 33, 118, 258, 525, 526, 527, 681, 682, 684, 702, 922	4:4, 380, 425	10:11-12, 531	7:16, 734
22:21, 21	33:1-29, 619	1:1-18, 703	2:13, 33, 691, 922	4:5, 379, 380, 381, 425, 454, 673, 680, 821	10:12, 530, 534	7:19, 676
22:28-29, 424	33:16, 261	1:1-18, 703	2:13-23, 800	4:6, 101, 380, 381, 425, 682	11:1, 930	11—12, 398
23:3, 33, 330, 493	34, 241, 614	1:1-18, 703	2:14, 219, 220, 696	4:7, 265, 673, 674, 675, 677, 698, 789, 800	11:7, 201, 316	12, 76
23:3-5, 680	34:5-12, 579	1:1-18, 703	2:15-16, 299, 680, 731	4:7-8, 692, 693	12, 232	13, 455
23:3-6, 40, 490, 684	34:9, 877	1:1-18, 703	2:17, 219, 691	4:7-10, 680	12:3, 467	13:1, 736, 741
23:4, 490, 694, 695	Joshua	1:1-18, 703	2:18-23, 684	4:8, 696	12:5, 467	13:3, 902
24:1-5, 684	1, 232	1:1-18, 703	2:19-20, 491	4:9, 380, 922	12:14, 201, 302	14, 209, 914
24:19, 680, 691	1:5, 119	1:1-18, 703	2:20, 258, 379, 380, 516, 678, 680, 682	4:9-10, 380, 381, 679, 680	12:24, 201	14:2, 536
24:19-22, 702	1:8, 420	1:1-18, 703	2:21, 673, 680	4:10, 212, 379, 380, 381, 673, 680	13:8-15, 469	14:4, 479, 710
25, 379, 380	1:9, 119	1:1-18, 703	2:22, 219, 691, 822, 922	4:11, 21, 22, 683	14:51, 165	14:11, 379
25:1, 379	1:14, 32	1:1-18, 703	3, 491, 679, 703, 732	4:11-12, 380, 679, 684, 730, 934	15, 165, 240, 477	14:20, 734
25:5-10, 240, 379, 425, 454, 680, 684	2, 32	1:1-18, 703	3:1, 683	4:12, 21, 258, 683, 693	15:1-3, 165	15—17, 671
25:6, 379	5:2—6:1, 459	1:1-18, 703	3:1-4, 679	4:13, 258, 454, 679, 680, 681, 682, 684, 702	15:6-32, 923	15:10, 302
25:7, 379	6:24, 614	1:1-18, 703	3:1-5, 380, 686	4:13-17, 676, 686, 692	15:7, 467	15:31, 671
25:8-10, 692	6:26, 316	1:1-18, 703	3:1-6, 684	4:14, 258, 299, 381, 683	15:8-9, 463	16:23, 882
25:9, 379	6:27, 459	1:1-18, 703	3:1-7, 683	4:14-15, 679, 922	15:22, 870	18:28, 479
25:11-12, 842	7:13, 831	1:1-18, 703	3:1-8, 800	4:15, 679, 683, 703	16, 467	19:23, 714
25:13-16, 910	10:1, 122	1:1-18, 703	3:1-9, 680	4:16, 426	16:13-14, 118	19:30, 380
25:15, 422	11:23, 687	1:1-18, 703	3:1-18, 686	4:17, 299, 381, 426, 674, 676, 679, 682, 698, 703	16:14-23, 579, 614, 669	19:40—20:2, 673
25:17-19, 165, 477	20:1-9, 321, 379, 389	1:1-18, 703	3:1-18, 686	4:17-22, 674, 822	16:16-23, 616	20:3, 321
26:1-11, 393	23, 232	1:1-18, 703	3:1-18, 686	4:18, 680	16:18, 32, 674	22, 614, 797
26:5, 231	24, 75	1:1-18, 703	3:1-18, 686	4:18-22, 490, 673, 676, 686	17, 840	22:1, 615, 734
26:16-17, 421	24:2, 231	1:1-18, 703	3:1-18, 686	4:19, 380, 922	17:12, 679	22:3, 527
27—28, 535	24:14-24, 931	1:1-18, 703	3:1-18, 686	4:20, 212, 379, 380, 381, 673, 680	17:43, 314	22:4, 930
27:11-26, 316	24:32, 344	1:1-18, 703	3:1-18, 686	4:21, 679, 680, 681, 682, 684, 702	18:10, 616	22:11, 527
27:16, 316	Judges	1:1-18, 703	3:1-18, 686	4:22, 299, 789	18:14, 674	22:12, 262
27:17, 382	1:1, 687	1:1-18, 703	3:1-18, 686	4:23, 299, 789	18:14-15, 618	23, 91
28—29, 813	3:7-11, 687	1:1-18, 703	3:1-18, 686	4:24, 258, 299, 381, 683	19, 209	23:1-7, 614
28:1-14, 421	3:12-30, 694, 697, 700	1:1-18, 703	3:1-18, 686	4:25, 679, 683, 703	19:9, 616	23:5, 326
28:15-48, 32	4—5, 51	1:1-18, 703	3:1-18, 686	4:26, 679, 683, 703	19:24, 531	23:14, 525
28:15-68, 316, 421	4:14, 831	1:1-18, 703	3:1-18, 686	4:27, 299, 381, 426, 674, 676, 679, 682, 698, 703	21:10, 614	23:17, 234
28:16, 796	5, 230, 261, 262, 506, 536, 808	1:1-18, 703	3:1-18, 686	4:28, 299, 789	21:12—23:1, 614	24:11, 882
28:20, 100	5:7, 265	1:1-18, 703	3:1-18, 686	4:29, 380, 922	22—24, 525	24:22, 731
28:23-24, 681	5:12, 618	1:1-18, 703	3:1-18, 686	4:30, 380, 454	23, 850	1 Kings
28:37, 532	6—9, 678	1:1-18, 703	3:1-18, 686	4:31, 679, 680, 681, 682, 684, 702	24:8, 479	1—2, 674
28:54, 12	6:37, 159	1:1-18, 703	3:1-18, 686	4:32, 299, 789	24:13, 429, 529, 534	1—11, 671, 733, 737
28:63, 100	8:2, 534	1:1-18, 703	3:1-18, 686	4:33, 299, 789	25:16, 528	1:11, 302, 303
29:25, 114	8:14, 718, 895	1:1-18, 703	3:1-18, 686	4:34, 299, 789	26:10, 619	1:13, 302
29:29, 816	8:21, 534	1:1-18, 703	3:1-18, 686	4:35, 299, 789	26:19, 316	1:16, 479
30, 813	9:15, 527	1:1-18, 703	3:1-18, 686	4:36, 299, 789	27:1-3, 614	1:18, 302, 303
30:1-4, 408	12:8-10, 694, 697	1:1-18, 703	3:1-18, 686	4:37, 299, 789	28:6, 850, 883	1:40, 616
30:11-16, 725	14:5, 311	1:1-18, 703	3:1-18, 686	4:38, 299, 789	28:17, 118	1:50, 527
30:11-20, 725	17, 374	1:1-18, 703	3:1-18, 686	4:39, 380, 493, 680, 683, 691, 922	29:4, 714	1:50-51, 527
30:15, 226	17:1, 679	1:1-18, 703	3:1-18, 686	4:40, 299, 789	30:22, 157, 159	1:50-53, 525
30:15-20, 861	17:7-8, 679	1:1-18, 703	3:1-18, 686	4:41, 299, 789	2 Samuel	1:52-53, 733
30:17-19, 316	17:9, 679	1:1-18, 703	3:1-18, 686	4:42, 299, 789	1, 579	2:6, 733, 902
31:10-13, 462	18:30, 795	1:1-18, 703	3:1-18, 686	4:43, 299, 789	1:17-27, 384, 400, 401, 669	2:13-23, 209
31:18, 160, 188	19:1, 679	1:1-18, 703	3:1-18, 686	4:44, 299, 789	1:19-27, 72, 476, 620	2:28, 527
31:19, 619, 620	19:2-3, 21	1:1-18, 703	3:1-18, 686	4:45, 299, 789	3:33-34, 400	2:28-34, 525
31:22, 620	19:16, 730	1:1-18, 703	3:1-18, 686	4:46, 299, 789	5:6-7, 23	3, 787
31:27, 382	19:18, 679	1:1-18, 703	3:1-18, 686	4:47, 299, 789	5:7, 407, 936	3—11, 868
		1:1-18, 703	3:1-18, 686	4:48, 299, 789	5:10, 119	3:1, 537, 733, 735
		1:1-18, 703	3:1-18, 686	4:49, 299, 789		3:1-3, 733

3:1-15, 539	11:3, 456, 636	25:8-9, 460	25, 24, 636, 669	35:25, 236, 399,	1:4, 826	3:12, 166, 173,
3:4-28, 236, 849	11:3-8, 733	25:8-12, 402	25:1, 614, 620	400, 410	1:4-5, 426	708
3:5-6, 537	11:9, 733	25:16, 733	25:1-2, 620	36:23, 171	1:4-12, 174	3:12-14, 426, 719
3:5-15, 733	11:9-13, 225	25:25-26, 402	25:1-6, 619		1:5, 164, 781	3:13, 173, 191,
3:6-9, 885	11:11-13, 733	25:27, 321	25:1-8, 487	Ezra	1:7-8, 173	480, 493
3:6-28, 734	11:13, 116		25:3, 620	1:1-2, 171	1:7-10, 220	3:15, 173, 479,
3:7, 737	11:14, 714	1 Chronicles	25:6, 620	1:1-4, 782	1:8, 265	781
3:9, 734	11:23, 714	1:17, 371	26:1, 234, 620	2:1, 620	1:9, 176, 828	4, 173, 175, 185,
3:9-14, 895	11:25, 714	1:30, 264, 428,	26:1-2, 26	2:41, 25	1:10, 821	187, 661
3:12, 877	11:29-39, 882	867, 878	26:1-19, 26	2:55, 635	1:10-12, 215, 455	4:1-3, 477
3:16-27, 895	11:41-43, 733	1:42, 371	26:19, 234, 620	2:57, 635	1:11, 178, 265,	4:3, 934
3:16-28, 238, 733	12, 674, 733	2:3-15, 673, 676	27:27-31, 30, 636	2:58, 733	827, 922	4:4, 493
3:28, 895	12:32-33, 620	2:6, 619	28, 733	2:63, 850	1:11-12, 827	4:5-16, 494
4—6, 872	14:26, 733	2:11, 32	29:22, 736	3:8-9, 615	1:12, 164	4:7-8, 101
4:21, 734, 866	15:13, 64	2:11-12, 685	29:25, 122, 123,	3:10, 25, 614	1:12-15, 176	4:8, 719
4:21-28, 636	15:23, 871	4:17, 619	636	4:2-6, 97	1:13, 704, 729	4:10-14, 166
4:24, 734	16:5, 871	6:10, 733	29:30, 614	4:9-10, 782	1:14, 173	4:11, 164, 173,
4:25, 464	16:11, 379	6:22, 26		4:9-11, 97	1:15, 265	265, 426, 923
4:29-30, 545, 872	16:23, 302	6:24, 24	2 Chronicles	5:17—6:5, 97	1:17, 295, 455	4:12-16, 923
4:29-34, 537, 539,	16:27, 871	6:31, 614	1—9, 537	6:19-22, 459	1:19, 426, 719,	4:13, 477
636, 671, 733	16:31—21:29,	6:31-48, 24	1:1, 736	7:9, 620	827	4:13-14, 167, 190,
4:31, 619	209	6:32, 733, 931	1:7-13, 236	7:14, 845	1:20, 295	215, 477
4:31-34, 530	17—18, 869	6:33, 24, 26, 619	3:17, 685	7:25, 845	1:22, 21, 426,	4:13—5:2, 656
4:32, 539, 619,	17:6, 18	6:39, 234	4:5, 617	9, 270, 402, 404	719, 827	4:14, 101, 166,
669, 733	18, 236	6:44, 619	5:11, 21	9—10, 207, 240,	2, 162, 183, 217,	190, 192, 256,
4:34, 872	18—20, 23	8:33, 477	5:12, 25, 620	454	789, 790	480, 823
5—7, 733	18:19, 64	9:19, 26, 234, 620	5:12-13, 619, 636	9:1-2, 190	2:1, 189, 265, 644	4:15-17, 183
5:4, 714	18:39, 114	9:23, 114	6:40-42, 326	10, 673	2:3, 478, 781, 928	4:16, 191, 820,
5:5, 326	19:2-3, 656	9:31-32, 620	6:42, 467		2:3-15, 321	923, 934
5:7, 733	19:21, 931	11:5, 407, 525	7:3, 479	Nehemiah	2:4, 163	4:17, 477
5:9-14, 236, 239	20, 865	12:1, 620	7:6, 618, 619	1, 402, 404	2:5, 165, 463,	5, 169, 174, 175,
5:10, 429	20:11, 281	12:6, 620	9, 733	1:1, 781	476, 477, 781	181, 216, 296,
5:12, 733, 872,	20:32, 159	15—16, 76, 386	9:1-9, 895	3:15, 620	2:5-6, 162	863
877	22, 114	15:1—16:36, 73	9:1-12, 236, 239	5:1-5, 136	2:6, 476, 477	5:1, 732
6:11-13, 733	22:10, 691	15:16, 614, 618	9:18-20, 620	7:44, 25	2:7, 163, 186,	5:1-2, 923
7:17, 933	22:27, 320	15:16-17, 619	11:17, 733	7:57, 635	188, 426, 478	5:2, 184
7:19, 617	22:46, 871	15:17, 24, 619,	12:9, 733	7:59, 635	2:8, 188, 781	5:4-8, 164
7:22, 617		620	13:6, 736	7:60, 733	2:8-9, 923	5:9, 783
7:26, 221, 617	2 Kings	15:19, 24, 386,	14:7, 23	8:8—10:36, 35	2:8-18, 216	5:9-13, 296
8, 232	1:1, 687	619, 620	15:11, 869	8:15, 188	2:9, 295, 923	5:10—6:3, 479
8:1, 123	2:10-11, 102	15:20, 616	16:10, 320	9, 398, 402, 404	2:11, 188, 478,	5:13, 783
8:1-2, 736	3:4-5, 831	15:20-21, 73, 386,	17:10, 201	493	493	5:14, 163
8:2, 461	3:4-27, 687	616	19:7, 201	9:6-37, 722	2:12-14, 426	6:1, 168, 493, 646
8:2-21, 462	6:1, 877	15:21, 615, 616,	19:9, 900	11:7, 867	2:13, 189	6:1-2, 719
8:10, 113	6:8-23, 831	617	20:5, 393	11:17, 25	2:14, 189	6:1-4, 923
8:10-11, 21	8:1-6, 381	15:22, 619	20:9, 393	11:22, 25	2:15, 923	6:1-11, 173
8:14, 736	9:13, 302	16, 229, 234, 499	20:14, 25	12:24-47, 614	2:16, 171, 189,	6:2, 182
8:22, 123, 736	9:30-37, 923	16:4, 931	20:19, 26, 234,	12:36, 618	6:4, 164	6:4, 164
8:29-30, 393	11, 923	16:5, 24	620	12:37, 620	2:17, 162, 826,	6:6-9, 494
8:31-32, 75, 389	12, 671	16:7, 73, 386, 614	20:29, 201	12:45, 733	923	6:6-10, 296
8:33-36, 393	13:21, 724	16:8-22, 325	22:3, 209	12:46, 25, 486,	2:18, 321	6:8-11, 15
8:35, 393	15:3-5, 469	16:8-34, 73	23:11, 467	619	2:19, 783	6:10, 783
8:46-51, 408	17, 232	16:8-36, 325	24:21, 37	13, 207	2:20, 186	6:11, 164, 923
8:50-53, 326	17:37, 421	16:23-30, 325	25:14-24, 882	13:1-3, 454	2:21, 783	6:13, 296, 704,
8:54-66, 463	18—19, 238	16:25, 930	28:27—29:3, 97	13:23-27, 107,	2:21-23, 494, 923	923
8:55, 736	18:3, 674	16:31-34, 326	29:5, 21	190, 673	2:22, 190	7:1, 164
8:58, 421	18:4, 19	16:35, 326	29:7, 21	13:23-28, 240	2:23, 719	7:1-6, 923
9:1-9, 733	18:7, 674	16:37, 24, 931	29:12, 26	13:26, 733, 735	3, 8, 183, 188,	7:4, 101, 191,
9:7, 532	18:8, 674	16:41-42, 619,	29:13, 25		216	265, 493
9:10, 733	19:14-19, 724	620	29:25-28, 619	Esther	3—8, 163	7:5, 492
9:16, 537	19:35-37, 724	16:42, 618	29:29, 479	1, 173, 186, 188,	3:1, 164, 463	7:6, 191
10:1-9, 895	21:7, 733	17:3-15, 326	29:30, 25	205, 216, 467,	3:2, 296, 478, 479	7:8, 21, 22, 923
10:1-13, 236, 239,	22:8—23:25, 35	17:13, 326	30:13-27, 459	492, 789, 790,	3:2-4, 479	7:8-10, 296
671	22:19, 675	18:2, 930	30:24, 869	827, 828	3:4, 175, 296, 478	7:9, 163
10:1-22, 733	23:1-2, 620	18:6, 930	30:26, 733, 736	1—2, 163	3:5, 296, 479	7:10, 426
10:5, 636	23:8, 623	18:8, 733	31:4, 167	1:1, 172, 174, 186	3:6, 296	8, 183, 874
10:7, 872	23:13, 675, 733	18:13, 930	33:7, 733	1:1-2, 178	3:6-13, 101	8:1-2, 21, 166
10:14-22, 733	23:21-22, 459	21, 716	34:12, 26, 618	1:1-3, 172	3:7, 166, 478, 631	8:2, 479
10:19-20, 620	23:25, 675	21:1, 714, 715	35:1-19, 459	1:1-6, 782	3:7-14, 173	8:3, 187, 192
10:24, 733	24:8-16, 477	22:5-7, 733	35:3, 733, 736	1:2, 171, 781	3:8, 179, 191, 265	8:5, 265, 719
11, 716	24:13, 733	22:9, 733	35:4, 733	1:2-8, 295	3:8-9, 173, 426	8:8, 186
11:1-5, 239	25:1, 402	22:17-19, 733	35:5, 21	1:3, 9, 161, 164,	3:9, 174, 191, 719	8:8-10, 719
11:1-8, 735	25:3-7, 402	23:1, 733	35:15, 25, 620	189, 827	3:10, 164	8:9, 708

8:10, 15, 163, 173, 874	365, 369, 371, 667, 779, 859,	253, 254, 373, 434, 649, 812, 918	4:16—5:4, 799 4:17, 653, 903 4:17-19, 667 4:17-21, 69, 347 4:18-21, 653 4:19, 19, 22, 869 4:19-20, 432 5, 82, 205, 288 5—27, 355 5:1, 6, 114, 382 5:2, 659 5:3-4, 297 5:4, 528 5:5, 222 5:5-7, 109 5:8, 337 5:8-16, 653 5:9, 368, 616 5:9-16, 350 5:13, 878 5:15, 829 5:17, 297 5:18-27, 652:17- 27, 109 5:19, 511 5:19-22, 534 5:20, 869 5:22, 13, 869 5:23, 13 5:24-25, 453 5:25, 222 5:26, 731 5:27, 297, 362 6—7, 334 6:2, 659, 818 6:2-13, 355 6:4, 776 6:5, 15, 222, 869 6:6, 222 6:8-9, 933 6:14, 203, 297, 906 6:15-18, 100 6:18-20, 346 6:19, 865 6:23, 528 6:24, 818 6:24-26, 297 6:24-30, 109 6:30, 818 7:1, 867 7:1-3, 60 7:2, 867 7:5, 19, 869 7:6, 822 7:7, 646 7:7-9, 432 7:8, 786 7:9, 5, 382 7:9-10, 22, 52 7:11, 910 7:12, 20, 46, 63, 321 7:17, 69 7:17-18, 361 7:17-19, 776 7:19, 69, 361 7:20, 878 7:21, 60, 815 8, 110 8:2, 109, 352 8:2-3, 254 8:3, 652, 667	8:3-4, 109 8:3-7, 66 8:4, 652, 779 8:5, 337 8:5-7, 109, 337, 652 8:6, 344 8:9, 561, 822 8:10, 910 8:11-13, 100 8:11-15, 22 8:14, 19, 869 8:15-17, 94, 799 8:16-19, 22 8:20-22, 653 9, 48, 52 9—10, 82, 334, 667 9:2, 667 9:2-24, 893 9:2-35, 361 9:5-7, 482 9:5-9, 869 9:5-13, 350 9:8, 44, 45, 48, 63 9:9, 17, 346 9:13, 20, 45, 48, 63 9:14-21, 330 9:15, 297, 436, 668 9:15-31, 109 9:17-18, 831 9:17-19, 776 9:20, 668 9:20-23, 778 9:21, 337, 435 9:21-24, 109, 203, 373 9:22, 358, 362, 432, 776, 812 9:22-24, 908 9:23, 659 9:24, 67 9:25-26, 432 9:26, 17 9:27, 94, 799 9:28, 370 9:30-31, 354 9:33, 6, 7, 382, 471 9:33-34, 278 9:33-35, 109 10, 62, 63 10—11, 228 10:1, 435, 776 10:1-7, 67, 109 10:1-22, 818 10:2, 365 10:2-7, 422 10:5, 825 10:7, 338 10:8-11, 431 10:9, 432, 646 10:12, 254 10:13-22, 254 10:16, 16 10:18, 254, 431 10:21, 52, 382 10:22, 52 11, 110 11:2, 109, 668 11:3, 659	11:3-6, 296 11:6, 109 11:7-9, 653 11:7-11, 350 11:11, 652, 814 11:12, 15, 109, 347, 373, 869 11:13, 337 11:13-14, 779 11:13-15, 344 11:13-20, 66, 109, 373 11:14-20, 337 11:16, 644 11:17, 433 12, 253 12—14, 334 12:1, 928 12:1-3, 373 12:2, 109, 659 12:4-5, 297 12:4-6, 109 12:7, 14, 17 12:8, 18 12:9, 252, 253, 718, 909 12:10, 13, 432, 910 12:12, 109, 373 12:13, 814, 871 12:13-25, 653 12:14, 871 12:14-25, 350, 358 12:17, 867, 878 12:18, 867 12:25, 771 13:1-2, 109 13:2, 297 13:3, 61, 109, 382 13:4, 94, 799 13:12, 109, 373, 646 13:13-28, 361 13:15, 117, 362, 364, 799 13:18, 668 13:18-20, 94, 799 13:19, 338 13:22-27, 109 13:23, 338 13:23-27, 94, 799 13:24, 61, 117, 372, 526, 815, 928 13:26, 719 13:28, 19 14, 524, 911 14:1-2, 432 14:4-6, 94, 799 14:6, 821 14:7-9, 524 14:7-10, 432 14:10-12, 524 14:11-12, 432 14:12, 382 14:13, 5, 526, 528 14:13-15, 355 14:13-18, 94, 799 14:14, 363, 824, 846 14:15, 869 14:17, 368	14:18-20, 482 15, 110, 352 15—21, 334, 352 15:1-13, 109, 373 15:2, 109, 659 15:3-5, 109 15:4, 203 15:5-6, 254, 517 15:7, 481 15:7-8, 346 15:7-9, 109 15:7-16, 653 15:8, 114 15:9, 297 15:13, 926 15:14, 667 15:14-16, 69 15:20-35, 652 15:23, 17, 821 15:24, 867 15:28, 22 15:32, 821 15:33, 220 16—17, 334 16:2, 109 16:3, 352, 659 16:4, 297, 910 16:6-14, 254, 667 16:8, 347 16:9, 776 16:9-14, 867 16:11, 776 16:12-14, 831 16:15-16, 349 16:18, 516 16:18-20, 278 16:18-21, 382 16:18-22, 361 16:19, 6, 7, 382, 780 16:19-21, 114, 471, 667 16:20, 297 17—42, 799 17:2, 297 17:6, 297 17:7, 56 17:11, 821 17:12, 820 17:12-13, 431 17:13, 22 17:14, 19, 516 17:16, 5, 52 18, 110 18:1-4, 109 18:3, 14, 869 18:5-21, 109, 652 18:8-10, 346 18:9-13, 52 18:11, 869 18:12, 100 18:17, 100, 646 18:17-18, 60 18:18-21, 431 18:19, 453 18:21, 254 19, 334, 382 19:3, 297 19:5, 297 19:5-6, 297 19:6, 254, 382, 653 19:6-7, 422, 667
Job
1, 367, 372, 664, 831	2:3-4, 361 2:3-6, 818 2:4, 373	2:3-6, 818 2:4, 373 2:4-5, 777 2:5, 117, 210, 422, 778 2:6, 365, 778 2:7, 465, 869 2:7-8, 777 2:7-10, 108 2:9, 210, 778, 918 2:9-10, 453, 777, 778 2:10, 203, 210,	2:11, 264, 786, 866 2:11-13, 108, 373 3, 108, 242, 254, 333, 335, 355, 371, 373, 435, 714, 778, 892, 893, 917 3—25, 243 3—27, 238 3—37, 66, 243, 659 3—42, 242 3:1, 778, 821 3:1-10, 778 3:1-26, 254, 316 3:1—31:40, 361 3:1—40:6, 252 3:2-13, 354 3:3, 367 3:3-10, 893 3:3—40:6, 812 3:4, 431 3:5-6, 94 3:5-9, 799 3:6, 821 3:8, 19, 47, 63 3:9, 19 3:11-23, 322 3:11-26, 778 3:14, 867 3:15, 22 3:17, 786 3:17-20, 5 3:18, 355 3:19, 465 3:20, 431 3:20-22, 355 3:21, 778 3:23, 60, 322, 431, 528, 776, 778 3:23-26, 779 3:24-26, 778 3:25, 812 3:26, 67 4, 108, 201, 203, 363, 928 4—5, 110 4—14, 334 4—27, 108 4:1, 296 4:2-5, 296 4:3-5, 359 4:6, 203, 250, 253, 906 4:6-7, 652 4:7, 644, 812 4:7-9, 66, 100, 667 4:7-11, 109, 373 4:7—5:4, 94 4:8, 779 4:9, 261, 431, 505, 871 4:10, 15, 16 4:10-11, 869 4:11, 16 4:12-16, 346 4:15, 118	4:16—5:4, 799 4:17, 653, 903 4:17-19, 667 4:17-21, 69, 347 4:18-21, 653 4:19, 19, 22, 869 4:19-20, 432 5, 82, 205, 288 5—27, 355 5:1, 6, 114, 382 5:2, 659 5:3-4, 297 5:4, 528 5:5, 222 5:5-7, 109 5:8, 337 5:8-16, 653 5:9, 368, 616 5:9-16, 350 5:13, 878 5:15, 829 5:17, 297 5:18-27, 652:17- 27, 109 5:19, 511 5:19-22, 534 5:20, 869 5:22, 13, 869 5:23, 13 5:24-25, 453 5:25, 222 5:26, 731 5:27, 297, 362 6—7, 334 6:2, 659, 818 6:2-13, 355 6:4, 776 6:5, 15, 222, 869 6:6, 222 6:8-9, 933 6:14, 203, 297, 906 6:15-18, 100 6:18-20, 346 6:19, 865 6:23, 528 6:24, 818 6:24-26, 297 6:24-30, 109 6:30, 818 7:1, 867 7:1-3, 60 7:2, 867 7:5, 19, 869 7:6, 822 7:7, 646 7:7-9, 432 7:8, 786 7:9, 5, 382 7:9-10, 22, 52 7:11, 910 7:12, 20, 46, 63, 321 7:17, 69 7:17-18, 361 7:17-19, 776 7:19, 69, 361 7:20, 878 7:21, 60, 815 8, 110 8:2, 109, 352 8:2-3, 254 8:3, 652, 667	8:3-4, 109 8:3-7, 66 8:4, 652, 779 8:5, 337 8:5-7, 109, 337, 652 8:6, 344 8:9, 561, 822 8:10, 910 8:11-13, 100 8:11-15, 22 8:14, 19, 869 8:15-17, 94, 799 8:16-19, 22 8:20-22, 653 9, 48, 52 9—10, 82, 334, 667 9:2, 667 9:2-24, 893 9:2-35, 361 9:5-7, 482 9:5-9, 869 9:5-13, 350 9:8, 44, 45, 48, 63 9:9, 17, 346 9:13, 20, 45, 48, 63 9:14-21, 330 9:15, 297, 436, 668 9:15-31, 109 9:17-18, 831 9:17-19, 776 9:20, 668 9:20-23, 778 9:21, 337, 435 9:21-24, 109, 203, 373 9:22, 358, 362, 432, 776, 812 9:22-24, 908 9:23, 659 9:24, 67 9:25-26, 432 9:26, 17 9:27, 94, 799 9:28, 370 9:30-31, 354 9:33, 6, 7, 382, 471 9:33-34, 278 9:33-35, 109 10, 62, 63 10—11, 228 10:1, 435, 776 10:1-7, 67, 109 10:1-22, 818 10:2, 365 10:2-7, 422 10:5, 825 10:7, 338 10:8-11, 431 10:9, 432, 646 10:12, 254 10:13-22, 254 10:16, 16 10:18, 254, 431 10:21, 52, 382 10:22, 52 11, 110 11:2, 109, 668 11:3, 659	11:3-6, 296 11:6, 109 11:7-9, 653 11:7-11, 350 11:11, 652, 814 11:12, 15, 109, 347, 373, 869 11:13, 337 11:13-14, 779 11:13-15, 344 11:13-20, 66, 109, 373 11:14-20, 337 11:16, 644 11:17, 433 12, 253 12—14, 334 12:1, 928 12:1-3, 373 12:2, 109, 659 12:4-5, 297 12:4-6, 109 12:7, 14, 17 12:8, 18 12:9, 252, 253, 718, 909 12:10, 13, 432, 910 12:12, 109, 373 12:13, 814, 871 12:13-25, 653 12:14, 871 12:14-25, 350, 358 12:17, 867, 878 12:18, 867 12:25, 771 13:1-2, 109 13:2, 297 13:3, 61, 109, 382 13:4, 94, 799 13:12, 109, 373, 646 13:13-28, 361 13:15, 117, 362, 364, 799 13:18, 668 13:18-20, 94, 799 13:19, 338 13:22-27, 109 13:23, 338 13:23-27, 94, 799 13:24, 61, 117, 372, 526, 815, 928 13:26, 719 13:28, 19 14, 524, 911 14:1-2, 432 14:4-6, 94, 799 14:6, 821 14:7-9, 524 14:7-10, 432 14:10-12, 524 14:11-12, 432 14:12, 382 14:13, 5, 526, 528 14:13-15, 355 14:13-18, 94, 799 14:14, 363, 824, 846 14:15, 869 14:17, 368	14:18-20, 482 15, 110, 352 15—21, 334, 352 15:1-13, 109, 373 15:2, 109, 659 15:3-5, 109 15:4, 203 15:5-6, 254, 517 15:7, 481 15:7-8, 346 15:7-9, 109 15:7-16, 653 15:8, 114 15:9, 297 15:13, 926 15:14, 667 15:14-16, 69 15:20-35, 652 15:23, 17, 821 15:24, 867 15:28, 22 15:32, 821 15:33, 220 16—17, 334 16:2, 109 16:3, 352, 659 16:4, 297, 910 16:6-14, 254, 667 16:8, 347 16:9, 776 16:9-14, 867 16:11, 776 16:12-14, 831 16:15-16, 349 16:18, 516 16:18-20, 278 16:18-21, 382 16:18-22, 361 16:19, 6, 7, 382, 780 16:19-21, 114, 471, 667 16:20, 297 17—42, 799 17:2, 297 17:6, 297 17:7, 56 17:11, 821 17:12, 820 17:12-13, 431 17:13, 22 17:14, 19, 516 17:16, 5, 52 18, 110 18:1-4, 109 18:3, 14, 869 18:5-21, 109, 652 18:8-10, 346 18:9-13, 52 18:11, 869 18:12, 100 18:17, 100, 646 18:17-18, 60 18:18-21, 431 18:19, 453 18:21, 254 19, 334, 382 19:3, 297 19:5, 297 19:5-6, 297 19:6, 254, 382, 653 19:6-7, 422, 667
1—3, 334 1—20, 345, 383, 668, 816 1:1, 198, 250, 253, 264, 361,	365, 369, 371, 667, 779, 859, 865, 866, 906, 933 1:1—2:12, 242 1:1—2:13, 361 1:2, 372, 453 1:2-3, 203, 372 1:3, 14, 15, 372, 867, 869 1:4-5, 869 1:5, 203, 349, 372, 730, 933 1:6, 113, 253, 382, 715, 785 1:6-7, 6 1:6-12, 114 1:7-12, 818 1:8, 198, 203, 253, 361, 364, 372, 667, 812, 906, 910, 933 1:8-9, 250 1:8-12, 779 1:9, 203, 253, 652, 812 1:9-10, 66, 777 1:9-11, 372 1:10, 14, 364, 528, 776, 778 1:11, 117, 210, 422, 778 1:12, 117, 716, 778 1:13, 220, 869 1:13-19, 373, 777 1:13-21, 656 1:13-22, 108 1:14, 15 1:14-17, 869 1:15, 336, 429, 869 1:16, 14, 869 1:17, 15, 336, 869 1:18, 220, 918 1:18-19, 869 1:19, 453 1:20-21, 777, 933 1:21, 66, 253, 434, 512 1:21-22, 210, 778 1:22, 203 2, 108, 335 2:1, 6, 113, 382 2:1-6, 114 2:3, 198, 203, 210, 250, 253, 667, 716, 906, 933 2:3-4, 361 2:3-6, 818 2:4, 373 2:4-5, 777 2:5, 117, 210, 422, 778 2:6, 365, 778 2:7, 465, 869 2:7-8, 777 2:7-10, 108 2:9, 210, 778, 918 2:9-10, 453, 777, 778 2:10, 203, 210, 253, 264, 361,	253, 254, 373, 434, 649, 812, 918 2:11, 264, 786, 866 2:11-13, 108, 373 3, 108, 242, 254, 333, 335, 355, 371, 373, 435, 714, 778, 892, 893, 917 3—25, 243 3—27, 238 3—37, 66, 243, 659 3—42, 242 3:1, 778, 821 3:1-10, 778 3:1-26, 254, 316 3:1—31:40, 361 3:1—40:6, 252 3:2-13, 354 3:3, 367 3:3-10, 893 3:3—40:6, 812 3:4, 431 3:5-6, 94 3:5-9, 799 3:6, 821 3:8, 19, 47, 63 3:9, 19 3:11-23, 322 3:11-26, 778 3:14, 867 3:15, 22 3:17, 786 3:17-20, 5 3:18, 355 3:19, 465 3:20, 431 3:20-22, 355 3:21, 778 3:23, 60, 322, 431, 528, 776, 778 3:23-26, 779 3:24-26, 778 3:25, 812 3:26, 67 4, 108, 201, 203, 363, 928 4—5, 110 4—14, 334 4—27, 108 4:1, 296 4:2-5, 296 4:3-5, 359 4:6, 203, 250, 253, 906 4:6-7, 652 4:7, 644, 812 4:7-9, 66, 100, 667 4:7-11, 109, 373 4:7—5:4, 94 4:8, 779 4:9, 261, 431, 505, 871 4:10, 15, 16 4:10-11, 869 4:11, 16 4:12-16, 346 4:15, 118	4:16—5:4, 799 4:17, 653, 903 4:17-19, 667 4:17-21, 69, 347 4:18-21, 653 4:19, 19, 22, 869 4:19-20, 432 5, 82, 205, 288 5—27, 355 5:1, 6, 114, 382 5:2, 659 5:3-4, 297 5:4, 528 5:5, 222 5:5-7, 109 5:8, 337 5:8-16, 653 5:9, 368, 616 5:9-16, 350 5:13, 878 5:15, 829 5:17, 297 5:18-27, 652:17- 27, 109 5:19, 511 5:19-22, 534 5:20, 869 5:22, 13, 869 5:23, 13 5:24-25, 453 5:25, 222 5:26, 731 5:27, 297, 362 6—7, 334 6:2, 659, 818 6:2-13, 355 6:4, 776 6:5, 15, 222, 869 6:6, 222 6:8-9, 933 6:14, 203, 297, 906 6:15-18, 100 6:18-20, 346 6:19, 865 6:23, 528 6:24, 818 6:24-26, 297 6:24-30, 109 6:30, 818 7:1, 867 7:1-3, 60 7:2, 867 7:5, 19, 869 7:6, 822 7:7, 646 7:7-9, 432 7:8, 786 7:9, 5, 382 7:9-10, 22, 52 7:11, 910 7:12, 20, 46, 63, 321 7:17, 69 7:17-18, 361 7:17-19, 776 7:19, 69, 361 7:20, 878 7:21, 60, 815 8, 110 8:2, 109, 352 8:2-3, 254 8:3, 652, 667	8:3-4, 109 8:3-7, 66 8:4, 652, 779 8:5, 337 8:5-7, 109, 337, 652 8:6, 344 8:9, 561, 822 8:10, 910 8:11-13, 100 8:11-15, 22 8:14, 19, 869 8:15-17, 94, 799 8:16-19, 22 8:20-22, 653 9, 48, 52 9—10, 82, 334, 667 9:2, 667 9:2-24, 893 9:2-35, 361 9:5-7, 482 9:5-9, 869 9:5-13, 350 9:8, 44, 45, 48, 63 9:9, 17, 346 9:13, 20, 45, 48, 63 9:14-21, 330 9:15, 297, 436, 668 9:15-31, 109 9:17-18, 831 9:17-19, 776 9:2

Dictionary of the Old Testament: Wisdom, Poetry & Writings

19:7, 818	23:7, 436	28:8, 16	31:13-15, 198,	34:17, 668	38:22-30, 869	339
19:7-12, 776	23:8-9, 350	28:9-10, 481	199	34:22, 53, 526	38:23, 821, 822	40:17, 222, 840
19:9, 297	23:9, 61	28:12, 643	31:13-23, 359	34:25, 264	38:24, 818	40:19, 20
19:11-12, 831	23:10, 382, 435	28:12-22, 892	31:14-19, 94, 799	34:25-27, 373	38:25-26, 69	40:20, 13, 65, 482
19:13-19, 348,	23:10-12, 667	28:14, 44, 516	31:15, 199, 431	34:27, 845	38:25-27, 342	40:22, 222
382	23:11-12, 338	28:16-19, 346	31:16, 867	34:29, 117, 815	38:25-30, 818	40:23, 865
19:15-27, 61	23:12, 219	28:19, 865	31:16-22, 316	34:36, 786	38:29-30, 60	41, 46, 48, 708,
19:17, 918	23:13-14, 350	28:20, 643	31:16-23, 198,	34:37, 373	38:31, 95, 321	818
19:18, 786	23:15, 61	28:21, 13, 18	199, 667, 861	35, 334	38:31-32, 346	41:1, 18, 19, 45,
19:23, 719	23:17, 61	28:22, 101, 516	31:17, 219	35—37, 255	38:31-33, 818	60, 818
19:23-24, 6	24:1, 815	28:23, 643, 779	31:18, 199	35:10, 487, 903	38:33, 62	41:1-10, 818
19:23-27, 361,	24:1-17, 358	28:23-28, 892	31:19, 867	35:11, 17	38:34, 46, 818	41:1-34, 63
471	24:2, 14, 382	28:24-26, 869	31:20, 14	35:16, 94, 799	38:34-35, 869	41:4, 818
19:23-29, 911	24:3, 15, 867	28:28, 198, 204,	31:20-21, 94, 799	36:4, 110, 297	38:35, 516, 818	41:5, 17
19:25, 6, 382,	24:5, 15, 869	250, 253, 254,	31:21, 23	36:7-11, 94, 799	38:36, 818	41:10-11, 64, 908
383, 422, 427,	24:12, 653	325, 816, 859,	31:23, 119	36:8-13, 322	38:37-38, 818	41:11, 60, 342,
780	24:13, 431, 786	892, 900, 906,	31:23-24, 198	36:13-17, 94	38:39, 15, 16, 869	818
19:25-26, 437,	24:15, 453, 526	933	31:26-28, 82, 199,	36:13-27, 799	38:39—39:30,	41:12-34, 818
780	24:20, 19, 645	29, 66, 338, 349,	344	36:14, 869	346	41:18-21, 46
19:25-27, 6, 7, 53,	25, 110	351, 433	31:29, 297	36:24—37:13,	38:40, 526	41:21, 431
278, 383, 667	25:1-6, 254	29—30, 255	31:29-30, 198,	350	38:41, 18, 431,	41:26-29, 829
19:26, 382, 815	25:2, 653	29—31, 82, 110,	199	36:29, 814	869	41:29, 65, 70
19:26-27, 7, 383	25:2-6, 350	111, 204, 333,	31:32, 729	36:32-33, 94, 799	39, 818	41:30, 732
19:28-29, 6	25:3, 431	334, 349, 359,	31:35, 6, 382, 719	37, 893	39:1, 14, 16, 869	41:33, 64
20, 110	25:4, 667	373, 892	31:35-37, 109,	37—39, 862	39:1-2, 822	41:34, 64, 70
20:3, 297	25:4-6, 69, 653	29—37, 238	361, 667	37:1-5, 94, 799	39:1-4, 818	42, 252, 334, 918
20:4-9, 100	25:6, 19, 435	29:1-17, 330	31:35-40, 373	37:3-13, 869	39:5, 15, 869	42:1, 252
20:4-29, 109, 652	26, 48, 52, 60,	29:2-10, 297	31:37, 373	37:5, 814	39:5-8, 482, 818	42:1-5, 374
20:8, 432	909	29:3, 431, 528	31:38, 516	37:8, 13, 526	39:6, 865	42:1-6, 110, 243,
20:12, 60	26—27, 334	29:4-5, 862	31:38-40, 316	37:10—42:11, 94	39:7, 65, 69, 70	668, 779
20:14, 19	26—32, 254	29:6, 220, 433	31:40, 219, 222	37:11, 46	39:9, 15	42:2, 857
20:16, 19	26:2-4, 109	29:7, 23, 865	32, 254, 423	37:14-15, 94, 799	39:9-12, 818	42:3, 814, 933
20:17, 220	26:5, 52	29:8, 465	32—33, 255	37:24, 203, 297	39:13, 17, 869	42:5, 61, 910
20:20-22, 60	26:5-14, 254	29:12-17, 667	32—37, 94, 110,	38, 209, 252, 430,	39:13-18, 818	42:5-6, 297, 819
20:24, 829	26:6, 5, 53	29:13, 433, 867	243, 252, 334,	662, 779, 818,	39:15, 13	42:6, 350, 812,
20:29, 254	26:7, 61	29:14, 198	340, 343, 373,	869	39:18, 15, 65, 70,	933
21, 334, 353	26:8, 321	29:15-17, 359	650, 663	38—39, 706, 814	516, 869	42:6-17, 110
21:3, 297	26:10, 62, 321	29:16, 528	32:2, 668, 866	38—41, 20, 47,	39:19, 15	42:7, 779, 780,
21:4-16, 109	26:10-14, 60	29:17, 528	32:3-4, 94, 799	48, 60, 61, 65,	39:19-25, 818,	812
21:6, 644	26:12, 20, 45	29:20, 453	32:4, 297	69, 112, 255,	869	42:7-8, 243, 338,
21:7-13, 67	26:12-13, 45, 48,	29:21, 297	32:6-9, 110	334, 335, 341,	39:20, 18	396, 668
21:10, 14	63	29:25, 70, 867	32:8, 110, 373,	812, 816, 849,	39:22, 65, 516	42:7-9, 297, 819
21:13, 821	26:13, 19, 45, 46	30, 338, 348	431	903, 904	39:24, 13	42:7-12, 252
21:19, 353	26:14, 909	30:1, 16, 297, 869	32:9, 297	38—42, 204, 210,	39:26, 17, 818,	42:7-17, 110, 242,
21:22, 871	27, 108, 109, 203,	30:1-15, 348	32:11, 297	869	869	246, 361, 374,
21:22-26, 353	333, 343, 717,	30:3, 869	32:11-12, 297	38:1, 252, 373,	39:27, 17	382, 383, 437
21:26, 19, 432	892	30:4, 222	32:15-16, 297	817	39:27-30, 818,	42:8, 14, 423,
21:30, 100	27:1-6, 330, 338	30:7, 222	32:18-20, 357	38:1—39:30, 339	869	779, 869
22, 110	27:2, 667, 818	30:9-10, 297	32:22, 903	38:1—40:2, 779	39:28, 526	42:8-9, 933
22—27, 109, 334	27:2-4, 355	30:15, 297	33:4, 118, 431	38:1—40:5, 874	39:29, 869	42:8-10, 82
22—31, 205, 374	27:3, 431	30:20-21, 776	33:4-6, 869	38:1—42:6, 110,	39:30, 69	42:9, 933
22:2, 618	27:5-6, 667	30:23, 22, 437	33:6, 432	361	40, 252, 818	42:10, 364, 918
22:2-12, 109	27:6, 667	30:25, 867	33:8-21, 110	38:2, 297, 350,	40—41, 840	42:10-17, 82, 243,
22:3, 344	27:8, 435, 436,	30:26, 435	33:9, 667	358, 779, 878	40:1, 252	780
22:4, 203	824	30:29, 16, 17, 66,	33:10-11, 94, 799	38:4-7, 818, 908	40:1-2, 818	42:11, 95, 336,
22:4-11, 254, 423	27:12, 779	869	33:14-15, 534	38:4-38, 339	40:1-5, 668	344, 423, 812,
22:5-9, 337, 653,	27:13-23, 110,	31, 119, 198, 199,	33:19-28, 73	38:7, 65, 67, 94,	40:2, 252	867, 918
667	254	200, 255, 316,	33:23, 382	113, 487, 516	40:2-5, 374	42:11-17, 435,
22:5-11, 779	27:18, 19	333, 338, 341,	33:23-28, 6, 471	38:7-8, 114	40:3, 252	824
22:6-11, 109	28, 60, 110, 111,	351, 433, 653,	33:24, 511	38:8, 67	40:3-5, 779, 818	42:12, 14, 15,
22:9, 867	112, 204, 205,	667, 779	33:24-26, 94, 799	38:8-11, 45, 48,	40:4, 297	364, 869
22:12, 350	210, 238, 333,	31:1, 199, 453	33:28, 528	50, 63, 64, 321,	40:4-5, 110	42:13, 453, 679,
22:12-14, 653	334, 335, 338,	31:1-4, 119	33:28-30, 94, 431,	818	40:6, 252, 817	867
22:14, 46, 725	341, 343, 345,	31:1-12, 198, 199	799	38:11, 64, 67	40:6-7, 818	42:13-15, 918
22:15-20, 652	373, 374, 482,	31:2-3, 100	33:31-33, 297	38:12-15, 818	40:6-8, 909	42:14, 867
22:21-25, 346	519, 641, 643,	31:4, 199	33:33, 297	38:13, 69	40:6—41:34, 779	42:14-15, 210
22:21-30, 109,	814, 849, 879,	31:5-8, 316	34, 255, 334, 423	38:15, 100	40:8, 340, 653,	42:15, 381, 918
337, 353	892, 893, 900	31:6, 6	34:5-20, 110	38:16, 818	668, 816	42:16, 453, 867
23, 359, 667	28—31, 109, 333	31:9, 199	34:11, 373	38:16-17, 52	40:8-14, 342, 818	42:17, 363, 371,
23—24, 334	28:1-2, 346	31:9-10, 210, 214	34:14, 431, 432,	38:17, 23, 52, 818	40:15, 20, 60, 70,	846
23:1-7, 361, 910	28:1-11, 346, 708,	31:9-12, 453	910	38:18, 818	869
23:1-10, 818	869, 892	31:10, 94, 453	34:14-15, 910	38:19-21, 818	40:15-24, 45, 818	Psalms
23:3-10, 6	28:7, 17	31:13, 867	34:15, 432	38:22-23, 818	40:15—41:34,	1, 84, 92, 100,

150, 235, 314, 377, 585, 611, 621, 659, 893	711, 714, 830 3:4, 86, 393, 483, 711 3:5, 86 3:5-6, 711 3:6, 773 3:7, 86, 87, 528, 591, 711, 817, 819, 831 3:8, 711, 714 4, 58, 71, 75, 260, 386, 388, 616, 734, 931, 932 4:1, 73, 86, 387, 421, 486, 669, 811 4:2, 87 4:3, 86 4:4, 773 4:5, 663 4:6, 117, 389 4:7, 220 4:8, 118, 616 5, 73, 75, 86, 223, 234, 281, 389, 485, 607, 669, 932, 936 5:1, 73, 440, 616, 618, 669 5:2, 87, 421 5:5, 87, 293 5:5-6, 317 5:6, 100 5:7, 21, 932 5:9, 100 5:9-10, 317 5:11, 87, 118, 526 5:11-12, 665, 811 5:12, 119, 421, 526, 815 6, 201, 386, 388, 389, 390, 601, 775, 891, 917, 932 6:1, 73, 439, 486, 617, 775 6:2, 87, 527, 582 6:3, 226, 811 6:4, 811 6:4-5, 711, 713 6:5, 5, 52, 646, 713, 812, 934 6:5-7, 712 6:6, 87 6:7, 87 6:7-8, 712 6:8, 87 6:8-10, 388, 817 6:10, 289, 591, 619, 714, 819 7, 75, 228, 388, 619, 932 7:1, 86, 118, 591, 664, 666, 712 7:1-5, 830 7:2, 15, 712, 830 7:3, 86, 664 7:3-5, 389, 713 7:4, 87 7:5, 289, 434, 591 7:6, 420, 528, 811, 831, 832 7:6-7, 712	7:6-8, 710 7:6-13, 830 7:6-16, 616 7:7, 87 7:8, 528, 665, 713, 811 7:8-11, 421 7:9, 87, 421, 664 7:10, 86, 119, 526, 713 7:11, 86, 249, 528 7:11-16, 665 7:12, 527 7:12-13, 831 7:16, 54, 262 7:17, 54, 55, 87, 247, 664, 714 8, 235, 290, 583, 617, 641, 932 8:1, 323, 486, 588 8:2, 606 8:3, 62 8:3-5, 932 8:4, 69, 646, 822 8:4-5, 69 8:5-8, 814 8:7, 13, 14, 15, 18 8:7-8, 60 8:8, 17, 18, 69 8:9, 323, 588 9, 2, 3, 100, 617, 664, 805, 932 9-10, 3, 235, 263, 390, 391, 399 9:1, 87 9:2, 87, 247 9:3, 87, 100, 665, 819 9:5, 100, 101, 436 9:5-6, 100, 289, 665 9:6, 87, 100, 101, 646 9:7, 3, 591, 825 9:7-8, 811 9:8, 436 9:9, 23, 198, 483, 586 9:9-12, 937 9:11-14, 392 9:12, 646 9:13, 23, 52, 819 9:14, 23, 290, 617 9:15, 263, 591 9:15-17, 665 9:16, 617 9:17, 322, 421 9:18, 618 9:19, 87, 400, 831 9:20, 87, 665 10, 2 10:1, 387, 811, 815 10:1-11, 434 10:2, 87 10:2-6, 3 10:4, 293 10:6, 591 10:7, 420 10:9, 15 10:10, 3 10:11, 400, 645	10:12, 817, 819 10:14, 117, 937 10:15, 75 10:16, 87, 100, 117, 825, 932 10:16-18, 811 10:17, 819 10:18, 528, 811 11, 58, 75, 87 11:1, 17, 118, 482, 591 11:2, 87, 526, 527 11:4, 21, 116, 932 11:4-5, 435 11:5, 431 11:6, 76, 87, 665 11:6-7, 435 11:7, 76, 86, 117 12, 56, 235, 386, 391, 712 12:1, 439, 617, 710, 713 12:3-4, 317, 714 12:7, 118 12:7-8, 711 12:8, 591 13, 235, 388, 651 13:1, 88, 117, 226, 387, 395, 526, 776, 815 13:1-2, 524 13:2, 87, 387, 775 13:3, 86, 384, 387, 392, 528 13:3-4, 524, 830 13:4, 387, 591 13:5, 87, 387 13:5-6, 524, 780 13:6, 387 14, 235, 247, 391, 797 14:1, 223, 225, 226, 591, 814 14:2, 618 14:3, 811, 814 14:4, 87, 219 14:5, 118 14:6, 118 14:7, 87 15, 235, 236, 389, 665 15-24, 151, 442, 445 15:1, 289 15:2, 395 15:4, 204, 289 15:5, 420 16, 58, 263 16:1, 58, 59, 118, 591 16:5, 76, 166 16:5-6, 263 16:8, 118 16:8-11, 53, 606, 615 16:10, 53, 87, 100, 101, 436, 614 16:10-11, 5, 437, 824 16:11, 61, 118, 119 17, 75, 235, 388,	932 17:1, 421 17:1-2, 666 17:2, 87, 712 17:3, 421, 435, 713 17:5, 666 17:6, 86 17:7, 118, 712 17:8, 18, 221, 525, 526, 527 17:8-9, 711 17:11-12, 711 17:12, 830 17:13, 75, 87, 817, 819 17:13-14, 831 17:15, 71 18, 30, 235, 378, 584, 602, 614, 711, 805, 819, 932 18:1, 619, 712 18:1-2, 525, 819 18:2, 15, 23, 86, 118, 119, 481, 483, 526, 527, 712, 830 18:2-5, 61 18:3, 86, 819, 930 18:3-19, 50 18:4, 52 18:4-5, 713, 819 18:6, 5, 21, 86, 247, 666, 819, 932 18:7, 482, 814, 817 18:7-15, 62, 591, 711 18:8, 46, 520, 817 18:9, 817, 819 18:10, 46, 527, 817, 819 18:11, 262, 817 18:12, 817 18:12-19, 831 18:13, 817 18:14, 527, 817, 829 18:15, 431, 817 18:16-19, 713 18:17, 87 18:18, 76 18:20, 665 18:20-24, 713 18:21, 247 18:22, 666 18:24, 117, 665 18:25-27, 713 18:27, 293, 729 18:27-28, 805 18:28, 86, 528, 714 18:29, 714 18:30, 526, 712 18:30-31, 119 18:31, 483, 526 18:31-42, 713 18:33, 16, 714 18:34, 831 18:34-42, 714 18:35, 526	18:35-36, 528 18:41, 811, 812 18:42, 713 18:43, 714 18:43-45, 714 18:46, 86, 526 18:46-50, 714 18:47, 434 18:49, 87, 290 18:50, 87, 467, 932 19, 49, 84, 235, 378, 583, 585 19:1, 60, 67, 68, 290, 487, 591 19:1-6, 51, 60, 62 19:4, 487 19:7, 224, 249 19:7-10, 729 19:7-11, 289, 432 19:8, 528 19:9, 86, 198, 325, 900 19:11, 88 19:13, 87, 88 19:14, 86, 87, 117, 440, 483, 526, 616, 711 20, 235, 378, 584 20-21, 151 20:1, 713 20:2, 21, 938 20:2-3, 937 20:6, 467, 711, 713, 937, 938 20:7, 15, 591, 645 20:7-8, 291 20:9, 713 21, 235, 378, 584, 617, 832 21:1, 324, 714 21:4, 434, 821 21:4-7, 432 21:5, 289 21:8-10, 100 21:8-13, 819 21:12, 829 21:13, 324 22, 235, 388, 393, 592, 617, 932 22:1, 73, 153, 308, 592, 651, 664, 812 22:1-2, 392, 394, 776, 811 22:1-10, 388 22:2, 86, 392 22:3, 117 22:3-5, 776, 777 22:4-5, 713 22:5, 714 22:6, 19 22:6-8, 289, 606, 776 22:7, 592 22:7-8, 713 22:8, 592 22:9, 528 22:9-10, 388, 431 22:9-11, 776, 777 22:10, 920 22:12-13, 591, 713	22:12-22, 832 22:13, 15, 830 22:14, 311 22:14-18, 713 22:17, 16 22:18, 592 22:19-21, 710 22:20, 16, 434 22:21, 15, 528, 606 22:21-22, 290 22:21-31, 714 22:22, 87 22:22-31, 780 22:23, 204, 205, 395 22:25, 932 22:27, 645, 932 22:27-28, 62, 824 22:28, 87, 116 22:29, 101, 479, 824 22:30, 824 23, 58, 75, 528 23:1, 14, 58, 153, 522 23:3, 663 23:4, 118, 119, 516, 815 23:5, 76, 591 23:5-6, 525 23:6, 76, 87, 400, 821, 932 24, 235, 236, 389, 585, 620, 641 24:1, 14 24:1-2, 60, 290, 932 24:1-6, 713 24:2, 48, 62 24:3, 620 24:3-5, 289 24:4, 420 24:5, 247 24:6, 117 24:7, 23, 641, 932 24:7-10, 72, 87 24:9, 591, 713 24:8, 61, 117, 641 24:8-10, 932 24:9, 23, 641, 932 24:10, 61, 117, 641, 831 25, 2, 235, 388, 893 25:2, 86, 87, 289, 712 25:3, 289, 824 25:4-5, 397 25:5, 86, 88, 713, 824 25:6, 87, 646, 815 25:7, 397 25:8, 86 25:8-9, 397 25:8-10, 389 25:10, 86, 87, 392, 397, 421 25:11, 397 25:12, 397 25:12-13, 205 25:12-15, 389 25:14, 204, 392,
---	---	--	--	---	--	---

397	117, 324, 601,	431, 517, 520,	36:5-6, 60	40:1-12, 805	832	247, 303
25:16, 117, 777,	819, 825, 932	583	36:6, 14, 481, 711	40:2-12, 805	44:9-16, 391, 811,	47:3, 584, 832
811	29:10-11, 302,	33:6-8, 60	36:6-7, 588	40:3, 290, 389,	823	47:3-4, 303
25:18, 87, 397	304	33:6-9, 48, 932	36:7, 18, 525,	487	44:10-11, 397	47:4, 304
25:19, 830	29:11, 324, 815,	33:8, 87, 204, 205	526, 527	40:5, 86, 389	44:11, 14	47:5, 13, 303
25:20, 87, 118,	819	33:9, 586, 825	36:8, 21	40:6, 75	44:12, 395	47:7, 87, 618, 619
250, 289, 714	30, 235, 584, 620,	33:12, 421	36:9, 117, 118,	40:8, 8640-7, 6,	44:12-13, 397	47:8, 87, 117, 303
25:21, 88, 824	805, 931, 932	33:13-17, 711	264, 431	719	44:13-16, 289	47:8-9, 525
25:22, 389	30:1, 87	33:13-18, 117	36:10, 711	40:10, 248, 664	44:17, 392, 645	47:9, 303
26, 75, 235, 389	30:1-3, 77	33:15, 932	36:11, 87	40:11, 87, 811,	44:17-19, 27	48, 89, 235, 583,
26:1, 87, 421,	30:2, 392, 527	33:18, 204, 205,	36:12, 87	815	44:17-26, 289	932, 938, 939
433, 811	30:3, 321	434	37, 2, 3, 235, 585,	40:14, 434	44:19, 527	48:1, 117, 483,
26:2, 421	30:4, 87, 646	33:18-22, 830	651, 665, 811,	40:14-15, 289	44:20, 645	664, 930, 938
26:4-6, 433	30:5, 61, 517, 815	33:20, 119, 526,	893	40:17, 86, 88	44:21, 421	48:1-2, 113
26:5, 591	30:8, 87	830	37:1, 435, 810	41, 235, 273, 527,	44:24, 117, 395,	48:1-3, 61
26:6, 932	30:9, 52, 290,	33:21, 249	37:3, 665	805	397, 400, 651,	48:2, 51, 87, 483,
26:7, 87	321, 322, 812	33:22, 87	37:5, 665	41:1, 199	815	583, 937
26:8, 21, 114, 932	30:11, 77, 301	34, 2, 204, 235,	37:6, 665	41:4, 87	44:24-25, 391	48:2-9, 419
26:10, 731	30:11-12, 392	805, 893	37:7, 88, 118,	41:5, 289, 591	45, 21, 221, 235,	48:3, 23, 583, 830
27, 58, 75, 388	30:12, 77, 86, 87	34:2-22, 250	435, 653, 824	41:6, 87	263, 451, 584,	48:3-8, 831
27:1, 23, 58, 434,	31, 235, 388, 592	34:4-10, 713	37:9, 23, 824	41:9, 219, 775	612, 615, 616,	48:4-8, 936
526, 528, 714	31:1, 87, 664, 714	34:5, 289	37:11, 606	41:11, 87	617, 741, 932	48:6, 920
27:2, 87, 591	31:1-4, 118, 525	34:6, 777	37:12, 434, 729	41:12-13, 826	45—48, 27	48:8, 664
27:3, 58, 591	31:2, 23, 483, 526	34:6-9, 805	37:13, 117	41:13, 234, 825	45:1, 73, 439,	48:10, 664
27:3-9, 832	31:2-3, 23, 483,	34:7, 204, 831	37:14, 434, 527,	42, 24, 234, 470	486, 707	48:10-11, 61
27:4, 525, 821	526	34:8, 86, 815	729, 829	42—43, 26, 27,	45:1-5, 830	48:12-13, 830
27:4-6, 393, 932	31:3, 86	34:8-9, 289	37:14-15, 2, 830	71, 235, 642,	45:2-5, 27	48:12-14, 24
27:5, 483, 526	31:4, 23	34:8-10, 665	37:17, 421	774	45:3, 527	48:13, 23
27:6, 289	31:5, 86	34:10, 16, 205	37:18-19, 289	42—44, 26	45:3-4, 830	48:14, 617, 618
27:7, 59, 811	31:6, 87	34:11, 325, 900	37:19, 434, 822	42—49, 26, 76	45:4, 665	48:49, 89
27:8-9, 117	31:6-8, 711	34:11-22, 432	37:20, 100	42—59, 643	45:5, 527	49, 100, 235, 585,
27:9, 86, 117,	31:7, 117, 250	34:13, 322	37:21, 665	42—72, 234, 581	45:6, 117, 820,	811, 893, 899
526, 712	31:7-8, 805, 830	34:14, 665	37:25, 219, 653,	824	824	49:3, 585
27:10, 249	31:9, 87, 811	34:15, 117	810	42:1, 587	45:6-7, 606	49:4, 585
27:12, 87, 420,	31:9-10, 712	34:16, 117, 646	37:25-26, 2	42:1-2, 932	45:7, 289, 467,	49:5-6, 291
729	31:10, 87, 435	34:18, 118, 712	37:26, 665	42:1-5, 642, 774	468, 665	49:5-9, 100
27:13, 58, 61, 62,	31:11, 87	34:19, 434	37:27-29, 826	42:2, 61, 382	45:8, 21, 22	49:5-15, 53
305	31:12, 432	34:19-20, 665	37:28, 2, 86, 811	42:3, 72, 87	45:9, 920	49:7-15, 102
27:14, 59, 88,	31:13, 434, 713	34:19-22, 712	37:28-29, 823	42:4, 393, 642,	45:10, 21, 920	49:10, 224, 225
388, 389, 434,	31:14, 86, 87, 392	35, 235, 388, 619	37:30, 585, 665	645, 932	45:11, 451	49:12, 642
712, 824	31:14-16, 712	35:1-2, 830	37:30-31, 249	42:5, 642, 711,	45:15, 21	49:14, 14
28, 235, 389	31:14-24, 435,	35:1-3, 384, 831,	37:31, 665	774	45:16, 452, 920	49:14-20, 437
28:1, 86, 321,	651	832	37:32, 434	42:6, 86	45:17, 289	49:15, 102, 436,
483, 526	31:15, 822	35:2, 526	37:34, 824	42:6-11, 642, 774	46, 62, 235, 386,	781, 824
28:1-3, 322	31:16, 88, 117,	35:3, 527	37:38, 100	42:7, 26, 44, 312	583, 616, 641,	49:16, 21
28:2, 21, 87	528, 711	35:4, 289, 434	37:39, 2, 483,	42:8, 487	932, 938, 939	49:16-20, 291,
28:3, 87	31:17, 87, 289	35:5, 384	526, 822	42:9, 86, 87, 815	46—48, 27	665
28:6, 87	31:18, 87	35:6, 384	37:40, 711	42:10, 72, 87,	46:1, 119, 439,	49:19, 113
28:7, 86, 87, 119,	31:19, 204, 665	35:7-8, 384, 591	38, 3, 235, 388,	289, 290	486, 526, 617	49:19-20, 436,
517, 526, 713	31:19-24, 805	35:8, 100	932	42:11, 642, 711,	46:2-3, 482	824
28:7-8, 714	31:20, 118	35:10, 384, 777	38:1-8, 831	774	46:2-4, 60, 249	49:20, 642
28:8, 23, 118,	31:22, 87, 117	35:11, 384	38:3, 87	43:1, 582, 811	46:3, 60, 483	49:20—79:11,
467, 526	31:23-24, 388,	35:11-16, 384	38:5, 225	43:1-5, 642, 774	46:4, 117, 247,	579
28:9, 528, 711,	389	35:13, 384	38:10, 528	43:2, 23, 483,	937, 938	50, 24, 76, 234,
815	31:24, 87	35:15, 384	38:12, 100, 434	526, 811	46:4-5, 482, 483,	235, 386, 612,
29, 46, 235, 262,	32, 30, 235, 389,	35:15-16, 289	38:15, 86, 88, 392	43:3, 117, 483	583, 936	665
263	584, 805	35:17, 117, 384,	38:16, 289	43:3-4, 26, 393	46:5, 117, 583	50:1-3, 817
29:1, 487	32:1, 806	434	38:18, 87	43:4, 86	46:5-6, 936	50:1-6, 811
29:1-2, 263, 819,	32:1-2, 289, 535	35:17-19, 290	38:20, 714	43:5, 642, 711,	46:6-7, 583	50:1-15, 819
932	32:1-7, 932	35:18, 393	38:21, 86, 651	774	46:6-8, 419	50:5, 664, 819,
29:3, 61, 247,	32:3-4, 775	35:20, 384	39, 235, 388	44, 235, 390, 391,	46:7, 23, 117, 642	932
627, 628	32:5, 87, 811	35:22, 117	39:1, 322	398, 582, 651,	46:8-11, 936	50:6, 436, 664
29:3-4, 819	32:6, 76, 87	35:23, 86, 528,	39:4-5, 821	830	46:9, 100, 527,	50:8-14, 932
29:3-6, 627	32:6-8, 806	812	39:5-7, 822	44—49, 24, 234	583, 831	50:9, 14, 21
29:5, 222, 629	32:9, 15, 806	35:23-24, 384,	39:7, 88	44:1-3, 391, 392	46:10-11, 290	50:10, 13, 14
29:5-6, 819	32:10-11, 436	811	39:8, 225, 289	44:1-8, 713	46:11, 23, 117,	50:10-11, 482
29:6, 628	33, 3, 235, 582	35:24, 86, 197,	39:9, 824	44:2, 117	483, 642	50:11, 18, 481,
29:7, 603, 629	33:1-3, 439	811	39:11, 19	44:3, 117	47, 235, 290, 499,	482
29:7-8, 819	33:2, 87	35:26, 289	39:12, 87	44:4, 87	932	50:13, 14
29:8, 629	33:4, 62	35:27, 88	39:13, 824	44:6, 829	47:1, 71	50:14, 75, 87, 247
29:9, 819	33:4-7, 49	35:27-28, 290	40, 235, 388, 584,	44:6-7, 711	47:1-2, 824	50:14-15, 805
29:9-10, 814	33:5, 86, 87	35:28, 664	797	44:8, 87	47:1-9, 249	50:15, 290
29:10, 44, 87,	33:6, 114, 249,	36, 235, 263, 389	40:1, 88, 117	44:9, 289, 831,	47:2, 87, 117,	50:16, 664

50:16-23, 819	55:19, 117, 205	61:4, 525, 527	67:7, 205	433	324	78:1, 585
50:23, 713, 932	55:19-20, 616	61:6, 434	68, 235, 236, 440,	71:8, 290	74, 62, 64, 235,	78:2, 585
51, 235, 389, 393,	55:22, 388, 651	62, 58	483, 602, 625,	71:9, 821	263, 391, 832	78:4, 303
775, 932	55:22-23, 206	62:1, 620, 711	932	71:10, 434	74:1, 14, 811	78:5, 304, 421
51—72, 613	55:23, 87, 100,	62:1-2, 58, 711	68:1, 72, 831	71:13, 289, 714	74:1-8, 832	78:5-8, 821
51—100, 78, 88,	101	62:1-7, 61	68:1-2, 118	71:14-24, 714	74:2, 392, 646	78:10, 421
259, 287, 445,	56, 617, 932	62:1-12, 23	68:2, 100	71:15, 664, 714	74:3-8, 397	78:13, 304
593, 714	56:1, 18, 73, 615	62:2, 86, 118,	68:4, 47	71:19, 388	74:6-7, 582	78:14-16, 304
51:1, 87, 248,	56:2, 87	483, 526, 830	68:5, 199, 249,	71:21, 289	74:7, 21, 114,	78:15, 262
811, 815	56:3, 87	62:3, 23, 59, 811	528, 811, 920	71:22, 248	718, 832, 932	78:15-16, 482
51:2, 87, 711	56:4, 87, 642	62:6, 86, 483	68:5-6, 321	71:24, 289	74:10, 291, 382,	78:20, 14
51:2-4, 578	56:6, 434	62:6-7, 526	68:6-7, 321	72, 61, 235, 273,	819	78:23, 46
51:3, 87	56:8, 6, 87	62:7, 86, 483	68:7, 774	584	74:10-11, 815	78:25, 219
51:4, 87, 117, 811	56:9, 119	62:8, 59	68:7-8, 616	72:1, 733	74:11, 819	78:35, 483
51:5, 433, 713	56:10-11, 642	62:10, 420	68:8, 61	72:1-2, 588	74:12, 49	78:38, 100, 815
51:6, 395	56:11, 87	62:11, 511	68:8-10, 831	72:1-4, 712, 734	74:12-17, 48, 50,	78:38-39, 249
51:7, 517, 711	56:12, 932	62:12, 86, 87	68:13, 18	72:1-10, 830	392, 711	78:39, 646
51:8, 517	57, 75, 932	63, 75	68:14-17, 61	72:2, 198, 665,	74:13, 19, 46, 819	78:41, 248
51:9, 711	57:1, 87, 100,	63:1, 517	68:15-16, 516	777, 811	74:13-14, 62, 64,	78:42, 645
51:10, 711	118, 393, 439,	63:1-8, 932	68:16, 117	72:3, 482, 483	591	78:44, 264
51:10-12, 713	486, 525, 526,	63:2, 21	68:17, 527	72:4, 528, 711	74:13-15, 45, 46	78:45, 18
51:11, 398, 775	527, 614	63:6, 645	68:21, 832	72:6, 589	74:14, 19, 819	78:47, 220, 814
51:12, 87	57:1-3, 118	63:7, 118, 525,	68:24, 87	72:9-11, 289	74:15, 60, 814	78:48, 14
51:14, 86, 87,	57:1-6, 712	526, 527	68:24-27, 920	72:10-11, 734	74:16-17, 62	78:52, 304
664, 710	57:3, 86	63:8, 588	68:26, 439	72:12, 528	74:18, 224, 225,	78:54, 117, 481
51:15, 3	57:4, 829	63:9, 100, 434	68:30, 14	72:13, 712	291, 382, 832	78:55, 304
51:15-17, 75	57:5, 642, 711	64, 235	68:31, 13	72:14, 382, 528	74:19, 263	78:60, 117
51:17, 398, 713	57:9, 87	64:1, 87, 434	68:32, 773	72:15, 734	74:20, 392	78:61, 815
51:18, 938	57:11, 642, 711	64:2, 87	68:32-33, 616	72:16, 482, 664	74:21, 382, 391	78:62-64, 832
51:18-19, 393	58, 263, 316, 391,	64:3, 829	69, 221, 235, 393,	72:17, 289, 734	74:22, 224, 225,	78:66, 118
51:19, 14	932	64:3-4, 829	592, 615, 932	72:18-19, 234	291, 382, 819	78:67-72, 668
52, 235, 389, 617	58:1, 486, 665	64:4, 393	69:1, 73, 486, 712	72:20, 734	75, 808, 932	78:68, 483, 939
52:1-4, 517	58:2-5, 665	64:7, 829, 831	69:2, 582	73, 29, 30, 58, 61,	75:1, 73, 118, 486	78:68-72, 932
52:2, 100	58:3, 433, 821	64:10, 389	69:3, 824	85, 235, 432,	75:2, 436	78:69, 21, 60,
52:3, 87	58:6, 16, 528	65, 235, 808, 932	69:4, 382, 712	585, 805, 811,	75:2-10, 71, 73	483, 872
52:5, 61, 62	58:6-11, 665	65:1, 932, 937	69:5, 225	893	75:4-5, 527	79, 235, 316, 391,
52:7, 23, 526	58:9, 222	65:3, 938	69:6, 290	73—83, 24, 25,	75:7, 811	617, 940
52:8, 86, 87, 117,	58:11, 811	65:4, 21, 525, 932	69:7, 824	76, 234, 386	75:8, 220, 718	79—80, 25, 26
220	59, 617, 832, 932	65:5, 664	69:7-9, 290	73—89, 234, 581	75:10, 527, 528	79:1, 21, 116,
53, 235, 247, 263,	59:1, 86, 87, 486	65:5-8, 712	69:7-12, 382	73—150, 258,	76, 89, 235, 583,	117, 248, 291,
391, 617, 797	59:1-2, 586	65:5-11, 481	69:10-12, 289	613, 621	932, 938	392, 397
53:1, 223, 225,	59:2, 711, 712	65:6, 481	69:13, 247, 712	73:1, 324, 776	76:1, 73, 439, 486	79:1-3, 832
263, 485, 486,	59:3, 434	65:6-7, 60, 814,	69:14-15, 52, 528	73:2, 264	76:1-2, 117	79:1-5, 832
586	59:5, 247	937	69:15, 52, 582	73:3, 118	76:1-3, 831	79:2, 13, 17
53:4, 87, 219	59:6, 16	65:7, 45	69:16, 87, 815	73:3-5, 665	76:1-6, 831	79:3, 117
53:6, 710, 938	59:8, 248, 249	65:7-9, 60	69:17, 815	73:3-9, 435	76:2, 483	79:4, 289, 390
54—59, 235	59:9, 23, 86, 526	65:12, 482	69:18, 382, 712	73:7, 23	76:2-3, 936, 937	79:6, 591
54:1, 73, 486,	59:11, 389, 526	65:13, 14	69:19, 117	73:8-9, 517	76:2-7, 419	79:6-7, 775
711, 811	59:11-12, 831	66, 235, 584, 805,	69:19-20, 289	73:12, 665	76:3, 527, 583,	79:7, 397
54:3, 434	59:13, 87	808, 932	69:19-21, 712	73:12-14, 396	829	79:8, 397, 646
54:4, 119, 388,	59:16-17, 526	66:4, 824, 932	69:20, 812	73:13, 776	76:4, 482	79:8-13, 712
434	59:17, 23, 86, 526	66:7, 825	69:21, 220	73:13-14, 46	76:4-9, 936	79:9, 591, 711,
54:5, 87	60, 221, 235, 391,	66:8, 824	69:22-28, 713	73:15-20, 71	76:5-6, 583	775
54:6, 87, 393, 932	616, 617, 620,	66:10, 435	69:28, 6, 436, 719	73:16, 776	76:9, 712, 811	79:9-10, 291
54:7, 712	932	66:10-12, 76	69:29, 290, 711	73:16-27, 436	77, 52, 62, 235,	79:10, 291, 393,
55, 617	60—150, 593,	66:11, 526	69:30, 87	73:17, 21, 61, 118	386, 393	832
55:1, 73, 87, 486	613, 808	66:12, 814	69:30-31, 487	73:17-18, 117	77—78, 89	79:11, 320, 321
55:1-2, 421	60:1, 87, 486, 831	66:13-14, 805	69:31, 15, 75	73:17-20, 435,	77:1, 620	79:12, 291
55:2, 87	60:1-5, 823	66:13-15, 235,	69:33, 117	824	77:3, 645	79:13, 14, 391
55:6, 617	60:3, 220	805, 932	69:34, 18, 60, 932	73:18-19, 100	77:4, 264	80, 221, 235, 391,
55:6-7, 615	60:4, 205	66:13-20, 805	69:34-36, 393	73:20, 291	77:8, 248	615, 617, 713,
55:6-9, 206	60:5, 249, 711,	66:15, 14	69:35, 712	73:21-22, 811	77:9, 815	831, 932
55:7, 615	713	66:16, 290, 805	69:35-36, 713	73:21-28, 61	77:10, 26	80:1, 14, 117,
55:8, 615	60:6, 21	67, 391, 773, 808,	70, 235, 797	73:22, 14, 224	77:11, 645	390, 391, 486,
55:12-14, 206	60:6-12, 823	932	70:2, 434	73:23, 118	77:11-20, 932	528
55:13, 775	60:7, 23	67:1, 73, 117,	70:2-3, 289	73:23-26, 396	77:16, 20, 44	80:1-3, 390
55:14, 393	60:9-12, 830	486, 528, 815	71, 235	73:23-28, 117,	77:16-19, 60, 62	80:3, 117, 524,
55:15, 206	60:10, 831, 832	67:1-2, 290	71:1, 118, 591	812	77:16-20, 51, 817	528, 642, 711
55:16, 86, 247,	61, 235, 616	67:1-7, 824	71:1-6, 711	73:24, 53, 824	77:17, 829	80:3-16, 100
587	61:1, 73, 486	67:3, 524, 642	71:2, 664, 711,	73:25, 61	77:16-20, 50	80:4-6, 390
55:17, 712, 821	61:2, 61, 525	67:4, 811	811	73:26, 526	77:20, 14	80:6, 390
55:17-19, 206	61:3, 23, 87, 118,	67:5, 524, 642,	71:3, 526	73:27, 100, 824	78, 235, 281, 722,	80:7, 117, 524,
55:18, 591	830	773	71:6, 290, 431,	73:28, 59, 118,	932	528, 642, 711

80:8-11, 390, 392	932	89:19, 289, 327	526, 527	290, 329, 584	815, 821	104:11, 13, 15
80:10, 222, 482	86:1, 88	89:19-37, 392,	91:7, 832	96:10-13, 664,	102:3, 582	104:12, 17, 60
80:12, 23, 528	86:2, 86, 88, 711	932	91:9, 247, 526	811	102:8, 87	104:13, 47, 482
80:14, 390	86:4, 88	89:20, 248, 467,	91:11-12, 606	96:11, 18, 60	102:9, 87	104:14, 14, 431
80:15, 390	86:5, 86, 87, 815	468	91:13, 16, 46, 830	96:11-12, 516	102:11, 527, 821	104:15, 65, 219
80:18, 390, 391	86:6, 87	89:22-23, 326	91:15, 118	96:12, 67, 516	102:12, 646, 825	104:16, 222
80:19, 117, 524,	86:7, 86, 824	89:24, 289, 327,	92, 89, 235, 585,	96:12-13, 68	102:12-22, 393	104:17, 17, 222
528, 642, 711	86:8, 115, 249	527	620, 805, 931	96:13, 67, 290,	102:13, 824	104:18, 14, 17,
81, 90, 235, 932	86:9, 62, 932	89:25, 50	92:3, 616	436, 664, 812	102:15, 205	481, 482, 526
81:1, 486, 526	86:9-10, 290	89:26, 249, 483,	92:5, 814	97:1, 74, 290,	102:15-16, 824	104:19-23, 47,
81:1-2, 71	86:12, 86, 87	528, 712	92:6, 224, 225	329, 516, 591	102:16, 824, 938	821, 822
81:2, 798	86:15, 86, 87	89:27, 247, 289,	92:7, 100, 101	97:1-6, 932	102:18, 719	104:19-24, 48
81:2-3, 71	86:16, 88, 117	329	92:9, 100	97:2, 46, 117, 664	102:19-20, 321	104:20, 13
81:6-16, 73, 76	87, 235, 583, 617,	89:27-28, 249	92:10, 527	97:2-5, 817	102:20, 320	104:20-26, 603
81:9, 420	932	89:28, 664	92:10-11, 832	97:3-5, 831	102:21, 938	104:21, 16, 311,
81:10, 932	87—88, 24, 234	89:30, 326	92:12, 222	97:4, 61	102:21-22, 824	431
81:11-12, 823	87:1, 483	89:32-33, 248	92:12-14, 665	97:5, 61, 198, 482	102:25, 62, 825	104:22, 526
81:16, 219	87:1-2, 483	89:33, 327	92:13, 21, 117	97:6, 584, 591	102:25-26, 100	104:24, 48, 62,
82, 114, 235, 391,	87:2, 23	89:33-34, 249	92:15, 483, 526	97:7, 115, 289,	102:25-27, 606	481, 814
421, 591	87:4, 45, 50, 483	89:34, 664	93, 71, 235, 499,	290	102:26-27, 825	104:24-30, 46
82—83, 25	87:6, 719	89:34-35, 326	620	97:9, 247, 584	102:27, 826	104:25, 13
82:1, 117, 421,	88, 235, 373, 386,	89:37, 329	93—99, 581	97:12, 646	102:28, 651	104:26, 45, 62,
587	421, 617, 619,	89:38, 467	93—100, 155,	98, 67, 714	103, 3, 805	64, 583
82:2, 811	812, 932	89:38-39, 327,	938, 941	98:1, 248, 487,	103—106, 235	104:27-28, 431
82:2-3, 665	88:1, 263, 321,	777	93:1, 74, 249,	712, 793	103:1, 249, 324	104:27-29, 603
82:2-4, 665	486, 780	89:38-40, 390	329, 584	98:1-2, 584	103:1-2, 290	104:28-30, 48
82:3, 528	88:2, 776	89:38-45, 832	93:1-2, 584	98:1-3, 61, 290,	103:3, 87, 527,	104:29, 431, 432
82:5, 115	88:3, 582	89:39, 151, 326	93:3, 44	774	664	104:30, 13, 118
82:6-7, 665	88:4, 321	89:40, 23	93:3-4, 60, 516,	98:1-9, 516, 811	103:4, 87, 101	104:31, 65
83, 235, 316, 390,	88:5, 5, 52, 322,	89:41, 289	584	98:2, 664	103:5, 17	104:32, 482
391, 932	646	89:42, 387	93:4, 439	98:3, 22, 646, 664	103:6, 86, 664,	104:34, 440
83:3, 264	88:6, 321, 793	89:45, 289, 327	93:5, 21, 400	98:3-6, 61	811	104:35, 304, 324,
83:4, 645	88:7, 26	89:46, 327, 811	94, 3, 89, 235,	98:4-6, 774, 932	103:8, 86, 87, 815	482
83:7, 798	88:8, 321, 322	89:47, 646	316, 620	98:4-9, 664	103:8-11, 248	105, 73, 234, 281,
83:9-12, 392	88:9, 776	89:48, 52	94:1-2, 817	98:6, 61, 329	103:10, 664, 815	619, 722
83:13, 435	88:10-12, 290	89:49, 326, 327	94:2, 293, 811	98:7, 18	103:11, 205	105:1, 304
83:13-18, 831	88:12, 52, 321,	89:49-50, 329	94:3, 811	98:7-8, 67	103:12, 664	105:3, 249
83:14, 482	322	89:50, 327, 646	94:4, 293	98:7-9, 61, 774,	103:13, 86, 205	105:5, 645
83:14-18, 100	88:14, 117, 387,	89:50-51, 290,	94:6, 420, 702,	932	103:15, 222	105:7, 249, 591
83:15, 118, 817	815	327	729	98:8, 482	103:17, 205, 664,	105:8, 646
83:16, 319	88:18, 322, 776	89:52, 234	94:8, 224, 225,	98:9, 61, 67, 198,	823, 825	105:17-21, 320,
83:16-18, 290	89, 64, 114, 235,	90, 58, 235, 619,	226	249, 290, 664,	103:17-18, 434	322
84, 61, 235, 525,	273, 386, 390,	932	94:9, 62	812	103:18, 421, 645,	105:18, 320
583, 599, 651,	391, 584, 619,	90—106, 234,	94:12, 585	99:1, 74, 117	664	105:19-20, 322
932	824, 831	581, 590	94:18, 528	99:1-5, 290, 487,	103:19, 87, 824	105:20, 321
84—85, 24, 234	89:1, 248	90:1, 118, 328	94:21, 434	932	103:20, 487	105:20-22, 322
84—88, 26	89:1-2, 392	90:1-2, 328, 825	94:22, 247, 483	99:3, 249, 642	103:20-21, 302	105:22, 321, 322
84—89, 76	89:1-31, 50	90:2, 53, 62, 481,	95, 62, 73, 235	99:4, 329	103:20-22, 304	105:23-45, 823
84:1, 486	89:2, 825	516, 825	95—96, 89	99:5, 117, 642,	103:21, 931, 932	105:26-27, 304
84:1-2, 932	89:2-39, 74	90:3-12, 328	95—99, 71	664	103:22, 249, 324	105:27—137:6,
84:2, 118, 250,	89:3, 326, 421,	90:4, 561, 825	95—100, 235	99:9, 483, 642	104, 60, 602	579
517	664	90:7, 328	95:1, 483, 526,	100, 582, 585,	104:1, 324	105:29, 18
84:3, 117, 526,	89:3-4, 392, 932	90:7-8, 327	714	620	104:1-2, 48, 303	105:33, 220
527	89:5-8, 715	90:9-10, 822	95:1-2, 932	100:1-4, 932	104:1-3, 817	105:37, 321
84:9, 27, 467,	89:5-12, 61	90:9-15, 821	95:1-5, 61	100:1-5, 516	104:2, 61, 583	105:39-42, 304
468, 525, 526,	89:5-18, 392	90:10, 327, 432	95:3, 115, 249,	100:3, 14, 62, 249	104:2-30, 932	105:40, 18, 219
830	89:7, 117	90:11, 327, 821	290, 329, 932	100:4, 23, 87,	104:3, 44, 46, 527	105:41, 482
84:10, 118	89:8-10, 45	90:12, 822	95:3-5, 290	117, 932	104:3-18, 48	105:42-43, 646
84:11, 815	89:8-18, 49	90:13, 327, 328,	95:4, 482	100:5, 248, 815,	104:4, 606, 814	105:43, 321
85, 235, 391, 713	89:9, 45	811	95:5, 44, 62	825	104:5, 62, 583	106, 73, 234, 273,
85:1-3, 710, 815	89:9-13, 20	90:13-17, 328	95:6, 932	101, 235, 289,	104:5-6, 60	281, 324, 722,
85:2, 711	89:9-14, 48	90:14, 151, 327,	95:7, 14	584	104:5-9, 50	932
85:2-3, 616	89:9-18, 62	822	95:7-8, 615, 823	101—150, 258,	104:6, 44	106:1, 248, 815,
85:4, 713	89:10, 64	90:16, 327	95:8-11, 714	287, 305, 325,	104:6-10, 481	825
85:6, 798	89:11, 60, 62	91, 58, 236, 247,	96, 67, 234, 499	593	104:6-12, 60	106:2, 303
85:7, 713	89:11-14, 811	830, 832	96—99, 664	101:1, 86, 87	104:7, 814	106:4, 646
85:8, 225	89:12, 516	91—118, 90	96:1-3, 932	101:2, 22	104:8-9, 62	106:4-5, 646
85:9, 117, 205,	89:14, 197, 249,	91:1, 118, 526,	96:3, 290, 584	101:3-7, 588	104:9, 44, 814	106:6, 397, 710
713	327, 664	527	96:3-5, 290	101:7, 22	104:10, 60	106:7, 645
85:10, 517	89:15, 117, 528	91:1-2, 830	96:4, 115, 249,	101:8, 87	104:10-11, 431,	106:8, 710
85:12, 664	89:17, 527	91:1-7, 831	930	102, 235, 393,	481	106:8-11, 304
86, 26, 89, 90,	89:18, 248, 525,	91:2, 58, 250, 526	96:9, 932	619, 932	104:10-13, 65	106:9, 50
235, 408, 588,	526, 830	91:4, 118, 525,	96:10, 198, 249,	102:2, 117, 775,	104:10-18, 482	106:10, 710, 711

106:10-11, 831	110:6, 812, 820	116:17, 932	121, 58, 73, 620	132:16, 665	139:23-24, 397	146—150, 155,
106:17-18, 100	111, 2, 61, 235,	116:18, 932	121:1, 59	132:17, 467, 468,	140—141, 263	234, 324, 581,
106:20, 15	893	116:18-19, 584	121:1-2, 61	527, 528	140—143, 235	589, 590, 780
106:21, 710	111—112, 234	117, 235, 582	121:2, 825	133, 234, 235,	140:2, 821	146:1, 324
106:23, 100	111—117, 154	118, 235, 236,	121:3, 58	289	140:3, 19, 264	146:4, 100
106:33, 397	111:4, 646	378, 585, 592,	121:4, 58	133:1, 379	140:6, 87	146:6, 18, 44
106:43, 710	111:5, 205, 646,	668, 711, 825	121:5, 58, 526,	133:2, 379	140:7, 118, 526,	146:7, 86, 811
106:44-46, 249	664	118—119, 154	527	133:3, 60, 61, 939	714	146:7-8, 320
106:45, 392, 646	111:7-10, 249	118:1, 72, 248,	121:6, 135, 158	134, 235, 582	140:12, 86, 528	146:7-9, 665
106:47, 249, 391,	111:9, 249, 664	324, 588	121:7, 58	134:1, 21	140:12-13, 665	146:9, 729
397, 710	111:10, 325, 432,	118:1-4, 71	121:8, 826	134:3, 249, 815	141:3, 322	146:10, 324, 825,
106:48, 234, 397	816, 900, 933	118:2, 72	122, 235, 583,	135, 234, 235,	141:3-5, 397	940
107—145, 581	112, 2, 235, 289,	118:3, 22, 72	668	722	141:4, 87	147, 39
107—150, 234	536, 585, 893	118:4, 72	122:1, 118	135:1-2, 21	141:5, 250, 787	147:1, 324, 619
107:1, 248, 808,	112:1, 204, 205,	118:5-18, 324	122:4, 620	135:3, 301, 815	141:9, 87	147:3, 87, 398,
825	665	118:10-18, 832	122:5, 22	135:5, 115, 249	141:10, 87	527
107:1-2, 808	112:1-2, 535	118:12, 843	122:7, 588, 830	135:5-21, 290	142, 62, 932	147:5, 814
107:2, 225	112:2, 823	118:14, 526	123, 58, 235, 391,	135:6, 45	142:1, 87, 614	147:6, 88
107:4, 713, 808	112:2-5, 433	118:16, 608	798	135:8, 118	142:5, 61, 62	147:7, 71, 87
107:6, 642, 713	112:4, 528	118:18, 815	124, 58, 808	135:10, 118	142:6, 830	147:8, 482
107:8, 642, 808	112:5-9, 730	118:19, 23	124:2-3, 831	135:10-12, 831	142:7, 321	147:9, 14
107:10, 527, 808	112:6, 646	118:19-20, 932	124:2-5, 52	135:13, 825	143:1, 87	147:10, 15
107:10-11, 713	112:9, 433, 527	118:19-29, 235	124:6, 528	135:14, 812	143:1-2, 664	147:11, 824
107:13, 642, 713	112:10, 100	118:22-23, 606	124:7, 17	135:19, 22	143:2, 88, 421,	147:12, 117
107:14, 527	113, 154, 235,	118:25-26, 606	124:8, 249, 825	135:19-20, 72	811	147:13, 23, 940
107:15, 642, 808	324	118:27, 71, 117,	125, 58	135:20, 22, 205	143:3, 87, 434,	147:14, 219
107:17, 225, 808	113—118, 485	932	125:2, 58	136, 72, 235, 641,	832	147:15-18, 517
107:17-18, 713	113:2, 826	118:28-29, 805	125:4, 815	722, 724	143:5, 645	147:19-20, 824
107:18, 52	113:4, 249	118:29, 72, 248,	126, 58, 391	136—137, 154	143:7, 117, 811	147:20, 324
107:19, 225, 642,	113:5, 261	324, 588	126—128, 90	136:1-3, 487, 642	143:8, 86, 87	148, 290, 932
713	113:6, 261	119, 2, 4, 89, 155,	126:5, 812	136:2, 115	143:10, 118, 397,	148:1, 302, 324
107:21, 642, 808	113:7, 261	235, 378, 432,	127, 235	136:2-9, 60	398	148:1-5, 114
107:22, 808	113:7-8, 293	585	127—128, 452,	136:4, 304	143:11, 290	148:1-14, 60, 516
107:23, 808	113:9, 261, 920	119:1, 90	453	136:4-9, 487, 932	143:11-12, 421	148:2, 487, 932
107:25-27, 713	114, 154, 235,	119:1-8, 289	127:1, 452, 733	136:5-9, 304	143:12, 87, 88,	148:5, 249
107:28, 642, 713	601	119:8, 588	127:1-2, 734, 814	136:10-22, 304	100	148:5-6, 67
107:29, 814	114:1, 22	119:31, 289	127:2, 249	136:10-24, 487,	144, 62, 235	148:7, 46, 249,
107:31, 642, 808	114:1-2, 304	119:34, 420	127:3-5, 734	932	144:1, 86	302
107:32, 793	114:1-4, 482	119:50, 815	127:5, 289, 385,	136:11, 321	144:1-2, 483, 591	148:7-10, 482
107:33, 814	114:1-8, 51	119:51, 289	452	136:25, 13, 431	144:1-11, 584	148:8, 482, 814
107:33-34, 432	114:2, 21	119:54, 487, 509	128, 235, 585,	137, 235, 279,	144:2, 86, 526	148:8-9, 482
107:38, 14	114:3-6, 304	119:63, 204	893	316, 625, 775	144:4, 129, 432	148:10, 13, 14, 18
107:41, 14	114:4, 14	119:73, 62	128:1, 205	137:1, 318, 644	144:5, 482	148:13, 67, 249
108, 235, 932	114:5-8, 60	119:74, 205	128:3, 21, 220,	137:1-3, 793	144:5-8, 817	148:14, 324, 527
108:3, 87	114:6, 14	119:75, 811	452	137:2, 222	144:6, 527	149:1, 324
108:6, 249	114:8, 304, 482	119:80, 289	128:6, 452	137:3, 318	144:8, 87	149:2, 117, 940
108:9-13, 823	115, 58, 235	119:84, 811	129, 235, 808	137:5-7, 318	144:9, 71, 482	149:3, 71
109, 235, 316,	115—116, 90	119:90, 62, 248	129:1, 77	137:6, 644	144:10, 88	149:4, 88
651, 712	115—117, 619	119:92, 100	129:1-5, 730	137:7, 646, 823	144:11, 829	149:5-9, 830
109:4, 714	115:1-2, 291	119:94, 712	129:5, 289	137:7-9, 317	144:12, 21, 62,	149:6-7, 832
109:6, 714	115:2-8, 932	119:105, 528	130, 235, 389	137:8, 317, 589	920	149:8, 320, 321
109:9, 60	115:9-11, 59, 72,	119:114, 118, 526	130:2-3, 421	138, 235	144:12-15, 398	149:9, 324, 719
109:12-14, 434	119, 830	119:117, 712	130:5, 824	138:1, 87, 115	144:13, 14	150, 300, 301
109:13, 289	115:10, 22	119:130, 224, 528	131, 58	138:2, 21, 87,	145, 1, 2, 300,	150:1, 21, 324
109:14-15, 645	115:11, 205	119:132, 815	131:1, 814	249, 932	619, 798, 932	150:1-6, 234
109:15, 289, 646	115:12, 22	119:135, 117	131:2, 58, 821	138:6, 293	145—150, 235	150:3-5, 71, 439
109:17-20, 317	115:14-18, 60	119:143, 815	131:3, 59, 826	138:8, 249	145:1, 87	150:6, 324
109:20, 714	115:15, 249	119:146, 712	132, 235, 236,	139:1-18, 822	145:3, 930	151 (LXX), 39,
109:21, 811	115:17, 52, 290,	119:149, 249	468, 584, 932	139:6, 814	145:7, 646	234, 614
109:22, 88	934	119:151, 118	132—133, 263	139:7, 118, 397	145:7-9, 664	151—155 (Syriac
109:23, 18	115:18, 826	119:154, 421, 528	132—134, 939	139:7-12, 116	145:8, 86, 87	Peshitta), 234
109:29, 289, 714	116, 39, 235, 263,	119:164, 616	132:4, 263	139:8, 5, 53	145:9, 86, 87, 814	151:1 (LXX), 614
109:30, 87	805	119:176, 14	132:5, 932	139:12, 47, 821	145:13, 86, 798,	154 (Syriac
109:31, 712	116:1-4, 713	120, 235	132:6, 481	139:13, 431, 433,	825	Peshitta), 234
110, 74, 235, 407,	116:1-11, 73	120—134, 73, 77,	132:7, 71	434	145:13-21, 711	155 (Syriac
584, 592, 612,	116:3, 5, 52	154, 234, 485,	132:7-8, 116, 117	139:13-16, 62,	145:14, 528	Peshitta), 234
671	116:6, 224	620, 931	132:8, 72	433, 821	145:15, 822
110:1, 289, 606,	116:9, 61, 62	120:1, 439	132:9, 939	139:17,	145:15-16, 431	Proverbs
614, 615, 786	116:12-13, 713	120:1-4, 517	132:10, 117, 467,	814139:16, 6,	145:16, 13	1, 54, 55, 209,
110:3, 820	116:12-19, 73,	120:2, 729	468, 939	433, 719	145:17, 2, 86	428, 471, 536,
110:4, 469	235, 290	120:4, 829	132:11, 326	139:18, 118	145:20, 100	912
110:5, 119	116:14, 805	120:5, 878	132:12, 664, 940	139:19, 87, 118	145:21, 249	1—9, 24, 63, 70,
110:5-6, 249, 830	116:16, 920	120:5-7, 830	132:15, 665	139:19-24, 317	146, 582	102, 104, 105,

106, 107, 108, 152, 197, 205, 207, 208, 216, 217, 218, 224, 227, 237, 243, 245, 443, 533, 534, 536, 538, 541, 542, 547, 548, 549, 551, 552, 555, 558, 559, 565, 572, 574, 575, 576, 657, 658, 662, 663, 735, 736, 737, 803, 810, 858, 859, 861, 893, 901, 905, 906, 907, 909, 911, 912, 913, 924	224, 519, 529, 657, 729, 831 1:11-12, 658 1:11-14, 657 1:12, 7, 52, 321, 911 1:13, 56, 658 1:14, 658 1:14-15, 56 1:15, 56, 658 1:15-18, 657 1:16, 56, 658 1:17, 18, 56, 531, 534 1:17-18, 658 1:17—2:1, 95 1:18, 531 1:18-19, 534 1:19, 56, 57, 657, 658 1:20, 5, 103, 533, 735, 865 1:20-21, 55 1:20-33, 55, 57, 100, 102, 105, 106, 243, 516, 534, 542, 574, 657, 658, 905, 912, 916, 920 1:21, 23, 865 1:22, 55, 223, 224, 226, 811 1:22-27, 55 1:22-33, 55, 56 1:24-26, 103 1:24-27, 775 1:26, 533 1:26-27, 100 1:27, 55, 56 1:27—2:1, 799 1:28, 316 1:28-33, 55 1:29, 202, 223, 226, 250, 372 1:29-33, 810 1:30, 293 1:31, 775 1:32, 95, 224, 226, 775, 800 1:32-33, 55, 103 1:33, 55, 56, 433, 778 2, 3, 22, 103, 197, 202, 451, 515, 542, 545, 571, 574, 706, 912, 914 2:1, 107, 199, 534, 542, 657 2:1-6, 518 2:1-22, 103, 104, 106, 243, 534, 893 2:2, 910 2:4, 244 2:5, 202, 250, 251, 372, 810, 906 2:5-8, 910 2:6, 251, 534, 734, 814, 906 2:6-8, 910 2:7, 119, 372, 526	2:7-8, 118 2:9, 197, 198 2:10-16, 519 2:10-19, 225 2:11, 527 2:12-15, 519, 549 2:12-19, 542 2:13, 549 2:14, 810 2:15, 549 2:16, 207, 225, 452, 563, 843, 920 2:16-17, 452 2:16-19, 519, 729, 769, 917, 921 2:16-22, 920 2:17, 225, 559 2:18, 7, 22 2:18-19, 435 2:19, 61, 432 2:20-22, 542 2:21, 372 2:22, 775, 778 3, 201, 223, 664, 872 3—4, 432 3:1, 107, 193, 199, 534, 657 3:1-12, 103, 106, 243, 534, 855, 858 3:1-20, 106 3:1—8:36, 106 3:2, 61, 534, 811, 821 3:2-4, 433 3:3, 719 3:3-4, 292, 534 3:4, 117, 778 3:5, 202, 251, 531, 534, 811, 854, 857 3:5-6, 780 3:5-10, 910 3:7, 202, 250, 251, 372, 571 3:8, 433, 778 3:9, 251 3:9-10, 82, 85, 292, 534 3:10, 220 3:11, 297 3:11-12, 66, 252, 293, 534, 569, 734, 815, 910 3:12, 106, 544 3:13-16, 294 3:13-18, 105, 244, 518, 519 3:13-20, 106, 243, 534, 872, 874, 920 3:15, 536 3:16, 61, 778, 779 3:16-18, 433 3:18, 61, 432, 780, 781, 872 3:18-20, 62 3:19, 62, 66, 251, 854 3:19-20, 49, 62, 84, 85, 106,	197, 245, 519, 547, 869, 872, 903, 906, 912 3:21, 928 3:21-35, 103, 106, 243, 534 3:21—6:19, 106 3:25, 778 3:25-26, 433 3:26, 928 3:27, 563 3:27-35, 849 3:31, 810 3:31-35, 810 3:32, 251, 910 3:33, 21, 421, 544 3:33-34, 910 3:34, 224, 226, 293, 569 3:35, 103, 226, 292, 704 4, 150, 242, 428, 529, 532, 553 4:1, 102, 199, 207, 534, 657 4:1-5, 730 4:1-6, 906 4:1-9, 103, 106, 243, 534, 895, 912 4:1-19, 907 4:2, 102, 193 4:3, 102 4:3-4, 529 4:3-9, 28, 30, 722 4:4-6, 527 4:5-7, 518 4:5-9, 920 4:6, 102, 224 4:6-8, 105 4:6-9, 519 4:7, 541, 800, 854 4:8-9, 294 4:10, 61, 657, 811 4:10-19, 104, 106, 243, 534 4:11, 907 4:13, 432 4:14, 907 4:14-16, 534 4:14-17, 519 4:17, 219, 220 4:19, 103, 435 4:20-27, 103, 104, 106, 243, 534 4:21-22, 534 4:22, 432 4:23, 61, 322, 432, 534, 571, 910 4:23-27, 103, 106 4:27, 103 5, 3, 199 5—7, 544 5:1, 104, 518, 534, 657 5:1-6, 225, 519 5:1-14, 920 5:1-23, 103, 104, 105, 106, 243, 452, 519, 534 5:3, 207, 220, 225, 452, 534,	926 5:3-6, 729, 917, 921 5:3-20, 870 5:4, 222 5:5, 7, 435, 452 5:5-6, 7 5:6, 432, 436 5:8, 22 5:8-9, 292 5:8-14, 534 5:11, 452, 824 5:11-12, 293 5:12, 226 5:14, 452 5:15, 531 5:15-19, 452 5:15-23, 920 5:16, 865 5:18, 921 5:18-19, 105 5:18-20, 421 5:19, 16, 567, 568, 745, 870 5:20, 207, 225 5:21, 117, 251, 292, 861, 909 5:22, 322 5:23, 226, 452 934 6, 421 6:1, 466, 657 6:1-5, 105 6:1-19, 105, 106, 243, 534 6:5, 16, 17, 870 6:6, 18, 854, 870, 899 6:6-8, 105, 568 6:6-11, 51, 66, 421, 729, 854, 857 6:7-8, 854 6:8, 843 6:9, 811 6:9-11, 105, 854 6:10-11, 540 6:12-15, 100, 105, 519, 907 6:16, 251, 431, 511 6:16-17, 531 6:16-19, 105, 106, 534, 729 6:17, 202 6:19, 549 6:20, 102, 193, 433, 511, 928 6:20-22, 907 6:20-24, 519, 527 6:20-29, 920 6:20-35, 104, 105, 106, 199, 243, 452, 534 6:20—8:36, 106 6:23, 61, 293, 432, 436, 528 6:23-29, 519 6:24, 207, 225, 452, 928 6:24-35, 870 6:25, 435 6:25-26, 534 6:26, 207, 219,	421, 435, 868 6:29-35, 452 6:30, 910 6:30-31, 292 6:30-33, 292 6:30-35, 920 6:32, 100, 226 6:32-33, 292, 921 6:34-35, 421 7, 199, 207, 208, 211, 216, 217, 452, 542, 917, 934 7:1-5, 542 7:1-17, 452 7:1-23, 920 7:1-27, 82, 103, 104, 105, 106, 243, 534 7:2, 193, 221, 927 7:3, 719 7:4, 843, 920 7:4-5, 519 7:5, 207, 225, 843 7:5-23, 870 7:5-27, 209 7:6-20, 30 7:6-23, 102, 542, 934 7:6-27, 519, 729, 917, 921 7:7, 226 7:8, 22 7:9-11, 95 7:10-18, 868 7:12, 865 7:12-15, 562 7:14, 207, 560, 870, 928 7:16, 511, 560 7:17, 188, 207, 221 7:21, 452 7:22, 15, 16, 435, 870 7:23, 17, 921 7:24-27, 542, 920 7:27, 7, 21, 22, 452 8, 30, 48, 64, 65, 84, 197, 207, 208, 209, 452, 481, 529, 550, 551, 569, 570, 574, 575, 577, 725, 849, 862, 872, 892, 893, 904, 912, 913, 915, 916, 933 8—9, 335, 559, 565, 892 8:1-8, 917 8:1-11, 3 8:1-16, 519 8:1-36, 105, 106, 243, 534, 542, 905, 920 8:1—9:6, 843 8:1—9:12, 432 8:2-11, 84 8:3, 23, 865 8:4, 913 8:4-36, 30, 516	8:5, 224, 226 8:5-9, 913 8:6, 198, 372 8:9, 198, 372, 562 8:10-11, 518, 892, 913 8:11, 536 8:12, 209 8:12-21, 3, 84 8:13, 202, 203, 250, 251, 293, 372, 892, 906, 913, 933 8:14-16, 209 8:15, 666 8:15-16, 199, 551, 913 8:17, 844 8:18, 294 8:18-19, 544, 892 8:22, 64, 251, 533, 570, 905 8:22-23, 915 8:22-25, 844 8:22-26, 905 8:22-29, 666 8:22-30, 551, 915, 922 8:22-31, 3, 30, 49, 62, 64, 84, 106, 109, 278, 547, 550, 814, 855, 869, 876, 892, 903, 904, 913 8:22-36, 519, 905 8:23-26, 825 8:24, 64 8:24-25, 905 8:24-29, 481 8:25, 481 8:27, 62, 321 8:27-30, 905 8:28-29, 45 8:29, 48, 62, 321, 814 8:30, 64, 278, 551, 569, 905, 915 8:30-31, 65, 913 8:31, 64, 905 8:32, 535 8:32-35, 3 8:32-36, 84, 905 8:33, 541, 800 8:34, 23, 535 8:35, 61, 252, 432, 433, 905, 921 8:36, 226, 435 9, 209, 224, 225, 518, 549, 843, 912, 933 9:1, 22 9:1-6, 22, 224, 542, 872, 905, 912, 920 9:1-12, 106 9:1-18, 3, 105, 243, 534 9:2, 220 9:2-5, 570 9:3, 224, 550, 868 9:4, 226, 518,
---	--	---	--	---	--	--

531, 799	10:5, 224, 293, 541, 618	11:15-21, 153	530, 573	15:9, 251, 535, 666, 910	16:17, 527	453
9:4-6, 550, 912	10:6, 531, 537, 927	11:16, 294, 908	13:15, 573	15:10, 226, 293	16:18, 100, 202, 293	19:14, 453
9:5, 220	10:6-7, 845	11:18, 652, 666	13:16, 223, 573	15:11, 7, 53, 251, 814, 909	16:18-19, 910	19:16, 527, 927
9:6, 518, 913	10:6-11, 537	11:20, 251, 372, 535, 861, 908	13:17, 573, 771	15:12, 224	16:19, 202, 879, 907	19:17, 199, 868, 910
9:7, 224	10:7, 292, 463, 646	11:21, 652, 666, 908, 911	13:18, 293, 573	15:13, 532	16:20, 251, 618, 910	19:18, 226
9:7-8, 293	10:8, 226, 421, 529	11:22, 17, 435	13:19, 223, 573	15:14, 223, 225	16:21, 531	19:19, 549
9:7-12, 106, 518	10:9, 532, 652, 810	11:25, 731	13:21, 573, 666	15:16, 202, 251, 372, 575, 933	16:22, 226	19:20, 560
9:8, 224	10:10, 226, 572	11:28, 666	13:21-22, 536	15:17, 15, 575	16:23, 225	19:21, 251, 778, 810, 882, 908
9:9, 223	10:11, 433, 517, 531, 537, 543	11:29, 810	13:22, 435, 573, 666	15:19, 222, 570	16:24, 531	19:22, 731, 879
9:10, 198, 202, 204, 223, 250, 251, 325, 372, 432, 537, 810, 816, 845, 854, 859, 900, 906, 930, 933	10:12, 530, 532, 533, 569	11:30, 781, 872	13:23, 776, 908	15:19-31, 95	16:25, 226	19:23, 202, 203, 250, 251, 372, 900, 933
9:11, 61, 433, 811, 821	10:13, 226	11:31, 569	13:25, 810	15:20, 226, 293, 531	16:26, 517, 868	19:24, 531
9:12, 224	10:14, 226, 517, 533	12:1, 293	14:1, 22, 518, 872, 914	15:21, 223, 226	16:27, 531	19:26, 293
9:13, 207, 224, 225	10:15, 845	12:2, 652, 778	14:2, 202, 203, 250, 251, 293, 372	15:22, 543, 821	16:28, 532	19:27, 558
9:13-17, 920	10:16, 539, 652, 810, 901	12:3, 914	14:3, 15	15:23, 7, 436, 618, 811, 824, 911	16:31, 293, 666	19:28, 421
9:13-18, 106, 224, 225, 542, 729, 912, 917, 921	10:17, 293, 533, 906	12:4, 453	14:4, 15	15:24, 7, 436, 618, 811, 824, 911	16:33, 82, 84, 251, 778, 810, 814	19:29, 226
9:14, 224, 913	10:18, 226, 517	12:5, 666	14:5-10, 95, 562	15:25, 21, 202, 252, 531, 868, 910	17:1, 82, 294, 879	20:1, 220, 516
9:16, 224, 225, 226, 518, 531, 799	10:19, 224, 533, 618	12:6, 372, 567, 831	14:6, 224	15:26, 251, 810	17:2, 292, 618	20:2, 15, 66, 537
9:16-17, 550, 912	10:20, 529, 533	12:7, 652	14:8, 223, 226	15:27, 730	17:3, 251, 435, 857	20:3, 226, 292
9:17, 224, 519	10:21, 223, 226, 517	12:8, 292	14:9, 226	15:28, 95, 225, 666, 799	17:5, 251, 293, 903	20:4, 435
9:18, 7, 518, 544, 775, 843, 911, 914	10:22, 778, 845, 914	12:9, 294, 535	14:10, 466, 517, 531	15:29, 82, 85, 252, 535, 569, 666, 934	17:6, 293	20:6, 571, 731
10, 224, 453, 901	10:23, 223	12:10, 14, 666, 910	14:11, 21, 100, 372, 810	15:30, 569, 572	17:7, 224, 908	20:7, 372, 666
10—12, 652	10:24, 652, 666, 780, 810	12:11, 226	14:12, 226, 531, 540	15:32, 293	17:10, 226, 560	20:8, 537
10—15, 224, 576, 778	10:24-25, 421	12:12, 666	14:13, 533	15:33, 202, 251, 293, 372, 432, 900, 906, 908, 933	17:12, 16, 66, 223, 226, 870	20:8-11, 537
10—22, 529	10:25, 652	12:13, 666, 927	14:14, 810	15:34, 202, 251, 293, 372, 432, 900, 906, 908, 933	17:13, 21	20:9, 814
10—24, 552, 555	10:25-26, 536	12:14, 531, 845	14:15, 224, 530	15:35—16:9, 535, 548	17:15, 294, 810	20:10, 251, 910
10—29, 102, 107, 152, 243, 529, 532, 536, 538, 573, 575, 657, 658, 772, 903, 904, 907, 908	10:26, 533, 729	12:15, 224	14:16, 226	16:1, 251, 541, 800	17:18, 226, 574	20:10-23, 731
10:1, 224, 236, 283, 529, 530, 531, 532, 533, 537, 540, 542, 543, 550, 552, 553, 666, 733, 734, 867, 895, 913	10:27, 202, 203, 250, 251, 372, 433, 652, 778, 779, 900	12:16, 226, 293	14:17-18, 562	16:2, 251, 909	17:20, 910	20:11, 372
10:1-22, 539, 901	10:27-28, 911	12:17, 421, 666	14:18, 224	16:3, 251, 541, 800, 908	17:21, 226	20:12, 251, 903, 906
10:1—22:16, 155, 197, 532, 534, 538, 540, 552, 572, 659, 662, 894	10:28, 100, 666	12:18, 531, 533, 829	14:19, 23, 666, 865	16:4, 251, 810, 814, 903	17:22, 532	20:13, 567
10:2, 532, 540, 666, 879	10:29, 23, 252, 526	12:18-19, 536	14:20, 223, 704	16:5, 810	17:23, 226, 529	20:14-19, 541, 800
10:3, 252, 529, 544, 568, 652, 666, 910	10:30, 117, 652	12:21, 421, 652, 666	14:21, 861	16:6, 202, 203, 250, 251, 372, 900	17:25, 226, 529	20:15, 533
10:4, 201, 203, 421, 530, 531, 810	10:31, 666, 810	12:22, 251, 810	14:22, 223, 704	16:7, 252, 532, 814	17:26, 535	20:16, 225, 452, 868
10:4-5, 729	10:32, 517	12:23, 223, 225, 226	14:23, 910	16:8, 95, 535, 666, 779, 810, 879, 907	17:28, 421	20:19, 226
	10:33, 532, 533, 537, 540, 542, 543, 550, 552, 553, 666, 733, 734, 867, 895, 913	12:24, 845	14:24, 223, 704	16:9, 251, 537, 810, 814, 857	18:1, 23	20:20, 422, 528, 810, 824
	10:34, 435, 517, 573	12:25, 845	14:25, 421	16:10, 910	18:2, 224	20:22, 251, 810, 811, 824
	10:35, 292, 573, 658, 666	12:26, 293	14:26, 202, 251, 372, 900	16:10-15, 535, 548, 671	18:4, 433, 533	20:23, 251, 421, 910
	10:36, 372, 573, 666	12:27, 845	14:27, 52, 202, 203, 372, 667, 900, 933	16:11, 197, 251, 422, 910	18:5, 535, 563	20:24, 251, 810, 814, 854, 857, 908, 909
	10:37, 533, 571, 573	12:28, 7, 666, 781, 911	14:28, 868	16:12, 199, 294	18:6, 544	20:25, 82, 934
	10:38, 9, 562	12:29, 294, 535	14:29, 23, 666, 865	16:13, 199, 294	18:7, 225	20:26, 849
	10:39, 528, 573, 824	12:30, 573	14:30, 910	16:14, 549	18:8, 533	20:27, 251, 528, 21, 537
	10:40, 100, 531	12:31, 573	14:31, 199, 293, 421, 776, 861, 868, 903	16:15, 532	18:10, 24, 118, 252, 525, 533, 666, 830, 910	20:28, 422, 528, 810, 824
	10:41, 14, 666, 910	12:32, 527, 573, 928	14:32, 7, 526, 811, 911	16:16, 907	18:11, 23	20:29, 814
	10:42, 226	12:33, 322, 527, 573, 928	14:33, 910		18:12, 100, 202, 293, 421	20:30, 251, 810, 814, 857
	10:43, 531	12:34, 95, 293, 560	14:34, 95, 293, 560		18:13, 226, 292	20:31, 251, 810, 814, 857
	10:44, 562	12:35, 292, 573, 658, 666	14:35, 294, 618, 671, 868		18:14, 421	20:32, 251, 810, 814, 857
		12:36, 372, 573, 666	14:36, 294, 618, 671, 868		18:15, 252, 453, 519, 921	20:33, 82, 85, 251
		12:37, 533, 571, 573	14:37, 533, 571, 573		18:16, 252, 453, 519, 921	20:34, 202, 293
		12:38, 9, 562	14:38, 9, 562		18:17, 421	20:35, 432
		12:39, 528, 573, 824	14:39, 528, 573, 824		18:18, 226, 292	20:36, 849
		12:40, 100, 531	14:40, 100, 531		18:19, 293, 549	20:37, 85, 544
		12:41, 14, 666, 910	14:41, 14, 666, 910		19:1, 372, 529, 534, 545, 779, 879	20:38, 372
		12:42, 226	14:42, 226		19:2, 226, 435, 517	20:39, 453
		12:43, 531	14:43, 531		19:3, 226, 435, 517	20:40, 226
		12:44, 562	14:44, 562		19:4, 568	20:41, 226
					19:5, 531	20:42, 226
					19:6, 731	20:43, 226
					19:7, 100, 531	20:44, 226
					19:8, 868, 908	20:45, 226
					19:9, 293, 549	20:46, 226
					19:10, 293, 549	20:47, 226
					19:11, 293, 549	20:48, 226
					19:12, 15, 533, 549, 868	20:49, 226
					19:13, 100, 226, 293	20:50, 226

21:25-26, 536	563, 574	24:30, 226	27:2, 293	30:2-4, 429, 430	840	1:4, 130, 821
21:26, 666	23:2, 533	24:30-34, 30, 722,	27:3-4, 549	30:2-9, 428	31:10-20, 2	1:4-5, 822
21:27, 82, 845,	23:4-5, 546, 562,	857, 906	27:6, 14	30:4, 62, 429,	31:10-31, 2, 4, 39,	1:4-7, 893
870, 934	563	24:31, 23, 222	27:7, 220, 910	430, 431, 571	104, 105, 199,	1:4-11, 239
21:28, 100, 810	23:5, 17, 870	24:33-34, 435,	27:8, 17	30:5, 119, 526,	205, 207, 237,	1:5, 66
21:30, 251, 908	23:6-7, 562	810	27:11, 557	830, 909	243, 245, 294,	1:5-7, 126, 870,
21:30-31, 814,	23:6-8, 563	24:34, 568	27:13, 225	30:5-6, 430	403, 452, 519,	909
882	23:7, 372, 568	25, 708	27:15, 543	30:5-9, 429, 430	524, 529, 534,	1:6, 66, 130
21:31, 15, 251,	23:8, 562	25—26, 535	27:15-16, 536	30:7-9, 430, 534,	536, 538, 539,	1:7, 130
870	23:9, 562	25—27, 156, 537	27:17, 569	723	571, 575, 577,	1:8, 130
22, 224, 530	23:10, 422, 868,	25—29, 197, 237,	27:18, 220, 292	30:8, 219	681, 693, 731,	1:9, 66, 130, 131,
22—23, 452	870	534, 552, 575,	27:19, 226	30:9, 251, 909	755, 840, 891,	135, 330, 636,
22—24, 534, 562,	23:10-11, 381,	894, 895, 896	27:20, 5, 7, 52,	30:11-14, 103	914, 924, 925	822
896	534, 546, 563,	25:1, 200, 236,	101	30:13, 202	31:11, 921	1:9-10, 822
22:1, 294, 569,	564, 810, 910	283, 536, 537,	27:21, 293	30:15, 19, 511,	31:12, 199, 921	1:10, 128, 130,
879	23:11, 421	540, 554, 671,	27:22, 226	534	31:13-18, 199	883
22:2, 251, 868,	23:12, 561	704, 719, 733,	27:23, 14	30:15-16, 52, 516,	31:15, 199	1:10-14, 95, 801
869, 870, 903	23:12—24:10,	734, 735, 867,	27:24, 532	534	31:16, 921	1:11, 137, 645,
22:4, 202, 203,	563	895	27:26, 13	30:15-30, 430	31:17, 840	646
250, 251, 292,	23:13, 226	25:1—29:27, 39,	27:26-27, 870	30:15-33, 39	31:18, 917	1:12, 122, 124,
372, 421, 667,	23:13-14, 322,	540	27:27, 13	30:15—31:9, 568	31:19, 921	134, 142, 283,
900, 906, 933	547	25:1—31:31, 575	28—29, 537	30:16, 7	31:19-20, 840	636, 865
22:5, 222	23:14, 7, 824, 911	25:2, 200, 573,	28—31, 899	30:17, 17, 18, 293	31:20, 199, 433	1:12-13, 736
22:6, 545, 569	23:15-16, 561	811, 908, 909	28:1, 15	30:18, 511, 534	31:22, 921	1:12-17, 734
22:7, 731, 868	23:16, 372	25:3, 200	28:2, 517	30:18-19, 534,	31:23, 23, 453,	1:12—2:16, 123
22:9, 421, 535	23:17, 202, 203,	25:4-5, 200	28:4, 292, 845	814	575, 732, 865,	1:12—2:26, 30,
22:12, 251, 814	250, 292, 810,	25:5-6, 202	28:5, 251, 933	30:18-20, 237	921	137
22:13, 16, 531,	927	25:6-7, 200, 293	28:6, 372, 879	30:19, 17, 19, 534	31:24-27, 731	1:12—11:6, 239
865	23:17-18, 824,	25:8-10, 570	28:7, 293, 729	30:20, 543, 771,	31:26, 199, 207,	1:12—12:7, 124,
22:14, 225, 868,	911	25:9-10, 292	28:9, 82, 85, 934	868	433, 840	146, 147, 204,
914	23:19, 561	25:11, 220, 571	28:10, 372, 907	30:21, 511	31:27, 219, 575	324
22:15, 224, 226,	23:20, 220	25:15, 12	28:14, 201, 202,	30:21-23, 534,	31:28, 199, 433,	1:13, 130, 137,
322	23:22, 293, 563	25:16, 220	372, 535	908	921	255, 637, 777,
22:16, 868	23:22-25, 207,	25:17, 572	28:15, 15, 16, 870	30:22, 810	31:28-30,	813, 903
22:17, 539, 552,	730	25:18, 829	28:18, 372, 907	30:23, 453	29:431:28-29,	1:13-17, 636
555, 556, 562,	23:24, 223	25:19, 822	28:21, 219	30:24-28, 66, 704	921	1:14, 130, 131,
704, 734	23:26, 561, 572	25:21-22, 569	28:25, 251, 910	30:24-31, 706	31:29, 453	133, 135, 643,
22:17-18, 562,	23:27, 207, 225,	25:23, 549	28:26, 224	30:25, 18, 899	31:30, 2, 202,	779, 813
896	563, 868	25:26, 66	28:28, 667	30:26, 17, 870	205, 243, 250,	1:15, 813, 814
22:17-21, 546,	23:30, 220	25:27, 202, 220,	29:1, 100	30:27, 18, 870	325, 372, 535,	1:16, 122, 123,
561, 563, 706	23:31, 220	293, 294	29:3, 100, 868	30:28, 19, 21, 870	840, 895, 906,	130, 134, 137,
22:17—24:22, 28,	23:32, 19	25:28, 23, 535	29:6, 666, 927	30:29, 511	921, 933	283, 294, 636,
39, 237, 264,	24:1-2, 292	25:28—26:2, 535	29:7, 666	30:29-31, 529	31:31, 199, 294,	637, 736, 865
429, 534, 574,	24:3, 22	26, 535	29:8, 549	30:30, 14, 16, 870	865, 921	1:16-17, 868
575, 809, 896,	24:3-4, 872	26:1, 292	29:9, 226	30:31, 14, 19,		1:17, 128, 130,
899	24:5, 704, 830	26:1-2, 66	29:10, 372	430, 870	Ecclesiastes	133, 137, 223,
22:17—24:34,	24:7, 23, 226, 865	26:2, 17, 317	29:13, 251, 814,	30:32, 224, 293	1, 453, 862	225, 294
539, 548	24:11, 563	26:3, 15	903	30:33, 535	1—2, 29, 636,	1:17-18, 637
22:19, 251, 562	24:11-12, 814,	26:4, 39	29:15, 322	31, 209, 237, 243,	637	1:18, 130, 531,
22:20, 555, 560,	909	26:4-5, 13, 223,	29:16, 667	269, 433, 453,	1:1, 122, 124,	638, 639
561, 562, 565,	24:12, 569, 811	224, 254, 535,	29:18, 535, 567,	533, 536, 552,	143, 239, 283,	2, 225, 636, 917
574, 719	24:12-22, 563	543, 638, 810,	568, 729, 883	575, 661, 681,	324, 471, 636,	2:1, 130, 131,
22:20-21, 570	24:13, 558	907	29:22, 549	753, 840, 893,	637, 734, 736,	134, 137, 643,
22:20—24:22,	24:14, 824	26:5, 39	29:23, 202, 293	895, 921, 922	865, 868, 895,	868
563	24:16, 544, 815	26:6, 226	29:25, 202, 251,	31:1, 207, 237,	917	2:1-23, 435
22:21, 562	24:17-18, 251	26:7, 226, 530,	372, 910	264, 428, 530,	1:1-2, 125, 244	2:2, 130, 131,
22:22, 23, 546,	24:19, 292, 435	543	29:26, 251, 252	540, 708, 734,	1:1-3, 147	141, 142
561, 562, 865,	24:19-20, 815,	26:9, 222, 530,	29:27, 845	735, 867, 868,	1:1-11, 124, 126,	2:3, 130, 223, 225
868	908, 911	543	30, 237, 269, 429,	878, 883	204, 676	2:4-6, 870
22:22-23, 563,	24:20, 528, 824	26:10, 226	430, 552, 708	31:1-9, 39, 104,	1:2, 12, 66, 124,	2:4-7, 30, 636
810, 910	24:21, 202, 203,	26:11, 16, 223,	30—31, 152, 197,	207, 209, 430,	130, 324, 432,	2:4-16, 736
22:22—24:22,	250, 372	535, 569	243, 264, 427,	529, 534, 895	638, 643, 776,	2:5, 124, 130, 266
561, 562, 565	24:21-22, 100	26:12, 202	428, 542	31:1-31, 2	777, 813, 814	2:7, 14, 122, 130,
22:23, 562	24:22, 541, 568	26:13, 16, 865	30:1, 237, 264,	31:2, 82, 104,	1:2-3, 239	294, 636, 865,
22:24, 562	24:23, 236, 539,	26:14, 435	283, 428, 429,	264, 558, 735	1:2-11, 893	870
22:24-25, 564	552, 555, 556,	26:15, 435	530, 540, 708,	31:2-3, 560	1:2—12:8, 635	2:7-10, 636
22:25, 3, 562	562, 734	26:17, 16	734, 867, 878,	31:3, 264, 453	1:3, 126, 130,	2:8, 636, 865, 870
22:26-27, 562	24:23-34, 28, 39,	26:18-22, 569	883	31:4, 220, 511,	135, 637, 638,	2:9, 122, 130, 865
22:28, 382, 422,	534	26:21, 535	30:1-4, 202	793, 867	643, 813	2:10, 128, 130,
562, 564	24:23-34, 237	26:23, 535, 799	30:1-9, 30, 430	31:6, 220	1:3-11, 129, 244	131, 295, 639,
22:29, 546, 562,	24:24, 845	26:27, 907	30:1-14, 39, 568	31:8-9, 534, 666	1:3-15, 903	776
564, 571	24:28, 574	26:28, 854	30:2, 224	31:10, 244, 536,	1:3-16, 435	2:11, 130, 131,
23:1-3, 541, 562,	24:29, 294	27:1, 558	30:2-3, 814	679, 681, 693,	1:3—3:9, 660	133, 135, 294,

471, 643, 776	638, 660, 777,	4:13-16, 123	6:12, 130, 131,	8:6, 130	526	12:3-7, 22
2:12, 130, 223,	821, 822, 870	4:15, 130, 131	527	8:7, 130	9:12-13, 531	12:4, 17, 917
223, 734, 868	3:12, 126, 130,	4:15-16, 295	7:1, 55, 130, 295	8:8, 127, 130, 870	9:13, 128, 130,	12:5, 18, 130,
2:12-17, 639	131, 137, 535,	4:16, 128, 130,	7:1-2, 127	8:9, 128, 130, 131	131	220, 221
2:13, 130, 223,	639, 813	131	7:2, 22, 125, 127,	8:9-10, 295	9:13-16, 12	12:5-6, 127
223, 911	3:12-13, 7, 62,	4:17, 130	128, 130, 295,	8:10, 128, 130,	9:13-18, 831	12:7, 124, 130,
2:13-14, 638, 776,	126, 295, 911	5, 201, 242, 641	772, 870	137, 643	9:14-15, 704, 883	255, 432, 909,
911	3:12-14, 140, 643	5:1, 130, 225,	7:2-4, 7	8:10-14, 813	9:15, 130, 295,	910
2:13-16, 637	3:13, 66, 125,	226, 933	7:3, 130, 141, 142	8:11, 124, 130,	638	12:8, 12, 124,
2:14, 130, 435	126, 127, 128,	5:1-3, 777	7:4, 127, 130, 226	266, 424	9:16, 130	130, 143, 239,
2:14-16, 127	130, 255, 462	5:1-6, 909	7:4-5, 225	8:12, 130, 204,	9:16-18, 637, 911	324, 635, 638,
2:15, 128, 130,	3:14, 124, 130,	5:1-7, 82, 83, 256,	7:5, 130, 638	256	9:17, 12, 130, 225	643
134, 137, 643,	204, 250, 256,	652, 870, 883	7:5-7, 911	8:12-13, 66, 250,	9:18, 12, 100,	12:8-14, 124, 125,
776	814, 860, 907	5:2, 130, 909	7:6, 95, 128, 130,	256, 652, 860,	130, 638	145, 204, 244,
2:15-16, 639, 813	3:14-15, 126, 135,	5:2-6, 933	221, 643	907, 911	10:1, 18, 130,	676
2:15-17, 777	883	5:3, 130, 226	7:7, 95, 130	8:12—9:4, 652	223, 225, 638,	12:9, 128, 130,
2:16, 66, 130, 821	3:15, 126, 130,	5:3-4, 225	7:8, 130	8:13, 130, 667	660	635, 636, 895
2:17, 130, 131,	636, 815	5:4, 130, 226	7:8-9, 910	8:14, 128, 130,	10:1-3, 225, 911	12:9-10, 637, 704,
135, 637, 643,	3:15-17, 813	5:4-5, 462, 934	7:9, 130, 225, 226	432, 643, 652,	10:1-15, 637	734, 736
813, 917	3:16, 130, 131,	5:4-6, 424	7:10, 130, 636,	667, 776, 813,	10:2, 130, 226	12:9-11, 128
2:17-18, 7, 776	137, 423	5:5, 130	821	909	10:3, 130, 223,	12:9-14, 239, 252,
2:17-26, 722	3:16-21, 813	5:6, 100, 130,	7:10-12, 330	8:14-17, 423	225	330, 736
2:18, 130, 131,	3:16-22, 642	204, 256, 517	7:11, 130, 637	8:15, 62, 66, 126,	10:5, 130, 131	12:10, 130, 719
135, 435	3:17, 8, 130, 134,	5:7, 130, 250,	7:11-12, 638, 911	130, 131, 137,	10:6, 223, 225,	12:11, 129, 130,
2:18-23, 639	256, 435, 436,	256, 777, 860,	7:12, 130, 527	140, 141, 142,	810	471, 635, 813,
2:19, 128, 130,	667, 871, 909,	907	7:13, 130, 225,	255, 295, 462,	10:6-7, 137, 295	879
131, 223, 225,	910	5:8, 130, 813,	256, 814	643, 871, 909,	10:7, 15, 130,	12:11-12, 879
643	3:17-18, 137	865, 868	7:13-14, 813, 909	911	10:8, 19, 23	12:12, 130, 143,
2:20, 130, 131,	3:18, 130, 134,	5:8-9, 636, 861	7:14, 130, 131,	8:16, 130, 137,	10:10, 130, 638	204, 718, 735
813	435	5:9, 123, 128, 130	134, 255, 434,	910	10:11, 19, 130	12:12-13, 128
2:21, 128, 130	3:18-20, 911	5:10, 130, 435,	649	8:16-17, 134, 137,	10:12, 100, 130,	12:13, 66, 123,
2:21-23, 813	3:18-21, 14, 129,	643	7:15, 130, 137,	638, 777	911	125, 126, 127,
2:22, 130, 131,	813, 909	5:12, 130, 131,	423, 432, 435,	8:16—9:1, 909	10:12-15, 225	128, 129, 130,
638	3:19, 66, 127,	729, 868	667, 780, 813,	8:16—9:10, 134	10:13, 130, 223,	131, 193, 204,
2:23, 128, 130	130, 431, 432,	5:13, 130	821	8:17, 130, 131,	225	250, 256, 295,
2:24, 66, 126,	643	5:13-17, 95	7:15-18, 813, 907	255, 638, 652,	10:14, 130, 223,	325, 535, 640,
128, 130, 135,	3:19-21, 7, 127,	5:14, 130	7:16, 130, 637,	813, 814	225, 226	813, 816, 859,
137, 255, 295,	431, 824	5:14-18, 801	638, 639, 667	9, 130	10:15, 130	860, 861, 900,
639, 788, 813	3:19-22, 126	5:15, 128, 130	7:16-17, 534	9:1, 130, 137,	10:15-16, 868	906, 907, 911
2:24-25, 62, 256,	3:20, 66, 130,	5:15-16, 7, 127	7:17, 127, 130,	223, 255, 813,	10:18, 130	12:13-14, 124,
462, 639	432, 910	5:16, 130, 638,	223, 225, 226,	814, 909, 910	10:19, 130, 131,	125, 128, 142,
2:24-26, 140, 638,	3:20-21, 910	643	821	9:1-2, 777	220	204, 244, 423,
643, 911	3:21, 130	5:17, 130, 137,	7:18, 66, 130,	9:1-6, 813, 911	10:20, 18, 123,	667, 737, 780,
2:26, 128, 130,	3:22, 62, 126,	435, 813	204, 250, 667	9:1-10, 7	130, 424	909
131, 435, 643,	130, 131, 137,	5:17-18, 639	7:19, 130, 637,	9:1-12, 642	11, 814	12:14, 8, 128,
903, 909	140, 295, 535,	5:17-19, 136	638	9:2, 130, 652,	11:1, 219	130, 256, 295,
3, 121, 123, 822,	639, 643, 813,	5:18, 126, 128,	7:20, 130, 141,	667, 813	11:2, 130, 462,	436, 813, 815,
899	883, 911	130, 131, 295,	667, 910	9:2-3, 637, 909	511	871
3:1, 66, 130, 143,	4, 223, 288, 664	462, 909	7:21, 130	9:2-6, 870	11:4, 130	1:1, 239, 265,
789, 822	4:1, 130, 131,	5:18-20, 62, 140,	7:22, 130	9:2-12, 127	11:5, 130, 255,	439, 735, 748,
3:1-3, 543	136, 812, 813,	643, 911	7:23, 128, 130,	9:3, 128, 130,	813, 818, 869,	761, 868, 898
3:1-8, 130, 454,	868	5:19, 125, 126,	134, 638	131, 225, 639	870
466, 638, 660,	4:1-3, 423, 636,	127, 128, 130,	7:23-24, 917	9:3-6, 909	11:6, 130	1:1—3:8, 764
813, 870, 893,	861	131, 255, 909	7:23-29, 137	9:4, 16, 130, 660	11:7, 130	1:2, 220, 242
917	4:2, 637	5:19-20, 256, 813	7:24, 813	9:4-6, 637	11:7-8, 137, 436	1:2-4, 68, 748
3:1-9, 126, 214	4:2-3, 127	6:1, 95, 130, 131	7:25, 130, 223,	9:5, 130, 295, 646	11:7—12:7, 239	1:2-12, 748
3:1-15, 822	4:3, 130, 131,	6:1-2, 7	225	9:6, 130, 131	11:8, 127, 130,	1:2—2:7, 239,
3:2, 7, 127, 135,	436, 535, 813	6:2, 128, 130,	7:25-29, 214	9:7, 130, 131,	131, 643	919
462	4:4, 128, 130,	255, 295, 435,	7:26, 52, 127,	220, 256, 462	11:8-10, 911	1:2—8:12, 748
3:2-8, 821, 822	133, 435, 643	639, 813, 871,	130, 214, 322,	9:7-9, 134, 137	11:9, 8, 130, 131,	1:4, 220, 645, 868
3:3-8, 909	4:5, 130, 226	909	453, 917	9:7-10, 62, 140,	141, 256, 423,	1:5, 734, 743,
3:5, 214, 454,	4:5-6, 531	6:3, 130, 435, 436	7:27, 124, 128,	295, 643, 911	637, 871, 909	866, 868
789, 917	4:6, 130, 535, 643	6:3-6, 127	130, 244, 635	9:8, 130, 918	11:9-10, 137	1:5-8, 748
3:5-6, 214	4:7, 130, 131	6:4, 130	7:28, 130, 918	9:9, 130, 131,	11:10, 130	1:6, 265, 424, 742
3:6, 130	4:8, 128, 130,	6:5, 130	7:29, 128, 130,	214, 453, 643,	12, 255	1:7, 14, 643, 741,
3:9, 126, 130,	435, 517	6:6, 130	256, 814, 910	776, 909, 918	12:1, 130, 637,	755
638, 643	4:9, 130	6:7, 130, 910	8:1, 130, 638, 704	9:10, 52, 130, 934	645, 813, 814,	1:7-8, 757
3:9-18, 909	4:9-12, 454, 917	6:8, 130, 225, 868	8:1-4, 671	9:11, 130, 131,	821, 869, 870,	1:8, 14, 870
3:10, 130, 255	4:11, 917	6:9, 128, 130, 643	8:2, 130	638, 813, 820,	903	1:9, 870
3:10-11, 813	4:12, 144, 917	6:10, 130	8:2-4, 123	821, 822	12:1-7, 642	1:9-12, 748
3:10-15, 126	4:13, 130, 225,	6:10-12, 883, 909	8:3, 130	9:11-12, 12	12:1-8, 7	1:10, 428
3:11, 66, 127,	638, 704, 868	6:11, 7, 130, 638,	8:5, 130, 638, 821	9:11-18, 12	12:1-14, 252	1:12, 868
130, 255, 256,	4:13-14, 322	643	8:5-7, 883	9:12, 18, 52, 130,	12:3, 22, 130

Song of Songs

1:1, 239, 265,	439, 735, 748,
761, 868, 898
1:2, 220, 242
1:2-4, 68, 748
1:2-12, 748
1:2—2:7, 239,
919
1:2—8:12, 748
1:4, 220, 645, 868
1:5, 734, 743,
866, 868
1:5-8, 748
1:6, 265, 424, 742
1:7, 14, 643, 741,
755
1:7-8, 757
1:8, 14, 870
1:9, 870
1:9-12, 748
1:10, 428
1:12, 868

1:13, 221	801, 866, 870	7:7-8, 222, 738	10:32—12:6, 459	40:10, 74, 329	63:7—64:11, 398	25:20-21, 865
1:13—2:3, 748	4:8-11, 748	7:7-10, 748	11:1-9, 882	40:18, 113	63:7—64:12, 398	26, 883
1:13—2:7, 748	4:8—5:1, 748	7:8, 220	11:2, 877, 900	40:20, 882	63:10-11, 398	26:4-6, 399
1:14, 866	4:10, 220	7:9, 220, 868	11:3, 900	40:22-26, 115	63:14, 398	26:18-19, 408
1:15, 18	4:12, 68, 452	7:10, 801, 868	12, 230	40:27, 832	65:8, 879	26:23, 37
1:17, 222, 265	4:12-14, 871	7:11-12, 748	12:4-6, 401	41:7, 157	65:17-25, 62	27, 850
2:1, 866	4:12-15, 755	7:11-13, 465, 919	12:6, 401	41:20, 909	66:2, 398	29, 881
2:1-2, 617	4:12-16, 919	7:12, 220	13:1, 878	41:21, 329	66:22-23, 67	29:1-2, 477
2:1-13, 68	4:12—5:1, 748	7:13—8:3, 748	13:12, 618	41:22, 330		31:29, 281, 400,
2:2, 221, 222	4:13, 68, 220, 265	7:13—8:4, 748	14:4, 532	42:7, 320	Jeremiah	532, 879
2:3, 220, 526,	4:13-15, 68	8:1-2, 298	14:4-21, 400	42:9, 883	2, 239	31:29-30, 881
527, 748	4:14, 221	8:1-3, 298	14:12-15, 321	42:22, 397	2—25, 266	31:30, 881
2:4, 22, 743, 866	4:15, 452	8:2, 22, 213, 433,	14:13, 113, 114	42:24, 397	2:1-2, 453	31:31-33, 815
2:4-6, 838	4:16, 68, 741, 750	866	14:26, 880	43:12, 113	2:2, 459	31:31-34, 398
2:5, 220	5:1, 68, 220, 221,	8:3, 643	14:28, 878	43:15, 329	2:13, 520	31:35, 45
2:6, 643	298, 730, 743,	8:4, 517, 643,	15:1, 878	43:19, 330, 883	2:15, 311	32, 380
2:7, 452, 481,	748	748, 758, 866,	16:1, 696	44, 930	2:18, 399	32—33, 320
517, 748, 749,	5:1-2, 519	868, 920	17:1, 878	44:6, 329	2:22, 618	33:10-11, 73
758, 866, 868,	5:2, 18, 746, 870	8:5, 433, 738, 866	17:13, 158	44:23, 74	2:36, 399	33:11, 73, 77
870, 920	5:2-6, 298	8:5-7, 748	19:1, 878	44:24, 48	3:1-5, 762	36, 794
2:8, 23, 481	5:2-7, 298, 748	8:5-14, 239, 919	19:11-12, 878,	44:25, 880, 882	3:9, 225	37:5-10, 399
2:8-9, 325, 482,	5:2-8, 748, 758	8:6, 8, 194, 246,	880, 882	44:28, 171	4:22, 882	38:6, 321, 399
748	5:2—6:3, 69, 919	256, 433	20:4, 465	45:6-8, 47	5:22, 201	38:22, 400
2:8-17, 748	5:5, 757	8:6-7, 517	21:1, 878	45:7, 47, 649	5:24, 201	39, 320
2:8—3:5, 239,	5:5-7, 743	8:7, 748	21:11, 878	45:18, 114	5:31, 399	39:1, 402
919	5:6, 298	8:8, 298, 838	21:13, 878	46, 930	6:6, 136	39:1-10, 402
2:9, 68, 459, 870	5:7, 866, 868	8:8-9, 298, 748	22:1, 878	47:1-15, 919	6:25, 399	39:5-7, 526
2:10-15, 748	5:8, 748, 758,	8:8-12, 748	22:12, 400	47:8, 115	6:28, 225	41, 402
2:11-12, 68	866, 868	8:9, 222, 424	23:1, 878	47:10, 115, 878,	7, 861, 870, 875	41:1-3, 402
2:11-13, 68	5:9, 762	8:9-10, 23, 866	23:1-14, 400	880, 882	7:1-8, 875	41:4-9, 402
2:12, 221, 487	5:9-16, 748	8:10, 22, 298, 748	24—27, 50	48:6-8, 62	7:1-15, 408	41:5, 236, 393,
2:13, 68, 220	5:9—6:3, 748	8:10-12, 919	24:22, 321	49—54, 239	7:3, 875	410
2:14, 18, 482, 870	5:9—8:4, 239	8:11, 265, 866,	25:8, 53	49:6, 938	7:6, 136	48:36, 616
2:15, 101, 870	5:10-16, 96, 239,	868	26:19, 5, 382	49:13, 67, 74	7:9, 400	49:7, 346, 372,
2:16, 221, 300,	835, 837, 839	8:11-12, 734, 739,	27:1, 45, 46, 50,	49:14, 397	8:4, 879	429, 882
617, 841	5:11, 18, 871	748	51	49:17, 397	8:5, 615	49:20, 372
2:16-17, 748	5:12, 18, 870	8:12, 265, 868	28, 879	49:19, 397	8:7, 51	49:24, 879
2:17, 325, 482,	5:13, 221, 617	8:13-14, 242, 748	28:15, 53	49:23, 159	8:8-9, 882	50:34, 382
870	5:13-16, 871	8:14, 482, 870,	28:16-18, 53	50:1, 397	8:18—9:1, 389	50:35, 882
3:1, 298, 746	5:14, 840	924	28:23-28, 880	51, 48	9:10, 400	51:15, 882
3:1-2, 69	5:15, 68, 222	Isaiah	28:29, 880	51:9, 45, 46	9:14, 399	51:34, 46, 51
3:1-4, 748, 758	5:16, 837, 840,	1, 861	29:13-16, 880	51:9-10, 45, 48	9:16-21, 400	51:38, 311
3:1-5, 748	866, 868	1—39, 229	29:14, 882	51:9-11, 50	9:17, 400, 410,	51:57, 882
3:2, 866	6:1-3, 748	1:2-3, 880	29:15-16, 880	51:12, 327	902	52:6-11, 402
3:2-3, 866	6:2, 68, 221	1:15-18, 870	29:16, 255	52:3, 397	9:17-22, 400	52:12-13, 460
3:4, 22, 213, 298	6:2-3, 617	1:21, 159	30:1-5, 882	52:5, 397	9:20, 917	52:12-16, 402
3:5, 452, 481,	6:3, 221, 839	1:21-23, 400	30:6, 878	53:10, 811	10:7, 895
643, 748, 749,	6:4, 746, 866	1:23, 702, 910	30:7, 45, 50, 51	54:1, 401, 938	10:10, 114	Lamentations
758, 866, 868,	6:4-7, 835	1:27, 156, 157,	30:29, 616, 787	54:5, 680	10:12, 49, 882	1, 97, 214, 228,
920	6:4-8, 919	158	30:33, 561	54:8, 680	10:23-25, 389	236, 316, 393,
3:6, 221, 743, 746	6:4-10, 748	2:2-4, 938	31:1-3, 882	55:1-5, 329	11:18-20, 389	399, 400, 401,
3:6-11, 748	6:4—8:4, 919	4:3, 6	32:1-2, 527	55:3, 329	12:1-4, 389	403, 404, 409,
3:6—5:1, 919	6:5, 14, 211, 866	5, 879	33:6, 882, 900	55:3-5, 329	13:12, 879	524, 773, 918,
3:6—5:8, 239	6:6, 14	5:1, 527	33:10-13, 388	55:5, 938	14:1—15:4, 402	936
3:7, 868	6:7, 68, 220	5:1-7, 880	33:20, 114	55:8-9, 909	14:2-9, 391	1—2, 399
3:9, 265, 734,	6:8, 868	5:5, 528	33:20-22, 113	55:11, 938	14:17, 399	1—3, 403, 661
866, 868	6:9, 18, 433, 868,	5:6, 618	35:1, 221	55:12, 74	15:12, 879	1—4, 2, 97, 399,
3:10, 866, 868	870	5:8-10, 692	35:1-2, 67	55:13, 188	15:15-18, 389	403, 524
3:11, 734, 868	6:11, 220	5:14, 52	36—37, 238	56—66, 849	16:5, 743	1—5, 4
4:1, 14, 18, 68,	6:11-13, 748	5:21, 878, 880,	36—38, 23	56:1-8, 258	16:6, 410	1:1, 40, 291, 404,
837, 866, 868,	6:11—7:12, 748	882	37:17, 382	57:13, 12	16:8, 22	414, 417, 455,
870	6:12, 801	6:9-10, 880	38, 76, 615	57:15, 398	17:9, 857	517, 788, 833,
4:1-7, 748, 752,	6:13, 866, 868	7:14, 119, 796	38:9-10, 615	59:4-15, 391	17:14-18, 389	918
835	7:1, 868	7:18, 843	38:20, 615	59:7, 56	18:18, 882, 895	1:1-2, 517
4:1-8, 239	7:1-6, 748	8, 476	40, 524, 940	59:19, 74	18:18-23, 882	1:1-7, 730
4:1-16, 68	7:1-10, 239, 835	8:1, 6	40—55, 277, 397,	60:1, 74	18:19-23, 389	1:1-11, 401, 404
4:2, 14, 870	7:1-13, 68	8:5-8, 50	400	60:2, 158	20:7, 399	1:1-16, 801
4:3, 68, 220	7:2, 220, 221, 617	8:13, 201	40—66, 74, 75,	60:6, 429	20:7-12, 389	1:1-18, 96
4:4, 22, 866, 868	7:2-8, 211	9:6, 882	115, 332, 874	61, 22	22:13-17, 22	1:1-22, 98
4:5, 68, 221, 617,	7:3, 870	10:1-2, 702	40:1-2, 115, 415	61:1, 119, 398	22:17, 136	1:2, 327, 404,
839, 870	7:4, 22, 738, 866	10:13, 880	40:1-8, 115	62:3-5, 762, 768	23:15, 399	406, 417, 812
4:6, 221, 482	7:4-5, 211	10:15, 879, 880	40:2, 415	62:4, 455	23:28, 532, 879	1:2-4, 788
4:8, 16, 482, 526,	7:5, 837, 866		40:3, 331	62:11, 74	24:7, 398	1:3, 406

1:4, 417, 516, 934, 940	2:5, 23, 96, 100, 101, 400, 476,	3:15, 222, 399	3:56, 425	5:12, 291	28:11-19, 400	4:14, 881
1:5, 214, 257, 404, 407, 419, 775, 813, 832	483, 517, 801, 813, 831	3:17, 661	3:57, 425	5:14, 403	28:13-16, 113	4:16, 881
1:6, 291, 404, 517, 940	2:6, 101, 406, 517, 940	3:18, 100, 257, 291, 776	3:58, 257	5:15, 403	29:3, 46, 50	6:6, 870
1:7, 644, 813	2:6, 101, 406, 517, 940	3:18-20, 405	3:58-59, 382, 425	5:16, 406, 407	32:2, 46, 50	7:4-5, 879
1:8, 214, 291, 415, 417, 419, 813	2:7, 21, 23, 257, 406, 776, 813	3:19, 222, 399	3:59, 407	5:16-17, 801	32:12-16, 400	8:7, 881
1:8-9, 404, 407, 424, 918	2:7-8, 23	3:19-30, 407	3:59-66, 405, 813	5:17, 96, 403	32:16, 400	9:1, 401, 491
1:9, 214, 257, 327, 404, 406, 518, 812	2:8, 101, 257, 517, 940	3:19-39, 407	3:61, 291	5:18, 16, 483, 940	33:21, 461	9:10, 881
1:9-10, 834	2:9, 100, 406	3:20-26, 824	3:62, 616	5:19, 257, 406, 407, 483, 813, 825	34:23, 879	9:13, 881
1:10, 21, 399, 404, 517, 934	2:10, 404, 517, 833, 940	3:21-22, 436	3:63, 291	5:19-22, 258	36:24-32, 398	9:16, 881
1:10-12, 96, 801	2:11, 101	3:21-24, 405	3:64, 257	5:20, 406, 407, 424, 813, 815	36:27, 398	10:1, 881
1:11, 219, 257, 404, 407, 432	2:11-12, 404, 518	3:21-26, 934	3:64-66, 407	5:20-22, 777	37:1-14, 459	10:4, 881
1:12, 257, 278, 405, 407, 518, 813, 823, 918	2:11-13, 436	3:21-33, 405, 408	3:66, 101	5:21, 257, 406, 407, 461, 775, 919	38:18—39:16, 463	11:10, 311
1:12-13, 214	2:12, 219	3:22, 405	4, 236, 399, 400, 401, 403, 405, 524, 661, 773, 917, 940	5:21-22, 776, 815	40:6, 620	13:13, 881
1:12-14, 919	2:13, 100, 517	3:22-23, 780, 823	4—5, 403, 404, 661	5:22, 777	40:6, 620	14:5, 617
1:12-16, 401, 404	2:13-19, 404, 518	3:22-24, 3, 330	4:1-6, 401	5:21, 257, 406, 407, 461, 775, 919	40:22, 620	14:6, 881
1:13, 403	2:14, 399, 407	3:22-27, 777	4:1-10, 406	5:21, 257, 406, 407, 461, 775, 919	40:26, 620	14:9, 330, 881
1:13-14, 776	2:15, 517, 940	3:22-33, 814	4:2, 940	5:21-22, 776, 815	40:31, 620	Joel
1:14, 257, 407, 813	2:15-16, 291	3:23, 405	4:2-4, 518	5:22, 406, 407, 461	40:34, 620	1:13-16, 393
1:15, 257, 407, 517, 813	2:16, 407, 821	3:24, 257	4:3, 16, 17, 406, 528	8, 205	40:37, 620	2:15-17, 393
1:15-17, 940	2:17, 257, 407, 424, 813, 831	3:25, 405, 815	4:4, 436, 833	Ezekiel	40:49, 620	2:21-24, 401
1:16, 16, 327, 406, 407, 417, 518, 833	2:18, 23, 257, 407, 517, 940	3:25-26, 257	4:5, 96	1, 569, 624	43:17, 620	3:13, 616
1:16-17, 517	2:18-19, 404, 405, 407	3:25-39, 405	4:5-8, 801	1:1-28, 460	45:10, 731	3:18, 113
1:17, 214, 327, 401, 404, 407, 455, 517, 813	2:19, 407, 436	3:26, 405, 824	4:6, 406, 455, 833	3:12, 460	47:1-12, 113	Amos
1:18, 257, 407, 419, 424, 665, 813, 919	2:19-20, 518	3:27, 405, 821	4:7-8, 436	6:9, 225	Daniel	1—2, 534, 881
1:18-19, 404	2:19-21, 833	3:28, 405, 417	4:9, 436	7:26, 883	1, 851	1:2, 311
1:18-22, 401, 404	2:20, 21, 37, 257, 405, 407, 424, 436, 518, 776, 934	3:29, 405	4:9-10, 518	9:6, 465	1—6, 181, 240, 427, 873	1:12, 372
1:20, 257, 407, 417, 436	2:20-21, 407	3:30, 405	4:10, 101, 406, 436	9:9, 534	1:1, 873	2:6-7, 136
1:20-22, 404	2:20-22, 213, 401, 405	3:31-32, 417, 934	4:11, 257, 813, 940	10, 408	1:2, 178, 871	2:6-16, 228
1:21, 327, 404, 407, 813, 821	2:21, 424, 465, 813, 821	3:31-33, 56, 436, 813, 824	4:11-16, 406, 801	11:1-2, 883	1:8, 178	3:3-6, 879
1:21-22, 316, 407	2:22, 399	3:32, 405	4:12, 406, 407, 424, 665, 813, 934	11:3, 879	2, 839, 851, 877	3:3-8, 879
1:22, 403, 407, 415, 775	2:22, 399	3:33, 405, 408	4:14, 406	12:10, 878	2—6, 851	3:4, 311
2, 236, 400, 401, 403, 404, 524, 664, 773, 832, 833	3, 1, 236, 260, 278, 281, 288, 389, 391, 393, 399, 400, 401, 402, 403, 405, 408, 409, 424, 451, 517, 518, 524, 773, 813, 940	3:33-38, 405	4:15, 400	13, 850	2:1, 873	3:8, 311, 312
2—4, 3, 97, 101, 399	3:1, 400, 405	3:33-39, 408	4:16, 291	14, 374	2:12, 895	3:14, 527
2:1, 117, 257, 291, 400, 406, 517, 823, 940	3:1-17, 405	3:34, 417	4:17, 399, 403, 406	14:12-14, 362	2:21, 871	4:1, 136
2:1-2, 417	3:1-18, 257	3:34-36, 408	4:17-20, 96, 399, 406, 801	14:14, 336, 371, 374	2:31-33, 616	5:2, 400
2:1-10, 404	3:1-20, 257, 405	3:34-38, 407	4:19, 17	14:20, 336, 371, 374	2:38, 178	5:8, 47
2:1-12, 401	3:1-20, 257, 405	3:34-40, 407	4:19-22, 801	14:14, 336, 371, 374	3:5-7, 930	5:21-24, 14
2:2, 100, 257, 424, 483, 517	3:1-20, 257, 405	3:35, 425	4:20, 406, 416, 418, 526, 527	15:2-8, 879	3:10-12, 930	6:1-7, 750
2:3, 400, 403, 813	3:1-20, 257, 405	3:36, 257, 425	4:21, 371, 865	16, 239, 453, 834	3:14-18, 930	6:5, 618
2:4, 400, 517, 813, 829	3:1-20, 257, 405	3:37-38, 405, 408, 813	4:21-22, 401, 406, 407, 517	16:8, 380	3:18, 930	6:7, 743
2:4-5, 776	3:1-20, 257, 405	3:39, 405, 407, 408	4:22, 400, 517, 813, 940	16:10-13, 835, 837, 839	4, 851	6:12, 879
	3:1-20, 257, 405	3:40, 41, 436	4:22, 400, 517, 813, 940	16:15-34, 836	5, 851	7:14, 877
	3:1-20, 257, 405	3:40-42, 407, 934	4:23, 406, 407, 424, 665, 813, 934	16:25, 762	6:8, 426, 875	6:20, 875
	3:1-20, 257, 405	3:40-47, 401	4:24, 476, 518, 661	16:35-42, 455	7, 50, 51, 851	7, 50, 51, 851
	3:1-20, 257, 405	3:41, 405	4:25, 291, 813	16:36, 919	7—12, 850, 851	7:1, 873
	3:1-20, 257, 405	3:41-47, 405	3:42, 425, 813	16:44, 879	7:10, 6	7:10, 6
	3:1-20, 257, 405	3:41-66, 403	3:43, 424, 813	17:1-10, 532	8, 851	8, 851
	3:1-20, 257, 405	3:42—5:22, 436	3:44, 425, 813	18:1-20, 238	8:1, 873	8:1, 873
	3:1-20, 257, 405	3:43, 424, 813	3:45, 291, 813	18:2, 400, 534, 879, 881	8:2, 781	8:2, 781
	3:1-20, 257, 405	3:44, 425, 813	3:46, 100	18:20, 362	8:16, 781	8:16, 781
	3:1-20, 257, 405	3:45, 291, 813	3:47, 100	18:25, 534	9, 402, 404, 851	9, 402, 404, 851
	3:1-20, 257, 405	3:47-48, 405	3:48, 101, 405	18:29, 534	9:1, 873	9:1, 873
	3:1-20, 257, 405	3:48, 101, 405	3:48-51, 399, 401, 405	19:1-9, 400	9:2, 35	9:2, 35
	3:1-20, 257, 405	3:49, 405	3:49, 405	19:10-14, 400	9:24-25, 873	9:24-25, 873
	3:1-20, 257, 405	3:50, 257, 405, 661	3:50, 257, 405, 661	20, 453	10:1, 873	10:1, 873
	3:1-20, 257, 405	3:51, 405	3:51, 405	20:45-49, 532	10:10-21, 852	10:10-21, 852
	3:1-20, 257, 405	3:52, 17	3:52, 17	22:7, 910	10:13, 115, 382	10:13, 115, 382
	3:1-20, 257, 405	3:52-58, 405	3:52-58, 405	22:25, 311	10:20, 115	10:20, 115
	3:1-20, 257, 405	3:52-66, 405, 407	3:52-66, 405, 407	23, 453, 834	10:21, 6, 382	10:21, 6, 382
	3:1-20, 257, 405	3:53, 399, 417	3:53, 399, 417	23:14-15, 624	12:1-3, 382	12:1-3, 382
	3:1-20, 257, 405	3:53-62, 96, 801	3:53-62, 96, 801	25:13, 372	12:2, 5, 6, 53	12:2, 5, 6, 53
	3:1-20, 257, 405	3:55, 425	3:55, 425	26:17-18, 400	Hosea	1—2, 453
	3:1-20, 257, 405	3:55-56, 407	3:55-56, 407	27:2-36, 400	1—3, 211, 239, 739, 762	1—3, 211, 239, 739, 762
	3:1-20, 257, 405			27:8-9, 902	1:2, 225	1:2, 225
	3:1-20, 257, 405			28, 882	2, 211, 834, 835	2, 211, 834, 835
	3:1-20, 257, 405			28:2, 113	2:6, 528	2:6, 528
	3:1-20, 257, 405				Nahum	1:1, 878
	3:1-20, 257, 405				1—2, 453	1—2, 453
	3:1-20, 257, 405				1—3, 211, 239, 739, 762	1—3, 211, 239, 739, 762
	3:1-20, 257, 405				1:2, 225	1:2, 225
	3:1-20, 257, 405				2, 211, 834, 835	2, 211, 834, 835
	3:1-20, 257, 405				2:6, 528	2:6, 528
	3:1-20, 257, 405				Habakkuk	1:1, 878
	3:1-20, 257, 405				1:1, 878	1:1, 878

1:2-4, 389	Baruch	5:11-12, 727	24:3-17, 725	34:21—35:13, 723	44:20, 724, 725	51:30, 720
1:6-8, 16	3:9, 424	6:5-17, 723	24:4, 725	45:1-5, 724	45:1-5, 724
1:12—2:1, 389	4:1, 424	6:24-28, 726	24:5, 723	45:2, 724		Tobit
2:5, 52		6:37, 725	24:5-6, 725	45:4, 725		3:8, 715
2:6-8, 532	1 Esdras	7:10, 726	24:7, 725	45:6-22, 724		3:17, 715
3, 230, 486, 615, 734, 774	4:48, 222	7:14, 722, 726	24:7-8, 725	45:7, 724
3:1, 615, 619	5:55, 222	7:29-31, 82	24:8, 725, 915	45:12, 724		Wisdom of Solomon
3:3, 616	2 Esdras	9:1-9, 723	24:8-9, 725	45:14, 725		1—5, 852
3:8-9, 44	14:45, 37	9:9, 220	24:9, 723	45:23, 724, 725		1—9, 886
3:9, 616	16:32, 222	9:12-13, 723	24:9-12, 471	46—51, 82		1:1—5:23, 886
3:10, 44	16:77, 222	9:17—10:18, 723	24:10, 725	46:1, 724		1:1—6:21, 886
3:13, 616		10:5, 719	24:13, 222	46:1—49:16, 724		1:1—9:18, 886
3:19, 486, 615	4 Ezra	10:19, 725, 726	24:13-17, 219	46:2, 724		1:4-5, 852
	1:1, 848	10:19-20, 723	24:15, 221	46:4-6, 725		2—5, 852
Zephaniah		10:26—11:6, 723, 725	24:16, 723	46:8, 220		2:7, 220
3:3, 311	Judith	10:27, 219	24:19, 726	46:11, 725		2:12—5:14, 885
3:14, 401	4:9-15, 582	12:4-7, 726	24:19-29, 887	46:11-12, 724		3:1-8, 846
3:14-20, 239		12:5, 219	24:22-23, 915	47, 579		3:1-9, 887
	1 Maccabees	13:15-24, 723	24:23, 422, 725, 877	47:3, 724		3:2, 887
Zechariah	1:56, 36	13:25—14:10, 723	24:23-27, 725	47:8, 579, 725		4:1, 844
1—8, 409, 717	4:36-61, 620	14:1-2, 535, 722	24:23-29, 725	47:8-10, 614		4:7-17, 7
1:1, 37	7:26-50, 632	14:11-19, 723	24:30-34, 725	47:12-21, 726		4:10-14, 726
3:1, 714, 716		14:13, 726	25:1-2, 722	47:13, 21, 726		5, 852
3:1-2, 714, 715	2 Maccabees	14:20, 722	25:1-11, 723	47:14, 726		5:13, 844
3:1-5, 382	2:13, 36	14:20—15:10, 722	25:7-11, 722	47:17, 761		5:15-16, 846
3:2, 716	2:14, 36	15:1, 725, 845, 915	25:8-9, 722	47:19, 724, 726		6:1—9:18, 886
7, 402	2:26-27, 184	15:11-20, 723	25:16-26, 723	47:21, 724		6:14, 23
7—8, 402	10:1-9, 620	15:14-15, 725	25:24, 723	48:10, 724		6:22—10:21, 886
7:3, 402	15:36, 186, 632	16:5-14, 723	26:1, 722	48:13, 724		7:1, 83
7:3-5, 236, 393		16:15-18, 723	26:5-6, 722	48:15, 21		7:6, 887
7:5, 402, 460	4 Maccabees	16:18-26, 723	26:10-16, 294	48:17-22, 724		7:22, 64
7:12, 35	1:16-17, 845	17:22, 221	26:28, 722	48:20, 724		7:25-26, 845, 916
8:18-23, 393	Sirach	18:1-14, 84	27:1-3, 22	48:21, 724		8:7, 844
8:19, 236, 402	1, 915	18:15-18, 723	27:4-10, 723	48:22, 725		8:16, 22
9—14, 264, 611, 849	1—43, 722, 723, 724	19:2, 220, 723	27:11-21, 723	48:23, 724		8:17, 852
9:1, 878	1:1, 723, 725, 726	19:4-17, 723	27:22-29, 723	49:1, 220, 724, 725		8:19-20, 846, 887
9:9, 401	1:1-10, 84, 723, 724	19:20, 725, 915	27:30—28:11, 723	49:9, 39		9:5, 83
11:3, 309	1:11—2:17, 723	19:20-30, 722, 723, 726	28:2, 726	49:9-39		9:7-8, 885
12:1, 878	2:1—23:28, 723	20:1-8, 723	28:12-26, 723, 727	49:10, 724		9:8, 846
14:1-21, 462	1:1—43:33, 723	20:18-26, 723	28:14, 22	49:12, 21		9:18, 852
14:8, 113	1:3, 723	20:20, 226	28:24, 222	49:16, 724		10, 726
14:16, 462	1:4, 723, 725, 915	20:31, 722	29:1-7, 731	50, 720		10—19, 886
Malachi	1:8-9, 725	21:1-10, 723	29:1-28, 723	50:1-4, 724		10:1-14, 886
1:1, 878	1:9, 725	21:11, 725	30:1-17, 723	50:1-24, 724		10:1-21, 846
1:2-5, 108	1:9-10, 915	21:12—22:2, 723	30:18-25, 723	50:1-26, 82		10:1—19:22, 886
1:6, 879	1:11, 723	21:15, 724	30:19, 725	50:1—51:30, 723, 724		10:15-21, 727, 890, 916
1:6—2:9, 108	1:11-20, 725	21:18, 22	31:1-11, 723	50:5, 724		10:15—19:22, 886
2:3, 71	1:11-30, 723	22:7-18, 723	31:8-10, 725	50:5-21, 724		10:19, 889
2:10-16, 108, 207	1:11—2:17, 723	22:17, 23	31:10, 725	50:8, 221		11—19, 846, 886
2:14-15, 879	1:14, 725	22:19-27, 723	31:12—32:2, 723	50:10, 220		13—15, 82, 84
2:17, 879	1:16, 725	22:27—23:6, 723	31:25-31, 220	50:11, 724		13:10, 844
2:17—3:5, 108	1:17, 22	23:7-15, 723	31:28, 220	50:12, 222		14:4, 844
3, 218, 861	1:18, 725	23:11, 22	32:3-13, 723	50:15, 220		16:13, 23
3:5, 702, 910	1:19, 723	23:16-17, 534	32:5-6, 220	50:25-26, 722, 724, 726		16:16, 846
3:6-12, 108	1:20, 723, 725	23:16-18, 722	32:14-17, 723	50:27-29, 725		16:18, 846
3:7-8, 879	1:26, 725	23:16-27, 723	32:15-16, 725	50:28, 725		16:20, 219
3:13-14, 879	2:1-6, 725, 726	23:18, 23	32:18—33:3, 722	51, 91		17:7, 844
3:13—4:3, 108	2:17, 722	23:22-26, 723	32:23-24, 725	51:1-12, 723, 724		18:4, 845
3:16, 6	2:12-14, 722	23:27, 725	33:1-3, 725	51:1-30, 724		19:1, 846
4:5-6, 724	2:15-16, 725	24, 82, 725, 846, 915	33:2, 915	51:12, 724		19:22, 886
	2:16, 725	24:1-34, 84, 723, 724, 725	33:14-15, 726	51:13-16, 722		New Testament
Apocrypha	3:1-16, 723	24:1-34, 84, 723, 724, 725	33:16-17, 220, 722	51:13-30, 723, 798		Matthew
	3:9, 22	24:1-34, 84, 723, 724, 725	33:16-18, 721	51:13-30, 2, 4, 234, 724		1, 472
Additions to Esther	3:17-29, 723	24:1-34, 84, 723, 724, 725	33:20-24, 723	51:15, 220		1:1-17, 677
12:3, 426	3:30—4:10, 723	24:1-34, 84, 723, 724, 725	33:24-31, 723	51:23, 706		1:1-18, 695
13:1, 719	4:4-5, 726	24:1-34, 84, 723, 724, 725	34:1-11, 723	51:23-27, 726		1:3-6, 683
13:8-17, 296	4:7, 722	24:1-34, 84, 723, 724, 725	34:8, 725	51:23-30, 721		1:5, 32, 33, 40, 673, 685, 700
14:9, 21	4:10, 726	24:1-34, 84, 723, 724, 725	34:9-12, 721
	4:13, 723	24:1-34, 84, 723, 724, 725	34:14-20, 723
	5:9, 732	24:1-34, 84, 723, 724, 725

1:5-6, 299	Mark	1:1-3, 551	13:15, 36	Galatians	5:6, 469	1:13-16, 838
4:6, 606	1:1—3:12, 875	1:1-18, 845	13:25, 696	1:8-9, 317	7:1—9:28, 408	1:17-18, 169
5:3-11, 535	1:7, 696	1:2-3, 915	13:32-33, 377	2:9, 119	7:17, 469	3:12, 119
5:17, 36, 738	1:11, 469	1:4-5, 47	13:33, 469, 592	3:6-9, 258	7:21, 469	3:14, 551, 915
5:22, 226	1:21-22, 550	1:10, 551	13:35, 470	4:26, 483	10:30, 318	4:2, 592
5:39-41, 319	6:2, 550	1:14-18, 860	13:35-37, 614	6:7, 654	11, 176, 722	4:9, 592
5:42, 726	9:2-8, 820	1:27, 696	18:24, 36	Ephesians	11:3, 48	4:11, 930
5:43-46, 194	10:33, 620	1:41, 466	Romans	2:19-22, 119	11:35, 37	5—8, 820
5:43-48, 199	11:9, 606	2:19-21, 458	1:4, 36, 469	5, 764	12:5-6, 569	5:1, 592
5:44, 398, 726	11:12-14, 317	3:2, 119	2:6, 569	5:8-14, 47	12:22-23, 408	5:7, 592
5:44-48, 294	11:20-25, 317	3:29, 764	2:28-29, 685	5:18, 808	12:22-25, 483	5:9, 592, 930
5:45, 726	12:10, 606	4:12-14, 737	3:4, 606	5:19, 485	James	5:12, 930
6:7, 726	12:28-31, 194	4:21-24, 119	3:10, 141	5:19-20, 592	1:2-4, 726	5:13, 592
6:12, 726	12:35-37, 86, 614	4:25, 466	3:10-18, 606	5:24-33, 745	1:5, 726	6, 852
6:23, 726	12:36, 606	5, 632	4, 698	6:16, 526	1:19, 727	6:10, 317
6:28, 617	12:36-37, 606	5:1, 632	4:7-8, 606	Colossians	3:1-12, 727	6:16, 592
6:29, 733	15:24, 592	5:30, 378	4:16-17, 258	1:15, 901	3:1-18, 330	7:10, 592
7:26-27, 226	15:29, 592	7:39, 118	5:1-5, 886	1:15-17, 519, 551,	3:9, 318	7:17, 592
8:23-27, 45	15:34, 408, 592	8:10, 317	8:9, 118	845, 915	3:15-17, 726	8—11, 820
9:15, 764	Luke	8:12, 47	8:18-25, 62, 141	5, 366	5, 366	9:11, 101
10:16, 735	1:26-38, 685	8:53-58, 737	8:19-22, 69	5:7-11, 362	5:7-11, 362	11:17, 50, 303
11, 915	2:4, 620	9, 342, 654	8:20, 141, 813,	5:11, 330, 336,	5:11, 330, 336,	11:18, 469
11:18-19, 915	2:40, 550	9:1-3, 654	814	1:16-17, 48	362, 366, 371,	12, 53
11:19, 551,	2:41-51, 550	10:10, 305	9—11, 278	2:1-8, 858	374, 812, 824	12—13, 51
915	2:52, 550	10:22, 620	11:9-10, 606	2:2-3, 519	5:14-16, 727	12:3, 46, 50
11:28-30, 726	3:16, 696	10:34, 36	12:14, 317, 319	2:3, 550, 915	5:20, 530	12:9, 46
12:41, 737	3:32, 40, 299, 685	10:35, 36	12:17, 294	3:16, 592	1 Peter	12:15, 46
12:42, 733, 737	4:10-11, 606	12:13, 606	12:19, 318	1 Thessalonians	1:3-5, 33	13:1, 46, 50
13:52, 719	4:16-21, 378	15:25, 36	12:20, 569	5:13, 808	1:10-11, 467	14:3, 592
14:22-34, 45	6:27-31, 194	19:24, 592	12:21, 294	1 Timothy	2:5, 119	14:8, 318
15:18, 100	6:28, 317, 319	19:36, 36	13:1-7, 526	2:1-2, 526	2:13-17, 526	15—16, 820
16:27, 569	9:31, 887	Acts	16:20, 50	2 Timothy	3:9, 294	16:19, 318
21:9, 606	11, 41	2:24-36, 86	1 Corinthians	3:15, 36	4:8, 569	17—18, 820
21:16, 606	11:31, 733, 737,	2:25, 606	1, 569, 570	3:16, 865	4:18, 569	17:3, 46, 50
21:18-22, 317	915	2:25-28, 606	1:17-31, 569	3:16-17, 738	5:5, 569	18:2, 318
21:42, 606	11:50, 41	2:25-29, 615	1:18-25, 227	Hebrews	2 Peter	18:21, 318
22:29, 36	11:51, 37	2:27, 470	1:18-31, 727,	1:1-2, 853	1:17, 469	19—20, 820
22:32, 811	12:27, 617, 733	2:29-36, 614	858	1:3, 469	1:20, 36	19:1, 592
22:41-46, 615	13:1-5, 654	2:30, 606	1:24, 519, 569	1:5, 469, 592	2:22, 569	19:3, 592
22:43, 606	13:34-35, 408	2:31, 606	1:30, 550, 816,	1:5-13, 606	1 John	19:4, 592
22:43-45, 606	13:35, 606	2:34-35, 606	915	1:8, 741	3:2, 816	19:6, 50, 592
22:44-45, 606	18:1, 726	4:10-11, 606	3:16, 118, 119	1:14, 114	Jude	19:19, 469
23, 41	19:38, 606	4:11, 606	10:6, 737	3:3, 737, 930	9, 37	20, 50
23:21-22, 119	20:17, 606	4:23-31, 469	10:11, 737	3:7, 823	14-15, 37	20:2, 46
23:35, 37, 41	20:42, 86	4:24-26, 592	13:12, 816	3:7—4:13, 606	Revelation	21, 408, 764
23:37, 525, 527	23:34, 592, 726	4:24-28, 377	15:25, 469	3:13, 823	1—3, 820	21—22, 820
23:39, 606	23:35, 592	4:25, 606	15:54, 53	3:15, 823	1:3, 848	21:1, 47, 50
25:1, 764	24:27, 738	4:25-26, 468, 615	16:22, 317	4:7, 615, 823	1:5, 329	21:4, 53
25:1-13, 227	24:44, 471, 578	4:27-28, 169	2 Corinthians	5:5, 469, 592	1:8, 2	21:5, 592
25:5, 764	24:44-46, 815	7, 722	1:20, 738			21:9—22:5, 592
25:33-34, 608	John	7:47, 733	5:17, 62			21:25, 47
27:35, 592	1:1, 197, 915	10:4, 620				22:3, 319
27:39, 592		10:38, 119				22:13, 2
27:43, 592
27:46, 408, 592

Subject Index

- abomination, 251, 294, 529, 534-35, 543-44, 675, 908, 934
accidental meter, 473-75
Accuser, 108, 114, 210, 340-41, 422-23, 715
acrostic, 1-4, 97, 104, 199, 207, 228, 236-37, 260, 352, 397, 399, 403, 406, 440, 452-53, 464, 499, 523-24, 529, 536, 575, 585, 601, 659, 661, 679, 681, 723-24, 773-74, 780, 921 act-consequence nexus, 907-9
Adad-guppi Autobiography, 134
additions to Esther, 176, 182 admonitions, 82, 103, 108, 127, 152, 201, 205, 243-44, 256, 324, 428, 533-34, 539, 542, 549, 554-56, 561, 574, 695, 729, 731, 832, 845, 900, 903, 910
Admonitions of Ipuwer, 354-356, 574, 809
Adversary, 278, 336, 717
afterlife, 5-8, 101, 111, 129, 354, 359, 370, 436-37, 449-50, 597, 650-51, 710, 712, 781, 825, 846, 909
Agur, 236, 264, 269, 427-30, 537, 540-41, 548, 552-55, 557-60, 562, 564-65, 708, 800, 867-68, 878
Ahasuerus, 8, 9-10, 101, 161, 163, 172, 176-81, 183, 185, 189, 215-16, 240, 275, 295-96, 321, 455, 476, 492, 644, 781, 826-27, 922
Ahiqar, 135-36, 335, 430, 529, 547, 552-55, 557-58, 704, 731, 898-99
Akitu festival, 74, 581
Akkadian, 29-31, 42, 80, 85, 111, 134, 139-40, 161, 171, 335, 346-48, 351, 360, 403, 413, 450, 481, 553-55, 557-58, 561, 574, 595-96, 599, 600-601, 605, 618-19, 636, 640, 655, 668-90, 704, 708, 750, 756-59, 767, 782, 841, 850, 865, 875, 896-97, 901, 926, 929 alef-bet, 2-3
allegory, allegorical interpretation, 40, 144, 211, 229, 231, 237, 239, 257, 271, 306, 310-11, 344, 428, 456, 459, 472, 488, 532, 536, 570, 606-8, 680, 696-98, 738, 740-42, 744, 760-69, 845, 894, 919, 934 alliteration, 348, 439, 512, 521, 523, 543, 588, 656, 770, 772, 925 alphabet, 1-4, 37, 97, 199, 228, 236, 260, 399, 524, 536, 541, 601, 705, 706-7, 718, 895, 906
ambiguity, 11-13, 62, 91, 161, 261, 276, 326, 375, 378, 444, 493, 495, 504, 545, 660, 670, 678, 792-94, 809, 925-27, 928
Ambrose, 144, 367, 371, 417, 571, 696-97
Amenemope, 264, 529-30, 534, 538, 541, 545-47, 552-56, 558, 561-66, 574, 708, 809
Amestris, 10, 162, 172-73, 189, 826-28
angel of Yahweh, 114, 118 animals, 7, 14-15, 19-20, 82, 127, 129, 134, 312, 346, 431-32, 482, 526-27, 591, 617, 625-26, 628-29, 818, 830, 838, 869-70, 895, 13-19, 21, 45, 65-70, 127, 129, 159, 211, 219, 239, 318, 352, 372, 384, 431, 433, 466, 482, 487, 516, 583, 598, 617, 639, 666, 704, 711, 744, 813, 822, 869-70, 930, 940 anointed one, 278, 416, 466, 469, 670 anointing, 27, 118, 137, 278, 327, 351, 375, 390, 416-17, 466-72, 507, 517, 526, 592, 670, 685, 727, 752, 819, 918, 937 anthropology, 80-81, 111, 133, 136, 206, 230, 233, 288, 294, 299, 327, 507, 856, 872, 904, 914 anti-Semitism, 476, 479, 874 antithetic parallelism, 503, 505, 521, 543, 586 aphorisms, 102, 107, 254, 277, 532, 558, 565, 569, 573, 575-76, 656, 658, 722, 879, 881, 883 apocalyptic, 5, 35, 50-51, 93, 160, 182, 185, 711, 846-53, 873 apostolic fathers, 606, 612 apostrophe, 306, 404, 589
Aqiba, 740, 761-63
Aquila, 36, 618, 797, 799, 801, 803-4
Aquinas, 369-70, 417
Aramaic, 1, 39, 91, 93-94, 97-98, 123-24, 132, 135-36, 149, 175, 178, 184, 218, 227-28, 260, 263-68, 271, 273-74, 284, 414, 419, 430, 481, 547, 552-54, 557, 560, 565-66, 568-69, 574, 577, 598, 614, 674-75, 694, 698, 700, 704, 708-9, 763, 784-87, 789-91, 797-99, 802-4, 828, 873, 875-76, 897-98, 930 architecture, 22-24, 133
aromatics, 221
Artaxerxes, 8-10, 37, 162, 170-71, 174-75, 185, 189, 783, 827 artisans, 157, 499, 902, 913
Asaph, 24-27, 73, 76, 102, 234, 263, 386, 486, 499, 608, 611, 619-20, 672, 713, 734 ass, 15, 69
assonance, 439, 512, 521, 588, 770-72
Augustine, 38, 367-68, 371, 473, 512-13, 515, 570-71, 696, 918, 941 authorship, 40, 86, 92-94, 122-24, 145, 147, 206-7, 209-10, 212-13, 229, 234, 237, 269-70, 272, 281-85, 327, 399, 418, 456, 468, 540, 548, 555-57, 572, 579, 607-10, 612, 614-15, 619-20, 636, 668-69, 672-73, 694, 733-36, 738, 767-69, 786, 800, 867, 870, 886, 896 autobiography, 27-30, 134, 146-47, 324, 331, 636, 724, 864, 897
Baal, 18, 42-49, 51-54, 113-15, 236, 263, 439, 455, 483, 551, 583, 598, 600-604, 619, 744-45, 866, 869, 876, 913, 937
Babylonian Theodicy, 1, 81, 84, 111-12, 335, 346, 351, 601, 809, 896
Balag, 413, 595
battle imagery, 831
bears, 16-17
beatitude, 105, 199, 534-35, 806
Behemoth, 20, 45, 60, 65, 67, 69, 70, 222, 339, 818, 840, 908 ben Sira, 36, 720, 727 benevolence, 351, 359, 808, 815, 862 biblical theology, 119, 231, 249, 325, 328, 445, 654, 817, 825, 855, 858 bicolon, bicola, 2-3, 473, 502, 512-13, 520-24, 532, 534, 542, 558, 574, 600 birds, 17-18, 60, 67, 69, 354, 466, 525, 527, 531, 534, 563, 658, 752, 758, 838, 870, 899, 917, 921 bless, blessing, 2, 5, 14, 21, 22, 25, 32-33, 44, 60, 76, 81, 83, 85, 108, 117-18, 150, 152, 167, 195, 203, 205, 210, 220, 235, 247, 250-51, 253, 258, 289-90, 301-2, 304, 314-15, 319, 342, 348, 350, 353, 372, 374, 391, 418-19, 420-21, 427, 433-36, 452-53, 456, 461, 463, 491-92, 521, 528, 535, 543-44, 585, 633, 646, 650, 664-65, 676, 679, 681, 683-85, 701, 711, 713-14, 717, 724, 730, 754-55, 777-81, 814-15, 819, 822, 824, 826, 845, 857, 867, 907, 910, 921-22, 932-34, 937, 939 boars, 17
Boaz, 32-34, 212-13, 219, 240, 258, 275-76, 299, 379-81, 425-26, 454, 490-94, 516, 673-86, 691-98, 701-3, 730-32, 789, 922 breasts, 16, 22, 220-21, 392, 528, 567, 595, 738, 751-53, 757, 760, 764, 835, 838-39, 841, 920 caesura, 506, 520
Cairo Love Songs, 752, 759
Calvin, John, 161, 370, 417
canon, canonicity, 35-41, 89, 91-93, 95, 98, 118, 141-143, 146-149, 160, 163, 164, 169, 177, 180, 211, 212, 254, 256, 257, 273, 274, 283, 284, 327-31, 362, 427, 452, 455-57, 499, 500, 513, 514, 570, 633, 660, 673, 680, 681, 696, 719, 721, 723, 738-40, 744-45, 750, 760-61, 765, 768, 769, 788, 854, 856, 863, 864, 902 canonical approach, 153, 154, 283-84, 328, 376, 470, 580 canto, 140, 772-73
cattle, 14-15, 21, 67, 165, 193, 337, 344, 357, 431, 466, 636, 869, 879 chaff, 158, 432, 435, 659, 731, 811 chaos, 19-20, 41-52, 60-64, 67, 81, 83-84, 237, 249, 304-5, 357, 448, 481-83, 536, 563, 584, 591, 602, 626, 675, 700, 745, 780, 830, 904, 908, 937, 940 Chaoskampf, 42, 44, 46, 48-49, 51, 54, 63-64
chiasm, 54-56, 106, 261, 532, 536, 588, 656-57, 718 church fathers, 35, 38, 176, 366, 416, 455, 485, 570, 606-7, 612, 696, 797 city dirge, 401-2 clause predicators, 261, 522
Code of Hammurabi, 231, 688-89, 692 colon, cola, 2, 51, 252, 323-24, 465-66, 473-75, 502, 509, 512, 520, 521-23, 531, 600-601, 643, 792-94 community lament, 235, 282, 400-401, 403, 406, 410, 580, 582, 591, 595-96, 813, 831-32, 937 comparative studies, 132 complaints, 26-27, 33, 62, 66, 74-75, 108, 137, 203-4, 228, 230, 235-36, 348, 356-57, 360, 366, 370, 373, 375, 384, 386-87, 394-97, 405, 407-8, 410-11, 413, 421, 434, 436, 528, 582, 599, 651, 670, 689, 712, 774, 793, 809, 862, 892-93 Complaints of Khakheperresonb, 137, 354, 356 confidence, 5, 57-59, 75, 235-36, 248, 251, 256-57, 266, 268, 289-90, 328, 344, 350-51, 359-60, 363, 370, 373, 383, 386, 390, 399, 408, 419, 425, 437, 467, 470, 500, 528, 540, 603, 642, 659, 711-12, 774, 780, 810, 812, 814-16, 854, 914, 921, 937-38 consonance, 512, 770-72
corporate laments, 384-85, 387-88, 390-94, 396-97, 596 cosmetics, 186, 923
cosmic battle, 60-61
cosmogony, 43, 60, 62, 481
cosmology, 42, 48, 51, 69, 80, 343, 852, 903-4, 938
Counsels of a Pessimist, 134 covenant, 25-27, 32-34, 49, 53, 63, 75, 90, 100, 116, 118-19, 127, 150, 160, 164-68, 174, 183, 185-86, 196-97, 204, 223, 225-26, 229, 236, 246, 249-50, 252, 258, 268, 288-91, 316, 326-29, 344, 364, 372, 376-77, 390, 392-93, 397-98, 405-6, 408, 418-19, 421, 433-34, 436-37, 444, 449, 452-53, 455, 468-69, 470-71, 478, 484, 487-88, 491, 493, 495, 528, 533, 535, 549, 559-60, 565, 576, 579, 581, 590, 599, 610-11, 616-17, 641-42, 645-46, 650-51, 664, 668, 670, 675-76,

- 680-85, 695, 699, 701, 703, 711,
725, 729, 733-35, 738-39, 769,
776-78, 790, 806, 809-13, 815-16,
819, 824-26, 839, 852, 855-64,
869, 871, 895, 900, 902-3, 909,
915, 920-21, 924, 930, 932, 937,
939
- covenant festival, 75, 806
- creation, 6, 11, 13-14, 18-20, 30, 33,
42-43, 46-51, 60-70, 79-81, 83,
85-86, 89, 93, 100, 102, 106, 114,
116, 118, 144, 194-95, 197-98,
201-2, 213, 228-30, 235, 237, 249,
251, 253, 255, 257-58, 290, 302-4,
323, 325-26, 328, 330, 335, 368,
371, 391, 417, 431, 481-83, 487,
498-99, 502, 508, 516-17, 519,
531, 533, 547, 550-51, 570, 576,
583, 588, 591, 597, 601-3, 637,
642, 666, 672, 694, 704, 706, 745,
767, 774, 779, 786-87, 789, 811,
814-15, 821, 823, 825-26, 838,
844-45, 854-55, 857-58, 862, 869-
72, 891-94, 903-6, 908-10, 913-
15, 932-33, 937
- creation imagery, 60-62, 583, 591,
893-94
- creation theology, 60, 63-65, 68-
70, 854, 862, 870, 891, 893, 904,
909
- Creator, 14, 20, 62-63, 65, 67-68,
71, 80, 91, 194-95, 197-98, 201,
226, 243, 249-47, 304, 359, 481-
82, 580, 583-84, 591, 600, 645,
738, 744, 778-79, 854, 856, 859,
862, 870-71, 876, 903-4, 906,
908-10, 915, 932
- cult, 25, 52, 71-84, 127, 150, 196,
209, 225, 230-32, 235, 282-83,
286, 329, 346, 349, 375, 447-49, 484, 525, 527, 556, 559, 576, 578-
81, 584-85, 595, 604, 609-11,
616-17, 619, 623, 629, 648, 650,
665, 710, 733-34, 743-45, 750,
753-54, 756-58, 767, 806-7, 842,
846, 859, 869-70, 902, 929-31,
933-34, 937-38, 940
- cultic poetry, 230, 235
- curses, 32, 68, 75, 88, 117, 203, 210,
222, 238, 289, 314-19, 337, 349,
362, 406, 433, 435-36, 453, 543-
44, 650, 681-82, 731, 777-79, 813,
- Cuthean Legend of Naram-Sin, 897
- Dahood, M., 5, 56-57, 135, 138,
156, 160, 263, 267, 499-500, 599,
604, 610, 612, 619-20
- Daughter of Zion, 409, 413, 605, 834, 918
- David, 3, 14, 22, 24-26, 30-34, 36,
50, 72-73, 76, 86-93, 98, 101, 115,
118, 122, 124-25, 142-43, 151,
229, 234, 236, 238-40, 265-66,
269-70, 272-76, 280, 282-83, 286,
299, 301, 325-27, 329-30, 371,
375-78, 381, 384, 386, 407, 429,
455, 460, 467-72, 483-84, 486-87,
490, 493-94, 525, 539, 552, 560,
578-80, 592, 606-10, 613-20, 636,
640, 664, 668-69, 671, 673-82,
684-85, 692, 694-95, 697, 703,
710-13, 718, 724-25, 733-34, 736-
37, 777, 783, 787-88, 794, 798,
- 811, 819, 824, 838, 859, 866-68,
917, 934, 937-39, 941
- Dead Sea Psalms scroll, 89-93, 579
- Dead Sea Scrolls, 36, 41, 88-99,
124, 169, 180, 541, 560, 579, 580,
632, 728, 761, 763, 795-96, 802,
851, 874
- death, 5-8, 10, 19, 22-24, 41-43, 52-
53, 66, 81, 83-84, 101, 104-6, 111,
125-30, 133-35, 137, 163, 165-66,
168-69, 173, 177, 190-91, 194-95,
206, 209-10, 214, 220, 226, 230,
236, 239, 241, 243, 257-58, 276,
290, 292, 295, 308, 316, 322, 349,
354-55, 358, 367, 371, 373, 381-
82, 387, 390, 392, 396, 400, 416-
17, 426, 431-32, 434-36, 450, 452,
458, 470, 472, 479, 490, 494, 517-
18, 521, 524, 526-28, 544-45, 547,
549, 576, 592, 596-97, 600, 603,
606-7, 617-18, 637-39, 642, 645-
46, 650-52, 654, 666, 687-89,
695-97, 700, 711-13, 719, 723-24,
726, 729, 743, 751, 754, 761, 765,
775, 777-78, 780-81, 789, 808-9,
811-13, 815, 818-19, 821-22, 824,
832, 854, 861, 870, 887, 893, 899,
909, 911, 917, 920-21, 923, 930,
933-34
- debate, 9, 20, 38, 40, 64, 72, 74, 95,
108-12, 123, 128, 141-42, 144,
147-48, 169, 201, 203, 238, 247,
266, 268, 276, 297, 315, 325, 351,
360, 367, 373, 375, 423, 429, 453-
56, 472, 502, 510, 518, 520, 523,
552, 580, 622, 638, 643, 667, 672,
722, 761, 772, 779, 780, 789, 795,
821, 860, 863-64, 891-93, 905-6,
911, 920
- deer, 16, 73, 312, 567, 587, 643, 870
- defeat, 8, 23, 42, 44, 48-50, 64, 83,
170-71, 174, 206, 269, 291, 316,
326, 328, 393, 401, 404, 421, 585,
602, 631, 713, 724, 819-20, 829,
831-34, 937, 940
- deliverance, 5, 23, 27, 50, 58, 88,
93, 101, 163, 166, 168-69, 175-79,
183, 186, 190, 204-5, 226, 235,
240, 250, 271, 274, 290, 303-4,
328, 330, 346, 350, 360, 376, 388,
391-92, 396, 405, 410, 418, 472,
477, 480, 482, 492, 495, 584-85,
588, 590-91, 596, 618, 620, 633,
644, 646, 651, 664, 669, 698, 710-
14, 724, 727, 776, 781, 805-8,
819, 823, 830, 832, 887, 930, 932,
939, 940
- democratization, 376-77, 669-70, 672
- destruction, 6, 8, 16, 19, 25, 52, 64,
82-83, 89, 97, 99-102, 106, 119,
166, 168, 176, 191, 236, 254, 271,
278, 285, 390, 392-93, 399-403,
405, 410-12, 414-18, 424, 436,
459-61, 465, 472, 485, 517, 576,
582, 590-91, 595-96, 633, 644,
652, 667, 780, 783, 788, 795, 814,
829, 830-34, 857, 883, 885, 923,
934, 937, 940
- Dialogue of Pessimism, 81, 83,
134, 335, 353, 430, 809, 897, 898
- diaspora, 470
- didactic narrative, 229, 238-40, 894
- didactic wisdom, 2, 281
- dirge, 236, 348, 400-401, 410, 439, 475-76, 619, 917, 940
- discipline, 4, 15, 66, 79, 188, 193,
201-2, 226, 228, 234, 252, 255,
282, 293, 297, 322, 324, 396, 404-
5, 407-8, 435, 495, 533-34, 549,
572, 623, 666, 713, 723-34, 815,
823, 859, 919
- discourse, 12, 79, 80, 102-3, 107,
125, 134, 207-8, 237-39, 288, 292,
308, 328, 331, 333, 335, 338, 342-
43, 438, 420, 423, 441, 444, 451,
507, 542, 544-45, 548-49, 571-72,
574, 576, 651, 657, 661, 729, 791,
808-9, 834, 864, 887, 912, 926,
928
- disputation, 108, 110-12, 203-4,
228, 232, 238, 252, 369, 373, 657,
881, 892, 896, 898
- divine presence, 116-17, 119, 235,
433, 436, 826
- divine sovereignty, 52, 396, 491, 499, 834, 908
- divine warrior, 469, 591, 776, 831, 832, 867, 940
- dogs, 16, 285, 337, 348, 353, 528, 569, 869
- donkeys, 15, 65, 70, 109, 165, 358, 690, 818, 869
- doves, 18, 68, 348, 482, 486, 615,
617, 735, 758, 837-38, 840, 871,
899, 918
- drama, 7, 44, 110, 126, 128, 239,
242, 283, 325, 340, 440, 442-43,
455, 488, 518, 568, 633, 643, 656,
673, 679, 685, 742-43, 746, 752,
764, 767, 923
- dramatist, 745
- dreams, 75, 79, 182-83, 206, 298-99, 337, 350, 432, 600, 723, 733,
738, 746-47, 758, 839, 849-52,
883
- eagles, 17, 69, 432, 546, 563, 818, 869, 870
- Early Biblical Hebrew (EBH), 262, 266
- early Christianity, 91, 93, 143, 148,
176, 288, 329, 366, 377, 390, 416-
17, 443, 470, 473, 485, 488, 570,
592, 606, 721, 763-64, 797, 846,
912, 916
- Ecclesiastes Rabbah*, 458
- Ecclesiasticus. See Sirach
- editorial criticism, 149-56
- education, 132, 171, 209, 229, 270,
329, 430, 704, 705, 707-9, 768,
843, 854, 877, 894
- Edwards, Jonathan, 566, 571, 577
- Egypt, Egyptian, 1, 8-9, 18, 20, 29,
42, 43, 45-50, 52-53, 60-61, 65,
70, 77, 80-82, 84-85, 87, 107, 111-
12, 127, 131-32, 136-38, 140, 145,
147, 159, 166, 174, 183-84, 202,
207, 218, 220-21, 229-31, 237,
239, 264, 270, 283-84, 304, 321-
22, 335, 346, 354-61, 363, 365,
389, 392, 429-30, 439-40, 445,
447-52, 458-60, 482, 488, 511,
522, 529-31, 534-35, 537-38, 540-
41, 545-47, 549, 552-55, 557-66,
- 572-77, 583, 590, 593-94, 597,
599, 602-3, 605, 607, 615, 623-26,
628, 640, 642, 646, 648-50, 654,
671, 687-88, 690, 704-10, 718,
720, 722, 725, 727, 730, 739, 743-
44, 746, 749, 750-54, 758-59, 767,
769, 782-83, 787, 809, 830-32,
838, 840-42, 846-48, 855, 864-67,
873, 876, 882, 885, 887, 889-90,
894-98, 901-2, 905, 914, 916, 920,
926, 930
- Elamite, 162, 171, 411, 632, 688, 782
- Elihu, 6, 94, 101, 110, 112, 203, 238, 243, 252, 255, 277, 296-97,
322-34, 337-43, 346, 350, 357,
372-73, 423, 650, 653, 660, 662-
63, 668, 866-67, 875, 893
- ellipsis, 156-60, 260-61, 465, 503,
511, 520, 522, 599, 793-94, 927
- Eloquent Peasant, 107, 137, 358, 574
- empathy, 29, 397
- enemy, enemies, 5, 14-17, 19, 22-23, 25, 50-51, 59, 71-72, 74-76,
82, 87-88, 100-101, 118, 165-66,
170, 172, 174, 180, 185, 190-92,
194, 198-99, 201, 228, 235, 252,
256-57, 289-91, 314, 316, 318-19,
324, 348, 356-57, 362, 372, 376,
382, 384-85, 387-91, 393, 397-98,
401, 404-7, 413, 434, 436-37, 455,
463, 467, 469, 480, 517, 526-528,
532, 580, 583-85, 586, 588, 591,
594, 596, 601-2, 619, 625-26, 629,
631, 642, 645-46, 651, 659, 664,
670, 710-14, 717, 719, 721, 726,
730, 757, 775-76, 813, 817, 819-
20, 823, 829-33, 840, 889, 898-99,
917, 923, 926, 928, 930, 932, 936-37
- Enheduanna, 440, 594-95, 605
- enthronement, 49, 50, 74-5, 77,
376, 499, 528, 580-81, 583-84,
590, 592, 603-4, 610, 668, 932,
937
- enthronement psalms, 74, 77, 499,
583, 584, 590, 592, 937
- entrance liturgies, 580, 641
- Enuma Elish, 42, 44, 47, 49, 62, 230, 601-3, 718
- envelope structure, 323, 641
- equity, 197-98, 450, 664, 666, 844
- eroticism, 40, 68, 452, 456, 660,
735, 738, 740, 744, 747, 754-55,
757, 760-61, 765, 767, 836-37,
841, 898, 926
- Ershemma, 595
- Esther, 160-92
- Esther, Greek versions of, 173, 176
- eternity, 47, 66, 256, 327, 359, 660, 820, 825-26, 915, 939
- ethics, 48, 75, 79, 106, 159, 171-72,
175, 180, 193-200, 203, 207, 242,
287, 299, 319, 337, 344, 392, 442,
449, 492, 534, 537, 559, 572, 575,
585, 606, 642, 647, 649, 655, 684-
85, 696, 706, 724, 760, 821, 833-
34, 843-44, 846, 852, 856-57,
861-63, 866, 871, 882, 892, 903
- evil, 19, 47, 49-51, 61, 64, 82, 85, 102-4, 125, 130, 152, 162-63, 166,

- 176, 191, 194-95, 198, 200, 202-4, 207-8, 219, 223-24, 251, 253-54, 256-57, 316, 321, 336-37, 350-51, 353, 368, 370, 372, 385, 395, 397, 415, 434-35, 448, 482, 491, 493, 517, 519, 531, 539, 542, 544, 567-68, 576, 578, 586, 600, 645, 647-49, 665, 667-68, 672, 681, 688, 710, 712, 715-17, 724, 726, 729, 771, 777, 808-10, 812-14, 818-19, 823, 829, 830, 834, 843, 846, 853, 856, 859-60, 883, 892, 897, 899-900, 906-8, 911, 913, 923, 927, 933, 940
- exile, 1, 24-27, 74, 93, 123-24, 127, 136, 146, 160, 162, 165-67, 188, 232, 256, 262, 264, 269, 276, 279, 282, 285, 291, 328-30, 343, 386, 391-94, 397-400, 402, 404, 406, 408, 414, 417-18, 426, 436, 459, 461, 476-78, 494, 518, 528, 560, 590, 608-9, 617, 625, 674-75, 683, 763, 787, 788, 808, 831, 861, 872, 918, 936, 940
- eyes, 1, 3, 13, 18, 22, 56, 59, 64-65, 69, 84, 104, 119, 141, 144, 194, 202, 206, 213, 221, 224, 242, 251, 268, 279, 285, 292-94, 296, 298, 309, 348-49, 384, 387, 395, 420, 426, 433, 448, 453, 470, 488, 517, 543, 546, 558, 571-72, 600, 655-56, 691, 702, 712, 716, 729-30, 741, 752, 756, 758, 794, 810, 814, 822, 837-41, 907, 918-19, 922, 927
- family, 21, 22, 66, 76, 95, 104, 106, 114, 134, 144, 190, 203, 205, 207, 209, 212-13, 229-31, 240, 250, 270, 275, 294, 298, 322, 330, 344, 347-48, 350, 358-59, 372, 379-81, 421, 424-25, 432-33, 435-36, 449, 451, 454, 477, 489, 495, 525, 536, 541, 545, 548, 554, 572-73, 598, 657, 661, 671, 673, 675, 677-84, 687-90, 692, 700-701, 708-9, 724, 729, 730, 733-36, 751, 758, 796, 812, 827, 832, 862, 864, 867-68, 872, 894-895, 918, 921, 926, 933
- fear of God/Lord/Yahweh, 78-79, 105, 119, 128, 142, 197-98, 201-5, 223, 226, 243, 250-51, 253, 292, 295, 325, 372, 432, 434-35, 537, 549, 585, 667, 706, 723, 725-26, 777, 779, 810, 815-16, 844, 854, 857, 859, 860-61, 877-78, 884, 892, 900-901, 905-8, 911, 921, 930, 933
- Feats and Exploits of Ninurta, 42
- feminist interpretation, 190, 205-16, 277, 279, 699, 703, 828, 912, 916
- fertility, 15, 68, 82, 107, 220-22, 236, 240, 257, 379, 617, 628-29, 697, 743-45, 750, 754
- fertility cult, 743-45
- festivals, 39-40, 74-75, 80, 82, 135, 143, 150, 154, 162-63, 166-67, 169, 175, 190, 207, 229, 234, 238-40, 271, 282, 399, 415, 457-64, 480, 494-95, 499, 579, 581-85, 604, 610, 614, 631-33, 680, 693, 752, 784, 788, 790, 806-8, 823, 931, 932, 934
- fish, 1, 18, 45, 69, 348, 355, 705, 758
- fool, folly, 7, 12-13, 15, 22, 55, 66, 80, 82, 100, 104-5, 112, 127, 129-30, 144, 178, 201, 222-27, 239-40, 243, 251, 289, 292-93, 296, 352, 381, 432, 435-36, 518-19, 530, 533, 535, 544-45, 549-50, 569-70, 586, 638-39, 723, 726, 733, 735-36, 775-76, 779, 810, 814, 830, 854-55, 857, 888, 907-8, 910-11, 913, 923, 933-34
- form criticism, 146-47, 227-28, 231-34, 263, 384, 451, 499, 580-81, 609-12, 655, 807, 933
- fortress, 23, 58, 86, 119, 407, 468, 482, 525-27, 589, 591, 642, 712, 798, 819, 836, 900, 936
- foxes, 16, 101, 871
- frame narrative/narrator, 30, 124-26, 128-29, 137, 147, 204, 241-44, 324, 361, 635, 637-39, 813
- futility, 12, 109, 127, 133-34, 137, 239, 316, 434-35, 509, 638
- gapping, 503, 511, 522, 927
- gates, 23, 72, 199, 296-97, 347, 350-51, 380, 385, 426, 478-79, 546, 623, 682, 684, 691-92, 703, 732, 782-83, 839, 865, 883, 899, 913, 921
- gazelle, 16, 68, 325, 481-82, 568, 643, 746, 753, 758, 838-71, 898, 924
- genealogies, 26, 34, 258, 330, 371, 472, 477, 490, 493, 673, 676-81, 683, 685, 692-93, 695-96, 703, 822
- genre, 1, 27-31, 35, 51, 54, 57-59, 62, 72, 84, 93, 107-8, 134, 137, 145-47, 150-51, 153, 180-81, 227-28, 230-39, 242, 246, 262, 266, 276, 281-82, 284-86, 300-301, 325, 329, 335-36, 346, 354-55, 374-75, 384, 386, 388, 394, 400-401, 411, 418, 420, 436, 438-40, 442, 454, 470, 474, 476, 484, 488, 492, 494-95, 504, 531-33, 535, 542-43, 545-48, 581, 595-96, 615, 636, 652, 655, 657, 665, 676, 694, 722, 726, 740, 754, 758-59, 761, 767, 769, 774, 778, 791, 805-9, 811, 813, 827, 833, 835-40, 846, 848, 850, 852, 863-65, 869, 872, 878, 880, 887-88, 891-94, 897-98, 916, 932-33
- God, 246-59
- goats, 13-14, 16, 68, 485, 756, 818, 837-38, 869-70, 919
- god, gods, 19-20, 42-44, 46-52, 63, 78, 80-82, 84-85, 111-17, 133, 135, 137, 162, 166, 171-73, 179, 202, 213, 230, 236, 248-50, 271, 290-92, 303, 314-15, 317, 337, 344-357, 360, 392, 401, 410-13, 420, 448-50, 490-91, 527, 547, 550-51, 559, 583-84, 587, 593-604, 617, 621, 625-26, 628-30, 632, 647-49, 688, 695, 740, 743-44, 752, 757-58, 762, 767, 778, 782, 798, 809, 827, 831-33, 841, 860, 862, 896-97, 899, 900, 903, 906, 909, 913-14, 919-20, 930-33, 937
- goddess, goddesses, 42-44, 47, 49, 64, 80, 83-85, 107, 112, 136, 162, 188, 207-9, 236-37, 348, 352-53, 401, 411-12, 447-50, 547, 550, 559, 565, 574-76, 595, 598, 743-44, 751, 754-57, 833, 897, 899, 905, 913-14, 920
- grammar, 13, 54-55, 86, 94, 114, 124, 177-80, 233, 260-62, 264, 307, 323, 388-89, 391, 417, 474, 499, 502-4, 506-8, 516, 520-22, 587-88, 600, 607-9, 652, 660, 696, 706, 766, 770-71, 795-97, 799, 802-3, 929
- grammatical parallelism, 521, 600, 770-71
- Great Hymn to Aten, 597
- Greek wisdom, 842
- Gregory the Great, 368, 765
- Gunkel, H., 42, 53, 59, 72-75, 77, 146-47, 150, 229-30, 240-41, 270-71, 280, 282-84, 287, 305, 375-76, 378, 387, 398, 400-401, 409, 497, 500, 580-81, 584-85, 593, 609-10, 613-14, 616-17, 621, 625, 655, 670, 676, 686, 698, 700, 805-8, 932, 935
- hair, 14, 18, 220, 412, 568, 625, 628, 752-53, 756, 837-41, 919
- Haman, 10, 101, 161-67, 171, 173-75, 177-79, 181-83, 190-92, 215-16, 240, 275-76, 278, 295-96, 426, 463, 472, 477-79, 492-94, 631-33, 719, 922-23
- hemistich, 520
- hermeneutics, 40, 51, 121, 146, 168, 216, 267-69, 272, 274-75, 279, 367, 415, 444, 510, 549, 567, 570, 606-8, 621-24, 698, 724, 760, 765-69, 795, 815, 836, 865, 888, 893
- Herodotus, 8-11, 21, 162-63, 170-75, 180, 189, 781-83, 827, 864
- Hezekiah, 25, 76, 197, 200, 236, 459, 536-37, 540-41, 552, 555, 575, 671, 674, 704, 708, 719, 724-25, 735, 743, 800, 867, 895
- Hippolytus, 570, 764
- historical allusions, 673, 865, 869-71
- historical criticism, 145, 227, 281, 283, 285-86, 327, 417, 637
- historical narrative, 168, 231, 240, 329, 495, 531, 585, 668, 734, 869, 873
- historiography, 172, 281, 676, 722, 863-64, 871-73
- Hittite Laws, 690, 693
- Hittite prayers, 598
- honor, 6, 10, 21, 68-69, 80, 83, 85, 103, 167, 173, 177, 180, 203, 251, 263, 287-303, 331, 338, 347, 349, 352-53, 359-60, 362, 364-65, 376, 381, 386, 423, 433, 452, 469, 478-79, 494, 544, 556, 591, 658, 666, 670, 673, 677-78, 708, 713, 723, 726, 729-31, 744, 780, 834, 871, 875, 900, 907, 920, 923
- honor challenges, 291, 293, 295-96
- horses, 10, 15, 70, 137, 142, 158, 163, 173, 296, 337, 479, 516, 532, 591, 627, 711-12, 753, 818, 869, 870, 923
- hospitality, 365, 690, 730
- house, 21-23, 43, 59, 72, 100-101, 104-5, 113, 117, 127, 189-90, 196, 202, 210, 213, 220, 222, 224, 243, 300, 302, 306, 329, 353, 363, 366-67, 373, 377, 379, 393, 402, 411, 436, 451-52, 469, 477, 490, 492-94, 518, 523, 544, 546, 550, 584, 594, 614, 616, 620, 664, 674-79, 682, 688-89, 694-95, 705-06, 734, 743, 746, 751-52, 756-57, 772-73, 785, 787, 790, 827, 835, 863, 866, 872-73, 883, 899, 907, 913-14, 932-33
- household, 21, 24, 105, 189-90, 196, 213, 243, 293-96, 426, 433, 453, 684, 688-89, 729-31, 921
- Hugh of St. Cher, 697-98
- human body, 22, 105, 570
- humanity, 60, 62-66, 68-70, 79, 105, 126-27, 133-34, 138, 144, 194-96, 198, 277, 328, 364, 368, 370, 378, 407, 431, 437, 512, 569, 646, 676, 685, 698, 738, 760, 764, 768, 809, 813-14, 818, 820, 822-23, 833, 854, 856-57, 869, 873, 897, 932
- Hymn to Aten, 602-3, 605
- hymns, 2-3, 37, 39, 48, 57, 59, 80, 84-85, 105-6, 150, 194, 230, 232, 235, 238-39, 247, 250, 253, 263, 282, 300-305, 324, 326, 329, 333, 341, 343, 346-48, 350, 360, 385, 387, 391, 393, 412, 448, 468, 470, 487-88, 499, 506, 559, 580, 582-83, 592, 594-600, 602-3, 614-15, 619-20, 642, 664, 669, 670, 705, 708, 722, 724, 738, 752, 761, 774-75, 780, 793, 805-6, 808, 891-92, 894, 905, 932, 939
- hyperbole, 240, 468, 656, 671, 916, 924
- I Will Praise the Lord of Wisdom, 84, 346, 348, 809, 896
- iambic meter, 523
- iconography, 229, 310, 486, 621-26, 628-30, 830, 832, 937
- Iddin-Dagan of Isin, 756
- image of God, 58, 69, 394, 434, 488, 856
- imagery, 15, 17-21, 23-24, 26, 41-42, 44-51, 53, 58, 60-62, 66, 68, 99-101, 118, 134, 149, 206-8, 211-12, 214, 218-19, 224, 276, 306-11, 313, 320-22, 327, 330, 346, 354, 384-85, 398-99, 420, 424, 431-32, 436, 441, 464, 481-82, 517, 520, 522, 525, 527, 543, 578, 581, 583, 594, 599, 600-602, 604, 617, 621-25, 627, 629-30, 660, 670-71, 710, 738, 744, 749, 753-56, 758-60, 763-65, 767-68, 791-92, 794, 817, 819, 829, 830-34, 836-38, 840-41, 852, 893, 898, 937, 939
- imprecation, 100-101, 219, 314-19, 411, 619, 651, 774, 779, 833
- imprisonment, 320-22, 888
- Inanna, 81, 236, 410, 412, 595, 605, 751, 753-57, 759
- inclusio, 2, 150, 152, 154, 202, 239, 323-25, 348, 524, 532, 535-37,

- 589-90, 641, 656, 659, 678, 723-24, 733, 735, 746-47, 749, 773, 906, 921
- individual laments, 3, 235, 282, 384, 386, 388-98, 400-401, 451, 580-81, 584, 596, 665
- innerbiblical exegesis, 325-26
- instruction, 23, 26, 29, 75, 78, 84-85, 100, 102, 134, 152-53, 159, 193, 197, 200, 202, 207, 209, 219, 226, 229, 231, 237, 239, 249, 293-94, 296, 320, 329, 330, 335, 351, 353, 355, 377, 379-80, 384, 389, 397, 420, 422, 430, 433-35, 477, 491, 493, 506, 518-19, 527, 529, 534-35, 545-47, 549, 553-54, 556-58, 564, 572, 585-86, 589-90, 608, 611, 620, 635, 666, 676, 679, 684-85, 694-95, 697, 706-8, 718-19, 725, 735, 741, 806-7, 810, 844, 846, 851-52, 859, 878, 887, 893, 895-99, 905-6, 908, 912, 920, 923, 934
- Instruction for Merika-re, 29, 80, 81, 84, 430, 553, 574, 688, 809
- Instruction of Amenemope, 237, 452, 539, 541, 574, 671, 804, 817
- Instruction of Any, 708, 898
- instructional wisdom, 552-53, 555, 559, 564
- international wisdom, 563, 572-73, 576, 815, 903
- intertextuality, 206, 211-12, 277, 325-27, 331
- irony, 53, 62, 108, 137, 163-64, 181, 198, 244, 253, 276, 354, 479, 493, 504, 620, 656, 658, 671, 827, 928
- jackals, 16, 66, 483, 869
- Jamnia, 35, 38, 142, 169
- Jerome, 37-38, 40, 142-45, 148, 176, 182, 185, 364, 366, 417, 473, 570, 607, 618, 695-97, 765, 797, 799, 802
- Jerusalem, 14, 16, 24-27, 50, 53, 58, 71, 73, 75, 92, 97, 100-101, 113, 116-19, 123-25, 136, 142, 160, 165, 169-70, 181, 184, 213-14, 222, 228-30, 234, 236, 238-40, 262, 267, 269, 270-72, 276, 278-79, 285-86, 290-91, 294, 311, 314, 318, 325, 327, 346, 367, 374, 386, 390, 393-94, 397, 399, 400-403, 407-9, 411, 414-19, 424, 430, 436, 455, 460-61, 464-65, 468, 471, 476-77, 483-84, 516-19, 563, 566-67, 569, 570, 579, 584, 610, 612, 620, 632-33, 636, 643-44, 663, 669, 675, 687, 707, 709, 717-18, 720, 722, 725, 727, 730, 734, 736, 743, 746-47, 757, 762-64, 775-76, 780-81, 783, 788, 801, 813-14, 819, 831, 833-34, 837, 843, 865-68, 885, 895, 917-20, 931, 934, 936-41
- Job, 333-74
- Josephus, 37-38, 40, 174-76, 181-82, 461, 473, 484, 614, 632, 681, 694, 697, 700, 761, 889
- justice, 21, 22, 25-26, 49, 65, 67, 71, 78, 80-82, 85, 107, 112, 118, 129, 136, 156-57, 166, 196-98, 201, 228, 236-37, 249, 252, 254, 285, 291-92, 317, 338-42, 344, 347, 349, 352, 356, 358-62, 367, 369-71, 403-5, 414-15, 420-24, 426-27, 430, 433-34, 436-37, 447-50, 453, 481, 511, 528, 535, 537, 544, 547, 559, 574, 596, 598, 638-39, 647-54, 664-667, 688, 690, 695, 711-12, 714, 716, 724, 730, 775-76, 778-81, 808-12, 814-18, 824, 844-45, 855, 857, 861-62, 882, 887, 904-5, 910, 914, 920, 928
- kingship, 18, 34, 42, 49, 60-62, 74, 86-87, 93, 118, 122-23, 165, 230, 234, 247, 302-4, 321-22, 324, 328-29, 375-78, 391-92, 407, 467-69, 471, 481, 483, 499, 525, 548, 581, 590-92, 605, 642, 648, 664, 669, 671-73, 679, 695, 811, 933, 937-39
- kinship, 379, 421, 730
- Korah, 24, 26-27, 102, 234, 263, 386, 486, 499, 611, 620, 734
- Lamentations Rabbah*, 414-15, 458, 461, 788
- Late Biblical Hebrew (LBH), 262, 264-67, 674-75
- Latin versions, 797
- law, 2, 9, 32-33, 36, 40, 49-50, 65, 79, 80, 81, 108, 117, 128, 150, 160, 163, 179, 185-86, 191, 193-96, 204-5, 212, 219-20, 230-31, 240, 258, 289, 292-93, 304, 320, 356, 364-65, 367-69, 377-81, 384, 396, 420-27, 432-34, 447, 450, 453-54, 460, 471, 480, 485, 490-91, 503-54, 506, 513, 528, 550, 567-68, 576, 589-90, 598, 606, 620, 653, 664, 666, 670, 673-74, 677-80, 682-85, 688-90, 692, 695, 697-98, 700-704, 724-29, 732, 736, 744-45, 760, 773, 786-87, 789-90, 795, 797, 845, 851, 855, 857, 861, 876-78, 880, 882-83, 887, 915, 917, 922
- Laws of Eshnunna, 688-89
- Lemuel, 2, 104-5, 207, 237, 264, 269, 427-30, 453, 511, 537, 540-41, 548, 552-55, 557-59, 562, 564, 661, 666, 708, 735, 793, 800, 868, 878, 895
- leopards, 16, 871
- Leviathan, 19-20, 42, 44-46, 50, 53, 60, 63-65, 67, 70, 339, 392, 583, 591, 602-3, 708, 818-19, 829, 840, 908
- levirate, 32, 40, 240, 299, 379, 380-81, 425-26, 454, 490, 492, 495, 680, 684, 690, 693, 697-98, 702-3, 922
- lexical parallelism, 521
- light, 22, 28, 38, 45, 47-48, 50-51, 58, 62, 72, 74, 89-90, 93, 101, 104, 115, 117, 123, 125, 128, 141, 145-46, 152, 174, 183, 192, 210, 214, 225, 229, 242, 250, 257, 263, 265, 267-68, 271, 276-79, 285, 293, 295, 303, 308-10, 317, 325, 327-29, 344, 351, 363, 376-77, 380, 384, 387, 391-92, 405, 413, 422, 431, 436-37, 442, 448, 467, 469-70, 484, 486, 499, 514, 528, 530, 532, 537, 539, 543, 546-47, 553, 587, 593-97, 602, 604, 608, 611, 626, 633, 646, 658, 672, 679-80, 683, 685, 691, 712, 714, 720, 723, 725, 728, 736, 739, 743-44, 764-67, 780, 799, 805, 808, 818, 820, 839, 843, 845, 880, 882-83, 886, 890, 892, 905, 908, 911, 913, 916, 921, 925, 928, 939
- lions, 15-16, 19, 264, 308, 311, 352, 431, 505, 528, 595, 603, 712, 724, 782, 830, 836, 869-71
- literacy, 309, 541, 569, 718, 894
- literary theory, 325, 327
- liturgical interpretation, 271
- liturgical reading, 161, 460-62
- logos, 655, 658, 660, 844, 887, 901
- love, 8, 17, 21, 23, 33, 68, 72-73, 79, 87, 118, 162, 188, 194, 197, 199, 204-06, 211, 214, 221-22, 239-40, 248, 252, 254, 257, 274, 278, 293, 298, 301-2, 324-25, 327, 329, 357, 364-65, 433-37, 440, 452-56, 465, 468-69, 483, 487-88, 516-17, 519, 524-25, 528, 532, 567-68, 570, 582, 588, 595, 617, 642-43, 657, 660, 664-65, 677, 682-83, 693, 695, 711, 723, 725-26, 735, 738-47, 750-62, 764-69, 777, 811-12, 815, 819, 823, 826, 835-38, 840-41, 845, 861, 866, 868-69, 898, 909-10, 915, 917, 919-921, 924, 932, 934
- love charm, 757-58
- love lyrics, 440, 739, 742-44, 756, 758-59, 840-41
- Love Lyrics of Nabu and Tashmetu, 757
- Love Lyrics of Rim-Sin of Larsa, 757
- Love Poem of a Faithful Lover, 757
- love poetry, 239, 643, 743, 750, 759-61, 767, 898
- Love Song of Nanay and Muati, 757
- Lowth, R. 440, 445, 474, 498-99, 503-4, 506-10, 515, 521, 525, 532, 585-87, 608, 613
- Ludingirra, 754-55
- Luther, Martin, 144-145, 147, 161, 169, 179-81, 370, 608, 613, 698, 700, 765-66
- LXX. See Septuagint
- lyric poetry, 437-45, 708, 837, 886
- lyricism, 438, 444
- maat*, 49, 65, 80, 107, 360, 447-51, 536, 547, 559, 565, 574-76, 649, 809, 905, 914, 920
- Maccabees, 36, 145, 161, 180, 184, 240, 632
- magic, 79, 84, 756, 758, 809
- Maimonides, 161, 369, 763
- Man and His God, 335, 346-47, 351, 361, 392, 809, 896
- mantic wisdom, 846, 849, 850-51, 877
- marriage, 9-10, 21, 32, 40, 62, 107, 171, 174, 180, 186, 190, 206, 212-23, 225, 239-40, 242-43, 270, 299, 365, 379, 380-81, 400, 424-25, 433, 451-57, 488, 490-92, 495, 679-80, 682-84, 688-700, 702-3, 715, 729, 738-39, 741, 743, 753-58, 761-67, 783, 786, 835, 839, 878, 917, 921-22
- meaninglessness, 129, 141, 148, 776
- medieval period, 143-44, 178-79, 181, 192, 361, 369, 417, 419, 428, 458, 561, 570-71, 606-8, 612-13, 618, 633, 696-98, 740-41, 763-67, 785, 790, 796, 802, 885
- memory, 5, 62, 100, 127, 137, 165, 167, 170, 172, 174, 189, 301, 377, 393, 463, 477, 480, 484, 488-89, 495, 498, 610, 642, 644-46, 655, 795, 837
- merism, 464-66, 588
- Mesopotamia, 1, 42, 47, 52, 61, 76, 80, 82, 132-35, 138, 147, 202, 236, 287, 322, 345-46, 348, 351, 353, 360-61, 401-2, 411, 413, 422, 426-27, 430, 439, 481, 488, 517, 541, 553-54, 557-58, 563-66, 572-74, 581, 593-95, 599, 604-5, 610, 623, 629, 648-49, 654, 687, 688, 691, 693, 709, 715, 717, 739, 750-51, 753, 758-59, 782, 809, 833, 849-50, 855, 864, 873-75, 894-95, 897-98, 901-2, 926
- messiah, 93, 247, 249, 329, 408, 466-67, 471-72, 605-6, 612, 762-63
- metaphor, 14-15, 18, 23, 52, 62, 68, 108, 115, 118, 130, 133, 149, 206, 208, 211, 213-14, 220, 222, 237, 239, 291, 306-9, 312, 318, 323, 343, 355, 380, 382-83, 397, 422, 424, 431-32, 438, 440, 442, 452-53, 455, 464, 482, 504, 514, 516, 518, 522, 524-26, 528, 531, 533, 536, 542-43, 549, 550-51, 571-73, 575, 587, 591, 601, 621-23, 656, 659, 719, 741-42, 745, 753, 758, 762, 764, 767-68, 781, 792, 829-30, 834, 838, 846, 866-67, 881, 898, 913-16, 918-19, 926, 928, 940
- meter, 97, 236, 260, 271, 439, 464-65, 472-76, 499, 503, 506, 521, 523, 585, 656, 661, 677, 791
- metonymy, 105-6, 117, 464, 487, 792
- Middle Assyrian Laws, 688
- midrash, 326, 363, 365, 414-15, 541, 614, 616, 785, 867
- Midrash Rabbah*, 192, 458, 480, 539, 917
- Moab, 32-33, 158-59, 212-13, 240, 275, 330, 380, 425, 481, 490-91, 494, 675, 678, 681-82, 687, 696-97, 700-702, 789, 831, 922
- monotheism, 80, 114-16, 250, 316, 344, 360, 363, 449, 575-76, 597, 630, 647, 649, 745, 848, 855, 909
- monsters, 19, 20, 44-48, 50, 64, 602
- Mordecai, 101, 160-68, 170-71, 173-75, 177, 180-83, 185-86, 188, 190-92, 215-16, 240, 256, 275-76, 279, 296, 426, 463, 476-81, 493-95, 631-33, 644, 661, 719, 783, 823, 874, 923
- Mot, 43, 49, 52-53, 339, 364, 600, 937
- Mount Zion, 51, 113, 311, 382, 393, 481, 483, 527, 602, 937, 939-40
- mountains, 14, 16, 23, 44, 50-51,

- 58-62, 64-65, 67, 113, 117, 158-59, 219, 325, 384, 395, 412, 466, 468, 481-83, 498, 522, 526-27, 591, 594, 602, 628-29, 664, 681, 711, 746, 782, 817-18, 820, 836-37, 839, 841, 866, 869, 924, 936-38
- mules, 15
- music, 71, 149, 438, 445, 483-85, 487-89, 499, 734, 805
- myth, mythology 19-20, 42, 44-51, 60, 62-65, 67, 69-70, 80-81, 87, 152, 209, 229-30, 249, 257, 308, 327, 411, 481, 559, 598, 600-602, 610, 626-28, 649, 705, 718, 745, 752, 758, 809, 830, 852
- Naomi, 32-33, 117, 212-13, 219, 240, 258, 270, 275-77, 279-80, 299, 330, 379-81, 425-26, 434, 454, 460, 490-94, 516, 673-74, 676-79, 681-86, 688-92, 694-703, 730, 917, 922
- narrative, 9-10, 29, 40, 51, 56-57, 62, 65, 76, 82, 151-52, 159, 164, 168, 171, 175, 177-78, 180-82, 187, 189, 192, 194-96, 206, 210, 212-13, 215-16, 228-32, 238, 240-44, 265, 269, 273, 275-76, 283, 288, 295, 320, 324, 326, 328, 330, 333, 335, 343-45, 351, 356, 360-61, 366, 376, 379, 380, 390, 402, 417, 420, 425-26, 431, 437-39, 441-55, 459-60, 471, 476-77, 480, 492-95, 498, 513, 544, 550, 554-55, 557, 565, 576, 578, 584, 592, 598, 604, 607, 615, 641, 655, 657, 660-61, 671, 673-74, 676-78, 680-81, 683-85, 692, 695, 698, 707, 715, 730, 736-37, 744, 754, 757, 758-59, 761, 767, 813, 817, 822, 829, 848, 851, 855, 864, 866-67, 869, 872-73, 888, 890-92, 893, 898, 929
- navel, 481, 839, 937
- Neo-Babylonian Laws, 689
- New Testament, 36, 41, 98, 113, 115, 120, 131, 141, 148, 223, 226, 279, 300, 320, 332, 399, 408, 472, 513, 550, 569, 578, 592, 605-6, 686, 693, 695, 720, 726-27, 804, 912, 914, 916
- New Year, New Year festival, 74-76, 230, 238-39, 282, 581, 604, 610, 632, 754-57, 806, 932
- Nicholas of Lyra, 607, 697
- Ninth of Av, 236, 271, 416, 457, 460-63, 784, 788
- nonalphabetic acrostic, 3
- noncanonical psalms, 91-92
- nose, 22, 117, 738, 752, 835-37, 839
- novella, 240, 286, 494-95, 677, 698
- numerical sayings, 231, 237, 239, 529, 534, 722, 724
- Old Persian, 171, 173, 188, 782
- onomastica, 534, 553
- onomatopoeia, 228, 588, 770, 772
- oral culture, 237, 497, 894
- oral poetry, 465, 497-500
- orality, 60, 146, 213, 227, 229-30, 232, 263, 284, 311, 497-500, 531, 540, 581, 656, 698, 705, 718, 785-86, 790, 898
- Origen, 37-38, 143-44, 176, 278, 366, 456, 473, 488, 570, 655, 696, 740, 742, 749-50, 764-66, 799, 845-46
- Orpah, 54, 117, 212-13, 217, 379, 454, 490-92, 695, 697, 699, 700-702, 922
- oxen, 14-15, 173, 350, 373, 435, 440, 528, 535, 754, 818, 869-70, 899
- palaces, 9-10, 19, 21-22, 24, 43-44, 49, 100, 113, 161, 163, 176, 189, 190, 295, 392, 478, 547, 625, 706, 732, 781-83, 826-27, 920, 923
- Papyrus Chester Beatty I, 752
- Papyrus Harris 500, 751
- paradise, 68-69, 437, 739, 863, 870, 872-73
- parallelism, 1, 3, 7, 11, 55-56, 260, 263, 276, 307, 420, 464, 472, 474-75, 481, 498-99, 502-14, 520-21, 523, 533, 542-43, 558, 565, 573-74, 585-88, 594, 599-601, 608, 622, 722, 770, 791, 866, 883, 886, 896, 927, 936
- Passover, 166, 229, 239-40, 271, 457-60, 462, 464, 485, 680, 694, 763, 784, 787, 931
- patience, 12, 79, 248, 328, 330, 362-64, 366-68, 371, 698, 728, 824
- patristic interpretation, 38, 40, 144, 176, 367, 416-17, 569-70, 606-7, 696-97, 741
- Pentecost, 219, 271, 457, 459-60, 680
- peripety, 164, 168
- Persia, Persians, 5-6, 8-11, 21, 37-38, 41-42, 97, 107, 124, 135-136, 141, 147, 161-176, 178-181, 183-186, 188-189, 191, 215, 229, 240-241, 265-266, 268, 275-276, 279, 284-285, 398, 402, 422, 426, 450, 455, 476-478, 492-494, 610, 616, 625, 632, 644, 661, 674, 708, 716, 719, 739, 781-783, 807, 826, 848, 865, 872-873, 897, 921-923, 940
- Persian court, 9, 161, 163, 173, 180, 275, 476-78, 492-94
- personification, 43-44, 46, 52, 82, 101-2, 105, 107, 213, 225, 243, 306, 382, 400, 402, 440, 448, 451, 516-19, 533, 550, 559, 565, 575, 755, 872, 901, 904-6, 913-14, 933
- petition, 5, 33, 59, 71, 137, 287, 290, 327-28, 353, 358-59, 384, 386-89, 391, 394-98, 421, 424, 434, 436, 596, 598-99, 601, 604, 607, 618-20, 713, 786, 919
- Philo, 36-38, 367, 473, 484, 614, 686, 726, 804, 843, 845-46, 876, 888-89, 901
- pigs, 17, 337, 569
- plot development, 396, 443
- Poem of the Righteous Sufferer, 335, 348, 350, 708
- poetics, 11, 152, 306-7, 323, 472-73, 498-99, 559, 572, 659, 864
- poetry, 1-3, 5, 11, 13-15, 17, 20, 44-45, 47-48, 51-52, 54-57, 60, 74, 77, 82, 84, 86, 90, 94-95, 97, 101-3, 146, 149, 150, 152-53, 155-59, 210, 218-20, 222, 230-31, 235-36, 239, 242-43, 246, 248, 252, 260-65, 270, 276-77, 283, 286-87, 304, 306-7, 311-12, 316, 320, 323-24, 326, 328, 343, 348, 358, 361-63, 366, 374, 384-85, 400-402, 420, 424, 433, 437-45, 464-66, 472-76, 481, 484, 487, 497-500, 502-14, 516-17, 520-23, 532-34, 536, 542-43, 550, 558, 560, 562, 565, 578-79, 581, 583, 585-88, 591, 593, 597, 599, 600-601, 603-4, 608, 610, 614, 617, 619-22, 625, 641, 643-46, 657, 659-60, 668, 672, 674, 676-77, 698, 704, 707, 711, 717-19, 722, 728, 738, 743, 747, 749-51, 755, 757-58, 767-74, 791-94, 798, 802, 807, 812, 829-32, 834-36, 840-41, 843, 864, 867, 886, 891, 893, 898, 900, 905-6, 913, 917-19, 925, 927-29, 934, 936
- polytheism, 80, 114-15, 135, 360, 745
- postexilic period, 5, 26, 73, 122-24, 127, 129, 136, 141, 146, 160, 165, 167, 193, 196, 199, 231, 260, 262, 264, 268, 270, 274, 282, 286, 343, 376-77, 386, 388, 392-93, 397-98, 420, 426, 454, 484, 495, 552, 559-60, 572-73, 579, 609-11, 620, 673-75, 698-99, 807, 849-50, 865, 872, 895, 938, 940
- postmodern, 146, 277, 529, 612, 656, 661
- postscript, 154, 339, 615-18
- poverty, 83, 112, 201, 203, 220, 352, 381, 421, 430, 687, 723, 845, 851
- praise, 2, 4-5, 14-16, 25, 27, 46, 52, 61, 63, 65, 67-68, 71-73, 78, 80, 82-83, 85, 87, 100, 104, 111, 113, 115, 117, 150, 199, 205-6, 215, 228-29, 232, 234-35, 247-50, 253, 269, 271, 273-74, 278, 290, 292, 294-95, 299-304, 323-26, 328-29, 346-48, 350-51, 360, 365, 375, 381, 384-85, 387-88, 390-93, 396, 412-13, 433, 439, 442, 449, 466, 473, 482, 484, 486-88, 499, 516, 521, 524-26, 571, 575, 578-79, 582-84, 590, 592, 595-99, 601-2, 605, 607-8, 610-11, 619, 642, 645-47, 664, 669-70, 682, 685, 697, 703, 710, 712-13, 722, 724, 753, 755-56, 773-75, 778, 780, 793, 805-6, 808, 819, 825, 831-32, 836, 845, 855, 887, 891, 893, 899, 900, 920-22, 930-34, 938-40
- prayer, 7, 25-27, 33, 62, 71, 76, 80, 82, 84-87, 89, 94-95, 97, 108, 112, 118, 160, 166-67, 175-77, 183, 185, 194, 206, 231-34, 248, 252, 269, 273-74, 278-79, 288-89, 316-18, 324, 326, 328-29, 349-50, 364, 373, 384-87, 389, 391, 393-98, 401-2, 405-8, 413, 420-21, 425, 430, 470, 482-84, 487, 490, 549, 569, 590, 592-94, 596-99, 605, 607-8, 611, 615-16, 618, 669-70, 672, 702, 705, 708, 710, 723-24, 726-27, 734, 757, 776, 786, 788, 805-7, 812, 815, 819, 825, 830-31, 833, 851, 855, 870, 897, 922, 932-34
- prison, prisoners, 232, 294, 320-23, 417, 713
- Prophecies of Neferti, 354, 356-57, 708
- prophecy, 73, 193, 278, 329, 414-15, 417, 545, 606-8, 696, 724, 788, 847-50, 855, 876-79, 881-83, 922, 938
- protection, 17-20, 23-24, 66, 76, 87, 100, 118, 166, 205-6, 220, 228, 230, 321, 328, 417, 419, 433, 470, 480, 493, 525-28, 533, 596, 618, 631, 648, 652, 684, 688, 711, 787, 830, 832, 870, 887, 917, 922, 936, 938-40
- prophets, 36-37, 39, 50, 73-76, 78, 83, 92, 100, 108, 114, 143, 165-66, 180, 193, 196, 199, 206, 225, 228, 236, 268, 272, 281, 286, 316, 320, 327, 329, 330, 345, 364, 366-68, 393, 399, 400, 402, 404, 406, 408, 414-16, 418, 449, 456, 459, 464, 471, 483, 504, 533-34, 565, 567, 569, 578, 602, 606-7, 611, 616, 620, 644, 650, 665, 670, 687, 695-96, 709, 719, 724, 726, 739, 741, 743, 762, 784, 848-49, 852, 855-57, 877-84, 895, 906, 919, 934
- Protests of the Eloquent Peasant, 354, 358
- proverbs, 7-8, 12-13, 83-84, 102-7, 133-34, 147, 152-54, 197, 199, 201-2, 219, 222, 224, 226, 228, 231, 236-37, 239, 243, 254, 269, 281, 285, 292, 294-95, 297, 324, 335, 373, 428-30, 517, 528-37, 539-45, 547-50, 552, 561, 563, 567, 570-76, 585, 652-54, 666, 671, 677, 705, 719, 722-23, 735-36, 761, 770-71, 778-79, 810, 852, 859-60, 866, 868-70, 877-78, 880-81, 886, 891, 894-96, 898-99, 907-13
- providence, 167, 169, 256, 269, 368-70, 434, 491, 685, 813, 822-23, 857, 940
- psalm titles, 73, 282
- psalms of confidence, 57-59, 812, 933
- psalter, 324, 578
- Pseudo-Solomon, 885, 888, 890
- pun, 71, 440, 925-29
- punishment, 6, 66-67, 81-83, 100, 141, 186, 210-11, 222, 228, 232, 236, 238, 257, 292, 314, 317, 320, 326-27, 339, 346, 353, 359-60, 365, 399, 406, 420, 422-24, 436, 449, 517, 544, 576, 596, 598, 645, 650-52, 654, 665-66, 695, 697, 714, 716, 787-89, 809-11, 813, 815, 825, 828-29, 832-33, 888-89, 899, 907, 919, 930, 940
- Purim, 40, 97, 101, 162-64, 166-70, 173, 175, 177, 181-83, 186-87, 190, 240, 271, 286, 455, 457, 461-64, 480, 495, 631-34, 680, 784, 790, 823, 934
- Qinah, 236, 473, 475-76, 661
- Qohélet, 8, 11-12, 28-31, 40, 66, 82-84, 121-33, 138-49, 193, 204-5, 238-39, 244-45, 269-70, 273, 294-95, 324, 330, 332, 427, 464, 543, 635-40, 642-43, 660, 662,

- 667, 676, 722, 736, 776-77, 779-80, 788-89, 791, 813, 816, 821-22, 860-62, 870, 877-79, 883, 891, 893, 901, 903, 909, 917-18, 924, 933
- Qohelet Rabbah*, 123, 789
- quantitative meter, 475
- Qumran, 35-36, 39-41, 85, 88-99, 102, 113-15, 141, 149, 161, 169, 228, 234, 282, 287, 459, 552, 580, 618, 632, 680, 719, 721, 761, 786, 791, 796, 798-802, 804, 874
- rabbinic interpretation, 143, 177, 364, 428, 787
- Rahab, 19-20, 32, 45-46, 50, 60, 64, 678, 683, 685, 695
- reciprocity, 728, 730-31
- redemption, 3, 33-34, 40, 60, 62, 80, 84, 101-2, 158, 168, 195, 211, 248, 258, 299, 302-4, 340, 357, 366-68, 379-80, 382-83, 421, 425, 461, 463, 472, 482-83, 487, 492, 495, 591, 616, 665, 680, 685, 694, 698, 710-11, 713, 736, 821, 826, 834, 903, 919
- Reformation, Reformers, 140, 142, 144, 147, 169, 175, 179, 362, 370-71, 417-18, 605, 607-8, 640, 693, 698, 721, 741-42, 760, 765, 767
- refrain, 101, 148, 239, 298, 323-24, 404, 443, 454, 523-24, 641-43, 667, 681, 773-74, 777, 789, 917
- refuge, 7, 19, 23, 33, 58, 59, 117-19, 151-52, 204-5, 247, 250, 252, 320, 328, 390, 396, 442, 456, 470, 482-83, 525-27, 589, 591, 665-66, 680, 682, 684, 712, 819, 922, 937-39
- religion, 35, 49, 78-84, 112, 114-15, 119, 135, 145, 175, 179, 193, 196-97, 208, 212, 230, 247-48, 269, 283, 308, 311, 344, 366-67, 392, 430, 445, 449-50, 506, 559, 597, 609, 694, 740, 745, 750, 806-7, 849, 855, 914, 916, 921
- remembrance, 66, 137, 289, 292, 295, 460, 521, 620, 642-46, 823, 933
- retribution, 67, 81, 109-10, 137, 203, 315, 335-37, 339-43, 351-53, 360, 370, 373, 408, 423, 434-36, 463, 544-45, 576, 598, 647-54, 660, 667, 717, 778, 786, 810, 815, 823-25, 846, 854, 856, 903
- rewards, 67, 108-9, 128, 173, 203, 238, 254, 258, 316, 337, 338-39, 341, 346, 353, 360, 364-66, 369, 421, 434, 436, 479, 507, 510, 543-45, 650, 666, 680, 682, 694, 713, 715-16, 776-77, 781, 786, 809-13, 825, 907, 913
- rewritten Bible, 88, 722
- rhetoric, 31, 55, 104, 129, 138, 172, 183, 227, 232, 244, 263, 294, 306-7, 323, 325, 328, 330, 336, 340, 343, 359, 388, 394, 395-96, 402-3, 453, 468, 479, 507, 510, 543-45, 519, 523, 569, 622, 627, 643, 655-61, 690, 702, 752-55, 757, 773-74, 819, 830, 833-34, 836, 843-44, 879, 881, 885, 890-93, 925, 928
- rhetorical criticism, 227, 232, 336, 655-56, 661
- rhyme, 506-7, 512, 521, 523, 770-72
- rhythm, 126, 202, 304, 439, 473, 475, 521, 523, 618, 661, 763, 886
- righteous, righteousness, 7, 15, 21-24, 49-50, 61, 66-67, 80, 82-84, 86, 100, 109, 117-19, 130, 141, 150, 156-57, 159, 175, 177, 185, 196-200, 204, 210, 223, 225, 228, 234, 237-38, 248-49, 251-52, 254-55, 289-90, 292, 296-97, 322, 330, 336-44, 352-53, 361-65, 367, 368-71, 374, 386, 389-90, 395, 398, 414-15, 420-22, 432-37, 447-50, 453, 463, 481-83, 486, 493, 504, 517, 519, 529, 533, 535, 543-44, 551, 567-69, 571-72, 585-86, 588-89, 591, 606, 608, 639, 646-47, 650-53, 658-59, 663-68, 670, 672, 679, 683-85, 698, 711-17, 730, 734, 738, 744, 775-80, 786-87, 809-13, 815, 818, 823-24, 843-45, 851-52, 854, 857, 862, 872, 881, 888-89, 896, 907-11, 913, 919, 930, 937
- rock, 18, 23, 58, 86, 118, 151, 159, 382, 388, 432, 481-82, 485, 525-27, 589, 591, 696, 712, 714, 819, 830, 870
- royal court, 190, 199, 236-40, 270, 530, 557, 573, 668-72, 704, 742, 781, 828, 882
- royal ideology, 49, 408, 430, 669, 937
- royal love songs, 755
- royal palace, 21, 50
- royal psalm, 74, 76-77, 151, 230, 235, 282, 330, 375-78, 391, 393, 451, 469, 580, 581, 584-85, 590-91, 610, 668-71, 830, 832, 892
- Ruth, 672-703
- Ruth Rabbah*, 458, 695, 789
- sages, 7, 29-30, 55, 61, 65-66, 78-82, 83-85, 107, 135, 142, 193, 202, 209, 219, 222, 244, 251, 330, 335-36, 338, 346, 355-58, 360, 372, 415, 427-30, 436, 471, 481, 529, 532-33, 535-36, 539-40, 543-44, 550, 556, 568, 574, 576, 585, 619, 633, 635-39, 658-60, 670-72, 676, 704, 719, 721, 729, 784, 787, 789, 810, 813, 846, 851-52, 854, 856-57, 859, 860, 877-84, 888, 895, 897, 899, 903-4, 906-8, 910, 914, 933
- salvation, 23, 58, 61-63, 65, 81, 84, 86, 88, 118, 168, 204, 212, 232, 247, 250, 281, 303, 326, 329, 367, 388, 393, 397, 405-6, 431, 434, 459, 472, 483, 494, 525-27, 608, 664, 665, 710-14, 725, 738, 741, 760, 763-64, 778, 780, 807, 811, 819, 823-24, 848, 852-53, 855-56, 858-59, 861-62, 883, 899, 938
- Satan, 46, 67, 108, 110, 114, 117, 177, 203, 238, 253-54, 336, 339, 350, 359, 363, 365, 370, 372, 382, 422-23, 435, 528, 571, 652, 714-17, 776-78, 785, 812, 818
- schools, 4, 39, 72, 74, 84, 133-34, 229, 232, 270, 284, 286, 470, 506, 530, 540-41, 572-73, 575, 609, 623-24, 627, 671, 688, 704-9, 767, 785, 850, 872, 894, 895
- scribes, 2-4, 37, 39, 78, 80-81, 84, 94-97, 134, 150, 176, 179, 209, 284, 355-56, 386, 399, 410, 430, 449, 499, 530, 540-41, 546, 553-57, 561, 578, 681, 704-9, 717-19, 721, 739, 743, 753-54, 794-95, 802, 850, 858, 868, 880-81, 894-95
- sea, 9, 13, 16, 18-20, 42-52, 61, 63-65, 67-68, 70, 100, 150, 249, 321, 392, 431-32, 466, 482, 487, 516, 520, 591-92, 602-3, 664, 713, 725, 758, 817-19, 889
- sea monsters, 16, 19, 42, 45-46, 63-64, 67, 70, 249, 321, 602
- Second Temple, 8, 35-36, 77-79, 89, 91-92, 115-16, 149, 181, 240, 268-69, 400, 424, 427, 457-59, 463-64, 485, 567, 632, 719-22, 728, 733, 744, 786, 817, 846-48, 850-53, 885, 887-88, 890
- secular wisdom, 900
- semantic parallelism, 474, 508, 521, 600, 770
- Septuagint, 2-3, 7-8, 17, 26, 35-41, 91-93, 95, 97, 99, 113-15, 121, 174, 181-82, 184-87, 216-18, 228, 234, 241, 270, 301, 317, 324, 362-64, 366-67, 371, 379, 416, 427-28, 468, 485-86, 526, 528, 536, 538, 540-41, 552, 561, 566-68, 570, 577-79, 606, 614-20, 631-32, 635-36, 685, 694, 720-21, 728, 733, 764, 785, 795, 797-804, 813, 842-47, 874, 886, 915, 930-931
- sex, sexuality, 15, 23, 107, 207, 210-12, 214, 229, 257, 421, 424, 426, 451-57, 488, 568, 738, 740, 744-45, 750, 754, 757, 760, 762, 764-65, 767-69, 834, 910, 919
- shame, 21, 118, 214, 226, 288-89, 291-94, 296, 298-99, 355, 379, 454, 456, 584, 592, 714, 723, 729-31, 792, 813, 819, 915, 919, 921, 932
- sheep, 13-14, 16, 165, 337, 350, 373, 562, 756-57, 792, 838, 869-70, 919
- short story, 495, 677-78, 728
- Shuilla, 596
- Shulgi of Ur, 755, 759
- Shu-Suen of Ur, 756
- similes, 14, 108, 219, 239, 306, 455, 465, 522, 524, 533, 535-36, 587-89, 656, 751, 758, 927
- sin, sinning, 21, 23, 68-69, 80, 82, 87, 95, 109, 119, 141, 165-66, 168, 179, 186, 195, 204, 213, 224-25, 236, 238, 250, 253-55, 258, 278-79, 281, 293, 296, 322, 326, 328-29, 337, 339, 347-48, 350, 360, 362, 363, 368, 372-74, 390, 395, 397-98, 400, 404-8, 414-17, 420, 423-24, 428, 432, 435-36, 455, 517-18, 533, 536, 578, 596, 598, 607, 625, 645-46, 648, 650, 653-54, 664, 666-67, 682, 710-11, 713, 716-17, 723, 727, 741, 774-76, 779-80, 788-89, 811-12, 814, 821, 823, 834, 854, 858, 908, 910, 915, 931-34, 940, 941
- sinners, 12, 80, 109, 292, 296, 361, 368, 370, 373, 435, 726, 917
- Sirach, 36, 38-39, 41, 82, 84, 91, 141, 145, 219, 220-22, 234, 281, 294, 298, 330, 422, 427, 471, 519, 541, 572, 576, 579, 706, 719-28, 731, 761, 798, 843, 851-53, 887-88, 890, 901, 915, 916
- social science, 270-71, 728, 732
- social space, 732
- Solomon, 25, 28, 30, 39, 40-41, 77, 82-83, 107, 122-24, 138, 142-45, 147, 149, 199-200, 236, 238-39, 250, 267, 269-70, 272-74, 283, 285, 287, 324, 326, 330, 393, 427-29, 440, 456, 461, 464, 467-68, 470-71, 484, 535, 537, 539-40, 542, 545, 550, 552-65, 571, 575, 578, 614, 619-20, 636-37, 666, 668-69, 671-72, 674-75, 681, 704, 708, 712, 719, 724, 726, 733-37, 739-40, 742-44, 746-47, 749-50, 759, 761, 764-66, 787-88, 836, 840, 842, 847, 852, 866-68, 872, 874, 876-78, 882, 885-90, 895, 896, 898-99, 915, 918, 924, 933-34, 936, 940-41
- Song of Songs Rabbah*, 458
- Songs of Ascent, 24, 77, 90, 151-52, 154, 234, 442, 452, 931, 936, 939, 941
- Songs of Zion, 235, 320
- Sons of Korah, 24-27, 102, 234, 263, 386, 499, 608
- sound patterns, 439, 523, 533, 770, 772
- sovereignty of God, 778, 814
- Standard Biblical Hebrew (SBH), 262, 264-66, 673-74
- stanza, 1-3, 90, 236, 323, 352, 403, 406, 412, 463, 468, 523-24, 594, 601-3, 616, 641-42, 725, 751-53, 770, 772-74
- storm imagery, 42, 44, 46-47
- story, stories, 8, 10, 42-43, 45, 48, 51, 65, 68, 70, 105-6, 160-69, 171-76, 178, 181-87, 189, 193-96, 213, 242-43, 265, 269, 270-77, 279, 283, 286, 296, 299, 310-11, 322, 325, 328-30, 351, 353, 360, 364, 369-70, 372-74, 379-81, 394, 422, 425-26, 428, 434, 438, 441, 443-44, 455, 469, 472, 478, 491-92, 494-95, 498, 528, 537, 544-45, 547, 555, 569, 572, 590, 611, 631-33, 639, 661, 674-79, 681, 684, 688, 694-99, 718, 733, 738, 740, 742-44, 747, 755, 758, 781, 822-24, 829, 858, 864, 866, 869, 872, 888-89, 897, 922
- stronghold, 23, 58, 388, 461, 525-26, 586, 712, 819, 936
- strophe, 54, 465, 508, 523-24, 641-42, 770, 772-74
- suffering, 4-5, 19, 60-62, 82, 84, 104, 108-12, 141, 177, 203-4, 206, 209-10, 213-14, 236, 238, 242-43, 253, 255, 257, 274, 278-79, 293, 297, 321, 328, 330, 333, 335-36, 339, 341-53, 355, 359-60, 362-63, 365-67, 369, 372-74, 382, 388, 390, 395, 397, 399, 403-8, 412, 416-19, 422-24, 435-37, 460-61, 495, 517-18, 576, 592, 596, 598,

- 611, 647-51, 653-54, 667, 717,
738, 775-81, 809, 811-12, 815-16,
824, 832-34, 853, 860, 891-92,
896-97, 899, 910, 918
- Sumerian city laments, 286, 410-12, 595
- superscriptions, 73, 77, 86-87, 91,
93, 150-52, 154, 234, 236-39,
281-82, 285, 324, 328, 375-76,
386, 399, 451-52, 471, 485-86,
537, 539, 540-41, 578-80, 590,
607-12, 615, 617, 619, 669-70,
712, 798, 819, 868
- Susa, 9, 161, 164, 166, 170, 173,
190, 192, 276, 476-79, 481, 494-
95, 631, 688, 781-83, 826-27, 923
- syllabic meter, 473-75
- synlepsis, 927
- symbolism, 15, 20-21, 46, 51, 127,
206, 208, 211, 307, 314, 479, 483-
84, 516, 519, 526, 550, 691-92,
696-97, 731, 761-65, 768-69, 783,
830, 839, 848-49, 907
- Symmachius, 797, 799, 803
- synonymous parallelism, 166, 252,
503, 521, 574, 586, 718, 843
- synthetic parallelism, 504, 508-9,
521, 586, 608
- Syriac, 2, 7, 91, 95, 218, 228, 234,
443, 541, 547, 568, 613, 720, 728,
787, 791, 797-803, 926
- Tabernacles, Feast of, 143, 457,
459, 461-63, 614, 616, 632, 680,
932
- Tale of the Eloquent Peasant, 361, 690
- Talmud, 35, 37-38, 40, 101, 142-43,
145, 160-61, 167, 177-78, 181,
363, 415, 455, 457-58, 460-63,
568-69, 579, 633, 673, 680, 693-
94, 696, 740, 766, 784-87, 795, 827
- targum, targumim, 99, 784-91
- Targum Canticles*, 784, 787
- Targum Esther*, 784, 789, 790
- Targum Job*, 93, 784-86
- Targum Lamentations*, 414-15, 784, 788, 790
- Targum Proverbs*, 784-87
- Targum Psalms*, 784-86
- Targum Qohelet*, 784, 788-89
- Targum Ruth*, 784, 789
- temple, 21, 24-25, 27, 61, 64, 71,
73-82, 84, 113, 116-19, 151, 154,
160, 165-66, 178, 183, 229, 231,
234-40, 248, 262, 269, 271-72,
282-83, 291, 326, 329, 350, 352,
356, 376, 385, 389-94, 397, 400-
402, 408, 411-12, 416, 428, 435,
440, 448, 459-61, 463, 478, 483,
485, 486-87, 517, 525-27, 533,
540, 547, 549-50, 556, 559-60,
569, 582, 583, 585, 593-94, 597-
99, 611, 614, 617-20, 626, 629,
633, 641, 665, 668-69, 708, 710,
721, 725, 733-34, 737, 751, 755-
56, 763, 775, 788, 795, 805-7,
819, 827, 832, 859, 872, 883, 885,
913, 920, 931-34, 936, 938, 940
- temple hymns, 440, 594, 599
- terseness, 152, 159, 261, 464-65,
475, 502, 520-23, 542-43, 585,
594, 599-601, 791-94, 800
- Testament of Job*, 363, 371
- tetracolon, 520
- textual criticism, 55, 89, 176, 227,
233, 499, 504, 609, 794-95, 797,
799, 801
- thanksgiving, 2-3, 5, 25, 57-59, 73,
77, 84-85, 90, 229-30, 235, 247,
250, 263, 282, 300-301, 324, 375,
387-91, 393, 396, 405, 420, 449,
473, 488, 580, 584, 588, 607, 620,
646, 655, 713, 722, 724, 805-8, 823, 832, 931, 933, 939
- theodicy, 60, 61, 85, 237, 342, 349,
647-54, 708, 809-11, 813-16, 854,
856, 881, 896, 899, 904
- Theodotion, 797, 799, 803
- theophany, 46, 60-61, 79, 335, 339,
482, 806, 817-20, 838
- thighs, 752, 758, 839-41
- Torah Psalms, 155, 585
- tower, 22-24, 118, 196, 302, 533,
588, 691, 738, 783, 830, 836-40,
866, 888
- trees, 17, 60, 62, 65, 67-68, 70, 121-
22, 159, 194-95, 202, 219-22, 306,
352, 432-34, 464, 466, 477, 486-
87, 516, 522, 524, 606, 659, 723,
738, 753, 755, 760, 780-81, 840,
870, 872, 898, 911
- tricolon, 2, 55, 468, 473, 511-12, 520, 542, 600, 603
- triumph, 171, 185, 592, 625, 712, 831-32
- Turin Love Song, 753
- two ways, 104, 106, 152, 215, 304,
308, 432, 589, 811, 861, 893, 904,
907, 928
- Ugarit, 43, 53-54, 76, 113-14, 135-
36, 139, 283, 313, 345, 347, 409,
439, 451, 484-86, 500, 505-6, 553,
559-60, 598, 610, 627, 654, 687,
690, 705, 708-9, 718, 758-60, 774, 899, 901
- Ugaritic, 1, 2, 42-46, 49, 52-54, 61,
113-16, 160, 224, 262-63, 283,
287, 313, 339, 344, 403, 410, 450,
452, 498-500, 505-6, 515, 560,
588, 598-604, 610, 614, 619, 621,
626, 628, 688, 705-6, 717-18, 758,
841, 926, 937
- vanity, 12, 66, 129, 141, 144, 146,
255, 294, 432, 539, 570, 638, 779,
788
- Vashti, 10, 161-64, 171-74, 176-78,
180, 189-90, 215-17, 275-77, 295,
455, 493-94, 632, 644, 826-28, 922-23
- verset, 502, 509-10, 520
- vindication, 6-7, 61, 75, 102, 288-
91, 338, 340, 342, 355, 361, 366,
369, 382-83, 390, 421, 425, 435,
437, 447-48, 450, 528, 568, 582,
585, 651, 665, 667-68, 711-12,
779-80, 788, 812, 816-17, 819,
852-53, 908, 911
- violence, 54, 162, 190-91, 214, 249,
262, 318, 366, 390, 493, 537, 543-
44, 657-58, 665, 711, 832-34, 940
- virtuous woman, 22, 533, 536, 571, 575, 693, 843
- wall, 9, 23, 59, 101, 298, 349, 356, 448, 525, 597, 707, 714, 782, 832,
838, 845
- warfare, 415, 517, 626, 629, 687, 829, 830-34, 870, 939
- warriors, 32, 69, 162, 166, 172, 206,
353, 392, 397, 403, 469, 487, 507,
580, 598, 641, 711, 713, 729, 820,
829-33, 838, 867-68, 914
- wasf*, 211-12, 239, 743, 835-41
- weapons, 42, 70, 353, 527, 583,
626-29, 714, 730, 829-31, 840, 937
- Westermann, C., 150, 156, 232,
241, 300-301, 305, 333, 346, 388,
396, 398, 400-403, 410, 419, 530,
539, 541, 552, 584, 610, 613, 775-
76, 781, 805-8, 872, 876, 931, 935
- widow, widowhood, 7, 33, 189,
199, 213, 258, 359, 379-81, 400,
414-15, 420, 425, 430, 433, 454-
55, 517, 546, 661, 678, 680, 682,
685, 687-92, 696, 698-99, 702,
729-30, 788, 861, 867-68, 910,
917-20, 922, 924
- Wilson, Gerald H., 27, 59, 93, 99,
150, 153, 156, 234, 241, 332, 376,
378, 446, 470, 472, 489, 502, 515,
528, 532, 539, 580-81, 593, 611,
613, 672, 737, 894
- Wisdom of Solomon, 36, 40-41, 64,
82, 84, 141, 229, 281, 519, 842-
43, 845, 852, 885, 886-90, 901, 915-16
- wisdom poems, 2, 102-3, 238, 723-25, 814, 859, 891-94
- wisdom psalms, 2, 6, 27, 30, 72, 84-
85, 92, 100, 205, 247, 335, 535,
580, 585, 651, 672, 842, 856, 865,
868, 893-94, 900, 933
- wisdom theology, 408, 854, 893-94, 900, 903-4
- woman, women, 7, 10, 16-17, 22-23, 32-33, 68, 76, 83, 87, 102-7,
144, 163-65, 173, 176, 188-89,
191-92, 198-99, 202, 205-16, 221-
22, 224-25, 237, 239-43, 258,
274-77, 279, 288, 294-95, 298-
300, 322, 330, 350, 353, 356-57,
380-81, 400-401, 403-4, 410, 412,
421, 424, 426, 433-35, 452-56,
465-66, 472, 478, 480, 488, 490,
493, 517-19, 521, 536, 542-43,
547, 550, 563, 567, 571, 574, 575,
588, 595, 600, 616, 643, 658, 672-
74, 676, 679, 682-85, 687-92,
695-97, 699-700, 702-3, 723-24,
726, 729, 735, 739-40, 742, 744,
752-59, 761-63, 766-69, 771, 789-
90, 823, 826-27, 833-41, 843, 859,
868, 891, 893, 905-7, 912-14,
916-24, 926, 932-34, 936, 940
- Woman/Lady Folly, 55, 102-3,
105-6, 202, 207, 209, 224-25, 237,
243, 335, 452, 471, 518-19, 537,
542, 544, 550-51, 657, 912-14,
916, 920-21, 933
- Woman/Lady Wisdom, 55, 64-65,
70, 82, 84, 102-3, 105-7, 109, 202-3, 207-9, 217, 224, 237, 243, 335,
432-33, 436, 452, 471, 481, 516,
518-19, 534, 536-37, 542, 544,
547-51, 569-70, 574-77, 657-58,
725, 735, 904, 912-16, 918, 920-
22, 933
- word pairs, 2, 158-59, 465, 492, 498-99, 508, 521, 533, 588
- wordplays, 191, 228, 678, 770, 929
- worship, 15, 24-25, 71-74, 76-85,
115, 119, 149-50, 175, 201-2, 204,
207-9, 235, 247, 268-69, 271-72,
282, 288-91, 301, 317, 324-25,
329, 360, 372, 376, 378, 382, 386,
393-95, 420, 449, 468, 479, 485,
488, 516, 549, 578, 584-85, 592-
94, 597, 602-4, 616, 620, 645,
668-70, 680, 684, 716, 731, 733,
743, 745, 751, 777, 805-7, 819-20,
824, 851, 856, 897, 905-7, 909,
913, 916, 920, 929-34, 938-40
- writing, 1, 2, 4, 28-30, 97, 123, 132,
136, 143, 150, 161, 172, 181, 231-
32, 274-75, 281, 286, 326, 331,
363, 368, 422, 430, 441, 444, 485,
489, 497, 516, 529, 544, 553, 557-
58, 561, 564, 571-72, 594, 603,
606, 618, 623, 636-37, 661, 668,
670, 685, 692, 696, 704-9, 717-19,
722, 734, 767, 785, 789, 794, 822,
835, 864, 871, 873, 879, 881, 887,
894-95, 915, 931
- Xerxes, 8-10, 37, 161-62, 170-75,
183, 189, 190, 240, 476-79, 494,
781, 783, 826-27, 873, 922-23
- Zaphon, 51, 407, 483, 602, 626, 937
- zeugma, 927
- Zion, 27, 53, 61-62, 91, 92, 113-14,
117, 156-58, 214, 217, 235-36,
316, 318, 377, 382, 391-93, 401-2,
404-9, 419, 468, 481, 483, 516-19,
525, 580-81, 583, 592, 599, 602,
610, 612, 664-65, 668, 713, 730,
793, 801, 830, 832-33, 868, 918-
19, 936-41

Articles Index

- Acrostic, 1
 Afterlife, 5
 Ahasuerus, 8
 Ambiguity, 11
 Animal Imagery, 13
 Architectural Imagery, 20
 Asaph and Sons of Korah, 24
 Autobiography, 27
 Boaz, 32
 Canon, 35
 Chaos and Death, 41
 Chiasm, 54
 Confidence, Psalms of, 57
 Creation Imagery, 60
 Creation Theology, 63
 Cult, Worship: Psalms, 71
 Cult, Worship: Wisdom, 78
 David, 86
 Dead Sea Scrolls, 88
 Destruction, 99
 Discourse in Proverbs, 102
 Disputation, 108
 Divine Council, 112
 Divine Presence, 116
 Ecclesiastes 1: Book of, 121
 Ecclesiastes 2: Ancient Near Eastern Background, 132
 Ecclesiastes 3: History of Interpretation, 140
 Editorial Criticism, 149
 Ellipsis, 156
 Esther 1: Book of, 160
 Esther 2: Extrabiblical Background, 170
 Esther 3: History of Interpretation, 175
 Esther 4: Additions, 181
 Esther 5: Greek Versions, 184
 Esther 6: Person, 188
 Ethics, 193
 Fear of the Lord, 201
 Feminist Interpretation, 205
 Floral Imagery, 218
 Folly, 223
 Form Criticism, 227
 Frame Narrative, 241
 God, 246
 Hebrew Language, 260
 Hermeneutics, 267
 Historical Criticism, 280
 Honor and Shame, 287
 Hymns, 300
 Imagery, 306
 Imprecation, 314
 Imprisonment Imagery, 320
 Inclusio, 323
 Intertextuality, 325
 Job 1: Book of, 333
 Job 2: Ancient Near Eastern Background, 346
 Job 3: History of Interpretation, 361
 Job 4: Person, 371
 Kingship, Psalms of, 375
 Kinsman-Redeemer and Levirate, 378
 Lament, Psalms of, 384
 Lamentations 1: Book of, 399
 Lamentations 2: Ancient Near Eastern Background, 410
 Lamentations 3: History of Interpretation, 414
 Law, 420
 Lemuel and Agur, 427
 Life, Imagery of, 431
 Lyric Poetry, 437
 Maat, 447
 Marriage and Sex, 451
 Megillot and Festivals, 457
 Merism, 464
 Messiah, 466
 Meter, 472
 Mordecai, 476
 Mountain Imagery, 481
 Music, Song, 483
 Naomi, 490
 Novella, Story, Narrative, 492
 Oral Poetry, 497
 Parallelism, 502
 Personification, 516
 Poetics, Terminology of, 520
 Protection Imagery, 525
 Proverb, Genre of, 528
 Proverbs 1: Book of, 539
 Proverbs 2: Ancient Near Eastern Background, 552
 Proverbs 3: History of Interpretation, 566
 Psalms 1: Book of, 578
 Psalms 2: Ancient Near Eastern Background, 593
 Psalms 3: History of Interpretation, 605
 Psalms 4: Titles, 613
 Psalms 5: Iconography, 621
 Purim, 631
 Qohelet, 635
 Refrain, 641
 Remembrance, 643
 Retribution, 647
 Rhetorical Criticism, 655
 Righteousness, 663
 Royal Court, 668
 Ruth 1: Book of, 672
 Ruth 2: Ancient Near Eastern Background, 687
 Ruth 3: History of Interpretation, 693
 Ruth 4: Person, 700
 Sages, Schools, Education, 704
 Salvation and Deliverance Imagery, 710
 Satan, 714
 Scribes, 717
 Sirach, Book of, 720
 Social-Scientific Approaches, 728
 Solomon, 733
 Song of Songs 1: Book of, 737
 Song of Songs 2: Ancient Near Eastern Background, 750
 Song of Songs 3: History of Interpretation, 760
 Sound Patterns, 770
 Stanza, Strophe, 772
 Suffering, 775
 Susa, 781
 Targumim, 784
 Terseness, 791
 Text, Textual Criticism, 794
 Thanksgiving, Psalms of, 805
 Theodicy, 808
 Theophany, 817
 Time, 820
 Vashti, 826
 Warfare Imagery, 829
 Wasf, 835
 Wisdom, Greek, 842
 Wisdom and Apocalyptic, 847
 Wisdom and Biblical Theology, 853
 Wisdom and Covenant, 858
 Wisdom and History, 863
 Wisdom and Prophecy, 876
 Wisdom of Solomon, 885
 Wisdom Poem, 891
 Wisdom Sources, 894
 Wisdom Theology, 901
 Woman Wisdom and Woman Folly, 912
 Women, 916
 Wordplay, 925
 Worship, 929
 Zion, 936

